Prob. b. Through mystical union we are members of Christ's body, of his flesh and of his bones, Eph. 5:30. Which words of Paul are to be understood not of ὁμοουσία, or our consanguinity with Christ on account of his assumption of our flesh, which consanguinity is common to the pious and the impious, but of the mystical union proper to the faithful alone; because the Apostle is speaking of the head of the church, which is his spiritual body, v. 23. Since, however, Christ is the head of the church not only according to his divine, but also his human nature, it follows that we are united not only with the divine nature, but also with the substance of Christ's flesh sacramentally in the use of the supper, and spiritually outside the sacrament.

Prob. c. That the reborn man, consisting of soul and body, is joined with God, is evident from 1 Cor. 3:16: Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you? Which words St. Paul applies to the body of the reborn, 1 Cor. 6:19: Or do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit who is in you? HULSEMANNUS observes, l.c. p. 920, that this union, since it is one of dependence, participation, and subordination of a second cause, or of the faithful man, under the head Christ, infers a closer mode of connecting the physical substance of the human body with the body of Christ, for sealing the certainty of the resurrection and immortality, than with the spiritual substance of the Holy Trinity.

Question XI. In what does mystical union formally consist?

The Form of Mystical Union. The mystical union formally consists both in a special and intrinsic conjunction of the substance of the faithful man with the substance of the Holy Trinity and the flesh of Christ a), and in a gracious operation, by which the most benign God operates in the reborn man with a special and efficacious influx b).

Prob. a & b. From Lev. 26:11-12: I will set my tabernacle among you, and my soul shall not abhor you; but I will walk among you and be your God, and you shall be my people. Which words Paul repeats, 2 Cor. 6:16: God has said: 'I will dwell in them and walk among them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.' The best, greatest God promises two things: a) A gracious inhabitation, which cannot be conceived without a substantial presence; since inhabitation is of a person, not of gifts, which are said not to inhabit, but to be in; b) A walking in our midst, which denotes a gracious operation. A prince walks among his subjects, ruling them; a father among his children, providing for their needs; a teacher among his disciples, instructing them; so God by the Holy Spirit rules, consults, and teaches and illuminates the reborn. Two things therefore pertain to the form of mystical union: 1) a true and real ἀδιαστασία, or proximity, through the approach of the divine substance to the believing man; by which the triune God comes to us and makes his dwelling with us; which therefore is not merely of operation alone, without an approximation of God, but of a closer access or advent to us, so that he may be and remain in us, John 14:23. (*) 2) A gracious ἐνέργεια, or operation, by which God so comes to us and dwells in us, that he fills us with all fullness of wisdom, holiness, power, and other divine gifts, Eph. 3:18. Which also imports a mystical περιχώρησιν, by which God is and remains in us through grace, but we are in God and adhere to him through trust, so that nothing that unites us to God through faith can separate us from God, Rom. 8:38.

Question XII. Can you now distinctly explain what kind of union the spiritual conjunction of God with a reborn and justified man is?

The mystical union is of substances, but not formally substantial a); it is of persons, but not personal with respect to its terminus ad quem b); it is accidental, not with respect to its extremes, but with respect to its terminus ad quem c); it is not παρατατική, or external without communication, but περιχωρητική, inferring a mutual immanence d); it is not a bare adessence, but a presence of God that is ἐνεργητική, or operative e); it is, finally, a conjunction of God with the faithful man that is ἀρμενική, or effecting a harmony of affections f).

Prob. a. The mystical union is not formally, or with respect to its mode, substantial. For one substance does not result from the divine and human substance, as a shoot coalesces with a trunk into one substance of a tree. It can, however, be called substantial objectively, from the extremes of the union; because not only divine gifts and operations, but also the very substance of God is spiritually conjoined with the substance of man. It is more accurately called a union of substances than substantial; because for a formally substantial union it is required that two incomplete substances should coalesce into one complete substance. But in the mystical union, God and the reborn man are complete substances; neither is one changed or transubstantiated into the other. For a) by the benefit of mystical union, God dwells in us as in temples, 1 Cor. 3:16. But a dwelling is not changed into its inhabitant, nor an inhabitant into his dwelling. b) Through mystical union we put on Christ, Gal. 3:27. But a garment is not essentially one with the man who is clothed. c) The divine nature is most distinct from the human, although God comes to us and makes his dwelling with us, John 14:23. For he can withdraw from the man to whom he has approached. Thus the Holy Spirit withdrew from king Saul, 1 Sam. 16:14, and David, from whom he had departed after he had fallen into the crime of adultery, implores God with most ardent sighs not to withdraw the Holy Spirit again, Ps. 51:13. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is essentially distinct from the reborn soul.

(*) Although indeed the very presence of God is infinite and immense everywhere, since God is never absent from anyone, Act. XVII, 27.; nevertheless the mode of presence and conjunction is one thing general, another special and proper to man born again. In the classic passage, 2 Cor. VI, 16. these two are distinguished; I will dwell in them, and also I will walk; of which the former indeed pertains to God's nature, present in some singular way, but the latter to God's operations.

Prob. b. That Christ and the mystically united faithful remain distinct persons, Paul teaches, Gal. 2:20: I live, yet not I (Paul implies that he is a distinct person from Christ), but Christ lives in me (Paul). Wherefore Paul and Christ, as two distinct persons, are discerned by different operations, which are of supposits. Otherwise the sense would be: I live, yet not I, i.e., Christ, but Christ lives in me, i.e., in Christ, than which nothing more absurd can be said. Personal union therefore differs from mystical: 1) In its extremes. The former unites the divine nature, which is τῷ λόγῳ αὐθυπόστατος, i.e., possessing its own subsistence, with the assumed human nature, which is ἀνυπόστατος, i.e., destitute of its own hypostasis; the latter joins the whole Holy Trinity by the bond of faith with a plurality of completely subsisting men. 2) In its terminus ad quem. The former terminates in one composite person (σύνθετον); the latter in one mystical being united per accidens. 3) In its mode. The former is indissoluble, the latter is dissoluble; by the former, the nature of the λόγος dwells in the assumed flesh σωματικῶς (bodily), as in a singular temple; by the latter, the triune God dwells in the reborn man πνευματικῶς (spiritually), as in a common temple. 4) In the degree, which mystical union admits, since, according to the increase or decrease of faith, it is now closer, now weaker; but personal union admits no degree, since it is always the same. 5) In the consequent communication. By personal union, infinite gifts are communicated to the flesh of Christ for possession and use; by mystical union, finite gifts are communicated to the reborn for subjective inhesion. 6) In the predication, which the former begets as personal, the latter as accidental.

Prob. c. The mystical union is called accidental, not from the united extremes, since they are substances, but from its terminus ad quem; because it does not terminate in a unity per se, as two incomplete substances concur to constitute one complete substance, e.g., soul and body constitute one man. But God and man are complete substances, and constitute one mystical being united per accidens. For which reason, mystical union is not indeed essential, yet neither is it accidental with respect to its extremes; because not only divine gifts, nor merely the gracious operation of God, but also the very substance of God is intimately united with the substance of the faithful man. Which is demonstrated:

1. Because the three persons of the Deity are said to come to the faithful and make their dwelling with them, John 14:23. But the persons of the Deity are not accidents, and to come to someone denotes an approximation to the same. To make a dwelling is never said of gifts, or of operations considered abstractly, but of operating persons.

2. God dwells in the faithful as in temples, 1 Cor. 3:16. Temples are said to be consecrated to God, not to gifts, not to divine operations. To inhabit a temple denotes a substantial presence. Gifts alone, operations alone are not said to inhabit.

3. From Gal. 4:6: God has sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying out, 'Abba, Father!' Here the Apostle openly distinguishes the substantial approximation of the Holy Spirit from the gracious cry, and so announces both that the substance of the Holy Spirit approaches more closely, and that it exerts its gifts more.

4. From 1 Cor. 6:15-17: Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a harlot? Or do you not know that he who is joined to a harlot is one body? For 'the two,' He says, 'shall become one flesh.' But he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit with Him. Whence an argument is born: In the way that, with respect to the extremes to be united, a man and a woman become one flesh, in that way Christ and the faithful are one spirit; But a man and a woman become one flesh through the union of substances; Therefore...

5. Those who are members of the body of Christ, of his flesh and of his bones, are united with Christ with respect to substance; But the reborn etc. Therefore... The minor is evident from Eph. 5:30.

6. Those who are united to Christ in the way that branches are to the vine, are joined in their substance to the substance of Christ; But the reborn etc. Therefore...

7. The reborn are κοινωνοὶ θείας φύσεως, partakers of the divine nature, 2 Pet. 1:4. But the communication of the divine nature denotes more than the participation of gifts or operations, since reborn and justified men have communion not only with divine gifts or operations, but also with God the Father and his Son, 1 John 1:3. From which we gather: Those to whom God is so united that he makes them partakers of his divine nature, to them he is joined not only by his gifts and operation, but also by the conjunction of his divine essence; But God is so united to faithful men etc. Therefore...

8. The doctrine of the peculiar approximation of the divine substance to pious men is conformable to our symbolic books, the Fathers, and orthodox Theologians. For the Form. Concord. art. III rejects the false doctrine of those who assert: Not God himself, but only gifts dwell in believers LUTHER writes thus on this question on Ps. 51: I omit the useless disputations of the schools, whether he speaks of the divine person, or of the gift of the spirit? For what do these things, even accurately disputed, edify? Since we have the clear testimony of Christ: We will come to him, we will make our home with him. Therefore the Holy Spirit truly dwells in believers not only through gifts, but also as to his substance. Nor does he give his gifts here, so that he himself is elsewhere, or sleeps; but he is present to his gifts and to his creature, conserving and adding strength. Confer, D. HULSEM. breviar. enucl. p. 906, & D. CALOV, in system tom. X. p. 509.

Prob. d. That the mystical union is not παρατατική, or external through bare assistance, but περιχωρητική, or internal through intimate immanence, is clear from the fact that, with Holy Scripture as witness, God is in the faithful through efficacious grace, and the faithful are in God through trust and the love flowing from it. To which the words of St. John refer, 1 epist. 4:15-16: Whoever confesses that Jesus is the Son of God, God abides in him, and he in God. And we have known and believed the love that God has for us. God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God, and God in him. The faith of the reborn rests on the philanthropy of God, which he most clearly testified by sending Jesus the redeemer; in whom the reborn believe with the heart, and whom they confess to be the Son of God, exerting this their faith by love for God. From this it happens that they abide in God, as in an ocean of goodness and charity, they abide in Christ, as branches in the vine, and God abides in them, as in consecrated temples, which he purifies, adorns, and fills with all fullness of wisdom, justice, and holiness; the truly reborn soul is passively perfected, cultivated, and, as a vessel of grace, is filled.

Prob. e. That the mystical union of God is not completed by a bare adessence of the divine substance, but also embraces an efficacious operation, is proved:

1. Just as the presence of God to creatures does not terminate in adessence alone, but in adessence conjoined with operation; so our spiritual conjunction with God does not terminate in the bare adessence of the divine substance to the substance of the faithful man, but embraces the efficacious operation of God in man, so that we may rightly gather: Wherever God is present by a general presence, there he also operates by a general concursus. Therefore, where God is present by a special presence, there he also operates by a special and gracious concursus.

2. God not only dwells in justified men, but also walks among them, 2 Cor. 6:16, i.e., he is present to them, exciting and operating in them various actions of virtues by which they worship him.

3. Christ is in the faithful in such a way that he lives in them, Gal. 2:20, produces notable fruits of faith, John 15:5, and erects a spiritual kingdom in their hearts, Luke 17:21.

4. The Holy Spirit is united with the faithful, so that he may teach them all things (necessary to be known for salvation), 1 John 2:27, excite prayers and sighs, Rom. 8:15-16, console them, John 16:7, lead them in a right land, Ps. 143:10, and sanctify them, Rom. 15:16.

Prob. f. That the mystical union reconciles for the reborn a harmony of affections with the triune God, is evident; because 1) they become one spirit with God, to whom they are joined, 1 Cor. 6:17, i.e., partakers of divine holiness, goodness, justice, and truth. 2) The same imitate God by loving, 1 John 4:10, by exercising mercy after the example of the heavenly father, Luke 6:36, by striving for holiness, 1 Pet. 1:15-16. 3) Because by the benefit of mystical union, the image of Christ is impressed upon our minds, that he may μορφωθῇ ἐν ἡμῖν, take form in us, Gal. 4:19.

Antithesis is that of 1. the Weigelians and Schwenkfeldians, who maintain that the mystical union with God is, with respect to its mode, essential and corporeal; 2. certain Scholastics, Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who deny that God dwells in the faithful in a special way of substantial presence. The chief arguments of the Weigelians are:

I. Whoever are one in God the Father and the Son, just as the Father is in the Son and the Son in the Father, their union is essential (for the union of the Father and the Son is essential); But the reborn etc. Therefore... The minor is evident from John 17:20-21. Resp. The words of the cited text are: I do not pray for these alone, but also for those who will believe in me through their word; that they all may be one, as You, Father, are in me, and I in You; that they also may be one in Us. From which words it may be observed that the particle of similitude καθὼς, as, is to be referred not to the mystical union with God, but to the ecclesiastical union of the reborn among themselves, which is an effect of the mystical union. Moreover, even if the particle of similitude were transferred to the mystical union with God, it would nevertheless infer not equality, but some conformity, not an absolute similitude, but a respective one.

II. Whoever are partakers of the divine nature, their union with God is essential; But the reborn etc. 2 Pet. 1:4. Therefore... Resp. Whoever are partakers of the divine nature by an essential participation, by which they become ὁμοῦσοι (consubstantial) with God, their union with God is essential; I grant. But whoever are partakers of the divine nature by a spiritual and gracious participation through faith, they are not essentially united to God.

III. Whoever are one spirit with God, their union with God is essential; But reborn men etc. 1 Cor. 6:17. Resp. Whoever are one spirit with God, so that they constitute with God a unity per se, their union is essential. With the major thus limited, we deny the minor; because by mystical union a unity per se is not constituted, but one per accidens. The reason is at hand; because God and the reborn man exist and subsist completely, and therefore cannot be united per se.

IV. Whoever are members of Christ, they are essentially the same with Christ; But the reborn etc. Eph. 5:30. Therefore... Resp. A distinction is made between natural and mystical members. The faithful are not called members of Christ because they have the same nature as Christ, of which indeed the unfaithful are also partakers, but on account of a spiritual kinship, which is connected on God's part by the bond of the word and sacraments, and on the part of the reborn man by the bond of faith. But a spiritual kinship does not infer an essential union.

V. Those who are united with God as branches with a vine, are joined with him essentially; But the reborn etc. John 15:5. Therefore... The major is established; because the union of branches with a vine is essential. Resp. A simile is not to be extended beyond the point of comparison. Christians are joined to Christ truly and really, but not essentially. Spiritual branches differ from natural ones in this respect, that the latter are joined by nature, the former by supernatural grace.

The arguments of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians are the following:

I. Whoever is by essence immense, infinite, omnipresent, and not locally distant from any created thing, he, when he begins to be specially present with the saints, cannot come or approach to them by a special substantial presence; But God etc. Therefore... The major is evident; because, where some being is present with a substantial presence, it comes there only by an effect, an affect, or some gift. Resp. I deny the major, whose adduced reason is valid for a finite being, having a determinable, definitive, and circumscriptive presence, not for an infinite being, or God, who is present in distinct modes of being present. The infinity and immensity of the Holy Spirit did not prevent him from being joined more closely to that dove, in which he visibly descended upon Christ in his baptism, than to other creatures. Indeed, ὁ λόγος (the Word), though infinite and immense, dwells more closely in his own assumed flesh, and that σωματικῶς, Col. 2:9, than in other holy men. The entire Holy Trinity is more closely present and united to angels and blessed men than to devils and the damned. Therefore, it does not follow: Wherever God is already present according to substance, he cannot in any way come or approach according to substance; but this only follows, that God cannot approach according to substance in the same way in which he is already present.

You say: The formal aspect of a gracious presence is founded and terminates not in a new approximation of substance, but in a new, and that special, mode of operating. Resp. A new mode of operating does not exclude, but includes a peculiar approximation of the divine essence. In all the degrees or modes of the divine presence, operation is conjoined with substantial presence. We learn this from the words of Christ, John 14:26: But the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things. Where Christ promises to the disciples, already reborn before, both the gracious advent of the Holy Spirit as to substance, and his special operation, or instruction.

II. If God were more closely united with the faithful by reason of substance, he would also withdraw from the unfaithful by reason of substance; But he does not withdraw from the unfaithful by reason of substance, because otherwise he would not be omnipresent; Therefore, he is not more closely joined with the faithful by reason of substance. Resp. God does not withdraw from the unfaithful as to his general presence; yet he does withdraw by his special presence, disdaining them, because the iniquities of a malicious sinner divide and separate God and the sinner, Isa. 59:2. Nor, however, is the divine omnipresence thereby infringed; because God does not depart physically and locally, by changing place, but hyperphysically and illocally, by not inhabiting the defiled dwelling of the heart.

Instance; God withdraws from the unfaithful by withdrawing his grace. Resp. God withdraws from the impious by withdrawing both his grace and the special proximity of his essence. Hence when God threatened the disobedient Israelites, Exod. 33:3; I will not go up in your midst, lest I consume you on the way, because you are a stiff-necked people! God himself was denying his special proximity to them.

III. He who unites himself with us for the purpose of operating in us, is united with us only by the benefit of a gracious operation; But the Holy Spirit etc. 1 Cor. 12:1. Therefore... Resp. The Holy Spirit operates not absent, but present. A gracious operation does not exclude, but presupposes a special substantial presence.

IV. Of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the presence is the same, the inhabitation is the same, the union is the same; But the presence, inhabitation, and union of God the Father and the Holy Spirit and of Christ with us occurs according to the divinity. Resp. The union and presence of the persons of the Trinity agree with respect to the mode of uniting, which is divine and supernatural; nor does the human nature of Christ itself approach and unite with us in any other than a divine way; but the reason for the union of the Father and the Son is different with respect to the object, or extreme. The Father is a simple person, the Son is composite (σύνθετος); and therefore the latter is united with us according to both natures, since Christ is not some third thing, distinct from the deity and the humanity. Moreover, Christ is our head, bridegroom, vine, and mediator according to both natures, and therefore by reason of the mediatorial office he is also united with us according to the flesh.

V. Whoever are built up together with Christ in the spirit, so that he may dwell in them through faith, they are not conjoined with the body of Christ; But the reborn etc. Eph. 2:22; c. 3:17. Therefore... The major is clear; because the union which is in the spirit through faith is spiritual; but that which is with the body of Christ is corporeal. The latter, therefore, does not seem to be established, because Christ dwells in us through faith. Resp. The spiritual union is named from the mode of uniting, not from the object or the united extremes. Hence, although we are united with the body of Christ, it is not, however, to be called a corporeal union, because it occurs through faith, kindled by the Holy Spirit, and therefore in a spiritual mode.

VI. The Weigelians and Schwenckfeldians maintain that the substance of God is united with the substance of the reborn man, from whose dreams the Catholics abhor. Resp. Our doctrine differs greatly from the opinion of the Weigelians and Schwenckfeldians; a) with respect to the productive and receptive means. For the adversaries go about subtracting the uniting force from the divine word, and say that faith consists in the imitation of Christ; b) with respect to the mode; because they assert that the mystical union occurs σωματικῶς (bodily), so that the divine essence becomes one essence with ours; c) with respect to the effect; because they opine that justification consists in the mystical union, so that by the benefit of this union the reborn are natural sons of God; d) with respect to the consequences; because the Weigelians imagine that personal predication flow from the mystical union, so that a faithful man can affirm of himself; 'I am Christ.'

Instance; But LUTHER himself used this proposition in his commentary on Gal. II, where he writes thus; Faith is to be taught purely, that, namely, through it you are so conjoined in Christ, that from you and him there becomes one, as it were, person, which cannot be segregated, but perpetually adheres to him, so that you can say with confidence: I am Christ, i.e., Christ's righteousness, victory, life is mine. And in turn Christ may say: I am that sinner, i.e., his sins, death, etc. are mine; because he adheres to me, and I to him. Ref. 1) LUTHER does not call Christ and the faithful man one person, but as it were, a person. 2) The Megalander was about to show that a reborn man applies to himself the effect, obtained by the merit of Christ, by true faith in this way: Christ's righteousness, victory, life is mine. For just as Christ is imputatively a sinner, insofar as he of his own accord took upon himself the sins of the world, so that the punishments of sins were transferred to him by divine judgment; so a reborn man, apprehending the merit of Christ by true faith and uniting it to himself, is imputatively Christ, insofar as the righteousness, victory, and life, reconciled by the merit of Christ, are transferred to him by divine estimation. 3) Luther speaks of the formal union of faith, by which Christ the mediator is apprehended; not of the mystical union, by which God dwells in the reconciled soul, which follows justification in the order of nature. But indeed, from a manner of speaking that is unscriptural (ἄγραφω), difficult to understand, and easy to twist, we rightly and deservedly abstain after the controversies stirred up by the corruptions of the adversaries, moved by the following reasons: a) Because John the Baptist expressly says; I am not the Christ, John 1:20. b) Paul does not say; 'I am Christ,' but; Christ lives in me, Gal. 2:20. c) If that proposition; 'I am Christ' is deduced from the mystical union, a man out of his mind could say: 'I am God the Father; I am the Holy Spirit'; because God the Father and the Holy Spirit also dwell in us. d) The Weigelians have progressed to such vanity that to the oft-mentioned proposition they have added predicates and works proper to Christ and incommunicable ad extra: Christ dwells thus in the reborn, that such a man can say to another: 'I, Christ Jesus, the living Word of God, have redeemed you through my innocent suffering.' Than which nothing more monstrous can be imagined.

Question XIII. What is the end of mystical union?

The End of Mystical Union. The ultimate end of mystical union is eternal life a). The intermediate ends and effects are various: communion with God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit b), the certification of faith c), of divine help d), of efficacious comfort e), the excitation of prayers, and their being heard f), conservation in the state of grace, whence arises the perseverance of the faithful g), sanctification h), the sealing of the future glorious resurrection and the celestial inheritance i), the union of the reborn among themselves and the communion of the church k).

Prob. a. If what you heard from the beginning abides in you, you also will abide in the Son and in the Father. And this is the promise that He has promised us—eternal life, 1 John 2:24-25.

Prob. b. From 1 John 1:3: That which we have seen and heard we declare to you, that you also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Cf. 2 Cor. 13:13: The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all! Amen! Since the mystical union is perichoretic, it infers our communion with the triune God. Therefore, the reborn, through communion with God the Father, are his sons and heirs of eternal life; through communion with the Holy Spirit, they are his vessels, dwellings, and temples.

Prob. c. From 2 Cor. 13:5: Examine yourselves as to whether you are in the faith. Test yourselves. Do you not know yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you? In whom Jesus Christ is by a special presence, they know for certain that they are grafted into Christ by faith, when they test and prove their faith from peace of conscience, internal joy, a living hope, to which they were regenerated through the resurrection of Christ from the dead, 1 Pet. 1:3. But he who accurately proves his faith by examination, and knows that Christ is and lives in him, is certain of his faith, and therefore of the grace which is apprehended by faith. Cf. 2 Tim. 1:12.

Prob. d. From 1 John 4:4: You are of God, little children, and have overcome them (the false prophets), because He who is in you is greater than he who is in the world. Reborn men, confirmed in the acknowledgment of heavenly truth, overcome the temptations of false doctors, aided by the Holy Spirit dwelling in them, who is greater and more powerful than that spirit who is in the world, i.e., the devil.

Prob. e. From Isa. 57:15: Thus says the High and Lofty One who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy: 'I dwell in the high and holy place, with him who has a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.' God, spiritually conjoined with a contrite and humble heart, suffuses it with living comfort, just as if a torrent of pleasure were to inundate it.

Prob. f. From Gal. 4:6: Because you are sons, God has sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying out, 'Abba, Father!' Which words B. HUNNIUS explains: It should be noted in what sense a cry is attributed to the Holy Spirit, not certainly that he himself invokes God—for this would derogate from his eternal majesty, since he is one God with the Father and the Son—but that he brings it about in the elect that they themselves cry out to and invoke God as their Father with most ardent prayers. Why would God the Father not hear the prayers excited by the Holy Spirit in the hearts of the reborn? The hearing of prayers is certainly a notable fruit of mystical union, as Christ himself teaches, John 15:7: If you abide in me, and my words abide in you, you will ask what you desire, and it shall be done for you.

Prob. g. From Ps. 71:23: Nevertheless I am continually with you... You have held me by my right hand; You will guide me with Your counsel, and afterward receive me to glory. The right hands of those who are united with God, when they falter in temptation, God takes hold of and sustains, lest they fall gravely; he leads and governs them on the slippery path by the counsel of his word, until he raises them to celestial glory.

Prob. h. From John 15:5: I am the vine, you are the branches. He who abides in me, and I in him, bears much fruit; for without me you can do nothing. Branches owe their natural power of bearing fruit to the vine; and faithful men render thanks to Christ for the spiritual powers of producing the fruits of righteousness of faith, i.e., good works. They bear these fruits as long as they are connected by the joint of faith with Christ, from whom, if torn away, they become sterile.

Prob. i. From 2 Cor. 1:22: God... has sealed us and given us the Spirit in our hearts as a guarantee. God seals in us not only present grace, but also the future inheritance. A pledge, or earnest, is a part of the price, given in advance, so that there may be faith concerning the whole price to follow. We therefore receive in this life an earnest, i.e., the firstfruits of the Spirit; we will obtain the full harvest of felicity by inheritance in eternal life, to which God the Father will raise the temples of his Spirit in the future resurrection of the dead. The Apostle hints at this in Rom. 8:1: But if the Spirit of Him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you,

He who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies through His Spirit who dwells in you.

Prob. k. From John 17:20-22: I do not pray for these alone, but also for those who will believe in me through their word; that they all may be one, as You, Father, are in me, and I in You; that they also may be one in Us, that the world may believe that You sent me. And the glory which You gave me I have given them, that they may be one just as We are one. Those who are bound by the nexus of faith with God the Father as sons, and with Christ as his members and brothers, of all these there is one mystical body, one church, and therefore a κοινωνία, or communion of all goods, of all privileges, which God the Father, in view of the merit of Christ apprehended by true faith, has promised to the church.

Question XIV. What things dissolve the mystical union?

The mystical union is dissolved by a) ἀπιστία, or unbelief, b) impiety of life.

Prob. a. Just as true faith is the chain by which God is connected with the reborn soul, Cant. 4:9, so unbelief is the dissolution of that chain. Since, however, faith exerts itself in desires, groans, and prayers, it is easy to conjecture that by the intermission of prayers the mystical union with God is broken. God deserts him by whom he is deserted.

Prob. b. Your iniquities have separated you from your God, Isa. 59:2. Those who live according to the flesh die, i.e., they lose the grace of God, the Holy Spirit, and faith, Rom. 8:13. Which having been lost, the bond of gracious union is dissolved.

Question XV. What kinds of predications flow from mystical union?

Predications flowing from mystical union are appropriative a) and causal b).

Prob. a. He who persecutes true Christians, persecutes Christ, Acts 9:4. The foundation of the predication consists in the communion of the head, Christ, with Christians, as spiritual members. He who inflicts injury on them or does them good is considered to inflict injury on or do good to the head, Christ, himself; since Christ appropriates their injury or good deeds to himself, not ὕποστατικῶς, on account of personal communion, but σχετικῶς, on account of spiritual communion and relation.

Prob. b. From Gal. 2:20: I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The sense is: I do not live by myself independently, but Christ effects in me the motion, sense, and continuation of spiritual life.

SUSPIRIUM.

It is a stupendous mystery that You, IMMORTAL GOD, in me, a mortal; most high in me, most humble; most rich in me, most poor; most holy in me, a sinner, do not disdain to fix Your seat and dwelling! I freely confess that I am unworthy that You should enter the chamber of my heart. Nevertheless, it has pleased Your majesty to be in me through grace, that I may be in you through trust. Therefore, You are present, You reign, You teach in my soul, as a Bishop in a temple, a King in a palace, a Doctor in a school: but I am in You, as a bough on a tree, a branch on a vine, a ray in the sun. Who has such a copious supply of speech that he can express in words the inestimable benefit and incomparable bond of union, by which You have so closely bound me to Yourself, that I am one spirit with You, a partaker of your wisdom, justice, holiness, peace, joy, and glory? Nothing is so much my care and concern as that this most holy and most pleasant communion may be constant, perennial, and indissoluble. I pray and beseech You, therefore, GOD the FATHER, that You may be and remain eternally my most benign FATHER, and I may be and remain Your most obedient son! Remain, LORD JESUS, my head, that I may remain your member! Remain, OH HOLY SPIRIT, my perpetual guest, that I may remain Your habitation, so that neither the rage of the devil, nor the snares of the world, nor the enticements of the flesh may ever dissolve or tear apart our conjunction!

CHAPTER X.
ON RENEWING GRACE AND THE RENEWAL OF JUSTIFIED MEN.

Question I. What is renewal?

RENEWAL IS AN act of grace, by which the Holy Spirit, having expelled vices, endows a justified man with inherent holiness. More fully it is defined: Renewal is an act of applying grace, by which the Holy Spirit abolishes the inherent remnants of sin in a justified man, lest it dominate, and begets in the same internal and external motions conformed to the divine will, and therefore spiritually good, so that, endowed with the restored divine image, he may live soberly, justly, and piously to the praise of the most holy God.

Obs. I. Homonymy. Renewal in general denotes any action by which those things which have been worn out, weakened, or corrupted by age are restored. And so in the spiritual renewal of man, taken more broadly, the old man according to his entire reason, i.e., his complete lack of spiritual powers, the guilt and dominion of sin, is understood to be abolished, and the new man according to his breadth, i.e., the spiritual powers themselves, absolution from guilt, and the habitual gift by which the dominion of sin is suppressed, is understood to be produced. In which broader sense the word "renewal" is taken in the Declar. Form. Conc. p. 675: This is most certain, that in true conversion a change, renewal, and motion must occur in man's intellect, will, and heart; namely, that the mind may acknowledge its sins, fear the wrath of God, turn itself away from sin, acknowledge and apprehend the promise of grace, ponder pious thoughts in the mind, etc. Where both the name of conversion and of renewal is taken in a general signification. That this loose signification of renewal is not unusual in Holy Scripture, D. SEB. SCHMID demonstrates clearly in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, c. 6:6, p. 663: Ἀνακαινισμός, renewal, in scripture is twofold. For there is a renewal εἰς μετάνοιαν, into or unto repentance, which precedes repentance itself; and another through repentance and from repentance, which follows repentance as an effect. This is proved partly from this our verse 6, partly from the rest of scripture. For when the Apostle says that it is impossible ἀνακαινίζειν, to renew those who have fallen away (to wit, by the sin against the Holy Spirit), εἰς μετάνοιαν, into or unto repentance, it is clear that he wishes ἀνακαινισμὸν, renewal, to be understood as that which precedes repentance and terminates in it; for it is ἀνακαινισμός, renewal, by which a man becomes penitent, and therefore faithful. But there is another ἀνακαινισμός, another renewal, to which our Apostle exhorts the Romans, who are already faithful, to whom he writes, c. 12:2: 'And do not be conformed to this world, ἀλλὰ μεταμορφῶσθε τῇ ἀνακαινώσει τοῦ νοῦς ὑμῶν, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind.' That this follows repentance and faith is plain and perspicuous. Whence if we wished to describe ἀνακαινισμὸν from scripture in general, we could describe it thus: Ἀνακαινισμός of man, or renewal, taken generally, is the divine donation of new motions and spiritual powers, for producing spiritual acts, which man, left to his nature and the oldness of his corruption, cannot produce by himself and from himself, neither in part, nor in whole. In the present discussion, renewal taken strictly imports a certain real and intrinsic change in the converted, reborn, and justified man; by which from an old man he becomes new, from a sinner, holy.

Obs. II. Renewal strictly so called is taken either transitively or intransitively; whence it is described by authors in a twofold way. Renewal taken transitively is an act of the applying grace of the Holy Spirit, by which he with the Father and the Son, by virtue of the merit of Christ, so changes a sinful man, that the intellect, with the darkness of errors dispelled, is illuminated, the will is emended, its inclination to evil is coerced, and the members of the body become instruments of righteousness to the praise of God and the due obedience to be rendered to him. Concerning this transitive renewal, the celestial oracle is worthy of note, Ezek. 36:26, where the LORD says; I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit within you; I will take the heart of stone out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh. I will put My Spirit within you and cause you to walk in My statutes, and you will keep My judgments and do them. Renewal taken intransitively is a real and intrinsic change of the converted, reborn, and justified man, by which he, instructed with divinely conferred powers, having shaken off the dominion of sin, purifies himself from the filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and conforms his internal and external motions, as far as is possible in this life, to the divine will expressed in the word of the law. Concerning which intransitive renewal the Apostle speaks, Col. 3:9-10; Put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him.

Obs. III. Synonymy. Renewal is otherwise called sanctification, which is likewise taken either broadly, so that it embraces in its scope vocation, illumination, conversion, regeneration, justification, and renewal, or is taken strictly, as it coincides with renewal strictly so called. Furthermore, sanctification, following the use of scripture, is accustomed to be distinguished into external and internal. The former is that by which something, having been segregated from common and profane use, is destined for a sacred use, pleasing to God. Thus the sabbath is sanctified, Exod. 20:8, the tabernacle and all its vessels, the altar, the priests are sanctified, Exod. 40:9-10, food, 1 Tim. 4:5. The latter is that by which sin is expelled from a justified man, and inherent holiness is given to him. We make mention of inherent holiness for this reason, to distinguish it from imputed holiness, which God out of mercy, in view of the merit of Christ apprehended by true faith, attributes by a gracious estimation to converted and reborn sinners; this is given to them through justifying grace, by which the holiness of Christ is imputatively ours, so that we may dare to say with the Apostle, from 1 Cor. 1:10; Christ has become for us from God... sanctification. We have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all, Heb. 10:10. In the present discussion, we are concerned with inherent, not imputed, holiness.

Question II. Who renews and sanctifies us?

The principal efficient cause of renewal. The triune God a), the Father b), the Son c), and terminatively and appropriatively the Holy Spirit d), renews and sanctifies justified men.

Prob. a. From 1 Thess. 5:23; May the God of peace himself sanctify you completely; and may your whole spirit, soul, and body be preserved blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Spirit" in this passage denotes the superior faculty of the human soul, which distinguishes men from brutes, to wit, the mind and will. "Soul" denotes the inferior faculties, to which pertain the external and internal senses with the sensitive appetite. "Body" is the dwelling and organ of the spirit and soul. The sense therefore is; May the God, the author and vindicator of temporal, spiritual, and eternal peace, illuminate the spirit, i.e., the intellect and will, lest it be oppressed by the darkness of errors or distrust; may he renew the soul, i.e., wipe away every stain or blemish from the external and internal affects; may he purify the body and keep it immune from all pollution, lest you incur the reprehension of God and men.

Prob. b. God the Father, the heavenly vinedresser, prunes every spiritual branch abiding in Christ, that it may bear more fruit, John 15:2. God purges the reborn soul, conjoined with Christ by the bond of faith, both by removing from it the impediments to spiritual fruitfulness, and by making it more fruitful with divine power, so that it may bear more fruits of righteousness (good works).

Prob. c. From John 15:5: I am the vine; you are the branches. He who abides in me, and I in him, bears much fruit; for without me you can do nothing. The Son of God is mystically united with justified men, as a vine with its branches, and by spiritual communication he distributes to them all vigor, all faculty of bearing the fruits of righteousness. From which Paul attributes the sanctification of the church to Christ, Eph. 5:25: Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for her, that He might sanctify and cleanse her with the washing of water by the word.

Prob. d. The work of sanctification is attributed to the Holy Spirit κατ' ἰδιοποίησιν, or by a certain appropriation. For we are said to be sanctified by the Holy Spirit, Rom. 15:16. And baptism is named the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, Tit. 3:5. He dwells in the reborn as in temples, 1 Cor. 3:16, leads them, Rom. 8:14, helps their infirmities, ibid. v. 26.

Question III. Does a justified man cooperate with God in the business of sanctification?

A reborn and justified man concurs in the work of sanctification, as a secondary, subordinate cause, moved by God, so that by the powers received from above he renews himself day by day.

Obs. 1. The Holy Spirit effects the faculty of doing good and the first act of sanctification in man, without the concursus of man, but to the second act of sanctification, or the exercises and continuation of sanctification, once introduced by the Holy Spirit, man concurs, not by natural, but by supernatural powers.

Obs. II. The reborn man indeed cooperates with God in the business of sanctification, yet not with an equal action, but with subordination to and dependence on the Holy Spirit, because he operates not by native, but by given powers. (*) This is gathered from the words of the Apostle, Phil. 2:12-13: Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling! For it is God who works in you both to will and to do for His good pleasure.

If a justified man were to concur in his own renewal in the same way as God, the εὐδοκία (good pleasure) of God alone could not be alleged as the reason why it is fitting for a man, kindled with the desire of seeking salvation, to tremble, since the good pleasure of God does not in itself terrify the conscience of man, but tranquilizes it. But a man trembles, whenever in the business of renewal he beholds his own imperfect, but God's most perfect, way of acting. Therefore, making a comparison of himself with the most perfect God, Matt. 5:45, he cannot but shudder, conscious of his own imperfection.

Prob. 1) From Ezek. 18:31: Make yourselves a new heart and a new spirit. Reborn men make for themselves a new heart and spirit, not by their own powers, but by powers divinely granted, by which they concur in (*) Just as we profess in the Declaration of the Formula of Concord ch. II. p. 674: As soon as the Holy Spirit has begun His work of regeneration and renewal, then indeed we can and ought to cooperate through the power of the Holy Spirit; although much weakness still concurs. Therefore 1) the distinction of beginning, or act, and increase, or state of renewal must be held closely. Its beginning is to be attributed to God alone, whose grace equips man born again, and freed from the guilt and punishment of sins, with strength for acting rightly. 2 Pet. I, 3. Having received these strengths, man, now renewed, uses them and acts rightly, with strengths also increased by God's benefit, taking increments daily. Ibid. v. 5. Christ illustrates the matter excellently with a similitude taken from a branch. A branch bears fruit by some power inherent in it, but not indeed by its own, but by the virtue of the vine with which it is joined, John XV, 5. Then 2) great caution must be applied when the aid of grace is spoken of. This manner of speaking indeed fits the flow of renewal, or its continuation and increase, but by no means the first act of renewal, or its inception. Namely, aid is the conjunction of one principal efficient cause with another less principal, since this indeed is not entirely lacking in strength for acting, but nevertheless feels them weak, and therefore it is necessary that the former, stronger in power, sustain the weakness of this one. But in the inception of renewal God alone effects all things in man, empty of all virtue. But in its continuation God increases and confirms the strengths imparted to man, so that God is the principal cause, man, now renewed and to be renewed more and more daily, is the less principal cause of good actions, to which he gives attention.

the continued amendment of life as subordinate causes, Jer. 12:2.

2. From 2 Cor. 7:1: Therefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. In which words the Apostle refers to the divine promises of which he had made mention in the preceding chapter, namely that God would dwell in the faithful as in dedicated temples, and would embrace them as children with paternal love. From which promises he validly concludes: It is the duty of Christians to purge the dwellings of the divine majesty from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and to pursue holiness of life after the example of the heavenly Father.

Obs. Renewal is therefore an action of God, as the principal cause, renewing the justified man transitively, both by conferring sanctifying powers upon him, and by concurring in the act of renewal with a special and gracious influx. The same renewal is an action of the justified man, as a secondary and subordinate cause, renewing himself intransitively, not by native, but by given, or divinely conferred, powers. Renewal taken transitively and intransitively, however, does not differ really; for this reason, that a) it denotes the same change, by which from an old man he becomes new, from a sinner, holy: which, with the connotation of dependence on God as an agent in another, is called transitive; but on the part of the subject, viewed in the manner of an immanent act, is called intransitive renewal. b) Both are perfected by the same powers, to wit, not human, but divine, which the Holy Spirit has originally and independently, but the reborn man has dependently and on account of the mystical union with God.

Question IV. What impelled God to renew a justified man?

Impulsive Cause. Mercy impelled God internally to renew man a), and the merit of Christ externally b).

Prob. a. From Tit. 3:5: According to His mercy He saved us, through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit. Just as his mercy, most inclined towards the human race, moved God to regenerate and save the sinner; so the same mercy led him to renew man, infected with the oldness of sin, which mercy shone most clearly in the work of sanctification, as Paul testifies, Tit. 2:12: The grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in the present age.

Prob. b. From Tit. 2:14: Jesus Christ... gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from every lawless deed and purify for Himself His own special people, zealous for good works. The effect of the redemption of Christ is the purification of men fallen into sin, which is done partly by faith through the sprinkling and cleansing of the blood of Christ, 1 Pet. 1:1; 1 John 1:7, partly by the consecration of the faithful into a peculiar people (περιούσιον), zealous for good works.

Question V. By what means does God renew us?

Means. The means of renewal, on God's part, are the word of the law a) and of the gospel b), baptism c) and the eucharist d); the means on our part is faith, the principle and root of Christian virtues e).

Prob. a. The divine law is a directing and normative means of renewal; because it is the adequate norm and rule of inherent holiness and justice, as Moses says, Deut. 4:2: You shall not add to the word which I command you, nor take from it, that you may keep the commandments of the LORD your God which I command you. The divine law commands those things which are right and holy, directs the course of piety, and obliges the conscience to obey the commanding God; but it does not inspire the powers to execute what is commanded.

Prob. b. The gospel is a conferring and producing means. The gospel indeed confers the supernatural powers of the Holy Spirit. For we have received the Spirit by the hearing of faith, i.e., by the doctrine of faith, or by the gospel, Gal. 3:2. The gospel also produces faith, the begetter of good will, as AMBROSE thinks, and of just action.

Prob. c. Baptism is the washing of renewal, Tit. 3:5. For baptism is not a bare sign of our sanctification, but an efficacious and communicative (ἐνεργητικὸν καὶ μεταδοτικὸν) means, productive and collative, by which new sanctifying powers are conferred by God, and the very act of sanctification is perfected. Add that the sanctifying powers conferred in baptism contribute and avail not a little to subsequent spiritual acts.

Prob. d. The Eucharist is a valid means of our union with Christ, in whom we bear much fruit, John 15:5; it is also a symbol and bond of our mutual charity, 1 Cor. 10:16-17.

Prob. e. Faith works through love, Gal. 5:6, i.e., it actively exerts itself, and through love, the queen of virtues, it pours itself out into external works. Where a) it is to be observed that the ἐνέργεια (activity) of faith is twofold: the first is internal, or formal, when it extends itself to Christ, and apprehends his satisfaction and merit; the second is external, or effective, when it exerts itself through charity toward God and neighbor. b) It is to be noted that faith, in order to renewal, performs a twofold function. In one, it determines the intellect to assent both to the word of the law, the norm of holiness, and to the gospel, the principle of spiritual powers, collative for doing good. Whence, with practical conclusions deduced, it dictates what is to be done and what is to be avoided. In the other way, it inclines the will, in which it also subjectively inheres, to resist evil concupiscence and to do that which the intellect, concerning any spiritual object already believed, prescribes in the manner of a practical judgment. From which faith is called the victory that overcomes the world, 1 John 5:4. Faith overcomes the world within us and without us. For faith within us vanquishes the inordinate love of the world; without us, the riches, honors, and delights of the flattering world, and the envy, hatred, and persecution of the afflicting world.

Question VI. What are the secondary aids of renewal?

The secondary aids of renewal are afflictions of the flesh a), and temptations of the soul b), which for reborn and justified men are not punishments, but paternal chastisements c).

Prob. a. From 1 Pet. 4:1-2: He who has suffered in the flesh has ceased from sin, that he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh for the lusts of men, but for the will of God. By divine providence, a man, liberated from his destined malice by adverse things and afflictions as by a certain medicine, is rendered healthier, says JUSTIN Martyr, Question 137.

Prob. b. From 2 Cor. 12:7-9: Lest I should be exalted above measure by the abundance of the revelations, a thorn in the flesh was given to me, a messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I be exalted above measure. Concerning this thing I pleaded with the Lord three times that it might depart from me. And He said to me, 'My grace is sufficient for you, for My strength is made perfect in weakness.' From this example of Paul, it is to be learned that internal temptation of the soul brings much momentum a) to the submission of the mind, b) to the ardor of prayers, c) to the experimental knowledge of the grace and power of Christ, which is made perfect in weakness, i.e., it perfectly exerts itself, is illustrated, and is clearly known.

Prob. c. From Heb. 12:11: Now no chastening seems to be joyful for the present, but painful; nevertheless, afterward it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it. If you look to the judgment of reason left to itself, all divine chastening is most troublesome and bitter; but the graver the beginning, the more pleasant the end; the more bitter the root, the sweeter the fruit. For the fruit of chastening is righteousness or holiness, which is a peaceable fruit, i.e., tranquilizing and soothing the conscience.

Question VII. What is the starting point and destination of renewal?

Starting point and destination. In the phraseology of scripture, the starting point of renewal is the old man; the destination is the new man.

Prob. 1) From Eph. 4:20-24: But you have not so learned Christ, if indeed you have heard Him and have been taught by Him, as the truth is in Jesus; that you put off, concerning your former conduct, the old man which grows corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and that you put on the new man which was created according to God, in true righteousness and holiness.

2. From Col. 3:10: Put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him. Obs. a) The old and new man are not distinguished essentially, but accidentally; because in the present, the old and new man are understood not physically, by reason of a different substance, but mystically, by reason of distinct qualities. TERTULLIAN says excellently: We defend that the oldness and newness of the moral man do not pertain to a substantial difference. b) The old and new man are explained partly concretely, partly abstractly. Viewed concretely, the old man is the corrupt nature of man, or speaking more distinctly, it is the blinded mind of man, and prone to making rash judgments about spiritual things; the will averse from good, inclined to evil; the sensitive appetite exorbitant from the rule of rectitude, and prone to desiring things pleasant to the senses, even if forbidden; on the other hand, the new man is the mind illumined with the light of new knowledge, the amended will, the corrected appetite. Considered abstractly, the old man is the horrendous corruption in the intellect, will, and sensitive appetite, namely, ignorance of spiritual things and a proneness to rash judgments in the intellect; the inclination of the will to temporal and perishable goods, to be preferred to spiritual and eternal ones; the rebellion of the sensitive appetite; it therefore denotes original sin, with actual sins connoted. On the contrary, the new man is the repaired image of God, which is conformity with God by reason of wisdom in the intellect, justice in the will, purity in the sensitive appetite. c) He is called the old man from his origin, both the first, of the seduction of the first parents, and the derived, of carnal conception and birth, by which sin is propagated. He is called the new man from the renewed image of God. Therefore he is said to be created according to God in righteousness and holiness of truth.

Question VIII. Is the old man, according to his entire reason, the starting point, and the new man, according to his entire breadth, the destination of renewal?

Although by illumination, conversion, regeneration, and justification not a little has been taken away from the old man, and some powers have been divinely conferred for putting on the new man a), nevertheless, there remain in illuminated, converted, and reborn men remnants of sin, or of the old man, which, lest they grow strong and obtain dominion, are diminished and abolished by successive renewal b).

Prob. a. By the benefit of illumination, the darkness of the intellect is scattered, and supernatural powers are conferred for knowing sin from the law, and Christ from the gospel, and the grace of God founded in him. By the benefit of conversion through the law, contrition is excited, or displeasure and detestation of sin conjoined with sorrow of heart, inferring the purpose of exterminating evil. By the benefit of regeneration through the gospel, ἀπιστία (unbelief) is abolished and faith in Christ is kindled. By the benefit of justification, the guilt of sin is taken away.

Therefore, by illumination, conversion, regeneration, and justification, not a little is taken away from the old man.

Prob. b. In illuminated, converted, reborn, and justified men, the flesh, the old man, or the depravity of original nature, lusts, and by lustful struggles against the spirit, the new man, or those new and supernatural powers which the Holy Spirit conferred in the act of illumination, conversion, and regeneration, Gal. 5:17. The flesh must therefore be suppressed, lest it predominate.

Question IX. Can you therefore distinctly explain the starting point and destination of renewal?

The starting point of renewal are the remnants of sin remaining in justified men after illumination, conversion, and regeneration, which are to be abolished by daily renewal, so that they may be diminished and suppressed, although in this life they are not uprooted; namely, some defect of spiritual powers on the part of the intellect indeed for knowing, on the part of the will for pursuing spiritual good; on the part of the sensitive appetite for obeying the superior faculties; and at the same time also a proneness of the same faculties of the soul to evil. The destination of renewal are those greater powers which are conferred by the Holy Spirit upon justified men after illumination, conversion, and regeneration, namely, a clearer and fuller knowledge of spiritual things in the intellect, inherent justice and holiness in the will, a prompt obedience of the sensitive appetite to be rendered to the superior faculties; with which conjoined the image of God is restored.

Question X. Which man is renewed?

The subject which. The sinful man is renewed by the Holy Spirit, but one who is illuminated, converted, reborn, and justified a), insofar as he is infected with the remnants of indwelling sin and is destitute of inherent justice b).

Prob. a. 1) From the harmony of apostolic doctrine. The Apostle Paul had taught, in chapters III, IV, and V of Romans, that a converted and reborn man is justified by faith alone without confluent works; but in chapter VI he shows that it is the office of justified men to walk in newness of life. 2) The fruit of freedom from sin is called sanctification, Rom. 6:22. 3) The Apostle exhorts the converted and reborn Ephesians and Colossians to put off and lay aside the old man, and likewise to put on the new man, Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:10. 4) Good works, which are produced through renewing grace, are fruits of repentance, Matt. 3:8; fruits of righteousness, Phil. 1:11. It is therefore necessary for a man to be converted, reborn, and justified first, with a priority of order, before he is renewed.

Prob. b. 1) The reborn and justified have sin, 1 John 1:8; they often stumble, Jas. 3:2; their flesh lusts against the spirit, Gal. 5:17. Sin dwells in them, Rom. 7:17. Hence it is that with the mind they serve the law of God, but with the flesh, the law of sin, ibid. v. 25. 2) No one is adorned with inherent justice who is not renewed. We must therefore be renewed in the spirit of our mind and put on the new man, who is created according to God in righteousness and holiness of truth, i.e., true and sincere, Eph. 4:24.

Question XI. Is the whole man, consisting of soul and body, renewed?

The subject by which. Primarily the soul is renewed, and its faculties corrupted by sin: the mind, the will, and the sensitive appetite a). Secondly the members of the body are renewed, which were instruments of unrighteousness, that they may be organs and, as it were, instruments of the sanctified soul, necessary for carrying out holy actions b).

Obs. In philosophical terms, this doctrine is proposed thus: The subject quod of renewal, or the whole suppositum which is said to be renewed, is man, with respect to his past state, a sinner; with respect to his present state, reborn and justified. The subject quo is either primary or secondary. The primary is either remote or proximate. The remote is the soul; the proximate is partly the intellect, partly the will, partly the sensitive appetite. The secondary is the body and its members. Confer. KOENIG, theol. positiva, p. 215.

Prob. a & b. From Rom. 12:1-2: I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service. And do not be conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind, that you may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God. From these words of St. Paul, a concise description of intransitive renewal can be formed in the following way: Renewal is the spiritual μεταμόρφωσις, reformation, of the justified man, by which he, having denied conformity to the world, with a renewed mind, knows and strives to do the good will of God, and whatever is acceptable and perfect to God, and presents his body as a living, holy sacrifice, pleasing to God, for worshipping him religiously, according to the prescribed word of God.

Question XII. In what does renewal formally consist?

The Form of Renewal. The form of renewal is completed by a twofold act, privative and positive. The privative consists in the dispersion of the darkness of the intellect, in the aversion of the will from evil, in the coercion of the ferocity of the sensitive appetite, and in the abstraction of the members of the body from a forbidden use, lest sin obtain dominion in it a). The positive consists in a richer illumination of the intellect for knowing, in the emendation of the will for choosing, and the correction of the sensitive appetite for desiring spiritual good, and also in the direction of the members of the body to a use pleasing and approved by God, and thus in the restoration of the divine image b).

Prob. a. Holy scripture calls the privative act of renewal the putting off of the old man, Col. 3:10, and the laying aside of the same, Eph. 4:22, by a metaphor taken from worn-out, torn, and defiled garments, which we take off and do not resume. But we put off the old man when, instructed by the powers of grace, we cleanse ourselves from the filthiness of the flesh and spirit, 2 Cor. 7:1. By the filthiness of the flesh is understood every sin which is consummated by the pleasure of the flesh and senses; such as are not only impurities, revelries, drunkenness, but also injuries, robberies, thefts, and the like; but the filthiness of the spirit is heresy, idolatry, emulation, dissension, and others, whose consummation consists without the pleasure of the senses.

Prob. b. Holy scripture calls the positive act of renewal the putting on of the new man, who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of the Creator, Col. 3:10. For which reason, we put on the new man by pursuing holiness of life after the example of the heavenly Father and Jesus Christ, so that the image of divine holiness may shine forth in us.

Obs. D. DANNH. represents the parts of sanctification most beautifully when in hodof. phen. IX, p. 703, he shows that it is done a) by sacrificing the body and all its members, by abstracting them from all injustice and vanity of this age, Rom. 12:16; b) by mortifying and crucifying the old Adam and one's own flesh, which always lusts for evil, by afflicting it with trouble, Gal. 5:24; c) by offering incense, or offering to God the incense of most ardent prayers, the formula of which Christ prescribed, Matt. 6:5; d) by adorning oneself with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God, Phil. 1:11.

Question XIII. Does renewal happen in a moment, or successively?

Successive Renewal. Just as the body of sin is more and more enervated by the reborn man in the progress of time a), so the reborn man is transformed into the image of God by the Holy Spirit from glory to glory b).

Obs. The body of sin is called the old man metaphorically by Paul in Rom. 6:6; because it is a complex of many sins, as of parts and members. Whence also the various species of sins are called earthly members, Col. 3:5.

Prob. a. Just as in former times those crucified were affixed to the cross, their limbs were bruised, mortified, buried, corrupted: so successively the old man is crucified, Rom. 6:6, when the desires of the flesh are suppressed and, as it were, constrained; he is bruised, 1 Cor. 9:27, insofar as the flesh, with the external delights of this age removed, is chastised; having been bruised, he is mortified, Rom. 8:13, insofar as the powers of sin to emerge are taken away; having been mortified, he is buried, Rom. 6:4, when the memory and thoughts of illicit things are set aside; having been buried, he is corrupted, so that the whole body of sin may be abolished, begun and continued here, consummated in the other life, Rom. 6:6.

Prob. b. 1) From 2 Cor. 3:28: But we all, with unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are being transformed (μεταμορφούμεθα) into the same image from glory to glory, just as by the Spirit of the Lord Just as Moses in former times indeed covered his face when he went out to the assembly of the people, but returning to the tabernacle and turning to the Lord, he beheld the glory of the Lord with his face uncovered; so Paul says that we do not grope in the dark like the Jews, upon whose hearts a veil lies, but with unveiled face we behold the glory of the Lord shining in the gospel. And just as Moses, from his secret conversation with God, obtained this, that his face radiated with a new light; so we, while we contemplate the face of the heavenly Father in the most limpid mirror of the gospel with the eyes of the mind, are illuminated with certain, as it were, rays of wisdom and holiness, and are renewed into the image of God, which from glory to glory, i.e., with new increments, daily exerts itself more clearly. And this is done by the Spirit of the Lord, who by his grace repairs in us the image of God lost through sin.

2. From 2 Cor. 4:16: Even though our outward man is perishing, yet the inward man is being renewed day by day (ἡμέρα καὶ ἡμέρα). Obs. a) The inward and outward man, as to substance, is the same; but with respect to carnal desires he is called the outward man, with respect to inherent holiness, the inward man. b) The outward man is corrupted and mortified by calamities, which subtract the delights of this world and place a bridle on him, lest he exercise his powers. But the inward man daily grows and is corroborated by the continued exercises of piety, which are more fervent under the cross.

Question XIV. What is the end of renewal?

End. The ultimate end of renewal is the glory of God a). The intermediate end is both the image of God, or inherent righteousness b), and good works c).

Prob a. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven, Matt. 5:16. The ultimate end of renewal, from which good works proceed, is the glory of God.

Prob. b. Put on the new man who is renewed in knowledge according to the image of Him who created him, Col. 3:10. For this end man is renewed, that in him the image of God may be repaired, which, on the part of the intellect, consists in the true acknowledgment of the creator, on the part of the will, in true righteousness and holiness, Eph. 4:24. By righteousness is understood, however, a universal one, or a complex of all virtues which pertain to Christian morals, and are otherwise variously distributed according to the two tables of the decalogue.

Prob. c. Just as the immediate effect of renewal is inherent holiness, so the mediate effect is the study and exercise of good works. For inherent holiness is the root of good works, which with respect to their execution are the effect of renewal, and with respect to intention are its end; for we are renewed for this reason, that we may perform good works. We learn this from the words of Christ: Every branch that abides in me, my heavenly Father will prune, i.e., he will renew, that it may bear more fruit, John 15:2. And from the words of Paul, Eph. 4:24: Put on the new man who was created according to God in true righteousness and holiness. Therefore, putting away lying, 'Let each one of you speak truth with his neighbor.' Where the Apostle connects the external exercise of good works with inherent righteousness.

Question. XV. Is a renewed man to be called holy?

A renewed man is holy, not from himself, but from grace a); he is holy, not so much in himself, as in Christ b); he is holy, not with a consummated holiness, but with one that is inchoate and continued c).

Prob. a. From Ps. 86:2; Preserve my soul, for I am holy. AUGUSTINE excellently explains these words in his commentary on this Psalm, p. 160: How shall I dare to say: 'because I am holy'? If holy, as sanctifying, and in need of no sanctifier, I am proud and a liar. But if holy, as sanctified according to that which was said: 'be holy, for I am holy', Lev. 19:2, let also the body of Christ dare, let also that one man, crying from the ends of the earth, with his head and under his head, dare to say: 'I am holy.' For he has received the grace of holiness, the grace of baptism and of the remission of sins. 'And such were some of you,' says the Apostle, enumerating many sins both light and grave, both common and horrible. 'And such were some of you, but you were washed, but you were sanctified,' 1 Cor. 6:11. If therefore he says they were sanctified, let also each one of the faithful say: 'I am holy.' That is not the pride of one who is puffed up, but the confession of one who is not ungrateful. For if you say that you are holy from yourself, you are proud; again, a faithful man in Christ and a member of Christ, if you do not say that you are holy, you are ungrateful.

Prob. b. Paul calls the Philippians saints in Christ Jesus, Phil. 1:1, and calls the Corinthians sanctified in Christ, 1 Cor. 1:1. To be sure, as CHRYSOSTOM says, only they are holy who are in Christ, who is the holy of holies, holiness itself, and the root of all true holiness, so that unless one is grafted into him, as a branch to a tree, or a shoot to a vine, and draws and drinks holiness from him, he is not holy, but profane, whence also the unbelieving Jews are thenceforth profane.

Prob. c. From Phil. 3:12: I have not yet attained. If so great an Apostle confesses his imperfection, who may presume that he has reached the pinnacle of consummated knowledge or holiness in this life?

Question XVI. How manyfold is the renewal or sanctification of a justified man?

The sanctification of a reborn and justified man is threefold: inchoate, continued, and consummated. Inchoate is that by which the Holy Spirit through baptism begins to break the powers of original sin, lest it predominate, to wash away vicious impurity, and to introduce holiness to the baptized. Continued is that by which the Holy Spirit preserves immunity from the dominion of sin by means of the divine word and the use of the Holy Supper, successively abolishes the remnants of the old man more and more, and makes the image of God clearer with new increments. Consummated is that by which the Holy Spirit most fully adorns the blessed, freed from the sense and root of sin, with the divine image.

Question XVII. Is a renewed man to be called spiritual or carnal?

A renewed man is spiritual not wholly, but in part, insofar as, led by the Holy Spirit, he knows, chooses, and does spiritual good a). The same is called carnal not wholly, but in part, not simply and absolutely, but in a certain respect and comparatively, insofar as he has remnants of sin and feels the spurs of a recalcitrant flesh, with which he must contend daily b). A renewed man is compared partly with Christians more advanced in knowledge and holiness c), partly with the divine law, which he does not perfectly fulfill d).

Obs. When a renewed man is called spiritual, the reason for the denomination is taken from the better part, to wit, from the prevailing spirit; but when the same is called carnal, (*) the reason for the denomination is taken from the lesser part, namely from the flesh, which, though subdued, is yet rebellious and struggling, with which the justified man, established on the way of life, wages continual wars.

Prob. a. 1) From Gal. 6:1: Brethren, if a man is overtaken in any trespass, you who are spiritual restore such a one in a spirit of gentleness, considering yourself lest you also be tempted. Obs. a) By "spiritual" the Apostle calls not the presbyters, but all the brethren, joined by the bond of faith, whom the Apostle describes in chapter 5:24-25, that they have crucified the flesh, that they live and walk in the Spirit. Since, however, renewal admits of degrees, those are called comparatively spiritual who are more robust in spirit, Rom. 15:1. b) The Apostle does not say in vain: considering yourself lest you also be tempted. If spiritual men were void of all temptation of the flesh, of all proclivity to sin, there would be no need for this paraenesis. 2) From Rom. 8:9: But you are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if indeed the Spirit of God dwells in you. The reborn are not in the flesh, i.e., in the power of the flesh, but in the kingdom of the Holy Spirit, because the Holy Spirit is not only a guest, but also the master of his dwelling. As he dwells in the reborn, so he also validly reigns.

Prob. b. The reborn are in a certain respect called carnal, 1 Cor. 3:1-2; Rom. 7:14, because they have sin and daily conflict with the flesh. That they have sin, St. John teaches, 1 Ep. 1:8: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. The reborn have and feel sin, but they do not commit sin from deliberate purpose of mind. D. CHEMNITZ inculcates this distinction, loc. theol. P. III, p. 104: John shows that there is a difference between having sin and doing sin; and the latter is more grave than the former, although they are sometimes taken for one and the same. For sin inheres in all, nor can anyone say that he is utterly clean from all sin. Yet the pious, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, resist. But he who completes it in deed, who translates evil concupiscences into action, and thus as it were practices the art of sinning, of him Christ pronounces, John 8:33: 'Everyone who commits sin is a slave of sin.' And Matt. 7:13: 'Depart from me, all you who work iniquity.' That the reborn daily conflict with the flesh, St. Paul asserts, Gal. 5:16-17: I say then: Walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfill the lust of the flesh. For the flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary to one another, so that you do not do the things that you wish. Which words of Paul in the Apol. A.C. p. 91 are explained thus: The flesh distrusts God, trusts in present things, seeks human aids in calamity, even against the will of God, flees afflictions which it ought to tolerate on account of God's command, doubts God's mercy, etc. The Holy Spirit in our hearts struggles with such affects, to repress and mortify them, and to bring in new spiritual motions.

Prob. c. From 1 Cor. 3:1-2: And I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual people but as to carnal, as to babes in Christ. I fed you with milk and not with solid food; for until now you were not able to receive it, and even now you are still not able; for you are still carnal. "Carnal" in this passage, for Paul, are not unregenerate or unbelieving men, but reborn men who are just beginning to learn the mysteries of faith and to accustom themselves to the struggle against their affects, such as are the more rude and weaker catechumens, to whom, as to infants, the milk of the gospel is to be instilled in the simplest and most catechetical manner, because they are not yet capable of solid food, i.e., of the mysteries of faith delivered in a more accurate manner.

Prob. d. From Rom. 7:14: For we know that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal. The law is called spiritual, not only because it has proceeded from the Holy Spirit, but also because, not content with external obedience, it requires an internal, perfectly spiritual compliance, which, since the Apostle cannot render on account of adhering oldness of sin, he professes that he

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that the struggle of the flesh against the spirit ceases in some, and that Paul in Rom. 7:14 does not call himself carnal, but has assumed the person of a man under the law, not yet reborn by the Spirit of Christ, and sustains that complaint in him. They rely on the following arguments:

I. To the carnal man described in Rom. 7:14 ff. are attributed those predicates which can be said of no reborn person. For he is said to be 1) sold under sin. But the reborn man is freed from sin, Rom. 6:18. 2) captive to the law of sin, from which the reborn man is likewise loosed, Rom. 8:2. 3) serving the law of sin with the flesh. But the reborn man is a servant of righteousness, Rom. 6:18. 4) He is said to do what he does not will, v. 20. But the reborn man has the Holy Spirit and with him the liberty of acting, 1 Cor. 3:17. Resp. to I. A distinction is made between active and passive selling. Whoever actively sells himself to the full obedience of predominating sin, like king Ahab, 1 Kings 21:2, he is unregenerate; I grant. But he who is passively sold, like Joseph, submitting to a foreign master with a reluctant mind, he remains reborn. This man is sold under sin with respect to the evident sense of indwelling sin, but not with respect to its full dominion. To II. A distinction is made between voluntary and involuntary captivity. A reborn man is unwillingly carried away and captured, like Samson, to do that to which he is not carried with full intention. To III. The Apostle with his illuminated mind serves the law of God; with his flesh (insofar as he is infected with the stain of inherent sin) he serves the law of sin, with a service not spontaneous, but involuntary. To IV. A distinction is made between liberty from the dominion and from the sense of sin. Although a renewed man is freed from the dominion of sin, he is not, however, immune from the sense and root of sin.

II. Whoever has crucified the flesh, he does not have to struggle with the flesh. Who would contend with a man affixed to a cross? But the reborn man etc. Gal. 5:24. Therefore... Resp. Whoever has crucified the flesh with a crucifixion not only inchoate and continued, but also consummated, he does not have to struggle with the flesh. But the reborn are commanded to daily crucify and mortify the flesh, Rom. 8:13. Therefore, their crucifixion of the flesh is not consummated.

III. Whoever overcome the world, they no longer have to struggle with the flesh. But the reborn etc. 1 John 5:4. Therefore... Resp. Whoever overcome the world with a full victory, by which the enemy is eradicated, they do not have to struggle with the flesh. But the reborn overcome, just as Joshua overcame the Canaanites, not so that the carnal desires of the world may be extirpated, but so that these spiritual enemies may be put under the yoke, although, impatient of the yoke, they from time to time affect dominion.

Question XVIII. Is the renewal of a justified man perfect in this life?

Imperfect Renewal. The renewal of a justified man in this life is imperfect a). The defect of perfection in the work of renewal, however, is not on the part of God, but on the part of man, not sufficiently receiving the action of the renewing God b).

Prob. a. 1) There is no man who does not sin, 1 Kings 8:6. There is not a just man on earth who does good and does not sin, Eccles. 7:20. 2) The reborn have sin, 1 John 1:8. They often stumble, Jas. 3:2. 3) The struggle of the flesh and the Spirit in the reborn abundantly testifies to the imperfection of renewal. For in whom the flesh lusts against the spirit, so that they do not do whatever they wish, they, even if they do not wish to sin, nevertheless sometimes sin; But in the reborn the flesh lusts etc. Therefore... The minor is evident from Gal. 5:17; Rom. 7:14 ff. 4) The exhortations of the Holy Spirit to the reborn also testify to the imperfection of renewal, by which they are admonished not to walk according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, Rom. 8:13; Gal. 5:24; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9-10; 1 Pet. 2:11; 1 John 2:1. 5) The remission of sins is to be daily sought from God by the reborn, Matt. 6:12; Ps. 32:6. Therefore, they are not without sins. 6) Many reborn have fallen gravely, such as Noah, Lot, Aaron, David, Peter, and others, whose renewal, if it had been perfect, would have averted every moral lapse.

Prob. b. From Rom. 8:3-4: For what the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, God did by sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, on account of sin; He condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us who do not walk according to the flesh but according to the Spirit. Obs. a) An αδυναμία, or impotence of justifying and saving (*), is attributed to the law, not intrinsic, but external, which is not so much of the law as of the weakening flesh; insofar as after the fall there are no longer surviving in man the powers necessary for rendering the due obedience to the law. b) What Christ acquired for us by his death did not produce in us the power of meriting, nor did it instill in the law some new faculty; but it consists in a vicarious obedience and satisfaction, which excludes our satisfaction or perfect fulfillment of the law.

Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians, and Weigelians, who dream of the perfection of renewal. They contend against us with the following arguments:

I. Christ commands: Be perfect, just as your heavenly Father is perfect, Matt. 5:48. Resp. From a precept to the effect, from a debt to the δύνανται, or faculty, of performing, the consequence is not valid. The particle, "as," denotes not equality, but similitude, insofar as we strive to imitate God with sincerity of love.(**)

II. The renewed men are perfect; Therefore, the renewal is perfect. The (*) Thus Paul himself interprets what τὸ παιδαγωγὸν ἡμῶν is, in Galatians III, 24.

(**) From the series and coherence of the words we recognize that Christ in this place is not speaking of the entire law universally, but of a certain part of it, which enjoins upon us love toward other men, and indeed pertains to the loving of men. These, he says, not friends only, but even enemies, are to be loved; and he disputes against the Pharisees, who miserably corrupted the true sense of the law. He stirs minds by the example of God, who bestows his benefits even upon wicked men. He, therefore, commands us to be perfect as God is, not in every way and degree, but in the manner of love for men, that we should pursue all with love, even our enemies, for he who is accustomed to hate them cannot be born again. There is indeed a most true, but also to be used cautiously and accurately, distinction of perfection, that one is of parts, another of degrees. I. The perfection of parts is the religious observance of all those things which are contained in the entire scope of the law. See Rom. XIII, 8, 9, 10; James II, 10 ff. These parts can be conveniently divided into the greater and essential, so to speak, and the lesser and integral. The former are as many as there are precepts and prohibitions. By the name of the latter, I understand the individual circumstances in each one, whether commanded or forbidden, such as: the Subject, the Object both real and personal, the mode of acting, the place, the time, the end. Our Liberator discusses this integral perfection of parts in Matthew V, 48. He there explains a certain part of the divine laws, namely that by which we are bound to love men, and indeed specifically concerning that circumstance which is usually called the personal Object, who should be understood by this name, ὁ πλησίον. Therefore, these parts, and indeed of both kinds, every renewed man so sacredly observes that he knowingly and willingly deviates from none of them; for it is confessed that not even one voluntary sin can be committed by a man, as long as he is and remains in the state of renewal. II. The perfection of degrees is the highest integrity of the soul, and altogether so great and so perpetual, that at no time, and in no way, does a man think or undertake anything contrary to any part of the law, and that he does not even feel any enticements to sin, but rather casts away, torn out by the root, the innate propensity to sin. This has never happened, nor will it happen, to anyone in this mortal life. Ps. XIX, 13; CXLIII, 3; Phil. III, 12; James III, 2; 1 Corinth. IV, 4. If any perfection of degrees seems to be attributed to some, it is so called not simply, but comparatively; for one who is progressing has certainly attained a greater degree than one who is beginning. Eph. IV, 13, 14; 1 Cor. II, 6 & III, 1; Hebr. V, 13, 14.

A controversy was once agitated concerning this: whether a renewed man can, in this life, arrive at the degree of legal perfection next to the highest? This we deny and strongly deny. The matter will be clear if we explain it by a definition. The highest degree would be this: if there were no hereditary sin in man, no propensity to do evil. But such great integrity is proper to Christ alone, Luke I, 35; 1 John III, 5, never to be attributed to us as long as we are mortal, 1 John I, 8. The second degree, next to that one, would be, if there never existed in us any motions of that innate propensity, alluring us to sin, no forbidden thought, no unjust desire. But indeed no one of the renewed is free and empty of the stimuli and enticements of τῆς σαρκός, Rom. VI, 12; VII, 17, 23; Gal. V, 16, 17, 24. The third degree, lower than the second, would be, if no external act, contrary to the law, were ever committed, antecedent is established from Phil. III, 15; Hebr. V, 14. Response. Renewed men are called perfect not absolutely, but comparatively, just as perfect men are opposed to the weak, who like children had scarcely learned the first rudiments of Christian doctrine. The Apostle himself denies that he is absolutely perfect, Phil. III, 13.

III. Noah is said to have been a just and perfect man, Gen. VI, 9. Josiah, 2 Paral. XXXIV, Daniel, chap. VI, 22. Response. The praised men were perfect with a perfection of sincerity, not of consummation. Their lapses and blemishes are recorded; namely, Noah overwhelmed himself with wine, Gen. IX, 21; Josiah waged an unnecessary war against Pharaoh Necho, to his own and his people's harm, 2 Paral. XXXV, 20; Daniel confesses his sins, chap. IX, 5.

IV. The love of God is said to be perfect in us, 1 John IV, 12; But love is a formal effect of renewal; Therefore, renewal is also perfect; because the effect is not more excellent than its cause. Response. The passage does not mean the active love of God, by which we love God, but the passive love, by which we are loved by God. Not the former, but the latter is perfect in us, because it has been perfectly declared towards us, and sealed in our hearts by the Holy Spirit.

V. In whom Christ dwells, in them there is no iniquity; because there is no communion of justice with iniquity, 2 Cor. VI, 15. But in the justified, etc. Eph. III, 17. Response. In the justified there is no iniquity; because a) their sins were remitted to them in justification; b) because they were freed from the dominion of sin in renewal; yet inordinate motions and sins of infirmity remain in them.

VI. Whoever are dead to sin, in them there is no sin; for to whom one is dead, to him he is no longer given or subject; But renewed men, etc. Rom. VI, 2. Response. Renewed men are dead to sin, so that it does not reign in their mortal body, Rom. VI, 12, although it may dwell in the same and at times affect dominion.

VII. Whoever is so renewed as to be a new creature, and all his things are new, he is perfectly renewed. But justified men, etc. 2 Cor. V, 17. Response. A justified man is called a new creature proximately and immediately on account of regeneration, which is like a new creation, which we do not deny to be perfect; but consequently, mediately and remotely only, on account of the gift of renewal. Cf. HULSEMANN, breu enucl p.

out of ignorance, error, or haste of mind. And not even this is anyone able to do in this mortality, James III, 2. The fourth degree is an efficacious effort, and a most ardent zeal, for acquiring a richer knowledge of things, and for correcting one's life more and more, with easier effort and firmer alacrity. This is what the proficient do, Eph. IV, 13, 14; 1 Thess. IV, 1. The fifth and lowest degree is the resistance against the motions of innate desire, and the diligent avoidance of all voluntary sins. And this belongs to all the renewed, even if they are beginners. 1 John III, 6, 9; Gal. V, 16, 24. Therefore, our ancestors have most rightly pronounced; that the initiated fulfillment of the law is far from perfection. In Apol. Aug. Conf. c. III. p. 115, and so very often.

Therefore, legal perfection does not fall upon any renewed man. Therefore, every single person needs evangelical perfection, the nature of which let us accurately define. It is indeed:

I. One kind falsely so-called, by the intolerable opinion. Generally, of all those who confuse these two, the law and the gospel, with each other, and indeed err greatly in the definition of each. Specifically, of two sects in particular: 1) The Roman-Catholics, who, taking this principle, that Christ added certain evangelical counsels to the laws, say that evangelical perfection is the observance not only of the precepts, but also of those counsels; but in truth, it is nothing but an arbitrary worship, confirmed by the authority of the Roman Pontiff, and especially the monastic way of life. Our people detest this error of theirs, in Aug. Conf. p. 17 & 36, and its Apology p. 282, 286. 2) The Socinians, who, as they invent new laws, supposedly established by Christ, and are accustomed to wrongly designate them by the name of the Gospel, so they place evangelical perfection in the obedience rendered to all these new commands of Christ, as well as to the old moral and natural law.

II. Another, however, is true, which is the remission of all sins, the liberation and freedom from all both guilt and punishment, on account of the most consummate righteousness and vicarious obedience of Christ, rendered entirely to the law, and imputed to us. Rom. VIII, 1, 2, 3; Eph. V, 26, 27; Coloss. II, 10, coll. with ff. v. 12, 13.

692. Furthermore, the old things are said to have passed away, and all things to have become new; a) because Christ has acquired for all a new grace and a new spirit; b) because He offers new grace to all, and confers it on believers; which new grace would also operate perfectly in all, if it were not hindered by the oldness of indwelling sin.

VIII. Every action of the Holy Spirit is perfect; But renewal, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because the Holy Spirit, possessing infinite power, acts perfectly. Response. Every action of the Holy Spirit considered in itself and absolutely, is perfect; but considered relatively, namely, with respect to the receiving subject, it is said to be imperfect, not because of a defect in the power of the Holy Spirit, but because of a defect of capacity in the justified man. For an action occurs not according to the mode of the one impressing, but of the one receiving according to the receptivity which is given in the capable subject.

Question XIX. Should the renewed man aspire to the perfection of holiness?

The renewed man should certainly aspire to the perfection of holiness a), so that he may daily receive new increments of inherent justice b).

Proof a. Let the command of Christ perpetually be before the mind of the renewed man, Matthew V, 48. "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

Proof b. Paul gravely warns: "My beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord!" 1 Cor. XV, 58.

The Papists object: No sane person aspires to that which he cannot attain; But according to the Protestants, no one can attain perfection; Therefore. Response. We deny the major premise. For he who aspires to the highest, obtains the middle, according to that Greek proverb: ἄκρον λάβε, μέσον ἔξεις. The student strives to attain the highest degree of erudition, although he may not reach it.

Question XX. How does the renewed man aspire to the perfection of inherent justice?

The renewed man, aspiring to the perfection of inherent justice, having implored the help of the Holy Spirit and instituted an examination of his life, morally abolishes the remnants of sin through displeasure and detestation of all moral filth, and through a continuous struggle against the flesh a). He expels the same in reality through the exercise of contrary virtues b).

Proof a. Just as the repentance of the standing belongs to renewed men, so the same implies a moral retraction and detestation of all pollutions, and a continued struggle of the spirit against the flesh, of which Paul treats in Rom. VII, 14 ff.; 2 Cor. VII, 1; Gal. V, 16, 17.

Proof b. Vices are really expelled by contrary virtues, for example, lying by truth, lust by chastity, drunkenness by sobriety. See Eph. IV, 25, ff.

SUSPIRIUM.

reate in me a clean heart,  GOD, and renew a right spirit within me! Cast me not away from Your presence, and take not Your HOLY SPIRIT from me! Restore to me the joy of Your salvation, and uphold me with a willing spirit, so that, having put off the old man, who is daily rendered worse by deceitful and evil desires, I may put on the new man, who was first created in your image in true justice and holiness! Restore in me, most KIND FATHER, Your image, radiant with the lights of wisdom, justice, and a serene conscience, that I may be just from You, and holy in CHRIST!

CHAPTER XI.
ON CONSERVING GRACE,
AND THE
OF THE FAITHFUL.

Question I. What is the conservation of the faithful?

CONSERVATION IS AN act of grace, by which the Holy Spirit dwelling in justified and renewed men, fortifies these against the temptations of the devil, the world, and the flesh, by which they are solicited to sin and apostasy from God, with supernatural powers, and confirms and increases their faith and the holiness of their life, lest they should fall from the state of grace, but persevere in the same, and be eternally saved.

Question II. Who is the author of this conservation?

Efficient Cause. The author of the conservation of the faithful is the triune God a), the Father b), the Son of God c), the Holy Spirit d), to whom this act of grace is ascribed in a peculiar manner, both by reason of the powers conferred in regeneration and renewal, and by reason of actual help.

Proof a. From Phil. I, 6. "Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." God, who planted Christianity among us, and regenerated and sanctified us, will complete this very work of His in us, provided we use the divinely granted powers properly, and do not place an impediment before the conserving God.

Proof b. From 1 Thess. V, 23. "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." God the Father sanctifies the spirit of man, lest it be corrupted by diffidence or error; the soul, lest it succumb to inordinate affections; the body, He preserves, lest it be defiled by some pollution.

Proof c. From John X, 27, 28. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my Father's hand." Christ, the good shepherd, protects His sheep, so that they may remain in the Father's hand, and obtain eternal life. To this Paul refers his own perseverance in faith, 2 Tim. IV, 17. "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear; and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion."

Proof d. To the Holy Spirit is peculiarly ascribed the conservation and confirmation of the faithful; for from Him, by the benefit of regeneration and renewal, they have received the powers to persevere, Tit. III, 6. He bears witness with the spirit of justified men, that they are the sons of God, Rom. VIII, 16, He helps their infirmities, ibid. v. 26, He is their paraclete, John XV, 26, He is the earnest, by which they have been sealed, 2 Cor. I, 22.

Question III. What moved God to conserve faith and holiness of life?

Impulsive Cause. To conserve and strengthen the faith no less than the piety of the justified and renewed man, God was moved internally by mercy a), and externally by the merit and intercession of Christ b).

Proof a. From 1 Peter V, 10. "But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you!" The Apostle teaches that from the same fount of grace flow both the first call to celestial glory and the final consummation of this benefit, namely, confirmation in good and introduction into celestial glory.

Proof b. From Rom. VIII, 34. "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" God has so loved us in Christ, that He has furnished us with the gift of perseverance; because Christ died for our sake, rose again, and being exalted to the right hand of God the Father, intercedes for us. "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," says Christ to Peter, Luke XXII, 32.

Question IV. By what means are the reborn conserved by God in faith and holiness?

Means The means of conserving and confirming faith in Christ and holiness of life are the word of God a) and the sacrament of the supper b).

Proof a. 1) By the word of God we are preserved from the filth of sin. "Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee," says the Psalmist, Ps. CXIX, 11.

2) By the word of God heard, and put into practice, our heart is comforted, lest our faith be shaken by any temptations. "Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock; And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock," Matth. VII, 24, 25.

3) By the word of God, as by a sword, we conquer and rout the spiritual enemies of our soul, Eph. VI, 17.

Proof b. By the use of the Holy Eucharist, the mystical union with God and the state of grace are conserved. "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him," John VI, 56. From this union with Christ it comes that we, as branches from the vine, obtain new strength for conquering the world, the devil, and our flesh through faith, and for bearing more copious fruits of justice.

Question V. What ministers does God use to confirm faith and holiness of life?

Ministerial Cause. Ordinarily, God uses sacred preachers to confirm the weak a). Extraordinarily, any renewed man, partly by the proposition of the divine word, partly by his own example, can incite others to the perseverance of faith and piety b).

Proof a. Sacred preachers offer their hearers milk and solid food. Milk to infants, and to those unskilled in the word of justice, that they may grow in grace and in the knowledge of Christ. Solid food to the perfect, who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil, that they may be preserved from evil, and confirmed in good, Hebr. V, 13, 14.

Proof b. It is the duty of all more perfect Christians to lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees; and make straight paths for their feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed, Hebr. XII, 12, 13. This pertains especially to confirming the soul in faith, because the Apostle does not want the hands of faith to be slack, nor the knees feeble, when one is to approach the throne of grace. Wherefore, let the more mature Christians make straight paths for their feet, i.e., by the proposition of the divine word, and by their own example, let them shine before the inexperienced, lest those who are weak should utterly fall from faith and deny Christ.

Question VI. Whose faith and holiness does God conserve?

Subject. God conserves the faith and holiness of men who are reborn, justified, united to God and Christ, and renewed by the Holy Spirit.

Proof. The conservation of a thing presupposes its existence. For which reason, since faith and holiness of life exist only in men who are reborn, justified, united with God, and renewed, they are divinely conserved only in them. This we gather from Rom. V, 1, 2: "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; By whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand;" and from 1 Cor. XV, 1: "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand." To stand, in the sacred writings, is the same as to persist, or to persevere. For here standing is not opposed to running; since Christians must not stand idly, but run, by the example of Lot; but to a lapse, whether in doctrine or in life, and so standing in the present context denotes perseverance. Therefore, since, as Paul teaches, only those brethren stand who have received the gospel and, being justified, enjoy the friendship of God, it remains firm and fixed that their faith and piety alone are divinely conserved.

Question VII. Is only the soul with its faculties, or also the body with its members, confirmed in good?

Subject which. Primarily the soul, and its faculties, the intellect, will, and sensitive appetite; secondarily the body, and its members, are preserved from evil and confirmed in good.

Proof. "And your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Thess. V, 23. Observe: For Paul, the spirit is the higher faculty of the soul, by which we understand and will. Faith, as it involves knowledge and assent, is in the intellect; as it involves trust, it is in the will. The soul is the lower faculty, by which we feel and desire that which is pleasing to the senses. The workshop of holiness of life is both the spirit and the soul, that is, the intellect, will, and sensitive appetite are capable of sanctification. Holy actions are exercised through the members of the body, as instruments and weapons of justice. For which reason, primarily the soul, secondarily the body and its members, are preserved from evil and confirmed in good by the Holy Spirit.

Question VIII. In what does the conservation of the faithful formally consist?

Form of conservation. The conservation of the faithful comprises a) preserving or pre-arming grace, by which God fortifies justified and renewed men against the temptations of the devil, the world, and the flesh with supernatural powers, lest they be snatched away by those enemies headlong into apostasy from faith and piety; b) confirming grace, by which through divinely ordained means, the faith and piety of justified and renewed men are established; to which also pertains consoling grace, by which the faithful, pressed by the burden of afflictions of body and soul, are raised up; c) enriching grace, by which both faith in Christ and piety of life are from time to time augmented with new and greater powers by the Holy Spirit.

Proof a. From 2 Thess. III, 3. "But the Lord is faithful, who shall stablish you, and keep you from evil." The Apostle's meaning is: God is faithful and constant; Therefore He will not allow you to fall from the gift of faith conferred upon you, but will establish you in it, and will keep you from all evil, from the fiery darts of Satan, from the snares of the world, from the enticements of the flesh, lest they shake or undermine your faith. To which end, the most merciful God in regeneration and renewal has imparted such powers, girded with which they are not unequal to restraining and overcoming their enemies. "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you," says St. James, chap. IV, 7. And St. John commends the pre-arming grace of God,

1 ep. chap. V, 4. "For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

Proof b. St. Paul proclaims the confirming grace of God with a memorable array of words, 2 Cor. I, 21, 22. "Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." The evangelical promises, of which the Apostle had spoken in the preceding verse, most certain in themselves, God confirms in us, through the anointing and bestowal of divine gifts, by which we not only believe them, but also conceive the greatest joy of soul and conscience from them. "Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." God has confirmed our faith, resting on the evangelical promises, with the sacraments, as with seals, and with the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, as with a certain earnest, obligating more strongly and firmly than any pledge, by which the bridegroom most closely and intimately binds his faith to the bride, and renders her plainly certain and undoubted of his perpetual and indissoluble love. From which infallible testimony of the Holy Spirit, this grace is also called συμμαρτυροῦσα, co-witnessing, because it testifies in our hearts by its own power, inherent in the word, that we are the children of God, and can with the utmost confidence address God: "Abba, Father!" Rom. VIII, 15. For not only does divine grace render the hope of salvation certain to us, but ever more certain, indeed most certain. To this confirming grace is also to be referred consoling grace, by which the afflicted souls of the faithful are refreshed and sustained, lest, having cast away their faith, they be carried headlong into desperation. Of which Paul speaks, 2 Cor. I, 3; "Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ."

Proof c. God, by conserving faith and holiness of life, enriches and strengthens the same with more abundant increments. "For this cause we also... do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; Strengthened with all might," says Paul, Col. I, 9, 10, 11.

Question IX. What duty is required of all the reborn and renewed, so that they may be conserved in faith and holiness?

Duties of Conservation. That the faith and holiness of Christians may remain whole and inviolable, it is their duty, a) to make proper use of the means divinely ordained for the perseverance of faith and holiness; b) to implore divine help with most ardent prayers; c) to be vigilant, and cautiously to avoid all stumbling blocks to faith, and occasions of sinning; d) with all the spiritual powers received in regeneration and renewal to fight fiercely against the enemies of the soul; e) with unwearied effort to strive for the increase of faith and piety.

Proof a. The means of confirming faith are the word and the sacraments. He who meditates on the word of God day and night is like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither, Ps. I, 2, 3. He who worthily eats the flesh of Christ in the sacrament of the supper, and drinks His blood, he remains in Christ, and Christ in him, John VI, 56.

Proof b. "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation," Matth. XXVI, 41. King David prays: "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not," Ps. XVII, 5.

Proof c. St. Peter gravely exhorts: "Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own stedfastness," 2 Petr. III, 17. Men who are ἄθεοι, or wicked, are those who can be kept in order by no law, no statutes; their company is to be avoided, lest being led away by their deception from the way of truth and piety, we lose the firmness of our faith.

Proof d. From Eph. VI, 10 ff. "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil."

Proof e. From 2 Petr. III, 18. "But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." The faithful grow in grace when they embrace it with a firmer trust; they grow in the knowledge of Christ when, eagerly drinking the milk of the gospel, they grow thereby, tasting more and more how gracious the Lord is, 1 Petr. II, 2, 3.

Question X. Is saving faith conserved by good works?

Properly speaking, faith is not conserved by good works, but by the same causes through which it is generated, namely by the word and the sacraments a); by good works it is exercised, manifested, and becomes known b).

Proof a. The word and sacraments are the means, divinely instituted, for kindling, nourishing, strengthening, and conserving saving faith in the hearts of men; but the pursuit of good works is its consequence, which testifies to faith, just as fruit testifies to the tree.

Proof b. The faith of Abraham ἐκ τῶν ἔργων ἐτελειώθη, was known as perfect from his works, James II, 22. CALOV. in his illustrated bible accurately explains these words: A thing is understood to be perfected, from the use of scripture, which either acquires a just perfection of its parts, or of its degrees, or even becomes more evidently known to others from its excellence. And thus we do not deny that the faith of Abraham was also intrinsically strengthened in its degrees by these signal works of obedience; that it became more known extrinsically to all those who now and in the past would hear of them, can be doubted by no one. The words of the Apology of the Aug. Conf. p. 117 also deserve to be noted here: "Alms are exercises of faith, which receives remission, which conquers death, as it exercises itself more and more, and in those exercises receives strength."

Question XI. What is the end of the conservation of the faithful?

The End and Effect of Conservation. The ultimate end of this conservation, on God's part, is the glory of God's grace a); on the part of men, eternal salvation and standing firm in the final judgment b). The proximate end and effect is perseverance c).

Proof a. From 2 Thess. I, 3. "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth."

Proof b. "But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved," Matth. X, 22. "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man," Luke XXI, 36.

Proof c. "For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure," Phil. II, 13. Whence, "he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ," chap. I, 6. Perseverance is therefore a gift of God, concerning which AUGUSTINE, in his book de corrupt. & gratia c. VI, discusses excellently: "If we should say that this perseverance, so laudable, so happy, is of man, so that it is not from God; we nullify that which the Lord said to Peter: I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not."

Question XII. What is the perseverance of the faithful?

Definition of perseverance. The perseverance of the faithful is a gift of God, by which the faith and holiness of a justified and renewed man are conserved and remain. Homonymy.

Question XIII. How many kinds of perseverance of the faithful are there?

The perseverance of the faithful is either temporary or final. The former is that by which justified and renewed men persist in faith and holiness of morals only for a time, but not until the end of life a). The latter is that by which Christians, retaining faith and a good conscience until the end of life, remain in the state of grace b).

Proof a. There are men who hear the word of God, receive the hearing with joy; but they have no root, but are πρόσκαιροι, or temporary. Therefore, when affliction or persecution arises because of the word, they are immediately offended, Matth. XIII, 20, 21. Their perseverance is temporary.

Proof b. On the other hand, there are men faithful unto death, to whom is given the crown of life, Apoc. II, 10. Their perseverance is final; which final perseverance is called perseverance κατ' ἐξοχήν.

Question XIV. How many kinds of final perseverance are there?

Final perseverance is either continuous or interrupted. The former is that by which the faithful, from the time he once began to believe, and was justified, so remains in the state of grace and in union with God to the end, that he never falls from grace, or interrupts the union with God. The latter is that which indeed suffers some interruption, but being subsequently restored, endures to the very end.

Obs. I. Distinction between the reborn and the elect. The reborn are judged by their present faith; the elect by their final faith. And therefore not all the reborn are elect; nor are all the elect always and at all times reborn. For there are reborn who, having lapsed into mortal sins, are reprobated because of final impenitence; there are also elect who, because of deliberate sins in which they indulge, are for a time not in the state of regeneration. The reborn can lapse totally and finally, i.e., through mortal sins they can fall from the state of grace, so as never to be restored to it; The elect can lapse totally, but not finally, i.e., their perseverance is interrupted for a time by deliberate sins, so that from sons of grace they become sons of wrath; but they cannot remain in the state of wrath, but return to friendship with God through serious repentance, because in view of their persevering faith, which would embrace the merit of Christ, they were elected by God; and the foreknowledge of God is never mistaken.

Obs. II. Continuous perseverance, with respect to time, belongs to those who sin only from infirmity, never from determined malice, or who commit only venial sins by consequence; which, because of indwelling sin, Rom. VII, 17, the lapse of the weakness of the flesh, Rom. VIII, 3, and the imperfection of renewal in this mortality, happens to travelers rarely, or not at all. This is even more true, on the same grounds, of equal perseverance. For who will give me a mature traveler, in whom for his whole life the degree of faith and piety is not diminished even a little? says the Blessed HULSEM. in his breu., p. 937.

Obs. III. That the perseverance not only of the reborn, but also of the elect, can be interrupted for a time, we have given proof above.

Question XV. What is opposed to the perseverance of the faithful?

Opposite. Opposed to the perseverance of the faithful is a lapse from faith and piety, which if it is continued with morose delight, is called apostasy.

Question XVI. What is apostasy?

Definition of apostasy. Apostasy is a deliberate, deceitful recess from faith and piety, continued with frequent acts of infidelity and impiety, with morose delight in them, and contempt for the divine word.

Obs. Apostasy is not called a lapse from faith and piety committed through ignorance or precipitancy, even with a protesting conscience, soon corrected by ensuing repentance; but a plainly deliberate and deceitful recess from faith and piety, a frequent continuation of acts of infidelity and impiety, a morose delight in them, and contempt for the divine word is called apostasy, according to the judgment of D. HULSEMANN. in brew. p. 861. Cf. DANNHAV in hodos. p. 860.

Question XVII. How many kinds of apostasy are there?

Division of apostasy. Apostasy is twofold, dogmatic and moral. The former is a defection from the true doctrine of the Holy Spirit, which being rejected, saving faith is extinguished a). The latter is a deliberate lapse from the pursuit of holiness, continued by frequent acts of malice, and causing the shipwreck of faith b).

Proof a. The starting point from which apostasy occurs is faith, as CALOV says in his bibl illuftr. on 2 Thess. II, 3, fol. 900. Therefore the Apostle warns in Hebr. III, 12: "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God," ἐν τῷ ἀποστήναι ἀπὸ θεοῦ ζῶντος. The Apostle implies that apostasy from the living God consists in the malicious rejection of faith. But faith is lost, both by the denial of the doctrine of faith, and by deliberate sins. Whence apostasy is divided into dogmatic and moral. Cf. HULSEM. breuiar. p. 962. Paul speaks of dogmatic apostasy, 1 Tim. IV, 1: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some ἀποστήσονται, shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." He who departs from the true doctrine of faith, and adheres to the false doctrine originating from the devil, is, in Paul's judgment, an apostate. By the Papists, apostasy is defined somewhat more strictly, as being an infidelity by which someone completely recedes from the true faith, as when a Christian becomes a Jew or a pagan. See BECAN. c. XIV, on faith, Question 3, & cf. CALOV. bibl. illuftr. on 2 Thess. II, 3.

Proof b. From 1 Tim. I, 19. "Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck." The Apostle teaches that faith cannot persevere, unless a good conscience is kept, and voluntary sins, by which the conscience is wounded, are avoided; which doctrine he confirms with the proposed examples of those who made shipwreck concerning faith, having cast away a good conscience through deliberate sins.

Question XVIII. Should reborn and renewed men doubt the perseverance of faith and piety?

Certainty of perseverance. The present state of grace, in which the reborn and renewed live, excludes every reason for doubting the perseverance of faith and piety; for of this they are certain, not indeed with an absolute certainty, but with an ordered and conditional one.

Proof a. The reborn and renewed are certain that a) God the Father will grant perseverance in faith, as Paul testifies, 1 Cor. I, 8. b) They are certain of the intercession of Christ, which He himself promised, Luke XXII, 32. c) They are certain of the sealing of the Holy Spirit, 2 Cor. I, 21, 22. see the citations above. Therefore, they are persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Rom. VIII, 39.

Proof b. The reborn, justified, and renewed are certain of their perseverance, not absolutely, but conditionally; if they duly perform their duty, concerning which see above, question 9. This the Formula of Concord teaches on p. 803: "It is the eternal decree of God, that He wills to promote, and confirm, and conserve to the very end that good work begun by Him in them; if only they constantly lean on His word, as on a staff, implore His help with ardent prayers, persevere in the grace of God, and faithfully and well employ the gifts received."

SUSPIRIVM

Protect and seal in my heart, O ETERNAL GOD, the true faith, which by pure grace You kindled in regenerating me! Preserve and strengthen in my soul Your image, which you restored in renewing me! For indeed, the devil, the world, and the flesh strive both to extinguish the saving faith and to destroy Your image. The devil solicits me to apostasy, the world and the flesh to impiety. To repel these enemies I am unequal, unless You, Savior, work what you have effected, fortify me with Your divine strength, and support me with your most present help. Wherefore I implore and beseech, that by Your most HOLY SPIRIT you may perpetually rule, sustain, and strengthen me, that against all enemies I may fight the good fight, run the course of piety with an unoffending foot, retain a persevering faith until the last breath of life, and from Your most liberal grace receive the crown of justice and glory.

ON GLORIFYING GRACE, AND THE ETERNAL BEATITUDE OF THE PERSEVERING FAITHFUL, AND ITS OPPOSITE,
THE ETERNAL DAMNATION OF THE UNBELIEVING.

Question I. What is glorification?

GLORIFICATION IS AN act of grace, by which God transfers justified men, persevering in faith until the end, and having departed from this life, from the kingdom of grace into the kingdom of glory, that they may obtain eternal beatitude, and celebrate the divine name with everlasting praises.

Question II. Who glorifies us?

Efficient Cause. The triune God a), the Father b), the Son of God c), and the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. From Rom. VIII, 30. "Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." Obs. a) δοξάζειν, to glorify, here does not signify to celebrate the glory of someone, in the way that creatures glorify God, Matth. V, 16; c. IX, 8; c. XV, 31, but to confer glory and excellence upon someone; in which signification it is also used of the redeemer himself, John XII, 16; c. XIII, 32; c. XVII, 5. b) Paul says that God glorified the justified, which is in no way to be understood of any glorification of this world, since scripture does not attribute δοξασμός to the elect in this life; but it must be taken concerning the future δοξασμός after this life. Cf. Rom. VIII, 17, 18. The past tense is used because of the certainty of future glorification.

Proof b. God the Father is to bring many sons unto glory. Hebr. II, 10.

Proof c. Christ, the righteous judge, will give the crown of righteousness to all them that love his appearing. 2 Tim. IV, 8.

Proof d. The Holy Spirit is called the spirit of glory, 1 Peter IV, 14, because He is not only glorious in Himself, but also confers glory upon us, and of the same in the sufferings of this world He makes us certain.

Question III. What moved God to glorify men who had fallen into sin?

Impulsive Cause. Internally, God was moved by goodness and mercy a); externally, by the merit b) and intercession of Christ c).

Proof a. "According to his mercy he saved us," Tit. III, 5. Obs. a) Not the merits of works of righteousness, which are none, provoked God to save us sinners, but mercy, elicited by no merits of men, moved Him. b) God is said to have saved in the past not only because of the certainty of future beatitude, but also because of its foretaste in this life.

Proof b. The external and meritorious impelling cause is the merit of Christ, by which satisfaction was made to the divine justice, offended by the sins of men. The merit of Christ, therefore, achieves this, that God saves man without compromising His justice. Paul emphasizes this, Rom. V, 10: "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."

Proof c. Christ, by the power of His merit, intercedes with God the Father to obtain eternal glory for us. "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me," John XVII, 24.

Question IV. By what means does God glorify us?

Means. The means offering and exhibiting salvation are the word of the gospel a) and the sacraments b). The receiving means is faith in Christ c). The means of execution, and of introduction into glory, are death, the resurrection of the dead, the consummation of this age, and the last judgment d).

Proof a. The word of the gospel is the word of salvation, Acts XIII, 26. It is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, Rom. I, 16.

Proof b. "According to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost," Tit. III, 5. And in the Eucharist we receive the body and blood of Christ for the remission of sins, Matth. XXVI, 28. But where there is remission of sins, there is life and salvation, as to the foretaste, and the certain hope of consummated beatitude.

Proof c. We are saved by faith, Eph. II, 8, and we live by faith, Rom. I, 17.

Proof d. Through death, resurrection, and the last judgment we are introduced into celestial glory, concerning which, see below.

Question V. What is the end and effect of glorification?

End. The end of glorification, on God's part, is the praise of divine grace a); on man's part, the end and effect of glorification is eternal beatitude b).

Proof a. For just as the end of election to eternal life is the glory of divine grace, Eph. I, 6, so also the same is the end of the actual bestowal of eternal life. Therefore, the angels and blessed men, falling down before the throne of God and adoring him, say: "Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen," Apoc. VII, 11, 12.

Proof b. The end and effect of glorification is glory, and that eternal, 1 Petr. V, 10. It is otherwise called beatitude, and eternal life, and the salvation of souls, 1 Petr. I, 9.

Question VI. Who are glorified by God?

Subject. Justified sinners are glorified by God a), who persevere in faith until the end of life b), and have departed from this life c).

Proof a. "Whom God justified, them he also glorified," Rom. VIII, 30.

Proof b. From Matth. X, 22. "He that endureth to the end shall be saved," and to him that is faithful unto death is given the crown of life, Apoc. II, 10.

Proof c. In this life, no one is in possession of consummated beatitude. St. John indicates this, 1 ep. c. III, 2: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

Question VII. Is both the soul and the body a participant in eternal beatitude?

Primarily the soul a), secondarily the body possesses eternal beatitude b).

Proof a. The end of faith is the salvation of souls, 1 Petr. I, 9. Christ came to save souls, Luke IX, 56. The word of God is able to save souls, James I, 21. Obs. It is called the salvation of souls, not because it will belong to souls alone, but because it is partly of the soul, which will enjoy it as soon as it has departed from the body, partly it belongs most of all to the soul, partly it will come to the body not without the soul, and in a certain way through the soul. Cf. D. SEB. SCHMID, aphorism. theol. p. 198.

Proof b. The body of the faithful will be raised in glory, 1 Cor. XV, 43, and will be transformed by the Lord Jesus Christ, that it may be conformed to his glory, Phil. III, 21.

Question VIII. In what does the salvation of souls formally consist?

Beatitude of the soul. The salvation of souls formally consists in the beatific vision and fruition of God, which is accompanied by the love of God, the most complete joy, and the perfect holiness of life.

Obs. Concerning the beatific vision and fruition of God, as the formal end of theology, we have treated above in Book I.

Question IX. In what does the future beatitude of bodies consist?

Beatitude of bodies. The beatitude of bodies consists in the complex of those perfections with which the bodies of the elect men will be divinely adorned in the kingdom of glory.

Question X. What will be the perfections of glorified bodies?

Perfections of glorified bodies. Guided by Holy Scripture, the principal perfections of glorified bodies will be three: a) spirituality, b) clarity, c) impassibility, from which other gifts of glorified bodies flow, and are elicited by consequence.

Proof a. From 1 Cor. XV, 44. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." Α ψυχικόν or natural body is that which in this life is subject to animal affections and actions, to generation, nutrition, augmentation, motion, needing food, drink, clothing, air, external heat, and is ruled by the soul as an internal principle. A spiritual body is so called not by reason of its substance, because it is not changed into a spirit; but by reason of its qualities, for it will be devoted to spiritual operations, and will be moved by the spirit of God; not that the soul will then cease to move it, but that the soul itself, full of spiritual light, will move the body spiritually, and will not need food or drink, sleep, or marriage, but will serve celestial and angelic functions. Since, therefore, the body will rise spiritual, it follows that it will be: 1) Invisible, in relation to non-glorified eyes. However, glorified bodies can be seen by not-yet-glorified eyes, if a divine dispensation is added. As an example, let us have the saints, who rose with Christ, and appeared not to all, but to many, whose eyes were opened, Matth. XXVII, 53. 2) Impalpable; for being palpable is a property of the animal body, not the spiritual. Nevertheless, the blessed will be able to exhibit their bodies to be touched, when they themselves wish; just as Christ exhibited His glorious body to be touched by the disciples, John XX, 20; Luke XXIV, 39. 3) Subtle, i.e., able to penetrate solid bodies. Thus Christ penetrated the closed doors with His glorified body, to which our bodies in the celestial fatherland will be conformed, John XX, 19; Phil. III, 21. 4) Unlocalized, which will not be in a circumscriptive where, but a definitive one. It will not be circumscribed by a surrounding body, but will define some place for itself at will. 5) Agile, which can be moved most easily and most swiftly, wherever the spirit, or soul, wishes to be.

Proof b. The glorified body will be bright, and shining like the sun, Matth. XIII, 43. Yet it will not for that reason be transparent like glass. It will shine, like the face of Christ, Moses, and Elijah on Mount Tabor, Matth. XVII, 2. From this it follows that it will be beautiful and most fair. "It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory," 1 Cor. XV, 43.

Proof c. The glorified body will be impassible; because it will be subject to no corruptive passion, whether proceeding from internal or external causes. "For they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat," Apocal. VII, 16. It follows from this that it will be immortal and incorruptible, and therefore always healthy and firm. "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption," 1 Cor. XV, 42. Adam in his integrity was able not to die; the blessed will not be able to die, the potentiality of dying having been removed both remotely and proximately, Luke XX, 36.

Question XI. What perfections will belong to the whole man in eternal beatitude?

Perfections of the whole man. The whole man, with the image of God most perfectly restored, will shine in the future life a), and will celebrate God with all the powers of soul and body b).

Proof a. The image of God consists in the conformity of man with the knowledge, justice, purity, and immortality of God. Which gifts will be most abundantly conferred upon the blessed. John indicates this, 1 ep. c. III, 2: "we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." The light of glory will manifest and represent God, to be seen by the eyes of the intellect. (*) But the vision

(*) The question is asked: whether blessed men will see God also with the eyes of the body, elevated to glory, or not? Answer: 1) by distinguishing between God and the θεάνθρωπον (theanthropon / God-man). For we confidently trust that it will certainly happen that we shall behold the second person of the divinity, in assumed human nature of God will illustrate the mind with wisdom, perfect the will with the love of God and with holiness, and adorn the body with immortality, so that between God and the blessed there may be a conspicuous ὁμοίωσις, or likeness, and κοινωνία τῆς θείας φύσεως.

Proof b. From Apoc. V, 9. The blessed sing a new song, saying with a loud voice: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing."

Question XII. What will be the external goods of the blessed?

The external goods of the blessed will be a) a most sweet conversation, b) a most pleasant habitation.

Proof a. The blessed will converse 1) with God and Christ, with whom, afflicted in this mortal life, they desired to be. Phil. I, 23; 2) with angels and elect men. For they have come to myriads of angels and to the church of the firstborn who are written in heaven, Hebr. XII, 22, 23. Than which fellowship, nothing is sweeter, nothing more lovable.

Proof b. The dwelling of the blessed will shine with clarity, will flourish with pleasantness, will thrive with perpetuity, Apoc. XXI, 10.

Question XIII. When will these perfections come to the blessed?

The aforementioned perfections will come to the blessed as soon as their soul has been separated from the body a). But on the last day, those gifts will be more conspicuous and more cumulative, when the soul is reunited with the body b).

Proof a. 1) From Apoc. XIV, 13. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth (ἀπ' ἄρτι)": i.e., from that instant in which they die. 2) Souls after death sing, Apoc. IV, 8, they glorify Him who sits upon the throne, v. 9, they adore the same, having cast down their crowns, v. 10, they have vials, chap. V, 8, they cry with a loud voice, chap. VI, 10, they follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, chap. XIV, 4.

Therefore, they enjoy eternal felicity before the resurrection of the flesh. 3) The same is clear from examples. Moses, dead and buried, was seen in celestial glory, Luke IX, 31. To the converted thief Christ promised: "To day shalt thou be with me in paradise," Luke XXIII, 43. Paul desired to depart, and to be with Christ, Phil. I, 23. To be with Christ signifies to enjoy the same felicity which He enjoys.

The antithesis is that of the Psychopannychites, Anabaptists, and Socinians, who state that separated souls do nothing and suffer nothing, but lie immersed in a deep sleep. Their main arguments are:

I. The piously departed are said to sleep, Matth. IX, 24; John XI, 11. Therefore, the souls of the departed feel no joys before they are reunited with their bodies. Response. The piously departed sleep only as to the body; because their souls enjoy the blessed vision of God in heaven, Apoc. XIV, 13, and are to be considered more awake than they ever were in the body: for they have no rest from celebration, neither night nor day, Apoc. IV, 8.

II. Faithful souls enter into rest, Hebr. IV, 3, and they rest under the celestial altar, Apoc. VI, 9, 11. Therefore, they enjoy no celestial pleasure. Response. 1) Faithful souls rest from the works, labors, and troubles of this life, Apoc. XIV, 13, but they do not rest from celestial operations, nor are they buried in sleep. For God also is said to have rested on the seventh day, Gen. II, 2, yet He does not sleep, but works perpetually. 2) The blessed souls are under the altar, i.e., under the protection and company of Christ, and they rest, i.e., they patiently await the final liberation of the church and the union with their to-be-resurrected bodies; but they are not seized by an inert sleep; because they cry with a loud voice, v. 10.

III. Christians persevering in faith will receive a crown of righteousness on the last day, 2 Tim. IV, 8, on which day the pious will first appear with Christ in glory, Col. III, 4. Therefore, before the last day they are not and His glorious body, with eyes of the body similar to it, Job. XIX, 25. 26. 27. 1 Pet. I, 8; 2) by denying, as it concerns the very nature of God. For the body, although most subtle and adorned with certain perfections of spirit, nevertheless retains its corporeal nature; which we constantly maintain against the Socinians. But it cannot happen that corporeal eyes see spirit, clothed with no bodily form, indeed most perfect spirit; wherefore God is excellently named ὁ ἀόρατος (ho aoratos / the invisible), 1 Tim. I, 17. and indeed so significantly, that no man has seen Him, nor will ever see Him, and not even then, when eternal praises are assigned to Him, 1 Tim. VI, 16.

partakers of eternal glory. Response. In 2 Tim. IV, 8, the Apostle speaks of the crown of righteousness to be given not to the soul, which has already received it, but to be given to the whole person, consisting of soul and body, i.e., to Paul, and to all faithful worshippers of Christ.

IV. Whoever state that before the day of the last judgment souls have entered into eternal life, from their opinion flows this absurdity, that there is no need for a last judgment; But the evangelical doctors, etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because according to their mind the soul is to be adjudged to eternal joys on that day on which it is separated from the body. What need is there then for a last judgment? Response. We distinguish between a particular judgment and a universal one. The former is instituted on the day of death, the latter on the last day. Yet there is a need for a universal judgment, 1) for the public recognition of the judge and redeemer Christ; 2) for the manifestation of the glory, justice, and mercy of God; 3) for the consummation of rewards and punishments with respect to the whole man; 4) for the greater exultation of the pious, and the confusion of the impious, so that the former may be publicly crowned, while the latter are confounded in a most illustrious assembly, Wis. V, 1 ff.

V. If the souls of the pious, separated from their bodies, were to enjoy celestial felicity, the souls of the holy fathers would possess consummated beatitude without us; But the consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The falsity of the consequent is proved from Hebr. XI, 39, 40. The holy fathers did not receive the promise (the consummated beatitude promised to the faithful); because God provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect (should not enjoy consummated beatitude). Response. Beatitude is either consummated in a certain respect, such as is fitting for a separated soul; or it is absolutely consummated, which belongs to the whole person after the reunion of the soul with the body. The Apostle speaks of the consummated beatitude of the body and soul together, inasmuch as it is to be given at the end of the world in the final judgment of all. If the ancients had obtained this consummation without us, the world would have ceased before we were born, and so we would never have been heirs of eternal life.

VI. The dead praise not the Lord, Ps. CXV, 17. In death there is no remembrance of God, Ps. VI, 5. Response. 1) The Psalmist speaks of those proclamations of divine praises which are made in the militant church with the corporeal tongue. 2) He speaks of the grateful memory of God, by which divine benefits are proclaimed, so that in this life other men also may be invited to conversion, and to the celebration of the divine name. Souls released from bodies praise God with the angels, in a spiritual manner.

Proof b. On the last day the beatitude of the faithful will be more cumulative; because then we will be consummated with the holy fathers, Hebr. XI, 40, i.e., we will obtain the most full and most consummated beatitude of soul and body together; it will also be more conspicuous; for "when Christ shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory," Col. III, 4. Cf. 1 John III, 2.

Question XIV. Is celestial beatitude capable of being lost?

The beatitude of the celestial fatherland is not capable of being lost, but is eternal.

Proof. 1) The elect will go into eternal life, just as the damned into eternal reproach, Dan. XII, 2. 2) No one will take our joy from us, John XVI, 22, for we shall always be with the Lord, 1 Thess. IV, 17.

Question XV. Will eternal beatitude be equal?

Essential beatitude will be the same for all without distinction a). But the accessory rewards of beatitude will admit of different degrees b), according to the more or fewer works, promised and compensated by God out of liberal grace and undue favor to those who work unequally c).

Proof a. 1) Essential beatitude is equal; because all the pure in heart will see God, Matth. V, 8. The beatific vision, in which beatitude formally consists, does not admit of more and less. 2) If some were less blessed in essentials, they would not yet enjoy the highest good perfectly or completely, but only imperfectly, which imperfection is diametrically opposed to consummated beatitude, which excludes all essential defect according to the definition of BOETHIUS: "Beatitude is a state of life made perfect by the aggregation of all goods."

Proof b. 1) From Dan. XII, 3. "Then the wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." The principal splendor in the kingdom of glory will be that of the teachers who justify, the lesser that of the learners. The latter are compared to the likeness of the firmament, the former to that of the stars. And just as the splendor of the firmament is not as great as that of the stars, so the glory of the משכילים will not be as great as that of the מצדיקים.

2) From the Pauline apostolic suffrage, 1 Cor. XV, 41, 42. "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead." A star surpasses a star in brightness, so the resurrected bodies, some will shed more, others less splendor from themselves.

3) From comparison with the angels. In the resurrection of the dead the elect will be ισάγγελοι, Matth. XXII, 30. But among the angels there are distinct orders and degrees, as to excellence and glory; Therefore, blessed men also, in the manner of angels, will be arranged into certain orders.

4) All saints indeed will judge the world, 1 Cor. VI, 2, and will sit on a throne, Apoc. III, 21. But the Apostles, with a peculiar prerogative over the twelve tribes of Israel, whom they will judge, will sit on twelve thrones, Matth. XIX, 28; Luke XXII, 30. But the eminence of those sitting on a judicial throne is great compared to those who are judged.

5) "He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully," 2 Cor. IX, 6. Namely, each one according to his own labor, 1 Cor. III, 8, will receive a greater or lesser reward. For example, Paul, who suffered so many labors, so many sorrows for the glory of Christ, will obtain greater glory; the thief, converted in the last hour of his life, will receive a lesser reward.

Proof c. Works are the meritorious cause neither of eternal life, nor of accidental rewards. For although we have done all things which we ought to have done, we are still unprofitable servants; because we have done no more than what we were duty-bound to do, Luke XVII, 10. But merit, properly speaking, is a work perfectly performed by our own powers, not owed, and equal or proportionate to the reward.

Antithesis is 1) of the Socinians, who deny the degrees of divine rewards, 2) of the Papists, who attribute the diversity of degrees to the merits of works. Whose arguments are:

I. All the bodies of the just in eternal life will shine like the sun, Matth. XIII, 43, and will be conformed to the glorified body of Christ, Phil. III, 21. Therefore, they will not differ in brightness. Response. 1) Absolutely speaking, all the bodies of the just in eternal life will shine like the sun, Matth. XIII, 43. But when a comparison is instituted between them, an inequality of brightness is found, so that some reflect the splendor of the sun, others of the moon, others of the remaining stars, 1 Cor. XV, 41-42. 2) All the bodies of the blessed will be conformed to the body of Christ in respect to brightness, but not in respect to the degrees of brightness, Dan. XII, 3.

II. All the laborers, whether they have labored more or less, receive a denarius alike, Matth. XX, 10. Therefore, rewards are not dispensed as more or fewer according to the labor performed. Response. By the denarius in the parable, the beatitude of the celestial fatherland is not precisely understood, but whatever reward it may be, temporal or eternal, corporeal or spiritual; which, considered absolutely, all receive alike, but comparatively, one reward is greater, another is lesser.

III. Those to whom God is all in all, are equally blessed; But to the inhabitants of heaven, etc., 1 Cor. XV, 28. Therefore. Response. Those to whom God is all in all are equally blessed with an objective beatitude (which is God himself); I grant this; but with a formal, and that accidental, beatitude, I deny it. A prince in his court is all in all to his ministers, yet to one minister he confers a greater dignity, to another a lesser. God is all in all to the blessed angels, yet their orders are distinct.

IV. To all Christians in common the greatest promises have been given, 2 Petr. I, 4. Therefore, neither greater promises have been given to these, nor lesser to those. Response. To all Christians the greatest promises have been given concerning the κοινωνία τῆς θείας φύσεως, the communion of the divine nature, of which we will be partakers inchoately in this life, consummately in the future life. But the inequality of rewards consists in accidental dignity, in the greater brightness of bodies, in a special revelation made to the minds of the blessed.

V. The inequality of rewards implies an imperfection of beatitude. Therefore, it is not to be asserted. Response. It does not imply imperfection, but a lesser and greater accidental perfection.

VI. The Apol. of the Aug. Conf. p. 96, claims the degrees of celestial rewards for the merits of works, whose words are these: "We teach that good works are meritorious not for the remission of sins, grace, or justification (for these we obtain by faith); but for other rewards, corporeal and spiritual, in this life and after this life; because Paul says: Each one will receive a reward according to his own labor." Response. "Merit" in the Apol. of the Aug. Conf. is not taken properly, or univocally, but analogically. For just as in common life a worker who labors more merits a greater wage than one who labors less; so he who, presupposing faith in Christ, has performed more works, will obtain more reward than he who has performed fewer. The former indeed from merit, the latter from the liberal promise of God (*).

Question XVI. What will be the seat or dwelling of the blessed?

The dwelling of the blessed is the heaven of glory a), most distinct from hell b). But what that is, and where it is, is not clear to us in this life c).

Proof a. The seat of the blessed is called the third heaven, 2 Cor. XII, 2. The first heaven is of nature (the aerial and the starry), the second of grace, the third of glory, in which are the angels, Matth. XVIII, 10. It is called the kingdom of heaven, Matth. VIII, 11. Paradise, Luke XXIII, 43. The country of the faithful, Hebr. XI, 14. The city of the living God, Hebr. XII, 22. The city to come, Hebr. XIII, 14. Jerusalem which is above, Gal. IV, 26. The heavenly Jerusalem, Hebr. XII, 22. (**) The house of the celestial Father, in which there are many mansions, John XIV, 2.

Proof b. A great gulf is fixed between heaven and hell, Luke XVI, 26.

Proof c. Whether this heaven was created within the six days, or not, the sacred writings do not mention. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him," 1 Cor. II, 9. Wherefore it is not for us to discuss the secrets of heaven, in the judgment of AUGUSTINE, de fide & symbolo c. 17.

(*) No one will receive rewards, whether greater or lesser, by his own merit; but each one from the pact and promise, on account of the merit of Christ. Our blessed ancestors used this word in the same way that the ancient Doctors of the church used it, so that mereri is the same as consequi (to obtain). For they themselves 1) in this very place, interpret it thus: "we obtain"; 2) later, in the same chap. III, p. 135, they first urge this most powerful argument against their adversaries, that eternal life is called a gift, and from that they draw this consequence: "good works are not the price, for which a reward is owed." Then, concerning the name of reward, they frankly profess that they will not dispute about the word, but about this matter of greatest moment: "Are good works worthy in themselves of grace and eternal life? or do they please only on account of faith, which apprehends Christ the mediator?" Finally, in the same place, they argue against their adversaries, and not without reason: "that they not only attribute this to works, that they are worthy (in themselves) of grace and eternal life; but they also imagine that their merits are superabundant for themselves, which they can bestow on others." By which very thing they generally declare it to be false, if anyone should dare to attribute any dignity of merit, properly so called, whether abundant or sufficient for oneself, to his own good works.

(**) Those sayings which are excerpted from the letters of PAUL to the Hebrews (with one exception, chap. XI, 14, cf. with v. 15 & 16), are to be understood of the church of the New Testament, conveniently and congruently with the scope of the entire epistle, as well as with the context. The same is signified by these words, Gal. IV, 26: ἡ ἄνω Ἱερουσαλὴμ, ἡ ἐλευθέρα, to which is opposed τὸ ὄρος Σινᾶ. The divine man himself interpreted both of these of the two Testaments, v. 24, add. c. V, 1.

ON DEATH OR
DAMNATION.

Question XVIII. What is death, or eternal damnation?

ETERNAL DEATH IS a state, most miserable by the aggregation of many evils, destined to last forever. It is more fully defined; Eternal death is a complex of many evils, which the triune God, the most just judge, on account of final infidelity and sins committed against conscience, will inflict to be eternally tolerated by the souls and bodies of reprobate men departed from this life, to the glory of divine justice, veracity, and power.

Obs. I. Eternal damnation denotes 1) the act of damnation, and thus includes both the sentence of the judge Christ pronounced upon the impious, and the execution, by which the impious will be cast into hell. 2) It designates a most unhappy and most sad state, destined to last forever. The latter acceptance is of this place; for it deals here with damnation as it is eternal. But the act, by which Christ will pronounce the sentence upon the impious, and the act of execution do not last forever, but pass.

Obs. II. Death in the sacred writings is opposed to life, either natural or spiritual. In the former way, death is the separation of the soul from the body. In the latter way, spiritual death, just as spiritual life, is twofold: a) it is understood with respect to this life; in which way spiritual life consists in the mystical union of the justified soul through faith with God, who is as it were the soul of the soul, the life of our life; in this way spiritual death is the separation of the unfaithful soul from the gracious company of God; b) It is understood in this way with respect to the other life; in which sense eternal spiritual life consists in the intuitive vision of God, and the beatific fruition of God through communion with God, the most intense love, and perennial joy. In which way eternal death is the separation of the unfaithful soul from the beatific vision and eternal fruition of God.

Obs. III. Eternal death is also called the second death, Apoc. II, 11; chap. XX, 6, 14, for this reason, that it imports the privation of the other life, which man could have obtained after this life was completed; it is moreover called corruption, epistle of Jude v. 10; perdition, Matth. VII, 13; eternal destruction, 2 Thess. I, 9. Not as if eternal death were the annihilation of the substance, but because it is the privation, or defect of felicity, everlasting reproach and ignominy, Dan. XII, 2. For to the damned nothing will be more contemptible before the eyes of God, angels, and the blessed, for they will be an abhorring unto all flesh, Is. LXVI, 24. It is called eternal punishment, Matth. XXV, 46; tribulation and anguish, Rom. II, 9.

Question XIX. Can the existence of eternal death be validly proved from the sacred writings?

Existence of eternal death. The existence of eternal death is clearly proved from the most clear sayings of both the old a) and the new Testament b).

Proof a. From the sayings of the O.T. it should suffice to have adduced that classic saying, Dan. XII, 2; "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." The Prophet asserts that many will rise to everlasting shame and contempt, which will be the punishment of the impious. For to those who are awakened by God the judge for this reason, that they may receive ignominy, that ignominy is a punishment.

Proof b. From the N.T. there occurs to us that memorable testimony of Paul in 2 Thess. I, 7, 8, 9: "Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you; And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, In flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." The Apostle teaches a) that the judge inflicting on the damned the punishment of eternal death is God, whose vindictive justice he praises in v. 6. b) He stresses that the meritorious causes are deliberate sins, cruelty towards the pious, affected ignorance, disobedience. c) He calls eternal death now affliction, now punishment, now eternal destruction to designate the mass of torments most grievous to be borne. d) He ascribes the torments not to the devil, but to the face of the judge; for the sight of him will not shine sweetly upon them, like the ray of the rising sun, but like a thunderbolt it will strike the impenitent, prostrate them, and drive them headlong into the unquenchable fire.

Question XX. Who then is the judge who will inflict the punishment of eternal death?

The condemning Judge. God will inflict the punishment of eternal death, from a decree not absolute, but ordered.

Proof. 1) God threatened disobedient men with eternal death, Genesis II, 17: "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." AUGUSTINE, in Book XIII of De C.D., 12, aptly explains these words of the celestial judge: "When God said to that first man, whom he had placed in paradise, concerning the forbidden food: 'in whatsoever day ye eat thereof, ye shall die the death,' that threat embraced not only the first part of the first death, where the soul is deprived of God, nor only the latter part, where the body is deprived of the soul, not only the whole of that first death itself, where the soul separated both from God and from the body is punished, but whatever of death there is, even to the very last, which is called the second, and than which there is none later."

2) God the judge will pronounce the sentence, Matthew XXV, 41: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." 3) The omnipotent Judge will execute the pronounced sentence. For the execution immediately follows, v. 46: "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment."

Question XXI. Will God use ministers in the execution of the sentence?

Ministers of the Judge. God in the execution will use the ministry of angels.

Proof. From Matthew XIII, 41-42: "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth."

Question XXII. For what meritorious causes does God adjudge a reprobate man to eternal death?

Meritorious causes. The causes meriting eternal death are, along with all unexpiated sins a), especially deliberate actual sins b). But final infidelity, insofar as it is a sin against the first commandment, is counted among the meritorious causes of eternal death; but insofar as final ἀπιστία is diametrically opposed to saving faith, it is the immediate and proximate cause of eternal damnation c). (*)

(*) The cause that brings about damnation is remote, as being one whose effect is indeed certain to occur, but on the condition that nothing contrary intervenes. The cause that brings about damnation is proximate, by which name we signify that which produces an effect so necessary that it cannot be avoided by the intervention of some other saving cause, contrary to it. Any sin is of such a kind, that a man is justly to be damned on account of it. But there is something intervening, namely the satisfaction, rendered by Christ alone for all. If anyone embraces it with true and constant trust, he will be saved, and freed from all guilt and punishment, Rom. VIII, 1. If not: there will be nothing left that can avert the damnation, long since merited. Therefore, any sin is a remote cause of damnation; but

Proof a. Every sin is either the first, or derived from the first. The first is the disobedience of the first parents, to which the punishment of eternal death was announced, Gen. II, 17. Compare Rom. V, 12.

Proof b. Every sin, derived from the first, is mortal by its nature, since it is ἀνομία, 1 John III, 4. Ἀνομία has a curse as its companion, Deut. XXVII, 26. Sin derived is either involuntary, or voluntary. The former can consist with the grace of God and saving faith; the latter casts out the grace of the Holy Spirit, and extinguishes faith; from which in a special sense it is said to give birth to death. Of which James says, c. 1, 15: "Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." Obs. Sin is finished which, having arisen from evil concupiscence, with the full consent of the will being added, is as it were nurtured and brought to light.

Proof c. "He that believeth not is condemned already," John III, 18. He is judged, not according to the promulgation and publication of the final damnatory sentence, but because of the certainty of the divine decree made from eternity, and by reason of the judgment, manifested in the word and announced to the unbelieving, the execution of which will follow on the last day. Furthermore, it is reasonable that sins merit damnation; and thus also unbelief, as a sin against the first commandment, merits death and in this sense it is true, that not only unbelief, but also other sins, are a cause, namely a meritorious cause, of damnation. But when unbelief is directly opposed to faith, as an organic cause, or an instrument of applying, then just as a man is justified only by faith, and by no other organ, apprehending the remission of sins in the promise of the gospel; so he is damned only by unbelief not applying, or repelling the promise of the gospel, Mark XVI, 16; John III, 18, 36. Cf. D. MENZERI resp. ad def. II. Part. Conuersat. Pruten. c. IX.

Question XXIII. What men will be adjudged to eternal death?

Subject. All reprobate men a), whether impious b), finally impenitent c), or unbelieving d).

Obs. We are not at present dealing with the damnation of apostate angels.

Proof a. From Apoc. XX, 15. "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."

Proof b. The impious are said to be those who, with a deliberate purpose of mind to sin, perform the works of the flesh, of whom Paul speaks, 1 Cor. VI, 9, 10: "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God."

Proof c. The finally impenitent are those who, without a practical acknowledgement and detestation of sin, die in their sins, as is clear from the example of Saul, 1 Chron. X, 13. Since they do not acknowledge their misery, they neither seek nor find mercy.

Proof d. The finally unbelieving stubbornly spurn the grace offered in the gospel, just as the frenzied reject medicine. In the phrase of scripture they are said to be those who do not obey the gospel, and therefore they will suffer the punishment of eternal destruction, 2 Thess. I, 8-9.

ἐπιστία, continued until death, and indeed that by which the merits of Christ are rejected, is the proximate cause.

It will be helpful to have illustrated the matter with one or two similitudes. 1) A criminal, who has already been condemned to punishment, has certainly merited death by his crime. But what happens in the meantime? The Prince's grace is announced to him. What does he do? He scorns the grace offered to him. What will finally happen? He must certainly be led to punishment. But why? Not because of the crime, but because of the repudiated grace, prepared to pardon it. 2) A disease, however serious, or a lethal wound, does not yet bring death; since medicine is prepared, which, if it is sufficient for healing the wound, and is also correctly applied, certainly frees the wounded and sick from the danger of death. If it is otherwise; then indeed not the mortal force of the wound or the disease, but either the contempt, or the neglect and wrong use of the medicine, is what makes the patient's state utterly desperate. In just this way is the sense of Christ's words to be perceived, John III, 18, coll. with v. 36: the vengeance of the Judge remains upon him, inasmuch as he had merited it by his sins, which however could have been removed, if, reproving himself, he had been willing to trust wholly in Christ.

Question XXIV. Will only the soul, or also the body, undergo the pains of hell?

Subject of damnation which. Both the soul and the body of the impious will suffer eternal punishments.

Proof. 1) From Matth. X, 28. "Fear him," says the Savior, "which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna" (not by killing, but by tormenting).

2) The same is taught by the example of those who descended alive with both body and soul into hell, Num. XVI, 33; Apoc. XIX, 20.

3) The soul and body were joined in guilt, Rom. VI, 13; 1 Cor. VI, 18. Therefore, also in punishment.

4) For this reason the impious will be resurrected, that they may receive the things done in the body, the soul's only instrument, 2 Cor. V, 10.

Question XXV. In what does death, or eternal damnation, formally consist?

Form. In a complex of very many evils, both privative and positive.

Proof. For eternal damnation is opposed to eternal beatitude 1) privatively, and thus it consists in the punishment of loss, or the forfeiture of all perfection and felicity; 2) positively, and thus it brings the punishment of sense, or the most exquisite torments, which the damned will feel. Therefore, in hell there will be the absence of all good, and the presence of all evil.

Question XXVI. What privative evils will the damned suffer?

Privative evils. The soul of the damned will lack the beatific vision of God and the light of glory a), the fruition of the highest good, the love of God, and joy b); The bodies will be destitute of all clarity and beauty c). Furthermore, the damned will be excluded from all fellowship with the holy angels and blessed men d).

Proof a. The soul of the damned, on the part of the intellect, will lack the intuitive knowledge of God. For "he that believeth not the Son shall not see life," i.e., God and Christ, who is the life of the soul, John III, 36. Jesus, the light of the world, will gravely address them; "depart from me!" Matth. XXV, 41, as if to say, "get hence, ye cursed! you are unworthy of all light of grace and glory, but rather worthy to be cast into outer darkness," Matth. VIII, 12. "To be sent into outer darkness will be nothing other than to be expelled from the Lord, who is the light of minds," says PROSPER, Book III, de vita contemplativa, c. 12.

Proof b. On the part of the will, the soul of the damned will lack the fruition and love of God, and all joy. For whoever does not see the gracious face of God, does not enjoy the sweetness of His goodness, is not admitted to the nuptials of the celestial bridegroom, Matth. XXV, 10, does not taste the master's supper, Luke XIV, 24. But is tormented by hunger, Luke VI, 25, and all water of solace, joy, and pleasure fails him, Zach. IX, 11.

Proof c. The beauty of resurrected bodies flows from the συμμορφία with the body of Christ, Phil. III, 21. Since the bodies of the damned are destitute of this, there will be no beauty for them, no noble face, but they will be an abhorrence to all flesh, Is. LXVI, 24.

Proof d. The holy angels and blessed men are in the heavenly Jerusalem, into which nothing unclean shall enter, Apoc. XXI, 27. Whence the damned dogs are outside, c. XXII, 15. The angels stand before the throne of God, Dan. VII, 10, and they always behold his face, Matth. XVIII, 10. Wherefore, since the damned are separated from the sight and throne of God, they are excluded from the company of angels. Where the grace of God has no place, there the gracious presence of angels does not obtain. They will also be deprived of the society of the pious; because these will sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven; but the impious will be cast into outer darkness, Matth. VIII, 11-12.

Question XXVII. What positive evils will afflict the damned?

Positive evils. Positive evils will afflict the souls and bodies of the damned. Their intellect will know God as a most just judge, and a most severe avenger of sins a). The will will be tormented by hatred of God, supreme sadness, and furious impatience b). The bodies will be crucified by a fire that is indeed material, but of a singular kind c).

Proof a. The damned will know the face of God, but as adverse and threatening sad thunderbolts; which face of divine wrath the damned will not escape, Ps. CXXXIX, 7-8. For they suffer punishment from the face of God, 2 Thess. I, 9. The damned will therefore know God, but abstractly from the sense of their punishments (and in this way they will in a sense see the face of God, even against their will); but they will know nothing but an angry God, and one most hostile to them. From this θεογνώσια, a most sad αὐτογνώσια will be born, by which the damned will contemplate themselves, so that they may consider with themselves the multitude of their sins, the gravity and the merit of the punishments they sustain, Wis. V, 3. Moreover, not without anxiety they will know the blessed as participants in beatitude, and themselves as devoid of that felicity, Wis. V, 1-5.

Proof b. The damned will wish to be hidden from the face of God, but they will not be able to, Apoc. VI, 16. They will not be able to bear the face of God, but will abhor it; they will not love God, as a good to them, but will pursue with hatred what is an adversary to them; they will envy the others who are possessors of eternal felicity, and so they will be tormented with immense pain, they will be filled with θλίψει καὶ στενοχωρίᾳ, Rom. II, 9, they will groan for the anguish of spirit, Wis. V, 3, they will feel the worm of conscience gnawing without intermission, Is. LXVI, 24, which will be accompanied by dire desperation, since they know that the gate of grace will never be opened to them, so that they would rather be torn to pieces, indeed reduced to nothing, than to live thus.

Proof c. The bodies of the damned will be crucified by an infernal fire properly so called, and therefore material. For the sentence of the judge announces fire, Matth. XXV, 41, from which the smoke ascends, Apoc. XIV, 11, whose flames will burn, Luke XVI, 24. Therefore, that to which the Holy Spirit attributes the proper name and effect of true fire, is not metaphorical, but a fire properly so called; But to the infernal fire, etc. Therefore. However, it will not be an elemental fire, but entirely singular. Common fire burns only bodies; infernal fire will also act upon souls. The former ceases when fuel is lacking; the latter does not need food properly so called. Furthermore, to wish to explain the nature of infernal fire more distinctly is more a matter of curiosity than of utility (*).

(*) Some of our own and of the ancient Theologians prefer a metaphorical interpretation. See the blessed JOH. GERARD, loc. theol. T. IX, art. 33, §. 68 & 69. So as not to dissemble my own opinion, the improper signification seems more probable to me. I think the eternal fire to be the most vehement pains, and at the same time the vengeance of the incandescent wrath of God, which is very often indicated by the name of fire, as in Deut. XXXII, 22; Ps. II, 12; 2 Thess. I, 8; Hebr. XII, 29. These arguments seem to me to have great proving force: 1) The interpretation which S. scripture itself has given us. In Luke XVI, what is said in v. 24, ὁδυνῶμαι ἐν τῇ φλογὶ ταύτῃ, the same had been said a little before, v. 23: ὑπάρχων ἐν βασάνοις. That most miserable man was in such great torments, not in body, but in soul. From which it plainly appears that the burning flame, whose force he complained he was experiencing, is not to be understood properly. For fire properly so called, and material, even if it were most singular, could not touch a spirit, which is devoid of all matter, and separated from the body. Elsewhere, and indeed in a principal place, Matth. XXV, 41, τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, Christ himself subsequently, v. 46, interprets as κόλασιν αἰώνιον. And in v. 41, that same fire, to which men are to be adjudged, is said to be prepared for the malignant angels. Angels are spirits, without any contagion of body. Therefore, the fire, suitable to the nature of spirits, cannot be material, and properly so named. 2) The conjunction of the names, "worm" and "fire." Mark IX, 44 & Is. LXVI, 24. There is no reason why we should understand one of these properly, the other improperly. But that that worm is improperly spoken of, no one today denies. The opinion of certain ancients is mentioned by the lauded GERARD, l. c. §. 70. All the more recent interpret it, and rightly indeed, of the pangs of conscience. 3) The comparison of the subject and the predicate. If there is a trope in the subject, it is necessary that it also be in the predicate. But that is the sense of sayings of this kind, in which a translated speech is manifestly used of the subject, Matth. III, 10, and again v. 12; c. XIII, 30, 42; John XV, 6. And when it is said γένενα τοῦ πυρὸς, the metaphor is drawn from the valley of Hinnom, which was a very ignominious place, destined for burning cadavers. Let them consult the interpreters, whom the blessed JOH. CHRISTOPH. WOLF in his cares on Matth. V, 22, calls upon. 4) The opposition, as in Luke III, 17 & Apocal. XXI, 8. What is said there of the opposite, namely of eternal life, as a fountain of living water, that, without any controversy, is to be taken improperly. 5) Another description, likewise metaphorical, and whose nature is such that it cannot be reconciled with a fire

Question XXVIII. What external evils will surround the damned?

The external evils which will surround the damned are a) a detestable consortium with cacodemons, b) a most squalid dwelling, which is hell.

Proof a. The decreitory sentence of the judge stands: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!" Matth. XXV, 41. As the sight of God and the angels wonderfully refreshes blessed men; so the sight of the devil and the malignant angels torments them by an immense amount. The demons will therefore torment the damned objectively, i.e., by their foul and horrid aspect; but that they will crucify them effectively, like executioners, does not seem probable. For a) as God makes the elect blessed in heaven without the ministry of angels; so he torments the reprobate in hell without the ministry of devils. b) It is not truly consistent that the most just God would constitute the seducer of men as their torturer. For thus the lot of the seducer would be better than the lot of the seduced, which seems to repugn justice. c) The devils themselves will be tormented; Therefore, they will not torment men. d) The sacred writings testify that it will be so, that the damned will suffer punishment, everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, 2 Thess. I, 9. Therefore, not from the devil.

You say: I. Matth. XVIII, 34. The angry lord delivered the wicked servant to the torturers, i.e., the demons. Response. a) A parable is not argumentative. b) The torturers are the torments, which the angry face of God inflicts, 2 Thess. I, 9.

You say: II. The devils are the torturers of men in this life; therefore also in the future life. Response. Many things are permitted in this age, which, as if the doors of μακροθυμία were closed, cannot be conceded in the other.

Proof b. The most squalid dwelling of the damned is hell, which is succinctly defined as τόπον βασάνου, a place of torment, Luke XVI, 28. Metaphorically it is depicted as a pit, in which there is no water (of solace and refreshment), Zach. IX, 11; as a prison, in which the last farthing must be paid, Matth. V, 26; 1 Petr. III, 19; as a furnace of fire, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth, Matth. XIII, 42; as a lake of fire burning with brimstone, Apoc. XIX, 20.

Question XXIX. Where is hell?

It is certain that the infernal prison is in a real place a), distinct from the seat of the blessed b). It is also probable that the same is outside this habitable world c). But where that place definitely is, is unknown to men who are travelers d).

Proof a. 1) Hell is explicitly called τόπος βασάνου, a place of torment, Luke XVI, 28. 2) Hell was a real terminus, to which the descent of Christ was made, 1 Petr. III, 19. But Christ did not descend into some imaginary space.

Proof b. 1) "Without are dogs," Apoc. XXII, 15, i.e., outside the celestial Jerusalem. 2) They were cast into a place, most distinct from the seat of the blessed by a great gulf, Luke XVI, 26.

Proof c. 1) The whole globe of the earth with all the elements will be consumed by fire, 2 Petr. III, 10. If, therefore, hell were contained within the compass of the elements, it would be burned and perish on the last day. 2) The prince of this world is said to be cast out, John XII, 31, i.e., outside this world into outer darkness, Matth. VIII, 12, i.e., outside the darkness of this world.

Proof d. The Holy Scripture has not revealed the place of hell to us. Therefore, the modesty of S. CHRYSOSTOM, homily XXXI on the epistle to the Romans, c. XVI, is properly so called; namely when it is named σκότος, and indeed significantly, τὸ ἐξώτερον, Matth. VIII, 12; XXV, 30. I argue; either both, πῦρ and σκότος, ought to be understood properly; or both improperly; or one or the other. If both are to be understood properly, there will be an open contradiction (for extreme darkness to be present, and at the same time the greatest fire, and flame, is certainly something self-contradictory): If you think both are said in an improper sense, I have what I want; If one or the other; why not also the other? Where the reason is parallel, there the consequence is also parallel.

The most eminent men, indeed, who defend the contrary opinion, reason from the properties of the judicial style, from which all metaphors ought to be absent. But it must be considered, 1) that the metaphorical expressions, which I have already brought forward, are also in the judicial style; 2) that that judicial style is at the same time prophetic, to which, by usual custom, metaphorical expressions are mixed, as in Is. VII, 18, 19, 20.

to be praised: "Let us not ask, where is gehenna, but how we may escape it." And AUGUSTINE, book XX of De C. D., c. 16: "That infernal fire, in what part of the world, or of things, it is, I think no man knows, unless perhaps one to whom the divine spirit has shown it."

The antithesis is of the Papists, who state that hell is in the center of the earth. Their main arguments are:

I. Hell, by the force of the word, denotes a lower place, for which reason it is also described, Matth. XI, 23. Response. Something is said to be lower either by reason of place, or by reason of state. Hell, compared with heaven, is said to be lower not so much by reason of its local site, as by reason of its lower state.

II. Devils are called subterranean creatures, Phil. II, 10. Therefore, hell is a subterranean place. Response. Devils and damned men are called subterranean, not precisely by reason of place, but of state. For in the phrase of scripture whatever is honorable is called celestial; and whatever is contemptible is called terrestrial, or subterrestrial.

III. Whoever, by descending into the earth, descended into hell, they by this very fact showed that hell is in the earth: But Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, etc. Num. XVI, 33. Therefore. Response. 1) I deny the consequence of the major. For by the same reasoning I argue: Whoever by descending into the sea descended into the belly of the whale, he by this very fact showed that the sea is in the belly of the whale; But the prophet Jonah, etc. Therefore. 2) We do not deny that the factious, as to their soul, descended to the state of the damned; but indeed by the word שׁאול the hell of the damned is not denoted proximately and immediately, but that word designates a chasm of the earth, an analogue of the grave, which, that is, those absorbed by the earth were forced to seek while alive. For since at other times only the dead were accustomed to be interred in the earth, here the living were forced to seek (not indeed hell, but) subterranean places and a chasm of the earth, which devoured and buried them with its opening. Cf. D. PFEIFF. dub. vexata p. 330.

IV. Christ, by descending into hell, descended into the lower parts of the earth, Eph. IV, 9. Therefore, hell is situated in the interior parts of the earth. Response. 1) The lower parts of the earth are called hell not properly, but metaphorically, with respect to the highest heavens, to which they are opposed; but this opposition is not with respect to place, but with respect to condition; because the heaven of the blessed, to which Christ ascended, is not defined by a physical place either. 2) The Holy Spirit not rarely condescends to the infirmity of our intellect, and describes the things of the future age with the words of the present age, e.g., celestial beatitude is called paradise, also a rich banquet; because we cannot conceive the delights of heaven otherwise than by fashioning in our minds the innocent pleasures of some most sweet garden, or of a rich banquet; thus also hell is described by the lower parts of the earth, so that its squalor and most sordid face may be placed before our eyes. 3) Our D. DANNHAY. in hodos. phaenom. VIII. p. 736, explains these words aptly: "He descended into the places themselves lower than the earth, that is, into the infernal prison, εἰς τὰ κατώτερα τῆς γῆς; not indeed the grave, because burial is not in the heart of the earth; but this descent is εἰς τὰ κατώτερα, indeed εἰς τὰ κατώτατα τῆς γῆς, or from the character of the Greek idiom into places which are themselves lower than the earth, and are not contained by the body of the earth; which is truly the lowest of all low things, not geometrically, but mystically."

Question XXX. What will be the beginning of the infernal torments?

The infernal torments will befall the souls of the damned as soon as they have departed from the body.

Proof. 1) Souls released from their bodies immediately descend into the place of torments; this is testified by the soul of the rich man crying out in the flames, Luke XVI, 23-24.

2) Just as those who die in the Lord, ὅπ' ἄρτι, from the time of their departure from this life, are blessed; so also, those who die in their sins, are immediately miserable as to their soul.

3) Christ preached to the spirits detained in prison, 1 Petr. III, 19. By "spirits" in this place are understood the separated souls of those who in the days of Noah were unbelieving, and had already perished in the flood in the days of Noah. To these spirits Christ preached not the gospel, but the law, and He convicted them that they were most justly added to eternal torments. Therefore, those spirits were tormented before their reunion with their bodies.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that separated souls are truly crucified before reunion with their bodies. Their arguments are:

I. The soul after the death of the man, before reunion with the body, does not live; Therefore it feels no torments. The antecedent is clear; because life consists in the conjunction of the soul with the body. Therefore, the whole man lives, not the body, not the soul. Response. The whole man lives the life of a composite, the soul lives the life of a part; it is the breath of life, Gen. II, 7.

Instance: Of the dead it is said that they are not, Jer. XXXI, 15; Matth. II, 18. Therefore they do not live either. Response. Of the dead it is said that they are not, that is to say, in this life (*).

II. Just as the body without the spirit is a corpse; so the soul without the body does neither act nor suffer. For the reason is parallel for parts composing some whole. Response. The reason is disparate. For the body is a material principle, ἄεργον, or ineffective by itself; the soul is a formal principle, ἐνεργητικόν, and the fount of life.

Question XXXI. Will the torments of the damned be eternal?

The torments of the damned are eternal, destined to have no end.

Proof. 1) From Matth. XXV, 46. "And these (the cursed) shall go away into eternal punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." In the same way that the life of the blessed is eternal, in that same way the punishment of the damned is eternal; But the former is eternal absolutely; Therefore, so is the latter.

2) The worm of the damned will not die and the fire will not be quenched, Is. LXVI, 24. Therefore, the worm of conscience will gnaw the damned without intermission, and the infernal fire will torment them without end.

3) "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him," John III, 36. Upon whom the wrath of God abides, from them it never recedes.

4) It is consistent with divine justice that those who know not God, nor have obeyed the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, should suffer punishment, everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, 2 Thess. I, 9. For they have sinned against an eternal and infinite God, and have rejected the merit of Christ, which is of infinite value. (**).

(*) PAUL himself interprets it thus, and explicitly teaches us that the phrase אנינו is said and this is to be understood: ἐν τῷ σκήνει, that is, ἐν τῷ σώματι. He declares the matter more fully with these words: ἐκδημῆσαι ἐκ τοῦ σώματος, and indeed in such a way that the immediate consequence is, ἐνδημῆσαι πρὸς τὸν Κύριον. 2 Corinth. V, 4, 6, 8. In almost the same way David explains that expression by this addition: likewise מֵאַרֶץ חַיִּים. But especially worthy of great attention of the mind is this statement, Ps. XXXIX, 14: "before I go hence, and be no more." The one of these words is an explanation of the other. For that phrase, "I shall depart" is an indication that this phrase "and I shall be no more," is not to be understood simply, but in a certain specific way. He who prepares to depart, certainly has a certain terminus proposed to himself, to which he may direct his course, and finally arrive where he had intended. In every departure, it is necessary that there be a twofold terminus, one which is called, from which, the other to which. If David had agitated no place or state in his mind, to which he himself was going, he could not have said: "before I go hence"; but it would have had to be said thus: "before I perish." Therefore, our blessed LUTHER most rightly converted the words into German: und nicht mehr hier sey (and be here no more). For whoever departs, does not cease to be altogether, but ceases to be in this place, in which he has hitherto dwelt.

(**) When we dispute concerning the eternity of punishments, first, as pertains to the constitution of the cause, we say they are eternal not only continuous, and lasting for a long time without any intermission (unaufhörliche); but also perpetual and infinite, never to be terminated (unendliche). Then, as far as proof is concerned, our opinion is

I. Abundantly confirmed by the amplest testimonies of Scripture. Of these there are two kinds:

a) Κατὰ τὸ ῥητόν, testimonies expressed in by far the clearest words, which the Most Holy Doctor JOH. GEORG. WALCH, in his Introduction to the Controversies in the Evangelical Church, P. III, page 277 ff., distributes into various classes. Generally, there are Antithesis. The antithesis was 1) of the Origenists, 2) of the Anabaptists, of whom mention is made in the Augsburg Confession, art. XVII: "It condemns the Anabaptists, who think that for damned men and for devils there will be an end to their punishments." 3) of the Socinians, who state that the damned will be annihilated. (*) three things to be well considered. 1) The divine writers, as often as they announce eternal damnation to the impious, so often do they speak without any limitation, which would certainly have been needed, especially in the principal places, if any liberation were ever to be expected. No hope was given to the rich man, Luke XVI, 25-26. 2) Damnation is called eternal, in opposition to eternal beatitude: Therefore, it is necessary that this adjunct, αἰώνιος, in each part of the opposites, obtain the same power. 3) Eternal damnation is described in words much more significant than beatitude and its eternal duration; because the Holy Spirit foresaw that the former, not similarly to the latter, would be brought into dispute, and that there would never be anyone who believes beatitude to exist, but doubts of its eternity. Therefore, concerning the former this expression is used: εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, Apoc. XIV, 11; XX, 10, which manner of speaking has such force, that it is never used otherwise than of perpetual and infinite eternity.

b) Κατὰ τὴν διάνοιαν, by necessary and open consequence. Sayings of scripture of this kind, and also principles of revealed Theology, from which this conclusion is effected, the celebrated WALCH, l. c. page 294 ff., exhibits to you, collected with great zeal and in just order.

II. Most agreeable to reason, illuminated by the divine word. The argumentation is threefold, on which our writers have chiefly relied. 1) Of what sort and how great is the guilt, of such a sort and so great also ought the punishment to be, if it is just. But all guilt, and its gravity, is to be estimated and weighed especially from the Object violated. Since this in sin is the eternal God, Ps. LI, 6, and the eternal son of God, and his αἰώνια λύτρωσις, Hebr. IX, 12; it follows that the just punishment of man, and that divine and properly so called, cannot but be eternal. For thus and not otherwise is it a punishment of retaliation, which is properly so called a punishment. Therefore, the opposition of the adversaries, one of the principal ones, in which they place much confidence, is of no avail: "There will be no just proportion and comparison of a temporal offense and an eternal vengeance." For what they assume is false, that in weighing the gravity of guilt, the duration of the action, and its brevity or lengthiness, is especially to be considered. Who would doubt that the crime of lèse-majesté, committed in one point of time, is to be avenged much more sharply than a multiple contumely, and an accumulated injury, with which someone might afflict a man from the lowest common people over a long space of time? We will also dispute ἐξ ἀνθρώπου. Those who deny the perpetuity of punishments, all nevertheless confess with one mouth their very long continuation for many ages. Let them therefore explain themselves, what proportion and equality intercedes between sins consummated in the short time of a life, and a long-lasting punishment? 2) Of what sort and how great is the proportion between temporal virtue, and perpetual remuneration, on account of the imputed justice of Christ to man, absolute in all its numbers, of such a sort and so great also is the proportion between temporal vitiosity, and perpetual punishment, on account of the rejected justice of Christ. The reason is parallel on both sides; therefore, the consequence is parallel. Indeed, the damned will never cease to sin, nor can it ever happen that they should repent, Luke XVI, 26 ff. 3) Of what sort and how great is the relation, as it is usually called, of τῆς πίστεως to eternal salvation, of such a sort and so great also is the relation of τῆς ἀπιστίας to eternal damnation, by force of opposition. Mark XVI, 16; John III, 36.

(*) Those who posit an end to the punishments, some of them persuade themselves that all punishment will be consummated by the destruction of the damned, by which they will finally be reduced to nothing. The Socinians are involved in this capital error. They say indeed that the punishments will be eternal. But by that name they understand not the punishment of sense, but of loss, not eternal torments, but the destruction of the damned, to be utterly abolished and destroyed. To this sense they twist these words, ὀλεθρος, ἀπώλεια. But that they denote the destruction not of nature, but of a blessed condition, as is clear from elsewhere (Matth. XVIII, 11; Luke XV, 6 & 32), so it appears from those places in which these words are extant; κόλασις αἰώνιος, Matth. XXV, 46; βασανισμὸς εἰς τοὺς Whose arguments are; I. The mercy of God is infinite, as the Psalmist testifies, Ps. LXXVII, 9: "Hath his mercy clean gone for ever?" But it would not be infinite, if God were to be angry without end. Response. 1) The cited Psalm deals with the church militant in these lands; it is therefore wrongly transferred to the damned, and to the devil himself. 2) God embraces penitent sinners with his infinite mercy, and those who with persevering faith embrace the merit of Christ. But upon impenitent sinners, and those who with final ἀπιστία repudiate the merit of Christ, the wrath of God abides, John III, 36. For just as the mercy of God is infinite, so also is his justice infinite. The redemption of Christ does not pertain to the devil. Therefore, neither does liberation from hell.

II. If there were no grace to be hoped for by the damned; neither would grace be greater than sin; nor would all who die in Adam be made alive through Christ. But grace is greater than sin, and all who die in Adam are made alive through Christ. Therefore, the grace of God is to be hoped for by the damned. The antecedent is clear from Rom. V, 18-21; 1 Cor. XV, 22. Response. Grace is greater than sin, acknowledged from the law in penitent hearts. But to the damned no return to repentance is open. For the time of repentance is not the future, but the present age, 2 Cor. VI, 2. Furthermore, those who die in Adam are made alive through Christ, namely those who through faith are in Christ, and have fallen asleep in Christ. For although Christ has acquired life for all by his most precious merit, yet not all apply it to themselves through faith, and so not all see life, John III, 36.

III. Christ is the Savior of all, especially of the faithful, 1 Tim. IV, 10. Therefore, the faithful will be saved first; but finally also the unfaithful. Response. Christ is the Savior of all men, as to merit; especially of the faithful, as to the actual event, which does not pertain to the unfaithful, on account of their final infidelity.

IV. Christ preached in hell to the spirits who were once unbelieving, 1 Petr. III, 19, 20. Therefore, he wished to convert them. Response. The sermon of Christ made to the spirits, detained in the infernal prison, was not evangelical, leading to faith and salvation, but legal, convincing and striking terror. Christ preached more really than verbally, by showing himself living and triumphant to the damned spirits.

V. The liberation of the damned and of their cacodemons is the ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, the restitution of all things; of which St. Peter speaks, Acts III, 21. For if all things are to be restored, both demons and damned men are to be elevated to their pristine state. Response. The restitution of all things, of which Peter speaks, is universal, not absolutely, but limitedly; since the Apostle himself explicitly adds the limitation; "which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." But of the restitution of the damned to a happy state not a jot, nor a trace is found in the writings of the prophets. (*).

VI. Whoever, for a temporal offense, inflicts on a sinner an eternal and infinite punishment, he is not just; But according to the opinion of the evangelical doctors, God, αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, Apoc. XX, 10. Others opine that the punishments are to be terminated by a restoration, by which it comes to pass that the damned, both demons and men, may finally at some point be admitted to the society of eternal glory. This false and pernicious opinion was first that of the Origenists, then of the Anabaptists, and is today still of those who follow the footsteps of D. Petersen and M. Lud. Gerard.

(*) From the whole series and coherence of the words it is clearer than the sun that ἀποκατάστασις πάντων in this place is anything but the restoration of the damned to their original state. For the Legate of Christ is not speaking of persons, but of things, and indeed of those things which were foretold by the divine Prophets, indeed by all, whoever at any time uttered sayings with divine instinct and inspiration. But what is signified by that name? Indeed, the consummation of all the prophecies of the O.T., whose final event will be the advent of Christ to the common judgment (v. 20), and the end of the kingdom of grace (1 Cor. XV, 24, 25 & 54, 55). I know indeed that this power of the word was not customary in Greece. It is, however, a sacred and Hebraic manner of speaking, which the writers of the N.T. sometimes imitate. To wit, the verb שׁוּב constructed with the noun דָּבָר, denotes the completion of a prediction and a promise, especially one so long delayed, that the promise and prophecy seem to have fallen to the ground, 1 Sam. III, 19. See Num. XXIII, 19; 1 Kings II, 4; Jer. XXIX, 10; XXXIII, 14.

etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because, where there is no proportion between the offense and the punishment, there the justice of the judge does not shine forth; but rather his supreme injustice appears. Now indeed, between a temporal and finite offense and an infinite and eternal punishment, no proportion is given. Response. I deny the major. For between a temporal sin and an eternal punishment a proportion is given not indeed by reason of the act, which is transitory, but by reason of the guilt, which is infinite and eternal, 1) on account of the infinite object injured, which is the infinite majesty of the eternal Deity, 2) on account of the rejected infinite price of the redemption of Christ.

Instance: If sins are infinite by reason of guilt, because by them the infinite majesty of God is violated; all sins will be equal, which is absurd. Response. Although sins agree in this, that all are committed against the infinite majesty of God; they do not, however, agree by reason of the malice, which is in the subject, and hence results the inequality of sins.

VII. Whoever are eternally dead, are not eternally tormented; But the damned, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because no one feels torments, unless he is alive. Response. Eternal death is so called in opposition to the eternal life of the blessed. The damned will be eternally dead; because neither will God, the life of the soul, dwell in them, nor will He offer them His face full of grace and glory to be beheld. However, the damned do not so die that they are not alive at all, nor feel any torments; which life of theirs, on account of its extreme misery, is to be considered death rather than life.

VIII. Those whom the infernal fire devours, so as to bring upon them eternal destruction, are utterly annihilated; But the finally unfaithful, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from Hebr. X, 27; 2 Thess. I, 9. Response. In Hebr. X, the word is ἐσθίειν, which signifies to eat, not to completely consume. Whatever the unquenchable fire eats, it always eats, it never eats up. The word ὀλεθρος, which is read in 2 Thess. I, does not signify total annihilation, but a change of state verging to the worse. Thus also God will destroy the soul in Gehenna, Matth. X, 28, not by utterly destroying it, but by casting it down into a most lost state.

IX. Christ will destroy every principality, every power, and every virtue, 1 Cor. XV, 24. Therefore, he will plainly annihilate all the princes of angels and men. Response. The word καταργεῖν, which is read in the source, does not signify to annihilate, but to enervate; to render void, to take away the state, use, and efficacy. Compare Luke XIII, 7; Rom. III, 3, 31; Gal. III, 17.

Thus Christ will cut the strength and sinews of the principalities, but He will not abolish their essence. (*).

(*) Besides these sayings, and more of this kind, which the adversaries abuse, there are certain false principles and foundations of error, which have been overthrown by invincible arguments in the section on God, on Christ, and on the means of grace. 1. They rashly separate divine love and benevolence from God's vindicating justice, and they think that the latter is not as natural, necessary, and infinite in God as the former. 2. They confuse God's absolute power, by which He is able, which is usually called so, and His ordained power, and they dare to separate the former from the other properties and perfections of God. For they attack us with this dilemma: God either does not want to, or cannot, eventually extirpate sin from the world. But why do they say "eventually," after a long series of years and ages? Why not quickly and suddenly? What if someone were to argue thus: God either does not want to, or cannot, remove and destroy evil immediately at present? Indeed, He either did not want to, or could not, prevent evil from arising? What, we ask, will they be able to answer? They will have the same answer for themselves. 3. They indeed make much of salvation itself, to be imparted to all by the propitious will of God; but they do not consider the order of salvation, holily established by God. 4. They either entirely deny or diminish the necessity and dignity of the satisfaction to be rendered to God the judge and avenger, thinking, of course, that a finite satisfaction is sufficient. 5. They opine that the most perfect satisfaction which Christ rendered pertains to all the damned, and even to the malignant demons themselves, and they do not accurately weigh the distinction between acquisition and application. 6. They imagine that a return from sins to God can happen after the final fates without the use of the means of grace. 7. They hold that the fire to which demons and men are sentenced is not so much punishing (ein Rachfeuer), as it

Question XXXII. Are there degrees of punishments in hell?

Infernal punishments differ in degrees, according to the quality and measure of sins.

Proof. 1. It will be more tolerable on the last day for the people of Sodom than for the inhabitants of Chorazin and Bethsaida, Matthew 11:24.

2. The servant who knew his master's will and did not do it will be beaten with many stripes; but he who did not know it, and did things worthy of stripes, will be beaten with few, Luke 12:47.

3. The Savior said to the Pharisees, "You make him a son of Gehenna twice as much as yourselves," Matthew 23:15.

The Socinians object: Whoever are equally rejected from the face of God, and equally dead in sin, they undergo equal punishments; But the damned, etc. R. The major premise is clear; because rejection from the divine face is the root of all torments which the damned sustain. Resp. I distinguish between the punishment of loss and of sense. All the damned are equally alike in the punishment of loss, by which they are deprived of the beatific vision of God; but they differ in the punishment of sense; for those who sinned more grievously and more often will feel greater torments.

Question XXXIII. What is the end of eternal damnation?

The end of eternal damnation is the glory of the vindicating justice a), truthfulness b), and power of God the judge c).

Proof a. From the vindicating justice of God proceeds the act of punishing, directed to the glory of God the judge. The Apostle proclaims this justice, 2 Thess. 1:6: "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you."

Proof b. The truthfulness of God will shine forth on the day of judgment, when God will in fact fulfill the threats made to the impious. The king sitting upon the throne says to John: "Write; for these words are true and faithful." To the "fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, their part will be in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone," which is the second death, Rev. 21:5, 8.

Proof c. The judge who is able to subject all the impious to eternal punishments must be most powerful. Whence the celestial beings sing: "Hallelujah! Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power (ἡ δόξαμις), unto the Lord our God: For true and righteous are his judgments," Rev. 19:1-2.

is purifying (ein Reinigungsfeuer). This contradicts the clearest statements, Prov. 11:12; 2 Thess. 1:8. The contrary is also against holy reason, which can teach anyone that punishment, properly so called, is to be distinguished from judicial chastisement. Underlying this false principle of theirs is another error; namely, that the bitterness of the torments is a sufficient means for emendation.

For the rest, the importance of this controversy is certainly most grave. For the opinion of the adversaries 1) greatly detracts from the highest perfections of God, especially His vindicating justice; 2) it either removes or diminishes the necessity of vicarious satisfaction, to be applied in this life; 3) it perverts the order of salvation; 4) it contributes not a little to the security of an impious life. Rightly, therefore, it has been condemned in our Augsburg Confession, art. 17.

SECTION II.
CHAPTER I.
ON THE
MEANS OF SALVATION
IN GENERAL, AND
IN PARTICULAR.
ON THE
WORD OF THE LAW

Question I. What are the means of salvation?

THE MEANS OF salvation are means divinely ordained, through which God, out of grace, offers the salvation acquired by the mediator Christ to all men fallen into sin, and gives and preserves true faith, and also leads all who embrace the merit of Christ with a final faith into the kingdom of glory.

Question II. How many kinds of means of salvation are there?

Their Division. The means of salvation are of a twofold order; Some are called means of salvation more strictly and properly, some more broadly and less properly. The means strictly so called, on the part of God, are donative (δοτικά), or exhibiting salvation, namely the Word and the sacraments a); on our part, the apprehensive (ληπτικόν) medium, or that which apprehends the offered salvation, is faith resting on the merit of Christ b). The means of salvation broadly so called are introductory (εισαγωγικά), or executive and leading into the kingdom of glory, namely death, the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, and the consummation of the age c).

Observation. In a stricter sense, the means of salvation are called exhibitiv and receptive, because they are causal. For although they are not the principal causes of salvation, they are nevertheless the organic causes of salvation. But the isagogical means are only conditions, without which there is no entrance into the kingdom of glory, and therefore they are called means of salvation ὡς ἐν πλάτει (as it were, broadly).

Proof a. The Word of God and the sacraments are the exhibitiv means of salvation; because through them the most merciful God offers, applies, and seals grace and salvation to men.

Proof b. Faith is the apprehensive medium; because it receives the grace of God founded on the merit of Christ and offered in the evangelical promise, by which eternal salvation is given.

Proof c. Death, the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, and the consummation of the age are called the executive, and isagogical, or introductory means of salvation. They are called executive, inasmuch as through them God executes the sentence of glorification and damnation; They are called isagogical, inasmuch as by their immediate intervention, men who finally persevere in faith are introduced into the kingdom of glory.

On these, see D. HULSEMANN, Breviarium, chap. XVI, p. 1126, ff. and D. J. A. OSIANDER, Colleg. System., part VI, p. 246.

Question III. In what manner of consideration is the Word of God treated here?

Various considerations of the Divine Word. The Word of God is considered here not as a principle of knowing (γνώσεως), or of cognition, but as a means of acting (πράξεως), or of operation, through whose intervention sinful man is led by God to eternal salvation.

Proof. The Word of God, considered as a principle of knowing God and divine things, pertains to the prolegomena of theology; in the present context, it is considered as a means of calling, illuminating, converting, etc.

Question IV. Is the Word of God an efficacious means of salvation?

On the efficacious Word of God as a means of salvation. The Word of God is a most efficacious means of salvation; for its force and efficacy are not merely objective, but also effective a); not consisting in moral persuasion, but in supernatural operation b); not external, or supervening in human use, but intrinsic to the Word; not accidental, but necessary by the necessity of divine ordinance, and thus not separable, but perpetual, competent to the divine Word as its first act, even outside of use c). This efficacy is truly divine, producing the same effect with the Holy Spirit, who is perpetually united with the Word, into which the Spirit flows together with the Word through a divine power, which belongs to the Holy Spirit originally and independently, but to the Word of God communicatively and dependently, on account of the mystical, intimate, and individual union of the Word with the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. The efficacy of the divine Word is not merely objective, or significative, like that of a statue of Mercury, which shows the way but does not cause the traveler to walk; but it is effective, because the Word of God not only shows the way of salvation but also saves souls, James 1:21.

Proof b. That the efficacy of the divine Word does not consist in moral persuasion, like that of rhetoricians who persuade by the splendor of their oration, the gravity of their sentences, and the weight of their reasons, Paul teaches in 1 Cor. 2:4: "My speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Likewise v. 13: "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual."

Proof c. Divine power does not belong to the written Word of God through a mere juxtaposition (παράτασιν) and external presence, such that, considered in itself and outside of use, the Holy Scripture is destitute of the power of illuminating and converting, an inefficacious and dead letter. For it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, Rom. 1:16, the seed of regeneration, 2 Peter 1:19. Therefore, it has and retains its internal force and efficacy even outside of use (just as the sun has the power of illuminating, although, if the moon's shadow is interposed, no one sees it, and just as a seed possesses internal efficacy, although it is not sown in the field), but it brings forth and exerts its efficacy in the second act when it is rightly used, attentively read, heard, and considered.

Proof d. Divine power has been communicated to the Word by the Holy Spirit, who is indivisibly joined to it. For this reason 1) The Word of God is called spirit and life, John 6:63, because it is endowed and animated with spirit and life. 2) The Word of God is living and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart; because it is joined with Christ, before whom no creature is invisible, Heb. 4:12, 13. Cf. SEB. SCHMIDIUS in his commentary ad loc. p. 444. 3) Supernatural and divine effects are attributed to the Word of God, which in the sacred letters are also claimed for the Holy Spirit. For by the Word of God we are called to the church, 2 Tim. 2:14; we are illuminated, 2 Peter 1:19; we are converted, Jer. 23:29; we are regenerated, 1 Peter 1:23; we are justified, 2 Cor. 3:9; we are renewed, John 17:17; we are preserved, Ps. 119:11; we are saved, James 1:21. Therefore, the Holy Spirit and the Word of God concur in these outcomes (ἀποτελέσματα), or common effects, not as associate causes, but the Holy Spirit produces them as the principal cause, to which the Word of God is subordinated as an intermediate cause, and the power of illuminating, converting, regenerating, etc., belongs to the Holy Spirit originally and independently, and to the Word of God communicatively and dependently, through dependence on the concurring Holy Spirit. For it pleased the Father of lights to beget you with the word of truth, James 1:18. 4) The Word of God, as such, cannot be imagined without divine virtue, or without the Holy Spirit, who is inseparable from his Word. For if the Holy Spirit were separated from the Word of God, it would not be God's Word, or the Word of the Spirit, but it would be a human word. Nor is the Word of God which is in God, or which is inspired in the men of God, other than that which is handed down in Scripture, or is preached, or is stored in the human mind. But that this is the divine sense, counsel, mind, and wisdom of God, just as it cannot be denied, so it cannot be destitute of divine virtue.

The antithesis is that of the Schwenckfeldian and Weigelian thinkers, according to whose mind Holy Scripture has no efficacy outside of its use. Their arguments are:

I. No instrument has efficacy outside of its use; The Word of God is an instrument; Therefore. The major premise is clear; because the entire force of an instrument consists in its use. Resp. 1) The Word of God is not so much an instrument as a medium, since not every medium is an instrument. The Word of God is more eminent than to be expressed by the name of instrument; for it is the power of God, the counsel of God, the concept of the divine mind, etc. Meanwhile, it is called an instrument ὡς ἐν πλάτει (as it were, broadly), and especially with respect to writing, preaching, economy, and ministry; but it is not properly called an instrument with respect to the internal virtue of the Holy Spirit with which it is endowed. 2) I distinguish between an instrument joined with the principal cause and one separated from it. An instrument separated from the principal cause (a hammer, an axe, a writing pen, etc.) has no efficacy outside of its use; but an instrument always joined with its principal cause possesses its efficacy even outside of use, e.g., the ear outside of use enjoys the powers of hearing. 3) I distinguish between use and the ordination to actual use. The force of an instrument consists in its ordination to use, although it is not used in act. The eye outside the external act of vision is a seeing instrument; because it is ordained for seeing.

II. Whatever word effects nothing outside of use, its efficacy depends on use; But the divine word, etc. Therefore. The major premise is proven; because efficacy is for the sake of the effect, which if it does not produce, it is in vain. But God did not impart efficacy to his word in vain. The minor is clear; because the Word of God, outside of use, on paper or parchment, is like a dead letter, effecting nothing. Resp. 1) I distinguish between the efficacy of the divine word considered as a first act and as a second act. Outside of use, the Word of God does not exercise its efficacy as a second act, yet it retains the same as a first act. 2) Although the Word of God effects or operates nothing outside of use; yet it is destined for a salutary effect and operation, and so its force is not in vain, nor should it be called dead. The hand of a sleeping man operates nothing, yet the power of operating was not given to it in vain, nor is the hand, operating nothing, dead.

III. Whoever attributes divine virtue to a created thing are idolaters; But the Evangelical Doctors, etc.; Therefore. The major premise is established; because divine virtue is God himself. If, therefore, divine power belonged to Holy Scripture, it would be God himself. The minor is proven; because Scripture is either creator or creature; It is not creator; Therefore, it is a creature. Resp. 1) Whoever attributes divine virtue to a created thing, as if it belonged to it originally and independently, they are idolaters; I concede. But the Evangelical Doctors state that the virtue of illuminating, regenerating, renewing, belongs to Holy Scripture dependently, communicatively, and by divine ordinance. 2) Although Holy Scripture considered materially, as letters, syllables, and words, is in the class of creatures; yet considered formally, as the divinely inspired (θεόπνευστον) sense, it is wrongly counted among creatures, since it is the mind of God, the counsel of God, the wisdom of God, etc.

IV. If divine power is intrinsically in the Word of God, even outside its legitimate use, it will be in it when used by magicians and sorcerers for incantation; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. I distinguish between use and abuse. Abuse, since it is against the nature of the divine word, does not take away from it its intrinsic virtue, which is not physically affixed or enclosed in it, but is supernaturally joined with it. Besides, the Word of God, outside of use, has an intrinsic efficacy, which by the force of divine ordinance respects and requires legitimate use, so that a salutary effect may follow.

V. If the sacraments, outside of use, have no efficacy, neither will the Word of God have any force outside of use; But the former is true; Therefore, so is the latter. The consequence of the major is proven because the sacraments, no less than the Word of God, are means of salvation. The assumption is established from the well-known axiom; let use be added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament. Resp. The case of the Word and the sacraments is different. For the sacraments formally consist in the action; Therefore, outside of use, they enjoy no efficacy. But who would say that the Word of God is formally an action; since the act of preaching, reading, and meditation is only accidental to it.

VI. Whatever is a sign of the divine will, it does not have an intrinsic power of operating; But the Word of God, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear; because no sign, as such, operates, but only represents the power of knowing something. The minor is clear; because by the Word of God, as a sign, the will of God is manifested. Resp. The Word of God considered materially, with respect to words, is a sign; but considered formally, with respect to its sense and dogmas, it is not a sign, but an efficacious means of salvation; nor does it only signify the mysteries of faith, but it also effectually converts the sinner.

VII. If the Word of God has a native faculty of acting, then it exercises it either physically or morally. Not physically; for thus no one could resist it; Not morally; for thus it would not differ from the words of Demosthenes or Cicero. Therefore, it does not have a native efficacy. Resp. There is a third option; The Word of God exercises its power supernaturally. For the power of the divine Word is not physical (strictly speaking; because it does not happen by physical and quantitative contact); nor merely moral, such as is in the persuasive words of rhetoricians; but hyperphysical, though explained in the scriptures through physical actions. For it is compared with fructifying seed, Mark 4:26; with moistening rain, Isa. 55:10; with refreshing honey, Ps. 119:103. Therefore, the power of the divine Word is hyperphysical, analogous to physical efficacy, i.e., true and real. Add to this that not every physical action is irresistible. A seed fructifies physically, but not irresistibly.

VIII. That with which the divine virtue of the Holy Spirit is perpetually joined, its operation is irresistible; But the operation of the divine Word is not irresistible; Therefore, the divine virtue is not perpetually joined with it. The major is evident; because no one can resist the virtue of the Holy Spirit. The minor is proven from Heb. 4:2: "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." Resp. 1) I deny the major. For the divine virtue of the Holy Spirit joined with the Word is not absolute, but ordained, to which an impediment can be opposed by the voluntary resistance of man. 2) To conclude from the negation of the effect to the negation of the power to operate is a bad inference. For the Word of God produces faith, through which it is mixed with the hearts of men who do not resist.

IX. If efficacy is intrinsic to the Word of God, why do we sing: "Give Thy Spirit and power to the Word" (Deinen Geist und Kraft zum Worte geben)? Resp. By the word in the litany is understood the external preaching and reading of the Word, for which the grace of God is implored, that it may obtain the desired effect in the souls of the hearers and readers, that He may remove impediments and open their hearts. (*)

(*) These three must also be accurately distinguished; efficacy, effect, and outcome. Namely, efficacy (efficacitas, Kraft) is the very constitution of a thing, inasmuch as it is apt for a certain end; just as the nature of a seed is efficacious in itself to produce fruit suitable to it. Holy Scripture is entirely truth, divinely inspired, and altogether most apt for teaching everyone those things which pertain to recovering salvation, 2 Tim. 3:15, 16. The effect (effectus, Wirkung) is the attainment of that same end, insofar as that medium, efficacious in itself, was rightly used, and no impediment contrary to its right use intervened, Luke 8:5 ff. The outcome (eventus) is something plainly different, alien from the proposed end, indeed utterly adverse to it, on account of certain things intervening from elsewhere. Thus it can and does happen that a thing most salutary in itself becomes, by accident and by the fault of man, most pernicious, Rom. 7:10. An example is what we read related, concerning the salutary effect of the divine word, Acts 2:37, and, on the contrary, concerning the opposite outcome of the same word, Acts 7:54.

Question V. How is the Word of God divided?

Division of the divine word. The Word of God is divided into the word of the law and the word of the gospel. The former excites contrition; the latter kindles saving faith by divine intention.

Proof. 1) John the Baptist insists on the distinction of the divine word into law and gospel, John 1:17: "The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ." The law was given through Moses, not as its author, but as its minister. But the truest grace has come to us through Jesus Christ the mediator; which is the highest point of the gospel proclamation; which the Son of God himself brought forth from the bosom of the Father and manifested to us. Paul teaches the same distinction, 2 Cor. 3:6:

"The letter kills, but the spirit gives life." The law is called the letter, not only because it was once inscribed in letters on stone tablets, but also because, like a letter, it prescribes and demands things to be done, but confers no powers for doing them. But the gospel is spirit; because it gives the spirit, who, by graciously uniting himself with the word of the gospel, bestows upon it the spiritual power of illuminating, regenerating, justifying, and saving our hearts. 2) The law detects and convicts sins, Rom. 3:19; it works wrath, chap. 4:15; it announces a curse, Deut. 27:27; it kills, 2 Cor. 3:6. But the gospel covers sins, Rom. 4:7; proclaims absolution from sins, Matt. 9:2; works salvation, Rom. 1:17; brings a blessing, Gal. 3:14; and gives life, 2 Cor. 3:6. Therefore, contrition is aroused by the law, but faith, righteousness, and salvation are given through the gospel.

ON THE WORD OF THE LAW

Question VI. Is the divine law a means of salvation?

OR FALLEN MAN, the divine law is not a causal and collative means of salvation a), but it is only a pedagogical means for the sinner seeking the causal means of salvation b).

Proof a. The divine law indeed promises eternal life, but under the condition of perfect fulfillment, Lev. 18:5; Ezek. 20:11. But since after the fall no one renders perfect obedience to the law in all its parts; because it is weakened by the flesh, Rom. 8:3, it happens by accident that the law works wrath, Rom. 4:15, and kills, 2 Cor. 3:6.

Proof b. "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith," Gal. 3:24. The law leads to Christ not directly, but as sickness leads to a physician, indirectly and by the occasion of showing the inability (ἀδυναμία) of obtaining salvation through the law. Blessed LUTHER excellently explains this pedagogy of the law, in vol. III of the Jena edition, fol. 9: "The law prepares for grace, by revealing and increasing sin, humbling the proud, to desire the help of Christ."

Question VII. What is law?

Definition of law in general. Law is a command of a superior, by which he dictates to his subject things to be done and to be omitted, obliging him to obedience or, failing this, to punishment.

Obs. I. SAMUEL PUFFENDORFF in L. I. de J. N. & G. p. 81 defines law in general as "a decree by which a superior obligates a subject to himself, to conform his actions to that one's prescription." It is certainly to be noted that a commanding decree and a command are the same thing. Therefore, whether you define law by a decree and precept, or by a command of a superior, the matter comes to the same thing. For "command" is taken so broadly here as to include also the impression of the natural law.

Obs. II. But since the command of a superior, obligating his inferior to himself, is either of God or of man; therefore law is divided into divine and human. For us at present, the discussion is about the divine law, which God gave to men.

Question VIII. What is divine law?

Definition of divine law. Divine law is a command of God, by which this supreme Lord and legislator prescribes to men what must be done and forbids what must be shunned, obliging them to render perfect obedience, or, failing this, to punishment.

Obs. Divine law in the sacred letters is taken a) most generally, for the entire celestial doctrine, Ps. 1:2; b) more specially, for the writings of the O.T., John 15:25; 1 Cor. 14:21; c) most specially for the Mosaic pentateuch, Luke 24:44. Here, however, the terms law and gospel are taken insofar as they are adequately distinguished from each other, and law denotes the norm of things to be done and shunned, while gospel denotes the norm of things to be believed. The summary of the law is: "Do this, and you will live," Luke 10:28; Gal. 3:12. The summary of the gospel is: "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved," Acts 16:31.

Question IX. How is the divine law divided?

Division of the divine law. The divine law is either universal and perpetual, or particular and temporary. The universal and perpetual law is the immutable rule of all moral acts, by which God obligates all men to do that which is honest and right, and to shun that which is base and unjust. It is also called the moral law. The particular and temporary law is that which God gave to the Israelites alone, and bound them to obedience; which fell when the Hebrew polity fell, and is either ceremonial or forensic.

Obs. We speak at present not of the archetypal law of God, but the ectypal. The archetypal law is the eternal and immutable justice, holiness, wisdom, and judgment of God concerning things honest and base, joined with the will that honest things be done by the rational creature, and base things be omitted. Whence God is said to be a law unto himself. Against this eternal law God can in no way act; because he cannot deny himself, 2 Tim. 2:13. For he would deny himself if he were to act against the eternal law, i.e., against himself. The ectypal is every law given by God to a rational creature; for it is derived from the law of God, which was born with God, as MARCUS TULLIUS says in book II of De Legibus.

Question X. How is the perpetual and moral law of God, generally speaking, divided?

Natural Law. The perpetual law of God is divided into the natural law and the moral law specially so called. (*) The natural law is the command of God, naturally impressed upon the minds of all, by which they are informed and obligated to do those things which are in themselves right and honest, and to shun those things which are in themselves wicked and base, for the praise of God the creator and the preservation of civil society.

Obs. I The law of nature here does not denote the law of nature prescribed by the creator, by virtue of which every creature maintains its order, nor the law common to man and brute, which is defined by ULPIAN in book 1, inst., title 2: "Natural law is that which nature has taught all animals," and is improperly called the law of nature; but the law of nature here denotes the law divinely bestowed upon man and impressed through nature. (**)

(*) Or, if you prefer, into natural law and revealed law; for these two are distinct and opposed to each other. The natural law is itself also moral, which the blessed author professes in obs. II.

(**) Since man is an animal endowed with reason, and created for a society consonant with reason; from this very definition of man it follows that every man is endowed with a threefold nature. There is in him 1) an animal nature, inasmuch as man is an animal. He indeed has this in common with all living things, but with this significant excellence, that man is conscious of himself, whereas other animals follow nothing but the instinct of nature implanted in them. That most imperfect definition, which is attributed to ULPIAN, should be understood of this nature, which learned men, not by an empty conjecture, judge should be explained from the tenets of Stoic philosophy. To this nature, therefore, belong these two things; that we live, that we feel. There is 2) a rational nature, inasmuch as man is an animal partaking of reason. In this, which is man's proper excellence, are contained all those duties which pertain to living well and blessedly, and to always acting with sufficient reason (for actions are of one who understands and wills freely). There is 3) a social nature, inasmuch as man is created for a society suitable to reason. Of this nature, likewise proper to man, we have three proofs, of which the first is the natural faculty of speech; for there would be no purpose and use for speech, which is the sign of reason, if man were to live in solitude or wander about; The second is the natural need of every man, who from his tenderest years to his last breath needs the work and benevolence of others; The third finally is the scope of sciences, arts, and various ways of life, with a certain natural inclination of minds. But of all these there would be not the slightest use without the tightest bond of society. To this third part of human nature are to be referred those duties which contribute much to living tranquilly and honestly in society and the republic.

With these just foundations, I trust it will be clear that there are altogether three kinds of natural laws, and consequently different principles for each. There is indeed one general

This is what is sufficient for the conservation of human nature and the attainment of its ends, so that without them the nature and society of men cannot even subsist safely. But of the natural laws, some are indeed simply necessary, the observance of which would have been perpetual, even if man had remained in the state of integrity (e.g., Know and revere God; Strive for your happiness; Give to each his own); others are principle, which extends so very broadly that it pertains to that entire threefold nature of man, namely this: Live agreeably and congruously to nature. But there are also special principles.

I. Of the animal nature; indeed this: One must live agreeably to the preservation of life and the perception of the senses. From this principle proceed these laws, and others of this kind: Seek food and shelter; Avoid harmful things; Dare nothing against the affection of love, a term used for that which is in brute animals as well, by which they are carried towards their young, and which is by no means to be confused with the virtue of love, ἀγάπη, which must always be directed by the use of reason. These things are for brute animals a certain necessity and natural instinct, the cause and reason of which they themselves do not know; but for man, they are laws, properly so called, inasmuch as he is capable of their cognition.

II. The principle of the rational nature is this: Know thyself. For from this one principle are derived all the laws pertaining to this most noble nature of man. Namely, when man turns his mind to himself, he easily understands of human nature 1) its origin, that it wholly depends on the will of one Creator and Preserver; 2) its constitution, and indeed its excellence, and at the same time 3) its corruption and misery, although he has an obscure and insufficient notice of it, until he is illuminated by revelation. Therefore, the natural laws that pertain here are chiefly these: 1) From the known dependence, to use a common word, of human nature: Remember thy Creator and Preserver, and know and worship him rightly: Use created things, both moderately, as is fitting, and wisely, that is, for the just ends of each thing, established by the Creator himself. 2) From the known constitution, and also excellence of human nature: Undertake nothing without counsel and deliberation; Always set for yourself an end that is good and salutary; Discern the truly good from the false and specious, the greater from the lesser, the certain from the uncertain; Value the blessedness of the soul more than the care of the body, which is not to be treated negligently; Of two evils, if you cannot avoid both at once, choose the lesser; It is better to suffer evil than to do it, nor are evils to be done so that good may come by accident; The necessary is to be preferred to the useful, the useful to the pleasant; Compare the means with the ends, and do not consider only what is present, but also anticipate in thought what will be future; Choose the medium from among several that is best, most certain, most safe. 3) From the known corruption and misery of human nature: Explore the defects of your intelligence and will, especially of your religion and reverence towards God; Hear the voice of your conscience; Reprehend yourself; Desire and seek the restoration and perfection of your happiness; Bear the evils that happen to you with a calm mind, and do not attribute any blame for them to God, the author of all good things. In these is seen the use, which is called, pedagogical of nature to grace, of reason to revelation.

III. The principle of the social nature is that which a man once supreme, PUFENDORF, held to be the general principle of the entire law of nature: Conduct yourself agreeably and decently in society. From this source have flowed the special laws, of which the chief are: Exercise the public worship of God with others, so that there may be both a mutual incitement of minds and a common profession of the highest duty, by which we are all equally bound to God; Injure no one; Give to each his own; What you want to be done to you, do that in turn to another, and what you do not want to be done to you, do not do to another; More regard is to be had for those joined to you by close kinship and necessity than for others; Honor each according to his dignity; Apply your mind to a certain way of life, for which you understand you are most apt and as it were born, so that you may be of benefit to the republic; Fulfill the function of the office entrusted to you diligently and faithfully, and do not meddle in others' affairs; The common safety of the many is to be preferred to the singular safety of one; Trust, but see whom you trust; Pacts and promises are to be kept; Observe all duties that pertain to the use of speech.

accidentally necessary (as: Take pains to reprehend and correct yourself; Prohibit and repel unjust force by just defense of yourself.) For in these, and things of this kind, the changed condition of nature, and the state of defection and corruption, is presupposed.

Obs. II. Natural law is also called moral in a general sense; because it directs the morals, or way of living, which befits a rational creature.

Obs. III. Things are honest by themselves and by nature which are suitable to a rational creature as such. Conversely, things are base by themselves which are unsuitable to a rational creature as such.

Question XI. Does the law of nature exist in man after the fall?

The law of nature was indeed greatly obscured by the fall of the first humans and the sins that followed the fall; yet some vestiges of it remained, namely universal principles from which the distinction between honest and base things is known naturally.

Proof. 1) From the testimony of Paul, Rom. 2:15: "The Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law; these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: (for) they shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another." The Gentiles do not indeed have the Mosaic law, proposed or prescribed to them by divine revelation; yet they have a law, written by the finger of nature, by the force of which after their actions they descend into themselves, and now accuse themselves as violators of the law laid down by God, now excuse, defend, and praise themselves as observers of the law.

2. There exist in the practical intellect of man first and universal principles, such as are: Good is to be done, and evil is to be shunned; God is to be worshipped; The advantages of civil society are to be promoted; What you wish another to do to you, do you to him; Live honestly; Harm no one; Give to each his own; Commit nothing of which you may be ashamed or repent. The habit of these practical principles is called in the schools συντήρησις.

3. There is also after the fall a faculty of applying the first practical principles to singular actions, e.g., It is not lawful for me today to beat Sempronius; because no one is to be harmed. This faculty, of applying practical principles here and now, is called φρόνησις, or prudence.

4. The natural law reveals and exerts itself by the natural horror and shame which seizes the mind, e.g., that intercourse with a mother, with a beast, is wicked, is testified by horror before the act and shame after the act.

5. The natural law is confirmed by the suffrage of all more civilized nations. It is an argument of truth, that something seems so to all, says SENECA, epistle 117.

Question XII. What are the causes of the natural law?

The efficient cause of the natural law is God a). The exemplary cause is the justice and sanctity of God b). The matter from which are the common notions, or practical principles, naturally known c). The matter in which, or the subject quod, is man, not a brute d). The subject quo is man's intellect, will, and sensitive appetite e). The matter about which, or the personal object, is God, the neighbor, and man himself f). The real object is things to be done and to be shunned g). The form is a directive and obligating force h). The end intended per se is the glory of God i), and the preservation of civil society k). The accidental end, or event, is being without excuse (ἀναπολόγησις), or the lack of excuse l).

Proof a. The efficient cause of the natural law is God, who 1) by the very fact that he gave man reason, by which he strives to discern good from evil, at the same time willed that man should do the known good and omit the evil. Therefore, when Paul in Rom. 2:15 asserts that the gentiles show the work of the law written in their hearts, he means an inscription made by God, through the means of natural propagation. 2) The obligation of the natural law is from God himself, the Creator and supreme ruler of the human race, because he bound men to its observance by his authority. The very tender sense of conscience in the souls of men not completely savage testifies to this, by which they are convinced that in sinning against the law of nature, they offend him who has dominion over the souls of men, and who is to be feared even where there is no impending fear from men.

Proof b. The ectypal (ἔκτυπος) law has its archetypal (ἀρχέτυπον) idea in the very sanctity and justice of God, which the natural law so reflects, as rays, scattered in water, their source, the sun; as an image its exemplar. Therefore, the root of the law of nature ultimately resides not in the divine will, but in the sanctity and justice of God, and God prohibited sin, not because he willed it, but because it is contrary to divine justice and sanctity.

Proof c. The practical principles known by nature, which we have reviewed above, are as it were the constituent parts of the law of nature, which being posited, it is posited, and being removed, the law of nature, the light of truth, and the seed of good are removed.

Proof d. Man, a partaker of reason and free will, is capable of the natural law. Therefore, the law of nature, properly speaking, does not apply to brutes: Because 1) due to a defect of reason they cannot conform their actions to the norm of the law; 2) Because they lack free will, which is constrained by the law. However, analogically and by similarity it is attributed to them; inasmuch as, just like man, they intend their own preservation, repel injury, and nourish and defend the offspring they have produced.

Proof e. The natural law illustrates the intellect of man, like a mirror, so that it may know and judge good and evil; it directs the will, so that it may choose the good proposed by the intellect, and reject the evil shown to it; but the sensitive appetite is contained by the law of nature within certain bounds, lest it should go astray, or transgress the laws of honesty.

Proof f. The law of nature teaches to worship God, not to harm one's neighbor and to give to each his own, to defend oneself, and to keep one's soul sober and chaste.

Proof g. The law of nature is directly concerned with things to be done, which are in themselves duties, suitable to a rational creature, and therefore naturally right and honest; Conversely, it is indirectly concerned with things to be shunned, which are in themselves illicit, unsuitable to a rational creature, and therefore intrinsically evil and base. In this, the law of nature differs not only from human law, but also from divine voluntary or positive law, which does not command or forbid things that are in themselves and by their own nature either duties or illicit, but by forbidding makes them illicit, and by commanding makes them duties. Conf. GROTIUS, de I. B. ac P. book I. ch. I. p. 7.

Proof h. The form of the natural law consists in a directive and obligating force.

For the law of nature directs all moral acts of men, inasmuch as it is an immutable rule, from which the honesty and baseness of human life is known, esteemed, discerned, and examined. It obligates to obedience, and, if this is not rendered, to punishment, inasmuch as it is a bond of law, by which a certain necessity is imposed upon the liberty of the human will, and man is bound to do that which is in itself right, and to shun that which is in itself base. This obligation arises from the eminence, beneficence, and power of God, the supreme legislator, to whom we are bound to render obedience due to our natural subjection. For God is most just, most wise, most good, and most powerful, to whom we owe ourselves and all that is ours; who both can and will give the greatest rewards to the obedient, and inflict the gravest punishments on the disobedient. Therefore, we are bound to obey necessarily and without exception the law inscribed by God on our minds.

Proof i. God willed that common practical notions should exist in the human intellect after the fall, as remnants of the divine image, so that all men from them might know, worship, and celebrate God, on account of the supreme eminence and dominion of the divine nature, and its beneficence to all creatures; But many gentiles, who knew God from the light of nature, did not glorify him as God, nor did they give thanks to him, Rom. 1:21.

Proof k. God created man for civil society, endowed him by nature, led him by reason, and joined him by speech. So that this society might be preserved tranquil, orderly, and honest, God sowed in the minds of men the law of nature, which dictates that one must live honestly, harm no one, give to each his own, and that the advantages of the republic are to be promoted.

Proof l. From Rom. 1:20: "The invisible things of God are manifested to the gentiles, that they may be without excuse." The gentiles knew from the dictate of the implanted law what ought to be done and omitted in external works; Nevertheless, many of them fell against their conscience into the gravest crimes. For these, the accidental end of the natural law is ἀναπολογία, or that they be inexcusable, because they were convicted in their conscience that such crimes should not be committed.

Question XIII. What are the properties of the natural law?

The properties of the natural law are that it a) is innate (σύμφυτος), or connate to all men, b) is immutable, c) is indispensable, d) is imperfect after the fall, e) is insufficient for salvation.

Proof a. The natural law is connate to all men and inscribed by the finger of God, Rom. 2:15, by an inscription that is 1) actual, not merely potential, which then only comes into act when reason begins to assert and exert itself. For it is said that the work of the law (ἔργον νόμου) is inscribed; Therefore, in act. 2) An inscription analogous to that by which the law was engraved in the first man; Just as the image was once created with man, of which this writing is as it were a certain sacred relic. 3) An inscription different from the inscription of the supernatural light kindled in regeneration. 4) An indelible inscription, although it can be obscured and held captive. The examples of barbarous nations, which used vices against nature as virtues, prove that the fire was covered with ashes, not completely extinguished. Conf. DANNHAVER, in hodos. phen. VI. p. 467.

Proof b. If the law of nature could be changed, it would be changed either by God himself, or by man. But it cannot be changed by God himself; because God can do nothing against his own justice, of which the law of nature is an expressed and infallible image; nor by man; because he who does not have the power of enacting a law, cannot change it either. And what man would dare, being inferior, to change the law of God, who is far superior? A careful distinction must be made here between a true and an apparent change. The law of nature, with respect to the most common principles of which it consists, is not truly and in itself changed; but often the thing about which the natural law establishes something undergoes a change; When this happens, it is not indeed that the natural law is changed, but that the matter is withdrawn from it, e.g., if a creditor considers what is owed to him as received, the debtor is no longer bound to pay, not because the law of nature has ceased to command that what one owes should be paid; but because what he owed ceased to be owed. Thus, when God commanded Isaac to be killed, he did not wish to change the law of nature, by decreeing that homicide was licit, but the killing of Isaac would not have been homicide prohibited by the law of nature, which would have been done by the will of him who is the Lord of life and death.

Proof c. The law of nature is indispensable, that is, no one can be excepted from its obligation. For since 1) God cannot change the law of nature, neither can he remove its obligation, in which the law formally consists. 2) If God were to exempt man from the obligation of the natural law, then he would permit and approve with impunity and appropriation that which is intrinsically base, which is repugnant to divine justice. God can indeed permit and approve an act which seems contrary to the law of nature, but in reality is not, if the circumstances are considered, e.g., when the Israelites took with them the vessels of the Egyptians, that act was not theft; because it was not the handling of another's property, but of their own wages, earned by the gravest labors endured in Egypt, not without the will of the owner, but by the command of the supreme Lord of all goods, God.

Proof d. The law of nature before the fall and after the fall does not differ in essence (ἔσις), essentially, but in perfection, or gradually. For it illuminated the mind of an integral man more clearly and perfectly than it does today the intellect of a man corrupted by sin. Hence it is that we do not know either original sin, or the first and indeliberate motions of evil concupiscence from the law of nature. Paul teaches this, Rom. 7:7, "I had not known sin, but by the law (Mosaic)." For I had not known concupiscence, except the law had said, "Thou shalt not covet."

Proof e. The law of nature indeed dictates that God is to be worshipped; But since in this corrupt state of nature we daily offend God by our sins, the law of nature does not teach what satisfaction can or should be offered to God offended by sins. But unless satisfaction has been rendered to God, the most just avenger of sins, we can neither place our trust in God, nor sincerely love him, nor perform works pleasing to him. Therefore, it remains fixed and certain that outside of Christ the mediator, of whom the law of nature knows nothing, there is no salvation, Acts 4:12.

Question XIV. What is the moral law specially so called?

Moral Law. The moral law, specially so called, is a command of God, superadded by the revealed divine word to the natural law, repeated often from the origin of the world, and finally solemnly promulgated on Mount Sinai, and committed to letters, distinctly prescribing honest things and prohibiting base things, directing all external and internal motions, and obliging all men to the most perfect obedience, or failing this, to the most exquisite punishments.

Obs. The natural law in a general sense is also the moral law, because it directs the morals of men to honesty; nor does it differ from the moral law, specially so called, materially, since the summary of the natural law is contained in the decalogue; But it differs from it formally. For a) the natural law is inscribed on the inmost souls of men by nature, the moral law is promulgated extrinsically, revealed by the voice of God and committed to letters; b) The natural law is more imperfect and obscure, the moral law is more perfect and clearer. The former directs external discipline; the latter governs and tempers both the internal and external motions of men. (*)

Question XV. How many kinds are there of the moral law specially so called?

The moral law, specially so called, is either primordial or Sinaitic. The primordial moral law is that which was both prefixed to our first parents, and revealed to their posterity by the voice of God, and further expounded and declared through the patriarchs, up to that solemn promulgation of the law on Mount Sinai; which informed them to live piously toward God, justly toward their neighbor, and temperately toward themselves, and obligated them to perfect obedience.

Obs. The primordial and the Sinaitic moral law do not differ in the substance of their dogmas, but in a different mode of revelation. For the primordial law took its beginning in paradise, when God commanded the first-created abstinence from the fruits which the tree of the knowledge of good and evil bore. But after the fall, before and after the flood, the doctrine of the law, both immediately proposed by God, and further expounded through the ministry of the divinely inspired (θεοπνευστων) patriarchs, flourished among the people of God, until God solemnly promulgated the law on Mount Sinai. But how the doctrine of the law sounded in the church of God before the time of Moses, and comprised the individual precepts of the decalogue, is shown by CHEMNITZ in loc. theol. Part II, ch. VI, fol. 21, and GERHARD in the locus on the law, § 15.

Question XVI. What is the Sinaitic moral law?

The Sinaitic moral law is a divine command, solemnly promulgated on Mount Sinai, in the presence and with the ministration of angels, consisting of ten precepts, inscribed by God himself on stone tablets, and transmitted to the Israelites through Moses, and often declared in Holy Scripture, that it might be for all men a perfect and perpetual norm of things to be done and shunned, obliging them to the most consummate obedience, and promising rewards to the obedient, and denouncing temporal and eternal punishments to the disobedient.

Question XVII. Who is the author of the Sinaitic moral law?

The author of the Sinaitic moral law is the triune God.

Proof. From Exodus 20:1; "And Elohim spoke all these words." Obs. 1) By "these words" are understood the ten precepts, which are called the "ten words of the covenant," Exodus 34:28, whence the name decalogue. 2) Elohim spoke the ten precepts, i.e., God, one in essence and three in persons; The unity of the divine essence is indicated by the Hebrew word which is put in the singular; The plurality of the divine persons, and consequently the trinity, is denoted by the word אֱלֹהִים, which divine name is plural not only in formation and termination, but also in sense and signification, and therefore implies a plurality of persons, as we have demonstrated in part I, chap. 1, Question 14. Therefore God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is one lawgiver, James 4:12. But the promulgation of the law by a sonorous and audible voice is appropriated to God the Son; for he is that uncreated angel who spoke with Moses on Mount Sinai, as Stephen testifies, Acts 7:38.

(*) Indeed, the natural law also directs the internal motions of the soul and the external actions of man, as is plainly apparent, both from the great force of conscience and from the very sentence of almost all natural laws. See the notes on page 998. But those laws are civil which regulate only external discipline. The law which the Blessed Author calls moral, when it is distinguished from the natural, I have briefly noted on page 997 that it is more correctly called revealed.

Question XVIII. What ministers did God use in the promulgation of the moral law?

In the promulgation of the Sinaitic law, God used the ministers of angels a), and Moses b).

Proof a. That hosts of angels attended God the lawgiver in the promulgation of the law, we gather from Deut. 33:2: "God came from Sinai... with ten thousands of saints." By those saints are designated angels, as Stephen explains, Acts 7:53, who asserts that the Jews received the law εἰς διαταγὰς ἀγγέλων, among the dispositions of angels, i.e., among the well-ordered ranks of angels, attending their emperor, and surrounding him for the sake of majesty. Paul agrees with this, who says that the law was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator, Gal. 3:19, where δι' ἀγγέλων is the same as "among angels," as the particle διὰ is taken in 2 Tim. 2:2; but "the hand of the mediator" denotes the power and authority of the mediator Christ, so that the sense is: The law was ordained, commanded, and decreed by the power of the mediator Christ, among the angels, who surround their Lord for the sake of honor and duty, and congratulate with the sound of a trumpet.

Proof b. "The law was given by Moses," John 1:17, not as author, but as minister, for he brought the tablets of the law written with the finger of God to the Israelites, Exod. 34:29, and impressed and expounded the divine law to them.

Question XIX. What causes impelled God to the solemn promulgation of the moral law?

God solemnly promulgated the moral law, a) so that greater authority, clarity, and perfection might be added to the natural law; b) so that the moral law might be a powerful medium, by which the Holy Spirit might break, soften, and convert the hearts of men; c) so that men, corrupted by sin, acknowledging their internal impurity from the divine law, might be compelled to seek the true physician of souls, Christ.

Proof a. God willed, 1) that there should exist a manifest divine testimony that the natural notions of the law concerning the distinction between honest and base things were divinely implanted in human minds, and that they were consonant with the idea of sanctity and justice which is in God, so that men might be validly obligated to give assent and render obedience to the dictate of the natural law. 2) The most benign Deity willed to add a clearer light to the natural law, greatly obscured by the sins of men, and to supply its defect. For the natural law after the fall indeed directs the external discipline of men, but it does not teach the inner sanctity of the soul, nor does it prohibit the indeliberate acts of evil concupiscence. Hence it happens that from the law of nature neither original sin nor the first evil motions are known, but many men, in the manner of the Pharisees, fascinated by the admiration of external discipline, strive to establish their own righteousness before God, Rom. 10:3. (*). This defect of the inscribed law was

(*) The law of nature forbids all motions of the soul not consonant with human nature and its constitution. But that in the state of corrupt nature and viciousness no one can know by nature the concupiscence innate in us, or hereditary sin, and its first origin, this is to be attributed not to some defect of the natural law, but to the defection of man, averted from that law, and to the corruption of souls. The Pharisees violated the natural law itself, and against it, no less than against the revealed law, all those like them are accustomed to sin even today. Nor can the revealed law be said, if we wish to speak accurately, to supply the defect of the natural law. The knowledge of the natural law, as it now is in depraved man who is hostile to the law, is indeed very imperfect (and this is what the blessed Author means; for he speaks of the inscribed law, not as it is law, but as it is inscribed, that is, naturally innate and known to man); but the natural law itself is, as it always was, perfect in its own kind. For in its scope it contains all those things which are necessarily required for the preservation of human nature and the attainment of its ends. And who would doubt that even the first defection of man, and the first unjust motion of the soul, was forbidden by the natural law itself? This certainly is, and will be perpetually, the first of all natural laws, which pertains to the rational nature; God is to be worshipped with the whole soul and with all one's strength. But revealed laws are the norm of those actions which pertain to certain surrounding things to be observed by men, and the reason for which can be supplied by the most holy God with the light of the prescribed law.

Proof b. In the solemn promulgation, God imparted a supernatural force to the word of the law, which came from his own mouth, so that it might be an efficacious instrument of the Holy Spirit, operating in sinful man, softening his hard heart, preparing and disposing it for faith, to be kindled in it by the voice of the gospel. For the Holy Spirit convicts the world of sin through the law, John 16:8.

Proof c. "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick," says Christ, Matt. 9:12. Those who do not acknowledge their internal misery, do not seek mercy. Therefore, the divine law was promulgated, so that, acknowledging our internal disease of original sin and our misery from it, as sick men we might sigh for the physician, redeemer, and liberator, Christ.

Question XX. What men are obligated by the Sinaitic moral law?

All men, absolutely, without any exception, are obligated by the Sinaitic moral law.

Proof. 1. The moral law comprehends the summary of the natural law, which is inscribed on the minds of all men, and is an expressed image of the eternal law existing in God.

2. Just as God is the creator of all men; so all are bound to keep the moral law, by which God commanded those things which he judged suitable for them as rational creatures, and to be observed on account of the authority of the creator, and the most wise and powerful lord.

3. The Sinaitic moral law was in force among the people of God, as to the substance of its dogmas, before the solemn promulgation, nor was it abrogated by Christ, but declared, and diligently impressed by the Apostles, who were the teachers of all nations. Therefore, the binding force of the Sinaitic moral law is both the greatest and most universal, which no man can escape.

4. The Apostle testifies that by the moral law every mouth is stopped, and the whole world becomes guilty before God, Rom. 3:19. This would not be so if the Mosaic law obligated only the Jews.

The antithesis is that of some of the Scholastics, and of Pererius, disp. VI on chap. II of Romans, who state that the law promulgated on Mount Sinai obligated only the Israelites. Their arguments, contracted into a summary, are: 1) The Sinaitic law was promulgated only to the Israelites, to whom 2) it was delivered only by the ministry of Moses. 3) The Sinaitic law contains some things which are specially suited to no other nations than the people of Israel. Therefore, the law promulgated on Mount Sinai obligates only the Israelites. Resp. to I. The promulgation of the Sinaitic law was indeed made only to the Israelites, but not for the Israelites alone; Just as also the prophetic promises concerning Christ were many of them made to the Israelites, but not for them alone. But as the sacred scripture, which is divided into law and gospel, pertains to all; so also the moral law, no less than the gospel, concerns all men. Therefore, in the N.T. the moral laws are not newly promulgated to the gentiles, but are repeated from the writings of Moses, and are prescribed to all. Resp. to II. I distinguish between Moses the minister, and God the author. We keep the Sinaitic law, not on account of the ministry of Moses, but on account of the authority of God the lawgiver. Resp. to III. I distinguish between the constitutive (συστατικά), or substantial of the moral law, and the circumstantial (περιστατικά), or accidentals of the precepts. The substantial dogmas of the moral law are suitable to man as a rational creature, from whose obligation no one is exempt; the known from no other source than from divine revelation. That the natural law was perfect in the state of integrity, no one will deny. But there were even then certain revealed laws, about the forbidden tree, and about the Sabbath. And the reason for the former was the dominion over the earth, granted to man by the benefit of God, which, that man might confess it to be circumscribed by limits, and that he was as it were a vassal, God by his own will prohibited him from this fruit. But the reason for the latter was this singular circumstance of creation, to be known only from revelation; that all kinds of created things were completed on the seventh day. The origin of evil, and both the imputation and propagation of the first sin, the intimate corruption of the soul and its propensity to any evil whatsoever, is certainly a most sad state of surrounding things and of the changes that have happened to human nature, and which revelation alone teaches us are to be known with the greatest sorrow.

accidental appendices specially concern the Israelites.

Question XXI. In what does the moral law formally consist?

The form of the moral law consists in a directive a) and obligating b) force.

Proof a. The moral law is a perfect and adequate norm, directing all moral acts, internal and external, from which everything honest and holy, everything base and iniquitous is known, judged, and discerned. "What thing soever I command you, observe to do it; thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it," says Jehovah, Deut. 12:32.

Proof b. The moral law is a bond, by which God, our most wise, good, and powerful Creator and Lord of all, constrains our freedom of action, so that we cannot rightly tend in a different direction from that to which it leads; although our will de facto often goes in a different direction. Therefore God the lawgiver threatens and inflicts the gravest punishments on transgressors, Exod. 20:5.

Question XXII. To what sort of obedience does the moral law obligate us?

The moral law obligates us to the most consummate obedience, which is perfect, a) with the highest intensive perfection, with respect to degrees, b) with the most ample extensive perfection, with respect to parts, c) with the longest protensive perfection, with respect to perseverance.

Proof a. The moral law today demands from us as great a perfection in the highest degree as Adam had while still innocent. For what talent God first gave to man, that he demands back. Therefore, the law commands that we love Jehovah our God with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength, Deut. 6:5.

Proof b. The law demands perfect obedience according to all the precepts of the decalogue; he who does not render it, is condemned by the law equally, having transgressed a single precept, as he who has violated the whole law. "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all," judges James, chap. 2:10.

Proof c. The moral law requires perseverance in obedience. For "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of a law to do them," Gal. 3:10. Where the Greek word, ἐμμένει, designates permanence and perseverance in the observance of the law. A distinction is to be made here between affirmative and negative precepts. Affirmative precepts indeed obligate always, but not to always be doing them, e.g., the fourth precept: "Honor your parents," does not obligate to always; for it can happen that parents command things adverse to God, or have ceased to be alive. Negative precepts obligate always, and to always be shunning, e.g., these interdicts, "thou shalt not commit adultery," "thou shalt not kill," obligate perpetually, to always and simply. (*)

(*) This distinction, though anciently used, will please few today; and not without reason. For 1) there can be no obligation, unless either to do, or to shun; Therefore, a law which always obligates, cannot not obligate to always either do, or shun. 2) If there is any limitation and determination of an action, as to the mode of acting, if there is any exception of time, or place, or of a certain thing in which the action is concerned; that same determination and exception is in the law itself, and in its sentence and obligating force. E.g., In the fourth law, "honor your parents," first, there is no exception of time; for they are to be honored with perpetual remembrance of their benefits, and observance of their commands, even though they have long ceased to be among the living; then, this limitation and determination of the action, in a just cause, not contrary to divine commands, is contained in the very sentence of the law, and its obligation, since it does not extend more widely. 3) In every affirming law there is a negation of the opposite, and in the same way in every negating law there is a precept of the contrary. E.g., in this affirming law, "render due honor to your parents," is contained this interdict: "Do not deny your duty to your parents." Therefore, what determination and limitation of action is in the affirming law, the same must be in the contrary negating one. 4) There are certain affirming laws, without any exception, and without limitation and determination of action, and therefore obligating to always be doing, such as are these: "Strive for your own preservation, always using legitimate means"; "Give to each his own"; which affirming laws certainly extend as widely as the negating ones: "Do not harm yourself"; "Harm no one." Indeed, this affirming law, the first and chief of all,

Question XXIII. Does the moral law obligate us to punishment equally as to obedience?

The moral law obligates men primarily to obedience, secondarily and consequently to punishment.

Proof. God, by virtue of his supreme dominion over men, demands due obedience from them, by prescribing in the moral law what is suitable for rational creatures. But if they refuse the divine command and decline to live agreeably to their rational nature, God finally inflicts a most just punishment, by which they are not freed from the debt of obedience. Therefore, the debt of obedience remains essential and principal, which the law requires; but punishment is accidental to the established law.

Question XXIV. Does human law obligate the conscience in the same way as divine law?

Divine law obligates the conscience immediately and absolutely a); human law, enacted by a legitimate power, obligates mediately and hypothetically, that is, if it is just, derived from the divine moral law b).

Proof a. God is the Lord of consciences. Therefore, he obligates them immediately and absolutely by his most holy law, so that their transgressors the conscience accuses, Rom. 2:15.

Proof b. A law enacted for subjects by a magistrate obligates their consciences 1) mediately, through these principles: What the magistrate, who is God's ordinance, prescribes to those of whom he is the magistrate, those things must be done; and what the magistrate prohibits to them, those things must be shunned. Since these are eternal truths, and are implicitly contained in the decalogue, no one can act against a law enacted by a superior without also acting at the same time against the eternal law of God. 2) It obligates hypothetically, if it is just; for then it is a ray of divine justice, and he who violates it, violates the sun. If, on the contrary, it is clearly and simply unjust, it does not obligate. For that saying must be valid everywhere, Acts 5:19: "We ought to obey God rather than men."

Question XXV. What is the end of the moral law?

The end of the moral law is a) the glory of the legislator, b) eternal life, promised under the condition of perfect obedience. The accidental event is eternal death c).

Proof a. From the promulgation of the Sinaitic law shines forth the wisdom, justice, and power of the supreme Lord and legislator, to be celebrated eternally.

Proof b. From Lev. 18:5: "Keep my statutes and my judgments; which if a man do, he shall live in them." The law was given to lead all who perfectly keep it to eternal life; not indeed by the merit of right, because God owes nothing to anyone, but from the promise and ordinance of God.

Proof c. From Rom. 7:10: "The commandment, which was (given) to me for life, the same was (found to be) unto death." The law, beatific in itself, becomes death-dealing by accident, due to a defect in the receptive power; because it is weakened by the flesh, Rom. 8:3. Hence it works wrath, denounces a curse, and adjudges to eternal condemnation all who do not fulfill the law.

Question XXVI. Of how many precepts does the Sinaitic law consist?

Decalogue. The moral law promulgated on Mount Sinai consists of ten precepts, which were inscribed by God on two stone tablets a). Their sum is the love of God and of neighbor b), not excluding the love of ourselves c).

Proof a. From Exod. 34:28: "And he (Jehovah) wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten words (עשרת הדברִים)." The Greeks call it δεκάλογον and δεκαλόγιον. And by "words" are understood not bare words, but precepts. Conf. Deut. 4:13. A distinction must be made here between general and special divine commands. The special ones are far more than ten, which however are contained under the decade of precepts. For the decalogue is an epitome of all moral laws, to which, as to a source, all laws directing the morals of men are to be referred. From this, the Hebrews hear the ten as the mothers of the law and its roots.

Proof b. Christ testifies that on the two commandments of loving God and neighbor obligates always and to always be doing in the highest degree: "Worship God, and never cease to pursue him with the most perfect love."

hang the law and the prophets, i.e., are contained in summary, Matt. 22:38.

Proof c. In the commandment of loving the neighbor, the love of ourselves is also involved. For God commands: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," Lev. 19:18, so that the love of ourselves is the measure of the love of our neighbor.

Question XXVII. How are the precepts of the decalogue distinguished?

In two parts, on two tablets. The first deals immediately with the love of God, the second, with the love of neighbor. We refer the first three precepts to the first tablet, and the subsequent seven precepts to the second.

Proof. 1) They are called the two tablets of the testimony, tablets of stone, written with the finger of God, Exod. 31:18. Christ calls the first tablet the first and greatest commandment, concerning loving God, and the second tablet he calls the second commandment, like unto the first, concerning loving one's neighbor, Matt. 22:37. Paul calls the precept concerning honoring parents the first commandment with a promise, Eph. 6:2. Therefore, the second tablet of the law begins with the fourth precept. For the rest, that there are ten precepts of the moral law, Moses expressly writes, Exod. 34:28; Deut. 4:13; ch. 10:4. But he does not mention which is to be established as the second, which the third precept. It is customary in almost all the Churches that sincerely embrace the Augsburg Confession and LUTHER's catechism to count three precepts for the first table, and to refer the command concerning graven images to the first, about not having other gods, and to refer seven precepts to the second table, and to divide the command about not coveting into two precepts; which division we retain as adiaphorous.

2. Images and graven things, made for worship, are other gods. Therefore, they are prohibited by the first precept, and the command about graven things is not distinct from the first precept, but only an appendix and explanation of the first precept, containing a special example of it.

3. In the Hebrew codex, each precept is concluded with a distinctive sign, either a סתומה, which signifies closed, or a פתוחה, which signifies open; and neither in Exodus nor in Deuteronomy is such a distinctive sign found between v. 3 and 4. But in Deuteronomy, it is expressly placed between the ninth precept, as we make it, and the tenth.

4. That the command about graven things constitutes one precept with the command about other gods is taught by the decalogical accentuation, about which see D. PFEIFFER in dub. vex p. 268.

5. In the ninth precept, actual concupiscence is prohibited, in the tenth, original. This is evident a) from the twofold repetition of תחמד, Exod. 20:17, so that two acts are signified; b) from the subsequent interpretation לא תתאוה, Deut. 5:21, which word in Hithpael denotes, to make that you covet, because even the first motions are prohibited here; c) from the different declaration of the object, since in the ninth precept actual concupiscence is prohibited related to a vague particular concupiscible object, but in the tenth precept original concupiscence related to a universal concupiscible object.

The antithesis is that of Piscator, Keckermann, Socinus, and others, in whose opinion the command about other gods and the command about graven things are two precepts. Their arguments are:

I. The Spirit of God prohibits the worship of other gods and of images with distinct sentences: Therefore, they are two distinct things. Resp. The Spirit of God subjects the prohibition of graven things to the command of not having other gods, so that a general precept may be illustrated by a special example, and one that especially strikes the senses. If the diversity of periods were to introduce a diversity of precepts, from the one precept about sanctifying the sabbath, several precepts would arise.

II. Two precepts are proposed in two verses in the sacred codex; But the ninth and tenth precepts of the Lutherans are not, etc. Therefore. The minor is evident from Exod. 20:17, where the precept about concupiscence is comprehended in only one verse, and indeed with one root. Resp. The ninth and tenth precepts in Exod. 20 are expressed in one verse, but yet are discerned by a distinctive accent, the Atnach; in Deut. 5, by a פ as a distinctive mark. Besides, a double verb is used there.

III. Paul comprehends actual and original concupiscence in one precept, Rom. 13:19; Rom. 7:7. Resp. I distinguish between the implicit and explicit mode of proposing divine precepts. Paul had not undertaken the plan of explicitly rehearsing the individual precepts; but he makes mention of them summarily and generally. Meanwhile, he indicates the difference between actual and original concupiscence not obscurely, Rom. 7:7.

IV. If concupiscence made different precepts, there would be far more precepts than ten; But there are not more; Therefore. The consequence of the major is proven; because there would be one precept about not coveting a house, another about not coveting a servant, another about not coveting a beast. Resp. The precepts are distinguished not according to the objects, but according to the different modes of tending toward the objects. Although the objects of concupiscence are different, the mode of tending toward those objects is twofold, actual and habitual, or original. (*)<sup>263</sup>

Question XXVIII. How is the decalogue to be explained?

The decalogue is to be explained in such a way that to it may be reduced both all virtues and works worthy of a Christian, and all vices and illicit works.

Proof. The decalogue is an epitome of all moral laws, succinctly comprehending all things to be done and to be shunned; and therefore the precepts of the decalogue are synecdochical, that is, more things are commanded and prohibited than are expressly named in the decalogue. Wherefore, in the explanation of the Sinaitic law, certain general rules are to be observed.

I. Negative precepts include contrary affirmative ones, and affirmative precepts contrary negative ones.

II. In the decalogue, both external and internal obedience is commanded; conversely, not only exterior, but also interior sins, with original sin itself, the root of all evils, are prohibited.

III. In the explanation of the law, the distinction between mortal sins, or those of choice, which drive out the grace of the Holy Spirit, extinguish faith, and lay waste the conscience, and venial sins, or involuntary ones, which although they consist with faith in the regenerate, are yet to be more and more diminished and abolished, is to be accurately held and inculcated.

IV. That the law may be fully explained, punishments and rewards, promises and threats are to be added. But the promises are to be understood with the exception of the cross, and the threats with the exception of penitence. (*)

(*) The arguments with which we contend for our division of the Decalogue, which has from AUGUSTINE the name Augustinian, are conveniently distributed into three classes, one of which is logical, another philological, and the third and principal theological. And indeed that argument which logical doctrine provides us will be of much value in the dispute against the Reformed, when it is asked of the two divisions, which of them is more accurate. For the faculty of thinking well also teaches us the correct laws of division, among which this is to be held not in the lowest place; Not a genus and one species, but different genera and different species constitute the distinct parts of a division. But that interdict, about many gods, and, besides the true one, who is one, fictitious and imaginary ones, differs from this prohibition, about the worship of images, in no other way than as a genus from a species, and indeed a certain one. Therefore, this, as some species, ought to be referred to that, as its genus. But these two, the IXth and Xth, as different genera, although closely joined, so differ from each other that the nature and definition of the things are different. Namely, hereditary cupidity is a most powerful propensity of the soul to think, desire, and do all that which is not suitable to the divine laws. Actual cupidity, as it is called, is a motion of the soul not consonant with the law, and the very thought and appetite, and its determination now to this, now to that forbidden thing, born from that innate and perverse inclination and alacrity of the soul, prone to any forbidden thing. Therefore, hereditary cupidity is the first principle of all actions not suitable to the law; then actual cupidity is the second principle of the same, arisen from the first. But when the case is argued against the Socinians, they should be met chiefly with this theological argument. For they are unwilling to bear the division of the IXth and Xth precepts, because they are ignorant of the force and true reason of innate cupidity, and in this place, on hereditary sin, they are in most grave error.

(*) But it is true, however, that both these exceptions properly pertain not to the sentence of the law itself, but to its conjunction with the Gospel. For the law, considered in itself, denounces nothing to the delinquent man, who deviates from it even by a hair's breadth,

V. In the decalogue, that which is moral, which obligates all men, is to be diligently distinguished from that which is ceremonial, which bound only the Jews, while the Mosaic polity stood. Whatever, therefore, agrees with the law of nature, is shown by Moses and the Prophets to pertain to all nations, (**) is repeated and commanded in the N.T. by Christ and the Apostles, that is moral, obliging all men; the rest are ceremonial, or special appendices pertaining only to the Israelites.

VI. When the effect is prohibited, the cause is prohibited; In a relative, the correlative is understood; Precepts or prohibitions concerning some principal species, also command or prohibit related species, or the whole genus.

VII. The precepts of the second table yield to the precepts of the first table. The neighbor is to be loved; but God is to be loved more.

VIII. For different ends and respects, the same virtue can be referred to different precepts of the decalogue.

IX. For explaining the precepts of the decalogue, all those moral things which are contained in Moses, the Prophets, and the writings of the N.T. are useful.

FIRST PRECEPT OF THE DECALOGUE

"I am Jehovah your God; You shall have no other gods before me."

Obs. Those words: "I am... your God," some, with LUCAS BRUGENSIS, make a general proem of the decalogue; others sell them as the first precept, with the Targum of JONATHAN, the Hebrews, JOSEPHUS, and PHILO; but they are more rightly held to be the affirmative part of the first precept, stating who is to be worshipped as the true God, to which the negative part is subjoined, about not having other gods. For a) the decalogical accentuation (which is twofold, but damnation, nor does it give him any hope of return and of coming back into grace, which indeed the voice of the Gospel alone offers and promises to man, (μετάνοιαν, repentance, pleasing and acceptable to the reconciled God, just as ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, the remission of sins, Christ commanded to be proclaimed in his name, Luke 24:27); to which promise the Gospel adds an incitement of the soul to bear the cross, not as a punishment, but as a benefit, in which indeed is seen the other part of the communion of the sufferings (τῶν παθημάτων) of Christ, by imitation and likeness, since the prior part of this communion (κοινωνίας) is placed in the application and salutary fruit of these most precious sufferings, in faith and justification.

(**) That this is to be understood not without some explanation and limitation will be apparent from what is said below, on Question XLVI. But especially to be considered are 1) the general declaration, without any exception, of which kind is that in Levit. 18:4, 29: 2) the reason of each law, which God himself has signified to us, either in nature or in scripture. These two principles are most certain; I. Since nothing is without a reason, nor is it otherwise than is suitable to this very reason; it follows that as widely as the reason of the law extends, so widely also extends its sentence and obligation. Therefore, if the reason of the law is so general and perpetual that that reason pertains to all men and all ages of the world; the law, and its binding force, must be no less general and perpetual. So also the argumentation is valid in the contrary direction. II. Since there can be several and various reasons for one thing; therefore, if the reasons of a certain law are several, and so indeed diverse, that some of them are general and perpetual, since they are to be referred to the entire human race and all times; while others are special and temporary, suitable only to the Jews and the age of the O.T.; it follows that that law is mixed, partly common to all men and times, partly special to the Jews and times, according to the condition they were in before Christ was born and had completed his work. E.g., The reason for the law of the Sabbath, to be kept holy, the first and principal reason is of such a kind that religion demands its remembrance from all nations and men, to the very end of the ages, Gen. 2:2; Ex. 20:11. Therefore, for this reason this law is common and perpetual. Then there was added one and another special reason, proper both to the Jews and to the times of the O.T.; one indeed sacred and typical, Heb. 4:9; but the other forensic, which pertained to the Judaic nation and republic, Deut. 5:15. Therefore, for this twofold reason this law is special and proper to the Jews. Therefore, in the Christian state of the N.T. this whole law is not abrogated, but only that which pertains to the Jews and the age of the O.T. has been set aside; for one reason, and indeed the first and principal one, always remains.

namely the accentuation of the verse and of the precept) begins with these same words; b) Christ, when asked which was the first precept, answered: "The first precept is: Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," Mark 12:29.

You say: I. Those words: "I am your God," are indicative, not preceptive; Therefore they do not make the first precept. Resp. That those words have the force of commanding is taught by the subjoined words: "You shall have no other gods before me." For the full sense of the precept is rendered not only by the affirmative part, but by the negative which is joined to it.

You say: II. Those words contain a general reason, impelling to the observation of all the precepts: Therefore they do not make a special precept. Resp. The first precept concerning fearing and loving God directs all the remaining precepts. Whence Blessed LUTHER, in his exposition of the same, deliberately prefixed these words: "We should fear and love God."

You say: III. Those words refer to the Israelites, for God adds: "who brought you out of the land of Egypt." Resp. The constitutive elements (τὰ συστατικά), the substantial dogmas, are to be distinguished from the circumstances and appendices which concern the Israelites alone.

Question XXIX. What does the first precept comprise?

The first precept comprises a divine edict, or command a), and a divine interdict, or prohibition b).

Proof a. When God says: "I am Jehovah, your God," he commands us the true worship of God, consisting in fear, love, and sincere trust. This precept demands from us a) a reverential and filial fear, aroused by his supreme majesty, justice, and power. From the fear of God flows a sincere, prompt, and constant obedience to be rendered to God: a submission of the soul, born from the consideration of the divine majesty and our infirmity; and also patience, when we are chastised by God. b) The love of God, not only on account of divine benefits, but for his own sake, because he himself is the highest good, and therefore worthy of love in himself. From the love of God follows the denial of ourselves and the world. c) Trust, to be placed in God, on account of the divine goodness, power, wisdom, and truth, by which he fulfills his promises. From trust are born hope and joy in God. The foundation of these virtues is θεογνωσία, or the knowledge of God.

Proof b. When God says: "You shall have no other gods before me," he prohibits all idolatry, which 1) is either crasser or more subtle. The former is when a man regards and worships as the true God that which is not God, or if he otherwise exhibits religious worship to those who are not gods. To this pertains the religious worship of images (the use of images can sometimes be licit and useful for the sake of memory). The latter is when we worship something which we know is not God, and yet we exhibit to it some worship which is due to God alone. Thus avarice is called idolatry, Col. 3:5. 2) Idolatry is divided into that by which what is not the true God is divinely worshipped, and that by which the true God is not worshipped divinely, i.e., when the true God is worshipped otherwise than he has commanded himself to be worshipped in his word.

SECOND PRECEPT

"You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain. For the Lord will not hold him guiltless who takes his name in vain."

Question XXX. What is commanded and prohibited by this precept?

The abuse of the divine name is prohibited a), and its genuine use is commanded b).

Obs. I. The first precept directs the heart of man to the fear of God; the second forms the tongue to the celebration of the divine name (*); the third moderates the public worship of God.

Obs. II. The name of God is God himself, insofar as he is revealed in the divine word, and known from the same. It denotes the essence of God, his majesty, all his attributes and works, and whatever of praise can be said of the triune God.

(*) And not only the tongue, but also other members. For wicked men abuse the most holy name not only with their mouth, but also in their work, and blasphemy (βλασφημία) is accustomed to be not only in words, but also in various actions, by which the highest perfections and properties of God are injured and contemned, Rom. 2:23, 24. The difference of the three precepts contained in the first table is placed in this, that in the first precept internal worship of God, in the second external and private worship, in the third public worship, not excluding private, is commanded to us.

Proof a. When God says: "You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain," a light and profane taking of the most glorious name of God into the mouth of man is understood. Thus, Elohim says to the wicked: "What have you to do to declare my statutes, or that you should take my covenant in your mouth?" Ps. 50:16. Therefore, a) in general, the abuse of the divine name is forbidden, i.e., profane use without due devotion, light, unworthy, prayers babbled without attention, reading of scripture, or hearing of the word, without devotion and reverence. b) Specifically: 1) Curses, to which blasphemies also pertain. 2) Light, or futile, and false oaths. A distinction must be made here between an illicit and a licit oath. The former conflicts with the word of God and is undertaken concerning things false, uncertain, impossible, futile. The latter does not conflict with the word of God, and is undertaken concerning things true, certainly known, licit, possible, and grave. This, if the glory of God requires it, our own and our neighbor's salvation demands it, the magistrate commands it, and the necessity of office requires it, can be performed with a safe conscience for the confirmation of the truth, Heb. 6:16. 3) Incantations, not only an express pact with the devil, but also any superstitious means whatsoever. 4) Lies and fallacies in sacred things, twisting the sayings of scripture, false worship of God, heresy, hypocrisy in prayers and external worship of God.

Proof b. On the contrary, what is commanded is a) in general the genuine and holy use of the divine name, in the devout preaching, hearing, reading, meditation, and confession of the divine word, in prayers and vows. b) In particular: 1) Invocation, by which we ask for benefits from the divine power and goodness, in our infirmity, need, and necessity, from God. 2) Adoration, by which we humble ourselves before God, and venerate his power over us and his eternal majesty with internal reverence of the heart and external gesture, Ps. 115:6. 3) Praise, or glorification, by which we not only think magnificently of God in our heart, but also celebrate his goodness, power, wisdom, justice, and general and special providence with our tongue and words. To this belong all the Psalms, all sacred music. 4) Thanksgiving for all spiritual and corporal benefits, which God has shown to us and to others whoever they may be, not only to those of our household, but also to strangers, whether friends or enemies.

THIRD PRECEPT

"Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy."

Question XXXI. What is commanded and interdicted by this precept?

By this third precept, the sanctification of the sabbath is commanded a); The profanation of the seventh day is interdicted b).

Proof a. When God commands: "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy," the object to be sanctified is the sabbath day. It should be carefully observed here that the third precept contains something moral, to the obligation of which all men are bound; and something ceremonial, which is proper to the people of Israel. The former is perpetual, the latter is temporary. The moral part is that some day of the week should be destined for sacred worship; the ceremonial part is that precisely the seventh day of the week should be dedicated to the exercise of divine worship, or, as others are fond of saying, the moral part in the Sabbath is the indefinite septenary and a cardinal number, or that some seventh day should be destined for divine worship; but the ceremonial part is the definite septenary and an ordinal number, or that precisely this seventh day in order should be sanctified. There was in this precept something ceremonial, the rigor of rest, or the quiet prescribed to the Jews; namely, the divine interdict, by which was forbidden a journey for the sake of carrying out private business, Exod. 16:29; the lighting of a fire, Exod. 35:3; the carrying of a burden, Jer. 17:21. The moral part still endures, the ceremonial is abrogated! For it is established by nature that some time should be given to divine worship; the divine constitution in paradise designated the seventh day, Gen. 2:2, 3, which sanction was observed before the promulgation of the Sinaitic law, Exod. 16:5, was repeated in the decalogue, Exod. 20, with certain circumstances added, Exod. 35:3. In the N.T. those circumstances, together with the circumstance of the definite seventh day, were abrogated by Christ through the Apostles, and in the place of the seventh day was substituted the first day of the week, called κυριακή ἡμέρα, the Lord's day, Rev. 1:10, which Christ consecrated by his authority and example; for on that day he rose again, appeared to the disciples gathered together, with the exception of Thomas, and afterwards on another day a week later, with Thomas present, he showed himself, John 20:19, 26. On that same day also he poured out the Holy Spirit upon the Apostles, Acts 2. The Apostles thereafter sanctioned this first day of the week, and instituted it as the ordinary sabbath of Christians. For the Apostles used that same day for the public assembly, Acts 20:7, and ordained that it should be so, 1 Cor. 16:2.

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists and Socinians, who state that Christ completely abolished the third precept concerning the sanctification of the sabbath day. They object: I. The distinctions of days are forbidden to Christians in the N.T., Gal. 4:10. Resp. The Levitical distinctions of days are forbidden to Christians, especially insofar as the observance of those days is believed in the N.T. to be necessary for salvation. II. The sabbath is counted among the shadows of things to come. Col. 2:16. Resp. Paul is speaking of the Judaic observance of feasts and sabbaths, which were shadows of things to come. But the Lord's day is not a shadow of things to come, but is held holy on account of the grateful remembrance of the glorious resurrection of Christ from the dead. For the Jews, the observance of sabbaths was a part of sacred worship; for Christians, it is a part of order and a circumstance of worship.

The sanctification of the sabbath a) in general is a separation from profane use and a consecration to sacred uses. Therefore, the sabbath is sanctified when it is separated from common works and dedicated to divine worship and holy operations, for which our rest is needed, so that the soul, wearied by cares and labors on other days, may rest in God. Furthermore, because the divine word is the medium of sanctification, it is commanded b) specifically: 1) the public preaching of the divine word and dispensation of the sacraments, Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 11:20; 2) the devout listening to the preached word, its meek reception, and pious meditation, Luke 10:16; 1 Thess. 2:13; James 1:21; 3) public prayer and thanksgiving, 1 Tim. 2:1; Acts 2:42; 4) private worship of God consisting in the repetition of the heard word, its consideration, rumination on divine benefits, catechetical instruction, scrutiny of conscience, confirmation of a good purpose; 5) the exhibition of works of charity towards one's neighbor, and the giving of alms, 1 Cor. 16:1.

Proof b. In general, the profanation of the sabbath is prohibited, when public and private divine worship is interrupted, and works that impede sacred worship are performed. Specifically, the following are prohibited: 1) Sinful works, by which one sins on other days, but especially on the sabbath day, such as drinking parties, revelries, luxury in dress, obscene conversations, etc. 2) Civil, servile, profitable works, such as commerce, agriculture, manual crafts, by which both the body is wearied and the soul is disquieted. 3) Works of recreation done unseasonably or inordinately, by which the devotion of public or private worship is impeded. However, not only works which are formally of divine worship are licit, but also works of charity, of necessity, and those which pertain to the sustenance of life.

FOURTH PRECEPT

"Honor your father and your mother, that your days may be long upon the land, and that it may be well with you."

Question XXXII. What is commanded and interdicted by this precept?

By this precept, honor and obedience to be rendered to parents, and those who are in their place, is commanded a). Their contempt and offense is interdicted b). Parents, and those like them, are at the same time obligated to procure the advantages of their children, and those who are in their place c).

Obs. By "parents" here are understood all superiors, whom God has placed over others to rule and defend them, such as are natural parents, guardians and curators, magistrates, ministers of the churches, teachers, elders in age. For when one principal species is commanded or prohibited, related species, or the whole genus, is also commanded or prohibited. Conversely, by "children" are understood inferiors, whom God has subjected to others to be ruled and defended, such as are natural children, pupils, hearers of the divine word, disciples, servants, juniors.

Proof a. When God commands: "Honor your father," a) in general, under the name of honor are comprehended all the duties which children owe to parents; b) in particular, it is required of children that they 1) honor their parents, on account of the divine character impressed on them, because in them God himself is honored. That honor consists in esteem of the heart, reverence of gesture and words, defense of their reputation. 2) That they serve them, by promoting their advantages, and alleviating the need of their old age; which the Greeks call ἀντιπαραργεῖν. 3) That they obey them, by promptly doing what they command, unless they command things adverse to God, the supreme Father. 4) That they love them; because from them they both derive their blood and receive very many benefits. This love is the foundation of honor and obedience, and at the same time the root of patience, by which the defects of parents are to be borne. Sir. 3:11.

Proof b. Contrary to the honor which children owe to parents are 1) contempt of parents, when they are scorned in heart, mouth, and gestures; 2) offense, by which sons, refusing the just commands of their parents, provoke their anger.

Proof c. By the fourth precept, not only is it prescribed to children what they should do towards their parents, but also to parents in turn their own duties are commanded. Whence the Apostle joins both, Eph. 6:3-4. Namely, parents are bound to provide for their sons all things that pertain to their advantages, 1) sustenance, 1 Tim. 5:8; 2) education in piety and morals, Eph. 6:4, joined with even stricter discipline, where necessity has required it, Prov. 13:24.

FIFTH PRECEPT

"You shall not kill."

Question XXXIII. What is prohibited and commanded by this precept?

By the fifth precept, homicide is prohibited a), and the preservation of our own and our neighbor's life is commanded b).

Proof a. God, the lord of life and death, expressly forbids the killing not of beasts (which from the foundation of the world were granted to man not only for service, but also for food, Gen. 1:28), but of men. Homicide is committed 1) by deed, namely, by hand, instrument, poison; 2) by mouth, by betrayal, by insults, by imprecations; 3) by an angry and cruel gesture, Gen. 4:5; 4) by heart, by anger, hatred, private vengeance, Matt. 5:22; 1 John 3:15. The object of the prohibition of homicide is both our neighbor, whether he be friend or enemy, whose neither body nor soul (by giving scandal) is it lawful to kill; and ourselves, lest we become self-murderers (αὐτοχτενέες), by laying violent hands on ourselves, by indulging in gluttony, anger, sadness, or by exhausting ourselves with improper labors. However, capital punishments, which the magistrate inflicts on malefactors, are not prohibited here, nor are just and necessary wars, which are waged by public authority. God has prohibited that we should kill, but he has not tied his own hands, who is the lord of life and death; and he uses the ministry of the magistrate, Rom. 13:4.

Proof b. Opposed to homicide is the preservation of our own and our neighbor's life. We preserve our own and our neighbor's life 1) by meekness, by restraining our anger; 2) by mercy, by succoring our neighbor in necessity; 3) by humanity, by speaking kindly, by consoling, by informing.

SIXTH PRECEPT

"You shall not commit adultery."

Question XXXIV. What is commanded and forbidden by the sixth precept?

By the sixth precept, chastity is commanded a), and unchastity is forbidden b).

Proof a. When God prohibits adultery, he commands us chastity, which preserves both the body undefiled and the soul pure. Chastity is either virginal, by which the unmarried preserve true purity of body and heart unsullied, without the impurity of the flesh, 1 Cor. 7:34, to which also widowed chastity is to be referred; or conjugal, by which married cohabitants, according to the dictate of the Holy Spirit and conscience, not only abstain from all alien and adulterous intercourse, but also observe moderation in the use of their own marriage, having regard for the principal aims of matrimony, and for health and time, and coerce their own concupiscence. Aids to acquiring and preserving chastity are frequent reading and meditation of the divine word, devout prayers, temperance, and sometimes fasting, assiduity in labor, and abstinence from all things that provoke lust.

Pray, read chaste things, fast, avoid idleness:

If you wish to keep your bodies chaste for God.

Proof b. By the sixth precept, adultery is prohibited, and all related unchastity or impurity 1) of deed, fornication, concubinage, incest, Sodomy; 2) of mouth, obscene jokes, filthy language, immodest poems, amorous songs; 3) of gestures, wantonness of the eyes, meretricious adornment, nudity, embraces, kissing; 4) of the heart, impure thoughts, and delight in them. The enticements and occasions of unchastity, which are also forbidden by this sixth precept, are drunkenness and reveling, Rom. 13:14; Eph. 5:18; idleness, the pillow of Satan; bad company, and lascivious dances; light clothing, and especially that which reveals too much of the body's parts; obscene pictures and images.

SEVENTH PRECEPT

"You shall not steal."

Question XXXV. What is interdicted and commanded by the seventh precept?

By the seventh precept, theft is interdicted a), and justice is commanded b).

Proof a. Theft is expressly forbidden, by which here a) in general is designated every unjust acquisition, possession, and usurpation of temporal goods, and the taking away of others' wealth. b) Specifically, all theft is prohibited which is committed 1) by deed, whether it be more manifest or more hidden. More manifest is that which is commonly held so, and is punished by the political magistrate, such as theft strictly so called, which is the handling of another's property, without the owner's consent, with the intention of depriving him; robbery, which is the violent and manifest taking of another's goods; sacrilege, the unjust taking of ecclesiastical goods; peculation, theft in a matter pertaining to the republic; plagiarism, the theft of a person. More hidden or subtle is all injustice by which we attribute to ourselves more, and to our neighbor less, than is fitting; to which pertains injustice in contracts, a double measure, an immoderate price, biting usury, detention of that which we owe, dishonest arts, prodigality. 2) It is committed by the tongue, or by fraudulent words, by which a neighbor is defrauded, Jer. 9:4. It is committed 3) by the heart and by an improper appetite for others' goods, by avarice and trust in temporal goods.

Proof b. Justice is commanded by the seventh precept, which is diligent in seeking temporal goods, upright in exchanging them, thrifty in protecting them, liberal in bestowing them, giving to each his own. Therefore, specifically, there is commanded 1) diligence in the works of one's office, that we may acquire temporal goods decently; 2) sincere justice in contracts, observing proportion and equality; 3) parsimony, that we may prudently protect the goods acquired; 4) liberality, that we may give what and to whom we ought.

EIGHTH PRECEPT

"You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor."

Question XXXVI. What is prohibited and commanded by this eighth precept?

By the eighth precept, all lying is prohibited, and all unbecoming use of the tongue, contrary to truth and charity a). But γλωσσαρχία, or the legitimate use of the tongue in speaking true things, and those which are useful to one's neighbor, is commanded b).

Proof a. When God, the supreme lord and legislator, forbids false witness against a neighbor, the order of judgments is indeed regarded, but under the one species of forensic lying (which is more pestilent than the rest) is contained in general a detestation of all lying. Whence Paul explains the eighth precept thus: "Putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour," Eph. 4:25. Now, a lie, strictly speaking, is an external speech contradictorily opposed to an internal speech, directed at deceiving someone; but if it is taken more broadly, it is described as a malicious contradiction of an external sign and an internal concept. Therefore, all lying is prohibited 1) in judgment, in which a witness commits a lie, who either conceals the truth, or by speaking harms the truth, Exod. 23:1; a plaintiff, by unjustly accusing, Mic. 7:3; a defendant, by denying against his conscience, or by creating delays; an advocate, by attacking a good cause with evil arts, and by defending a bad cause; a judge, by pronouncing an unjust sentence without sufficient knowledge of the case, or according to inordinate affections. 2) Outside of judgment, when false or uncertain things are said about a neighbor, and these are eagerly heard and more widely spread, which bring detriment to another's reputation; or when, conversely, the unworthy are praised or commended. Therefore, all defamation of a neighbor is prohibited, when those things are said about a neighbor which harm his reputation. Nor does the fact that what was said was true excuse from this sin. To this also pertain insults, sharp jests, defamatory pamphlets, all betrayal of a secret, or of a thing which ought to have been kept silent, all empty garrulosity. Even sinister judgments about another, against the laws of charity. However, the concealment of a truth, which I am not bound to reveal to my neighbor, nor which would be useful to him, is not prohibited. Nor is the correction of a sinning neighbor forbidden, if it is done modestly and out of charity.

Proof b. There is commanded 1) truth, or veracity, which is the concord of mouth and heart; for it is diametrically opposed to lying, Eph. 4:25. But the truth must be spoken in judgments, in counsels, in doctrines and arts, in all civil society. 2) Γλωσσαρχία, or a moderate use of the tongue, consisting in prudent taciturnity, a just measure of speech, utility of words, and pleasantness. Wherefore, he uses his tongue moderately, who interprets in a more favorable light things that are doubtful, covers or excuses the errors and infirmities of his neighbor as far as is permissible, and hopes for his emendation, and procures it, by fraternally correcting him, or by causing him to be corrected by others.

NINTH PRECEPT

"You shall not covet your neighbor's house."

TENTH PRECEPT

"You shall not desire your neighbor's wife, nor his male servant, nor his female servant, nor his donkey, nor anything that is his."

Question XXXVII. What is prohibited and commanded by the ninth and tenth precepts?

By the ninth precept, actual evil concupiscence, joined with delectation and deliberate consent, is prohibited a); but spiritual fortitude, by which the old Adam is conquered and natural cupidities are tempered, is commanded b). By the tenth precept, original concupiscence is interdicted c), and original justice is commanded d).

Obs. I. The discussion here is not of natural concupiscence, e.g., for food, drink, sleep, etc., which, if disorder (ἀταξία) is absent, is not condemned; nor of holy concupiscence for eternal things; but of evil concupiscence, which is an inclination and motion of the soul, deformed from the divine law.

Obs. II. In Deut. 5:21, there is a transposition of the objects of evil concupiscence; for the wife is listed in the first place, the house in the second. From this it is apparent that the distinction of these precepts cannot be sought primarily and properly from the objects.

Obs. III. Concupiscence does not contain itself in those objects which are enumerated in these precepts, but wanders more widely; therefore the general clause is added: "You shall not covet anything that is your neighbor's."

Proof a. That the ninth precept prohibits actual concupiscence, and the tenth original concupiscence, Moses indicates, when in Deut. 5:18 (sic), not without emphasis, he expresses the divine interdict concerning concupiscence with a double Hebrew verb. First he says: לֹא תַחְמוֹד, which denotes a second act, or actual concupiscence. Then he says: לֹא תַתְאוּר, which denotes a first act, by which one makes himself to covet. Therefore, by the ninth precept, actual concupiscence is forbidden, which as being more known is placed first; By the tenth precept, original concupiscence is prohibited, the knowledge of which philosophers did not attain from the light of nature. Paul speaks of this in Rom. 7:7: "I had not known concupiscence (to be sin), unless the law had said: You shall not covet." The apostle James, ch. 1:15, calls actual concupiscence συλλαβοῦσαν καὶ τίκτουσαν, concupiscence conceiving and bringing forth, which conceives delectation and the consent of the will, and breaks forth into an external act; but original concupiscence he calls in v. 14 ἐξέλκουσαν καὶ δαλεάζουσαν, drawing away and enticing, which turns the heart of man away from God and the rule of rectitude, and invites to evil with any allurements whatsoever. Therefore, by the ninth precept are prohibited all evil affections and bad thoughts, in which a man indulges, and in which he takes delight, especially against his neighbor, an example of which matter is adduced. Specifically, there is prohibited 1) envy, Prov. 21:10; 2) the desire to harm, Mic. 2:1-2; 3) avarice, Eccl. 5:9; 4) ambition, or the inordinate desire for honor, Gal. 5:26; 5) the concupiscence of pleasures, and the love of the world, 1 John 2:16.

Proof b. Evil concupiscence is resisted by spiritual fortitude, which both conquers, overcomes, and mortifies carnal or evil cupidities, and moderates natural cupidities, lest they should exceed, and finally adds a spur to the cupidity for eternal things. Therefore, specifically, there are commanded: 1) a daily struggle against the flesh, Gal. 5:24; 2) temperance in food, drink, and recreations; 3) modesty, in seeking honors; 4) αὐτάρκεια, or equity of mind; 5) desire for spiritual and celestial goods.

Proof c. By the tenth precept, original concupiscence is prohibited, which is the congenital inclination to evil, and the root of all other cupidities and sins. To this pertain the first evil motions, or the indeliberate acts of the evil will, to which neither delectation nor consent is added.

Proof d. In the tenth precept, God demands from us original justice, which he rightly demands from us, because he created it with us, and the putting on of the new man, by which it is gradually repaired, Eph. 4:24.

Question XXXVIII. Is the Sinaitic moral law a perfect norm of things to be done and shunned; or was it augmented by Christ, as a new legislator, and completed with new precepts?

The Sinaitic moral law is a perfect norm of things to be done and shunned, nor was it augmented by Christ with new precepts or additions, but only more amply declared, and purged from pharisaical corruptions.

Proof. 1) The divine law is perfect, Ps. 19:8, and therefore suffers neither addition nor diminution, Deut. 13:1.

2) The moral law is repeated in the new testament in no other way than it was handed down in the O.T. The compendium of both is the doctrine of loving God and neighbor, which exists in Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18. Which compendium of the law is repeated in the same way in Matt. 22:27 and Luke 10:27.

3) All virtues worthy of a Christian are commanded in the Mosaic law, and all vices are prohibited in the same. Therefore, it is perfect.

4) Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) is not a new legislator, but an interpreter, teacher, and vindicator of the law. For "the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Christ," John 1:17.

5) Although Christ in his prophetic office inculcated and expounded the divine law, and purged it from the corruptions of the Pharisees; yet the principal part and end of Christ's prophetic office was that he might raise up the poor in spirit and the contrite and broken-hearted with the sweetest doctrine of the gospel, Isa. 61:1; Luke 4:18.

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, Socinians, and Arminians, asserting that Christ is a new legislator, who rendered the moral law more perfect, and completed it with new precepts. Their more important arguments are:

I. Christ and Moses, as two legislators, are opposed to each other, Heb. 3:5-6. Resp. They are opposed to each other as master and servant, as a son in the house of God and a servant.

II. Christ is expressly called a legislator, Isa. 33:22. Resp. The words of the text are: "Jehovah is our judge; Jehovah is our legislator; Jehovah is our king; He will save us." Resp. The meaning is: the Holy Trinity preserves us, God the Father is our judge and avenger, the Holy Spirit is our lawgiver and teacher, and the Son of God is our king. Confer CALOVIUS's Biblia Illustrata on this passage, fol. 151.

III. Christ gave a new law, John XIII, 34. Therefore, he was a new legislator. Resp. Distinguish between a law that is simply new, and one that is new in a certain respect, or comparatively. Christ's law is called new not absolutely and simply, because it is the same law as the Sinaitic law, but it is called new in a certain respect and comparatively, because it was renewed by Christ, vindicated from the false interpretations of the Pharisees, and confirmed by the new example of Christ.

IV. Whoever opposes his own precepts to the Mosaic precepts is a new legislator; But Christ did so, etc., Matthew V, 21-22. Resp. Christ opposed his precepts not to the Mosaic laws, but to the corruptions of the Pharisees, who thought that homicide was only committed by an external act, not in the heart, not by gesture, not by mouth. (*).

(*) This is clearer than light, 1) from the general proposition, v. 20; 2) From this manner of speaking, ἡκούσατε, ὅτι ἐρρέθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, which is never used of the divine law, which was not handed down by mouth but consigned to letters. Of it, expressions of this kind are always used: "God commanded"; "he, the interpreter and minister of the divine will, said"; "as it is written in the law"; 3) From the sense of the words, vv. 21 & 22; for neither were those different judgments in the Jewish forum already established in the time of Moses, nor had God commanded the guilty of homicide to be afflicted with any other than capital

V. Whoever fulfilled the law, added to it: But Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because something is fulfilled when something is added to its complement, just as a vessel is filled with oil when more oil is poured in. The minor is clear from Matthew V, 17. Resp. Christ speaks of the fulfillment of the law by a most complete obedience rendered in our place, not of the fulfillment of the law by addition. For πληροῦν τὸν νόμον nowhere signifies an addition to the law. (**). Confer Romans XIII, 8, 10; Galatians V, 14; Galatians VI, 2.

VI. Christ gave three moral precepts which do not exist in the Mosaic law: 1) To deny oneself, 2) to take up, or tolerate, one's cross, and 3) to imitate Christ, Matthew XVI, 24. Resp. Self-denial pertains to the first precept, which deals with loving God with all one's heart and with all one's soul. For he denies himself who postpones the love of self to the love of God. The tolerance of the cross is patience, commended to us in the first precept; because it flows from filial fear of God. The imitation of Christ (as the Racovian Catechism explains, ch. II, on the precepts of Christ, Question 8) consists in trust towards God, perfect charity, humility, and perseverance in prayers, and thus pertains both to the first and to the second precept of the decalogue. Moreover, that the imitation of God and Christ was not unknown to the fathers and prophets, we learn from Leviticus XI, 44: "I am the Lord, your God; Be holy, for I am holy." Which is repeated in Matthew V, 48; 1 Peter I, 15. And lest anyone should think that the imitation of God prescribed to the fathers is one thing, and the imitation of Christ prescribed to us is another, let him hear Paul, Ephesians V, 1-2: "Be imitators of God, as beloved children; and walk in love, as Christ also has loved us."

Question XXXIX. How many uses are there of the moral law?

The use of the moral law is fourfold: a) political, b) elenctic, c) pedagogical d), and didactic. (*).

Proof a. The political use of the law consists in the preservation of external discipline, so that fierce and untamed men may be turned away from more serious crimes by the proposing of punishments and rewards. According to this use, the law is a bridle or a barrier by which sinners are coerced.

Proof b. The elenctic use consists in the manifestation and refutation of sins, along with the demonstration of the most severe divine judgment, Romans III, 20. According to this use, the law is a mirror of sin.

Proof c. The pedagogical use consists in an indirect compulsion to Christ. For although the law formally and directly neither knows nor teaches Christ; yet by accusing, convicting, and terrifying, it obliquely compels the sinner to seek solace and help in Christ the redeemer. Therefore, punishment by the most ancient law, Genesis IX, 6, and frequently repeated; 4) From the feigned opinion, v. 43, plainly contrary to the divine and moral law promulgated by the minister Moses, Leviticus XIX, 18; Exodus XXIII, 4; Proverbs XXV, 21; 5) From the conclusion of the entire oration, Matthew VII, 12.

(**) Christ fulfilled the law in a completely twofold manner: first, as our high Priest, by perfectly rendering vicarious obedience; second, as our supreme Leader, by explaining the perfect meaning of the law, and vindicating it against the corruptions of the Pharisees. In this place, Matthew V, 17, Christ performed the duties not of a Priest, but of a Doctor. Therefore, this verb, πληρῶσαι, must be understood of the perfect interpretation of the divine law, to be restored to its pristine integrity. This is confirmed 1) by the scope of the whole oration; 2) by the opposition, both of the verb, καταλῦσαι, and of the perverse and corrupt doctrine, v. 19; 3) by other places of scripture, in which it denotes the perfection of a doctrine, if someone brings it forth so whole that nothing is taken away, and nothing is added, e.g., Romans XV, 19; Colossians I, 25. For the rest, the greatest care must be taken lest these two be confounded with each other: to fulfill (implere), and to supplement (supplere). To fulfill is perfectly both to do and to say that which has been entirely commanded. To supplement is to perfect a thing not yet complete, in which there are certain defects, by adding to it. This latter is what the Socinians want for themselves, which is by no means to be granted to them.

(*) Most theologians are accustomed to refer the pedagogical use of the law to the elenctic. Therefore, they number a threefold use of the law, the third being the didactic. This opinion is in chapter VI of the Formula of Concord and its declaration, which is so inscribed: "On the third use of the law."

the law is a pedagogue to Christ, Galatians III, 24. (**).

Proof d. The didactic use consists in the information and direction of all moral acts, internal and external. Thus the law is a perpetual rule of living, Matthew V, 17.

Question XL. Are the reborn freed and exempted from this fourfold use of the law, so that the doctrine of the law should not be preached to them?

The moral law, on account of the fourfold use which it provides, must be preached and inculcated even on the reborn.

Proof 1) By the political use of the law, Christians are contained in discipline, so that they may avoid vices and grow in virtues; because in this life they are not fully renewed, but constantly struggle with their old Adam: "For that old Adam (like an untamed and contumacious ass) is still a part of them, which must be coerced not only by the doctrine, exhortations, impulse, and threats of the law, but also, as with a stick, by stripes and punishments, and forced into the obedience of Christ," as the Formula of Concord teaches, p. 723.

2) The law exercises its elenctic use in the reborn, whenever, looking into the mirror of the law, they are led to the knowledge of their indwelling sin and imperfection, Romans VII, 18.

3) The law is also a pedagogue to Christ for the reborn. This the blessed LUTHER teaches excellently in his later commentary on Galatians, p. 94: "Insofar as the flesh remains, so far also the law remains a pedagogue, who is accustomed now and then to terrify and grieve the conscience, by showing sin and threatening death. The conscience itself, however, is always raised up by the daily advent of Christ."

4) The law is a necessary rule of life for believers, lest they should devise some kind of religious life of their own sanctity from their own ingenuity, and under the pretext of the spirit of God, institute elective forms of worship without the word and command of God, as the Formula of Concord warns, p. 722.

The antithesis is that of the Antinomians (*) and Anabaptists, who contended that the Mosaic law does not pertain to Christians. Their arguments are:

(**) That saying is indeed to be understood of the pedagogical use of the sacred and ritual law of the O.T. This is declared both by the scope of this entire epistle and by the conjunction of these words both with the preceding, v. 23, and with the subsequent, vv. 25, 28, IV, 1-4. But as for the moral law, its pedagogical use is discussed by design in the letter written to the Romans, III, 20; IV, 15; V, 20, add 1 Corinthians XV, 56; Mark XII, 34; Psalm XXXVIII, 5; LI, 3, 4, & ff. I will explain the reason for this difference. A certain pedagogical use must indeed be asserted for both laws, both ritual and moral, but a different one for each, according to the diverse nature and definition of each. Namely, the pedagogical use of the moral law, as it is accustomed to be called, is the sense of sin, which can never be expiated by any finite price, by which most sad sense the soul is inflamed with a most ardent desire for divine grace, obtained by the infinite price of the satisfaction of Christ, which the Gospel announces to us. But the pedagogical use of the ceremonial and proper law of the Old Testament, insofar as it was ceremonial, was the typical signification of the coming Christ, and the sense of the hard burden which those laws brought with them, by which sense, indeed, souls were kindled with the desire for Christ to be manifested in the flesh. There is a singular reason why PAUL in Galatians III, 24 called the ceremonial law a παιδαγωγός to Christ, then to come and to be revealed. He himself interprets this reason a little later, in chapter IV, 1, 2, 3, that the Jews under the typical O.T. economy were held as infants and children.

(*) The most ancient Antinomians, and the worst of all, were the Manicheans, who, because they impiously dared to assign the most holy law of God to the evil principle which they had invented, rejected it entirely, against whom AUGUSTINE in particular disputed copiously. But of the Antinomians who shortly after the beginning of the purified doctrine troubled the church, and whose capital error was the confusion of the law and the gospel, there were, I say, various kinds, especially two; of which in one were those who denied the epanorthotic-pedagogical use to the moral law, thinking that the knowledge and detestation of sins were to be effected not from the law, but from the gospel; in the other were numbered those who took away the third or didactic use of the law, rashly thinking that renewed men do not need any law, as it was given only to the impious. The knowledge of this distinction

I. The law is not laid down for the just; 1 Timothy I, 9. Resp. The words of Paul are: Δικαίῳ νόμος οὐ κεῖται, the law does not lie upon the just as a heavy burden. This is accurately explained in the Formula of Concord, p. 719: "The law can neither overwhelm those who have been reconciled to God through Christ, nor be troublesome to the reborn with its coercion; since they, according to the inner man, delight in the law of God."

II. The reborn are not under the law, but under grace, Romans VI, 14. Resp. The reborn are not under the curse and troublesome coercion of the law; yet they are under the obligation of the law to render obedience.

Question XLI. Is the Sinaitic moral law abrogated?

The moral law, promulgated by God on Mount Sinai, cannot be abrogated.

Proof 1) The moral law, immediately promulgated by the Son of God, was inscribed by him on stone tablets, and was preserved in the ark of the covenant, so that it might be a most certain rule and norm, according to which life should be piously instituted according to the immutable will of God. Therefore, it cannot be abrogated.

2) The moral law comprises the natural law, which reflects justice itself in God, and is a certain ray of it. Therefore, as this is immutable, so is that.

The antithesis is that of Rivetus, Pareus, and others, who assert that the moral law, insofar as it was delivered by the ministry of Moses, has been abrogated for Christians. Their arguments are:

I. Those who have nothing in common with Moses, but all things in common with Christ, are not bound to keep the law of Moses; But Christians, etc. Therefore. Resp. The moral law is called the law of Moses as minister, but it is the law of God as author, from whom it retains a perpetual power of obligating, communicated to it. Moses did not promulgate the moral law, nor did he inscribe it on stone tablets with his own hand, but the Son of God did.

II. Some Lutheran theologians teach that the moral law has been abrogated as to justification, curse, and the rigor of exaction. Conf. DIETRICH, Institutiones Catecheticae, p. 73; QUENSTEDT, Systema, part IV, fol. 11. Resp. Other Lutheran theologians have judged that one should abstain from this manner of speaking, namely D. CALOV in his Biblia Illustrata on Exodus ch. XX, fol. 98, and on Galatians III, f. 591; D. JO. OSIANDER in Typus legis moralis, p. 83; D. RUDRAUFF in Sylloge controversiarum, q. 362; D. BAYER in Compendium, p. 817. I will here transcribe the judgment of D. GERHARD, which is read in his Locus de lege caerimoniali & forensi, c. IV, § 43: "That the law is invalid for the justification and life of men after the fall, brings no change or abrogation to the law, but argues that a great change has been made in us; for this reason justification and salvation cannot be hoped for from the law, because it is weakened by the flesh, Romans VIII, 3. For a like reason, that believers in Christ are not actually subject to the curse of the law, from this likewise no change or abrogation can be attributed to the law; since the voice of the law obtains its perpetual property and efficacy of accusing, cursing, and damning; that it does not actually exert this power of its against believers, proceeds from an accident, namely because the shield of divine grace and the cloak of Christ's righteousness covers them. The same judgment is to be made of the rigor of the judgment of exaction, which remains perpetual and inviolate for the law, which even believers and their works would be forced to experience, unless they were believers, i.e., unless they had been reconciled to God through faith in Christ, on account of whom also their works, although in many ways unclean and imperfect, are pleasing to God." Therefore, D. CHEMNITZ rightly admonishes, in his Locus de lege, c. V, p. 18: "Scripture does not say that the moral law is dead, abrogated, or evacuated, but we are said to be dead and abrogated to the law, to signify that a change is made not in that rule of justice in God, but in us, Romans VII, is necessary for understanding the opinion of our Formula of Concord and its declaration. For in it, chapters V and VI are both opposed to the Antinomians, but not in one and the same way. In chapter V, the dispute is against those Antinomians who are to be referred to the first of these kinds. But against those who are numbered in the other kind, the controversy is agitated in chapter VI. In our age, alas! the Herrnhutians are too openly involved in the most grave error of the Antinomians, and of both kinds indeed, as in many others, whom no theologian of right opinion will judge to be numbered among the associates of the Augsburg Confession, not even the varied, much less the true and integral.

4, 6. We do not καταργούμεν the law, but we κατηργήθημεν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, ἀποθανόντες." A distinction is therefore to be made here between accurate and common, or popular, speech; The latter is to be understood according to the sense rather than according to the words. For it is customary that when, by grace, a transgression of the law is not regarded rigorously, but is pardoned, we say in common speech that the legislator himself does not require this; especially if it is done ordinarily.

III. Christ abrogated the third precept concerning the sanctification of the sabbath day, when through the Apostles he commanded the first day of the week to be kept holy, Acts XX, 7; 1 Corinthians XVI, 2. Resp. The third precept contains in itself something moral and something ceremonial. The moral is the divine worship to be celebrated on some seventh day; The ceremonial is precisely the seventh day of the week. The moral refers to an indefinite seventh and a cardinal number, or one of the seven days of the week; The ceremonial refers to a definite seventh and an ordinal number, i.e., precisely the seventh day of the week. The moral still endures, the ceremonial has been abrogated.

Question XLII. Can the reborn perfectly fulfill the law?

No one reborn in this life perfectly fulfills the law of God a); but the perfect obedience which Christ the mediator rendered to the divine law in place of the human race is imputed to the reborn for righteousness b). And supernatural powers are conferred on them by the Holy Spirit through the grace of renewal, so that they do not violate the law by a deliberate purpose of the will, as long as they remain in the state of regeneration c).

Obs. I. D. CHEMNITZ gravely warns, in his Locus de lege, c. VIII, fol. 99: "In every single precept this doctrine must be diligently inculcated, both how the law is impossible, and how we can have its fulfillment. For on both sides errors are made dangerously, and often not from ignorance, but from petulance. The Pharisees, because it is written in Ezekiel XXXVI, 27: 'I will cause you to walk in my precepts,' imagine that they can satisfy every single precept with perfect obedience. The Epicureans, when they hear that no one in this life can satisfy the law of God with perfect obedience, excuse with this veil all lapses against conscience, and imagine that believers neither can nor ought to keep anything in the commandments of God. But this dream is as false as the delirium of the Pharisees."

Obs. II. The question is not about the unregenerate, who can render external discipline in some way, which scripture calls the righteousness of the flesh, Hebrews IX, 10 (*), but the interior obedience of the heart without faith and the Holy Spirit cannot be rendered or fulfilled by them, nor can their external discipline be pleasing to God. The question here is about the reborn.

Obs. III. A distinction must be accurately made between absolute perfection, or that of consummation, and comparative perfection, or that of sincerity. The reborn in this life never attain absolute perfection; yet they are called perfect comparatively, with respect to others who are either hypocrites or commit deliberate sins without any shame (**). But the reborn sincerely keep the law of God, do not sin from deliberate choice, but strive for perfection with the highest zeal.

Proof a. 1) From Acts XV, 10, where Peter in the apostolic college says: "Now therefore why are you testing God, to put a yoke on the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers (Abraham, Moses, etc., who could be seen as most perfect), nor we were able to bear." Obs. 1) The controversy was moved to the Apostles by the pseudo-doctors not only about circumcision, but about the entire law, of which it was, as it were, the first door and token, and that it deals not only with the ceremonial, but also with the moral law is clear from the distinction in v. 5, the nomination of fornication in v. 20, and the inference in Galatians V, 3. 2) This moral law is a yoke not only δυσβάστακτον, difficult to bear (just as Christ says that the legal ceremonies are φορτία βαρέα καὶ δυσβάστακτα, heavy burdens and difficult to bear, Matthew XXIII, 4); but completely ἀβάστακτον, because it can be perfectly fulfilled by no mortal.

(*) In that place indeed it is perspicuous that the Apostle is speaking of the ritual and Levitical law of the O.T., which he himself in chapter VII, 16 had called νόμον ἐντολῆς σαρκικῆς, the reason for which name is posited in the real object, as is the custom to speak, of that law, which was chiefly the flesh, partly of men, in circumcision and frequent and various washings, partly of beasts, in the sacrifices to be offered to God. The Blessed Author himself professes this below, Question XLVI, proof 2.

(**) Or rather, of other renewed persons who are beginners and have not made such great progress. E.g., Ephesians IV, 13-14. For when perfection is spoken of, a comparison is always instituted, and indeed of things which are of the same kind, which have the same nature and condition, and which differ among themselves only in degree, as greater and lesser.

2) From Romans VIII, 3: "For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God, who sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh (accomplished), and for sin condemned sin in the flesh, that the justification of the law might be fulfilled in us." The Apostle teaches that the law cannot justify and save, not through itself (for it is a perfect norm of justice, and promises salvation to its observers), but because man, corrupted by sin, cannot perfectly fulfill it.

3) From Romans VII, 14: "We know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal." The reborn are carnal not entirely, but in part, not on account of the dominion of the flesh, but the sense of it. They are carnal in comparison to the law, which demands not only exterior, but also interior obedience. Therefore, since the reborn are carnal in part, they cannot exactly fulfill the whole spiritual law.

4) The moral law obligates the reborn to perfect obedience with respect to degrees, parts, and perseverance, which no mortal after the fall can render. See above Question XXII.

Proof b. From Romans X, 4: "Christ is the end (fulfillment) of the law for everyone who believes." Those who do penance and with true faith apprehend Christ the mediator, to them is imputed the perfect obedience of the law which Christ rendered, as if they themselves had satisfied the law. And in this way they have the full, perfect, and integral obedience of the law by imputation through faith, as CHEMNITZ teaches in loc. cit.

Proof c. The obedience of Christ is not given to the reborn so that they may live freely according to the flesh, Romans VIII, 12, but the spirit of renewal is also given, which causes them to walk in the precepts of God, Jeremiah XXXI, 33, and writes the law in their hearts, Ezekiel XXXVI, 27; instructed by whose powers they mortify the actions of the flesh, Romans VIII, 13, nor do they sin voluntarily as long as the seed of regeneration is vigorous in them, 1 John III, 9.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, Arminians, and Anabaptists, who maintain that the reborn can perfectly fulfill the law of God. Who rely on the following arguments:

I. Christ says: "My yoke is easy and my burden is light," Matthew XI, 30. Therefore, it can be easily fulfilled. Resp. Christ speaks of the doctrine of the gospel, which, although it has the adjunct of the weight of the cross and temptations, sufficiently heavy for the carnal man, is nevertheless easy to the reborn, both on account of the most sweet consolation flourishing from the evangelical promises and the remission of sins, and on account of the grace and presence of the Holy Spirit, and the certain hope of gratuitous remission.

II. The commandments of God are not burdensome, 1 John V, 3. Therefore, they can be easily fulfilled. Resp. They are not burdensome to one who believes in Christ, who indeed with the Spirit of God by a spontaneous act delights in the law of God according to the inner man; although he sees another law in his members, which wars against the law of his mind, Romans VII, 22-23.

III. Christ died that the justification of the law might be fulfilled in us, Romans VIII, 4. Resp. The Apostle pointedly says "in us," not "by us"; namely τὸ δικαίωμα τοῦ νόμου is fulfilled in us when the obedience of Christ is imputed to us.

IV. Whoever loves Christ keeps his word. But the reborn, etc. Therefore. The major is clear from John XIV, 23. Resp. Just as the reborn in this way of life love Christ not perfectly, but according to the measure of their powers; so they keep his word imperfectly; they will love and keep it perfectly in the fatherland.

V. "God will circumcise your heart, and the heart of your seed, so that you may love God your Lord with all your heart," Deuteronomy XXX, 6. Resp. "The whole heart" is opposed either to a double and divided heart, or to a maimed and mutilated heart; In the former sense, it denotes a sincere heart, in the latter sense, it designates a perfectly renewed heart. The reborn love God with a sincere heart, and they acknowledge and grieve over their imperfection in loving.

VI. "I can do all things through him who perfects me, Christ," Philippians IV, 13.

Therefore, I can perfectly fulfill the law. Resp. 1) These words must be understood reduplicatively: All things which I can do, I can do through the grace of Christ who strengthens me, not from my own powers. 2) Restrictively, according to the underlying matter: "I know how to be abased, and I know also how to abound."

VII. "The commandment that I command you is not above you," i.e., above your powers, Deuteronomy XXX, 11. Resp. Paul explains this word not of the word of the law, but of the word of the gospel, Romans X, 6.

VIII. God commands nothing impossible, or he is iniquitous. Resp. God commands nothing simply and at all times impossible. For 1) the fulfillment of the law in the state of integrity was possible; Therefore, God is not unjust if he demands it from us, who are weak by our own fault. A creditor uses his right, demanding a debt even from him who through his own fault is unable to pay. 2) The fulfillment of the law is not impossible in itself, but κατ' ἄλλο, on account of another, inasmuch as it is weakened through the flesh, Romans VIII, 3. 3) God by grace imputes the obedience of Christ to believers for righteousness, and accepts their inchoate and sincere obedience, although it is imperfect, pardoning the imperfection.

ON THE CEREMONIAL LAW

Question XLIII. What is the ceremonial law?

The ceremonial law is a command of God, by which this supreme lord and legislator obligated the people of the old testament, and through Moses prescribed to them a certain form of external worship, to remind men of their sins, to show the redeemer from afar to the contrite, and to apply and seal the federal grace through two sacraments and various sacrifices.

Question XLIV. In what did the external worship prescribed by the ceremonial law consist?

The external worship prescribed to the people of God in the old testament consisted in observing certain rites concerning sacred persons a), things b), places c), and times d).

Proof a. The sacred persons in the O.T. destined for ecclesiastical functions were divided into three orders, viz., of the high priest, priests, and Levites strictly so called: About whom see Exodus XXVIII, 29; Leviticus IV, 8; Leviticus VIII; to these add the Nazirites, Numbers VI.

Proof b. The ceremonial laws deal 1) with abstinence from certain foods and the eating of certain animals, Leviticus XI, 2; ch. XVII, 11; 2) with the use of certain garments, Deuteronomy XXII, 11; 3) with the structure of houses, Leviticus XIV, 34; 4) with sowing, trees, brute animals, Deuteronomy XXII, 9; Leviticus XIX, 19; Deuteronomy XXII, 6; 5) with sacred vessels and utensils, or the instruments of external divine worship; 6) with the two sacraments of the O.T., circumcision and the paschal lamb, about which below; 7) with sacrifices. A sacrifice is an external sacred action, by which some visible thing is offered to God by a priest, in a rite prescribed in the law, to admonish men of the gravity of sin, and of the future sacrifice of the Messiah to be offered on the altar of the cross for sins (*). A sacrifice, with respect to its matter, was either a מִנְחָה, which was a food offering, or a זֶבֶחַ, a bloody sacrifice from animals slain in honor of God; with respect to its form, it was either expiatory, or a peace offering, and that either eucharistic or votive; with respect to time, it was either daily, or for the sabbath, or annual. On these see GERHARD, locus de lege caeremoniali, c. 1, p. 163.

Proof c. The sacred places with which the ceremonial law was occupied were two: the tabernacle, or portable Mosaic temple, about which see Exodus XXV, 9, and XL; and the temple of Solomon, fixed in one place, about which see 1 Kings VI, 36.

Proof d. Sacred time comprises the legal festivals. But the feasts of the Hebrews were various: 1) the weekly, which is the sabbath, to be celebrated on the last day of the week, Genesis II, 3; 2) the monthly, which was the νεομηνία, or new moon, Numbers X, 10; 3) The annual feasts were the feast of Passover, or of unleavened bread, Exodus XII, 34; the feast of Pentecost, or of weeks, Leviticus XXIII, 15; the feast of tabernacles, Leviticus XXIII, 34; the feast of the blowing of trumpets, Numbers XXIX, 1; the feast of expiation, Leviticus XVI & XXIII; the sabbatical year, Exodus XXIII, 10; the jubilee year, Leviticus XXV, 8-9. (*).

Question XLV. What is the end of the ceremonial law?

The principal end of the ceremonial law is both the signification and adumbration of the benefits of Christ, and their application through sacraments and sacrifices a). A less principal end is the reminder of sin b), good order (εὐταξία) in assemblies and ecclesiastical actions c), the segregation of the Jewish church from all assemblies of the gentiles d).

Proof a. The constitutions and observances concerning food, drink, distinctions of feasts, are called a shadow of future things, but the body is Christ, Colossians II, 16-17, for the reason that they prefigured Christ. Nor were the benefits of Christ only adumbrated in those Levitical ceremonies, but they were also applied and sealed to believers through the use of sacraments and sacrifices. Whence circumcision is called a seal of the righteousness of faith, Romans IV, 11, and the blood of sacrifices is said to expiate souls, Leviticus XVII, 11, not in itself, but by reason of the merit of Christ, valid before and after, the fruit of which it offered.

Proof b. Through the ceremonial laws a remembrance of sins is made every year, Hebrews X, 3.

Proof c. God had ordained the ecclesiastical rites so that all things in the church might be done in order and decently, 1 Corinthians XIV, 40.

Proof d. By sacrifices and other Levitical ceremonies the Israelites were distinguished from other nations. This Moses implies, Deuteronomy IV, 8: "What great nation is there to whom God is near, as all this law which I am going to give before you today?"

Question XLVI. Is the ceremonial law abrogated?

The ceremonial laws have been abrogated by the advent, passion, and death of Christ, as far as the necessity of observing and the utility of the observation; but with the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem they were utterly abolished.

Proof 1) The Levitical ceremonies were a shadow, prefiguring the benefits of Christ, which vanished with the supervening body, Christ, Colossians II, 17.

2) The sacrifice and offering had to cease with the advent of the Messiah, Daniel IX, 27, and the justifications of the flesh (the Levitical ceremonies, which were for the most part occupied with the flesh) were imposed until the time of reformation, Hebrews IX, 10.

3) The ceremonial law was abrogated by a public decree of the Holy Spirit in the council of the Apostles, Acts XV, 6, and with the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem the Levitical priesthood was deleted.

The antithesis is that of the Jews, who deny that the ceremonial laws have been abrogated. Their arguments are:

I. The ceremonial laws, no less than the moral law, were promulgated by the eternal Deity. Therefore, just like the moral law, they are to be perpetually observed.

Resp. There is a great difference between the moral and the ceremonial law. For 1) God immediately gave the moral law, Exodus XX, 1, and the same wrote it with his own fingers, Exodus XXXIV, 1, and commanded that it be preserved in the ark of the covenant, Hebrews IX, 4. But the ceremonial law he promulgated not immediately, but with the intervening work of Moses, Deuteronomy V, 31, nor did he himself write it, but Moses did, Exodus XXIV, 4, nor were the ceremonial laws placed in the ark of the covenant, but were committed to the custody of the priests, Deuteronomy XVII, 18. 2) The moral law is universal; because materially it is the same as the natural law inscribed on the minds of all men; but the ceremonial law is particular, which expired with the collapse of the temple of Jerusalem.

II. If the ceremonial law is abrogated in the N.T., the will of God will be mutable (because it proceeded from the will of God); But the consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. By the abrogation of the ceremonial law the will of God was not changed; because God willed that it should only endure until the times of reformation (διορθώσεως), Hebrews IX, 10.

III. The ceremonial law is still in force in the N.T.; for Paul circumcised Timothy, Acts XVI, 3, and the Apostles commanded abstinence from blood and what is strangled, Acts XV, 29, which pertain to the ceremonial law. Resp. 1) Paul willed that Timothy be circumcised, not out of necessity, but out of charity toward the weak Jews, not yet sufficiently instructed about the end of circumcision, given for a time. 2) The Apostles commanded abstinence from blood and what is strangled, not by force of a law that was in force and obligating; but to avert all scandal. For the Jews were unwilling to approach the Christian church because they saw that Christians ate what was strangled and blood, from which the Jews abhorred. Therefore, that the Apostles might remove this obstacle, they commanded Christians to abstain from blood and what is strangled: Which command, however, was not perpetual, but temporary; namely, until the Jews and Gentiles should coalesce into one body (*).

Question XLVII. Did the sacrifices of the O.T. have the power to expiate sins both voluntary and involuntary?

The sacrifices of the O.T. had the power to expiate sins both voluntary and involuntary a), not of themselves, but typically and organically b).

Obs. The use of the O.T. sacrifices was twofold, legal and evangelical. The legal use was ἀνάμνησις ἁμαρτιῶν, a remembrance of sins, Hebrews X, 3, so that, namely, sinful men might be admonished of the gravity and guilt of sin, and thus they were means of exciting contrition. The evangelical use was that they might show from afar the one expiatory sacrifice of Christ, and reconcile a sinful man to God on account of that future sacrifice of Christ prefigured and apprehended by faith.

Proof a. From Leviticus XVII, 11: "The life of the flesh is in the blood; therefore I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that makes atonement for the soul." To which the Apostle refers, saying in Hebrews IX, 22: "Almost all things are purified with blood according to the law, and without the shedding of blood there is no remission."

2. By sacrifices were expiated  $\epsilon\psi\chi$  and  $\epsilon\psi\chi$ , i.e., from the version of the LXX, ἀδικία, ἀσεβεία, iniquity and impiety, Leviticus XVI, 22; ch. VII, 2. Therefore, also voluntary sins.

3. The blood of the antitype, Christ, cleanses us from all sin and iniquity, 1 John I, 7, 9. Therefore, the typical blood of sacrifices also cleansed from all sin.

Proof b. The Levitical sacrifices had the power of expiating sins not of themselves, or by their own power. Therefore Paul says, Hebrews X, 4: "It is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins." They expiated, therefore, by the power of the antitype, or the sacrifice of Christ, which they adumbrated; for the law had a shadow of the good things to come, Hebrews X, 1. Nor, however, did the O.T. sacrifices behave as mere signifying signs (σημαντικά), but they were also divinely ordained organs, which would propose to sinners the Messiah, God to be incarnated, who in his assumed humanity would in his own time offer himself as a sacrifice to the Father for the sins of the whole world, and would offer, apply, and seal the fruits of his bloody obedience to them.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that the sacrifices truly expiated sins, and that they did not even typically expiate voluntary sins. Their arguments are:

I. No creature can be offered to God as a price of payment for sin; But all beasts, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because creatures belong to God. But whatever already belongs to God cannot be offered to him as a price for sins. Resp. I limit the major: unless God has so ordained. The will and ordination of the creator is to be regarded here, not, however, the judgment of human reason.

II. Whatever expiates typically does not expiate truly (for a type is opposed to the (*) Another cause seems to have underlain it, and a very weighty one at that. The reason for this interdiction, concerning blood and what is strangled, was entirely this: that blood was destined for the altar and the expiation of life, and by this very fact was consecrated to the one God. But it was considered a sacrilege to transfer a sacred thing to common use. But DANIEL in chapter IX had foretold that it would come to pass that sacrifices would not entirely cease before the devastation of the temple and the land of Judea. For before the term was established, the Gospel of Christ, not only slain but also consummated, had to be announced to the entire world, that is, both to the Jews and to the profane gentiles, as our Liberator himself testified, Matthew XXIV, 14-15. For that reason it was provided for by that decree of the Apostles that no one should eat blood, since it was still a sacred thing, the temple not yet having been destroyed.

true). But the sacrifices of the O.T., etc. Therefore. Resp. The true is opposed a) to the feigned, b) to shadows, John I, 17. If it is taken in the former sense; they certainly expiated truly and really, according to the true and real estimation of God; But if it is accepted in the latter sense; the proper truth of expiation is in Christ, the typical adumbration is in the legal sacrifices.

III. The legal sacrifices are rejected by God as useless, Psalm L, 8. Therefore, they did not truly expiate. mResp. The sacrifices of an impenitent man are rejected; those which are offered by a penitent and faithful heart are benevolently accepted.

IV. "It is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins," Hebrews X, 4. Resp. Of themselves, or by their own power and dignity.

V. The annual oblation was made ὑπὲρ τῶν τοῦ λαοῦ ἀγνοημάτων, for the ignorances of the people, Hebrews IX, 7. Therefore, not for sins committed against conscience. Resp. 1) The position of one is not the exclusion of the other. 2) In Hebrews IX, 7, sins of every kind are called ἀγνοήματα, because all have an accompanying ignorance, and proceed from some error of the mind, even the more serious ones. For even the malicious crucifixion of Christ is called an ἀγνόημα, Acts III, 17. Add Luke XXIII, 34; 1 Timothy I, 13.

Question XLVIII. Do sacrifices have their origin from the light of nature, or from divine revelation?

The light of nature does not dictate that God is to be worshipped with sacrifices; but they have their origin from supernatural revelation and ordination.

Proof. The law of nature dictates in general that God is to be worshipped, but it does not reveal the determination of the worship, nor does reason find any analogy between God, who is spirit, and corporal sacrifices; indeed, reason left to itself would persuade the contrary, that the most blessed God neither needs nor is delighted by the shed blood of animals and the foul-smelling burning of bodies.

The antithesis is that of certain Jews and Pontificians, who maintain that the rite of sacrificing proceeds from the light of nature. They object:

I. The Gentiles by common consent used sacrifices for the worship of God. Therefore, the rite of sacrificing proceeds from the light of nature. Resp. The Gentiles offered sacrifices to the Gods only out of a perverse imitation (κακοζηλία) of the Jews, for the rest they knew neither the matter, nor the form, nor the final cause of them. Whence they were also precipitated into human sacrifice (ἀνθρωποθυσίαν).

II. Abel sacrificed without a prescribed divine command; Therefore, from the instinct of reason and the dictate of the natural law. Resp. Although it is not read in the sacred codex that a command was prescribed to Abel concerning sacrificing, yet this is not to be denied. For the Apostle testifies, Hebrews XI, 4, that by faith Abel offered to God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain. But faith is not from the instinct of nature, but from the hearing of the word of God, Romans X, 17.

ON THE FORENSIC, OR JUDICIAL, LAW

Question XLIX. What is the forensic, or judicial, law?

The forensic, or judicial, law is a command of God by which he obligated the Israelites in the times of the old testament, and through Moses prescribed to them a form of political governance, so that external discipline might be preserved in civil society, and the Jewish polity, in which Christ was to be born, might be distinguished from the polities of other nations.

Obs. It is called forensic and judicial law; because it directed both the criminal and the civil forum of the Jews.

Question L. Concerning what things does the forensic law give precepts?

The forensic law gives precepts concerning all those things which pertain to the administration of the Israelite republic, and fall under the forum or judgment of the Jews.

Proof. Contained in the forensic law are precepts concerning kings, Deuteronomy XVII, 14; concerning waging wars, Deuteronomy XX, 1; concerning marriage, Leviticus XVIII, 19; Deuteronomy XXV, 5; concerning slaves, Deuteronomy XXIII, 15; concerning hirelings, strangers, the poor, orphans, and widows, Leviticus XIX, 13; concerning homicides, Leviticus XXIV, 17; concerning thefts, Exodus XXI, 16; concerning deposits, Exodus XXII, 7; concerning loans, Exodus XXII, 14; concerning damages inflicted, Exodus XXI, 35; concerning weights and measures, Leviticus XIX, 35; concerning not moving boundaries, Deuteronomy XXVII, 17; concerning avoiding biting usury, Exodus XXII, 25.

Question LI. What is the end of the judicial law?

The end of the forensic law is a) the preservation of external discipline in civil society, b) the distinction of the Jewish polity from the polities of other nations.

Proof a. Just as no nation can be contained within the limits of honesty and justice without external discipline; so the Israelite people had to be coerced by a more rigid polity, lest they should take for themselves an unbridled license for sinning, and cast off all shame.

Proof b. It pleased the most holy God to distinguish the Israelite republic, in which the true worship of God and the genealogy of the Messiah were to be preserved, by most just laws from the remaining peoples, in which grave sins were committed with impunity, by a particular forensic law, as if marked with a certain character.

Question LII. Is the forensic law of the Jews abrogated?

The precepts of the forensic law are twofold. Some are of common law, and are deduced as natural consequences from the moral law a). Some are of particular law, which respect the circumstances of the Israelite republic b). Not the former, but the latter are abrogated.

Proof a. The precepts concerning the office of a king, concerning slaves, and contumacious children are reduced to the fourth precept of the moral law: Concerning homicide, war, injury to a neighbor, to the fifth; Concerning marriage, rape, adultery, to the sixth; Concerning theft, deposit, loan, usury, to the seventh; Concerning witnesses, concerning calumnies, to the eighth. Which precepts, as to their substance, are in force among all. Their circumstances, peculiar to the Jews alone, have been abrogated in most Christian polities; yet the Christian magistrate is free to retain them.

Proof b. The precepts of the forensic law concerning marriage with the wife of a brother who has no children, Deuteronomy XXV, 5; concerning the drink of jealousy, Numbers V, 12; concerning those who are to be barred from public honors and offices, Deuteronomy XXIII, 1, 2, 3, have been abrogated, since they were enacted by God for just causes for the Israelites alone (*).

(*) In certain forensic laws, a secret and typical force also lay hidden, as in that precept, Deuteronomy XXI, 22-23, the reason for which the legate of Christ interpreted, Galatians III, 13.

SUSPIRIUM.

n the tablets of my heart, most HOLY GOD, You have inscribed Your law, the expressed image of Your holiness and justice, to which You have added a more abundant light and a greater weight by the precepts promulgated on Mount Sinai, that it may perpetually be before my mind and eyes. But I confess that I have often taken up a forgetfulness of it, so that I have deflected from that perfect rule of living, and have injured Your majesty. Give to me, Your most humble servant, most CLEMENT FATHER, the remission of my crimes, on account of the most consummate obedience of my redeemer, rendered in my place, which I apprehend, and I have no doubt of making its fruit my own. For the rest, I suppliantly venerate and pray that You may govern me by Your divine spirit, that my thoughts, counsels, undertakings, words, and deeds may never wander from Your law!

CHAPTER II.

ON THE WORD OF THE GOSPEL

Question I. What is the gospel?

THE GOSPEL IS a sermon of purely gratuitous grace, offering the merit of Christ and the benefits obtained to all men, and by the faith which it kindles, actually conferring them to the glory of God and the eternal salvation of men.

Obs. Gospel, by the force of the word, denotes good news, or a joyful and desired announcement.

Question II. In how many ways is the name of the gospel taken?

The name of the gospel is taken in three ways: a) Generally, and less properly, for the entire doctrine of the N.T. which was proposed by Christ and the Apostles, and is found handed down in the writings of the evangelists and apostles; b) Specially, for the doctrine of grace concerning the gratuitous remission of sins, to be obtained by faith in Christ, whether it be had in the new or in the O.T.; c) Most specially, for the proclamation, or doctrine concerning the Messiah now exhibited.

Proof a. The name of the gospel is taken generally in Mark I, 1, in the words: "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ." Where the beginning of the gospel denotes the same as the beginning of the doctrine handed down by Christ. But Christ handed down not only the doctrine of the gospel strictly so called, but also the doctrine of the law; which is clear partly from the diverse sermons of Christ; partly also from the doctrine of John the Baptist, who immediately in that passage, v. 4, is said to have preached the baptism of repentance. In the same sense it is also taken in Mark XVI, 15, where Christ dismisses his disciples fortified with this instruction: "Go into all the world, preach the gospel, etc." But it is certain that the Apostles preached not only the gospel strictly so called, but also the law.

Proof b. In a special sense, the gospel is adequately contrasted with the law. For just as the law is the norm of things to be done and to be fled, so the gospel is the norm of believing in Christ, and is the doctrine of the gratuitous remission of sins, to be obtained from God on account of the merit of Christ, whether it be proposed in the N. or in the O.T. Thus it is taken in Isaiah LII, 7: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those who bring good news." Which words Paul cites in Romans X, 15: "How beautiful are the feet of those who preach the gospel of peace." Add Hebrews IV, 2.

Proof c. The name of the gospel is used in a most special sense in Romans I, 1, where Paul affirms that he was set apart to preach the gospel, which was previously promised. Therefore, a distinction is to be made here between the gospel (εὐαγγέλιον) most strictly so called, and the promise (ἐπαγγελίαν). The preaching concerning the Messiah not yet exhibited, but to be exhibited, is called ἡ πρὸς τοὺς πατέρας ἐπαγγελία, the promise made to the fathers, Acts XIII, 32. But the Gospel (Εὐαγγέλιον), in its most special sense, denotes the public proclamation concerning the exhibited Messiah (*).

Question III. Is the gospel a sermon of repentance?

The gospel, in a general and less proper sense, is rightly called a sermon of repentance, generally so called a); But the gospel, accepted in a special and proper sense, insofar as it is opposed to the law, is not a sermon of repentance accusing and condemning sins b).

Proof a. The gospel, in a generic and looser sense, designates the whole Christian doctrine comprised in the writings of the Evangelists and Apostles, which consists in the preaching of repentance and remission of sins, as Christ commands, Luke XXIV, 47; and repentance, generally taken, comprises contrition and faith. This the gospel certainly preaches, taken in a looser sense, with the theologians devoted to the Augsburg Confession not disagreeing. For this form of speaking is used in the Apology of the Aug. Conf., p. 165: "The sum of the preaching of the gospel is to reprove sins, and to offer remission of sins, and righteousness for Christ's sake." And in the Epitome of the Formula of Concord, p. 592: "We believe, teach, and confess that if the word gospel is taken for the whole doctrine of Christ, which he himself professed in his ministry (as did his Apostles), it is rightly said and taught that the gospel is a sermon of repentance and remission of sins."

Proof b. The gospel, taken in a stricter sense, insofar as it is contrasted with the law, is not a sermon of repentance specially or partially so called, and indeed with respect to the prior part of repentance, i.e., contrition, or sorrow for sin. Which assertion of ours we strengthen:

1) From the doctrine of the gospel, proposed from the first time of the fall. For the proto-gospel concerning the seed of the woman, which would crush the head of the serpent, Genesis III, 15; the promise concerning the seed of Abraham, in which all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, Genesis XII, 3; concerning the son of David, who was to restore the kingdom of David and continue it eternally, 2 Samuel VII, 12 ff.; the prediction concerning the Messiah to be wounded for our iniquities, Isaiah LIII; is the true gospel, but most different from a sermon of repentance accusing, terrifying, and condemning the sins of men.

2) A sermon of repentance terrifies the sinner, makes him sad, declares to him the wrath of God and eternal death. But the gospel in the sacred letters is described as being the gospel of peace, Ephesians II, 17; the gospel of joy, Luke II, 10; the gospel of the grace of God, Acts XX, 24; the word of reconciliation, 2 Corinthians V, 18; the gospel of salvation, Romans I, 16. Therefore, the gospel formally is not a sermon of repentance.

3) A sermon of repentance aims at this, that the hearts of men may be broken and crushed; But the gospel is preached to the poor and contrite in heart, that they may be raised up and refreshed, Isaiah LXI, 1; Matthew XI, 5.

4) A sermon of repentance leads men to the acknowledgment and detestation of sin. But this is not from the gospel, but from the law, Romans III, 20. From which the Declaration of the Formula of Concord concludes, p. 717: "It is connected with great danger, nor can it be approved, that it is asserted that the gospel (properly so called, and when it is distinguished from the law) is a sermon of repentance, reproving sins."

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians and Antinomians, who maintain that the gospel is more rightly described by a sermon of repentance than by a sermon of grace. Who strengthen their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Which sermon terrifies the consciences of men is a sermon of repentance; But the evangelical sermon, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved by the examples of Peter, Acts II, 37; Paul, Acts XXIV, 25. Resp. The apostles preached not only the gospel, but also the law.

(*) And in this most special signification, the Gospel (Εὐαγγέλιον) 1) is a sign and document of Christ, now brought to light, Matthew XI, 5; 2) is distinguished not only from the law, especially the sacred and ritual law of the O.T., but also from the Prophets, who all testified of the coming Christ, Luke XVI, 16; 1 Peter I, 10-12. Therefore, in this way, in which the Gospel is the proper doctrine of the N.T., concerning Christ who was once to be, but is now present, there are three principal parts of which this doctrine of the Gospel consists. First; Christ, whom the Seers foretold would come, has long since come. Second; He is none other than Jesus of Nazareth. Third; In him alone are completed and consummated all things which the divine Seers predicted concerning the Christ to come.

II. In the gospel there exist many threats. See Matthew V, 22; ch. VII, 19, and elsewhere passim. Therefore, the gospel terrifies the souls of men. Resp. The threats exist in the gospel generally so called, but they are not of the gospel specially so taken, as it is opposed to the law.

III. Whatever doctrine reproves and accuses sins is a sermon of penitence; But the evangelical doctrine, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved; because the Holy Spirit reproves the sin of unbelief (ἀπιστίας) in Christ, by which the redeemer of the world is contemned and rejected; But the Holy Spirit does not reprove that unbelief through the law, which knows nothing of Christ. Therefore, through the gospel. Resp. 1) Distinguish between the law alone and the law illustrated by the light of the gospel. The law alone, or taken separately, knows nothing of faith, or unbelief in Christ, yet when illuminated by the light of the gospel it reproves and condemns unbelief in Christ. 2) Unbelief is considered either with respect to its genus, or with respect to a certain object. In the former way, it can and must be referred only to the law; since with respect to its genus it is a sin, and consequently it reproves and condemns it equally as the rest of sins. In the latter way, it has for its object either God as legislator, or according to the gospel it has for its object Christ the mediator. This respect does not change the genus of unbelief, but only varies the object so that unbelief, although it is directed directly against Christ, nevertheless impinges on the first precept of the decalogue, and thus is subject to the law. For this precept in general commands to believe God, in whatever way he is considered, whether as creator and preserver, or as legislator, or as redeemer; and thus the law in general reproves and condemns all unbelief. On the contrary, the gospel, although it manifests and declares a certain object of unbelief, yet it does not, properly speaking, reprove or condemn unbelief itself.

IV. Every sermon about the passion and death of Christ is a sermon of penitence; But the gospel, etc. Therefore. The major is clear: the passion and death of Christ is a real sermon of penitence, full of the severity, terror, and wrath of God. Resp. The passion and death of Christ is considered in a twofold way: 1) as a mirror of the justice, severity, and divine wrath towards sinners, and thus it pertains reductively to the law; 2) Inasmuch as it is a mirror of the ineffable mercy of God towards the miserable human race, and a most full satisfaction for sins, and thus it pertains to the gospel.

V. Whatever reveals the wrath of God is a sermon of penitence; But the gospel, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from Romans I, 18: "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, etc." But the wrath of God is revealed through the gospel, about which the Apostle had spoken before. Resp. The Apostle does not say that the wrath of God is revealed in the gospel, but in the preceding verse he had said that righteousness is revealed in the gospel, by which man is justified, to which is opposed wrath, which the Apostle asserts is revealed from heaven, namely, through the natural and moral law, through the judgments of God, through examples, and proper experience.

VI. Whatever contrition is salutary flows from the gospel; But the contrition of the faithful, etc. Therefore. The major is constant; because without the gospel, contrition, the greater it is, the more effectively it leads a man to desperation. The minor is clear; because it is a spiritual sacrifice, Psalm LI, 19; it is repentance unto salvation, 2 Corinthians VII, 10. Resp. God through converting grace, by grieving the sinner from the law, works repentance unto salvation, so that repentance taken partially (μερικῶς), or contrition, is not indeed a causal medium of salvation, but a medium of divine order, by which man is disposed and prepared by the Holy Spirit to conceive from the gospel a saving faith in Christ, with which salutary contrition is conjoined. Desperation is not to be attributed to contrition itself, considered in its essence; because contrition in itself is a work of the Holy Spirit through the law. But neither the Holy Spirit works desperation, nor does the divine law command it. But it is a vicious act of man, who makes the mercy of God less than his sin, and does not know how to flee from the law of Moses to the gospel of Christ.

VII. Whatever doctrine excludes all boasting, most effectively reproves sins; But the gospel, etc., Romans III, 27. Resp. The gospel excludes all boasting, not by reproving sins, which is of the law; but by referring the entire beginning, progress, and end of salvation to the grace of God alone.

VIII. Whatever doctrine is not only an odor of life to life, but also an odor of death to death, is not only a sermon of grace, but also of penitence; But the gospel, etc., 2 Corinthians II, 15-16. Therefore. Resp. The gospel is per se an odor of life; it becomes per accidens an odor of death to those who either condemn the gospel, or abuse it for security: just as the sweet odor of ointment refreshes doves, but kills beetles.

IX. The gospel is proposed with salutary fruit only to the penitent; Therefore, it is rightly called a sermon of penitence. Resp. We assert that the gospel, strictly and properly so called, is formally not a sermon of penitence, or of contrition. But if anyone wishes to call the gospel a sermon of penitence objectively, because it is fruitful only to the contrite, and declaratively, inasmuch as it declares what infidelity is, whose object is unknown to the law, we suffer him to abound in his own sense. Conf. DANNHAVER in hodosophia phanomenon VI, p. 484.

Question IV. What is the principal efficient cause of the gospel?

Principal efficient cause of the gospel. The efficient cause of the gospel, both with respect to the decree and to the revelation, is the entire Holy Trinity a), God the Father b), the Son of God c), and the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. God the Father with the Son and the Holy Spirit decreed from eternity; a) That as a remedy for the fall of Adam and for sin, which he foresaw, the second person of the Trinity, the Son of God, would in the fullness of time assume a true human nature, and in it by fulfilling the law, by suffering and dying, would make satisfaction for the sins of men, and would merit eternal salvation for the whole human race. b) He decreed that the merit of Christ and its benefits should be offered, exhibited, and distributed to all through the word of the gospel. With respect to this decree, the gospel is called a mystery hidden in God from the ages (ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων), Ephesians III, 9.

Proof b. "In many times and in many ways God spoke of old to the fathers by the prophets, but in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son," Hebrews I, 1. The God who has spoken in the Son is God the Father, who already of old in the O.T. spoke to the fathers by the prophets, that "everyone who believes in Jesus Christ receives forgiveness of sins," Acts X, 43. Which is the sum of the gospel.

Proof c. From John I, 17-18: "The law was given through Moses; Grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. No one has ever seen God; the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has made him known (to us)." Just as the law was given to us through Moses, by which we are convicted of our unrighteousness; so through Jesus Christ the most true grace has not only been acquired for us, but has also been lucidly explained to us by the preaching of the gospel, since this eternal Son of God, existing in the bosom of the Father, knows most perfectly the divine decree concerning our salvation, which this Word of God (λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ) announced to the first parents in paradise, Genesis III, 15.

Proof d. From Ephesians III, 5: "It has now been revealed to his holy Apostles and Prophets by the Spirit, that the Gentiles are fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ through the gospel." The mystery concerning Christ and the calling of all Gentiles to his church was more clearly revealed to the Apostles by the Holy Spirit in the N.T. than to the men of God in the O.T., who nevertheless also spoke of Christ, being moved by the Holy Spirit, 2 Peter I, 21.

Question V. By whose ministry was the gospel preached?

Ministerial Cause. The gospel was preached by the ministry of the holy men of God, both in the old a) and new testament b). Indeed, angels also, by the command of God, have joyfully and willingly expounded the gospel concerning Christ c).

Proof a. The proto-gospel concerning the seed of the woman that would crush the head of the serpent, was without doubt handed down and repeated by Adam and the rest of the patriarchs until the flood. After the flood, Noah was a preacher of righteousness, 2 Peter II, 5, with his descendants. A most illustrious evangelical promise was made to Abraham, concerning the Messiah, the seed of Abraham, in whom all nations were to be blessed, Genesis XII, 3, which was repeated to Isaac, Genesis XXVI, 4, from whom that promise was propagated down to Moses, whose ministry, although it is distinguished from the ministry of the gospel, finally shows and points to Christ. "Moses wrote of me," says the Savior, John V, 46. Memorable is the passage concerning the great Prophet, Deuteronomy XVIII, 15, which is cited in Acts III, 22. But the Levitical priests, as it were, described and prefigured the promise of the Messiah the redeemer in the sacrifices. After Moses, all the Prophets bore witness to Christ, Acts X, 43. Conf. Psalm II, VII, XXII, XLV, CX; Isaiah VII, LIII, LXI; Jeremiah XXIII; Daniel IX; Hosea XIII; Micah V; Haggai II; Zechariah IX, XIII; Malachi I, III, IV.

Proof b. In the N.T., the gospel of Christ was preached by the shepherds of Bethlehem, Luke II, 17; Simeon, Luke II, 29; John the Baptist, John I, 29; the Apostles, Mark XVI, 15, and their successors, or all faithful preachers of the gospel, in whom God placed the word of reconciliation, 2 Corinthians V, 19.

Proof c. It was a singular pleasure for the angels to propose and narrate to men the gospel concerning the conception of Christ, Luke I, 26; his nativity, Luke II, 10; his resurrection, Luke XXIV, 4; his ascension into heaven and his return to judgment, Acts I, 11.

The antithesis is 1) of certain Scholastics, who contend with Pelagius that men before Moses were justified and saved by the law of nature alone, after Moses by the law of Moses alone; but in the N.T. they are justified and saved by the gospel; 2) of the Anabaptists, who assert that the Fathers of the O.T. knew nothing of the promises of the gospel and of eternal life; 3) of the Socinians, who maintain that the gospel began with Christ, and is proper to the N.T. alone. Who fortify their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Whatever was kept secret for long ages, and was at last manifested in the N.T., was not in the O.T. But the gospel concerning Jesus Christ, etc., Romans XVI, 25. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between the substantials (τὰ οὐσιαστικά), and the incidentals (τὰ περιστατικά) of the gospel. The same doctrine of the gospel concerning Christ the mediator, as to its substance, was proposed in the O.T.; but that Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Mary, is the promised Messiah, was not known until the N.T.; which is also occupied in explaining this doctrine more abundantly and illustrating it more clearly, and to this extent that mystery was hidden in ancient times, that it was not so fully handed down, nor so plainly proposed; therefore it is said to have been made known through the prophetic writings (διὰ γραφῶν προφητικῶν), with the addition, that is, of a more abundant apostolic explanation, and a more diffuse promulgation among the gentiles.

II. The joyful news about the born Christ is called the gospel, Luke II, 10; Romans I, 1.

But in the O.T. there was no joyful news about the born Christ. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between the gospel taken in a special sense, inasmuch as it is opposed to the law, and accepted in a most special sense, inasmuch as it is discerned from the promise, and denotes the proclamation concerning the exhibited Christ; Not in the latter, but in the former sense was the gospel in the O.T.

III. If the law was given through Moses, but grace and truth were made and explained through Christ; the gospel was not yet known in the times of Moses; But the prior is true. Therefore, so is the latter. The consequence of the major is evident, because the gospel is a sermon of grace, contrasted with the law. The antecedent is clear from John I, 17. Resp. Distinguish between Moses the ministerial legislator, and the prophet or doctor. Moses was not only a minister of the law, but also a Prophet, who wrote of Christ, John V, 46. For the rest, grace is considered partly with respect to the promise of Christ to be incarnated, partly with respect to the fulfillment. What grace concerning Christ, who was to assume flesh and reconcile the human race, God had promised, he fulfilled when Christ was exhibited in the flesh.

IV. If the sermon concerning the Messiah to come is called ἐπαγγελία, or a promise, but not εὐαγγέλιον, it follows that in the O.T. the fathers did not rejoice in the gospel. The antecedent is true. Therefore, so is the consequent. The antecedent is clear from Acts XIII, 32; Galatians III, 18. Resp. The distinction between ἐπαγγελία and εὐαγγέλιον in the sacred letters is frequent, but not perpetual. For Paul says in Romans X, 15: "It is written (Isaiah LII, 7): How beautiful are the feet of those who preach good news? But not all have obeyed the gospel." And in Hebrews IV, 2: "For we have had the gospel preached to us, just as they (the fathers) also did."

Objection: But the gospel is said to have been promised through the prophets, Romans I, 2. Therefore, it was not preached by them. Resp. By the name of the gospel in that passage is understood the public proclamation concerning the exhibited Messiah, which only began to be preached in the N.T., Mark I, 1-2. In the meantime, the doctrine concerning the grace of God and the remission of sins on account of the Messiah promised in the O.T. and exhibited in the N.T. is one and the same in both.

Question VI. By what means is the gospel accepted?

The gospel is accepted and retained by the faith which it kindles a), together with all the benefits which it offers b).

Obs. Faith has a twofold respect to the gospel: a) as an effect, because it is produced by the gospel; b) as an organ, by which the evangelical promise and all the good things offered by it are apprehended, so that there is a perpetual relation between the offering organ and the apprehending organ; between the promise of grace and the trusting apprehension.

Proof a. The Holy Spirit in regeneration kindles faith through the word of the gospel. For "faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of God." Whence we are said to believe through the word of the Apostles, John XVII, 20.

Proof b. From Mark I, 14-15: "Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying: 'The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand, repent and believe in the gospel.'" Penitent and contrite sinners receive with trusting assent the implanted word, which is able to save their souls, James I, 21.

Question VII. To which men is the gospel to be preached?

Subject to which. The gospel, by the intention of God, is to be preached to all men a). Specially, however, and with salutary fruit, it is applied to the penitent and believing b).

Proof a. 1) Christ commanded the Apostles to preach the gospel to every creature, Mark XVI, 15. 2) The gospel was preached to every creature under heaven, Colossians I, 23. 3) God wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth, 1 Timothy II, 4. Therefore, God wills that the medium of faith and salvation be proposed to all men.

Proof b. The special application of the gospel is made to sinners who are penitent and not maliciously resisting; for God does not pour the oil of mercy except into a contrite vessel. Whence Christ is said to have been sent to evangelize the poor, Isaiah LXI, 1, and πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται, the poor hear the gospel, Matthew XI, 5. But it is necessary that to contrition be added faith, which is, as it were, the hand receiving the good things offered in the evangelical promise. He who does not receive the gospel by faith, hears and reads it without fruit. "The word heard did not profit, not being mixed with faith in those who heard it," Hebrews IV, 2.

Question VIII. What does the gospel preach and offer to us?

Real object. The gospel preaches and offers to us the grace of God, the merit of Christ, and all the benefits obtained by him (*).

Proof 1) The author of salvation himself enunciates the compendium of the gospel, John III, 16: "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life." From which it is called the gospel of the grace of God, Acts XX, 24.

2) The gospel of God deals with the Son of God, born of the seed of David according to the flesh, Romans I, 3. It is the preaching of Jesus Christ, Romans XVI, 25. "We preach Christ crucified, a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles, but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God," 1 Corinthians I, 23-24.

(*) There are five principal parts of the Gospel, inasmuch as it is opposed to the law, and is the common doctrine of both Testaments. First; God by an eternal counsel decreed not to preclude to men, all of whom he foresaw would be guilty of sin and damnation, a return to grace and salvation, but at the same time, that his vindicating justice, no less necessary and infinite than his grace and mercy, should be fully satisfied, to send Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπον), the Reconciler of peace between God and men. Ephesians I, 4; III, 11; Acts II, 23; IV, 28. Second; It was for that Christ to make satisfaction for the sins 1) of all men, Romans V, 12, 18; 1 John II, 2, 2) for all sins, 1 John I, 7, 3) entirely, without any defect, Hebrews X, 14. Third; This satisfaction rendered by Christ God has accepted, and wills to attribute to us, as if it had been rendered by us, 2 Corinthians V, 19, 21; Romans IV, 24, 25. Fourth; Our entire trust is to be placed in this one Christ, Acts X, 43, yet in a manner convenient to the order of salvation, so that a knowledge and detestation of sins precedes, and is to be daily continued, Psalm LI, 5, 8; Mark I, 15; Luke XXIV, 47. Fifth; By this trust, as the unique medium, we obtain the remission of sins, and, if that trust is constant to the end of this life, also eternal glory, Romans X, 9, 13. See Apology of the Aug. Conf., p. 159.

3) The benefits obtained by the merit of Christ are various, which the Holy Spirit offers to us through the gospel as a most efficacious medium. For that we are called by the gospel to the church, are illuminated in it, are converted, regenerated, made sons of God, endowed with peace of conscience, are justified, united with God, renewed, sanctified, are preserved in faith, and are glorified, we have shown in the preceding section through all the chapters.

Question IX. In what does the gospel formally consist?

Form of the gospel. The gospel formally consists in a gratuitous promise a), and one ordained to blessedness, to be obtained in the kingdom of grace and glory b).

Proof a. The Apostle teaches that the evangelical promise is gratuitous, Romans III, 23-24: "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, being justified (δωρεάν) freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." The evangelical promise is called gratuitous on our part, for the reason that we have not merited the benefits offered in the gospel by our works; not on the part of Christ, who has merited them for us at the highest price of his blood and life, 1 Corinthians VI, 20; 1 Peter I, 18-19.

Proof b. Blessedness in the kingdom of grace is the remission of sins and a righteousness valid before God. The blessedness of the kingdom of glory consists in the full fruition of God and of celestial goods. To both, as to an end, the evangelical promise is divinely ordained. For which cause it is called the gospel of the kingdom of God, Mark I, 14; the gospel of our salvation, Ephesians I, 13; the word of reconciliation, 2 Corinthians V, 18; the word of eternal life, John VI, 68.

Question X. What is the end of the gospel?

End. The ultimate end of the gospel, on the part of God, is the glory of the mercy, wisdom, power, and truth of God a). The ultimate end, with respect to men, is the blessedness of glory, or eternal life b). The intermediate end is the blessedness of grace, or the remission of sins and the righteousness of faith c).

Proof a. In the gospel 1) the bowels of the mercy of God are opened, who remits sins to us for Christ's sake, and accepts us to eternal life, Luke I, 78. There is revealed in it 2) the manifold wisdom of God, by which he found a tempering of justice and mercy, by destining and sending Christ the mediator, Ephesians III, 10. There is preached in the same 3) the divine virtue and power, 1 Corinthians I, 24, because Christ most powerfully crushed the head of the infernal serpent, destroyed the works of the devil, and swallowed up death in victory. Finally, there shines forth in the gospel 4) the immutable and infallible truth of God, who, by exhibiting his son in the flesh, fulfilled the promise made to the fathers.

Proof b. "The gospel is the power unto salvation for everyone who believes," Romans I, 16. "For it pleased God through the foolishness of the proclamation to save those who believe," 1 Corinthians I, 21. The preaching of the gospel seems absurd to the unbelieving; because it teaches to seek salvation in a crucified one, life in a dead one; but to believers the preaching of the gospel is most wise and most salutary.

Proof c. "The righteousness of God is revealed in the gospel from faith to faith; As it is written: 'The just shall live by faith'," Romans I, 17. By this is understood imputed righteousness, which is through faith in Christ, Philippians III, 9. It is called the righteousness of God, because it is imputed by the most merciful God to believers in Christ for salvation, Romans IV, 6. In this consists blessedness in the kingdom of grace.

ON THE DIFFERENCE AND AGREEMENT OF THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL

Observe. The Law and the Gospel with respect to their nature (φύσεως) are distinct by a whole heaven; with respect to their practice (πράξεως) they are more conjoined than any mathematical point; and so here it is necessary ὀρθοτομεῖν, to rightly divide the word of truth, 2 Timothy II, 15.

Question XI. How do the law and the gospel differ?

The moral law and the gospel differ: a) in the mode of revelation and knowledge; b) with respect to their object; c) in the diversity of their promises; d) in the subject to which they are to be proposed; e) in the disparity of their effects.

Proof a. The law is known in a certain way from the light of nature; since it was implanted in the minds of men in the first creation, nor was it utterly extinguished by the fall, Romans II, 15: "The Gentiles show the work of the law written in their hearts"; although a fuller knowledge of it, on account of the corruption of the human intellect after the fall, must be sought from revelation, comprised in the scriptures. But the gospel is a mystery, plainly hidden from human reason, brought forth by the Son of God from the bosom of the eternal Father, and revealed to us, John I, 18; Romans XVI, 25.

Proof b. The law is the doctrine of works; for it prescribes and commands things to be done and to be fled; whence it is called the law of works, Romans III, 27. But the gospel is the doctrine of faith; for it proposes Christ the mediator, his merit, and the righteousness and salvation obtained by it to be embraced by faith; therefore it is called the law (doctrine) of faith, Romans III, 27; the hearing of faith, Galatians III, 2.

Proof c. The promises of the law are conditional and compensatory; for they promise life indeed, but under the condition of one's own, perfect, and perpetual obedience. But the evangelical promises are gratuitous; because they promise life not on account of one's own obedience, but another's, namely Christ's, apprehended by true faith. Therefore, the evangelical promises are absolutely and unconditionally, not simply, but with respect to the legal and meritorious condition, although they do not exclude the evangelical condition, or faith, which lacks all merit, and the use of the means of faith (*).

Proof d. The law is to be proposed and sharply inculcated on impious and contumacious sinners, that they may be led to contrition; the gospel is to be applied to

(*) As for what pertains to the meaning of the law and the gospel, a fourfold difference of the two is chiefly to be known and firmly held:

I. Whatever pertains to the duties of man to be performed, insofar as they are duties, all that is to be attributed to the law, which is the most perfect norm of all things, whether to be done or to be fled; although the most valid moving arguments are to be drawn from the gospel; for nothing moves and bends souls more to render obedience willingly than the perception and grateful remembrance of the highest benefits, Luke I, 74-75; John XIII, 34; 2 Corinthians VII, 1; Titus II, 11-12; 1 John III, 16; IV, 11, 19. But whatever is to be referred to the benefits of a placated God, obtained by the merits of Christ, all that is to be asserted of the Gospel (by definition).

II. Whatever ought to be referred to promises, posited on the condition of obedience to be rendered by man himself, and that perfect and perpetually continued, is proper to the law: "Do this, and you will live." Whatever, on the contrary, is of the kind of those promises which exhibit to every perfidious man, provided he repents, the grace of God reconciled to men by the vicarious obedience of Christ, to be received by true trust placed in Christ, is proper to the Gospel: "Believe, and you will be saved." Of this signal difference of legal and evangelical promises, a most clear testimony exists in Romans X, 5 ff.

III. Whatever pertains to reproving and knowing sins, insofar as they are sins, is of the law, Romans III, 20. And indeed the matter itself speaks. For since the law is the most perfect norm of all duties, it follows that the same is also the norm of knowing the neglect of all duties. Every ἀμαρτία is ἀνομία, 1 John III, 4.

Scholion: The nature of sin, insofar as it is sin, is to be distinguished from the Object, either in which or against which one sins. This distinction being observed, the response to this opposition of the Antinomians will be easy: whether the gospel does not reprove ἀπιστίαν, and that indeed ἐξοχικῶς, if one does not trust in Christ? I indeed interpret that passage, John XVI, 9, not of sin itself, but of the cause of all sins: "concerning sin, because they do not believe in me," therefore they cannot be freed from sin. See the opposite, 2 Peter I, 5: ἐπιχορηγήσατε ἐν τῇ πίστει ὑμῶν τὴν ἀρετὴν. But whatever pertains to the remission and liberation from sins is of the gospel, Luke XXIV, 47; Acts X, 43; add Romans V, 1.

IV. Whatever pertains to threats and punishments denounced and inflicted upon man is of the law, Romans IV, 15; Galatians III, 10. But whatever pertains to grace and salvation, to be imparted to a man guilty of damnation on account of Christ, is of the gospel, Acts XX, 24; Romans I, 16.

Scholion: The suffering of evils which Christ endured for us is to be considered in a diverse manner: In one way indeed in itself, inasmuch as it was a vicarious punishment; and this must be referred entirely to the law: But in another way, as much as to the end and use, that it might be a medium of recovering grace and salvation, by which we might be freed from all punishment; and in this way it pertains entirely to the gospel.

the contrite, that they may conceive faith in Christ.

Proof e. The law accuses delinquents of disobedience, convicts, condemns, terrifies, as Paul testifies, Romans III, 20; ch. IV, 15; 2 Corinthians III, 7; but the gospel shows the mediator, consoles, absolves, vivifies, as the angel testifies, Luke II, 10; and Christ, Luke IV, 18; and Paul, 2 Corinthians III, 6.

Question XII. How do the law and the gospel agree?

The law and the gospel agree a) in their author, b) in the universality of their subject, c) in their end intended per se, d) in their duration.

Proof a. God is the author of the law no less than of the gospel.

Proof b. Just as the law obligates all men without exception to obedience, or this failing, to punishment; so the gospel proposes to all men the satisfaction and merit of Christ, to be apprehended by faith, to obtain remission and eternal life, 1 Timothy II, 5-6.

Proof c. The end of the law and the gospel, intended per se, is eternal life. The law promises eternal life under the condition of perfect obedience, Leviticus XVIII, 5; Ezekiel XX, 11; Luke X, 25, 28; Romans X, 5. The gospel promises eternal life under the condition of faith, apprehending the satisfactory obedience of Christ, Romans X, 9-10. The accidental event of the law is death. "The commandment, which was to me for life, the same became death," Romans VII, 10. By a like reason, the gospel to some is an odor of death unto death, 2 Corinthians II, 16.

Proof d. The moral law is a perpetual norm of things to be done and fled, never abrogated nor to be abrogated. And that the gospel is to be preached in the church until the end of the world is expressly said in Matthew XXVIII, 20.

Question XIII. Are the law and the gospel conjoined in practice?

The law and the gospel in practice are more conjoined than any mathematical point. For they flow together for the repentance of the sinner a), for the renewal of the justified man b), for the preservation of the renewed man in the perseverance of faith and piety c).

Proof a. Repentance consists of two parts, contrition and faith, and is therefore an ἀποτέλεσμα, or a common effect of converting and regenerating grace. The law in converting a man does what is its own, by exciting or working contrition. The gospel in regenerating a man also does what is its own, by kindling faith in Christ. Therefore, repentance results as an ἀποτέλεσμα from the confluence of the law and the gospel.

Proof b. In sanctifying a man, the law is at hand as a normative principle, or as a rule of holy life; for it prescribes and teaches what is to be done and what is to be omitted, and obligates to obedience; but it does not confer new powers for a spiritual and holy life. Therefore, the gospel comes to the rescue, as a productive principle, which supplies the faculty and powers to a man for walking rightly in the ways of the Lord. Wherefore, the law and the gospel concur for one holy action in the business of renewal.

Proof c. The law by its threats moves the renewed man to suppress the desires of the flesh more strongly, lest being overcome by the flesh he should fall into mortal sin and fall from faith. The gospel, by now and then conferring new powers, confirms and increases faith, so that the renewed man may persevere in faith and holiness. Add that the gospel alone demonstrates the difference between mortal and venial sin, in the judgment of D. CHEMNITZ, part II, loc. fol. 225. The law prohibits both, so that the renewed man, acknowledging his imperfection, may continue in daily repentance. The gospel raises up his soul, wavering with the sense of imperfect obedience and sin, by teaching that there is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, Romans VIII, 1.

Question XIV. Are all evangelical promises suspended on the condition of faith?

Certain evangelical promises, namely concerning the remission of sins and the bestowal of eternal life, are suspended on the condition of faith a). But there are other evangelical promises which were not made under the hypothesis of faith, but some respect and promise acts of grace which by divine ordination terminate in the excitation of faith b).

Proof a. "If you confess with your mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, it will come to pass that you will be saved," Romans X, 9. The evangelical promise is suspended on the condition of faith, not as of a work and merit, but as of a receiving medium (ἀντιληπτικοῦ), or a receptive organ, by which the salvation obtained by the merit of Christ is accepted.

Proof b. Vocation to the church, illumination, conversion, regeneration are acts of applying grace, which do not presuppose the condition of faith, but which precede faith in the order of nature, not of time, and are directed and terminate by divine order (ἐκ τῶν ὀφειλόμενων) in its generation. Conf. D. CALOV in synopsis controversiarum, p. 625.

Question XV. Are the evangelical promises suspended on the condition of works, or the perfect observance of the divine commandments?

The evangelical promises of obtaining the blessedness of grace and glory are not suspended on the condition of works.

Proof 1) The gospel is a sermon of grace, Acts XX, 24. But grace is opposed to good works. For Paul expressly writes, Romans XI, 6: "If by grace, then it is no longer of works; if by works, then it is no longer grace; otherwise work is no longer work." Therefore, the evangelical promises are gratuitous.

2) The moral law is the law of works; but the gospel is the law (doctrine) of faith, Romans III, 27. Therefore, the sum of the moral law is: "Do!" Galatians III, 12. But the sum of the gospel is: "Believe in Christ!" Acts XVI, 31.

3) "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be according to grace, so that the promise might be sure to all the seed," Romans IV, 16. If the evangelical promise had been made under the condition of works, it would not be sure, on our part; because we would always have to doubt whether our works are so pure, holy, and perfect that by them righteousness and salvation can befall us.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who assert that the evangelical promises require the condition of works. Their arguments are:

I. Christ says to the lawyer aspiring to eternal life: "Do this, and you will live!" Luke X, 28. Therefore, Christ in his gospel requires the condition of works from a man who is to obtain eternal life. Resp. The question of the lawyer was legal, proposed in these words: "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" But as the question was, so was the response. Hence Christ says: "You shall love the Lord your God, etc."

Objection: The response of Christ exists in the gospel; Therefore, it is evangelical.

Resp. The gospel is here taken in a special sense, as it is opposed to the law.

II. The gospel requires faith; Therefore, also good works. The reason for the consequence is; because faith is the mother of good actions. Resp. We readily grant that faith begets good works in the justified; but the question is whether the remission of sins and eternal life is promised under the condition of good works, which we deny. Good works pertain to the renewal of man, not to justification or beatification; And the norm of good works is the law, not the gospel.

III. Whatever is promised under the condition of the mortification of the flesh is promised under the condition of a good work; But eternal life, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the mortification of the flesh is a good work, commanded by the ninth precept of the decalogue. The minor is proved from Romans VIII, 13: "If by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live." Resp. Distinguish between the condition of the subject to whom the possession of eternal life befalls, and the condition of the thing under which eternal life is promised. The mortification of the flesh is a condition of the subject, preceding eternal life with a precedence of order, not of causality; since it is neither a medium of salvation nor a meritorious cause of eternal life.

ON THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS

Obs. Since the solemn promulgation of the law pertains properly to the old testament, but the solemn promulgation of the gospel pertains to the new, therefore, the differences between the law and the gospel having been explained, we will subjoin the distinction between the O. and N.T.

Question XVI. What is a divine testament?

A testament is a disposition of the most free will of God concerning divine worship, the means of salvation, and the form of government in the church, confirmed by the death and blood either of a typical beast or of the testator himself, to the praise of grace and divine justice and the salvation of men.

Obs. I. A testament is called by the Hebrews בְּרִית, which word in general signifies a covenant or pact sanctioned between two or more. It is derived from the root בָּרַח, he chose; because in a covenant are chosen both the persons between whom, and the things and conditions on account of which the covenant is entered into. This Hebrew name was expressed by AQUILA of Pontus, SYMMACHUS, and THEODOTION by συνθήκη, i.e., a covenant or pact; but the LXX interpreters, and the writers of the new testament following them, everywhere rendered it by διαθήκη, which name denotes a disposition, both federal and testamentary, or similar both to a covenant and to the disposition of a last will.

Obs. II. Pact, covenant, and testament are used by some in this sacred matter as equivalent terms; yet they differ in certain respects. For a pact is the consent of two or more concerning some matter, either to be given or to be done, conceived in express words; a covenant, as SUIDAS defines it, is a mutual obligation by which the contracting parties agree on certain conditions to be mutually performed, e.g., concerning an alliance, commerce, a truce, etc.; a testament is the legitimate disposition of a testator, by which, being about to die, he dispenses his goods among his heirs. Therefore, a covenant differs from a testament: 1) In a covenant the consent of each party is required; but in establishing a testament the consent of each party is not necessary. 2) From a covenant certain advantages accrue to each party; in a testament, to the heir. 3) A covenant is valid between the living; if one party dies, it is extinguished; but a testament is confirmed by the death of the testator. 4) A confirmed covenant one party cannot make void against the will of the other; but a testator, as long as he lives, can change and correct his testament. 5) In a covenant a mediator is required, not in a testament.

Obs. III. In the divine disposition concerning the dispensation of the means of salvation, and the divine worship and governance of the church, a certain tempering of a covenant and a testament properly so called is found, so that it can be called by the composite word testament-covenant or federal testament, or testamentary covenant. For it is a testament on account of the most ample legacies of good things, and the necessity of an intervening death; which two things are not necessarily required in a covenant. One of the covenanters does not transcribe or destine all his goods to the other, nor does he devote himself to death for the same. But from a covenant, the sanction of our mediator has a certain immutability and personal obligation.

Obs. IV. In the present context, our speech is not about the most ancient legal covenant which God entered into with Adam in his integrity, and from man demanded the most perfect observance of the divine law, both natural and positive, and liberally promised him eternal life as a reward, with the added threat of punishment if he should transgress the law, Genesis II, 16-17; nor about the covenant of grace, sanctioned with the fathers after the fall, by which God promised his grace, the remission of sins, and eternal life to all who believe in the Messiah, and demanded from them the obedience of constant faith; which promise of grace made to Abraham, the father of believers, comes under the name of a διαθήκη, or testament, Galatians III, 17; nor about the external sign, or instrument, or testimony of the tablets of the testament; in which way the sign of circumcision is called a testament, Acts VII, 8, and the federal tablets, or the prophetic books, come under the name of a testament, 2 Corinthians III, 6, 14; but they are called a divine testament in a broad sense (ὡς ἐν πλάτει), metonymically and improperly. But we must accurately consider what is denoted by the name of testament when the old and new testaments, accepted in their proper sense, are opposed to each other and are distinguished from each other.

Question XVII. How many divine testaments are there?

There are two divine testaments, the old and the new.

Proof 1) From Jeremiah XXXI, 31-34: "Behold, the days are coming, says Jehovah, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah, not like the covenant that I made with their fathers on the day when I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; because they made my covenant void; therefore I was a master over them, says Jehovah; but this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says Jehovah: I will put my law in their inward parts and write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. And no longer shall each man teach his neighbor and each man his brother, saying: 'Know Jehovah!' for they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, says Jehovah: For I will be merciful to their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." Obs. The prophet speaks 1) of the days of the Messiah to come; 2) of the evangelical covenant, which is of a different kind from that old legal pact. For the evangelical pact is a covenant of grace and faith; The legal pact is a covenant of justice and works. The covenant of grace is called by the Apostle the new testament; The covenant of justice and works is called the old testament, Hebrews VIII, 8. The new testament was indeed instituted after the fall in paradise, as to its promises and its salutary applicability to men through faith in the promise; but it was consummated and solemnly promulgated when Christ was exhibited in the flesh. But the old testament, or legal pact, was instituted before the fall with man in his integrity, and was solemnly promulgated on mount Sinai. 3) God made a new testament with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah not exclusively, as if it pertained only to those houses, but inchoatively, because it was to be revealed and preached in the first place to the houses of Israel and Judah, and then to be transferred to other peoples. 4) The old covenant, or testament, was made with the fathers of the Israelites from mount Sinai not exclusively, as if it had been made with no man before; but confirmatively, because, having been given to all men from the beginning of the world, it was confirmed anew to the fathers of the Israelites and solemnly promulgated. 5) By the law which God was to write in the hearts of men is denoted the saving doctrine, or the law of faith, Romans III, 27, which is the gospel; since under the new testament the moral law is not to be observed that it may justify, but that it may teach new obedience, as a fruit of faith and a document of gratitude. It is therefore easy to see what it is to inscribe on the heart and to put in the mind; namely, to illuminate the heart and soul by the Holy Spirit to a true knowledge of the faith, and to renew it to a new obedience, to mortify the old man, and to excite the new. 6) The doctrine of the old testament is legal, outside of Christ; the doctrine of the new testament is evangelical, in Christ. For the doctors of the law always urged a perfect knowledge of God and the worship proceeding from that knowledge; which because no man after the fall can render, the law threatened, cursed, and condemned all who were under it. For the perpetual voice of the law is: "Know God, do this and you will live! Cursed is everyone who does not do all things!" Which legal knowledge of God is not urged under the new testament; yet the evangelical knowledge of faith is to be taught, which is not impossible, but falls to all men through its own means, so that not only the great are capable of it, but also the small, indeed infants, inasmuch as they are not incapable of faith, Matthew XVIII, 6. 7) The doctrine of the remission of sins is proper to the new testament; by virtue of which God is propitious to iniquity, by pardoning it, and forgets sin, by not vindicating it. Confer. D. SEBASTIAN SCHMID, in his commentary on Hebrews VIII, 10, 11, 12, pp. 856 ff. (*).

(*) In the doctrine concerning the divine covenants and testaments, the greater care is to be employed, the more serious are the controversies which we have concerning this cause partly with the Reformed, partly with the Roman Catholics, partly with the Socinians.

I. This indeed no one denies, 1) that a covenant sanctioned by God, as being worthy of God, cannot but be entirely singular, nor at all to be compared with all those things which are required for covenants entered into by men, especially these: α) equality of the parties, β) mutual and most free will on both sides, not only without any coercion, but also without any obligation by which one is already bound to the other, γ) mutual utility, of which kind certainly none falls to God, who needs no one, δ) mutual and equal obligation, so that one can call the other to justice, and this one in turn that one, if he should not wish to keep the pact. But this is also confessed; 2) that those things cannot but be present which necessarily pertain to the nature of a covenant, whatever it may be, and they are stipulation and re-stipulation.

II. There are entirely two covenants which God has made with the entire human race, of which one is the legal covenant, or, as it is otherwise accustomed to be called, the covenant of works; the other, however, the evangelical covenant, or, what is the same thing, the covenant of grace. The name of grace, in this argument, is used in that signification in which it is opposed 1) to the natural corruption of man and the wrath of God, 2) to the dignity of works, Ephesians II, 1, 3, & 4, 8, 9. Concerning the covenant of works, therefore,

Deuteronomy VII, 9, 12; Hosea VI, 7. Concerning the covenant of grace, these sayings are to be understood, Genesis XVII, 7, coll. with Romans IX, 5-8; Galatians III, 14; Isaiah LIV, 10; LV, 3; Malachi III, 1; Luke I, 72, 74.

III. The covenant of works was without delay made void, as soon as the common parents of men broke and thus weakened it by their perfidy. Romans VIII, 3, so that from that time no mortal could be just before God by the sentence of the law. Galatians III, 21. Therefore, the covenant of grace immediately succeeded in its place, declared in the first news of Genesis III, 15. This we defend with the highest zeal against the Socinians.

Consectary: The giving and promulgation of the laws, especially that most solemn one on Mount Sinai, was made by no means for the renewal of the covenant of works, but entirely for its perpetual remembrance, Hebrews X, 3, on account of the use of the law, both epanorthotic-pedagogical, by which everyone, being guilty of sin, might be led to implore grace, and didactic, by which a man who is a partaker of grace might act conformably to the prescribed norms, yet always feeling that he still labors under many defects, and is never not in need of grace.

IV. The agreement and the difference of both covenants must be accurately known. Namely,

α) they agree in a certain way, with respect to 1) the parties; for in both are God and all men, with not one excepted (which the Reformed state much differently, in whose opinion the covenant of works indeed pertains to all and each man, but the covenant of grace to a few elect); 2) the foundation, which in both is the eternal counsel and decree of God; 3) the nature, since indeed in both there is a certain stipulation and re-stipulation; 4) the End; for both look to the glory of God, and the salvation of men, not only temporal, but also eternal.

β) These two covenants differ among themselves 1) with respect to the parties, considered in different ways. For God in the covenant of works, or legal covenant, is to be considered only as benign, as well as just and immutable; but in the evangelical, or covenant of grace, also as violated, angry, yet having pitied men, and prepared for reconciliation. Then, as for what pertains to men, all are to be considered, in the legal covenant indeed, as innocent, of integral life, and instructed with sufficient powers for rendering an entirely perfect and perpetual obedience to the law; but in the evangelical, α) as perfidious, and for that cause guilty of damnation; β) as those of whom, all and each, God has pitied; γ) as those for whom the eternal Son of God has sponsored, that he, in their name, would fully satisfy vindicating divine justice; δ) as those to whom, to each and every one, the vicarious satisfaction of Christ and the recovered salvation, as well as the saving trust by which each would receive it, is to be seriously offered; ε) as those of whose number some indeed, on account of a foreseen obstinacy of mind by God, that they would always be about to be unbelievers, or perfidy and inconstancy, that they would be at last at the end of this life temporary, have been adjudged to eternal damnation, already merited by their sins, but others, through a foreseen by God true and constant trust of theirs in Christ, are to be led to eternal blessedness.

The Reformed dissent much from us here, since 1) concerning the number of men they falsely persuade themselves that all, except the elect, are entirely excluded from the covenant of grace, 2) they invert the order of things, thinking that the decree concerning the election of a certain few is prior to that concerning Christ the sponsor, who would make satisfaction for the fault and punishment of men. Our theologians have rightly understood that a by far most valid argumentation, for a common and equally prepared saving grace for all, is to be made from the comparison of the covenant of works and the covenant of grace, namely that the latter cannot be of a lesser condition than we know the former to have been. PAUL certainly has gravely taught us that the covenant of grace, as far as it pertains to sinning men, extends as widely as the legal covenant, Romans V, 12, 18, and, as far as sins committed by men are concerned, much more widely, ibid. vv. 15, 16, 20.

They differ among themselves, 2) with respect to the foundation. This indeed in the covenant of works is the eternal decree of God, entirely congruent with his benignity, holiness, and remunerating justice, and the state of integrity of men. But in the covenant of grace it is α) the eternal decree of God, not only consonant with holiness and vindicating justice, so that a necessary satisfaction was required, to be rendered for all the fault and punishment of all men, but also agreeable to mercy, by which God regarded the misery of men, and their extreme lack of powers, and willed to accept the vicarious satisfaction of Christ the sponsor, as if it were ours: β) the eternal pact of the Father with the Son. Of this pact classic passages exist, Psalm II, 6-8; XXII, 26-28; XL, 8, 9, add Hebrews X, 5 ff.; John XVII, 4, 5, 19. It consists I) of the stipulation and sponsorship of the Son, in which are contained these three things: α) That he wills to receive upon himself the fault and all the punishment of all and each man, Psalm XL, 8, 9; John XVII, 19. β) That he will therefore render a vicarious satisfaction in full, Isaiah LIII, 12. γ) That he will also reconcile all men, alienated from God, to God, by procuring a return of souls from sins to God, and the application of the rendered satisfaction, by offering it equally to all, and by imparting it to the obedient, Isaiah LIII, 11; Psalm XXII, 23, 28; Luke XXIV, 47. II) From the re-stipulation of the Father, who promised: α) That he wills to accept this sponsorship of the Son entirely, and to ratify all things rendered by him, indeed still to be rendered, as if they were already rendered, Isaiah LIII, 6. β) That he will adorn his Son, the satisfaction having been rendered, not for himself, but for us and our salvation, with the highest glory, Psalm VIII, 6, coll. with Hebrews II, 7, 8, 9, 10; Isaiah LIII, 10, 11. γ) That he will give to the Son the most perfect power of leading all who are obedient to him to salvation, but of excluding the obstinate contemners of grace from the possession of salvation; Psalm II, 8-12; Isaiah LIII, 10, 11; John XVII, 2.

They differ 3) in their nature: For the stipulation and re-stipulation is one thing in the legal covenant, namely this: "Do this, and you will live!"; but another in the evangelical covenant, of which indeed the sum is this: "Believe and you will be saved!" Romans X, 4 ff. And this opinion is opposed to the Roman Catholics and others, who do not hesitate to mix the good works of man, and what to them indeed seem good, into the covenant of grace.

V. Great caution is needed, lest anyone should think that the covenant of works, or the legal covenant, and the Old Testament are one and the same way. The Socinians always confound these two, which are to be accurately discerned, and few are ignorant of the false principles of this error. I will explain the force and reason of this distinction as briefly as I can. 1) In the covenant of works there was no one, nor could there be one, who would make a testament, no death of his by which he himself would confirm it, no inheritance to be expected after his death. Christ would never have come if men had never sinned, he himself would never have met death for the liberation of men if men had never had to undergo the punishment of death. 2) The covenant of works utterly ceased to have its force for effecting the salvation of man as soon as the perfidious man by his own fault made it void, Romans VIII, 3, add Galatians III, 21, 22. The efficacy of the covenant of grace, on the contrary, existed continuously after the first defection of man from the law, the proto-gospel having been perceived. (Prop. III. Consect.). Therefore, the covenant of grace was no less valid before Christ was born and died than after his nativity and death. 3) The covenant of grace is called a testament for this reason chiefly, because it was confirmed by the death of Christ, Hebrews IX, 15, 16, which death of Christ from the time that the proto-gospel had been heard was signified by the death and blood of propitiatory victims, as by a type. 4) The Old Testament therefore is the covenant of grace itself, and differs from the new testament in no other way than by reason of a diverse economy (οικονομία), since indeed in the O.T. the saving grace of God was conferred on men on account of Christ still to come, and announced by the shadow of many types, and especially by the very death and blood of beasts; today in the N.T. the same grace is attributed to us through the same Christ, who died for us, all types having been abrogated. Therefore, the antitypical grace of the N.T. is said to have succeeded in the place of the typical grace of the O. Testament. John I, 16, 17. 5) The ritual law of the O.T., insofar indeed as it was a law, was valid for the remembrance of the covenant of works, ἀνάμνησιν ἁμαρτιῶν, Hebrews X, 3, but by no means for its renewal (Prop. III. Consect.); but insofar as it was ritual and typical, a harbinger of the coming Christ, it was entirely to be referred to the Gospel and the covenant of grace. Thus the meaning of the words, Hebrews VIII, 8 ff., coll. with IX, 15, 18, 22; X, 6-9, will be easily perceived. I thought it was my part to note these things, since the Blessed Author, whose merits I indeed venerate, seemed to me in this place not to have expounded with sufficient distinction concerning the one covenant of works, the other of grace, and likewise concerning the old and new testament.

2) From Galatians IV, 21-26: "Tell me, you who want to be under the law; (Have you not heard the law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by a slave woman and the other by a free woman. But he who was of the slave woman was born according to the flesh, but he of the free woman was through promise. Which things contain an allegory, for these are the two testaments; one indeed from Mount Sinai, which begets to slavery, which is Hagar. For Hagar is Mount Sinai in Arabia; but it adumbrates the Jerusalem that now is; for she is in slavery with her children; But the Jerusalem that is above is free, she who is the mother of us all." Paul expresses in these words two testaments, and says they were prefigured in the wives of Abraham. The old in Hagar, the new in Sarah. Hagar is a slave; so the O.T. is a law of slavery. Sarah is free; so the N.T. is a promise of liberty. Hagar generates according to the flesh; so the O.T. has those subject to it liable by a certain obligation of nature. Sarah generates according to the promise; so the N.T. regenerates by the evangelical promise. That which was signified by Hagar is Sinai, a mountain in Arabia, not inasmuch as it is a natural mountain, but inasmuch as that mountain is the place of the giving of the law, and it adumbrates the Jerusalem that now is, i.e., the legal Jewish people, desiring to be justified by the law, whose metropolis is Jerusalem. On the other hand, the seat of the new testament is the Jerusalem above and free. It is "above" because it has its origin from heaven and savors τὰ ἄνω, Colossians III, 2. It is "free" because it is immune from servitude and malediction. Therefore, the new testament is an evangelical pact, promising celestial goods and liberty from the guilt and dominion of sin.

Question XVIII. What is the old testament?

The old testament is a solemn disposition of the most free divine will, by which God, with the intervening ministry of Moses, gave to the Israelite people, led out of Egypt, on Mount Sinai his law concerning divine worship and the governance of the church and polity of Judea, and promised to all who perfectly keep the given law goods both corporal and temporal, and spiritual and eternal, but threatened transgressors of the law with temporal and eternal punishments, and willed this federal disposition to be confirmed by the sacraments of circumcision and the paschal lamb and by the typical blood of animals, so that divine justice might be manifested through the law, and the Israelites, convicted of their sins, might be compelled to Christ the mediator.

Obs. I. We consider here the old, or legal, testament not according to its first institution, made in paradise before the fall with man in integrity (where its foundation was laid, as DANNHAVER says in hodosophia phenomenon VI, p. 492), but according to its solemn promulgation, made on Mount Sinai.

Obs. II. Ecclesiastical writers by the old testament understand a) the covenant of grace, which God after the fall made with the fathers, in which he promised that he would receive sinners freely and save them, through and on account of the merit of the Messiah to come, but under the condition of persevering faith, to be fixed on the Messiah to come. For that there was some covenant older than the Sinaitic is clearly taught by Paul, Galatians III, 17. But when the old testament is contrasted with the new, the former is said to have been sanctioned after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, Jeremiah XXXI, 32, on Mount Sinai, Galatians IV, 24. b) The state of the church from the beginning of the world until the advent of the Messiah. In which sense the patriarchs, Moses, and the prophets are said to have lived in the old testament. c) The writings of Moses and the prophets, comprising the history of the church from the creation of the world until the birth of Christ. See 2 Corinthians III, 14. d) In a most special sense, it denotes the legal pact made on Mount Sinai between God and the people, with the intervening ministry of Moses, entered into with great solemnity and majesty.

Question XIX. What is the new testament?

The new testament is a solemn disposition of the most free divine will concerning the Christian religion and the governance of the church, confirmed by the blood and death of Christ the mediator, by which God calls all men through the gospel and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper to the church, and seriously intends to illuminate, regenerate, justify, renew, and glorify them, so that they may be through faith in Christ sons of God, heirs of eternal life, and may celebrate the grace of God with perpetual praises.

Obs. I. We consider here the new testament, or the gospel, not according to its first institution made in paradise after the fall with the first parents, where its foundation was laid, and repeated to Abraham, but according to its solemn promulgation made in Zion, or Jerusalem, Isaiah II, 3; Luke XXIV, 47. The new testament was consummated by the exhibition of Christ.

Obs. II. The name of the new testament is taken 1) for the doctrine comprised in the writings of the Evangelists and Apostles; 2) For the whole state of the church, from the nativity of the Savior until the very end of the world; 3) For the gracious pact of the remission of sins, of righteousness, and of eternal life in Christ; which indeed God entered into with the first parents after the fall and with the fathers, but was at length dedicated and confirmed by the death of the only-begotten Son exhibited in the flesh; In which sense it is here accepted by us. The words of our CHEMNITZ in his loci theologici, part III, fol. 70, deserve to be noted here: "The doctrine of the law, inasmuch as it is a ministry of death and damnation, wherever it is found in scripture, pertains to the old testament. And the doctrine of the righteousness of faith in Christ, wherever it exists in scripture, pertains to the new testament. Unless the new testament had been known to the fathers, whence, I ask, would Abraham and the rest of the faithful have had the Spirit and life? Since only the new testament is a ministration of the Spirit and of life."

Question XX. Do the old and new testament agree in certain predicates?

The old and new testament agree in certain general predicates.

Proof. The Old and N.T. agree 1) In genus, or common concept; For both are a federal testament and a testamentary covenant, or a disposition of the will of God concerning divine worship and testamentary goods.

2) In author, who is the Triune God, and in a peculiar reason the Son of God, by whom both testaments were established.

3) In testamentary goods; For in both testaments are promised goods both temporal and eternal.

4) In dedication and confirmation. For both testaments were dedicated and confirmed by blood. "For not even the first testament was dedicated without blood," says the Apostle in Hebrews IX, 18. Both also have their seals, or sacraments.

5) In publication. Both the old and the new testament after their first institution were solemnly promulgated in the fullness of time.

6) In the direction and preservation of order in the church. For both testaments were sanctioned by the most wise God with this end and counsel, that the people of God might not wander by their own will, and stray in any mere disorder (ἀταξία), or confusion, but might be contained within a certain form of polity distinct from all other peoples.

Question XXI. How do the old and new testament differ?

The old and new testament differ: a) in specific form; b) in mediator; c) in the substance of their confirmation; d) in sacraments; e) in the goods promised in each testament; f) in the condition under which they are promised; g) in constitutions and ceremonies; h) in effects; i) in the circumstances of mode, place, latitude, time.

Proof. The old testament is entirely legal, comprising the moral, ceremonial, and forensic law; The new testament is the gospel. The former is the testament of justice and works; because it exhibits the image of justice and holiness which is in God, and urges the pursuit of good works under the threat of temporal and eternal punishment. This is the testament of grace and faith. The former demands a debt; this one remits the debt on account of the merit of Christ apprehended by true faith, Jeremiah 31:31 ff. The decree of the former is: "Do this, and you will live!" Luke 10:28; Galatians 3:12. The decree of the latter is: "Believe, and you will live!" Romans 10:9; Acts 16:31. Whence all who have been saved (even under the state of the Old Testament, in which the moral, ceremonial, and forensic law of Moses was still in force) were saved in no other way than through the grace of Jesus Christ (and therefore by the power of the gospel and the new testament), Acts 15:11. Cf. HULSEMANN. brev. cap. VIII. p. 493.

Proof b. The mediator of the New Testament is Christ, Hebrews 9:15. The messenger and interpreter of the Old Testament was Moses, who is indeed nowhere called a mediator, but a servant of the Lord, Numbers 12:7; Hebrews 3:5. Yet he received the tablets of the covenant from God, and brought them down to the people, and sprinkled the book of the covenant with sacrificial blood, Exodus 24:7. From which he is called by some authors a legal, typical mediator, on account of his office of interpreting; Christ, however, is the evangelical, true, and propitiatory (ἱλαστικός) mediator, on account of the benefit of satisfying. For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Christ, John 1:17, where John opposes grace to the moral law, truth to the ceremonial law which consists of types, and the master to the servant. For the law was given through Moses the servant, but grace was made, i.e., meritoriously acquired, through Christ, the true mediator.

Proof c. The Old Testament was sanctioned by the blood of beasts and it was typical, Exodus 24:8; Hebrews 9:20. But the New Testament was confirmed by the blood of the Son of God, Matthew 26:28. Whence the blood of beasts pertains to the substance of the O.T., but the blood of the Son of God to the substance of the N.T.

Proof d. The sacraments of the O.T. are circumcision and the Passover, or the paschal lamb; the sacraments of the N.T. are baptism and the Lord's supper.

Proof e. The Old Testament had special promises concerning the glorious occupation and happy possession of the land of Canaan, and the preservation of the Judaic polity until the advent of the Messiah. It also had promises of eternal spiritual goods, but less clear and for the most part covered by the shadows and figures of types. The New Testament contains clear promises of spiritual goods, but promises corporal goods generally with the exception of the cross.

Proof f. In the legal covenant God promised his people temporal and eternal, corporal and spiritual goods, under the condition of their own perfect obedience, Exodus 19:5, and the people promised obedience, Exodus 24:3, 7. But in the evangelical covenant God promised us the gratuitous remission of sins, righteousness, and eternal life, in view of faith apprehending the satisfaction and merit of Christ, Jeremiah 31:31; Hebrews 8:8; Romans 3:24.

Proof g. The Old Testament consisted of a huge multitude of constitutions, rites, and ceremonies, joined with infinite troubles. But the New Testament has rites very few in number, very easy to perform, most august in understanding, restricted to baptism and the eucharist. Whence Augustine, against Adimantus, chapter 16, writes: "In the old testament were the burdens of slaves, but in the new is the glory of the free."

Proof h. The effects of the O. and N.T. are plainly diverse and opposite. The O.T., insofar as it denotes the legal pact, urges the pursuit of good works, but does not confer the strength to perform good works. But the N.T. inscribes faith in the hearts of the faithful, and gives the strength by which they do not indeed perfectly fulfill the moral law, but by which, being instructed, they serve God with a sincere heart, and walk more and more worthily of the gospel, Philippians 1:27. The O.T. demonstrates sins, Romans 7:7. The N.T. offers the pardon of sins, Jeremiah 31:34. The O.T. works wrath, Romans 4:15, curses, Deuteronomy 27:26, kills, 2 Corinthians 3:6. The N.T. promises grace, Hebrews 8:8, blesses, Galatians 3:14, gives life, 2 Corinthians 3:6. Whence from the new, but not from the old testament, is gratuitous justification. For if a law had been given that could give life, then righteousness would indeed be by the law, Galatians 3:21. Yet this inability to justify is not absolute and simple; for the law is in itself good and holy, Romans 7:12; 1 Timothy 1:8, and could have justified man in the state of integrity; but it is respective and accidental, by reason of our flesh, which weakens the law of God, however holy and good in itself, and is unable to fulfill the condition of the law, i.e., to render perfect obedience to the law, Romans 7:14; c. 8:3.

Proof i. The Old and New Testaments differ in their mode of promulgation. The former was published amidst thunder, Exodus 19:16. The latter was promulgated with a gentle address, Matthew 28:19. The former was promulgated on Mount Sinai; The latter went forth from Mount Zion, Isaiah 2:3. The former was entered into with the Israelites; The latter offers the grace of God to all men, Mark 16:15. The former was promulgated after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt; The latter was consummated when Christ was exhibited. The former was to be abrogated with the Judaic polity, Hebrews 7:18; c. 8:13. The latter will stand firm until the consummation of the age, 1 Corinthians 15:2.

Proof k. The Old and New Testaments differ in dignity and preeminence. For the Old Testament has a shadow of the good things to come; but the New Testament exhibits to us the very body or fulfillment in the exhibited Christ, Hebrews 10:1. Wherefore from all the enumerated differences we gather the prerogative of the New Testament; Inasmuch as a causal means of salvation is more excellent than a pedagogical means, Christ than Moses, the blood of the mediator than the blood of a beast, a clear and gratuitous promise than a less clear and conditional one, freedom than servitude, a ministry of life than a ministry of death, a universal and eternal covenant than a particular and temporary one, the body than the shadow, so much more excellent is the New Testament than the Old Testament.

Question XXII. Did God in the Old Testament promise spiritual and eternal goods?

God in the Old Testament did indeed promise spiritual and eternal goods, but under the condition of perfect obedience.

Observation I. By the Old Testament we understand the legal covenant entered into by God with the Israelites; for in the phraseology of scripture this is properly called the Old Testament, and is diametrically opposed to the New Testament, Jeremiah 31:31 seq.; Hebrews 8:8; Galatians 4:24; 2 Corinthians 3:6.

Observation II. The covenant of grace, which God from the time of the first fall established with Adam, Abraham, and the rest of the fathers, is indeed sometimes called the Old Testament by ecclesiastical writers, from Galatians 3:17, but accurately speaking it pertains to the New Testament. A distinction must be made, however, between the New Testament begun and the New Testament consummated. By promising the Messiah the redeemer to fallen men, God began the N.T.; but by sending His son in the flesh, He consummated it; by the power of the covenant of grace (which is also called the gospel). That the fathers before Christ were justified and saved, we have shown above, question V; in the present, our discourse is concerning the Old Testament properly so called, or the legal covenant.

Proof. 1) From Leviticus 18:5: "You shall therefore keep my statutes and my rules; if a person does them, he shall live by them; I am the LORD." Cf. Ezekiel 20:11. That this legal promise refers not only to temporal life, but also to eternal, is clear a) from the indubitable interpretation of Christ, Matthew 19:17; Luke 10:28. b) From the apostolic declaration, Romans 10:5: "For Moses writes about the righteousness that is based on the law, that the person who does the commandments shall live by them." Cf. Galatians 3:12, where the Apostle, from the opposition of the evangelical and legal promise, teaches that eternal life was also promised in the law, but under the condition of fulfilling the law.

2. From Leviticus 26:3, 11, 12: "If you walk in my statutes and observe my commandments and do them... I will make my dwelling among you, and my soul shall not abhor you. And I will walk among you and will be your God, and you shall be my people." That this legal promise is to be understood of spiritual goods, Paul teaches in 2 Corinthians 6:16.

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists and Socinians, who maintain that in the O.T. only corporal and temporal goods were promised, but not spiritual and eternal ones. Their more important arguments are:

I. If celestial goods had been promised to sinful men in the Old Testament, the Apostle would not say that the New Testament is more excellent, and that it has more excellent promises, Hebrews 8:6. Therefore, spiritual and eternal goods are not promised in the Old Testament. Response: 1) Why the New Testament is called more excellent, see above, question 21, proof k. 2) The N.T. has more excellent promises, not materially, on account of the things contained, or by reason of the good promised, but formally, or by reason of the manner of promising the good, and indeed a) by reason of the required condition. For in the Old Testament there are conditional promises of eternal life, or they are suspended on the condition of the perfect fulfillment of the law; but the promises of the New Testament are gratuitous, offering the remission of sins and eternal life freely to those who believe in Christ. b) By reason of clarity. For the promises of the New Testament are clearer and more open; the promises of the Old Testament concerning eternal life are wrapped in shadows and types. c) By reason of efficacy. The legal covenant promises eternal life to those who exactly fulfill the law, but it does not supply the strength to fulfill the law; but the evangelical covenant promises eternal life to those who believe in Christ and confers the strength to believe.

II. Whatever covenant does not justify man, but is only an ἐπεισάγωγὴ, an introduction of a better hope, that does not promise spiritual goods. But the legal covenant, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Hebrews 7:19: "for the law made nothing perfect; but a better hope is introduced, through which we draw near to God." Response: The better hope is the hope of the gospel, founded in Christ. But it is called a better hope, not on account of the things promised, but on account of the reason and way of arriving at the things promised. The law creates a hope of eternal life, but under a condition impossible for us; Whence it is also called weak and useless for us by the Apostle; but the hope in Christ is certain, while the way in Christ through faith alone of arriving at the things promised is easy and infallible.

III. Whatever Christ, exhibited in the flesh, first revealed, that was not promised in the Old Testament; But Christ, exhibited in the flesh, first revealed life and immortality; Therefore. The minor is clear from 2 Timothy 1:10: "Christ... brought life and immortality to light through the gospel."

Response: We distinguish between the promise of eternal life, and its more abundant manifestation. Christ brought life and immortality to light through the gospel; not because it was not promised or known to the faithful fathers of the old testament; but for two other reasons, one of which is the clarity of the manifestation, the other the breadth of the notification. In the times of the Old Testament eternal life was promised, but less clearly, and it became known only to the Israelite people; but Christ through the gospel manifested the way to eternal life more clearly, the shadows of figures being removed, and notified it to the whole world.

SUSPIRIUM

Prostrate at the feet of Your mercy, O ETERNAL GOD, most CLEMENT FATHER, I give you thanks as great as my mind can conceive, for the revealed gospel of Yours concerning the conferring of eternal salvation upon us, on account of the merits of CHRIST. This word of grace teaches me, trembling, by the comparison of myself with the divine precepts, and not ignorant of my imperfection, to take refuge in the bosom of CHRIST, and to hide safely under his goodness, as under a most firm shield, against the punishments which the law threatens. This gospel of peace confirms that CHRIST, for us who rely on him with a certain faith, has produced righteousness by his obedience, rest by his labors, solace by his torments, and finally life by his death. Therefore, no treasure is more precious to me than the gospel of CHRIST, no food sweeter, no medicine more salutary, no light more serene. For by this light the ready way is shown to those tending toward the heavenly fatherland: By this medicine the wounds of conscience are healed: By this food those hungering for righteousness are refreshed: By this treasure the poor in spirit are enriched. Store up, O HOLY SPIRIT, this treasure in my soul, so that, the riches of this age having been spurned and trampled underfoot, I may uniquely desire, seek, find, and possess celestial goods. And you, O my soul, apprehend JESUS, the author and vindicator of your salvation, with true faith, retain him having been apprehended, and worship him having been retained with holy thoughts, pious prayers, and actions worthy of the gospel.

CHAPTER III.
ON THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL, AND IN PARTICULAR
ON THE SACRAMENTS OF
THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Question I. What is a sacrament?

SACRAMENT IS A sacred and solemn action, divinely instituted, in which God, with the intervention of a man's ministry, through an external and visible element joined with the word of institution, exhibits a celestial reality to each of the users, for the purpose of offering to all men, and conferring upon believers, and sealing the evangelical grace.

Observation I. Varro, in book IV of de lingua latina, derives sacramentum from sacrum, so that it denotes a sacred thing; but Vegetius, in book II of de re militari, c. 5, derives it from sacrando, i.e., dedicating and consecrating.

Observation II. The name sacramentum among profane authors supports a twofold signification. a) It signifies money, deposited with a pontiff in a sacred place, so that, the lawsuit being finished, the victor would recover his whole sum, but the money of the loser would cede to the treasury, to be spent for sacred uses, as Varro notes, in book IV of de latina lingua; although afterwards the word sacramentum was used more loosely for any pledge, as Cicero testifies in book I of de oratoribus. b) It denotes an oath, especially a military one.

(*) In this correct definition are contained certain axioms, primarily four, whose use extends most widely through this entire part of doctrine. I. Sacraments do not pertain to the law, but to the Gospel, insofar as the latter is distinguished from the law, and therefore not to the covenant of works, but to the covenant of grace. II. In the state of integral nature, since there was no Gospel, there was no Sacrament, properly so called. To some of the Reformed, indeed, especially the Dutch, certain Sacraments seem to have already been instituted in Paradise, namely the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, the tree of life, the sabbath. But, as they err in this, that they attribute no greater power to the sacraments than a signifying one, so they neglect the customary and proper power of the name, and using it in a broader sense, they understand any sign of the divine will, even the legal will, with a promise attached. III. Sacraments are in both Testaments, since in the one equally as in the other, God has declared his evangelical will, and has decreed to offer the benefits of grace, obtained by the merits of Christ, to men, and to confer them upon them. Yet the sacraments of the Old and New Testaments cannot but be different in a certain way, as befits the different economy of grace, which was one then, and another now. IV. Sacraments are to be properly distinguished from sacrifices, which two indeed agree in this: that 1) both are sacred actions, 2) both are divinely instituted, 3) not without a divine promise. But they differ from each other in such a way that a sacrament is a sacred action of such a kind, in which something is offered to man by God; but a sacrifice is that sacred action, in which something is offered to God by man. See Apol. Aug. Conf. p. 253. but there is something composed from both kinds, the paschal lamb, which, for one reason and another, was both a sacrament and a sacrifice, as our most venerable D. SAL. DEILINGIUS has excellently taught, in his Obs. S. T. I. 59.

Observation III. The word sacramentum is not expressly read in the sacred code; but just as it is of Latin origin, so in the Hebrew and Greek speech of the O. and N.T. no certain word is found which exactly corresponds to it. Tertullian, in his book de corona militis, was the first to use the word sacramentum to denote the act by which those being baptized obligate themselves to God, and religiously promise that they will fight strenuously under the banner of Christ against Satan, the world, and the flesh. Whence it happened that not only the whole rite of baptism, but also the sacred supper was called a sacrament.

Observation IV. The word sacramentum in the ecclesiastical sense is taken a) most generally, b) more specially, c) most specially. Most generally it is taken for any arcane and secret thing; in which way it is used in the Latin version, 1 Timothy 3:16; Ephesians 5:32. More specially it is taken for an external sign of a sacred and celestial thing, e.g., the rainbow in the clouds, the fleece of Gideon, the sun going backward, can be called sacraments. Most specially it is taken for a sign and means of conferring and sealing divine grace; and in this last signification, which is of this place, it denotes either ὁλικῶς the whole sacramental action, embracing both the terrestrial and celestial reality, or μερικῶς, one essential part, namely the external symbol, or the terrestrial reality, e.g., the water in baptism, the bread and wine in the sacred supper.

Observation V. A sacrament in Greek is called μυστήριον. The name μύστης, from which it is proximately derived, denotes a man initiated into sacred rites, μυσέω signifies I initiate into sacred rites, I institute. See Philippians 4:12. Μυσέω descends from μύω, I close; because among the Greeks the mystics were held μύειν τὸ στόμα, to close the mouth, and to say nothing of those things which they themselves had perceived, lest the authority of the sacred rites should become cheapened. For the rest, it should be especially noted that while every sacrament is a mystery, not every mystery is a sacrament properly so called. The spiritual marriage of Christ and the church is a μέγα μυστήριον, Ephesians 5:32, but not a sacrament properly so called.

Question II. What are the essential requirements of a sacrament properly so called?

Required for a sacrament, properly so called, is: a) That it be an action divinely instituted and commanded; b) That it have an external and visible element, united with a celestial reality by means of the word of institution; c) That it have a promise of evangelical grace.

Observation: These general requirements of the sacraments are to be deduced from those things which are handed down in specie concerning the individual sacraments in Holy Scripture.

Question III. Is a sacrament to be defined as an action?

A sacrament is rightly defined as an action a) sacred b) and solemn c).

Proof a. All the preceptive words concerning the sacraments in the sacred writings 1) command an action, e.g., "Circumcise," Genesis 17:11; "take a lamb, kill it," Exodus 12:3; "baptize," Matthew 28:19; "take, eat, drink, do this," Matthew 26:26. 2) The form of the sacrament consists in δόσει καὶ λήψει, in distribution and reception, and therefore in an action. 3) Outside of its use, i.e., the sacramental use, it is not a sacrament.

Proof b. A sacrament is a sacred action; because 1) it has the most holy God as its author, by whose word it is consecrated, and 2) it is destined for a sacred use.

Proof c. A sacrament is a solemn action, i.e., serious, clear, certain, not ludic, jocular, or mimical; as Sozomen, in book II, c. 16, commemorates that the boy Athanasius baptized little boys who were not yet initiated into the sacred rites.

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians, and Weigelians, for whom the sacraments are only external signs; to which the Pontificians partly accede, in whose opinion the sacraments of the Old Testament were only signs. Their principal arguments are:

I. All types are signs; because they signify and prefigure the antitype; But the sacraments of the O.T. are types. Therefore. The minor is clear; because circumcision prefigured the effusion of the blood of Christ, the paschal lamb his death, 1 Corinthians 5:7.

Response: We distinguish between theoretical and practical signs. The former signify and in themselves effect nothing; The latter not only signify, but also effect something, of which census are the sacraments, and therefore they formally consist in an action.

II. Whatever seals the federal grace, that is a sign; But the sacraments, etc. Therefore. Response: To seal the federal grace pertains to the end, or use of the sacraments, not to their essential constitution.

Instance: But Augustine defined sacraments as visible signs of an invisible grace. Response: That description, sought from the final cause, is not an adequate definition. (*)<sup>283</sup>

Question IV. Who instituted the sacraments?

The principal efficient cause. God instituted the sacraments a) and our Lord Jesus Christ, who also as man founded the sacraments of the N.T. b).

Proof a. 1) God alone is the author of salvation and the fount of grace. Therefore, God alone possesses the authority and power of ordaining the means of salvation and the seals of grace. 2) By an induction of all the sacraments. For God himself prescribed the sacrament of circumcision to be observed by Abraham, Genesis 17:10, and also to Moses that other sacrament of the O.T., Exodus 12:3. In the N.T. the institution of baptism is expressly attributed to God, John 1:33, as also the institution of the Holy Supper, 1 Corinthians 11:23.

Proof b. 1) In general. According to which nature Christ is our mediator, according to the same he ordained the sacraments as means of salvation. But he is our mediator also according to his human nature. Therefore, he also ordained the sacraments as means of salvation according to his human nature. 2) In specie: a) Concerning baptism, from Matthew 28:19, where Christ says: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them." He who said this was Christ resurrected from the dead and appearing to the disciples, v. 17, to whom was given all authority in heaven and on earth, v. 18. But indeed he was resurrected, appeared to the disciples, and received authority in time, according to his human nature. Concerning the Holy Supper from Matthew 26:26, where Christ says: "Take, eat, my body; drink, my blood." The θεάνθρωπος has a body and blood according to his human nature. Therefore, he is also the author and institutor of the Holy Supper according to his human nature.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who deny that Christ, as man, is the primary author of the sacraments. Who argue: Whoever does not have divine power, he cannot principally found sacraments; But Christ the man, etc. Therefore. Response: Negative to the minor; because Christ, as man, has divine power not indeed through himself, but yet through the grace of the personal union. The institution of the sacraments belongs to Christ, as God and as man; as God indeed, by divine authority, essential to him. But as man, by the same authority and power, but communicated to him by virtue of the personal union.

Question V. What moved God to the institution of the sacraments?

The impulsive cause. Mercy moved God internally to found the sacraments, the occasion for which mercy was provided by the infirmity and misery of fallen man a). Externally, the merit of Christ the mediator impelled him b).

Proof a. It is of the most liberal divine goodness that God established a covenant with sinful man, and annexed the sacraments as seals of grace to this covenant, Genesis 17:10; Matthew 26:28; 1 Peter 3:21. The propitious Deity took counsel for the infirmity of fallen man, to whom He desired His will to be manifested by the audible word, which He confirmed with visible words, so that what promise of grace man would receive with his ears, he would behold the pledges and seals of it with his eyes. Chrysostom says excellently in homily 60 to the people of Antioch: "If you were incorporeal, God would hand you incorporeal gifts nakedly, but because your soul is united to a body, they are handed to you to be understood in corporeal things." Thus after the fall, sacrifices immediately were added to the gospel, the rainbow to the Noachic pact, circumcision to the Abrahamic pact, the paschal lamb and many sacrifices to the Mosaic pact; Thus in the New Testament sacraments were added to the evangelical pact, baptism and the Lord's supper.

(*) When in our Augsburg Confession, art. XIII, Sacraments are named signs, they are to be understood 1) not as signs of a thing, as if they merely signified the sacred reality, or the benefits of divine grace, and did not truly offer, confer, and exhibit them to us; but as signs of God, by which he himself has declared his benign will; which interpretation is added to this name in that very place; 2) as efficacious signs, which obtain the force of means, as it is openly written in the same place; proposed for the purpose of exciting and confirming faith. For which reason the little word, per, is very often used in the Apology of the Aug. Conf., as on page 167 and page 200.

Proof b. In Christ the mediator we are blessed with every spiritual blessing, Ephesians 1:3, which blessing the sacraments offer, confer, and seal.

Question VI. To whom did God entrust the dispensation of the sacraments?

The subject to whom. God entrusted the right of dispensing the sacraments to the church a), which, for the cause of observing order and decorum (εὐσχημοσύνης), commended the execution or exercise of this right to ministers of the divine word who are called and ordained b). But in a case of extreme necessity, where a sacrament is necessary and cannot be omitted except at the peril of salvation, any Christian man can validly celebrate the sacrament of initiation c).

Proof a. 1) Because the church is the bride of Christ, John 3:29, whose ornaments are the sacraments. 2) Because the church is the house of God, and the pillar and buttress of the truth, 1 Timothy 3:15. This house preserves the treasure of the sacraments; This pillar guards the celestial truth, and its signacula, namely the sacraments.

Proof b. 1) Because the ministers of the church are stewards, or dispensers of the mysteries of God, 1 Corinthians 4:1. The sacraments also pertain to the divine mysteries. 2) Because no one (in ecclesiastical matters) takes this honor for himself, but only when called, like Aaron, Hebrews 5:4. 3) Because Christ specifically instructed the Apostles: "Baptize!" Matthew 28:19. "Do this!" Luke 22:19.

Proof c. Because all Christians are spiritual kings and priests, 1 Peter 2:9; Revelation 1:5. Therefore, when necessity urges, they use the right of the spiritual priesthood, which the faithful have as members from the priestly office of their head, Jesus Christ, Ephesians 1:22; 4:16; 5:25-26.

Question VII. Can the church change anything in the sacraments?

Can the sacraments be changed? The church can change nothing in the substantials of the sacraments a). Yet it enjoys the liberty of changing something in the circumstances of the sacraments b).

Proof a. Because the church is not the mistress of the sacraments, and therefore cannot change the essence of the sacraments (which consists in an indivisible thing), e.g., it cannot take away from the supper the cup instituted by Christ. But Christ uses the church, 1) as a messenger and promulgator of the institution, once made by God, 2) as a treasurer, which only preserves the κειμήλιον and transfers it to posterity, 3) as an efficacious minister and steward, through whom Christ operates, 1 Corinthians I. 4) as an ordinator and adorer, as far as external solemnity and circumstantial ceremonies are concerned. Cf. D. Dannhaverus in hodos. p. 1008.

Proof b. The church has the power to dispose, so that all things may be done decently and in order, 1 Corinthians 14:40. Thus the Christian church, in grace to the sick, whose infirmity does not sustain baptismal immersion, changed immersion into aspersion. When Sabellius was rampant, who impugned the Holy Trinity, the rite of trine immersion was observed with singular care; but when Arius was raging, who denied the unity of the Father and the Son, baptism was performed with one immersion. Against Ebion, who urged unleavened bread, leavened bread was used by the church; against the Greeks who fought fervidly for leavened bread, unleavened was received. Cf. D. Brochmand. in loc. de sacrament. p. 1039.

Question VIII. Is a sacrament effective when administered by a minister of the church whose life is impure?

The life of the minister. With respect to decorum (τῆς εὐσχημοσύνης), sincere piety of life is required in a minister of the church a). But the efficacy of the sacrament depends not on the minister, or steward, but on the master, or author, God b).

Proof a. 1) Because δεῖ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεπίληπτον εἶναι, "it is necessary for a bishop to be blameless," 1 Timothy 3:2. 2) Because the minister is the legate of Christ, whom he ought to imitate, and the vicar of the whole church, whose ornaments he ought to reflect.

Proof b. 1) Because "neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but only God who gives the growth," 1 Corinthians 3:7. Therefore, the efficacy of the sacraments does not depend on the minister of the church who plants or waters, but on God who grants the increase. The reason is; because the minister in the order of the effect of the sacrament does not act, except instrumentally. But every instrument acts, not according to its own form, but according to the virtue of him by whom it is moved. 2) Just as the unbelief of men cannot nullify the faith of God, Romans 3:3; So the malice of the minister cannot impede the goodness of God who institutes the sacraments. The Augsburg Confession, Article VIII, teaches this: "Although the Church properly is the congregation of saints and true believers, yet, seeing that in this life many hypocrites and evil persons are mingled therewith, it is lawful to use Sacraments which are administered by evil men, according to the saying of Christ, Matt. 23:2: 'The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat,' etc. And the Sacraments and Word are effectual by reason of the institution and commandment of Christ, notwithstanding they be administered by evil men."

The antithesis is that of the Donatists and Anabaptists, who ascribe the efficacy of the sacraments to the piety of the ministers. They rely chiefly on this argument; Whoever does not have the Holy Spirit cannot confer the benefits of the Holy Spirit on another. But a wicked minister, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because what one does not have, he cannot give to another. Response: We distinguish between the principal and the instrumental cause. What the principal cause does not have (formally or eminently), it cannot impart to another. But it can be conferred by an instrumental agent, what is not in it; e.g., the air is the vehicle of speech to a listener standing far off; yet the air itself is devoid of speech.

Question IX. Is the intention of the minister required for the integrity and efficacy of the sacraments?

The intention of the minister. The external intention, which consists in the application of all the sacramental words and actions, with this end and in this manner which Christ instituted, is altogether necessary for the essential integrity of the sacrament a). The internal intention is indeed required for the decorum of the minister, so that he may bring an attentive and present mind, not a sleepy, not a wandering one, to his office b). But if, either from negligence or from malice, he is not intent, the defect of internal intention does not impede the salutary effect of the sacrament c).

Proof a. Because the external intention is the legitimate administration and formal use, outside of which a sacrament is not given. For it is an organ of grace and salvation, and therefore consists in the use, conformable to the divine institution.

Proof b. It is the duty of the ministers of the church τὴν διακονίαν αὐτῷ πληροφορεῖν, to fulfill their ministry, 2 Timothy 4:5, which requires accurate intention.

Proof c. 1) If the integrity and efficacy of the sacrament were to be estimated by the intention of the minister, all consolation to be drawn from the sacraments would plainly expire, and the entire efficacy of the sacraments would be uncertain, against the manifest sayings of the Holy Spirit, John 3:5; Galatians 3:27; Matthew 26:28; John 6:51. For since it is not given to man to penetrate the recesses of another's heart, how can anyone be certain of the baptizer's intention, and consequently of the efficacy of the baptism? 2) Just as the unbelief of men cannot make the faith of God void, Romans 3:3; so the defect of a good intention in the minister does not make the divine intention void. 3) The audible word, in the absence of a good intention of the minister, is effective; for indeed some preach Christ out of envy and contention, Philippians 1:15. Therefore, the visible sacrament, in the absence of a good intention, is also effective. 4) Zipporah, out of anger, without due intention, circumcised her son, Exodus 4:25, and that circumcision was valid. Therefore, a sacrament without the due intention of the minister is valid.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who suspend the efficacy of the sacrament on the good intention of the minister. Their arguments are:

I. Every elective action is done with the intention of acting (for it proceeds from one who knows and wills): The administration of a sacrament is an elective action; Therefore. Response: We distinguish between the internal and external intention of the minister. Every elective action requires the external intention of the minister, conformable to the will of the Lord, although the internal intention of the minister is not always good; e.g., if the servant of some liberal master pursued you with hatred, and were ordered by the master to hand over a hundred gold pieces to you, he would bring the money with an external intention, conformable to the master's command, although internally his intention is not good.

II. In a faithful and prudent servant a good intention is required; Every minister of the sacraments is a faithful and prudent servant, Matthew 24:45. Therefore. Response: A good intention is required for the sake of decorum and duty, but not for the sake of absolute necessity for the integrity and efficacy of the sacrament.

III. If the intention of the minister were not necessary for the integrity of the sacrament, a baptism in a bath, and a eucharist in a banquet, or otherwise conferred through play and jest, would be legitimate sacraments; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, also the antecedent. Response: Negative to the consequence. A jocular baptism and a ludic eucharist are not sacraments, not for the reason that the intention of the minister is lacking, but because it pertains to the essence of a sacrament that it be a sacred and solemn action, to be administered with due reverence by ecclesiastical use, which an ironic, mimical, jocular, and ludic action is not.

Question X. What is the matter of the sacraments?

Matter of the sacraments. Since the sacraments are actions divinely instituted, it is clear that they do not have a matter, properly so called a). Analogously, however, their terrestrial matter is called the element, or external symbol, which is a corporeal, visible thing, analogous to its signate, expressly determined by the word of divine institution, and ordained for this, that it be the ὄχημα, vehicle and exhibitivum medium of the celestial reality b). The celestial matter is the invisible and intelligible reality, exhibited by the visible terrestrial reality, as a divinely ordained medium, on which the fruit of the sacrament principally depends c).

Proof a. Matter properly so called belongs to corporeal substances, which are composed of matter and form, as parts. Since, therefore, a sacrament is not a corporeal substance, it is easy to gather that it does not consist of matter properly so called; Analogously, however, a matter about which it is concerned is assigned to it.

Proof b. & c. 1) By proceeding inductively through the individual sacraments. In circumcision the terrestrial and visible reality was the foreskin, cut and cast away not without the effusion of blood; typologically, the Messiah was present, to be born of the blood of Abraham, to be sprinkled with his blood in his passion, to be cut off and cast away. In the Passover the terrestrial and visible reality was a lamb to be slain; typologically, the Messiah to be sacrificed for us was present, 1 Corinthians 5:7. In baptism the visible symbol is water; the celestial reality is the Holy Spirit. In the Holy Supper the external elements are bread and wine, the invisible and celestial matter is the body and blood of the Lord. 2) God in the sacraments deals with the external and internal man; therefore he willed that there be two parts of the sacraments, suitable for each consideration of man, of which the celestial would be concerned with the faith of the internal man, but the terrestrial with the senses of the external man. 3) The effects of the sacraments (regeneration, justification, renewal, and glorification) cannot proceed from the terrestrial matter alone, nor be attributed to it without a species of idolatry. Therefore, the effect of the sacraments proceeds principally from the celestial reality, with which the terrestrial matter is sacramentally united, as a vehicle and exhibitivum medium of the celestial reality. 4) The audible word, by virtue of the divine ordinance, is united with the Holy Spirit, so that it can produce supernatural effects; So since a spiritual and divine power is attributed to the sacrament, it is necessary that a celestial matter be sacramentally united with the external element, by virtue of which it may produce celestial ἐνεργήματα, as a medium, instructed with divine power. Cf. D. CALVIUS, vol. IX of his system, p. 175. 5) The same is proven from the end of the sacraments, which since they are sensible signs, require some intelligible signate. For a sign, as Augustine defines in Book II of de doctrin. Christ. c. 1, is a thing which, besides the appearance which it presents to the senses, causes something else of itself to come into thought. Furthermore, because the sacraments are efficacious organs for supernatural acts; Therefore they require some, so to speak, internal and celestial nucleus, from which so great an efficacy can proceed through the external element. Cf. DANNHAVER in hodos. p. 1006.

You say: The sacramental matter ought to be present in the sacramental act. But the Messiah to be born and to be sacrificed was not present in the sacramental actions of the O.T. Therefore, the Messiah to be born and to be sacrificed was not the celestial matter of the sacraments of the O.T. Response: ὁ λόγος, because he is eternal and omnipresent, was certainly really present in the sacramental actions of the O.T.; as the one to be incarnated and sacrificed he was morally present, as to foreknowledge and decree, and also as to the evangelical promise and efficacy, so that he could be apprehended and applied by faith. For Christ is yesterday and today, and the same forever, Hebrews 13:8, and the lamb of God was slain from the foundation of the world, Revelation 13:8.

Question XI. Is there a union of the terrestrial and celestial reality in the sacraments?

Union of the terrestrial and celestial reality. There is a union of the terrestrial and celestial reality in the sacraments a), not indeed an essential one, nor a personal one, nor, with respect to the unifiable terms, an accidental one b), but an unusual, mystical, symbolical, and sacramental one c).

Proof a. Because from the terrestrial and celestial reality, by the confession of all, one sacrament is made, this cannot happen unless some union intervenes; which indeed is the formal principle of one composite.

Proof b. The sacramental union is not an essential union, such as is the conjunction of two incomplete substances for the constitution of one thing existing in itself; for neither the Messiah to be born and to be killed, nor the Holy Spirit is an incomplete being, nor do they coalesce for the constitution of one composite essence; Nor is it personal, the term of which is one intelligent suppositum, or one composite person (σύνθετος). Who would dare to say that the Holy Spirit coalesces with the water of baptism into one person? Nor is it a union accidental with respect to the extreme unifiable things, for the reason that in the sacraments a terrestrial substance is united with a celestial substance. We concede in the meantime, that it can be referred to an accidental union, so called with respect to the terminus ad quem. Cf. D. CALVIUS, metaphys. div. p. 317.

Proof c. The sacramental union is called unusual, with respect to the united matter; because a similar reason for sacramental union is not found in the whole of nature, and therefore it becomes known solely from the light of supernatural revelation; It is called mystical, with respect to the arcane and investigable mode; But it is called sacramental and symbolical, with respect to the end; for the reason that it brings it about that the external symbol signifies the celestial reality, and exhibits it as signified. By virtue of this mystical and symbolical union the sacrament is a mystery, consisting of a husk and a nucleus, a case and a jewel, a receiving shell and precious water, or (to speak more clearly) of an external and internal, a terrestrial and celestial reality.

Question XII. What is the form of the sacrament?

Form of the sacrament. The form of the sacrament is the external action, and that integrally occupied with the terrestrial and celestial reality of any sacrament, which formal acts, succeeding one another indistinctly, constitute, which are three: I. The recitation of the words of institution; II. Δόσις, or the sacramental dispensation; III. Λήψις, or the reception of the sacrament.

The assertion is proven by induction. The δόσις in circumcision is to amputate the foreskin; the λήψις is to sustain the amputation of the foreskin. In the passover the δόσις is to slaughter the paschal lamb, to roast it, and to offer it for eating; the λήψις is to eat the slaughtered and roasted lamb. In baptism the δόσις is to pour water on a person, or to immerse him in water in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; the λήψις is to permit the pouring or immersion. In the Holy Supper the δόσις is to distribute the blessed bread, which is the κοινωνία of the body of Christ, and the blessed wine, which is the κοινωνία of the blood of Christ, for eating and drinking; the λήψις is to eat the body of Christ with the eucharistic bread, and to drink his blood with the blessed wine. The word of institution, or of ordinance, which is also called consecratory, is everywhere added, by which the elements, or external symbols, are segregated from profane use, and are effectively dedicated to a sacred use, so that with them the celestial realities may be distributed, exhibited, and received. Thus the individual sacraments have their word of institution, Genesis 17:10; Exodus 12:3; Matthew 28:19; Matthew 26:26. Concerning which Augustine, tract. 80 on John, says: "The word is added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament."

Observation I. In the administration of any sacrament, antecedent, formal, and consequent acts concur. The antecedent may also be called preparatory and pedagogical, e.g., exhortation, prayer, confession of faith. The formal are those which constitute the sacraments, and distinguish them from other actions. The consequent and final are the application and sealing of evangelical grace.

Observation II. To the sacramental act a threefold word concurs: a) The word of command, by which we are divinely bound to the use of the sacrament; b) The word of institution, or consecratory, which is decently applied to the sacramental action, so that the terrestrial symbols may be transferred and dedicated to a mystical and sacred use; c) The word of promise, by which a salutary effect is promised. The word of invocation can be added, which does not a little to the solemn signification of the sacrament.

Question XIII. To which men are the sacraments to be dispensed?

The subject of the sacrament. The sacraments are to be dispensed to all and only to men who are capable of the formal and final use.

Proof. Only living men receive the formal acts of the sacraments, as is clear from the response to the preceding question. Only living men are capable of the end of the sacraments, namely regeneration, justification, and renewal. But the sacraments of initiation are dispensed to both infants and adults, the sacraments of confirmation only to adults.

Question XIV. Does faith also pertain to the integrity of a sacrament?

Faith is indeed necessarily required for receiving the salutary fruit of the sacrament a). But it is not required for the substantial integrity of the sacrament b).

Proof a. 1) Without faith no one can please God, Hebrews 11:6. 2) The promise, annexed to the sacraments, is received by faith, Romans 4:16; Galatians 3:14.

Proof b. 1) The sacrament depends on the will and institution of God, which is not made void by the unbelief of men, Romans 3:3. 2) If faith were to enter into the substance of the sacrament, the circumcision and baptism of infants would not be integral sacraments, because infants before the conferral of the sacrament lack faith, Ephesians 2:3; John 3:6. The faith of adults is indeed confirmed by the sacraments; But the confirming and the confirmed differ. 3) Just as the word of God is true, which hypocrites hear; So the sacrament is true, which adult hypocrites, destitute of faith, receive.

You say I: Whatever outside of its use is not a true means of salvation, faith pertains to constituting its integrity. But a sacrament outside of its use, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because with faith lacking, the salutary use of the sacrament is lacking. The minor is clear; because the whole being of a sacrament consists in its use. Response: We distinguish between the external, or formal use of the sacrament, and the internal, or final and salutary use. Faith is required not for the former, but for the latter. Augustine also had in view this salutary use or fruit of the sacrament, in tract 80 on John, saying thus: "Let the word be added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament."

Whence then is there so great a virtue of water, that it cleanses the heart? Unless the word does it, not because it is spoken, but because it is believed."

You say II: Paul says, 1 Corinthians 10:21: "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons," by which words he indicates that unbelievers cannot receive the sacrament of the supper. Whence the argument is born: Without which the cup of the Lord cannot be drunk, without that a true sacrament cannot be received; Without faith, etc. Therefore. Response: The Apostle's discourse is concerning a moral impossibility, in this sense; it is not decorous, it is not fitting, that those who drink the cup of the Lord should be present at banquets, prepared from sacrifices which were offered to idols.

Question XV. What is the primary end of the sacraments?

The primary end of the sacraments. The primary end of the sacraments is the offering, bestowal, application, and sealing of evangelical grace.

Observation I. By evangelical grace is understood the applying grace of the Holy Spirit, obtained by the merit of Christ, and promised in the gospel, namely the grace that calls, illuminates, regenerates, justifies, inhabits, renews, and glorifies.

Observation II. Through the sacraments evangelical grace is offered to all who use them, is conferred upon and applied to those who use them worthily, and is sealed to adult believers.

Proof. 1) To circumcision is annexed the promise; "I will be your God, and of your seed," Genesis 17:7. By which promise is offered regenerating, justifying, inhabiting, renewing, and glorifying grace. For that reason it is called σφραγίς δικαιοσύνης, a seal of righteousness, Romans 4:11.

2. The paschal lamb confirmed faith in Christ, who is called the passover sacrificed for us, 1 Corinthians 5:7.

3. Baptism is the washing of regeneration and renewal, Titus 3:5.

4. In the Holy Supper we receive the body given for us, and the blood of the N.T. which is shed for us for the remission of sins, Matthew 26:26-28. Therefore, through the sacrament of the supper the evangelical grace concerning the remission of sins is confirmed and sealed.

Question XVI. What are the secondary ends of the sacraments?

Secondary ends. The secondary ends of the sacraments are; a) That they be marks of the church, by which it is distinguished from the infidel people; b) That they be monuments of the benefits of Christ; c) That they be bonds of charity and nerves of public assemblies; d) That they be incitements to the exercises of virtues.

Proof a. The Israelite church was distinguished from the assembly of the infidels by circumcision and the paschal lamb, as by marks and tokens. By baptism and the eucharist rightly administered the Christian church is distinguished both from the Jewish synagogue and from the ethnics and sectarians.

Proof b. The paschal lamb recalls to Christians' memory the miraculous leading out of the Israelites from Egypt, Exodus 12:14. The Lord's Supper recalls the death of Christ, Luke 22:19.

Proof c. That the one baptism is a bond of charity and peace, Paul shows, Ephesians 4:5. By a like reason the Holy Supper is a medium of our conjunction with Christ the head and his mystical members. For we, being many, are one bread, one body, 1 Corinthians 10:17.

Proof d. Circumcision admonished the Israelites of spiritual circumcision, Deuteronomy 10:16; the paschal lamb, of gratitude toward God, Exodus 12:26; Psalm 111:4. Baptism signifies the submersion of the old Adam, which is done through penitence and daily renewal, Romans 6:4. The Holy Supper excites us to the grateful memory of the death of Christ, 1 Corinthians 11:26.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians, and Weigelians, who deny the primary end of the sacraments. The Pontificals, however, detract not a little from the efficacy of the sacraments of the O.T. They rely on the following arguments:

I. God confers evangelical grace; Therefore, not the sacraments. Response: God confers grace principally, the sacraments (taken for the external symbols) instrumentally. The sacraments are means or organs, through which God the Father wills to exhibit, give, and apply his grace, the Son of God to communicate his merit, the Holy Spirit to exert his efficacy for the salvation of every believer.

II. By whatever we are justified instrumentally, that is faith, Romans 3:28. The sacraments are not faith; Therefore, we are not justified by the sacraments. Response: We are justified by faith, as a receptive instrument; by the sacraments, as exhibitiv and sealing instruments. Faith is as if our hand, by which we apprehend and receive the benefits of the gospel as our own; The Word and sacraments are as if the hands of God, by which the benefits of Christ are offered, applied, and sealed to us.

III. An instrument has no efficacy; A sacrament is an instrument; Therefore. Response: We distinguish between the efficacy of a separated and a conjoined instrument. A separated instrument from the principal cause has no efficacy. But the sacraments are instruments conjoined with the celestial reality, from which so great an efficacy proceeds through the external element.

IV. No external thing can penetrate into the soul, and produce spiritual motions in it; A sacrament is an external thing; Therefore. Response: No merely external and natural thing can penetrate into the soul; I concede. But a sacrament is not a merely natural or external thing; but it is conjoined with the celestial reality and the word of institution. Its efficacy depends on the celestial reality with which it is conjoined, and on the divine ordinance.

V. Whatever is a sign has no power but that of signifying; But sacraments are signs; Therefore. Response: Whatever is a theoretical sign and merely signifying, that has only the power of signifying; I concede. But sacraments are practical and exhibitiv signs, which by exhibiting the thing signified effect something by the pact, institution, and promise of God.

VI. The sacraments of the old testament were not exhibiting signs, because they did not exhibit the body of Christ; Therefore, they were signs merely signifying. Response: The sacraments of the old testament are in a diverse respect signifying and exhibiting. They are signifying, insofar as they prefigured the coming and suffering Messiah; They are exhibiting, insofar as they presented the Messiah present in the efficacious divine promise.

VII. A shadow has no efficacy; The sacraments of the O.T. are shadows; Therefore, the sacraments of the O.T. have no efficacy. Response: The sacraments of the O.T. are partly shadows, partly means of grace. They are shadows, with respect to the future incarnation, passion, and death of Christ, which they adumbrated from afar. They are means of grace, insofar as the external elements, with the word of institution being added, conjoined with the celestial reality, regenerated, justified, sanctified, saved, by the power of the federal divine promise.

VIII. If the sacraments, externally applied, internally purge, Judaism will be introduced into the church. But Judaism is not to be introduced into the church. Therefore, the sacraments do not internally purge. The consequence of the major is proven; because the Jews believed that they could expiate and as it were redeem their crimes by various victims and oblations, Psalm 40:7; Psalm 51:18; Isaiah 1:11; Amos 5:22. Response: 1) The cited sayings deal with the sacrifices of the Jews, which differ greatly from the sacraments. The former are of the people to God, the latter are of God to the people. In the sacraments men receive something from God; In sacrifices men offer something to God. For the rest, 2) the Jews vainly persuaded themselves that the grace of God could be procured by external rites and sacrifices without penitence and faith; we require penitence and faith for perceiving the salutary fruit of the sacraments.

IX. Whatever is most certain does not need sacramental confirmation; But the divine promises, etc. Therefore. Response: The divine promises are considered either absolutely and in themselves, or with respect to us. Considered absolutely and in themselves, they do not need confirmation, but with respect to us, so that they may be effectively applied to us, and be approved by us with a solid assent.

X. Whatever excludes all doubt does not need confirmation; But faith according to the mind of the Lutherans, etc. Therefore. Response: Faith excludes the doubt of incredulity, not of infirmity, because faith is not always equally robust, but sometimes is weak and languid, like a bruised reed, or a smoldering wick, Isaiah 42:3.

Question XVII. Do the sacraments confer divine grace ex opere operato, without the faith of the user?

The sacraments confer no grace on adults, unless they receive it, having been offered, by true faith, which preexists in their hearts a). In infants the Holy Spirit, through the sacraments of initiation, kindles faith, by which the infants accept the federal grace b). But the dogma concerning the opus operatum is not conformable to the pattern (ὑποτυπώσει) of sound words c).

Proof a. 1) Because the sacraments have a promise of grace annexed to them, Mark 16:16; Luke 22:19-20. But the promise of grace is to be received by faith; because promise and faith are correlatives. 2) Because just as the audible word does not profit, unless it is mixed with faith, Hebrews 4:2; so neither does the sacrament, which is called the visible word, profit without the faith of the user. 3) In the sacraments a covenant is established with God; But for the establishment of a covenant two hands are required, clasping each other. In the establishment of the divine covenant the hand of God is the word and sacrament; the hand, on our part, is faith. 4) For an adult man, a δοκιμασία, or testing of himself, is necessary, so that he may test himself, whether he is in the faith, 2 Corinthians 13:5.

Proof b. Because, before infants are baptized, they lack faith; for indeed they are born of flesh from flesh, John 3:6, but are reborn of water and the Spirit, John 3:5, through which regeneration faith is kindled and Christ is put on, Galatians 3:27. From which it is concluded that baptism is both an efficacious medium through which the Holy Spirit excites faith in infants, and a salutary organ through which justifying grace is offered, which is accepted by the faith kindled in baptism. Dannhauer says excellently in hodos. phenom. X, p. 1007: "Faith is both the effect of the sacraments, and their receiving organ. In the same moment of time in which faith is given, it also receives; yet the moments of nature must be distinguished. Faith is given before it embraces grace; yet each act, of giving and of embracing, occurs in as it were the same moment of time."

Proof c. 1) Because that phrase, opus operatum, is barbarous; since contrary to the rule of grammar operatum is taken passively, just as if you were to say a work perpetrated, performed, perfected. 2) Because the opinion concerning the opus operatum in the N.T. sacraments imagines a giving hand without a receiving one, a relative without a correlative, a promise salutary without faith. 3) Because by this fiction worthy and unworthy users are confounded; since yet, as St. Paul testifies, those who eat unworthily eat judgment to themselves, 1 Corinthians 11:29.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificals, some of whom maintain that the sacraments of the N.T. confer evangelical grace ex opere operato, without a good motion of the user; some concede that in adults previous dispositions are required, among which dispositions they number faith, but that the sacraments of the N.T. confer grace ex opere operantis, as the one operating, or the user of the sacraments is prepared, and well disposed, and instructed with the necessary qualities. The Evangelicals reject the opus operatum for the reasons adduced above, nor do they admit the opus operantis for obtaining justification and salvation, because we are justified not by works, but by faith. The arguments of the adversaries are:

I. Whatever justifies and saves by an intrinsic power, divinely imparted, that confers justifying and saving grace ex opere operato. But the sacraments, etc. The major is proven; because the grace of God is said to be obtained through the sacrament ex opere operato when it is conferred on us not on account of qualities inherent in us, or previous dispositions, but solely from the power and efficacy inherent in the sacraments. Response: 1) We distinguish between an absolute and an ordained power. The sacraments justify and save not by an absolute power, but by an ordained one, and thus they require a subject who subjects himself to the divine order and uses them worthily. 2) We distinguish between the offering and the bestowal of divine grace. Divine grace is offered through the sacraments to all, even to those who use them unworthily; but it is not conferred on the unworthy, because they are destitute of faith.

II. Whosoever, being destitute of faith, are regenerated by baptism, to them the sacrament of baptism confers evangelical grace ex opere operato. But infants, etc. Therefore. Response: We distinguish between regenerating and justifying grace. The first, regenerating grace, is conferred on infants through baptism, since they do not place a malicious obstacle to the operation of the Holy Spirit; but when they are regenerated, they are endowed with faith, so that by the same they may put on the righteousness of Christ and apply it to themselves.

III. Of which the legitimate use can be without faith, for its use faith is not required; But of the sacraments, etc. Therefore. The minor is established; because an adult hypocrite, baptized with water in the name of the Holy Trinity, rightly uses the sacrament. Response: We distinguish between the formal use of the sacraments, and the final, or salutary use. An adult hypocrite is indeed capable of the formal use of the sacraments, but not of the final use.

IV. Whatever does not give efficacy to the sacrament, without it that can operate effectively. Faith does not give, etc. Therefore. Response: Negative to the major, and arguing by a like reason; Whatever does not give efficacy to a present medicine, without it that can heal effectively; the mouth of a sick person does not give; Therefore. Wherefore, in order that the sacrament may exert its efficacy in the second act, faith is required, as a receiving organ.

V. If faith as a receptive medium is required for the efficacy of the sacrament, the sacrament will not justify or save immediately, but through another medium; But it is absurd that one medium of justifying should justify through another medium; Therefore, faith, as a receptive medium, is not required for the efficacy of the sacrament. Response: The offering medium is badly opposed to the receiving medium. A physician heals by means of a medicine, and yet he does not wish the receiving mouth of the sick person to be excluded.

Question XVIII. Are the sacraments necessary?

The necessity of the sacraments. The sacraments are necessary by the necessity of precept a), and of a means b). The same are not necessary by an absolute necessity, but an ordained, or conditional one c); yet the sacraments of initiation are more necessary than those of confirmation d).

Proof a. The sacraments are necessary by the necessity of precept; because they were instituted by God, and their external symbols were determined by an express divine command. See above, question IV.

Proof b. The sacraments are necessary by the necessity of a means; for the reason that they are offering, conferring, and sealing means of salvation. See above, question XV.

Proof c. The sacraments are not absolutely necessary for obtaining salvation; because it can happen that not contempt of religion, but an article of necessity excludes the use of the sacrament, as Augustine says, in book IV against the Donatists, c. 22. Whence not the lack, but the contempt of the sacraments damns, as Bernard opines in epistle 77. For God has not bound his power to the sacraments. The grace of God, the merit of Christ, and faith are indeed absolutely and simply necessary for justification and salvation; but when and where the sacraments cannot be had, God out of mere grace, on account of Christ, produces justifying faith in an extraordinary way. The converted thief entered paradise, but unbaptized (ἀβάπτιστος). Catechumens, among whom was the emperor Valentinian, who died before baptism, were saved. Nor in the O.T. were uncircumcised infants excluded from salvation, Joshua 5:2; Matthew 2:16; 1 Maccabees 1:61.

Proof d. Concerning the sacrament of initiation Christ says, John 3:5; "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." The same is not said of the sacrament of confirmation. The sacrament of initiation is conferred on infants and adults, the sacrament of confirmation only on adult believers.

Question XIX. Of how many kinds are the sacraments?

Division of the sacraments. The sacraments are of two kinds, some are of the old, others of the new testament. The former are those which, having been instituted before the advent of Christ, adumbrated the same to be incarnated and to be killed through external elements: The latter are those which testify that Christ has been manifested in the flesh, has suffered and died, and exhibit the same really present.

Observation I. The sacraments of both testaments agree in; 1) their author; for all sacraments were instituted by God; 2) their common matter; for all sacraments indeed consist of a terrestrial reality, which is an external, corporeal, visible, and tangible element, and a celestial one, from which, as a cause, flows the effect of the sacrament; 3) their generic form; which is an action, undertaken according to the word of institution; 4) their final cause; which in both is the offering, bestowal, and sealing of evangelical grace; 5) the identity of their application; which is made through faith, as an ὄργανον ληπτικόν, or a receptive medium.

Observation II. The sacraments of the old and new testaments differ in; 1) duration. The sacraments of the O.T. were eventually to be abrogated, lasting μέχρι καιροῦ διορθώσεως, until the time of reformation, Hebrews 9:10. The sacraments of the N.T. will have the same end as the world. 2) extension of places and objects. The sacraments of the O.T. pertained to the Israelites within the borders of Judea, Genesis 17:7; Exodus 12:48. But the sacraments of the N.T. are catholic, common to all nations, Matthew 28:19; 1 Corinthians 11:26. 3) proper matter and form, which is one in the sacraments of the O.T., another in the sacraments of the N.T. 4) the mode of exhibiting the celestial reality. For the ancient sacraments adumbrated the θεάνθρωπος Christ, and exhibited him present only morally, John 8:56; Revelation 13:8. But our sacraments present and exhibit Christ present in the very substance of his assumed flesh. Augustine says excellently in his commentary on Psalm 73: "The sacraments of the O.T. were pre-annunciative of the coming Christ; but the sacraments of the N.T. are annunciative of Christ, exhibited in the flesh." And not badly our D. Dannhaver in hodos. p. 1030; "In the O.T. there was a typical lamb; In the N.T. the θεάνθρωπος. He lay hidden there in a shadow, here he presented himself in the body." Colossians 2:17; Hebrews 10:1. "There was a sign there without the presence of the body, here a sign of the body προσφερόμενον."

ON CIRCUMCISION, THE FORMER SACRAMENT OF THE O.T.

Question XX. What is circumcision?

Definition of circumcision. Circumcision is the former sacrament of the O.T., in which God, ordinarily through a minister of the church, to a male man to be inserted into the Judaic church, by the bloody resection of the foreskin, which prefigured the future effusion of the blood of the Messiah in his assumed flesh, and with the word of institution being added, conferred and sealed the federal grace, to the praise of divine goodness and the salvation of the circumcised man.

Observation I. Circumcision is named from circumcising; because the foreskin, which is the little skin covering the extremity of the genital member, was cut away.

Observation II. The name of circumcision is taken in three ways: a) metonymically, b) metaphorically, c) properly. Metonymically it denotes the circumcised people, Romans 15:8. Metaphorically it signifies the internal circumcision of the heart, Romans 2:29; Deuteronomy 10:16. Properly it is taken either μερικῶς, or partially, for only the external amputation of the little skin, Romans 2:28, or ὀλικῶς, for the whole act of sacramental circumcision, consisting of an external sign, typologically representing the celestial reality, and the word of command and promise, concerning which the classic locus and proper seat of this sacrament is to be seen, Genesis 17:7 ff.

Question XXI. Who instituted the sacrament of circumcision?

The efficient cause of circumcision. The triune God, the author of the federal grace and of salvation, instituted the sacrament of circumcision.

Proof. From Genesis 17, where God commanded circumcision, v. 10-12, annexed a promise, v. 7, prescribed the form by the word of institution, v. 9 ff., and threatened destruction to those who scorned this sacrament, v. 14.

Question XXII. By whose ministry was circumcision performed?

The ministerial cause. The ministerial cause of circumcision was first Abraham; then the succeeding patriarchs a); later, with the Mosaic polity established, the Levitical priests b). Extraordinarily, however, and in a case of necessity, even private members of the church performed the rite of circumcision c).

Proof a. From Genesis 17:7 ff., where we read that God established a covenant with Abraham, the sign of which was to be circumcision, v. 11. Whence also Abraham received the command to circumcise, v. 10, and executed it, v. 23. But Abraham is to be regarded not precisely as a paterfamilias, but as a minister of sacred things in the church of his house. It seems, however, that Abraham did not circumcise himself, but was circumcised by Eliezer, the prefect of his house and vicar of sacred things. Thus also the succeeding patriarchs are to be considered not so much as heads of families, as ministers of sacred things and doctors of the church.

Proof b. There is indeed no express law which explicitly binds the office of circumcision to the priestly order; Yet since, with the Mosaic polity established, the divine worship, which used to be performed by the patriarchs, was committed to the Levitical priests, it is not difficult to gather that the rite of circumcision was in the hands of the priests and Levites, distributed through all the Israelite tribes. Certainly Mattathias the priest circumcised the sons of those who had defected to ethnic superstitions, 1 Maccabees 2:46. But that the household members of any family, as far as was lawful, brought aid to the public minister, is conjectured from the example of Abraham, Genesis 17:23, and from the circumcision of John, Luke 1:59.

Proof c. Joshua, the prince of the Israelite people, by a special divine command, circumcised the sons of Israel at the hill of Arolath, Joshua 5:3. Zipporah circumcised her son, Exodus 4:25. The Israelite women, in the time of the Antiochian persecution, circumcised their infants, 1 Maccabees 1:61; 2 Maccabees 6:10.

Question XXIII. With what instrument was circumcision performed?

Instrument. The circumcising instrument was a sharp knife, of stone, or also of iron, or of steel.

Proof. In the phraseology of scripture the instrument of circumcision is called a rock, Exodus 4:25, and a knife of rocks, Joshua 5:2, i.e., of stone, or lapideous. Today the Jews use a very sharp steel knife.

Question XXIV. Who were circumcised?

The subject of circumcision. Israelite males, and the domestic servants of Israelites a), and proselytes b), were circumcised; and infants indeed, when they were eight days old, were to be initiated into the sacred rites of the Jews c).

Proof a. From Genesis 17:12; "He who is eight days old among you shall be circumcised. Every male throughout your generations (i.e., every son, born of you), whether born in the house (a homeborn slave, or a slave born in the house) or bought with money (who became a slave not by the right of birth, but of purchase) from any foreigner who is not of your offspring," i.e., a slave who came into your power, although he was bought not from the Israelite people, but from a foreigner. Yet servants were not compelled to be circumcised, but were invited, and if they refused to be circumcised, they were sent away, or sold again.

Proof b. Exodus 12:48: "If a stranger shall sojourn with you and would keep the Passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised." and then he shall come near to keep it; he shall be as a native of the land. But no uncircumcised person shall eat of it. From which it is apparent that no one was admitted to the Israelite sacred rites, especially to the eating of the paschal lamb, unless he had been consecrated by the sacrament of circumcision.

Proof c. The time of administration in boys was the eighth day from birth, Genesis 17:12. The circumcision of infants was deferred until the eighth day, so that consideration might be given to the tender bodies of the recently born; yet it was not deferred further, so that they might be received into the covenant of grace as soon as possible, to the great solace of their parents; although the act of circumcision could be deferred on account of a dangerous illness and journeys; just as God allowed circumcision to be omitted for 40 years, when the Israelite people were making their journey into the land of Canaan, Joshua 5:5-7.

Question XXV. Were females also circumcised?

The Israelite females were not indeed circumcised, yet they were partakers of the federal grace, and were certain of it not from an incised mark, but from λογισμῷ, or divine imputation.

Proof. The Israelite females, born of circumcised fathers, were married at an opportune time to circumcised men, and were destined to bear sons to be circumcised. For which reason the Israelite females were indeed excluded from the sign of the covenant, but not from the grace of the covenant initiated with Abraham. For God promises that he will be the God of Abraham and of his seed, Genesis 17:7, under which seed the females are certainly also comprehended, 1 Peter 3:6-7. Whence they were also permitted to celebrate the passover, which was otherwise not allowed for the uncircumcised.

Question XXVI. What was the matter of circumcision?

Matter. The terrestrial matter and external element of circumcision was the foreskin a). The matter, or celestial reality, was the Messiah to be born from the seed of Abraham, to be cut off with the effusion of blood, and to be cast away like an amputated foreskin b).

Proof a. From Genesis 17:11: "You shall be circumcised in the flesh of your foreskins." But the foreskin is a little skin, by which the extreme part of the virile member, or the glans, is covered. Aristotle calls it ἀκροποσθίαν, as if ἄκρον τῆς πόσθης, i.e., the extreme little skin of the genital member. Paul, with the word somewhat inflected, calls it ἀκροβυστίαν, Romans 2:25. To the Hebrews it is called ערלה, by which word, according to Rabbi David Kimchi, is signified every superfluous and heavy thing, which it is right to remove and cast away. Thomas, P. III, qu. 70, art. 3, adduces three reasons why circumcision was done on the genital member: "Circumcision was done on the member of generation for this reason: 1) Because it was a sign of faith, by which Abraham believed that Christ would be born from his seed; 2) Because it was a remedy for original sin, which is transmitted through the act of generation; 3) Because it was ordained for the diminution of carnal concupiscence, which is especially vigorous in those members."

Proof b. The celestial reality of circumcision was Christ, originating from the seed of Abraham, and to be cut off with the effusion of blood; Concerning whose cutting off see Daniel 9:26; Isaiah 53:8, where the same words are found concerning Christ as are used for circumcision. But Christ was present with the terrestrial matter, as a divine person really, as the one to be incarnated typologically and relatively, insofar as the amputated foreskin, as a type, had a respect to Christ the antitype, from whom the efficacy of circumcision flows. For in Christ we are filled with every blessing, Ephesians 1:3.

Question XXVII. What was the form of circumcision?

Form. The form of circumcision is the bloody and painful amputation of the foreskin joined with the applied word of institution.

Proof. From Genesis 17:11, where the word of institution is found, which was preceded by the word of promise, v. 7. The word of ordinance, or of application, and of invocation, was also without doubt added, which at least as to its vestiges exists among the Rabbis, and is recounted by D. Seb. Schmid in his tract on circumcision, p. 423: "Blessed are you, Lord our God, King of the world, who has sanctified us with your precepts, and has commanded that we initiate him into the covenant of Abraham, our father."

Question XXVIII. What was the nature of the union of the terrestrial and celestial reality in the sacrament of circumcision?

The union of the terrestrial and celestial reality in the act of circumcision, according to the nature of the O.T., was σχετική, relative and typical a), insofar as the amputated foreskin prefigured the Messiah to be incarnated and to be sprinkled with his blood in his most bitter passion, whom it did not exhibit substantially present according to both natures, but presented him morally present b).

Proof a. Just as the sacraments of the O.T. were pre-annunciative of the coming Messiah, not annunciative of the exhibited Messiah; So the union of the terrestrial and celestial reality in the sacrament of circumcision was not exhibitiv of the blood of Christ substantially present, but typically and prefiguratively of the blood of Christ, to be shed at the divinely appointed time.

Proof b. In the sacrament of circumcision the federal grace and the remission of sins were offered and effectively conferred, Genesis 17:7. But Christ is the sole meritorious cause of grace and the remission of sins, Acts 10:43. Therefore, although Christ in circumcision was not present according to the substance of the flesh to be assumed and the blood to be shed at some time; yet he was present, as to his person and according to the efficacy of the merit to be rendered by him, which is valid backwards and forwards, and was profitable before it existed. For this is common to all meritorious causes, that as the case arises they can exert their causal power by the value of their foreknown merit even before they exist, and can move the will of the efficient cause to act. For this reason the fruit of circumcision is to be derived from nowhere else than from the union of the terrestrial reality with the celestial, i.e., with the foreknown and foretold blood of Christ.

Question XXIX. What is the end of circumcision?

End. The primary end of circumcision is either organic, according to which circumcision was an efficacious medium for offering and conferring the federal grace a); or sigillary, according to which circumcision is a seal of the righteousness of faith b). The intermediate ends are, the segregation of the Israelites from other peoples c), an admonition concerning original sin d), and spiritual circumcision e).

Proof a. From Genesis 17:7: "And I will establish my covenant between me and you and your offspring after you throughout their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be God to you and to your offspring after you." From which words we gather that circumcision was a federal, God-uniting, and regenerative act. For to be a God to someone signifies that God is the most clement father of the man. But where there is paternity, there cannot be absent regeneration and the remission of sins, Jeremiah 31:33; Hosea 2:23.

Proof b. From Romans 4:11: "Abraham received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of faith."

Proof c. From Galatians 2:7: "when they saw that I had been entrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, just as Peter had been entrusted with the gospel of the circumcision." St. Paul distinguishes the gentiles from the Jews, designating the former by the name of the uncircumcision, the latter by that of the circumcision. But he has placed the abstract for the concrete, the uncircumcision for the uncircumcised, circumcision for the circumcised.

Proof d. Circumcision was done on the genital member because original sin is propagated through carnal generation, Psalm 51:7.

Proof e. The circumcised Jews are admonished of internal circumcision, Jeremiah 4:4: "Circumcise yourselves to the LORD; remove the foreskins of your hearts, O men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem." As if to say, it is not sufficient that the foreskin of the flesh has been resected from us, cut away also the foreskin of the heart, for rendering the most humble obedience to God.

Question XXX. Was circumcision necessary?

Necessity. Circumcision was indeed necessary by the necessity of precept and of a means a); yet not by an absolute necessity, but an ordained and conditional one b).

Proof a. From Genesis 17:14: "Any uncircumcised male who is not circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin shall be cut off from his people; he has broken my covenant." From which words it may be concluded: If the neglect of circumcision damned, the assumption of it saved; If those who omitted circumcision broke the divine pact, those who undertook it were co-opted into the divine covenant. Circumcision was therefore necessary not only by the necessity of precept, because God commanded it; but also by the necessity of a means, because it was a means of conferring federal grace and eternal salvation.

Proof b. God ordained circumcision, but did not precisely bind his power to this ordinary means: He ordained it, I say, under the condition of possibility, if an infant lived so long that he could be circumcised on the eighth day. Yet one should not therefore despair of the salvation of infants who died before the eighth day: 1) Because the promise was made to Abraham: "I will be your God, and of your seed after you"; 2) Because those infants did not transgress the law; for the reason that they ceased to live before the time destined for circumcision by the divine law; But where there is no law, there is no transgression, Romans 4:15. 3) If all uncircumcised infants had perished, then surely those infants would have been damned who were cast by Pharaoh into the river before the eighth day; who were born and died during the course of 40 years in the desert; who were killed by Antiochus before undertaking circumcision; who were slaughtered in the vicinity of Bethlehem by the satellites of Herod, not yet circumcised. See Exodus 1:22; 1 Maccabees 1:61; Matthew 2:16. But it would be too cruel to adjudge these to eternal damnation.

Question XXXI. How long ought circumcision to have lasted?

Duration. The term of the duration of circumcision was the time of Christ, manifested in the flesh and affixed to the cross a); Yet it was tolerated until the destruction of the city of Jerusalem, and the sufficient promulgation of the gospel b), which having been disseminated far and wide, it could not be undertaken without detriment to salvation c).

Observation. Different times are assigned to circumcision. For one was mortal in the O.T., in the N.T. with Christ exhibited in the flesh and crucified; dead and to be buried, with the destruction of Jerusalem; to be mourned, until the gospel was fully divulged; deadly, with the gospel preached far and wide among the nations.

Proof a. Christ by his death made the O.T. obsolete, Hebrews 8:13. Hence he cried out on the cross: "It is finished."

Proof b. Paul circumcised Timothy for the cause of removing scandal, Acts 16:3. Timothy therefore undertook circumcision as an adiaphorous thing.

Proof c. "If you let yourselves be circumcised, Christ will be of no advantage to you," Galatians 5:2. Rupert says elegantly in Book 5 on Genesis, c. 31: "Whoever is still circumcised, denies that he has come whom he professes to expect as coming by such a sign, and therefore denies that he who has already come is the Christ."

The antithesis is that of the Jews, with whom the Turks agree, who stubbornly urge the necessity of circumcision still. Their arguments are:

I. Circumcision is said to be instituted לעולם, for an eternal covenant. Response; עולם does not always denote an absolute eternity, but a periodic and limited one, i.e., a long time.

II. Isaiah predicted, c. 52:1, that in the times of the Messiah the uncircumcised and unclean would not enter the city, i.e., the church. Response; In that place is understood the internal circumcision of the soul, not the external one of the flesh.

Instance; Ezekiel 44:9 joins both the circumcision of the flesh and of the heart. "No foreigner, uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter my sanctuary." Response; Spiritual and carnal circumcision are joined, not because they ought to be of equal duration, but because the latter is a figure of the former. For the prophet describes N.T. things with O.T. phrases. Thus, making mention of the circumcision of the flesh, he designates the antitype by the word of the type, namely baptism, where we are circumcised by putting off the body of the sins of the flesh through the circumcision of Christ, being buried together with him through baptism, Colossians 2:11, so that the sense of the prophet Ezekiel is: no one will be a member of the church of Christ, unless he has been baptized and reborn; plainly as Christ says in John 3:5 concerning the necessity of regenerating baptism: "unless one is born of water and the spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven."

III. If God abrogated circumcision, he would be mutable; but he is not mutable; Therefore. Response: If God had instituted circumcision with this end, that it should be a perpetual sacrament of the church, and nevertheless had abrogated the same, he would certainly be mutable; but it was instituted for a certain time of the pedagogy and pupillage of the Jews, which having passed, it ought to cease. Therefore, God is not mutable, but constant in his counsels.

ON THE PASCHAL LAMB.

Question XXXII. What is the paschal lamb?

Definition of the paschal lamb. The paschal lamb was the latter sacrament of the old testament, in which God, through an unblemished and one-year-old lamb, consecrated by the word of institution, slain, roasted, and eaten by the Israelites and legally clean proselytes, prefigured the Messiah, to be killed for the sins of the human race, for the purpose of exciting and confirming faith in him, and obtaining the remission of sin and of the destructive plague.

Observation I. Pascha, and the paschal lamb, is named from the Hebrew word which denotes a passing over, a transition, or a leap, from the transition of the destroying angel, who on that night immediately following the institution of the paschal lamb, struck the firstborn of the Egyptians, but passed over the houses of the Israelites, and spared them, having seen the blood of the paschal lamb on the lintel, Exodus 12:13.

Observation II. Pascha in biblical use signifies 1) the paschal lamb, Exodus 12:21; 2) Chronicles 35:11; Mark 14:12, the antitype of which is Christ, 1 Corinthians 5:7: "For Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed," where Christ is called the passover metaphorically; 2) the paschal feast, together with the sacrifices connected with the paschal lamb, Exodus 34:25; Leviticus 23:5; 3) the sacred action by which this sacrament of the old testament was administered, Exodus 12:43.

Question XXXIII. Who instituted the sacrament of the paschal lamb?

The principal efficient cause. God, by his own authority, instituted and ordained the sacramental action concerning the paschal lamb, to be duly handled and eaten.

Proof. That God himself ordained the paschal lamb to be handled and eaten with certain rites, we learn from Exodus 12:1 ff., where the proper seat of this doctrine is.

Question XXXIV. Who were the ministers of this sacrament?

The ministerial cause. The ministers for promulgating the divine institution of this sacrament were Moses and Aaron a). But the ministers of the slaughter and roasting of the paschal lamb were partly the fathers of families of the Israelite nation b), partly the Levites c).

Proof a. From Exodus 12:21, where Moses says: "Go and select lambs for yourselves according to your clans, and kill the Passover lamb." The obedience of the people is subjoined, v. 28: "And the sons of Israel went away; as the LORD had commanded Moses and Aaron, so they did."

Proof b. 1) From Exodus 12:6: "and the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill their lambs at twilight." Therefore, any paterfamilias in Egypt, where the Levitical priesthood had not yet been ordained, could slaughter the paschal lamb. 2) Deuteronomy 16, God addresses the entire Israelite people: "you shall sacrifice the Passover to the LORD your God." From which we gather that the right of slaughtering and roasting the paschal lamb stood with any paterfamilias of the Israelite nation not only before, but also after the establishment of the Mosaic polity.

Proof c. 1) From 2 Chronicles 30:17: "the Levites were over the slaughtering of the Passover lambs." Cf. c. 35:6, 11, "the Levites slaughtered the passover, and flayed them." 2) From Ezra 6:20: "The priests and the Levites had purified themselves... to keep the passover." Where we note: a) that "passover" can denote not only the paschal lamb, but also other sacrifices which were made on the days of unleavened bread and were connected with the paschal lamb; b) The fathers of families, laboring under legal impurity, resigned their right to the priests and Levites; c) The fathers of families, for the greater solemnity of the public joy, employed the priests and Levites, as companions in the sacred labors.

Question XXXV. What was the terrestrial and celestial matter of this sacrament?

Matter. The terrestrial matter was an unblemished and perfect lamb, male, of one year, taken from the common flock of sheep, and sometimes also of goats a). The celestial matter was Christ, to be sacrificed for the sins of the whole world b).

Proof a. From Exodus 12:5: "Your lamb shall be without blemish, a male a year old. You may take it from the sheep or from the goats." Where observe 1) That the Israelites for the most part slaughtered a lamb; which indeed more lucidly adumbrated Christ, the most innocent lamb, who takes away the sins of the world, John 1:29. But when a lamb was lacking, a kid was used; for it is called by the generic name "pecus," which denotes a small domestic animal, and could be taken from the diverse species of smaller domestic animals, from the flock of sheep, or of goats. 2) That the lamb used was unblemished and perfect, i.e., lacking a defect, not lame, not scabby, etc. 3) That it had to be a year old, which was either soon to complete its first year of age, or had completed it, yet had not so exceeded it that it could be considered two years old. For the rest, a lamb that was less than eight days from its birth was not used.

Proof b. The celestial matter was Christ, to be sacrificed for the sins of the entire human race fallen into sin, of whom Paul says, 1 Corinthians 5:7: "For Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed."

Question XXXVI. What was the union of the celestial and terrestrial matter?

The union of the terrestrial and celestial lamb, according to the nature of the old testament, was σχετική, relative and typical, such as is that of a type to an antitype; by which Christ to be crucified and killed was prefigured, and was presented to the fathers as morally present, but was not exhibited substantially as to both natures.

Proof. Christ the celestial lamb, who takes away the sins of the world, John 1:29, was typologically represented by the paschal lamb, with all his merit, for the salutary fruition of the participants. The Messiah was therefore present personally, as the eternal

Son of God; but as to the flesh he was present in the sacrament of Pesach not substantially, but morally, by reason of the divine decree, promise, and efficacy of the merit to be rendered by him. For a meritorious cause, before it really exists, can by the value of its foreknown merit move the will of the efficient cause. In which respect he is also said to have been slain from the foundation of the world, Revelation 13:8.

Question XXXVII. What was the form of this sacrament?

Form. The form of this sacrament consisted in a) the timely selection of the perfect lamb, b) the bloody slaughter, c) the roasting, d) the total consumption, and e) the repetition of the words of institution.

Proof a. The lamb was taken from the common flock on the tenth day of the month of Nisan and was kept until the fourteenth day of this month, Exodus 12:3, 6. The segregation was therefore made four days before the lamb was slaughtered, 1) so that the fathers of families could more solicitously inquire into the perfection and requisites of that lamb, and observe whether it labored under any defect; 2) so that from the daily sight (or even cry) of that lamb they might take occasion to speak among themselves of their admirable liberation from Egypt, and the future redemption by the Messiah.

Proof b. The lamb was slaughtered between the two evenings, Exodus 12:6, the first of which began from the end of the third hour of the afternoon, which was called the ninth by the Hebrews; when the sun, a great part of the day having passed, inclines to its setting, the other evening is the end of the eleventh hour. At that same point in time Christ, the antitypical lamb, willed to die. The slaughter was not done without αἵματεκχυσία, because without it there is no remission of sin, Hebrews 9:22. Wherefore the slaughter of the lamb prefigured the effusion of the blood of Christ.

Proof c. The lamb was eaten not raw, not boiled in water, but roasted with fire, Exodus 12:9. Christ was prefigured as to be roasted, partly by the fire of divine wrath toward the sins which he took upon himself, partly by the fire of his love toward us to be redeemed.

Proof d. That the whole lamb was to be eaten, Moses teaches, Exodus 12:10. It was signified that the whole Messiah was to be eaten both spiritually and sacramentally.

Proof e. God sanctioned this sacrament with the word of institution, Exodus 12:11: "It is the LORD's Passover," and he ordered these words also to be used in the course of time, so that this rite might be distinguished from other thousands of non-sacramental acts, Exodus 12:27.

Question XXXVIII. Who were admitted to the eating of the paschal lamb?

Subject. Israelites, both male and female a), free of impurity b), possessing the use of reason c), also servants, and circumcised proselytes d), were admitted.

Proof a. "The whole congregation of Israel shall keep it (the passover)," Exodus 12:47. Therefore, females were not excluded, who, although they were not circumcised, were nevertheless consorts of the covenant of grace.

Proof b. From Numbers 9:10: "Speak to the people of Israel, saying, If any one of you or of your descendants is unclean on account of a dead body, or is on a long journey, he shall still keep the Passover to the LORD. In the second month on the fourteenth day at twilight they shall keep it." From which we gather that females suffering from menstrual blood were not admitted to the feast of the paschal lamb. But that king Hezekiah admitted the unclean to the celebration of the passover (against the law, Numbers 9:10), was done by a singular dispensation of God, 2 Chronicles 30:20.

Proof c. Children in whom the use of reason manifested itself, so that they could say: "What does this service mean to you?" Exodus 12:26, were present at the celebration of the passover; the rest were kept away.

Proof d. 1) From Exodus 12:43, 44: "no foreigner shall eat of it. But every slave that is bought for money may eat of it after you have circumcised him." 2) From Exodus 12:48-49: "If a stranger shall sojourn with you and would keep the Passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised. Then he may come near and keep it; he shall be as a native of the land. But no uncircumcised person shall eat of it."

Question XXXIX. What was the end of the paschal lamb?

End. The primary end was the confirmation of the federal grace and of faith in the coming Messiah a). The secondary ends were: physical liberation from the smiting angel b), commemoration of the miraculous leading out from the servitude of Egypt c), certification of future defense and protection d).

Proof a. From Hebrews 11:28: "By faith he kept the Passover and sprinkled the blood." The slaughter of the paschal lamb was a distinguished figure of the lamb of God to be slain for us, John 1:29; 1 Corinthians 5:7; Revelation 13:8, and the pouring out of the blood adumbrated the effusion of the blood of Christ, by whose power we escape the slaughter of the destroying angel, obtaining through the blood of Christ the remission of sins, Ephesians 1:7. Thus therefore Moses celebrated the passover with the people of God by faith, so that he might more and more excite and confirm faith in the Messiah, the immaculate lamb of God.

Proof b. From Exodus 12:23: "For the LORD will pass through to strike the Egyptians, and when he sees the blood on the lintel and on the two doorposts, the LORD will pass over the door and will not allow the destroyer to enter your houses to strike you."

Proof c. From Exodus 12:14: "This day shall be for you a memorial." This was the end of the passover, that the Israelites, eating the paschal lamb, should ruminate on the incomparable benefit of the admirable liberation from Egypt, where they were pressed by the yoke of servitude.

Proof d. Whoever, God the best and greatest, had rendered aid to the most turbulent Israelites in the times of Egypt, his assistance is to be seriously implored and certainly expected in all adversity.

Question XL. Was the paschal lamb a sacrifice?

The paschal lamb was not a sacrifice, properly so called; analogically, however, it can be so called.

Observation I. A sacrament is one thing, a sacrifice another. In a sacrament God offers and confers grace to men; In sacrifices men offer a gift to God, to obtain his grace.

Observation II. The paschal lamb is not to be confused with the paschal sacrifices: 1) Because the Pesach was only a lamb; but the paschal sacrifices were sheep and oxen, Deuteronomy 16:2; 2) The Pesach was the object of the evening slaughter, or between the two evenings on the 14th day of the month Nisan from the ninth hour to the end of the eleventh; but the sheep and oxen were used for paschal sacrifices on the days of unleavened bread; 3) the paschal lamb was slaughtered by the fathers of families in their individual houses; but those paschal victims were slaughtered only by the priests, with the Levites flaying the sacrificial animals.

Proof. 1) No sacrifice, properly so called, could be made in Egypt, on account of the abominations of the Egyptians, Exodus 8:26. 2) Every sacrifice, properly so called, was performed by a priest on an altar, with the sacrificial rite which the outline of the Levitical priesthood prescribes: The paschal lamb was ordinarily slaughtered not by a priest, but by the fathers of families, Exodus 12:6, nor on a solemn altar, but in private houses. 3) If the paschal lamb was a sacrifice properly so called, it was either a זבח, or a מנחה. Not a mincha, because that was a meal sacrifice, consisting of fine flour, and cakes and wafers with salt, wine, and oil, partly burned, partly destined for the priest, Leviticus 2; Numbers 15. But such was not the lamb, a living animal. Nor even a zebach strictly so called; because it was neither a holocaust, nor a sacrifice for sin and trespass, nor a peace offering: It was not a holocaust; because the whole lamb was not burned; nor a sacrifice for sin, because the sins of the people were not laid upon it; nor a peace offering, because it was not eaten by the priests in the holy court itself. Therefore, it is not under the special notion of a sacrifice, although it can be called a זבח under the notion of a slaughter.

The antithesis is that of most of the Pontificals, who assert that the paschal lamb was a sacrifice properly so called. Who rely on the following arguments:

I. Whatever was a type of the sacrifice of Christ, that was a sacrifice properly so called: The Passover was, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because it is necessary that the antitype should correspond to the type, or agree with it. Response: We distinguish between an omnimodal, or absolute agreement, and a fitting, or respective one. It is not necessary for the type to correspond to the antitype in its special requisites, since the former agrees with the latter not absolutely and simply, but in a certain respect, and therefore a type of a sacrifice is not necessarily a sacrifice. For the slaughter of the red heifer, Numbers 19:2, also figures the bloody slaughter of Christ, Hebrews 9:13, and yet it was not a sacrifice.

II. The paschal lamb is called זבח פסח, Exodus 12:27. Therefore, it is a sacrifice. Response: It is called זבח פסח not because it was a sacrifice properly so called, but with the word זבח being taken more generally, so that the sense is: It is the slaughter of the passover, because this slaughter was instituted when the Lord passed over, and so that he would pass over. And thus the Holy Spirit uses the word זבח, Samuel 28:24; c. 16:3; 1 Kings 1:9, for a slaughter; whence it is also used of the slaughter of men, Isaiah 34:6. The same is responded to that of Mark 14:12: πᾶσχα ἔθουσιν. For θύειν does not always denote a sacrificial slaughter; as Matthew 22:4; Luke 15:23, 27; Acts 10:13; in which places τὸ θύειν is used of preparatory acts for a banquet, or a meal, outside of all sacrificial respect.

Instance: Although the word broadly signifies any slaughter, yet you will not easily find it used otherwise than of a sacrifice, especially in this place, where a special relation to God is insinuated, v. ליהוה. Response: Although the application of זבח to a victim is more famous in the scriptures; yet this is not done necessarily, by reason of the root, which denotes a slaughter, either for a feast, or for a sacrifice; but by reason of the material position. In that amplification, therefore, we understand the words of Moses, Exodus 12:27, although we confess that the feast of the paschal lamb was most holy and most singular, which we concede can analogically be called a sacrifice, on account of the solemn slaughter and effusion of blood.

III. Every external act, defined by the word of God, in which a sensible and permanent thing is consecrated to God alone, and is actually offered as an odor of rest, is a sacrifice: But the paschal lamb, etc. Therefore. Response: Something is consecrated to God, either as a formal term, or as a final term. The whole paschal lamb was slain for the use of man, who is the formal terminus ad quem of this sacrament.

Question XLI. Was the sacramental action occupied with the paschal lamb necessary?

Necessity. The sacrament of the paschal lamb was necessary, by the necessity of precept and of a means.

Proof. God instituted and commanded the eating of the paschal lamb, Exodus 12. Therefore, it is necessary by the necessity of precept. The neglect of eating the paschal lamb damned, Exodus 12:15. Therefore, its observance saved, and thus it was necessary not only by the necessity of precept, but also of a means.

Question XLII. What circumstances are to be observed for a fuller understanding of the sacrament of the paschal lamb?

So that we may more fully understand this sacrament, the circumstances of place a) and of time b) are to be observed.

Proof a. The place of the celebrated passover was either extraordinary, or ordinary. The first extraordinary one was Egypt, and in specie the house of each paterfamilias, Exodus 12:46; the second the desert of Sinai, Numbers 9:5; the third Gilgal, Joshua 5:10. The ordinary one was Jerusalem; which indeed was that place which God had chosen to place his name there, Deuteronomy 16:5-6. By that express denomination of the place 1) elective cults were opposed, 2) concord among the confessors of the one true religion was nourished, 3) the sacrifice of the Messiah, to be offered in the city of Jerusalem, was prefigured. But outside this place the exiled and dispersed Hebrews celebrated a mnemonic passover indeed, but not a panegyric and solemn one.

Proof b. The time of this sacrament is one of institution, another of administration, another of abrogation. The time of institution falls in the year of the world 2513, according to the calculation of D. Calovius. See his biblical chronicle, fol. 80. The time of administration varies, according to the diverse acts; for the segregation was made on the tenth day of the month Nisan, but the slaughter on the fourteenth day, and the roasting and eating on the night following the fourteenth day, and indeed in the first watch, Exodus 12:8. But the sacrament of the paschal lamb was abrogated by the institution of the Lord's supper; for with the body present, the shadow ceases, Colossians 2:17. It is added that the solemn celebration of the passover was restricted to the temple of Jerusalem, which having collapsed, its solemnity expired.

SUSPIRIUM

The imbecility of the human intellect is most clearly established to You, OMNISCIENT GOD. It does not acquiesce in promises, even the truest, but demands signs and pledges that strike the eyes. To consult, You, most CLEMENT FATHER, for the infirmity of the human intellect, You most wisely ordained visible signs of your invisible grace. Recalling this with a grateful memory of mind, I pray most humbly that by the salutary use of the sacraments You may confirm me, the infirm, excite me, the languishing, sustain me, the vacillating, so that I may stand unmoved in the doctrine of faith and piety of life, and just as strenuously fight against the devil, the world, and the flesh! Dispense at last out of grace, ETERNAL GOD, to me, who under the sun militate for you alone, the crown of righteousness and glory!

CHAPTER IV.
ON THE SACRAMENTS OF THE
NEW TESTAMENT,
THE FORMER SACRAMENT
OF THE N.T.
NAMELY ON BAPTISM.

Question I. How many sacraments of the New Testament are there?

HERE ARE TWO sacraments of the N.T., baptism and the Lord's supper, or the eucharist. Proof. 1) From the requisites of the sacraments of the N.T. As many as are the sacred and solemn actions, instituted by Christ, proper to the N.T., consisting of an external visible element defined by Christ himself, and dispensing with the same a celestial reality, likewise determined by Christ in the words of institution, for conferring and sealing grace, comprehended in the word of promise, so many are the sacraments of the N.T.; But there are only two such sacred and solemn actions, namely baptism and the eucharist; Therefore.

2. If besides the Spirit, the witness of our salvation, there are only two terrestrial witnesses in the N.T. concerning the divine grace and our salvation, namely water and blood, no more sacraments of the N.T. are to be established than two; But the former is true, as John testifies, 1 Epistle c. 5:8; Therefore also the latter.

3. The primitive church had only two sacraments, of which Paul says in 1 Corinthians 12:13; "For in one Spirit we were all baptized... and all were made to drink of one Spirit."

4. Those only are sacraments of the N.T. whose matter flowed from the side of Christ hanging on the cross. But the matter of baptism and the eucharist, etc. Therefore. The major is clear from a collation of the passage in John's 1st epistle, c. 5:6, and the glossa ordinaria, which praises this sentence from Augustine: "Just as while Adam slept, Eve was made from his side; So while Christ was dead, his side was pierced by a lance, so that the sacraments might flow forth, by which the church is formed." The minor is clear from John 19:34.

5. Just as in the O.T. there were only two, not more, properly so called sacraments, circumcision and the paschal lamb; so also in the N.T. the sacraments, properly and strictly so called, are only those two which have been substituted in their place, baptism, which is also called περιτομή ἀχειροποίητος for that reason, Colossians 2:11, and the Holy Eucharist, which for that reason was instituted after the eating of the paschal lamb on the very night in which Christ was betrayed, at the same table, Matthew 26:26.

6. Because these two sacraments suffice for the spiritual life. There are four things which a man needs for the constitution and preservation of life. A birth, a garment, nourishment, and medicine. A man receives the birth and garment of the spiritual life in baptism, nourishment and medicine in the Holy Supper. What more can he desire?

7. The remaining sacraments, which are imagined by the adversaries, are not properly so called sacraments of the N.T. For matrimony is not proper to the N.T., because it was already instituted in paradise. Penance flourished both in the times of the old and the new testament, nor does it have a visible element defined by Christ himself. Extreme unction was not instituted by Christ, but according to the mind of Lombard it is owed to St. James; nor did it always last in the new testament. Orders has indeed a promise of the efficacy of the ministry, but that is not connected with an external visible element. Confirmation was not instituted by Christ, whether you regard its matter or its form.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificals, whose opinion is that there are seven sacraments: baptism, the Lord's supper, confirmation, penance, unction, the order of ministers of the church, and matrimony.

(*) Since their arguments are weak, we will touch upon only a few of them:

I. As many as are the necessary aids of the spiritual life, so many are the sacraments. But there are seven, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the sacraments were divinely instituted to confer, strengthen, and increase the spiritual life, and to preserve it from diseases. The minor is proven; because by baptism a spiritual generation occurs, by confirmation an augmentation, by the eucharist nourishment, by penance a remedy against sin, by extreme unction a remedy against the remnants of sin, by matrimony men are propagated to be deputed to the worship of God, and by holy orders they are ruled and ordained. Response: 1) If it were permissible to argue thus, there would be more sacraments than seven, namely the blood of Christ, the preaching of the divine word, and daily prayer, which contribute much of moment to the spiritual life. 2) Neither extreme unction nor marriage generates the spiritual life, or preserves it when generated.

(*) In this disputation against the Roman Catholics a general argumentation is sufficient, to be drawn from those things which are necessarily required for a sacrament of the N.T., of which if even one is absent, it cannot be a properly so called N.T. sacrament. First, the ambiguity which lies in the word must be removed. When it is said a sacrament of the new testament, there ought to be understood a sacred action, instituted by divine authority by Christ for the offering or confirming of men's salvation, of such a kind that in the new testament it not only ought to be done, but also began to be done, and was never before this age. It is necessary, therefore, that in a sacrament of the new Testament, properly so named, these four things should be present conjoined: 1) The Word of God, specifically of Christ, as the Sponsor of the N.C.; the word, I say, both of institution and of promise; 2) some terrestrial thing, commanded by Christ himself, or, as it is wont to be said, an element, to be used by the eyes; 3) the power of offering and conferring salvation of the soul, by a new generation, remission of sins, renewal of the mind, and a certain expectation of perfect blessedness; 4) the action itself to be proper to the new testament, and never to have been customary before. Since these things are so, the conclusion will be by necessary consequence: those five sacraments, by which the adversaries have dared to increase their number, are first indeed plainly not sacraments, and then if in some way they were sacraments, are not sacraments of the new Testament. Therefore, a sacrament of the new Testament is not 1) confirmation, especially in the way which they observe, and which is wont to be performed with many superstitious rites (requisites 1, 2, 3 are lacking); Nor is it 2) the Order and consecration of the ministers of the church (requisites 2, 3, 4 are lacking); Nor 3) matrimony (requisites 2, 3, 4 are likewise lacking) and what a wonderful and twofold repugnance; in what way, I ask, will this opinion of theirs concerning the sacrament of matrimony be able to be reconciled with another certain decree of theirs concerning celibacy, as if its dignity and preeminence is greater than that of marriage? Can anything be holier and more excellent than a sacrament? How unjustly also is it dealt with priests! Is it right and equitable to deprive men, consecrated to a sacred business, of the grace of a sacrament? What further? if someone, in their customary manner, should argue thus: what one does not have, he cannot give to another? Nor 4) the absolution of sins (requisites 2 & 4 are lacking): Least of all, finally, 5) extreme unction, as an extreme superstition (all four numbered things are lacking). What the Apostles did, Mark 6:13, and what for some time was the custom under the auspices of the N.T. church, James 5:14-15, that 1) was something singular and extraordinary, in the manner of miracles; let them therefore perform today also, if their powers are of any avail, those things which were granted to the first Legates of Christ, Mark 16:17-18: 2) it pertained to healing the sick; therefore it was nothing less than extreme unction, for the cause of death, as is clear in both cited places; 3) it brought with it nothing of the so many and so superstitious rites which in the Roman assembly are thought necessary for this action.

II. Marriage is called a great sacrament, Ephesians 5:32, and is an efficacious medium of divine grace; since a woman is saved through childbearing, if she remains in faith, 1 Timothy 2:15. Response: 1) In the text there is μυστήριον, which is broader than sacrament. 2) The spiritual marriage of Christ and the church, adumbrated by the marriage of a husband and wife, is called a μυστήριον. 3) Τεκνογονία is neither a cause of salvation, nor an impediment to salvation.

III. Extreme unction is a sacrament, for it has the word of command and promise, and a visible element, James 5:14. Response: We distinguish between corporal and spiritual unction. In that place, the subject is corporal unction, and that miraculous, which had a place in the primitive church. But sacraments strictly so called confer and seal the evangelical grace concerning the remission of sins and connected spiritual benefits.

IV. Penance is a sacrament properly so called, insofar as it is conjoined with absolution; for it has a divine command, a promise of grace annexed, John 20:23, and an external symbol, namely χειροθεσίαν, or the imposition of hands. This the Apology of the A.C. has observed, p. 200: "Truly sacraments are baptism, the Lord's supper, and absolution, which is the sacrament of penance. For these rites have the command of God and the promise of grace, which is proper to the N.T." Response: Penance, conjoined with absolution, approaches most nearly to the nature of sacraments properly so called; for through it, according to the command of God, the benefits of Christ are dispensed to penitents, the promises of the gospel are applied in specie, and the gratuitous remission of sins is announced; but it does not have an external and visible element expressly determined in the word of institution; concerning which Augustine, tract. 80 on John, says: "Let the word be added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament." Χειροθεσία (the laying on of hands) is not expressly defined by the word of institution (which according to the Pontificians is found in John 20:23), nor is it essential to penance and absolution. Add to this that penance was also in the Old Testament. Therefore, it is not a sacrament of the New Testament, strictly speaking.

Question II. What is baptism?

Definition of baptism. Baptism is a sacred and solemn action, divinely instituted, in which a sinful human being, alive and born, without distinction of sex or age, is washed with water in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, so that through this washing of water the divine grace, promised by the word of the gospel, may be applied, conferred, and sealed to him.

Obs. I. Baptism is derived from the word βαπτίζειν, which properly signifies to wash, either by immersing or by sprinkling. It signifies immersion more frequently, but sprinkling more rarely. The meaning of sprinkling occurs in Mark 7:34, where the Jews are said not to have eaten unless they were baptized, i.e., washed their hands with water, and in Luke 11:38, the Pharisees are said to have marveled that Christ had not been baptized before dining, i.e., had not washed his hands. (*)

Obs. II. The word baptism is taken either improperly or properly. Improperly it denotes a) the baptism of blood, i.e., the cross, calamity, a bloody and bitter death. In which sense the Savior says, Luke 12:50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" Cf. Matt. 20:22. From this it came about that in the primitive church martyrdom was called the baptism of blood, when catechumens were seized by a bloody death before they were tinged with baptismal water; to which, however, the remission of sins is wrongly attributed by the Pontificians, since Christ procured this by his blood, which he confers and applies to believers through the sacraments. b) The baptism of wind, or of fire, that is, the miraculous effusion of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, about which John says in Matt. 3:12; "I indeed baptize you with water... but He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and fire"; by which words are indicated the gifts of tongues, miraculously conferred upon the Apostles and represented by fiery tongues, Acts 2:16. c) The baptism of the journey, through the Red Sea and the cloud, 1 Cor. 10:2; "Our fathers... were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea," i.e., the Israelites passed through the Red Sea, with Moses and the bright cloud as their guide. For just as the Israelites were freed from Egyptian servitude by this passage, so we by the benefit of baptism are delivered from the servitude of the Stygian Pharaoh. And as Pharaoh with his whole army was swallowed by the waves of the Erythraean Sea, so the old Adam, attended by an army of vices, is submerged in baptism. Properly, it denotes a) generally, any washing or ablution of filth. b) Specifically, it designates the legal and Levitical washings, handed down to Israel by the law of Moses, which in Heb. 9:10 are called διάφοροι βαπτισμοί (various baptisms). c) Most specifically, it designates the evangelical baptism, proper to the new testament, and is commonly called the baptism of water.

(*) As it concerns the word, these two names, βαπτισμός (baptismos) and βάπτισμα (baptisma), by common custom indeed denote one and the same thing; but by the manner of speaking in the sacred letters, not only customary but also perpetual, they differ among themselves, and indeed in such a way that the word baptismus is never employed concerning this N.T. sacrament, but always concerning other washings, either holy and ritual, commanded in the divine law of the O.T., Hebr. VI, 2. IX, 10. or Pharisaic and smelling of superstition, devised by human will, Marc. VII, 4. & 8. But baptisma is the name by which either Christ's suffering of evils, Matth. XX, 22. Luke, XII, 50. or in most places the sacrament of the N.T. is signified.

Obs. III. Some add the baptism of light, i.e., doctrine. But the sayings of scripture that are cited, Matt. 21:25, Acts 18:25, Acts 19:3, are to be understood of the baptism of water.

Question III. Who instituted baptism?

Efficient Cause. The sacrament of baptism was instituted by the triune God a). Christ the θεάνθρωπος (God-man), risen from the dead, repeated the command to baptize and extended it to all nations b); yet he himself baptized no one with his own hands c).

Prob. a. God sent John to baptize with water, John 1:33. To which command he most promptly obeyed. For the word of the Lord came to John, and he came (to obey the divine command) preaching baptism, Luke 3:2.

Prob. b. Christ after the resurrection did not first institute the sacrament of baptism, but repeated the institution, extended the command to baptize to all nations and men, and prescribed to the Apostles and their successors a universal and perpetual norm and formula for administering baptism, saying: "All authority has been given to me in heaven and on earth." From which it is concluded that the authority to institute baptism belongs to Christ, even according to his human nature, according to which all power was given to him in heaven and on earth, Matt. 28:18.

Prob. c. John 4:2: "Jesus Himself did not baptize, but His disciples." But when in John 3:22 & 25 Christ is said to have baptized, this is to be understood of the ministry of the Apostles, through whom Christ baptized; just as king Solomon is said to have built the temple, Acts 7:21, not immediately, but through the medium of architects. The reason why Christ did not baptize αὐτοχειρί (with his own hand), because scripture has not revealed it, we do not clearly know. The ancients, however, adduced the following reasons: 1) So that Christ might remove the false persuasion of those to be baptized, lest those who were baptized immediately by Christ should seem to have received a greater benefit than those who were baptized by the disciples. 2) So that Christ might show the difference between himself and his ministers, that the ministers baptize only with water, but he himself with the Spirit. 3) To indicate that baptism is not to be estimated from the dignity of the minister.

Question IV. Who ordinarily administers baptism?

Ministerial Cause. The ministers of the church, legitimately called and ordained a), orthodox and of blameless life b), ordinarily administer baptism. But extraordinarily, and in a case of necessity, any pious Christian knowledgeable in the sacred rites, whether male or female, can administer baptism c).

Prob. a. Only the ministers of the church are the ordinary dispensers of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. 4:1. The same are the ambassadors of God, sent with the ministry of reconciliation, 2 Cor. 5:18, 20, which consists in the preaching of the word and the administration of the sacraments.

Prob. b. From 2 Tim. 2:15; "Be diligent to present yourself approved to God, a worker who does not need to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Where you should note that piety of life is required of a minister of the church for the sake of propriety, but the efficacy of baptism does not depend on his probity, since it flows from God, the author. Whence there should be no doubt at all about the validity of a baptism dispensed by an impure minister.

Prob. c. 1) Laymen in a case of necessity can preach the word of God (which is established by the example of Aquila and Priscilla, Acts 18:26; Rom. 16:3). But he whose it is to teach, it is also his to baptize. 2) Every Christian is a spiritual priest before God, Apoc. 1:6. For which reason, by virtue of the spiritual priesthood, he can baptize, if he is knowledgeable in the sacred rites. 3) Laymen administered circumcision, in whose place baptism has succeeded. Zipporah circumcised her son, Exod. 4:24-25, which the Maccabean women also did in a case of necessity, 1 Macc. 1:35; lib. II, c. 6:10. Which circumcision God himself approved.

You say: I. To whom it is not permitted to teach in the church, to him it is not permitted to baptize (because the office of teaching and baptizing is of equal dignity): But it is not permitted for a woman to teach in the church, 1 Tim. 2:12. Therefore... Resp. As it is not fitting for women to teach solemnly and publicly, so the solemn use of baptizing is not suitable for them. But just as in urgent necessity they can teach privately, so too they can baptize.

You say: II. Women are not called to teach and to baptize. Resp. They are not called by a special and economic vocation; they are, however, called by a general vocation to the spiritual priesthood, and by the vocation of charity, to be exercised in a case of necessity.

You say: III. To whom it is not lawful to dispense the Holy Supper, to them it is not lawful to administer baptism; But it is not lawful for women to dispense the Holy Supper. Therefore... The major is established: because the utility and necessity of baptism and the Lord's supper are equal. Resp. We deny the major. For the proof, we say that the necessity of baptism is greater than that of the Lord's supper. For the Savior says of baptism: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven," John 3:5. But he does not say the same of the Lord's supper. The confirmation of faith is had from the Holy Supper, but not solely; it can also be obtained and had from the pious remembrance of baptism, the announcement of absolution, and the evangelical promise.

Question V. Was the baptism of John and of Christ, administered by the Apostles, the same?

The baptism of John and of Christ was one and the same, with respect to origin a) and efficacy b), although it differs from it accidentally c).

Prob. a. Because the baptism of John, just as that of the Apostles, was instituted by God, John 1:33; Luke 3:2.

Prob. b. 1) Because John baptized a baptism of repentance and of faith in Christ. Paul inculcates this to the Ephesian disciples, Acts 19:4: "John indeed baptized with a baptism of repentance, saying to the people that they should believe on Him who would come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus." 2) John baptized for the remission of sins. But that does not happen except through faith in the name of Jesus Christ, Acts 10:43.

Prob. c. 1) John baptized into Christ ἐρχόμενον, the one who was to come, i.e., born indeed, but not yet having suffered and died, nor yet glorified and announced to the whole world, Matt. 3:11; Acts 19:4; John 1:29. The Apostles, however, although they baptized at the beginning into Christ not yet having suffered or died, yet afterwards they administered baptism into Christ having suffered, died, been glorified, and known to the whole world, Acts 2:36; Rom. 6:3. 2) Through the baptism of John, the visible gifts of the Holy Spirit were not conferred on any man. For John performed no sign, John 10:41. But the Apostles after the ascension of Christ into heaven, not always indeed, but very often through baptism conferred the visible gifts of the Holy Spirit, as can be read in Acts 19:2-3.

Antithesis is that of the Pontificians and Socinians, who deny the identity of the baptism of John and of the Apostles. They object to us:

I. John himself distinguishes his baptism from the baptism of Christ when he says that he baptizes with water, but Christ will baptize with the Spirit and fire, Matt. 3:11. Resp. The baptism of Christ is taken in two ways: a) For the sacrament of initiation, which is otherwise called the baptism of water. b) For the visible effusion of the Holy Spirit, and is called the baptism of fire. When it is asked whether the baptism of John is of the same efficacy as the baptism of Christ, it is taken in the former way, insofar as it is a sacrament of initiation; in which respect it is the same as the baptism of John, since by it also initiation into Christianity was made.

II. Certain disciples baptized by John were baptized again by Paul, namely with the baptism of Christ, Acts 19:3 ff. Resp. Those disciples were not dipped twice, but once by John the proto-baptist, v. 3. But when in verse 5 it is said: "When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of Jesus," these words are not of Luke the historian, who wrote the Acts of the Apostles, but are the words of Paul the teacher still speaking and explaining the baptism of John. To wit, when the disciples in v. 3 had said that they were baptized with the baptism of John, Paul begins to explain how and in what order John baptized, and shows that the baptism of John was a baptism of repentance, and that John spoke of the Christ to come, that they might believe in him. The Apostle continues by teaching, v. 5: "When they heard this, the hearers of John were baptized (to wit, by John, not by Paul) in the name of the Lord Jesus." The reason is at hand; because it is the continued speech of Paul, and in the Greek text (ἀκούσαντες δὲ) the particle δὲ corresponds to the preceding particle μὲν (Ἰωάννης μὲν). From which series of the text it is perspicuous that Paul did not rebaptize these men, but only laid his hands on them, so that they might receive the gifts of the Holy Spirit in a visible form, about which they had heard nothing before. For by the Holy Spirit is understood the wonder-working spirit, or the miraculous effusion of the gifts of the Holy Spirit. See Acts 10:44-46.

III. Whoever is not said to have baptized in the name of Christ, his baptism is not the same as the baptism of the Apostles, because the Apostles are said to have baptized in the name of Christ; But John etc. Therefore... Resp. We deny the minor; for with Paul as witness, Acts 19:4, "John baptized a baptism of repentance, and said to the people that they should believe in him who was to come, namely in Jesus Christ."

IV. John is not said to have baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity. Resp. Although it is not said αὐτολεξεῖ, or found κατὰ τὸ γράμμα (according to the letter), that John baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity; yet because John was sent by God to baptize, John 1:33, it is validly concluded that he baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity; since that formula of baptizing is handed down by Christ, Matt. 28:19. For it is not probable that God instituted baptism with different forms. And how would he not baptize in the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, to whom, while he was baptizing, the whole Holy Trinity appeared under visible signs?

V. The baptism of John pertained only to the Jews; for we do not read that John baptized other nations than the Jews: The baptism of Christ did not pertain only to the Jews: Therefore, the baptism of John is not the same as that of Christ. Resp. a) John did not baptize only Jews; because all Judea and the entire region around the Jordan, Matt. 3:5, was baptized by John, in which tract there were many Gentiles. Cf. Matt. 4:15. b) John preached a baptism of repentance, Acts 19:4. Therefore, whoever needed repentance, to them the baptism of John pertained. But not only Jews need repentance, but also Gentiles.

VI. Whoever by baptizing prepared the way for Christ, his baptism does not agree with the baptism of Christ; But John etc. Luke 1:76; John 1:23. Therefore... Resp. That preparation does not derogate from the efficacy of John's ministry. But just as his doctrine and preaching was efficacious for converting men, Luke 1:16, and giving the knowledge of salvation, which is in the remission of sins, Luke 1:77, so his baptism also did not lack spiritual virtue and efficacy.

VII. The baptism of Christ is the baptism of regeneration, Tit. 3:6. But the baptism of John was not the baptism of regeneration; Therefore... The minor is proved; because the baptism of John is only called the baptism of repentance, Matt. 3:11. Resp. By the very fact that the baptism of John is the baptism of repentance, it is the baptism of regeneration. For regeneration formally consists in the donation of faith, which salvific repentance embraces in itself as its principal part.

Instance; But by the very fact that it is called the baptism of John, it differs from the baptism of Christ. Resp. It is called the baptism of John, of the minister, whose author and master is God. John baptized διακονικῶς (ministerially); the αὐτοκρατορία (sovereignty) belongs to Christ. See John 1:6; 3:27.

Question VI. Is baptism conferred by a heretic efficacious and valid?

If baptism has been conferred by a heretic who retains the substantials of baptism, its efficacy is not to be doubted a). But if it is to be conferred in a flourishing church, where an orthodox minister can be had, it cannot be sought from a heterodox one without great sin b). In a persecuted church, however, in urgent necessity, it is sought and received without fault from a heretic who observes the customary formula of baptism, provided that a protestation is added, that the infant is not bound by this baptism to accept a false doctrine c).

Prob. a. Because the efficacy of a rightly performed baptism depends not on the ministerial cause, but on the principal one, 1 Cor. 3:7.

Prob. b. Because we are forbidden to be yoked together with unbelievers, 2 Cor. 4:14. On the contrary, we are ordered to come out of the evil church, lest we share in the plagues of the evil assembly, Apoc. 18:4.

Prob. c. Because Christ ordered the Pharisees, sitting in Moses' seat, to be heard, insofar as they proposed the doctrine of Moses (for the vocal, not the local, seat of Moses is understood; since Moses never crossed the Jordan, nor ever lived in Jerusalem), Matt. 23:2. If, therefore, the circumcision of the heterodox Pharisees was not held to be invalid, then certainly the baptism of heretics is not inefficacious.

Question VII. What is the matter of baptism?

The Matter of Baptism. The matter of baptism is twofold, earthly and heavenly. The earthly matter of baptism is natural, pure, commonly available water, constituted in legitimate use.

Obs. I. By natural water is excluded artificial, distilled, medicated, rose water, etc.; by pure water is excluded mixed, muddy, and feculent water, such as lye, broth mixed with parts of bread and meat, salt water, and the like. But purity is not understood as exact and absolute, to which no alien element adheres, but common or natural purity is understood. Whence baptismal water is to be segregated from dregs with as much diligence as men are accustomed to avoid feculent waters serving for washing and drinking. By commonly available water is indicated ordinary water, of whatever kind it may be. "There is no distinction," says TERTULLIAN, L. de baptismo c. VI, "whether one is washed in the sea or a pond, a river or a spring, a lake or a channel. Nor is there any difference between those whom John dipped in the Jordan, and those whom Peter dipped in the Tiber."

Obs. II. The proximate matter of baptism is water placed in legitimate use, since it touches the body of the one being baptized. If any droplets of water in baptizing flow past the body of the infant being baptized, they are not the proximate matter of baptism.

Obs. III. The reason why God destined water for the sacrament of baptism has not been revealed in the written word of God. It is certain, however; a) That water is a medium πολυκοινων, available to all nations. In any nation there is as much water as suffices for baptism. b) That there is no clearer symbol of the Holy Spirit and the efficacy of baptism than water. God the Father is the fount, the mouth of the fount is the Son of God, the crystalline river flowing from both is the Holy Spirit. Water cleanses the body: baptism, the vehicle of the Holy Spirit, purges the soul. Water refreshes the thirsty, vivifies drooping plants, and makes trees fruitful; baptism, called to memory, quenches the thirst of the soul, which it vivifies when sad, and begets the fruits of repentance. Water cools; baptism provides refreshment against the ardor of concupiscence.

Prob. Our assertion is proved; 1) Because Christ was baptized with water and ordered baptism with water, Matt. 3:11; Matt. 28:19. 2) Because baptism is called the washing of water by the word, Eph. 5:26. 3) Because we are reborn of water and the spirit, John 3:5. 4) Because the Apostles baptized with water, Acts 8:36; c. 10:47.

Antithesis is that of the Pontificians and Socinians, who maintain that another liquid than water can be used for baptizing. They object:

I. So great a necessity can arise that another liquid, in the absence of water, must necessarily be used for baptizing: but necessity has no law. Resp. So great a necessity is not to be feigned, by which the substance of baptism is changed.

II. The Lutherans do not reject the baptism of the Pontificians, who pour some of the priests' chrism and the catechumens' oil into the baptismal water. Why then cannot lye, rose water, or another liquid be used? Resp. We certainly fault the Pontificians for that mixture. Since, however, water preponderates in that pontifical act of baptism, we maintain that an infant baptized by Pontificians is not deprived of the salutary effect on account of that mixture.

Question VIII. What is the heavenly matter of baptism?

The heavenly matter of baptism, analogically speaking, is the whole Holy Trinity a); but peculiarly and terminatively, the Holy Spirit b).

Obs. The name heavenly matter here is not taken in the ἀκριβείᾳ (precision) of the Philosophers, but in a certain latitude for the heavenly thing. Strictly speaking, neither the Holy Spirit nor the venerable Trinity is or can be called a material cause. Therefore, by matter we understand nothing other than the thing. See D. SCHERZER. in breviar. Hulsem. p. 588.

Prob. a. 1) From the divine institution, Matt. 28:19: Whatever, by virtue of the divine institution, is most presently united to the baptismal water and is conferred on the infant being baptized, that is the heavenly matter or thing of baptism; But the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit etc. Therefore. Where you should note that, with GERHARD as interpreter, by the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is understood the infinite majesty, ineffable holiness, inenarrable goodness, admirable virtue, and grace of the whole Holy Trinity, which is present with all its virtue and benefits, and through which, united to the word and sanctified, it operates efficaciously. 2) From Gal. 3:27: Whom we put on in baptism, he is the heavenly matter united with the earthly matter; But Christ etc. Therefore.

Prob. b. 1) Whatever is poured out on us in baptism, that is the matter of baptism; But water and the Holy Spirit are poured out on us in baptism; Therefore they are the matter of baptism; the former indeed earthly, the latter heavenly. The major is established; because baptism is a spiritual washing, whose matter is that which is poured out on the one being washed. 2) By whatever we are washed in the sacrament of baptism, that is its matter; But we are washed by the Holy Spirit in the sacrament of baptism, 1 Cor. 6:11. Therefore. 3) From that from which we are regenerated, that is the matter of baptism; We are regenerated from water and the Holy Spirit, John 3:5. Where you should note that just as the particle "from," joined to water, denotes the earthly matter or thing; so the same numerical particle "from," joined to the Spirit, denotes the heavenly matter or thing of baptism. For no suitable reason can be opposed to the contrary, why, to wit, "to be born of water" should signify the visible thing of baptism, but "to be born of the Spirit" (in the same phrase, in the same clause) should not denote the invisible thing of baptism.

You say: The cited passage cannot be understood of a material cause; because, although the water of baptism is a material cause, it is not, however, a material cause of regeneration, but an instrumental one; because regeneration is not something consisting of water and the Spirit, as of matter, but an action and spiritual change of man, depending efficaciously on the Holy Spirit and water; on the Holy Spirit indeed, as the principal efficient cause, but on water, as on an instrumental cause. Resp. 1) By regeneration in this passage is understood baptism, which is an efficacious means of regeneration. 2) Since baptism is a divine action just as regeneration is, it does not have a matter ex qua, properly so called, but its matter is said to be that thing with which it is occupied and from which its efficacy flows.

4. Spiritual and truly divine effects (such as regeneration, justification, renewal, salvation) cannot be attributed to water alone, as the earthly matter, without idolatry, just as they cannot be to the mere sound of the ἀκουστός (audible) word, unless the Holy Spirit were united to it, who makes the word, whether ἀκουστόν or ὁρατόν (visible), to be spirit and life.

Antithesis is that of 1) the Socinians, who deny the heavenly thing of baptism, 2) certain of our own, who indeed do not deny that the Holy Spirit or the most sacred Trinity is present to the baptismal water, but who doubt whether it can therefore be called the matter of baptism. Their arguments are:

I. The purest spirit cannot be called matter; The Holy Spirit is the purest spirit; Therefore. Resp. The purest spirit cannot be called matter univocally; I grant. But it is called so analogically, and by heavenly matter is understood that supernatural thing which, united with water, is conferred on the one being baptized, and which bestows efficacy on baptism.

II. The efficient cause of baptism is wrongly held to be its matter; But the triune God etc. Therefore. Resp. The triune God is the efficient cause of baptism with respect to its institution; he is, however, the matter of baptism with respect to the sacramental union and communication, by which the triune God most presently unites himself to the water of baptism, and through this medium communicates himself to us, as our most present good, with all spiritual benefits.

III. Whatever doctrine is explained in different ways by evangelical doctors, nothing certain is to be asserted about it; The doctrine of the heavenly matter of baptism etc. Therefore. The minor is proved; because D. LUTHER teaches that the heavenly thing is the word of God, whom D. BALDWIN follows; D. HUTTER opines that the heavenly thing of baptism is the blood of Christ; D. DANNHAVER, the Holy Spirit; D. AFFELMANN, the whole most sacred Trinity. Resp. This diverse manner of speaking is not with difficulty reconciled by D. CALOV, who teaches excellently, vol. IX of his Systema, p. 166; The heavenly matter of baptism, if it is to be defined completely, is the Holy Trinity, God the Father, God the Son, Christ the θεάνθρωπος, to whose integrity not only the divine, but also the human nature pertains, just as the blood also altogether pertains to this, of which he was made a partaker for our sake, and also the Holy Spirit. Which heavenly thing is univocally called the word and name of God, that is, God himself, triune and one, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Instance I. The word of institution is not God himself. Resp. The word of institution, when it is called the heavenly thing of baptism, is to be taken not ἄνευ συμπλοκῆς, incomplexly, simply and nakedly, as it is only an external word, but μετὰ συμπλοκῆς, complexly with the name, i.e., with the very thing expressed by that most holy name: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, or ἡνωμένως and conjointly; because just as the naked word, without the Holy Spirit, is not the power of God, so the word of God always has united to it the Holy Spirit and the whole Trinity, John 6:63, 68. Whence is its efficacy, which it also exerts in baptism, which is the washing in the word, for our regeneration and salvation, Eph. 5:26.

Instance II. The blood of Christ is the meritorious cause of baptism. Therefore, it is not its material cause. Resp. The blood of Christ is present in the sacrament of baptism, 1) by reason of merit; because the fruit of baptism was obtained by the blood of Christ, shed on the altar of the cross for our sins, Heb. 9:28. 2) By reason of substance; because the Son of God assumed flesh and blood into the unity of his person, and now after the union has been made, he performs all the works of the mediator in, with, and through the human nature; therefore the whole Christ, θεάνθρωπος, is present to this sacrament. 3) By reason of efficacy; because in baptism we are cleansed from our sins by the blood of Christ, 1 John 1:7. And St. Peter, 1 ep. 1:2, teaches that we are sprinkled no less with the blood of Christ than with water, when he commemorates the ῥάντισμὸν αἵματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ). Our meaning therefore is that Christ ἐξ ἀναίματος (not without blood) is present to baptism with a substantial, and that efficacious, presence, and communicates the efficacy obtained by his blood to the person being baptized by means of the washing of water. In which way it is called the heavenly matter of baptism. Furthermore, when some of our theologians deny that the blood of Christ is the heavenly matter of baptism, they take the word "blood" distinctly and with a specific difference from the body and divinity of Christ, as is done in the eucharist; yet they concede that the blood of Christ is the heavenly thing, if it is taken conjunctively, as blood is an internal part of the body of Christ.

Instance III. But why is the Holy Spirit peculiarly called the heavenly thing of baptism, when nevertheless the baptismal act is a work ad extra, and therefore a work common to all three persons of the deity? Resp. Although the works of the Trinity ad extra are undivided, yet the order and distinction of the persons must be preserved. Scripture itself attributes the effect of baptism, namely regeneration and renewal, in a peculiar way to the Holy Spirit, Tit. 3:6. And therefore the Holy Spirit is called the heavenly thing of baptism appropriatively, because the Holy Spirit is present to baptism, administered according to the institution of Christ, 1) by reason of his essence, just as the other persons of the Trinity are also present; 2) as the oblation and collation of evangelical grace; 3) as the sealing of the covenant initiated between God and the one baptized, valid at any time.

Question IX. What is the nature of the union of the earthly and heavenly thing in the sacrament of baptism?

The sacramental union of the water constituted in the legitimate use of baptism, and the word of institution, embracing the glorious name of the Holy Trinity, is not typical or relative a), but real and exhibitiv, inferring both the substantial presence of the triune God and the communication of supernatural efficacy b).

Obs. From the preceding question it is clear that baptism consists not only of an earthly matter, but also of a heavenly matter, analogically so called (which can also be called the other intrinsic constituent of the sacrament), which heavenly matter is called by some the word of institution, by others the name of the Holy Trinity, by others the Holy Spirit. The word of institution, however, is here taken not abstractly, but complexly, as it embraces the glorious name of the Holy Trinity: The name of God, however, in the present denotes the majesty, goodness, wisdom, power, and holiness of God. The Holy Spirit is in a peculiar and singular way called the heavenly thing of the sacrament of baptism, for this reason, that the effects of baptism are appropriated to the Holy Spirit. If, therefore, you should assert that the water in the act of baptism is united with the word of institution, or with the name of the Holy Trinity, or with the Holy Spirit, you will not have erred, for this reason, that those formulas of speaking agree in reality.

Prob. a. In the sacraments of the O.T., the earthly thing only prefigured the heavenly, adumbrated it typically, and presented it morally: But in the sacraments of the N.T., the earthly thing exhibits the heavenly as substantially present. Therefore, the union of the earthly and heavenly thing in the sacrament of baptism is not typical or relative, but real and exhibitiv.

Prob. b. 1) The means of our purification and sanctification is called the washing of water not simply, but in the word, Eph. 5:26. Therefore the washing of water is mystically united with the word of institution. 2) There is one baptism, which is performed with water in the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Therefore, in the act of baptism, water is sacramentally united with God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. 3) The one ἀποτέλεσμα (result) of regeneration proceeds from water and the Spirit, John 3:5. Therefore, water placed in legitimate use is mystically conjoined with the Holy Spirit, from whom the power of regenerating principally proceeds.

Question X. What is the form of baptism?

The Form of Baptism. The form of baptism embraces both the ablution by water, which is done either by the immersion of the whole body in water a), or by a continuous sprinkling, or pouring of water on a major part of the body b), and the pronouncement of the words of institution c), in such a way that a distinct mention, confession, and invocation of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is made d).

Prob. a. ΒΑΠΤΙΖΕΙΝ in general signifies washing or ablution, whether it is done by pouring water or by immersion. At the beginning of the primitive church, baptism was performed by immersion. The one to be baptized, having laid aside his clothes, would descend into the river, and be immersed naked in the water; For which reason Christ in Matt. 3:13, 26 is said to have come up straightway from the Jordan. Therefore, he had first descended, and it is probable that the whole body of Christ was submerged, that by his purification he might sanctify the waters, as GREGORY NAZIANZEN opines, Orat. 34. So also Philip and the Eunuch both went down into the water, and the former baptized the latter, Acts 8:38. To which the words of Paul refer, Rom. 6:4: "By baptism we are buried with Christ into death," and Col. 2:12: "buried with Christ." For in these phrases, reference is made to this rite of the primitive church, where those being baptized, wholly immersed in water, were, as it were, buried. The church for a long time cultivated and employed this manner of baptizing. For that it had not yet become obsolete in the third century after the birth of Christ, CYPRIAN is a witness, who in L. IV, epist. 7, raises the question concerning those who receive grace in infirmity, that is, are regenerated, yet on account of adverse health cannot be completely immersed in water, but only sprinkled with water, whether they are to be held as true Christians? From which it is easy to gather that in the third century, while CYPRIAN was alive, baptism was performed by immersing the whole body; yet, when necessity urged on account of bodily infirmity, baptism was accustomed to be performed by the sprinkling of water. And CYPRIAN reports in the same place that some were unwilling to number such, who were only sprinkled with water, among true Christians, but called them Clinics, because they were sprinkled with water while lying on a bed. To whom he responds in the cited epistle that it is no obstacle to those lying down that, excluded by necessity, they could not be baptized by the customary rite, namely immersion, but it is sufficient that they were sprinkled with water in the name of the Holy Trinity.

Prob. b. 1) The washing of hands and feet, which is also done by sprinkling alone, is called ΒΑΠΤΙΣΜΟΣ, Mark 7:4; Luke 11:38. Therefore, the meaning of the word βαπτίζειν is satisfied even by sprinkling alone; just as the βαπτισμός of the cloud and the sea, 1 Cor. 10:2, denotes a lightly performed sprinkling. 2) Three thousand are read to have been baptized in one day within the city of Jerusalem, Acts 2:38. But who would believe that so many men, in that place in the city where they had flocked, were washed by Peter alone with an immersion of the whole body in water? 3) Who could persuade himself that so great a multitude of men and women, Matt. 3:5, entirely naked and with their clothes laid aside (with all modesty), were immersed in the Jordan by John in the sight of so many onlookers, in broad daylight? 4) The baptism of the clinics provides a manifest example of baptismal sprinkling. But the custom of baptizing by sprinkling prevailed in the western church after the age of GREGORY around the year 875, and gradually throughout almost the entire west the rite of immersion became obsolete; a) On account of the tender bodies of infants, which cannot be exposed to the cold air and wholly immersed in regions situated to the north, especially in winter time, without present danger to their health. b) For the sake of honesty and modesty, for which reason it is more decent today to sprinkle or pour water on adults, especially women, than to immerse them naked in their whole body before men.

Prob. c. The form of baptism consists not only in things done, but also in things said. Pertaining to baptism is both τὸ μαθητευτέον (that which is to be made a disciple) and τὸ βαπτιστέον (that which is to be baptized), on account of the words of institution: μαθητεύσατε βαπτίζοντες, Matt. 28:19. Therefore, the form of baptism consists both in action and in speech. Speech is inferred by the imperative: μαθητεύσατε. Which word indeed generally signifies to make disciples, but at the same time connotes "to say." For disciples are made both by words, or instruction, and by a ritual initiation; which initiation, however, as a rite, requires the words of a particular institution. For a rite is not, as it were, dumb, and to be performed with gestures alone, or mute actions. But the action is evident from the imperative: "baptize," which is implied in the participle. For the words, "teach, baptizing," are to be resolved thus: Teach and baptize. Cf. HULSEM. brev. cap. X. p. 595.

Prob. d. That the customary formula of baptizing in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is to be retained is validly gathered: 1) Because Christ himself prescribed this formula, Matt. 28:19. Christians should not rashly depart from the prescription of Christ. 2) Because by this formula of baptizing, both the ὁμοουσία, or the same essence, of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and their personal distinction are indicated. For we are baptized not into the names, but into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, because their name is one, i.e., their authority, majesty, and essence is one. Moreover, the Son is distinguished personally from the Father in the words of institution; Therefore, in the same way the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the Father and the Son. 3) This formula of baptizing comprehends the confession and invocation of the Holy Trinity. We are baptized into the name of him in whom we are bound to believe and whom we are bound to invoke; for by the sacrament of baptism we are bound to the faith, profession, worship, and obedience of him who is the author of baptism. Therefore baptism is called the inquiry of a good conscience toward God, 1 Pet. 3:21. "We ought to believe as we have been baptized, to adore as we believe," says BASIL M., ep. LXXVIII. 4) This formula of baptizing indicates the benefits which each and every one of the three persons of the Divinity dispenses through baptism into the one baptized. God the Father receives him as a son, the Son as a brother, the Holy Spirit as a temple or dwelling. For which reason, in baptism, distinct mention of the three persons of the Divinity must be made.

Obs. Although the passive Greek formula is sufficient: "Let the servant (handmaid) of Christ be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit"; yet the active Latin formula: "I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," is plainer and more emphatic; since by it is comprehended at once the principal and the organic cause, the Holy Spirit and the minister. Add that it is apprehended by natural sense that the practical imperative of the formula, "baptize," should in practice be changed into the indicative: "I baptize." For in this way the conformity of the command and the execution becomes more evident.

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny a) that baptism is rightly performed by sprinkling, and b) that the formula of baptism in the name of the three persons of the deity must be rigidly observed. For immersion they contend with the following arguments:

I. They adduce the examples of Christ and others, baptized by the submersion of the whole body, Matt. 3:16; Acts 8:36. Resp. Those examples show that that immersion is licit, and was anciently used, especially in warmer places, but they do not prove that it is absolutely and everywhere necessary.

II. Βαπτίζειν signifies to immerse. Therefore, βαπτισμός denotes immersion. Resp. Βαπτίζειν signifies to wash, either by immersion in water, or by pouring water.

III. The Apostle of the Gentiles institutes a comparison between baptism and the death and resurrection of Christ, Rom. 6:3-4, namely that by immersion we are buried with Christ, but by emersion we rise with him. Which adumbration can in no way be had by sprinkling, which is done with a very little water. Resp. 1) The significations and adumbrations pertain to the secondary, not the primary, end of baptism. For the latter is regeneration and renewal, Tit. 3:5. 2) The analogy of the burial of Christ can have a place, even if only the head is sprinkled with water. For he whose head is sprinkled or poured upon with water, is, as it were, buried by that water. 3) Although sprinkling does not so manifestly signify our spiritual burial with Christ, it does, however, signify the ῥαντισμὸν αἵματος, the sprinkling of the blood of Christ, 1 Pet. 1:2, and the form of making a covenant, which was performed by the sprinkling of blood, Exod. 24:8; Heb. 9:19.

Against the rigid observation of the customary baptizing formula they argue:

I. The Apostles baptized in the name of Christ, Acts 2:38; c. 10:48; c. 19:5. Therefore, we are not necessarily obliged to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Resp. 1) Some Fathers maintain that those who are baptized in the name of Christ are also implicitly baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, according to that of BASIL, book on the Holy Spirit, c. XII: "The appellation of Christ is a profession of the whole Holy Trinity; because it at once declares the Father, who anointed, and the Son, who was anointed, and the Holy Spirit, who is the anointing." And IRENÆUS, book IV against Valentinus, says: "In the name of Christ three persons are understood: the one uniting, the one anointing, and the anointing." For which reason some maintain that this formula, "in the name of Jesus Christ," is not to be reprobated, provided it is not understood exclusively: Which baptism HUGO and LOMBARD acknowledge as valid, cited in D. CALOV, vol. X of his Systema, p.

288. 2) When the Apostles are said to have baptized in the name of Christ, it does not indicate the formula of baptism, but the efficient cause, or the author who instituted baptism, so that the sense is: The Apostles baptized by the authority, will, and command of Christ. For in no way is it probable that the Apostles did anything against the institution of Christ, which is of strict observance.

II. We are also baptized into the death of Christ, Rom. 6:5. But death is not the name of God: Therefore, we are not baptized in the name of God alone. Resp. We are baptized into the death of Christ not formally, but finally; because by baptism we are made partakers of the efficacy of the death of Christ, by which we have liberty from the guilt and dominion of sin, which Christ procured for us by his death.

III. The Israelites were baptized into Moses, 1 Cor. 10:2. Therefore, men are not baptized in the name of God alone. Resp. a) Moses speaks of a typical, not a proper, baptism. b) The Israelites were baptized not into the name or person of Moses, but into Moses, that is, into the profession and ratification of the doctrine which Moses professed: Which doctrine was not so much of Moses as of God. If one could be baptized into the name of Moses, why not also into the name of Paul? But the Apostle rejects this, 1 Cor. 1:13.

Question XI. Who is to be baptized?

The Subject of Baptism. To be baptized is a true human being a), carnally begotten b), and brought forth into the light c), whether male or female d), whether an adult who is not resistant e), or an infant f).

Prob. a. From Matt. 28:19. Therefore, a true human being is to be baptized, not a bell, not a monster incapable of regeneration.

Prob. b. From John 3:5-6: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. That which is born of the flesh is flesh." The reason why men need baptism is that they are flesh of flesh, i.e., conceived in original sin.

You say: Christ was baptized, who yet was not flesh of sinful flesh. Resp. Christ was baptized by the same economy, or special dispensation, by which he was circumcised; namely, that by the contact of his body he might sanctify the baptismal waters, and apply to us by the baptism of water the righteousness procured by his blood, Matt. 3:16.

Prob. c. No one can be reborn unless he has been born. Hence an embryo is by no means capable of baptism.

Prob. d. We read that Lydia, a woman, was baptized, Acts 16:15. "There is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ," Gal. 3:17.

Prob. e. History teaches that at the very beginning of the nascent church many adults were tinged with the sacred wave. This is the difference between infants and adults, that infants indeed cannot be instructed beforehand, but adults must first be taught and afterwards baptized, so that from the hearing of the word they may conceive both a hatred of sin and faith in Christ, Matt. 28:19; Matt. 3:6; Acts 8:27. Wherefore, through baptism, faith and that which follows it, justification and renewal, are not first conferred on adults, but are sealed and increased.

Prob. f. That infants are capable of baptism is evident 1) from the universal necessity. Whatever is born flesh of flesh, that must be regenerated of water and the Spirit under peril of salvation, John 3:5-6. But infants are born flesh of flesh. Therefore... 2) From the universal command of Christ, Matt. 28:19, where Christ commands all nations to be baptized. Under all nations, infants are also comprehended. 3) From the universal promise, Acts 2:38-39, coll. with Gen. 17:7, from which we gather; Those to whom the promise of grace and the evangelical covenant has been made, they are to be baptized, so that by baptism they may be constituted heirs of eternal salvation; But the promise has also been made to infants. Therefore... 4) From the parity with circumcision. To whom the circumcision of the old testament pertained, to them also pertains the baptism of the new testament (because the latter has succeeded in the place of the former, Col. 2:11. Nor is the grace of the old testament greater than that of the new); But circumcision also pertained to infants; Therefore... 5) From their fitness for the kingdom of heaven. Those to whom the kingdom of heaven belongs, to them pertains baptism as a means of arriving in that kingdom. The kingdom of heaven belongs to infants, Mark 10:14. Therefore... 6) From the practice of the primitive church; since indeed the Apostles baptized entire houses and families (to which infants also pertain), Acts 16:15; c. 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:16.

Antithesis is that of the Anabaptists and Socinians, who impugn paedobaptism with the following arguments:

I. We do not have an explicit divine command to baptize infants: Therefore, we are not obliged to paedobaptism. Resp. A universal command, which admits of a descent to infants, is sufficient for us. Otherwise, we conclude by the same reasoning: There is no explicit divine command to baptize Transylvanians; Therefore, no Transylvanian is to be baptized. There is no explicit command that the eucharist is to be offered to women. Is it therefore not to be offered to them? But just as from the words "drink all of you" we rightly conclude for women, so we argue invincibly for infants on account of the words "baptize all nations."

II. Christ was baptized in his thirtieth year of age; Therefore, baptism should be deferred to the thirtieth year of age today. Resp. Christ was circumcised in his infancy, at which time baptism had not yet been instituted; since indeed John the Baptist first administered baptism in the 29th year of Christ. Add that the baptism of the most holy Jesus (which he undertook out of free economy) could be deferred without danger; but our infants, conceived in sin, are subject to various dangers.

III. If infants are fit to receive baptism, they will also be fit to receive the preaching of the divine word (because both baptism and the preaching of the word are means of regeneration); The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. We deny the consequence of the major; because for receiving the preaching of the word with fruit, hearing and meditation are required, of which infants are not capable due to the lack of the full use of reason. Nothing, however, impedes them from being baptized.

IV. If infants are capable of baptism, they will also be capable of the Lord's supper (for both are sacraments of the N.T.); The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. We deny the consequence of the major; because one who is about to approach the Lord's supper, δοκιμαζέτω ἑαυτὸν, let him examine himself, 1 Cor. 11:28. But such a δοκιμασία (examination) does not apply to infants, nor is it required of those to be baptized.

V. Whatever baptism is not voluntary, that is not legitimate; The baptism of infants is not voluntary; Therefore... The major is established; because the whole Christian religion is voluntary, therefore also baptism, a notable part of the Christian religion. The minor is proved; because προαίρεσις, or purpose of the will, does not yet apply to infants. Resp. Something is called voluntary, either that which is elicited by the will, or that which is admitted by a non-repugnant will. Although infants do not actively choose baptism, they do not, however, resist; but they admit it spontaneously.

VI. Whoever cannot enter into a covenant with God, they are not to be admitted to baptism; For in baptism a pact or covenant is entered into with God; Infants cannot enter into a covenant with God; Therefore... The minor is clear; because a covenant is entered into between those who possess the use of reason, which infants lack. Resp. On the part of the one who makes a covenant with another, the full use of reason is not always necessary, which is clear from the example of circumcised infants. Not infrequently among men, covenants are sanctioned in which parents vouch in place of infants, and so the covenant also embraces infants not yet possessing the use of reason. The same thing happens in baptism, where, when infants are received into the covenant, others vouch for them, namely those who offer them for baptism.

VII. Infants are not capable of faith; Therefore, neither are they fit to receive baptism. Resp. That infants are capable of regeneration and of faith, we have given proof in the preceding section, ch. IV, on regeneration.

Question XII. Are the infants of Jews and Gentiles to be washed with the sacred water?

The infants of reluctant Jews and Gentiles are not to be seized for baptism by violent daring a). If, however, they have come into our power by legitimate means, baptism is not to be denied them b).

Prob. a. 1) Because to baptize a small child with the parents contradicting is an injury to paternal power. The faculty of disposing of the religion of their children belongs to and remains with all parents, Eph. 6:4. 2) Because the Apostle says: "What have I to do with judging those also who are outside?" 1 Cor. 5:13, q.d., I have no right over them. 3) The violent seizure of children from the hands of infidel parents is repugnant to divine and natural law, as kidnapping, severely prohibited, Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7; The Gospel, however, does not abolish law and equity. 4) Such a baptism is conjoined with the manifest danger of apostasy and profanation of baptism.

Prob. b. The infants of Jews and Gentiles, who come into our power by legitimate means, e.g., by victory, by liberation from shipwreck, etc., are from the census of our goods, and therefore subject to our command and disposition. For which reason, if danger of life threatens them, they are to be baptized immediately. But if God prolongs their life, baptism is to be deferred until they become catechumens, so that they themselves may give an account of their faith before they are baptized.

Question XIII. Are the children of prostitutes and of other men excommunicated from the church to be baptized?

The infants of prostitutes and of other men excommunicated from the church are rightly baptized, with the consent of the parents.

Prob. 1) Because the son shall not bear the guilt of the father, Ezek. 18:20. 2) Because it is the earnest will of God that not one of the infants should perish, Matt. 18:14. Hence Christ invites all infants to himself, Mark 10:4. 3) The illegitimate are capable of salvation; Therefore also of the means of salvation. Jephthah was illegitimate, yet not uncircumcised, Judg. 11:1, whom the Apostle deigns to insert into the catalog of saints, Heb. 11:32.

You say: The author of the book of Wisdom condemns the illegitimate, ch. 3:16-17. Resp. a) That book is apocryphal. b) Understood are those illegitimate who follow in the footsteps of their impious parents, Exod. 20:5.

Instance; But the illegitimate is forbidden to enter the church of the Lord, even to the tenth generation, Deut. 22:2. Resp. To enter the church of the Lord in that passage signifies to perform an ecclesiastical office, from which the illegitimate are barred, lest the authority of the ecclesiastical office become cheapened.

Question XIV. Are also foundlings (χαμεῦρετοι), or exposed infants, to be baptized?

Baptism is not to be denied to exposed infants.

Prob. 1) From the universal will of God; because he does not will that any of the little ones should perish, Matt. 18:14. 2) From the highest necessity; because unless they are born again of water and the Spirit, they cannot enter the kingdom of heaven, John 3:6. But that the salvation of others is to be procured, Paul teaches, Col. 3:16.

You say: If that exposed infant had been previously baptized, it would become an ἀναβαπτισμός (rebaptism). Resp. That cannot be said to be repeated which is not known to have been done.

Instance I. But if a note is affixed to the exposed infant, testifying that it has been baptized, should it then be repeated? Resp. That note does not deserve faith, since it originates from a woman worse than beasts who cherish their own young.

Instance II. But it could be baptized conditionally, in this way: "If you have been baptized, I do not baptize you; but if you have not been baptized, I baptize you in the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." Resp. That hypothetical baptism of the Pontificians begets perpetual doubt both in him who administers the baptism and in him who conditionally perceives this sacrament, whether baptism was conferred once or twice, rightly or wrongly. For which reason, that conditional baptism is not to be tolerated in the church.

Question XV. Are the infants of Christians, before receiving baptism, holy and in the divine covenant?

The infants of Christians, before receiving baptism, are holy with an external holiness, or that of the church a), but they are not holy with an internal holiness, or that of faith b). The promise of the covenant belongs to them, but they are not yet in the exhibited covenant c).

Prob. a. From 1 Cor. 7:14: "But now your children are holy." An external or ecclesiastical holiness is understood, which consists in this, that the infants of the faithful have the closest access to divine grace, and therefore to the participation of the means through which, by divine ordinance, eternal salvation is conferred. For they are born within the camp of the church, and have a right to the thing, although they do not yet have a right in the thing, i.e., they have immediate access to the federal divine grace, but they are not yet actually partakers of the federal divine grace. Ecclesiastical holiness is so called, not as if unbaptized (ἀβαπτιστοί) infants of Christians are citizens or members of the church, but because they have the right and power of obtaining the privileges of the citizens of the church, which are not so easily granted to others who are outside. This external holiness is called by D. CALOV, in bibl. illustr. on 1 Cor. 7, p. 317, a merely relative holiness, and such according to an extrinsic denomination. By D. BALDWIN it is called Levitical and legal; by D. DANNHAVER, corresponding to Levitical purity, in hodos p. 1093.

Prob. b. 1) Because infants before receiving baptism are flesh of flesh, John 3:6, children of wrath, Eph. 2:3, unclean, conceived of unclean seed, Job 14:4; Ps. 51:7. 2) Because by baptism we are cleansed from sins, Eph. 5:26. Therefore, before baptism we were unclean and not holy. 3) Because by baptism the first access into the kingdom of heaven is opened to us, John 3:5, whence by the confession of all, baptism is the sacrament of initiation. Hence TERTULLIAN says: "Christians are not born, but made."

Prob. c. The divine covenant is indeed promised to the infants of the faithful, but not yet exhibited or applied, Gen. 17:10; Acts 2:39, 41. For since the promise of the covenant is conditioned, or determined by the condition of receiving circumcision or baptism, infants, before receiving the sacrament of initiation, are not actually grafted into the divine covenant.

Antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, asserting that the infants of the faithful, before receiving baptism, are holy and co-opted into the divine covenant. Their arguments are:

I. The infants of the faithful are expressly called holy, Rom. 11:16; 1 Cor. 7:14. Resp. The infants of the faithful before receiving baptism are holy with an external holiness, or that of the church, but they are not yet holy with an internal holiness, or that of faith.

II. Those to whom the divine covenant pertains, they are holy; But to the infants of the faithful etc. Therefore... The minor is evident from Gen. 17:19; Acts 2:38. Resp. Those to whom the divine covenant pertains as exhibited and applied through the means of grace (circumcision and baptism), they are holy with an internal and spiritual holiness; but indeed, to the infants of the faithful not yet circumcised or baptized, pertains only the promise of the covenant, determined by the condition of receiving circumcision or baptism.

III. Many unbaptized persons have believed, e.g., Cornelius, Acts 10:47; the Eunuch, Acts 8:37. Therefore, before receiving baptism they were holy with the holiness of faith. Resp. A distinction is made between infants and adult catechumens. In infants, with the intervention of baptism, faith is kindled; in adult catechumens, by means of baptism, faith is increased and confirmed.

IV. If those born of Jews are called Jews by nature, then also those born of Christians will be Christians by nature. The antecedent is true, with Paul as witness, Gal. 2:5. Therefore, so is the consequent. Resp. A distinction is made between Jews according to the flesh and according to the spirit. Jews according to the flesh are those who are born of Israelites, and they are opposed to Gentiles, just as Germans are contrasted with Gauls, Spaniards, etc. A Christian is not such a gentile name, but he who is anointed with the oil of the Holy Spirit, he is called a true Christian, who is not born such, but is made so by baptism; just as a Jew according to the spirit is he who by circumcision has been grafted into the divine covenant and remains in the same covenant by true faith.

Instance: If the infants of Christians are not Christians by nature, there will be no difference between the infants of Gentiles and of Christians, since both those and these are devoid of holiness. Resp. There certainly is a difference. For the infants of Christians enjoy an external and ecclesiastical holiness, because they are begotten in the church from faithful parents and have an immediate or proximate right to the means of grace, so that a certain prerogative belongs to them above those who are outside, 1 Cor. 5:12. Therefore, they are wrongly called by the common people "young heathens."

Question XVI. What is the end of baptism?

The End of Baptism. The primary end of baptism is the oblation, application, collation, and sealing of evangelical grace a). The secondary ends are: the distinction of Christians from Gentiles, and their union to the body of the church b), and the obligation to true faith and piety of life c).

Prob. a. Evangelical grace in this place is the applying grace of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit applies this grace to us as the principal cause through baptism, as an organ or divinely ordained means. For through baptism is applied to us 1) calling grace, therefore by baptism as by a door we enter the kingdom of grace, or the church, John 3:5.

2) Illuminating grace; because by baptism we are imbued with such a light of knowledge that we put on Christ, Gal. 3:27. From which the Greek Fathers called baptism φωτισμόν, illumination, from Heb. 6:4. See GREGORY NAZIANZEN, Orat. 40 on baptism. 3) Regenerating grace, by which we are endowed with faith; for baptism is the washing of regeneration, Tit. 3:5. Infants receive regenerating grace through baptism without preceding faith, since it is excited and kindled by the efficacy divinely imparted to baptism. 4) Justifying grace; because we are baptized for the remission of sins, Acts 2:38. 5) Indwelling grace; because by baptism we put on Christ, Gal. 3:27, and are inscribed into his mystical body, 1 Cor. 12:13. 6) Renewing grace; for baptism is the washing of renewal, Tit. 3:5. 7) Conserving and sealing grace. Just as to Abraham circumcision was a seal of the righteousness of faith, Rom. 4:11, so baptism, which has succeeded in the place of circumcision, is today for adults who have been reborn through the preaching of the gospel a seal by which both faith and the righteousness of faith are confirmed and sealed. 8) Glorifying grace. For God saves us through the washing of regeneration, as Paul testifies, Tit. 3:5, with whom Peter concurs, 1 ep. 3:22. The water of baptism makes us saved, just as the water of the flood saved Noah.

Prob. b. "By one Spirit we were all baptized into one body," 1 Cor. 12:13. By the Holy Spirit as the principal cause, and by baptism as the divinely ordained means, we are united and coalesce into one mystical body, which is the church. The members of this are men reborn by baptism; Christ, however, is its head, Eph. 1:22. Just as, therefore, we are baptized for this end, that we may be inserted into one body, so by baptism, as by a mark and a token, we are distinguished from unbaptized men.

Prob. c. From 1 Pet. 3:21; Baptism is συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς ἐπερώτημα εἰς θεόν, the answer of a good conscience toward God. Which apostolic oracle D. DANNHAVER explains aptly in hodos p. 1107. The word ἐπερώτημα 1) immediately and formally denotes the interrogation formerly used in baptism: "Do you believe?" "I believe." "Do you renounce?" "I renounce." Cf. Acts 8:37, and therefore baptism is called a stipulation. But a stipulation, according to the author POMPONIUS, is a conception of words by which he who is interrogated responds that he will give or do what he has been asked.

Which is followed by another interrogation of the baptized, παρησιασική (bold), corresponding to a certain assertion: "Abba, Father! am I not your son?" 2) It denotes μεταληπτικῶς (by metonymy) a certain ἀπόδειξις (proof) and demonstration. In which sense the word of God is called ἐρώτημα δῆλον, a clear word, Sir. 33:4. 3) It designates complexly the federal act of those stipulating, born from mutual interrogations and responses. God therefore makes a pact in baptism with the one being baptized, and gives him by pact a good conscience, to wit, the remission of sins, righteousness, and eternal life; moreover, he promises that he will be a God, father, provider, and protector to him. Conversely, the one being baptized promises that he will be a faithful servant and son to God, and will begin a new life, will preserve the good conscience received from him until the last breath of life, and will obey his law and commandments in all things. For this reason, in former times, those about to publicly profess the Christian faith in baptism would look up to heaven and raise their right hands on high, with an oath taken before witnesses; and the oath, subscribed by the hand of the one being baptized and sealed with his ring, was entered into the records. See D. CALOV. in bibl illustratis on 1 Pet. II, fol. 1508.

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists, and Weigelians, who deny that baptism is an efficacious means of conferring and sealing grace. See their arguments confuted in the preceding section, chap. IV, on regeneration.

Question XVII. Is the root of sin destroyed by baptism?

The guilt and dominion of sin are taken away by baptism, not the root or tinder of sin.

Prob. 1) From the presence of evil concupiscence in the reborn. Paul, baptized and reborn, complains, Rom. 7:14: "I am carnal, sold under sin. I do evil on account of indwelling sin." St. John pours out similar complaints, 1 ep. 1:8: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us."

2. From the propagation of original sin. For the saints propagate sin into their children, Ps. 51:7. Therefore, sin still inheres in them.

3. From the actual sins which the reborn perpetrate after baptism. For there is no man who does not sin, 1 Kings 8:46.

Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who maintain that sin is destroyed by baptism, so that it is no longer present. They rely on the following arguments:

I. Whatever is washed away is no longer present. In baptism, sin is washed away, Acts 22:11. Therefore... Resp. We deny the major. Sin is washed away in baptism, not so that it does not exist, but so that it is not imputed, nor does it dominate.

II. Whoever cleanses the church by the washing of water in the word, he takes away all sin. But Christ etc. Eph. 5:26. Therefore... Resp. Christ cleanses the church by remitting sins and wiping away stains, which wiping away, however, on account of the incapacity of the subject, is imperfect.

Instance: But Christ so sanctifies the church that it has no spot or wrinkle. Resp. The Apostle does not say that the church is already without spot or wrinkle, but that it is to be presented glorious without spot or wrinkle. This will happen in the future life, where the triumphant church will be free from all defilement.

III. By baptism we die to sin, Rom. 6:4. Therefore, nothing of sin is left in us who are baptized. Resp. We die to sin, not so that it is extirpated by baptism, but so that it does not dominate.

Question XVIII. Does the efficacy of baptism extend also to future sins?

Baptism possesses such notable efficacy by divine ordination that both God, in view of the baptismal covenant, recalls the sinner to himself and remits the sin to him when he repents a), and the contrite sinner, yearning for the grace of God, can raise himself up by the remembrance of baptism b).

Prob. a. Baptism is a covenant and a divine pact, 1 Pet. 3:21. But the divine covenant, on God's part, is eternal, Isa. 54:10, it is ἀμεταμέλητον (irrevocable), Rom. 11:29, since the unfaithfulness of men does not make the faith of God of no effect, Rom. 3:3. Hence it is that God recalls the sinner to himself and to the covenant initiated with him, Jer. 3:22.

Prob. b. Just as in the old testament Jonathan, 1 Sam. 14:6, and David, 1 Sam. 17:26, drew most efficacious consolations from circumcision, so the saddest sinners take solid comfort from baptism, recalled to memory. Peter certainly, after a most grave lapse, sustains himself by the remembrance of baptism, saying: "Baptism saves us," 1 ep. 3:21. The Corinthians had sinned not lightly, to whose minds the Apostle subjects baptism, 1 Cor. 6:11; "You were washed," namely in baptism, and 1 Cor. 12:13; "By one Spirit we were baptized into one body." St. Paul raises up the fallen Galatians, Gal. 3:27; "As many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who deny that the efficacy of baptism extends to future sins. Their principal arguments are:

I. Whoever are baptized for the remission of future sins, their sins are remitted before they are committed; But no sins are remitted before they are committed. Therefore... Resp. A distinction is made between a sin remitted and one that is remissible. By the power of the baptismal covenant, a future sin is remissible, not actually remitted. For baptism does not destroy future sins in completo, but in virtue, when the sinner by penitence swims back to the baptismal covenant as to a ship.

Instance: But the ship of the baptismal covenant is broken by a deliberate sin; therefore penance is called the second plank after the shipwreck by TERTULLIAN, lib. de pœnitentia, fol. 553, and by JEROME, ep. VIII. Resp. 1) Penance is called the second plank after the shipwreck, not as if the ship of baptism is completely shattered by sin, or the covenant which God initiated with us in baptism is fragile and temporary (which is against Hos. 2:13; Rom. 11:29), but because it is the second plank after the shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, 1 Tim. 1:19. 2) From a shipwreck of faith on the part of man to a shipwreck of the baptismal covenant on the part of God, the consequence is not valid, because the unfaithfulness of men does not make the faith of God of no effect, Rom. 3:3.

II. Circumcision was not valid for the future; Therefore, neither is baptism. The antecedent is established; because the Israelites, having fallen into sin after circumcision, obtained remission of sins not through circumcision, but through penitence. Resp. 1) That the Israelites sought very sweet comforts from circumcision is clear from the above-adduced examples of Jonathan and David. 2) We do not separate penitence from circumcision and baptism, but we join it with this sacrament. 3) God promises that he will circumcise the heart of the Israelites when they repent of the sins committed after circumcision, Deut. 10:6. Which promise rests on a covenant of circumcision valid for the future.

III. Those who have relapsed after baptism cannot be recalled by baptism, Heb. 6:6. Resp. 1) We do not assert that a sinner who has relapsed after baptism is recalled by a repeated baptism, but that God, in view of the baptismal covenant, recalls the sinner to himself and remits the sin to him. 2) In that passage, the Apostle speaks of the sin against the Holy Spirit, which is irremissible, not on the part of God absolutely reprobating or simply denying the means of grace, but on the part of man obstinately and perseveringly repudiating the offered means of salvation.

Question XIX. Is baptism necessary?

On the necessity of baptism. Baptism is necessary with the necessity of precept a) and of means b), and indeed with an ordained, not an absolute necessity; since we believe that the infants of Christians who die without baptism are saved c).

Prob. a. The precept of Christ exists, Matt. 28:19; "Teach all nations, and baptize them." Cf. Acts 2:38.

Prob. b. 1) From John 3:5; "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." Which exclusive is resolved into this exponent: No unbaptized person (ἀβάπτιστος) will enter the kingdom of heaven; but baptism is the ordinary means and, as it were, the way by which we enter the kingdom of God. 2) From Mark 16:16; "He who believes and is baptized will be saved; but he who does not believe will be condemned." As faith is a necessary means, receiving the offered salvation, so baptism is an organ offering salvation and conferring it upon believers, by the power of divine ordination.

Prob. c. 1) Because the promise of the divine covenant pertains to the infants of Christians, although they are not yet in the exhibited or applied covenant, Gen. 17:7; Acts 2:39. Wherefore, God, remembering his promise, is without doubt propitious to the infants of Christians who have departed this life without baptism. 2) Because God does not will that one of the little ones should perish, Matt. 18:14. 3) Because just as it is harsh and cruel to condemn the infants who either were born and died in the desert during the forty years of pilgrimage before they were circumcised, Josh. 5:4, or were extinguished in the persecution of Pharaoh with their foreskin not yet cut back, Exod.

1:22, or were killed by the satellites of Herod before receiving the sacrament of circumcision, Matt. 2:16; so the sentence by which the unbaptized (ἀβάπτιστοι) infants of the faithful are adjudged to eternal damnation is justly harsher. 4) "God has not bound his grace to the sacraments," as THOMAS opines, P. II, qu. 64. We indeed are bound to the use of the means, but God can act extraordinarily, just as ordinarily we use food in famine and medicines in diseases; but God can nourish without food and restore health without medicine in an extraordinary way. 5) "Not the deprivation, but the contempt of baptism condemns," says AUGUSTINE, L. IV against the Donatists, c. 32.

Antithesis is that of 1) the Socinians, who maintain that baptism is a merely arbitrary rite, used by the Apostles around the beginnings of the church, and no longer necessary today. 2) most of the Pontificians, who maintain that unbaptized infants are excluded from the kingdom of heaven, and suffer the pain of loss, not of sense. The Socinians argue; 1. Whatever is not numbered among the rudiments of heavenly doctrine is not necessary for Christians; The baptism of water is not numbered etc. Therefore... The minor is proved from Heb. 6:2, where mention is made of βαπτισμῶν διδασκῆς (the doctrine of baptisms), not of water. Resp. The Apostle understands baptism properly so called, about which catechumens were to be informed. (*)<sup>286</sup> He speaks, however, in the plural, to indicate that the doctrine of baptisms can be so instituted that it is inculcated to catechumens that there is a great difference between the ceremonial baptisms of the old testament and the sacramental baptism of the new testament. For that the Jews had various sacramental baptisms, we learn from Heb. 9:10.

II. If John baptized with water, but Christ with the Spirit and fire, it follows that in the present-day church of Christ no one need necessarily be baptized with water. The antecedent is true, with John as witness, Luke 3:17. Therefore, so is the consequent. Resp. In this passage, the baptism of fire is understood, which does not abolish the baptism of water.

III. The Apostles are not read to have been baptized; Therefore, baptism is not necessary. Resp. In historical matters, a firm consequence is not drawn from a negative argument, or rather from silence. For it does not follow; We do not read that the Apostles were baptized; Therefore, they were not baptized. If all things had been written, the world could not contain the volume of books, John 21:25.

IV. Whatever doctrine is wholly spiritual and regards the inner man, that does not prescribe an external rite of baptism to be necessarily observed; But the evangelical doctrine of the new testament etc. Therefore... The minor is proved from 2 Cor. 3:6; "God... has made us sufficient as ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter but of the Spirit," where the doctrine of the new testament is called spirit, i.e., spiritual. Resp. 1) We deny the major. For a spiritual doctrine does not simply exclude external rites, otherwise it would also exclude the external rite of the Lord's supper, which is absurd. 2) Baptism is not a merely external rite, but is the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, who is poured out on us abundantly, Tit. 3:5.

The Pontificians argue; I. Whoever is not born of water and the Spirit will not enter the kingdom of heaven, John 3:5. Unbaptized (ἀβάπτιστοι) infants etc. Therefore... Resp. I limit the major; Whoever, as a contemner of baptism, is not born of water and the Spirit, he will not enter the kingdom of heaven; I grant. But the infants of the faithful, whether having died in the mother's womb or snatched by a sudden death before baptism, are not contemners of baptism. They are indeed ἀβάπτιστοι negatively, but not privatively so. Those who died in their mother's womb ought not to have been baptized; but those who died by a sudden fate before receiving baptism could not be tinged with the sacred water. Therefore, they are not ἀβάπτιστοι privatively, and so are not excluded from entrance into heaven.

(*) In this place the Legate of Christ speaks of various types of the O.T., inasmuch as they were λόγος τῆς ἀρχῆς τοῦ χριστοῦ (logos tes arches tou christou / word of the beginning of Christ), which Christian men now ought to leave behind (ἀφέντες / aphentes), and betake themselves entirely to the perfection of the N.T. in the consummated antitype. Which clearly appears from the scope of this entire epistle. Therefore by the name βαπτισμῶν (baptism / baptisms) he signifies the frequent and various washings commanded by the law of Levitical worship, add. ch. IX, 10. and he calls the same βαπτισμοὺς διδασκῆς (baptismous didaches / baptisms of teaching) because there was need of doctrine and interpretation, to what end those rites looked, and what mystery lay hidden in their coverings. See Levit. X, 10. 11. In the N.T. there is only ἐν βάπτισμα (hen baptisma / one baptism), Eph. IV, 5. and this is never called βαπτισμός (baptismos), always βάπτισμα (baptisma). See notes to page 1080.

II. Those who do not believe are condemned; Unbaptized (ἀβάπτιστοι) infants do not believe; Therefore... The minor is proved; because in unbaptized infants, faith has been kindled neither by the sacrament of baptism nor by the preaching of the gospel. Resp. God kindles faith in the infants of the faithful in an extraordinary way.

III. The unbaptized (ἀβάπτιστοι) infants of the faithful are conceived in original sin, the remission of which they have not obtained; Therefore, they are not partakers of eternal salvation. Resp. Christ acquired the remission of sins for unbaptized infants by his merit, which they apply to themselves by a faith extraordinarily kindled.

Question XX. Is baptism to be repeated?

Baptism rightly performed ought not to be repeated.

Prob. 1) Because in baptism God establishes a covenant with us, 1 Pet. 3:21, which is not momentary or temporary, but eternal, Isa. 54:10, and ἀμεταμέλητον (irrevocable), Rom. 11:29. 2) Just as circumcision could not be repeated, so neither can baptism. 3) As natural generation, so spiritual regeneration is one, Eph. 4:4. 4) Baptism is the sacrament of initiation and spiritual investiture. But initiation and entrance into the church is needed only once.

Question XXI. Is baptism twofold, internal and external?

How manyfold is baptism. There is not in the act itself and at the same time a twofold baptism, internal and external, but baptism is one, and with one and the same undivided action the Holy Trinity, as the principal cause, and the minister of the church, as the ministerial cause, dispenses in baptism, by means of the exterior washing of water, to those who do not resist the divine operation, the remission of sins and renewal, by the power of the divine institution.

Prob. 1) From Eph. 4:5: "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." As truly as there is only one Lord and one faith, so truly there is only one baptism; But those are mendacious that cannot be doubled; Therefore neither can baptism be doubled.

2. From the nature of baptism, since it consists of water and the Spirit, John 3:3. Whatever baptism is true and complete, that consists of water and the Spirit; But an external baptism separated from the internal does not consist of water and the Spirit; Therefore, an external baptism separated from the internal is not a true and complete baptism.

3. From the subordination of the minister. Baptism is dispensed by God as the principal cause, to whom the baptizing minister is subordinated; Therefore, it is one and an individual act which God dispenses through the minister.

You say I. Whoever distinguishes the baptism that washes away the filth of the body from the baptism of the conscience, he establishes a twofold baptism, one external, the other internal. But St. Peter etc. 1 ep. c. 3:21. Therefore... Resp. St. Peter denies that the removal of the filth of the flesh is baptism; on the contrary, he affirms that baptism is the inquiry of a good conscience, because it washes away the filth of the soul, or confers the remission of sins, from which a good and tranquil conscience arises.

You say II. If external and internal baptism could not be separated, all who are baptized would be regenerated; But not all who are baptized are regenerated, which is established by the example of Simon Magus, Acts 9:10. Therefore... Resp. A distinction is made between the oblation and the collation of regenerating grace. God offers regenerating grace, by which faith is kindled, to all, Acts 17:3, but he confers it only on those who do not resist; the reason is that regeneration is not an irresistible, but a resistible action. Although, therefore, God intends to regenerate all who are baptized, yet on account of the malicious resistance of adult men it happens that not all are actually regenerated; infants, however, since they do not place a malicious obstacle to the Holy Spirit, are all truly regenerated by baptism.

Question XXII. Can the exorcism, which is accustomed to precede baptism, be tolerated in the church?

Exorcism. The exorcism which is accustomed to precede baptism in our churches is Christian and indifferent, and therefore is retained not in vain to adumbrate the spiritual dominion of the devil over the un-reborn, and the salutary effect of baptism, by which they are liberated from the same.

Obs. I. Our discussion at present is not of the miraculous exorcism, by which in the first beginnings of the apostolic church some cast out devils from the possessed, but of an exorcism that adumbrates the efficacy of baptism.

Obs. II. A distinction must be made between a significant (σημαντικόν) and an effective (ἐνεργητικόν) exorcism. The Pontificians ascribe to exorcism the power of expelling the devil from the corporally possessed. We, however, assert that by exorcism is only signified or adumbrated the tyranny and dominion of the devil which he exercises over the un-reborn; which dominion of the devil over the un-reborn is called by some authors in a broader sense a spiritual possession, who yet confess that the subject of spiritual possession, strictly and properly so called, is the obstinately and contumaciously impious man. From which it follows that the infants of the faithful, strictly and properly speaking, are not spiritually possessed. See KOENIG, theol. positiva, p. 52.

Obs. III. We retain exorcism not from the necessity of precept or of means; since exorcism is neither divinely commanded, nor a means of salvation, nor a part of religious worship; but from Christian liberty; because it is a certain adiaphoron, and a free ceremony, neither commanded nor forbidden.

Obs. IV. Εξορκίζειν and ὀρκίζειν signify a) to exact an oath from someone; see the Septuagint version, Gen. 24:3; c. 50:5; Exod. 13:19; b) to command, order, or impose something on someone by the authority of God the highest judge, or by the threat of divine judgment, e.g., 1 Sam. 14:24, Saul is said to have adjured the people not to take food before evening, before he had taken vengeance on his enemies, i.e., he commanded the people under the gravest threat of divine judgment. So Paul writes, 1 Thess. 5:27: ὀρκίζω ὑμᾶς τὸν Κύριον, "I adjure you by the Lord, that this epistle be read to all the holy brethren," i.e., I command you by the authority of the Lord. In the latter sense it is taken in the present, and so the minister of the divine word adjures the devil, i.e., he commands the devil, by the authority of the triune God, and under the threat of the most just divine judgment, to let go of the one to be baptized, and to claim no right or power over him, but to leave room for the divine operation.

The assertion is proved: 1) The significant exorcism, which in our churches precedes baptism, signifies and adumbrates: a) The state of sin in which we are constituted outside the state of regeneration, which occurs through baptism; that we are by nature children of wrath, and under the power, captivity, and dominion of the devil, see Eph. 2:2-3. b) The efficacy of baptism, that such a one who is to be offered to Christ in baptism, by the power of Christ's institution and the divine promise, is to be liberated from the power of darkness and transferred into the kingdom of Christ the redeemer. c) The stipulation, that this is to be rendered to God alone, and that on the other hand the devil and his works are to be renounced. From which is born the argument: That rite which adumbrates the state of sin in which infants are conceived and born, the efficacy of baptism, and the stipulation to be rendered to God, that rite is usefully retained in the church out of Christian liberty. But the exorcism which in our churches precedes baptism is such a rite, etc. Therefore... 2) Exorcism is a most ancient Christian rite, used in the church in the times of CYPRIAN, who lived in the third century, as is evident from his L. IV, Ep. VII.

The following doubts can be raised against this ceremony:

I. Whoever exact an oath from the devil, do wrongly; But the Lutherans etc. Therefore... The major is evident; because an oath is not to be exacted from the devil, a most mendacious impostor. The minor is manifest; because Lutheran pastors adjure the devil. Resp. The prelates of the Lutheran church do not exact an oath from the devil, but they themselves command by authority and under threat of divine judgment that he let go of the one to be baptized and leave room for the Holy Spirit operating through baptism.

II. From whoever are not possessed by the devil, neither corporally nor spiritually, the devil is not to be cast out; But the infants of the faithful etc. Therefore... Resp. This argument does not strike us; because a) we deny that the infants of the faithful are corporally possessed by the devil. b) But spiritual possession is spoken of either broadly or strictly. In a stricter sense it denotes the inhabitation and operation of the devil in an obstinately and contumaciously impious man; In which sense we deny that the infants of the faithful are spiritually possessed by the devil. But in a broader sense, spiritual possession denotes the power and dominion over an unregenerate man; In which broader sense the infants of the faithful, not yet reborn through baptism, are said by some authors to be spiritually besieged by the devil. c) Lutherans do not cast out the devil from infants by exorcism; since their exorcism is not effective, but significant and adumbrative of sin, the power of the devil, and the efficacy of baptism.

Instance. Why then do the baptizers say: "That you depart and yield?" Resp. These words are understood of abstinence from dominion, as if the baptizers were saying: "Satan, do not claim for yourself power or dominion over this infant; since he is about to be snatched from your kingdom of darkness by baptism and inserted into the kingdom of Christ."

III. Whoever is called a servant of Christ does not need exorcism; The infant to be baptized is called a servant of Christ by the baptizer; Therefore... Resp. He is called a servant of Christ not in state, but by extension, just as one who is to be girded is considered girded.

IV. Whoever from the mother's womb are holy in the divine covenant, they do not need exorcism; The infants of Christians etc. Therefore... The minor is clear from the testimony of Paul, 1 Cor. 7:14. Cf. Acts 2:39. Resp. 1) The infants of Christians before receiving baptism are holy with an external holiness, or that of the church; but they are not holy with an internal holiness, or that of faith; because they are not yet reborn. 2) The promise of the covenant pertains to the unbaptized infants of the faithful, but they are not yet in the exhibited and applied covenant; for the application is made through baptism.

V. Whatever belongs to Christ alone, that can be attributed to neither exorcism; To liberate from the power of Satan etc. 1 John 3:8. Therefore...

Resp. A distinction is made between the acquisition and the application of spiritual liberation. Christ by his merit acquired for us liberty from our enemies, which he applies to us through the word and sacraments; by exorcism the same is signified and adumbrated.

VI. Exorcists have a bad reputation, Acts 19:14-15. Resp. Unbelieving exorcists, who attempt to use an effective, and that miraculous, exorcism in the name of Jesus, have a bad reputation; But evangelical doctors truly believe in Christ, and their exorcism is not ἐνεργητικός (effective), but σημαντικός (significant).

VII. Exorcism has neither a divine command nor a promise; Therefore it is not to be tolerated in the church. Resp. If exorcism had a divine command and promise, it would not be an indifferent rite, but would be a necessary part of religious worship. We use exorcism as an adiaphoron, out of Christian liberty.

VIII. Whatever tends to the contempt of matrimony, that is to be removed from the church; Exorcism etc. Therefore... The minor is proved; because it tends to the contempt of matrimony if spouses are said to beget children possessed by the devil. Resp. We do not maintain that the infants of Christians are corporally possessed by the devil. But as concerns the spiritual dominion of Satan over the unregenerate, that can no more be denied than the propagation of sin itself from Christian parents. The infants of Christians are gifts of God, but before they are inserted into the divine covenant by baptism, they are in a state of sin and under the power of Satan.

X. It cannot be denied that the sound of the words of exorcism is rather harsh; therefore this rite should be abrogated. Resp. The sense of the words is more suitable, although the sound is rather harsh. This rite, since it is an adiaphoron, can be abrogated with the consent of the church, provided it is done without prejudice to the heavenly doctrine concerning the state of sin and the efficacy of baptism. It can also be converted into a form of prayer, or even be proposed and explained in words more consonant with scripture. Confer. D. CHEMNITZ, loc. theol P. III, fol. 161, & D. CALOV, Synops. controv. p. 785.

SUSPIRIUM.

For if, O GOD, most excellent in holiness, greatest in virtue, most blessed in life, I were to bury in oblivion or dissemble your benefits, flowing to me from the most wisely instituted baptism conferred upon me, I would be a most profligate and impious man. But rather I both venerate with a grateful mind and praise with a full mouth Your most inclined mercy towards me, that You deigned to pour over, wash, regenerate, and renew me, infected with the stain of congenital sin, with the sacred water. By the intervention of this salutary washing, I have been made, O most INDULGENT FATHER, a partaker of your covenant, a son of grace, a brother of CHRIST, a temple of the HOLY SPIRIT, a citizen of the church, an heir of heaven. In every lapse, in every temptation, in the very article of death, no consolation will be more present, sweeter, or more solid to me than the remembrance of baptism. Instruct me, I ask, with strong powers, that I may from time to time recall my baptismal covenant, commit nothing unworthy of it, crucify the venomous concupiscences of Adam, and walk in newness of life!

CHAPTER V.
ON THE EUCCHARIST,
OR THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Question I. What is the eucharist, or the Lord's supper?

THE EUCCHARIST IS a sacrament of the New Testament, or a sacred and solemn action, instituted by Christ the God-man (Θεανθρώπου), in which the true and substantial body of Christ is to be eaten with the blessed bread, and his true and substantial blood is to be drunk with the blessed wine, given to the Christian communicants, and both are received by them, and eaten and drunk in a supernatural manner, in commemoration of the death of Christ, and for the confirmation of evangelical grace.

Obs. I. Just as baptism is the sacrament of initiation, and as it were the gate of grace, through which we enter the kingdom of God; so the Lord's Supper is the sacrament of confirmation, and as it were the nourishment and medicine, by which the faithful soul is refreshed, and confirmed in the faith and hope of eternal life.

Obs. II. This sacrament of confirmation is distinguished by various names. 1) The most ancient church, and especially the Greek, called it ευχαριστιαν, i.e., thanksgiving; because Christ ευχαριστήσας, Matthew 26:27, instituted this sacrament, and we ought to announce the Lord's death, 1 Cor. 11:26, with thanksgiving. For just as the greatest of all benefits is our redemption and salvation through the passion and death of Christ; So also the greatest thanks are to be given to God and our Savior, when in the partaking of the body and blood of Christ we celebrate his solemn memory. 2) It is called εὐλογία, which is blessing, likewise from the words of institution, Matthew 26:26. "Jesus took the bread, καὶ εὐλογήσας, and when he had blessed it, he broke it, and gave it to the disciples," &c. Whence also the cup is called τῆς εὐλογίας, 1 Cor. 10:16, because the external symbols (bread and wine) are blessed, i.e., consecrated, and unless they are blessed, they are not exhibitiv of the body and blood of the Lord. 3) It is named κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, the Lord's supper, 1 Cor. 11:20. The Greek word, δεῖπνον, to the ancient Greeks denoted a banquet, whether instituted at midday or in the evening. See HOMER, Iliad B. Whence by TERTULLIAN it is called the Lord's banquet, book I to his wife. The interpreters have rendered it supper; the Germans, des HErrn Nachtmahl, des HErrn Abendmahl, because our Lord Jesus Christ, on the night in which he was betrayed, took bread, and likewise the cup, after he had supped, when he instituted this sacred banquet. We, although we ordinarily celebrate the eucharist in the morning and fasting, commonly call it the Holy Supper, either in honor of the first institution, performed in the evening at the beginning of the night, or because it is common (κοινή), whence supper is said by the Latins, because the ancients dined alone, but had supper (coenam) with guests in common (κοινὴν): Thus the eucharist in public services, although it is performed in the morning, is nevertheless a supper, that is, common (κοινή) to many. 4) It is called τράπεζα το Κυρίου, the table of the Lord, 1 Cor. 10:21, because in the time of the Apostles it was celebrated at a table. The Greeks in the eucharist used two tables, one they called the table of proposition (προθέσεως), on which the bread and wine were placed before consecration; the other they called the sanctuary (ιερατεῖον), where the consecration took place. Conf. METROPHANES' confession of the eastern church, c. IX, on the Lord's supper. 5) It is called ἀρτοκλασία, the breaking of bread, because Christ, blessing, broke the bread, Matthew 26:26. Conf. 1 Cor. 10:16. 6) It is called ἡ κοινωνία, communion; because 1) the blessed bread is the communion of the body, and the blessed cup is the communion of the blood of Christ, and 2) by means of this communion we are joined with Christ and among ourselves with a closer faith and love. Hence those who approach the sacrament are still heard to be communicants, from 1 Cor. 10:17. 7) Καινὴ διαθήκη, the new testament; because Christ, offering the blessed cup, said: "This cup is the new testament in my blood," Luke 22:20, i.e., this, which is in the cup, is the foundation and confirmation of the new covenant of grace sanctioned in my blood. The testator, therefore, is Christ, sealing the testament by his death; the heirs, all believers; the witnesses, the Apostles; the notaries, the Evangelists and Paul; the good legacy, the golden key to the kingdom of heaven and the celestial treasures; the seal, the body of Christ in the bread, the blood in the wine. 8) It is called σὺναξις, assembly or congregation, with respect to the sacred assemblies in which it is usually celebrated. Conf. 1 Cor. 11:20. 9) Λειτουργία, which word, taken generally, denotes the administration of a public office; taken specifically, it designates the sacred and solemn action by which the body of Christ is dispensed to be eaten through the medium of bread, and the blood of Christ to be drunk through the medium of wine. 10) Ἀγάπη, charity. For the more opulent in the primitive church would bring bread and wine to the table of the Lord, so that a part might be used for the sacrament, and whatever was left over would go to the ministers of the church and the poor. This was a sign of charity; hence the Holy Supper was called ἀγάπη, charity. 11) Θυσία καὶ προσφορά, sacrifice and offering, not by reason of a sacrificial act, as if the priest sacrifices; but partly by reason of the matter, because that is distributed which was once sacrificed on the cross; partly by reason of the end, because the sacrament of the supper is dispensed and received in commemoration of the sacrifice once performed on the cross. 12) Μυστήριον, and with the addition Φρικτὸν, Φρικῶδες, Φρικωδέστατον μυστήριον, a tremendous mystery. JUSTIN, Apology II for the Christians. CHRYSOSTOM, homily 38 on Matthew. For the eucharist is an admirable mystery: a) because it was revealed by God alone, 1 Cor. 11:23. b) because of the mode of union between the heavenly and earthly thing, which is not only significative, or, that the earthly thing signifies the heavenly, but real and exhibitiv, by which the heavenly thing is no less communicated to those eating and drinking, than the earthly thing; c) because of the mode of presence of the body and blood of Christ, which is substantial and real, not virtual, not objective, or intentional; d) because of the mode of union with us, by which the heavenly things, the body and blood of Christ, are more closely united with the faithful communicants in the sacrament, than outside the sacrament. Conf. HULSEM. breu. c. XIII. p. 819. 13) Mass, the abuse of which word in the papacy is most frequent, where they place the whole sum of their religious observances in hearing mass; and what is more known than the sacrifice of the mass? The word, mass, has a Latin origin, and is so called from the dismissal of the people. There was, as CASAUBON explains, a twofold dismissal (ἄφεσις) or mass; the former, when the readings of Holy Scripture and those prayers which the catechumens, energumens, and other uninitiated could attend were finished, the deacon would cry out: "Go, catechumens, in peace; it is the dismissal (missa est)!" i.e., you will have dismissal (for it was not right for them to watch the sacred liturgy); the latter, when the sacred rites were performed and the celebration of the eucharist finished, after the prayer of dismissal (εὐχὴν ἀπολυτικὴν), the deacon at the end of all the sacred rites would again cry out: "Go, faithful, in peace! it is the dismissal (missa est)!" i.e., now you also are dismissed, so that each one has the free power to depart. 14) Today it is called the sacrament of the altar. For when Christian temples were built under Constantine the Great, stone tables were erected and called altars, which we still freely use in the public administration of the eucharist.

Question II. Who instituted the eucharist?

The efficient cause. The principal author of the sacrament of the supper is God alone, one in essence and three in persons a). But in a special sense, our Lord, Jesus Christ, is the author and institutor of the sacred supper b).

Proof a. The sacrament of the supper is an effective means of salvation and a seal of grace; Therefore, the institution of the sacred supper depends on the authority and power of the triune God, who is the author of salvation and the fount of grace.

Proof b. In a special sense, the institutor of the sacred supper, according to the unanimous testimony of the evangelists, Matthew 26:26, Mark 14:22, Luke 22:19, and the Apostle Paul, 1 Cor. 11:23, is our Lord, Jesus Christ, as our mediator, according to both natures, the divine as well as the human. For according to which nature Christ could say: "this is my body, this is my blood," according to that he also ordained his body to be eaten and his blood to be drunk. Now it is most certain that Christ could say: "this is my body, this is my blood," not only according to the divine nature, but altogether according to the human nature as well. Wherefore, the human nature of Christ is in no way to be excluded from the institution of the eucharist. The author and founder of this sacrament in 1 Cor. 11:23 is called the Lord Jesus. For he is the Lord of lords and King of Kings, Rev. 19:16, according to both natures, as God, born from eternity, as man, made in the fullness of time, from the grace of the personal union. In the institution of the sacred supper, he showed himself to be Jesus, i.e., savior, outside of whom there is no salvation, by the work itself. For the eucharist was established by him as a sacrament of salvation, as GREGORY THE GREAT says in his paschal homily. This sacrament is described by the communication of the body and blood of Christ, 1 Cor. 10:16. Christ denotes the Priest, King, and prophet. The founder of the sacrament of the supper is our most loving Priest, who exhibits to us his body and blood, sacrificed on the altar of the cross, to be eaten and drunk; He is a most wise Prophet (πάνσοφος), who knew most correctly what and how he should speak, and in what way he could fulfill his promises, since he knows how to do more than we understand, Eph. 3:20; He is a most truthful Prophet, and truth itself, and therefore he will not deceive us; He is an omnipotent King, and therefore he will provide what he has promised; He is an omnipresent King, who now is also present at all assemblies (συνάξεις), or sacred gatherings, Matthew 18:20; He is a most opulent King, who feeds his subjects with himself and specifically with his body and blood, and is therefore also the host of the banquet. He was indeed then, when he established this sacrament, in a state, but not in the act, of exinanition, but he exerted the splendor of his majesty, a most clear evidence (avspiam).

Question III. Who today dispenses the sacrament of the supper?

Ministers. Today's dispensers of the sacrament of the supper are the ordained ministers of the church a), who consecrate the external elements, with prayers poured out to God, and with the words of institution pronounced in the name of Christ b), and distribute them to the communicants c).

Proof a. 1) Although Christ himself in his own person (αυτοπροσώπως) distributed the first supper to his disciples; to us today, however, he dispenses this sacrament only through the medium of the ministers of the church. For to them, through the collation of sacred orders, the public and ordinary power of teaching the word of God in the church, and therefore also of administering the sacraments, baptism and the sacred supper, has been conferred. For the word and the sacraments are so connected that there can be no true and formal sacrament without the word of God. 2) The ministers of the church are stewards or dispensers of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. 4:1, among which mysteries the sacrament of the Lord's supper is eminent. 3) Not even in a case of necessity is the administration of the sacred supper to be committed to a layman, or a private person; because in this part there is a difference between baptism, which is the sacrament of initiation, and the eucharist, which is the sacrament of confirmation. Of the necessity of baptism Christ testifies: "Unless one is born again of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven," John 3:5. But the use of the sacred supper is not established in equal necessity; therefore, when there is no supply of an ordinary minister, then that saying of AUGUSTINE has its place: "Believe, and you have eaten." For it is better to persuade a man anxiously desiring the sacrament of the supper, when a minister is lacking, in whatever way, of the sufficiency of spiritual eating, and to show the danger of other temptations which could arise if the sacrament were administered by another, without a legitimate call, and therefore with a doubtful mind and uncertain outcome.

Proof b. It is the duty of the ministers of the church to consecrate the elements of bread and wine. For no one can rightly enjoy the eucharist unless the consecration of the bread and wine has preceded, because of the command of Christ in the institution: "Do this"; namely, what you have seen me do in the distribution, when I blessed the bread and wine, and gave the blessed things to you, and what you did by eating and drinking, the same I enjoin you to do in the future, when distributing or receiving these same symbols. Consecration, however, is either total or partial. The latter is twofold, namely of destination and of union; which two, joined together, are called total consecration. The consecration of destination dedicates the symbols to sacred use; The consecration of union, through the testamentary and dispositive words, not as merely historical, nor by reason of the letters and syllables, but as they are operative, by reason of the divine sense ("this is my body," which word retains its efficacy, just as that: "be fruitful and multiply") is performed. Mention of both these consecrations is made in these words: "Christ took" (i.e., separated from profane use) "the bread, gave thanks" (dedicated to sacred use), and said: "this is my body" (i.e., he united it sacramentally to his body). Matthew 26:26. Whence the consecrated cup is called the communion of the blood (κοινωνία τῷ αἵματι), 1 Cor. 10:16. Conf. SCHERZERI System. theol. p. 380.

Proof c. The ministers of the church distribute to the communicants the bread and the blood, through whose ministry Christ, the author of the supper, offers his body to be eaten and his blood to be drunk. This exhibition of the body and blood is not done by a distinct and separate act, but by a conjoined one; because Christ does not present his body and blood, really present in the Holy Supper, immediately, but through the ministry of the word, for a true eating and drinking with the earthly symbols.

Question IV. Can a minister of the church lawfully dispense the eucharist to himself?

A minister of the church should ordinarily receive the sacrament of the supper from a neighboring fellow minister a); but in a case of necessity, where another minister is away on a journey, or cannot be had so suddenly, and there is danger in delay, he lawfully administers the sacrament to himself b).

Proof a. 1) The closer the dispensation of the sacrament approaches its first institution, the better and safer it is. But in the first institution the dispensing person, who was Christ, and the receiving persons, who were the disciples, were distinct. 2) Just as no one ordinarily absolves himself from sins; so no one gives the sacrament to himself. 3) The sacrament of the supper is a symbol of charity and brotherly love (Φιλαδελφίας); Wherefore let him seek and employ a neighboring fellow minister as a witness of his faith and charity.

Proof b. 1) All things which are not divinely commanded or forbidden yield to necessity. But it is nowhere commanded that distinct persons should always perform the parts of the communicant and the recipient of the sacrament of the supper; nor is it anywhere forbidden that a pastor in time of necessity should administer the sacred supper to himself. 2) Just as a minister of the divine word can and should console himself from the divine word; so nothing prevents him from refreshing himself by the partaking of the sacrament which he himself dispenses.

Question V. What is the norm of the entire doctrine concerning the sacrament of the supper?

The norm of the sacred supper. The norm of the entire doctrine concerning the sacrament of the eucharist are the words of institution of the Holy Supper, which are read in Matthew 26:26ff., Mark 14:22, Luke 22:19, 1 Cor. 11:23 a); but by no means is the norm or foundation for knowing and confirming this doctrine the sermon of Christ at Capernaum, which is read in John 6:26ff. b).

Proof a. 1) From the institution of any sacrament, as from its proper seat, where it is proposed and explained not incidentally or in passing, but directly and accurately, judgment must be made concerning its nature. 2) The Apostle of the Gentiles himself, Paul, in 1 Cor. 11:23, in asserting the orthodoxy concerning the Holy Supper, appealed to the words of institution, as the proper seat of this doctrine. 3) The sacrament of the supper is called a testament, Luke 22:20. Therefore, its norm and foundation is the will and ordinance of the testator.

Proof b. The sermon at Capernaum, in John 6, does not formally comprehend the sacramental eating of the body of Christ. For 1) sacramental eating was only instituted and required on the last night of Christ; but that eating of which John chapter 6 speaks was required long before, because the sermon at Capernaum was delivered a whole year before the sacred supper was instituted by the Lord Jesus. 2) Sacramental eating is done through the medium of symbols, bread and wine; Spiritual eating, which is commanded in John 6, requires no such symbol in itself; because Christ can be perceived spiritually through faith, without any symbol. 3) The former is eating properly so called, and distinct from drinking; for the blood with wine is not given to us to be eaten, nor the body with bread to be drunk; the latter is metaphorical, and not distinct from drinking in reality. 4) The former is done with the mouth of the body; the latter with the mouth of faith. 5) The former can be done unto judgment and death, 1 Cor. 11:29; the latter is always done unto life, John 6:50. 6) The former is not absolutely necessary for salvation; the latter is absolutely necessary, even for infants, v. 53. Therefore, John 6 does not deal with the substance of the sacred supper, although the fruit of all spiritual eating, whether it be with or without a symbol, is explained in the same chapter.

Question VI. What is the literal sense of the words of institution: "This is my body: This is my blood"?

In the former proposition the demonstrative pronoun, THIS, denotes the whole sacramental complex, consisting of the bread and the body of Christ; In the latter proposition it likewise denotes the whole complex, consisting of the wine and the blood of Christ, mystically united a). The substantive verb, IS, connects the predicate with the subject, and denotes that what is offered in the sacred supper is truly and really not only bread, but also the body of Christ b). BODY and BLOOD of CHRIST denote the true and substantial body of Christ, and the true and substantial blood of Christ c).

Obs. The letter (Τὸ ξητὸν), the literal sense, are spoken of in two ways; 1) in the comparison of different interpretations of scripture; for the interpretation of scripture is either literal or mystical. The literal sense is that which the words themselves immediately render, when all circumstances are considered, and it is distinguished into the proper literal sense and the figurative. The proper sense is that which the Holy Spirit intends with the words taken in their native signification, e.g., "God is a spirit." The figurative sense is that which is proximately intended by the Holy Spirit with words affected by some trope, e.g., "God is our shield." The mystical sense is said to be that which is not signified proximately by the divinely-inspired (θεόπνευστα) words, but which flows and is deduced from the thing signified by the divinely-inspired words. 2) The letter (Τὸ ἐκτὸν), the literal sense is spoken of with respect to the different use of words, proper and tropical. Where it is the letter, when the words are used properly and without any trope; but the literal sense is that which is generated from the words taken properly and outside of all trope. In this latter signification the letter (τὸ ῥητὸν) and the literal sense are taken in the present context.

Proof a. 1) We learn that the pronoun THIS (HOC) denotes the whole sacramental complex from the Greek construction. Εθιόντων δὲ αὐτῶν, λαβὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὸν ἄζυτον καὶ εὐλογήσας, ἐκλάσας, καὶ ἐδίδου τοῖς μαθηταῖς, καὶ εἶπε λάβετε, Φάγετε, τὰτὸ ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμά με, Matthew 26:26. Where the demonstrative pronoun does not precisely or only denote τὸν ἄρτον, or the bread; because the Greek construction opposes it; nor does it precisely or only denote the body; because the proposition would be identical and tautological. Therefore, it denotes the whole sacramental complex. We conclude: The pronoun, THIS, either denotes precisely the body of Christ, or the bread, or the whole sacramental complex.

2. From the context itself. What the demonstrative pronoun, THIS, demonstrates, the context of the words of institution teaches. "Jesus, taking the bread, and blessing, broke it and gave it to the disciples, and said: Take, eat, this is my body." From which words we conclude: 1) Whatever Christ, instituting his most holy supper, took from the table, broke, and gave to his disciples, that is demonstrated by the demonstrative pronoun, this. But he took the bread, etc. Therefore. 2) The Lord Jesus added, when he took the bread, broke it, and gave it to the disciples: τέτό ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμά με, this is my body, to demonstrate that in offering the bread, he also offered his body. If he had said: "This is bread"; the demonstrative pronoun would demonstrate precisely and solely the bread; But Christ said, this is my body, to indicate that he was giving not only bread to be eaten, but also his body. 3) The pronoun, THIS, which is of the singular number, comprehends two things, namely the bread and the body of Christ. It is therefore necessary that these two come into some union, so that it can be signified and said by one singular, this, not, these. 4) The bread is demonstrated not only as present, but also as visible. And this is the reason why bread is not placed in the predicate; nor was it said: "This is bread and my body"; or: "this is bread with my body." For that which is demonstrated and exhibited to the eye does not need an exposition, which is usually made by the predicate. The body, however, is demonstrated as invisibly present; and therefore it is expressly named, so that it may be known.

3. It is the common reason of exhibitiv propositions that, when different things united among themselves are shown, the whole complex is demonstrated in the subject, but in the predicate that is expressed which is more worthy and less obvious to the sense, e.g. If a bridegroom, having offered his bride a skillfully made box as a sign of his love, were to say: "Take, this is a gem"; the demonstrative particle, THIS, would demonstrate both the box and the gem. When a host at a banquet, offering you a cup, says: "Take, this is wine," the demonstrative, THIS, denotes both the cup and the wine. If a doctor were to offer a noble medicine to a sick person in a vessel, and say to him: "Take, this is a noble alexipharmic"; by the demonstrative pronoun both the vessel and the alexipharmic are comprehended. In the same way, when Christ, the physician of souls, offering the bread, says: "Take, eat, this is my body," the deictic word denotes both the eucharistic bread and the body of Christ.

4. In exhibitiv propositions the demonstrative, THIS, is not taken adjectivally, but substantively, involving a substantive noun, and signifying the same as "this thing." It has, therefore, a general signification, and is apt to demonstrate every being, and therefore whatever it signifies, it signifies not distinctly and according to its specific reason, but confusedly and generally, under the concept of "this thing." But what thing this, placed in the place of the subject, designates, is to be taken from the predicate. For subjects are such as they are permitted to be by their predicates. Hence it is that the nobler thing, less obvious to the senses, is noted principally and in the nominative case, the less noble thing is connoted in the oblique case, e.g. When the bridegroom hands the box to the bride, and says: "Take, this is a gem"; the pronoun THIS in the nominative case, although confusedly and under the concept of "this thing," denotes the gem, in the oblique case it connotes the box, and can be explained: "This thing, which I hand or exhibit to you in and with the box, is a gem." Thus the sacramental proposition, by which Christ, offering the bread to his disciples, says: "Take, eat, this is my body"; has this sense: "Take, eat, this thing, which I hand to you to be eaten with the bread, is my body." Conf. D. DANNH. in hodos. phanom. X. p. 1178. & D. MVSAEVS in controu. theol. p. 365.

5. The sacramental propositions: "this is my body," "this is my blood," are rightly explained by the exegetical particles, "in, with, and under." This is evident; a) Because the pronoun, "this," involves the whole sacramental complex, consisting of an earthly and a heavenly reality, and it denotes the latter in the nominative case, while connoting the former in an oblique case; and an oblique case is conveniently explained by the particles, "in, with, and under." b) Pious antiquity used these particles. AUGUSTINE, in a sermon to the neophytes, says: "Receive this IN the bread, which hung on the cross." AMBROSE, de mysteriis c. 9: "What we see is the species of bread and wine; What we believe UNDER that species is the true body and true blood of Christ." And CHRYSOSTOM, book 3 de sacerdotio, says: "It is believed that the body and blood of the Lord are present at the same time WITH those things which are seen." (*). c) The sacramental union and communion is explained by these particles, just as the personal propositions concerning the personal union conceived in Holy Scripture are explained by such particles. The personal proposition found in John ch. 1, 14, "The Word was made flesh," Paul in 1 Tim. III, 16, explains thus: "God was manifest IN the flesh." The proposition which the Apostle uses in Rom. IX, 5, "Christ is God," the same in 2 Cor. V, 19 explains by this proposition: "God was in Christ," and Peter in Acts X, 38 by this one: "God was WITH Christ." Nevertheless, the sacramental propositions can also be explained by other particles, for example; This proposition: "Take, eat, this is my body," is declared: "this thing, which I offer to you to be eaten, is not only bread, but also my body"; or: "this, which I offer to you by means of the bread, is my body."

Proof b. The substantive verb, "IS," according to its literal and proper usage, denotes the existence, nature, or state of a thing, i.e., that a thing is, and of what kind it is. Wherefore the verb, "IS," taken properly, as a copula, connects the predicate with the subject, and indicates that what is given to be eaten in the Holy Supper is truly and really not only bread, but also the body of Christ.

Proof c. "BODY" literally signifies the essential body, or the very substance of the body, for it is explicitly added: "which is given for you," Luke XXII, 19; "which is broken for you," 1 Cor. XI, 24. The "BLOOD" of Christ is the true and substantial blood, by which the new testament was sanctioned and confirmed; but the new testament does not have types or shadows; therefore, not a typical, but the true and substantial blood of Christ is present in the sacred supper, which was shed for us for the remission of sins, Matth. XXVI, 28.

You say: I. That which Christ, instituting the sacred supper, took from the table, broke, and distributed to his disciples, that alone is demonstrated by the pronominal particle, "THIS," when he says, offering it: "this is my body." But Christ, instituting the sacred supper, took bread from the table, broke it, and distributed it to his disciples. Therefore. Response: We deny 1) the major premise, taken in an exclusive sense. For no more follows than that this is demonstrated by the pronominal particle, "THIS"; which is true. For in reality the pronoun demonstrates the bread, but not alone, nor precisely, but in a complex, of which it is a part, and the less noble one at that. 2) What thing in the dispensation of the sacrament is designated by the little word, "THIS," in the proposition, "this is my body," by Christ, in the nominative case, is to be learned not from the preceding words, by which what Christ did before he commanded the disciples to take and eat is described, but from the predicate; for predicates are such as they are permitted to be by their subjects. Since therefore the predicate of this proposition is the body of Christ, it is clear that "THIS" in the nominative case signifies the body of Christ, or the concept of this thing, which was offered to the disciples to be eaten with the bread, thus simultaneously connoting the bread in an oblique case.

You say: II. Paul explains the particle, "THIS," of the bread, saying: "The bread which we break, is it not the κοινωνία of the body of Christ?" 1 Cor. X, 16. Response: Paul's proposition: "The bread is the communication of the body of Christ," is different from this: "This is my body." For in the latter, the body of Christ is predicated in the nominative case; in the former, it is at least connoted in the predicate, in an oblique case. Whence it is not necessary that the subjects be the same in both places, or that the same thing be denoted by the subject in both places. Paul elicits his proposition from Christ's proposition. For if that which he gave to his disciples was the body of Christ, it follows that the bread is the communion of the body of Christ, or for that reason used by Christ, that it might be the means through which we might be made partakers of the body of Christ, not that we might fill our belly.

III. If the pronoun, "THIS," denotes the body of Christ, Christ's proposition will be tautological, just as if he had said: "My body is my body." Response: We assert that the pronoun, "THIS," denotes the sacramental complex, of which the principal part is the body of Christ, which is denoted by the pronoun, "THIS," under the confused concept of "this." Whence no ταυτολογία is inferred.

IV. If by the deictic, τοῦτο, Christ had understood the complex of bread and the body of Christ, mystically united, the sense of Christ's words would be this: "The bread together with my body is my body"; or: "the bread and my body are my body, or the communion of my body": How absurd this is, no one fails to understand. Response: We indeed understand by "THIS" the complex of bread and the body of Christ; but we simultaneously maintain that in signifying the two parts of the complex some inequality intervenes; that the body of Christ is designated principally, or in the nominative case, under the most general notion of "this thing," but the bread less principally, or in an oblique case, so that the sense is: "This thing, which is handed over to be eaten with the bread, is my body."

V. The ecclesiastical Doctors used this proposition: "The eucharistic bread is the body of Christ." Response: That proposition is not ἑγγράφος, or biblical, but ἀγράφος, and ecclesiastical. We are presently investigating the sense of the biblical proposition, which Christ himself used.

Question VII. Is the τὸ ῥητὸν, or the literal sense of the words of the sacred supper, to be retained?

We must not depart from the proper meaning of the words of the sacred supper, but they are to be understood most simply according to the letter, as they lie and sound.

Obs. I. We are not presently concerned with all the words of the institution of the sacred supper, but with the οὐστατικοῖς καὶ διαθετικοῖς, the substantial and dispositive words: "this is my body; this is my blood."

Obs. II. A trope is a change of the proper and native signification into another, in a word resolvable to a topical place freely made by the intellect, for the sake of either necessity, or clarity, or propriety. From which it is evident that a periphrasis is not a trope, since the same signification of the word is not changed, but only illustrated.

Our assertion is proven: 1) In the exposition and consideration of any place of scripture, one must not depart from the letter, where the sense of the letter is good, and the most grave and clear reasons do not persuade to the contrary: But the letter of this our scripture, i.e., the words of the sacred supper, has a good sense, nor are there grave reasons present which urge a trope: Therefore, in the exposition of the words of the supper, one must not depart from the letter. The major is a hermeneutical rule and self-evident. For the literal sense has a certain natural prerogative, from which it cannot be dislodged, except by some great right. It is prior in nature, as the simple is to the composite, the straight to the oblique, the naked to the colored. It is also prior in cognition; when I hear: "Herod is a fox," the image of a fox first occurs to my concept, and by a second mental operation, from consideration of the absurdity, I am carried to the cognition of the trope. It is prior in doctrine, and therefore always clearer and better known by nature, even if sometimes later in time. The minor will be more clearly established from what is to be said below.

2) The author and institutor of the sacred supper is our Lord, Jesus, a most truthful teacher, most benevolent, and most powerful in authority. He is most truthful, and so deceives no one, or he speaks the truth so openly that it can be recognized by men. Therefore, he did not obscurely use a trope. He is most benevolent, because out of love and benevolence towards the human race he instituted the sacrament of the supper, and in the last supper, if ever, he testified his benevolence towards his disciples. Who then will we deny that he dealt clearly with them? He is most powerful in authority. Therefore, all ought so to revere the words of this supreme teacher, that in their interpretation one should in no way rashly depart from the letter, but should solicitously retain it. (*)

3) The institution of the Lord's supper, after Christ's ascension to heaven, was repeated and committed to writing by different writers in different places. Now, just as at other times the sacred writers undertook these mutual tasks, so that what one had perhaps written less fully, or in less proper words, another would express more fully, or in more proper words: so if in these words: "This is my body: This is my blood," the Lord had wished to signify not what they import when taken properly, but this, that the bread is a sign of his body, and the wine is a sign of his blood; it is not credible that the sacred writers, who described the history of the institution with all care, would all have been silent about it. But they were all silent about it, nor did any one of them indicate by a word that it is only signs of the body and blood of Christ, and not the body and blood itself, which are offered to be eaten and drunk.

4) The Lord Jesus spoke the words of the supper when he was near death, and was not to speak much more with his disciples: And so, in reality, he acted as a testator, who bequeathed his body and blood to his church. But at that time, when anyone is near death, he speaks most clearly and plainly. For everyone prudently avoids lawsuits among the heirs, which necessarily follow when a testament labors with obscurity through tropes. Since this is so, the heirs ought certainly to adhere to the words of the testator as much as possible. For if one were to depart from the proper meaning of the speech, the testator would without doubt have indicated it manifestly. Since such

(*) He is also most knowledgeable of all things and future events. He certainly foresaw what and how great dissensions would one day tear the church into parts. Therefore, he himself would either have declared his mind in other words, or would have added an interpretation to these words, unless he had wished them to be understood by everyone as properly said as the letter bears.

prudence is found among men, how much more in the Savior!

5) The Lord's supper is a sacred feast; But convivial words never suffer a metonymy of the sign for the thing signified. Because no one, offering a sign of bread, meat, or wine, says without mockery: "Take, eat, this is bread, meat; Drink, this is wine."

6) To depart rashly from the letter of the words is dangerous, as Eve learned by experiment, Gen. III, 6. On the contrary, Abraham constantly adhered to the letter with great fruit, Genesis XXII, 2.

7) The individual words of the institution are so clear that they reject a trope. For the demonstrative particle, "THIS," indeed demonstrates the whole complex, namely the blessed bread and at the same time the body of Christ, yet in such a way that the body of Christ is denoted in the nominative case, but the bread in an oblique case; which is accustomed to happen in all exhibitiv propositions, in which we exhibit two conjoined things to someone. The verbal copula, "IS," is not capable of a trope. For if the copula, "IS," should lose its signification of coupling or uniting the predicate with the subject, and should take on another; then it would also destroy the proposition itself, so that it would no longer be a proposition. But if the word "IS" means the same as "signifies," it will not be a copula, but part of the predicate. For if the word "signifies" is resolved, it is the same as if you said: "Is signifying"; whence from the resolution, the word, "IS," will at length be the copula; but the participle "signifying" can be referred to nothing other than the predicate. Nor does a trope fall upon "body" or "blood," on account of the προσδιορισμὸν, "which is given for us." For that is designated by the name of body and blood which was given for us unto death, and was shed for us for the remission of sins. But now, not a sign of the body, not a tropical, not a figurative one, but the true and proper body of Christ was given for us unto death, and not a tropical, not a figurative, but the true and proper blood of Christ was shed for us for the remission of sins; Therefore.

8) The new testament differs from the old in this, that there a shadow, here the body is exhibited; in that one signs, in this one the things signified are set forth. Therefore, a merely metonymical and significative theology has no place here. For if the Lord had wished to institute figures of things, he would have retained the paschal lamb, which far more evidently figured the death and promise of Christ, and in the paschal feast he would have said thus, "Eat, this," noting the lamb, "is my body," i.e., signifies my body, as it was formerly to be given, so now given.

Certain doubts are moved against our assertion. (*)

1. The sense of Christ's words is: "This bread is my body, this wine is my blood." But bread is not properly called the body of Christ, for it would follow that the bread was crucified for us; Therefore, the bread is metonymically and sacramentally called the body of Christ, because it is the symbol and seal of the body of Christ. Response: The sense of Christ's words: "This is my body, this is my blood," is not: "This bread is my body, this wine is my blood"; but this is the literal sense: "This, which I offer to you, which you are to receive and eat, is not only bread, but is in addition my body: This, which I offer to you, and you are to receive and drink, is not only wine, but is in addition my blood."

2. In the words of the Holy Supper recited from Luke, ch. XXII, 20, and Paul, 1 Cor. XI, 25, "This cup is the N.T. in my blood," a figurative expression must necessarily be admitted. For the cup is taken by metonymy, where the container is put for the content, for the wine, and the testament for the sign or seal of the testament. Response: 1) We distinguish between that which is not inconvenient, and that which is necessary. It would not be an inconvenient sense: "That which is contained in this cup is the testament in my blood"; which trope would not destroy, but would establish the presence of Christ. But it is not necessary to constitute that trope, because the cup is taken complexly, and denotes the cup filled with wine; for Christ did not bless an empty vessel. The cup is considered here not ἐξ ἀφαιρέσεως, but ἐκ προθέσεως, inasmuch as it is constituted in a mystical order, office, and union. The same is said to be shed for us, 1 Cor. X, 21, and capable of εὐλογίας, 1 Cor. X, 16. 2) Nor would you inconveniently say that "testament" by metonymy of the effect for the cause denotes the cause of the testament, so that the sense is: "That which is drunk from the cup, namely my blood, is the foundation and cause of the N.T." Yet it is not necessary to explain the words of the Holy Supper by that trope. For διαθήκη not only signifies a pact, but also, equally with the word ברית, the means by which a covenant and pact is established, and grace and peace are granted; of which kind of means the divinely instituted sacraments are principally. Therefore, the cup taken complexly for the container and the content is properly called the new means of grace and divine peace in the blood of Christ, that is, with respect to the blood of Christ. 3) If there is any obscurity in the words of Luke and Paul, yet Matthew and Mark express Christ's words clearly: "This is my blood of the N.T.," which anyone will recognize as the very words of the Savior, if he will only compare the words of the former part: "This is my body," which all the Evangelists with Paul retain with the highest consensus.

(*) The antithesis is of the Reformed, who, although they agree in the matter itself, yet disagree among themselves about the manner in which the words of institution are to be explained, which variety of opinions, when so great a matter is at stake, is certainly an indication of a bad cause. As many voices as there are, so many are their opinions. Some stick to the word Hoc, which they interpret as εἰκὼν. Others, and almost the majority, want the verb est to mean the same as σημαίνει. Finally, some think that σῶμά με, αἷμά μου are to be understood no otherwise than if it had been said, σύμβολον, a sign of my body, a sign of my blood. Nor have these disagreements arisen among them only in more recent times, but from the very cradles of this sect, as it were, CARLSTADT, ZWINGLI, OECOLAMPADIUS, and the adherents of each, thus went into parties.

3. The body of Christ is said to be broken metaphorically, 1 Cor. XI, 24. Therefore, a trope is given in the words of the Holy Supper. Response: We distinguish between the words of the Holy Supper that are ουσιαστικά, or substantial, and those that are περιστατικά, or circumstantial. The breaking of Christ's body denotes a circumstance, and is taken improperly, because the history of the passion clearly teaches that no bone of Christ was broken, John XIX, 33. Therefore, a most grave reason urges us to depart from the literal sense.

4. The substantive verb, "IS," is to be explained by "signifies"; because the bread is not properly or substantially the body of Christ, but its memorial, sign, and seal. Response: 1) No grave reason urges us why we should explain "IS" by "signifies," since according to the letter and its proper use it denotes the essence and existence of a thing. 2) The words of the Holy Supper: "This is my body," do not mean the same as this: "The bread is my body."

5. The proposition: "This is my body," is to be understood sacramentally. But a sacramental phrase is one in which the names of the things signified are attributed to the external symbols, because they signify and seal the things signified. Such sacramental propositions are: 1) "Circumcision is the covenant of God," Gen. XVIII, 10, 13, because it is the sign and seal of the covenant, v. 11. 2) "The lamb is the passover," or transit, Exod. XII, 11, i.e., it signifies the transit of the Lord. Response: 1) Just as the sacraments formally are not signs, but means, and such sacred actions by which God through an earthly thing, joined with the word of institution, exhibits a heavenly thing, for offering, conferring, and sealing evangelical grace: So sacramental propositions are not merely significative, but express the mystical union which is given between the earthly and the heavenly thing, and show that through the earthly thing, as a symbol and means, the heavenly thing is truly and really exhibited. 2) Circumcision considered ὁλικῶς, as it denotes the whole sacramental action, is properly and without any trope ברית, i.e., a means of grace and peace; for the Hebrew word denotes both a covenant and the means by which the covenant of grace is sanctioned: But circumcision viewed μερικῶς, with respect to the external amputation of the prepuce, is a sign of the covenant. 3) Nowhere in scripture is it read: "The lamb is the transit of the Lord"; but it is written: פסח הוא ליהוה, which words some render in Latin: "It is the Lord's passover." For the Israelites are commanded to eat the paschal lamb hastily. And it is added for a reason: "It is the Lord's passover," namely, it is at hand, or it is now imminent, the Lord's passover is at hand. Others, however, understand the paschal lamb, having gotten its name from the Lord's passing over, whence Dr. VARENIUS in his commentary on Exodus translates: "The lamb of the passing over before the Lord," das ist und heißt alsdenn ein recht Spring- oder Oster-Lamm vor dem HErrn, and so the sense is: "The lamb set apart, to be slain and eaten at the appointed time, is a paschal lamb consecrated to God and destined for a sacrifice analogically so-called." From which Dr. SEB. SCHMID translates Pesach into Latin as sacrificium praeterificum. All of which things are said without any trope.

6. The substantive verb, "IS," is also taken for "signifies" in other places of scripture, e.g., "That Rock was Christ," 1 Cor. X, 4. The Apostle speaks of the rock from which water flowed in the desert, which was not Christ, except σημαντικῶς, significatively, because it signified Christ. "The seven good kine are seven years," Gen. XLI, 26. Response: 1) The Apostle speaks of the rock accompanying the Israelites in the desert; Which was not that natural and properly so-called rock from which the water flowed; but a metaphorical and spiritual one, namely Christ, as God, whom we also read was tempted by some of the people in v. 9. But the spiritual rock, accompanying the Israelites everywhere, did not signify Christ, but was truly Christ himself. Therefore, the verb, "IS," is not taken there σημαντικῶς, but ὑπαρκτικῶς. 2) The seven cows are not properly so-called cows, but seen in a dream; and the years for a like reason are not real years, but visional. The sense is therefore: "The seven dreamed cows are seven years prefigured in a dream." 3) Those propositions are extra-sacramental, to investigate whose sense solicitously does little or nothing for our purpose.

7. What Paul's expression, "The bread is the κοινωνία, or communion of the body of Christ," is, such also is Christ's expression; "the bread is my body." But the former is sacramental, of which this is the sense; the bread is the sacrament, or sacred sign of the communion of the body of Christ; Therefore, this latter is also such. Response: 1) Christ does not say: "The bread is my body." 2) Paul's expression is not similar to Christ's expression, but differs from it, in subject and predicate. 3) The bread is not a sign, but a communicating medium of the body of Christ, or a medium, by which being taken and eaten we take and eat the body of Christ.

8. Whoever explain the words of the Holy Supper far otherwise than they were uttered by Christ, they explain them by a trope; But the Lutheran doctors, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved; because Christ said: "This is my body," which the Lutherans explain: "In, with, and under the bread is my body." But this explanation differs much from Christ's expression. Response: 1) Between a periphrastic and a tropical explanation, a periphrasis is not a trope, but only a more copious description of a thing, or a fuller explanation. 2) When in exhibitiv propositions the demonstrative pronoun, "THIS," demonstrates two conjoined things, the exegetical particles, "in, with, and under," are conveniently used for a more lucid periphrasis, yet they are not simply necessary, as has been shown above.

9. LUTHER explained Christ's words by synecdoche, which is certainly a trope. Response: We distinguish between rhetorical and grammatical synecdoche. LUTHER understands not the former, but the latter, and indeed not that figure which in grammar is called synecdoche; but because synecdoche, by the force of the word, denotes a complexion, LUTHER rightly maintains that the word τοῦτο, or "THIS," is to be understood complexly, so that it denotes the body of Christ in the nominative case, but connotes the bread in an oblique case.

Instance: By this reasoning the ecclesiastical proposition, "The bread is the body of Christ," will be plainly rejected. Response: That ecclesiastical proposition, rightly explained, is not utterly rejected, but is tolerated; because the bread is understood as consecrated and constituted in a sacramental union with the body of Christ, and so the sense is: "The bread is the body of Christ sacramentally," that is, "the bread is the symbol, or medium, with which the body of Christ is exhibited." For the sacramental union is more intimate and closer, although it is mystical, than that we should grasp it with our senses. That this most close union might be signified, it is said: "The bread is the body of Christ," as if to say, "The union of the bread and the body of Christ is so close that, where the sacramental bread is, there is the body of Christ, and if I receive the sacramental bread, I truly also receive the body of Christ." Confer. SEB. SCHMID's treatise de fundamentis praesentiae corp. & sang. Chr. in S. coena, p. 24.

Question VIII. How many kinds of matter of the Lord's Supper are there?

Matter of the Supper. The matter of the sacred supper is twofold, earthly and heavenly.

Proof. 1) From the nature of all sacraments, which require some external, visible, tangible element, analogous to its signified, determined by the express word of institution, and ordained to this, that it be the ὄχημα, vehicle and exhibitiv medium of the heavenly thing: They require moreover also a heavenly and intelligible thing, exhibited by the visible earthly thing as a divinely ordained medium, from which the fruit of any sacrament principally depends and flows.

2) The heavenly thing in no sacrament is proposed more clearly by the words of institution than in the sacrament of the supper. Wherefore IRENAEUS, L. IV, advers. haeres., c. 34, says considerately: "The bread which is from the earth, receiving the invocation of God, is no longer common bread, but the eucharist, consisting of two things, an earthly and a heavenly."

Question IX. What is the earthly matter of the sacred supper?

The earthly matter. The earthly matter of the sacred supper is partly bread, true in respect of its substance a), which, with respect to quantity, whether larger or smaller, round or oblong; with respect to quality, whether unleavened or leavened; with respect to flour, whether of wheat, fine flour, or barley, makes no difference b); Partly wine, true in respect of its substance c), which, whether red or white, pure or slightly diluted with water, makes no difference d). But bread and wine have the nature of matter in the Holy Supper, inasmuch as they are dispensed and received, eaten and drunk e).

Proof a. Christ, instituting the Holy Supper, took bread, blessed, broke, and gave it to the disciples, Matth. XXVI, 26. Which bread is not abolished by consecration, but retains its substance. For thus in 1 Cor. X, 26, the communicants are said to eat bread, and therefore already blessed or consecrated.

Proof b. In the description of the sacred supper, mention is made of bread, without a description of quantity or quality. The quantity of the eucharistic bread is therefore arbitrary: yet a smaller is preferred to a larger, by which 1) men may be reminded that that bread does not serve to feed the belly, but to sanctify the soul and body; 2) that it might be more conveniently distributed among many, and 3) on account of the most ancient practice of the church. The round loaves, or little cakes, which they called hosts and oblates, are rightly used in our churches. For they are, as to matter and form, and therefore as to substance, true bread; because they consist of purer wheat flour, mixed with water, and are baked by the heat of fire. Add that they have been used in the church for more than a thousand years. For by EPIPHANIUS, who lived at the end of the IV century, in his Ancoratus, the eucharistic bread is called στρογγυλοειδής, having a round figure. Indeed, for distribution and partaking, especially for the old, the toothless, and the sick, they seem more suitable than common and table bread. The quality of the eucharistic bread is also arbitrary, and it is all the same whether leavened or unleavened bread is used for the distribution of the sacred supper. Christ indeed in the first sacred supper used unleavened bread; because he celebrated the supper in the days of τῶν ἄζύμων, and after eating the paschal lamb, at which time, according to the law of God, no other bread than unleavened was in use among the Jews. See Exod. XII, 18; Lev. XXIII, 6. Yet he did not institute that either unleavened or leavened bread should be used, but simply instituted bread, whatever it may be, provided it has the true nature of bread. Whence, although Christ used unleavened bread, it is nevertheless probable that the primitive church, even in the time of the Apostles themselves, used leavened bread. For we read in Acts XX, 6, that Paul sailed away from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and within five days came to Troas, and on one of the sabbaths the disciples came together to break bread. But after the days of unleavened bread had passed, leavened bread was in use among the Jews. From which we probably gather that the Apostle also used it in the celebration of the sacred supper.

Proof c. The other symbol and visible element is wine. For when Christ, having offered the cup, had said: "Drink from it, all of you," Matth. XXVI, 27, he adds in v. 29 that he would not henceforth drink ἐκ τοῦ γεννήματος τῆς ἀμπέλου, "of this fruit of the vine"; which is an elegant periphrasis for wine.

Proof d. Christ determined the substance, not the quality of the wine. It is indeed probable that the Lord used wine tempered with water, because in the hottest regions (in which Palestine is) the wines produced are more generous or stronger than can be conveniently drunk without tempering with water. But in these northern regions, where the wines are not so strong, there is no necessity of adding water. We distinguish between a light mixture, or the addition of water in a small quantity, and a heavy mixture, or the addition of water in a large quantity. We grant that the former is licit; but we say that the latter is not even licit. The mixture is to be judged so that the odor, color, and flavor of the wine prevail.

Proof e. Bread and wine, considered generally and in themselves, are the remote matter of the Holy Supper: But the same, viewed in their sacramental use, inasmuch as they are consecrated and dispensed among the communicants, and are received, eaten, and drunk by them, are the proximate matter of the Eucharist.

Obs. The reasons why Christ willed to use these symbols in particular are: 1) Because they are almost the most common, and available at all times and everywhere; 2) These are almost the chief nutritive things in every kind of food and drink, Ps. CIV, 15; 3) The union of food and drink with our bodies is a symbol of our most close union with Christ; 4) A reminder of charity, 1 Cor. X, 17.

The antithesis is 1) of the Greeks, who keenly contend that leavened bread must be used in the dispensation of the Holy Supper; who call the Latins azymites on account of their use of unleavened bread in the eucharist, while they themselves are called fermentarii by the Latins. 2) of the Socinians, who deny that round loaves, which we commonly name hosts or oblates, are to be used in the eucharist. 3) of the Pontificians, who assert that crama, or wine mixed with water, must necessarily be used.

The principal argument of the Greeks is that Christ did not celebrate the Passover at the same time as the Jews, but anticipated it. Whence they gather that he used leavened bread. Response: We concede that Christ did not celebrate the Passover at the same time with the Jews; because on the same day that Christ had eaten the Passover, they killed him, and they refused to enter the praetorium, lest, being about to eat the Passover, they should be defiled, John XVIII, 28. But Christ observed the time of the Passover according to the divine institution, the Jews according to human tradition. It was a tradition among them that if the Passover fell on a προσάββατον, or day of preparation, it should be postponed to the next sabbath. For which cause the sabbath day (on account of the concurrence of feasts, to be sure) is said to be great at that time, John XIX, 31. We prove that Christ ate the Passover according to the divine institution on the 14th day of the first month from the fact that he was otherwise most tenacious of the divine commandments, but held the δευτερώσεις of the Jews of no account; partly, because in Luke XXII, 7, Christ, when the day of unleavened bread came, in which it ἔδει, i.e., was necessary to sacrifice the Passover, sent Peter and John to prepare the Passover; partly from the Jews' own confession about that translation, about which see the Chronologists.

The Socinians object; I. That bread is to be used in the administration of the sacred supper which has the power of nourishing and strengthening the body. But hosts do not have the power of nourishing, etc. Therefore. Response: 1) Round loaves have the power of nourishing; 2) Taken in a larger quantity they actually nourish; 3) We take not much, but little, so that we may recognize that these are taken not εἰς πλησμονὴν, but εἰς ἁγιασμόν (as the Fathers of the Council of Nicaea speak).

II. Between which bread there is no analogy with the body of Christ, that bread is not to be used in the eucharist; But between hosts and the body of Christ, etc. Therefore. Response: 1) The sacrament of the supper was not instituted primarily on account of the analogy of bread with the body of Christ, but so that the eucharistic bread might be the κοινωνία, i.e., the exhibitive medium of the body of Christ, 1 Cor. X, 16. 2) There is a greater analogy of thin and fine breads with the glorified body of Christ than of coarser breads.

III. Christ used a larger bread; Therefore, we should also use the same. Response: We distinguish between what is licit and what is necessary. We licitly use a larger bread, but not necessarily; otherwise, for the same reason, someone might perhaps gather: Christ used unleavened bread; Therefore, unleavened bread must necessarily be used in the dispensation of the supper.

IV. One bread is to be used, of which many may partake, 1 Cor. X, 17. But hosts are not one bread, etc. Therefore. Response: We distinguish between the unity of bread by reason of one mass or substance, and the unity of bread by reason of its sacramental office. The eucharistic bread is one, according to Paul in this passage, in the whole Christian world, by reason of its sacramental function, not by reason of mass and substance. It is one not in number, but in kind, in all churches.

V. True bread is to be used in the eucharist; Hosts are not, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved: True bread has an outer crust and an inner pith; Which cannot be said of hosts. Response: 1) Hosts have an outer crust and an inner pith, but a subtle one; 2) A toothless old woman eating the pith eats true bread.

VI. Hosts derive their origin from the papacy. Response: We deny it. They were in use in the time of EPIPHANIUS.

The Pontificians argue: I. Christ in the institution of the sacred supper used crama, or wine tempered with water. Therefore, it is to be used today in the dispensation of the sacred supper. Response: It is indeed probable that Christ, according to the custom of the region, used wine tempered with water, but it is not infallibly certain. The example of Christ can show that crama is licit; but necessity is not inferred from it, since a precept is lacking, and Christ only makes mention of the fruit of the vine.

II. Whatever was prefigured by the flow of blood and water from the side of Christ, that is to be used in the administration of the Holy Supper; But wine tempered with water, etc; Therefore. Response: 1) Our discussion is about the mixture of water and wine, not about the confluence of water and blood. 2) The two sacraments of the new testament, baptism and the Lord's supper, were prefigured by the flow of blood and water.

III. The mixture of wine and water in the eucharist has many good significations, e.g., the union of the two natures in Christ, the union of Christ with the church. Response: The external symbols were instituted by Christ not for the sake of signification, but for the sake of κοινωνία and exhibition.

Question X. What is the celestial matter of the sacred supper?

Celestial. The celestial matter of the Lord's supper is the true and substantial body of Christ a), likewise the true and substantial blood of Christ b).

Proof a. That the true and substantial body of Christ is given to us to be eaten with the blessed bread in the Holy Supper is most lucidly clear from the unanimous and unvaried description of the Holy Supper made by the three Evangelists, Matth. XXVI, 26; Mark XIV, 22; Luke XXII, 19, and Paul's repetition, 1 Cor. XI, 24: "This is my body, which is given for you." Since, however, the true body of Christ was given for us unto death, it is easy to gather that in the eucharist there is given to be eaten with the consecrated bread not a typical or figurative body, such as was the body of the paschal lamb, inasmuch as it prefigured or foreshadowed the body of Christ; not a mystical body, which is the church, Eph. I, 23; not a sign of the body, which for its part was not crucified for us; but the true and personal body of Christ, proper to the Son of God, and therefore full of God and majestic, in which the fullness of the divinity dwells as in its own temple, Col. II, 9. From which it follows that this body is truly life-giving, John VI, 51. It is the body of Christ now glorified and most glorious. For although we always enjoy the crucified and dead body of Christ, as to its merit, it is nevertheless no longer in that state now, but we enjoy it in the state in which it now is. Therefore, it is not to be circumscribed by the rules of nature. The flesh of Christ could be without its own υπόστασις; why not also without quantitative extension? Glorious bodies are affected by the angelic duration of an aevum; why not also by an angelic ubi? Confer. DANNHAVER in hodosoph. phaenom. X, page 1197.

Proof b. The other part of the celestial matter in the Holy Supper is the true and substantial blood of Christ. For, according to the testimony of the Evangelists, Matth. XXVI, 27, 28, and Mark XIV, 23, 24, Christ, having taken, consecrated, and offered the cup to be drunk, said: "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Wherefore, since the true blood of Christ was shed for us, it is easily apparent that in the eucharist there is given to be drunk with the consecrated wine not a typical or figurative blood, not a sign of blood, not the efficacy of blood, but the true blood of Christ, contained in his veins, shed in the passion, but taken up again by him when he rose; the proper blood of the Son of God, Acts XX, 28, therefore most precious, ἱλαστικός and λυτρωτικός, sacrificial and redemptory, 1 Pet. I, 19; Hebr. IX, 12; covenantal blood, Zach. IX, 11, by which the new testament was sanctioned and confirmed; cleansing blood of sprinkling, 1 John I, 7. From which we gather: Whatever is exhibited in the Holy Supper to be eaten with the blessed bread and to be drunk with the consecrated wine, that is the celestial matter of this holy feast; But the true and substantial body of Christ is exhibited to be eaten with the blessed bread, and the true and substantial blood of Christ to be drunk with the consecrated wine, in the Holy Supper; Therefore. The major is self-evident; for whatever is exhibited or offered in a feast to be eaten and drunk, that is the matter of the feast. But the body and blood of Christ is the celestial matter; because it is the proper body and blood of the Son of God, and is distinguished from the earthly matter, namely bread and wine.

You say: I. When Christ said: "This is my body," he did not wish to designate his body as the celestial matter in this sacrament under the aspect of exhibition; because 1) he himself sat at the table, and 2) since he himself ate of this bread, he would have eaten himself, and also 3) when he spoke, he would have been at the same time mute and speaking; which is contradictory and absurd. Response: To I. Christ sat at the table in a natural manner; but he gave his body to be eaten sacramentally. To II. Christ indeed ate the paschal bread, but not the eucharistic bread; just as he also did not drink the eucharistic wine. For Mark testifies in ch. XIV, 23, that all drank from the blessed cup, but he means the Apostles, to whom the command of eating the body of Christ with the bread, and of drinking his blood with the wine, pertained. To III. Christ spoke, according to his natural condition, and at the same time he did not speak, according to his supernatural condition; which are not contradictory.

You say: II. The blood of Christ is not the celestial matter of the sacred supper, for the reason that, as Luke XXII, 20, and Paul, 1 Cor. XI, 25, relate, Christ, instituting the eucharist, said: "This cup is the new testament in my blood." Response: We distinguish between a real proposition and a usitative one. In the former a thing is predicated of a thing, in the latter a use is predicated of a thing. Luke and Paul in the cited words refer to the use of the Lord's supper; of which kind of usitative proposition is also when baptism is called the stipulation of a good conscience, 1 Pet. III, 21.

Question XI. What kind of union is there of the earthly and celestial matter in the use of the Holy Supper?

Sacramental Union. The sacramental union in the use of the Holy Supper is a true and real conjunction of the earthly and heavenly matter, by which, from the will and power of Christ the institutor, the external elements, consecrated bread and wine, are united with the heavenly reality expressed by the word of institution, namely the body and blood of Christ, into one sacrament, so that on account of this union, in the very use of this sacrament, the body and blood of Christ are exhibited with the bread and wine to be orally eaten and drunk by all communicants, in commemoration of Christ's death.

Obs. I. We are not presently speaking of the personal union of the divine and human natures in Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου), nor of the spiritual union of the souls of the faithful with Christ; but of the sacramental union, which is not merely σημαντική, or significative, nor τυπική, prefigurative, nor only ενεργητική, or operative, nor σχετική, or relative, nor φυσική, natural or local; but it is substantial, with respect to the extremes, although it is sacramental with respect to the means, through a true and real conjunction, and the simultaneous exhibition of the body of Christ with the blessed bread, and the blood of Christ with the blessed wine, in the use of the sacrament of the supper.

Obs. II. The mathematical point of time when the earthly and heavenly things are precisely united in the eucharist cannot be defined; because the Lord promised the presence of his body and blood not to the execution of one, but of several corequisite actions, which requires some latitude of time, and among which actions the last are eating and drinking. For he said: "Take, eat, this is my body," Matth. XXVI, 26. Therefore, to take the bread, to bless it, to distribute it, to eat it, are simultaneously corequisite for the body of Christ to exist united with the bread. In the same way, one must think of the wine being joined with the blood of Christ. Cf. HULSEMANN, breviarium, c. XIII, p. 858.

Obs. III. The sacramental union of the earthly and heavenly thing implies a mutual presence and communication of the bread and the body, likewise of the wine and the blood of Christ, so that the blessed bread is the vehicle of the body, and the blessed wine is the vehicle of the blood of Christ.

The assertion is proved: 1) Whatever Christ offers to us in the sacred supper to be eaten with the blessed bread and to be drunk with the blessed wine, that must in the use of this sacrament be conjoined and united with the eucharistic bread and wine; But his body and blood, etc.; Therefore.

2) From the apostolic testimony. Paul explicitly says: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communication of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communication of the body of Christ?" 1 Cor. X, 16. Where there is a true and real communication, there is a true and real union, nor can κοινωνία have any place without union; because communication is the effect of union.

3) Because from the earthly and heavenly thing one sacrament is made, it cannot happen without some intervening union.

Question XII. Is the substantial body of Christ and the substantial blood of Christ truly present in the sacrament of the supper?

The true and substantial body and blood of Christ is really present in the use of the Holy Supper.

Obs. I. Distinguish between physical and hyperphysical presence. Physical presence is local and circumscriptive, proper to bodies behaving naturally. The mode of hyperphysical, or supernatural presence (i.e., which we cannot attain by natural perception), is twofold, definitive and repletive. A finite being is definitively present which is in a certain where without local occupation of space. In this way angels are present, who since they are spiritual essences, cannot be measured by the interval of place. This definitive mode of being present will also be common to our bodies in eternal life. In this way Christ also made use of it when he came out of the tomb through the sepulchral stone, when he entered to the disciples through the closed doors. In which way the body of Christ is also not inconveniently established to be present to the elemental bread in the use of the sacred supper; although in addition there also accedes the sacramental union of the bread with the body of Christ, which depends not precisely or simply on that definitive mode of presence, but on a special divine promise. Repletive presence is omnipresence, which belongs to God alone by himself and essentially, to the human nature of Christ through union with the divine and personally.

Obs. II. Distinguish between objective, or intentional presence, and true and real presence. Something is said to be objectively present through this, that it is actually the object of our cognition, or that it is known by a knowing power, such as our intellect. But that which is present only through this, that it is known by the intellect, is not really present; For what is really present, is present without this, that it is known by the intellect. Therefore, what is only objectively present, is present only by its species, not in itself. But what is not present in itself, but only through a species impressed on the intellect, how can it be said to be truly and really present? If in a common feast a conversation arises about the king of France, and about the exquisite delights of food and drink with which the royal table is furnished; it is rightly said that the king of France and his dishes are present there objectively, while they are known through their species, impressed on the intellect; But who would bear someone saying that the king of France and the royal dishes are truly and really present in that feast? Besides, it is established that even those beings of reason, which are imagined to be, though they neither are nor can be, have their objective presence; as when I conceive a chimera, or a goat-stag, which are nevertheless not truly and really present to the one conceiving. That which is truly and really present to someone, is present according to its true and real being: How then can that be truly and really present to someone, which has neither its true and real being, nor can have it, but consists entirely of fiction?

Obs. III. The body of Christ is present to the eucharistic bread distinctly, and the blood of Christ to the blessed wine distinctly; because Christ willed the distribution to be made by distinct symbols. That discrete exhibition, however, does not imply a separation, so that the body is really separated from the blood. Whence we distinguish between a material, a personal, and a sacramental presence; in which last way only, the body of Christ is present to the bread, and his blood to the wine in the use of the Holy Supper. Thus, although the blood is inseparable from the body of Christ as to natural and personal presence, they can nevertheless be distinctly present and exhibited by a sacramental presence; because this sacrament does not result from nature, by virtue of which the body of Christ is not without blood; nor from the personal union, according to which the blood equally as the body was assumed into the hypostasis of the Son of God; but solely from the ordinance and institution of Christ, by which these were ordained to a distinct distribution, and the eating of the body of Christ with the blessed bread, and the drinking of the blood of Christ with the blessed wine.

Obs. IV. The question is not of a virtual or operative presence of Christ, i.e., whether Christ is present in the Holy Supper by an effect, or operation, as the sun is present to us by light and heat; nor of a significative or prefigurative presence, as the body of the paschal lamb in the O.T. prefigured the body of Christ; but of a sacramental, real, and substantial presence of the body and blood of Christ in the action of the Holy Supper.

Our assertion is proven: 1) From the words of institution. Whatever is exhibited in the sacred supper to be eaten and drunk by the mouth of the body, that is substantially and immediately present to the communicants in the Holy Supper; But the body and blood of Christ is that which is exhibited in the Holy Supper to be eaten and drunk by the mouth of the body; Therefore, the body and blood of Christ is substantially and instantly present to the communicants in the Holy Supper. The major is self-evident, unless you wish to say that what is exhibited to them to be eaten and drunk in the Holy Supper is not eaten and drunk by the communicants. For for something to be eaten or drunk by the mouth of the body, which is not substantially and immediately present to the one eating and drinking, implies a contradiction. The minor is also manifest from the words of institution. For, having exhibited the blessed bread, the Savior says to his disciples: "Take, eat, this is my body." Similarly, having exhibited the blessed cup: "Drink of it, all of you. For this is my blood, that blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins," Matth. XXVI, 26, 27, 28. Where the words of the command: "eat, drink," are doubtless to be taken of oral eating and drinking, which alone is properly so called eating and drinking; Which drinking, immediately performed at the command of the Lord, Mark also commemorates, ch. XIV, 23: "And they all drank of it." The verb, "drank," designates an external act, concerning which testimony could be borne. Now, that the very body and blood of Christ is that which is exhibited to be eaten and drunk by the mouth of the body in the Holy Supper, is likewise clear from the words of institution. For when Christ commanded the disciples to eat, he immediately adds, explaining the object which ought to be eaten: "This is my body." And when he had commanded them to drink, he adds, explaining the object which ought to be drunk: "This is my blood." What else is this than that Christ commands his body to be eaten, and his blood to be drunk?

2) From the periphrasis of the blood of Christ. For as Matthew relates, ch. XXVI, 28, Christ described the object of drinking thus: "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Namely, just as, when the law was promulgated, and the people had bound themselves by its religion, Moses, sprinkling them with the blood of victims, thus addressed them: "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words," Exod. XXIV, 8; so Christ, exhibiting his own blood, than which nothing is more precious, soon to be shed on the altar of the cross, by instituting a new sacrament, says: "This is my blood," etc. From which we gather: In whatever sense the blood of bulls sprinkled is called the blood of the O.T., in that sense the blood of Christ is called the blood of the N.T. But the blood of bulls is called the blood of the O.T. not significatively, but effectively and constitutively, through a real presence; Therefore. Especially the words of Luke, ch. XXII, 20: "This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you," most clearly demonstrate the power of the blood of Christ, present in the chalice. For nothing is more certain than that the cup was shed for us not on account of its material, nor on account of the wine contained, but solely with respect to the blood of Christ. For either the wine is present in the cup without the blood, or the blood of Christ with the wine. Not the former; because that is present which is the basis of the sanctioned new testament, and which is shed for us. But wine alone is not the basis of the new testament, nor was wine shed for us. Therefore, the blood is present with the wine.

3) From the true and real κοινωνία which is between the eucharistic bread and the body of Christ, and likewise between the wine and the blood of Christ, as Paul testifies, 1 Cor. X, 16. Where there is a true and real communication of the distributed bread with the body, and of the consecrated wine with the blood of Christ, there is a true and real presence of the body and blood of Christ with the blessed bread and wine; But in the eucharist, etc. Therefore.

4) From the guilt of the body and blood of the Lord, concerning which Paul says, 1 Cor. XI, 27. Those who incur guilt of the body and blood of the Lord by eating and drinking it unworthily, to them the body and blood of the Lord must be really present; But impenitent sinners, etc. Therefore.

5) From the necessary discretion of the Lord's body, concerning which Paul says, 1 Cor. XI, 29. For if the body of Christ is to be discerned in the eucharist from common food, it is certainly necessary that it be truly and really present; But the antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent.

6) From the testimony of the blood of Christ concerning our salvation on this earth, of which John speaks in 1 ep. ch. V, 8: "There are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood." He who testifies on earth must be present on earth; But the blood of Christ, etc. Therefore.

7) From the absurdities which follow the contrary opinion. If the body and blood of Christ are not truly and really present in the sacred supper, it follows: 1) only bare sacramental symbols are left; 2) the sacramental signs of the N.T. are more obscure than the signs of the O.T.; for the paschal lamb represented the death of Christ more clearly than the eucharistic bread; 3) Christ is no more present in the eucharist than he was present to the fathers of the O.T.

8) Christ, who is the only-begotten Son of God, and himself true God and omnipotent, can easily, through his omnipotent power, bring it about that he presents his body and blood, endowed with divine subsistence, in that divine subsistence, present in the Holy Supper, wherever and whenever it is celebrated. If anyone should deny this, we oppose to him the divine omnipotence, by which the angel Gabriel once confirmed the virgin Mary, saying, Luke I, 37: "For with God nothing shall be impossible."

The antithesis is of the Anabaptists, Arminians, Socinians, and Schwenkfeldians, who deny the true and real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Holy Supper. Their arguments are:

I. Every natural body is in a certain and determined place, and therefore not in many places where the sacrament of the supper is administered; But the body of Christ, etc. Therefore. Response: 1) We distinguish between a body called natural with respect to its substance, and with respect to its affections or qualities. The body of Christ is a true and natural body with respect to its substance, but with respect to its affections it is glorified and majestic, and therefore supernatural. 2) No natural body by the powers of nature can be in several places, yet by the omnipotence of God the presence of a certain body can be multiplied, without its essence being multiplied. What is impossible for nature is possible for God. Let us therefore grant that God can do something which we confess we cannot understand. 3) Grant that no body, subsisting with a finite and created subsistence, can be in several places; it is nevertheless otherwise with the body of Christ, which has been exalted into the infinite υπόστασις of the λόγος; This the Son of God by his omnipotent power can and will make present, wherever and whenever the sacred supper is celebrated.

Instance: Christ assumed a human body, of the same kind as our body, Hebr. II, 14. Therefore, it enjoys the same affections. Response: As close as the body of Christ the θεανθρώπος approaches the condition of the body of a mere man (ψιλλῷ ἀνθρώπῳ) as to essence, so far by a long interval does it differ from the same as to subsistence, and its consequent, the participation of divine majesty, so that the whole fullness of the divinity dwells in it σωματικῶς, Col. II, 9.

II. Whatever doctrine subverts the truth of the human nature of Christ is not to be asserted; But the doctrine of the substantial presence of the body of Christ in the sacred supper is subverted, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved; because every true human body is visible, palpable, and circumscribed in a certain place; which kind of body is not that which is said to be under the hosts in many places. Response: Every body is visible, palpable, and circumscribed in a certain place according to its natural condition; I grant. But by divine omnipotence it is made invisible, impalpable, and not actually circumscribed in a place, if it is divinely constituted in a supernatural state. For glorified bodies, endowed with spiritual qualities, are not seen, touched, and are not circumscribed by a physical place.

III. If the body of Christ is co-present with the eucharistic bread, there will be as many bodies of Christ as there are hosts distributed; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Response: denying the consequence. For for the same reason someone might perhaps gather: If God is mystically united with all faithful Christians, there will be as many Gods as there are faithful Christians. This therefore only follows, that the body of Christ is under as many breads as are distributed in the sacred supper. Then, all the breads in the Holy Supper are as one bread, as the Apostle teaches, 1 Cor. X, 17: "we being many are one bread." It should therefore rather be concluded: Although there are many breads, since they are as one, there will also be one body.

IV. If the body of Christ were present distinctly in the Holy Supper under the bread, and the blood under the wine, the body of Christ would be separated from his blood; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Response: We distinguish between a sacramental union and presence, and a natural union and presence. The body of Christ is under the bread sacramentally; because the body is under the bread as under its sacramental symbol, and the blood is under the wine as under its sacramental symbol. For the bread in the sacrament was instituted by Christ to be the symbol of his body; and the wine was instituted to be the symbol and vehicle of his blood. By this the natural union of the body and blood of Christ is not broken; since the Son of God by his omnipotence can make his body and blood present in various ways, its nature remaining safe.

V. If the body of Christ were in, with, and under the bread, it would certainly have to be adored in, with, and under the bread. The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence is evident; because Christ is to be adored where he exhibits his gracious presence to us. The falsity of the consequent is manifest, because those who adore Christ in or under the bread, adore the bread itself at the same time. Response: 1) Not always that with which Christ is united is to be adored. For he is united with the faithful; are the faithful therefore to be adored? 2) The object of adoration is one thing, the place of adoration another. Where the eucharistic bread is distributed, there Christ is to be adored; but the eucharistic bread is not the object of adoration.

VI. Whoever do not want to assert consubstantiation in the Holy Supper, they ought not to assert that the body of Christ is in, with, and under the bread. But the Lutherans do not want to assert consubstantiation; Therefore. The major is clear; because he who says that the body of Christ is in, with, and under the bread, by this very thing indicates that the body of Christ is commingled with the bread, or impanated. Response: Those explicative particles do not infer a physical presence, but a hyperphysical one; not a local inclusion, but a unique union; not a carnal impanation or consubstantiation, but a mutual presence and sacramental communion of the blessed bread and the body of Christ, of the blessed wine and the blood of Christ.

VII. Whatever body has been taken up into the heavens is not present on earth. But the body of Christ, etc.; Therefore. Response: 1) Christ ascended into heaven, that he might fill all things, Eph. IV, 10, i.e., that he might be omnipresent, Jer. XXIII, 23. He was exalted to the right hand of the omnipresent God, which permeates, embraces, and exceeds all places; Therefore, by virtue of this exaltation he can make his body present in a special way, where and when he wills. After his ascension, Christ was seen several times by Paul, Acts IX, XXII, XXIII, XXVI. 2) By the ascension, indeed, the mode of visible presence was taken away; but not the invisible and sacramental one.

VIII. The substantial presence in the eucharist conflicts with the end of the instituted supper, which Paul says is that we should remember Christ and proclaim his death until he comes to judgment. But if he is already present with his body, the proclamation of his death will cease; for commemoration is of things not present, but absent. Response: It is denied that it conflicts. For 1) we remember him who is not seen, even if he is present; 2) Indeed, we remember him who makes himself visibly present to us, if we have previously forgotten him. 3) Christ is present and comes with his body in the sacred supper, but he does not come to judgment. Whence the proclamation of his death, suffered so many ages ago, and therefore now by no means present, does not cease, although the body of Christ is now present, but invisibly. In the other life, the proclamation of Christ's death will not cease among the elect, when they will behold the present body of Christ in glory, Apoc. V, 9.

IX. The substantial presence of the body of Christ in, with, and under the bread conflicts with the first institution and administration of the supper. For when Christ took bread from the table, broke it, and distributed it, he sat at the table together with the disciples; But he was not in, with, and under the bread, nor did he break himself in, with, and under the bread, nor did he carry himself in his hands. Response: It does not conflict with the first institution and administration of the supper. When Christ took bread from the table, broke it, and distributed it, he sat at the table naturally together with the disciples; and when he distributed the bread, he at the same time caused his body to be in, with, or under the bread sacramentally, not by removing his session at the table, but by multiplying the presence of his body through divine omnipotence.

X. The substantial presence of the body of Christ in, with, and under the bread conflicts with the scope and intention of Christ. For Christ willed his body to be eaten by the faithful principally inasmuch as it was given and crucified for us. Whence he says: "This is my body, which is given for you." But those who assert a substantial presence in the bread exhibit only a glorious and impassible body to be eaten. Response: It does not conflict with the scope and intention of Christ. For he willed his body to be eaten, which was to be given and crucified for us; Not inasmuch as it was given and crucified for us. Christ in the first supper exhibited his body soon to be given, not yet given; Now he himself exhibits it to us, having been given.

XI. Whatever body is omnipresent is not only exhibited to be eaten under the blessed bread, but under all bread; But according to the opinion of the Lutherans, the body of Christ is omnipresent; Therefore. Response: We distinguish between a general and a special presence. They are not opposites, to be omnipresent, and nevertheless to be exhibited to someone in a certain special mode of presence. For thus we read that the omnipresent Holy Spirit descended upon Christ in the form of a dove, Matth. III, 16, was given to the disciples by an external breath, John XX, was communicated to the Apostles in the form of fiery tongues, Acts II, 3, and dwells truly and by a gracious presence in the bodies of the pious, 1 Cor. III, 16. Although, therefore, through the grace of the personal union, general omnipresence was communicated to the assumed flesh of Christ, that presence nevertheless does not take away or destroy the special and sacramental presence of the body of Christ.

XII. The substantial presence of the body of Christ in the eucharist conflicts with express testimonies of scripture, which deny that Christ is always with his body on this earth, such as are: 1) "I came into the world, again, I leave the world," i.e., the earth, John XVI, 28. 2) "ye have not me always," John XII, 8. 3) The angel said of Christ, who had risen: "He is risen, he is not here," Matth. XXVIII, 6. 4) "If he were on earth, he should not be a priest," Hebr. VIII, 4. Response: These and similar places of scripture do not simply deny the presence of the body of Christ on this earth, but a certain mode of presence. For 1) when the Lord says: "I leave the world," the leaving of the world is to be understood according to the ordinary and visible conversation, according to which the Word made flesh had hitherto dwelt among men. But nothing prevents Christ, having left the world according to that visible presence, from nevertheless being present with his body in the Holy Supper in another way, namely invisibly, according to his promise. 2) Thus the Savior denies only a certain mode of presence, John XII, 8: "ye have not me always," namely in such a way that you can do good to me, as you can to the poor. 3) Similarly when the angel, Matth. XXVIII, 6, says: "He is not here"; namely dead, lying in the tomb, whom you can anoint, such as you seek. 4) In Hebr. VIII it is written of our Pontiff, Christ: "If he were on earth," to wit, in the manner of other pontiffs, who offer gifts according to the law, and serve the shadow of heavenly things, he would not even be that true priest, prefigured in the O.T. by the Levitical priests; and therefore it was not fitting for him to remain on earth in the manner of priests serving a shadow, but to penetrate into heaven itself and to sit at the right hand of God. But the ascension of Christ into heaven, and his session at the right hand of God the Father, do not destroy the invisible presence of Christ in the sacred supper, although they take away the visible, ordinary, humble, and local presence.

XIII. What the union of the members, i.e., the faithful, is with Christ the head, such also is the presence; But the union of the faithful with Christ is nothing but spiritual; Therefore, the presence is also nothing but spiritual. The major is established; because the presence of Christ in the supper is for the sake of our union with Christ. The minor is proved; because the union is by faith, Eph. III, 17. Response: The union of the faithful with Christ in the Holy Supper is twofold, one corporal, the other spiritual. It is called corporal with respect to the substance united, not with respect to the mode of uniting; by which, namely, not indeed in a corporal, natural, and sensible manner, but yet truly the very substance of the body of Christ, present with a substantial proximity, in, with, or under the bread, is united, or joined to the faithful. The spiritual union is by faith, of which John VI, 36 speaks. The unfaithful in the Holy Supper do not have a spiritual union with Christ, but only a corporal union; Which, however, does not profit them, but rather harms them, and leads to greater condemnation, 1 Cor. XI, 29.

Instance: If the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Holy Supper is not spiritual, it will be corporal, and will be made by a physical contact of the body of Christ, which is absurd. Response: The presence of the body of Christ in the Holy Supper is not merely spiritual, which is made by a representation of faith alone, nor is it corporal with respect to the mode, or physical; but it is true, real, and substantial indeed, yet supernatural, incomprehensible, and known to God alone.

Question XIII. What is the form of the eucharist?

Form of the Supper. The form of the eucharist is completed by the formal acts of this sacrament, following one another undistractedly: a) εὐλογία, the blessing, or consecration of the symbols; b) δόσις, or the distribution of the consecrated symbols; c) λήψις, the reception of the distributed symbols, consisting in the eating of the body of Christ with the blessed bread, and the drinking of the blood of Christ with the blessed wine.

Proof a. We learn from the words of institution that the first formal act of this sacrament is εὐλογία. For, as Matthew testifies, ch. XXVI, 26, "Jesus took bread, and having blessed (καὶ εὐλόγησας), broke it, and gave it to the disciples," and v. 27, "and taking the cup, and having given thanks (καὶ εὐχαριστήσας), he gave it to them." The εὐλογία, or blessing, differs from the εὐχαριστία, if not really, yet objectively and formally; in that the former was directed to the external symbols, the bread and wine; the latter to the heavenly Father. Confer. 1 Cor. X, 16, where Paul makes mention of the cup of blessing. The blessing, or consecration, is done by a) prayer, b) the repetition of the words of institution. For whatever is sanctified, is sanctified by the word of God and prayers, 1 Tim. IV, 5. We do not find in the sacred code a certain formula of prayers, described by Christ or by the Apostles, for consecrating the eucharist. Since therefore it is not established what prayer Christ used in blessing the symbols, we gather that the Savior left the form of the prayer in the discretion of the church, so that for this reason not even the Lord's prayer is simply necessary by divine right for this act, provided that such formulas of prayers are used which are full of devotion and are particularly accommodated to the consecratory act. Meanwhile, since Christ elsewhere prescribed this formula of praying: "Our Father, who art in heaven," indeed commanded us to pray thus, and no better prayer is given, the church from the beginning has rightly and piously sanctioned this prayer in consecrating the eucharist. Moreover, the consecration is done by the Lord's prayer indeed in general, but by the accession of the words of institution that generic consecration is determined to this specific use, which is proper to the eucharist, so that it is not just any consecration, but specifically the consecration of the eucharist. The repetition of the words of institution, however, is not a bare historical recitation of the words of institution, or a doctrinal review directed to informing the people; but it is a) ἀγιαστική, or separative of the symbols from natural and profane use; b) effectively elevative and destinate, to a holy and supernatural use, so that the consecrated bread and blessed wine may be the adequate matter of this sacrament; c) exhibitiv of the body of Christ in many ποῦ, and unitive of the same with the bread and wine, inasmuch as it is conjoined with δόσει καὶ λήψει; for the εὐλογία alone is not the cause of the sacramental union; for Christ gave, and said: "Take," and only then did he utter these words; "THIS IS MY BODY." Therefore, unless the eucharistic bread is at the same time offered and received, it cannot be said: "this is the body of Christ." Cf. Dr. HULSEMANN, breviarium, chap. XIII, p. 675. It is to be well observed here that this threefold effect of consecration does not depend on some magical incantation, which is inherent in the consecratory words according to the tips of the letters, or according to the husk of the syllables, or on a created power which is given to the priest through an indelible character. Far be it from us to think these things about this venerable sacrament! But we distinguish between the efficient and the impulsive cause of the sacramental union. The efficient cause is solely the omnipotent power of Christ, by which he makes his body and blood present, and sacramentally unites them with the bread and wine, whenever and wherever the Lord's supper is rightly celebrated. The impulsive cause is the benevolent will of Christ, by which it pleased him, and he also promised to make his body and blood present, and to unite them with the bread and wine, wherever his supper is rightly celebrated. The words of institution contain this will and promise of Christ, the recitation of which is for that reason necessary, and is required by way of an impulsive cause. Which the solid declaration of the Formula of Concord, p. 747, does not deny but declares: "We believe, teach, and confess that the true presence of the body and blood of Christ in the supper is effected neither by the word nor the work of any man, nor by the dignity or merit of the minister, nor by the eating or faith of the communicants: None of these has made the body and blood of Christ present for us. But this whole thing, that we have the body of Christ present in the supper, is to be ascribed simply and solely to the omnipotent power and word, institution and ordinance of the Lord Jesus Christ."

Proof b. The second formal act of this sacrament is δόσις, or the distribution of the Holy Supper, by which the consecrated symbols are distributed among the communicants according to the Lord's institution. It is, however, all the same whether these sacred symbols are given into the hands of the recipients, or are immediately applied to their mouths by the minister of the church. For since the mode of distribution is not expressed in Holy Scripture, it is left to the discretion of the church.

Proof c. The third formal act of this sacrament is λήψις, or reception, by which with the consecrated bread the body of Christ is received and eaten, and with the consecrated wine the blood of Christ is received and drunk, according to the Lord's institution, Matth. XXVI, 26, 27.

Question XIV. Is the breaking of the bread necessary in the administration of the Holy Supper?

The breaking of the bread in the administration of the supper is indeed free and licit in those places where it has obtained a), but it is not simply necessary b).

Obs. I. The word "breaking" is sometimes taken broadly for distribution, Is. LVIII, 7, sometimes strictly for comminution into parts.

Obs. II. The question is not: whether the bread should be broken before distribution? but: whether it must necessarily be broken in the very act of distribution? Among us the mass of bread is broken before distribution; but the breaking of bread in the very act of distribution is adiaphorous, or indifferent.

Proof a. The example of Christ teaches that the breaking of bread is free and licit in the act of distribution, Matth. XXVI, 26.

Proof b. 1) The breaking of the eucharistic bread was accidental to the first supper, on account of the larger loaves, and as was in use among the Hebrews, of fragile ones. The breaking of the bread was therefore a παρασκευαστική action, and a minister of the principal action, i.e., distribution.

2) If the breaking of the bread is necessary, it must be done either for the sake of distribution or for the representation of the broken body of Christ. If for the sake of distribution, it will be a ministerial act serving the principal, and therefore left to the discretion of the church. If for the sake of representation, it is necessary that some analogy intercede between the sign and the thing signified. But the body of Christ, properly speaking, was not broken, John XIX, 36.

You say: I. Whatever Christ himself did, and commanded to be done by us, that must necessarily be done by us; But Christ himself broke the bread, and commanded the breaking of the bread to us; Therefore. Response: 1) We distinguish between formal acts and ministerial or concomitant acts. In the formal acts of the Holy Supper, we should always imitate Christ, the author of the Holy Supper. But the concomitant acts can be in some way different with respect to circumstances. For Christ distributed the sacrament of the supper a) in Jerusalem, b) in the evening, c) after a common supper, d) in an upper room of a house, e) among the disciples reclining at table. Just as we do not necessarily imitate Christ in these circumstances, so also not in the breaking of the bread. For the Jews at the time when Christ instituted the supper used not such thick loaves as we do, but broad and less thick ones, or cakes, which could be more conveniently broken by hand than cut with a knife. 2) What Christ commanded is clear from the words of institution: "Take, eat; This is my body. This do in remembrance of me." There no mention is made of breaking.

II. The apostles broke bread, Acts II, 24; Acts XX, 7. Therefore, we should also necessarily break the bread. Response: 1) The question is not: whether the breaking of bread was customary in the apostolic church? but: whether it was performed with the opinion of a command? 2) The apostles, in the manner of the Jews, even when about to eat outside the eucharist, are read to have broken the bread which we cut.

III. Whatever action is most full of solace is necessary: But the breaking of bread, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved: because ἀρτοκλασία shows and represents Christ broken for us, 1 Cor. XI, 24. Response: 1) Christ, properly speaking, was not broken, John XIX, 36. 2) Paul in this passage understands a metaphorical breaking, i.e., the passion or crucifixion of Christ; which if the breaking of bread in the eucharist referred to, this would have to be not a metaphorical, but a true and properly so-called breaking, since every type is more obscure than its antitype; which is not the case here, since the breaking of bread is proper, but that of which it is established as the antitype, the breaking of Christ's body, is metaphorical.

Question XV. Are the bread and wine essentially changed, or transubstantiated, into the body and blood of Christ by the consecration?

The bread and wine are not essentially changed into the body and blood of Christ by the consecration.

Obs. We distinguish between an essential and an accidental change. When the holy Fathers wrote that the bread and wine in the eucharist are changed or transelemented by consecration, they did not understand an essential change, but an accidental one, namely with respect to the office and mystical use, i.e., the elevation of the elements to a nobler state, so that the bread is and remains the same in respect of its essence as it was before consecration, but according to the institution and promise of Christ, by his omnipotent power it becomes a communicative symbol of the body of Christ, when before consecration it was common bread.

Proof. 1) Because transubstantiation, or the essential change of the blessed bread and wine, cannot be demonstrated from the words of the institution of the Holy Supper; for in the words of Christ there is an exhibitiv expression, by which two things accidentally united are exhibited, one of which, the nobler and less obvious to the senses, is expressed in the predicate, the other not expressed, without any change of one thing into the other. See above, q. 5.

2) Whatever Christ in the institution of the supper took, consecrated, broke, and distributed, this very thing he commanded to be eaten; But he took, consecrated, broke, and distributed the substance of the bread, not the bare accidents. Therefore.

3) The eucharistic bread is called by Paul κοινωνία, the communion of the body of Christ, 1 Cor. X, 16, which would be taken away if one of those things between which κοινωνία ought to be, were removed and ceased to exist.

4) The consecrated bread is explicitly called bread, 1 Cor. X, 16; chap. XI, 26, 27.

5) Every sacrament, and specifically the eucharist, as IRENAEUS teaches, L. III, c. 34, consists of two things, an earthly and a heavenly.

6) If a mouse were to eat the consecrated bread, it would have eaten the very body of Christ; which is most absurd.

The antithesis is of the Pontificians, who maintain that by consecration the substance of the bread and wine is changed and converted into the substance of the body and blood of Christ, so that after the blessing only the external species and accidents of the bread and wine remain. Their principal arguments are:

I. The words of institution: "Take, eat; This is my body," either note only a significative representation of the body of Christ, or an essential change of the blessed bread into the body of Christ; But they do not note only a significative representation; Therefore, they infer an essential change. Response: A third option is given. The words of Christ note a sacramental union, which sacramentally unites two things.

II. If the eucharistic bread is not essentially changed into the body of Christ, it follows that that proposition: "The bread is the body of Christ," is false. But that proposition is true and was used by the holy Fathers and LUTHER. Therefore. Response: We distinguish between a biblical and an ecclesiastical proposition. That proposition: "The bread is the body of Christ," is not biblical, but ecclesiastical, to be understood by reason of the sacramental union.

Instance: On account of the union of disparate things, one cannot be predicated of the other in the nominative case. Response: In an unusual predication, one disparate thing can be predicated of another in the nominative case, which is established from the personal predication: "Man is God," to wit, on account of the personal union.

III. Whoever cannot at the same time receive the food of the mind and of the belly, they must explain the words of institution not by a sacramental union, but by transubstantiation; But the communicants, etc.; Therefore. The major is established; because the sacramental union joins the food of the belly, namely bread, and the food of the mind, namely the body of Christ. Response: We distinguish between the primary and secondary use or end of the body of Christ. Primarily indeed the body of Christ confirms faith and refreshes the soul: the secondary use consists in this, that the life-giving flesh of Christ confers a blessed resurrection on our bodies.

Question XVI. Do we eat and drink the body and blood of Christ not only with the mouth of faith, but also with the mouth of the body?

The body and blood of Christ, in the legitimate use of the sacred supper, are received, eaten, and drunk by the communicants not only with the mouth of faith, but also with the mouth of the body.

Obs. I. Eating, formally, is the reception of a thing, offered under the aspect of food, through the mouth into the body, for the nourishment of man.

Obs. II. There are three kinds of eating: one is natural, another spiritual, another sacramental. The first is done with the corporeal mouth, and was instituted for the nutrition and refreshment of the natural powers; the second is done with the mouth of faith, and tastes Christ with all his merits and benefits, offered in the gospel, for the refreshment of the soul and conscience; the third can be done with the mouth of the body, but in a supernatural manner, for spiritual refreshment.

Obs. III. Spiritual and sacramental eating differ. The former belongs to all times; the latter is proper to the N.T. The former also occurs outside the supper; the latter has place only in the supper itself. The former can also be done without symbols; the latter is performed only by means of external symbols. The former always profits unto salvation; the latter sometimes is also unto judgment. The former apprehends the whole Christ with all his benefits; the latter only the body of Christ in and under the bread. The former is metaphorical; the latter is proper with grammatical propriety, though not with physical propriety.

Obs. IV. We distinguish between oral eating that is physical, or natural, and that which is hyperphysical, or supernatural. The former is that by which food taken by the mouth is sent down into the belly, is digested, and is ejected: The latter is that by which the offered food is indeed received through the mouth into the body, but is not digested and ejected in a natural manner. The angels ate, Gen. XVIII, 8, and Christ after his resurrection, Luke XXIV, 44, which eating, however, was not of the natural order, nor was the food digested in a natural manner.

But just as the earth absorbs water differently than the sun does, so also that food was not digested in a physical way. Dr. DANNHAVER in hodos. phanom. X, p. 1233, subdivides proper supernatural eating into economic and sacramental.

Obs. V. Sacramental eating and drinking is one and undivided action, by which at the same time and in the same moment we eat the eucharistic bread and the body of Christ sacramentally united to it, and we drink the same wine and the blood of the Lord sacramentally united with it from the eucharistic chalice. But of that one eating and that drinking there is a twofold mode. For although the earthly and the heavenly thing are taken with one and the same organ, yet not in the same way. The bread and wine are received by the mouth immediately and naturally, the body and blood of Christ mediately and supernaturally. It can be declared by similarities. Water is immediately poured upon the infant to be baptized, the Holy Spirit mediately. The disciples immediately received the breath of Christ's mouth, with which he breathed upon them, the Holy Spirit mediately. The Apostles immediately saw the Son of the virgin Mary with their corporeal eyes, and handled him with their hands; mediately they saw and handled the Word of life, 1 John I, 1, on account of the personal union. The whale immediately swallowed the body of Jonah, mediately his soul on account of their natural union. Thus, in the legitimate use of the eucharist we immediately eat and drink the blessed bread and wine, mediately the body and blood of Christ on account of the sacramental union.

The assertion is proved: 1) Whatever is eaten with the blessed bread in the same eating, that is eaten with the mouth of the body. But the body of Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved: because the single verb in number, "EAT," is predicated of the bread and the body at the same time. Therefore, it will enjoy only one signification in this proposition. It will therefore signify either only oral eating, or only spiritual, or both at the same time. If the former: Therefore, both the bread and the body of Christ will be eaten at the same time by the mouth, which we desire. If the latter: Therefore, we will at the same time believe in the bread, which is idolatrous. If both at the same time: Therefore, one word, in the same place, and in the same member of the proposition, will have a double literal sense, which is false.

2) The verb, "EAT," joined with "TAKE," in a convivial proposition signifies properly. But "EAT" in this place is joined with "TAKE" in a convivial proposition. Therefore, "EAT" in this place is taken properly. But all proper eating is oral.

3) Whatever things are sacramentally united in the same sacrament and in the same action, they are also received with the same organ. Now, in the use of the Holy Supper, the bread and the body of Christ, the wine and the blood of Christ are sacramentally united. Therefore, the bread and the body, the wine and the blood of Christ are also received with the same organ in the use of the sacrament. The major is established; because one and undivided action cannot be done with a double instrument.

4) All eating, contradistinguished from drinking, is oral eating; But sacramental eating is contradistinguished from drinking. Therefore. The major is established; because spiritual eating, which is done by the mouth of faith, does not differ from spiritual drinking.

5) Whoever distinctly eat the body of Christ with the blessed bread, and distinctly drink the blood of Christ with the blessed wine, they eat the body and drink the blood of Christ with the mouth of the body; But the communicants, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because spiritual eating and drinking refers to the whole Christ with all his benefits. Therefore, that eating by which the body of Christ is distinctly eaten with the blessed bread, and the drinking by which the blood of Christ is distinctly drunk with the blessed wine, is not a merely spiritual eating and drinking, which is done by the mouth of faith.

6) Whoever eat the body of Christ without the mouth of faith, they eat the body of Christ with the mouth of the body; But unworthy communicants, etc., 1 Cor. XI, 26. Therefore. The minor is established; because the unworthy do not have the mouth of faith.

7) Against which, as an object, one sins by eating and drinking which is done with the mouth of the body, that is also eaten and drunk with the mouth of the body; But one sins against the body and blood of Christ, as an object, by eating and drinking which is done with the mouth of the body! Therefore.

8) Pious antiquity believed in the oral eating of the body and drinking of the blood of Christ. TERTULLIAN, de resurrect. carn., c. 8, says: "The flesh feeds on the body and blood of Christ, so that the soul also may be fattened on God." CHRYSOSTOM, hom. XXIX in 2 Corinth.: "Our mouth has not attained a common honor, receiving the Lord's body." And the words of AMBROSE to Theodosius are known: "With what rashness will you receive the cup of the precious blood with your mouth, when by the fury of your words blood was unjustly shed?"

You say: I. Whatever sacramental eating was not instituted by Christ is not to be asserted; But oral sacramental eating, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved; because the eating of the body and blood which is done with the mouth is the Capernaïtic butchery of human flesh, John VI, 52, 63, and cyclopean ἀνθρωποφαγία. Response: 1) A distinction must be made between oral eating that is physical, or natural, and that which is hyperphysical, or supernatural. The physical eating of human flesh is cyclopean ἀνθρωποφαγία, which we do not assert; but we believe that sacramental eating is indeed oral, because it is done with the mouth as an organ, but supernatural, mystical, incomprehensible, and known to God alone; for it is done without injury to the body of Christ, which exists unextended and indivisibly in the Holy Supper. 2) The Capernaïtes thought, a) that Christ was a mere man; but we are fed with the flesh of Christ the θεανθρώπος. b) They thought that the flesh of Christ was to be eaten immediately and naturally; but we assert that the flesh of Christ in the use of the Holy Supper is truly and really eaten by the mouth of the body, but mediately, by means of the blessed bread, and supernaturally, for concerning this highest mystery we do not think naturally, vulgarly, or in a Capernaïtic manner.

Instance: There is no proper, true, and real eating that is not physical. Response: Just as there is a proper, true, and real generation of the Son of God from the substance of the Father, which however is not physical; so there is a proper, true, and real eating of the body of Christ, which however is not natural.

II. Whatever body is eaten with the mouth is eventually consumed; But the body of Christ is not consumed, because it is incorruptible; Therefore, it is not eaten with the mouth. Response: 1) Whatever body is physically eaten is consumed; I grant; But the body of Christ in the Holy Supper is eaten supernaturally. 2) The whale devoured Jonah, and yet did not consume him.

III. If the body of Christ were properly and orally eaten, it would certainly be ground by the teeth and cast down into the stomach; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Response: 1) We deny the consequence, because the body of Christ is not eaten in a natural or common way, but in a supernatural and mystical one. 2) We distinguish between a universal and a particular requisite of eating. If all food had to be ground by the teeth, toothless old women and infants would not truly eat. 3) If someone has received food in his mouth and swallowed it, but by nausea or weakness of strength is prevented from sending it down into the stomach, but before it reaches there is forced to cast it out by vomiting; he has truly eaten the food, although he has not sent it into the stomach. 4) The body of Christ is not a natural food, destined for the digestion and natural nourishment of man, to which alone the casting of food into the stomach is directed; but it is a supernatural, celestial, and in a certain respect spiritual food.

IV. Whatever food is celestial and spiritual is not eaten with the mouth of the body; But the body of Christ; Therefore. Response: 1) We deny the major. For the word of the gospel is also spiritual food, and yet it is perceived by the corporeal ears. 2) Celestial and spiritual food is not eaten with the mouth of the body in a natural and common way, but in a supernatural way. 3) The body and blood of Christ is spiritual food and drink, not simply with respect to its essence, as if the body of Christ were changed into a spirit; for that conflicts with the truth of the human nature; but comparatively and in a certain respect; a) In opposition to common and natural food; because sacramental food is not coarse and physical, but mystical and supernatural; b) With respect to its qualities; because the body of Christ is glorified and majestic, and therefore endowed with spiritual gifts; c) With respect to its effect; because it nourishes us to spiritual life, and confers spiritual and celestial benefits.

V. If the eating of the body of Christ which occurs in the Holy Supper is real and proper, it will be either corporal or spiritual; But it is not corporal; because it is not done in a corporal manner, i.e., natural and common. Therefore, it is spiritual, and is done by the mouth of faith. Response: A third option is given, namely, supernatural, mystical, and incomprehensible. For just as the conception of Christ in the womb of Mary is true and proper, yet with respect to its manner is not natural and common, nor merely spiritual, which is done by faith; so the eating of the body of Christ in the supper, with respect to its manner, is not corporal, i.e., common and natural, nor merely spiritual, which is done by faith; although in a certain respect it can be called corporal, with respect to the organ, because it is done with the mouth of the body; and spiritual, inasmuch as spiritual is opposed to natural and coarse. Cf. Dr. DANNHAVER in hodos, p. 1243.

VI. Whoever sat alive at the table, his body could not be eaten by the disciples; But Christ, etc.; Therefore. Response: Christ sat at the table naturally, and yet by his omnipotent power, having multiplied the presence of his body, he gave his body to the disciples to be eaten sacramentally.

VII. If the blood of Christ is drunk with the mouth of the body, the new testament of Christ will also be drunk with the same; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence is proved from Luke XXII, 20, where Christ, instituting the supper, says: "This cup is the new testament in my blood." Therefore, if the blood of Christ is drunk with the mouth, the N.T. will be drunk with the same. Response: We distinguish between a real and a usitative predication. Matthew and Mark use a real predication when they describe the other species of this sacrament: "This is my blood of the N.T." Luke and Paul use a usitative predication: "This cup is the N.T. in my blood, which is shed for you." Christ commands the blessed cup to be drunk, comprising the wine and the blood, of which he predicates this use, that it is the N.T. in his blood, i.e., the medium of grace and peace, not with respect to the wine, but with respect to the blood.

VIII. Whatever eating of the body of Christ is useless is not to be asserted; But the oral eating of the body of Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from John VI, 63: "The flesh profiteth nothing." I respond with the words of CYRIL, book IV on John, ch. 23: "The flesh of other men (ψιλῶν) indeed profits nothing truly; But the flesh of Christ, because in it the only-begotten Son of God dwells, alone can give life." Therefore these words are premised: "It is the spirit that quickeneth," i.e., the principle, fount, and origin of quickening is the spirit, or that spiritual nature in Christ. Whence the flesh of a mere man, naturally eaten or Capernaïtically torn, profits nothing. There are some who think that by "flesh" in this passage is denoted the carnal intellect, or the wisdom of the flesh, Rom. VIII, 6, so that this is the sense; carnal thoughts about this so great mystery profit nothing.

IX. If the oral eating of the body of Christ were profitable, it would also be salutary to the unworthy. Response: 1) Even the word of the gospel, indeed the very death and shedding of the blood of Christ, do not profit the unfaithful; are they therefore simply of no profit? 2) The spiritual eating of the body of Christ, conjoined with oral eating, profits more than without it: It profits, I say, to a closer union of ourselves with Christ.

Question XVII. To which guests is the Holy Supper to be offered?

Guests. The Holy Supper is to be offered to Christian men a), who are willing and able to eat and drink b), and to discern this mystical food, to prove themselves, and to announce the Lord's death c).

Proof a. The guests of the first supper were the Apostles, who represented adult faithful Christians. Therefore, the guests of this mystical people are not Pagans, Turks, Jews, nor even catechumens not yet baptized; because baptism is, as it were, the door to the church, whose proper goods are the sacraments.

Proof b. Those are not guests who are destitute of the faculty of eating and drinking. Therefore, the Holy Supper is not to be offered to dead men, nor to those abstainers who cannot taste even a drop of wine; but they are to be well instructed about spiritual eating and drinking, of which AUGUSTINE says: "Believe, and you have eaten."

Proof c. Welcome guests are those who have both the will and the power to recognize the dignity of this most august feast and to discern it from common food, to prove themselves according to the law and the gospel, and to announce the Lord's death with a grateful mind. Therefore, the following are excluded: 1) Notorious sinners, whose crimes, e.g., adulteries, fornications, thefts, blasphemies, and given scandals are manifest, as long as they indulge in their sins and do not perform serious penance. But the church does not judge of secret things, but commits them to the judgment of the all-knowing God. Hence hypocrites, although they are unworthy of the Holy Supper, and therefore deserve to be excluded, are not, however, excluded by the church, because through hypocrisy, by which they feign piety, they are not known to the church. But notorious sinners are kept away, for the reason that they are unwilling to prove themselves rightly. 2) Heretics, who err in the foundation of the faith and subvert the substantial of this sacrament, who, being involved in gross error, neither will nor can prove themselves. 3) Infants, who on account of their age cannot announce the Lord's death and prove themselves. 4) Those possessed by the devil, who are perpetually infested by this enemy. 5) The furious, or those who are delirious from disease, who are perpetually excited by fury. But if the possessed are sometimes free from the attack of the devil, and the furious have some lucid intervals from their madness, they are to be admitted to this sacred feast, that they may be refreshed by the most divine goods which are conferred in the sacred supper. As for the deaf and mute, we follow the counsel of LUTHER: "If signs of desire and penitence are present, the mute and deaf person should not be kept away from the altar." For communicants are not considered worthy unless they are penitent and faithful, who have laid the foundations of saving faith, as much as suffices for attaining salvation. And it is fitting for communicants to be not only of proven faith, but also of proven life. Hence the deacon in the primitive church would exclaim to them: "Holy things for the Holy!"

Question XVIII. Do hypocrites and unworthy communicants receive the body and blood of Christ in the use of the Holy Supper?

Hypocrites and all the unworthy, in the use of the Holy Supper, receive the true body and blood of Christ; Yet in such a way that they perceive neither consolation nor life from it, but rather that that reception turns to their judgment and condemnation, if they do not convert and perform penance.

Obs. Unworthy guests are not the weak in faith, the fainthearted, or disturbed Christians. For the Lord's Supper was instituted primarily for the weak in faith, who are nevertheless penitent, so that they might perceive from it true consolation and confirmation of their weak faith; but unworthy are those who approach the Lord's Supper without true penitence and contrition, and true faith, and without the purpose of amending their life. Confer. solid. declar. Form. concord. p. 745.

Proof. 1) From 1 Cor. XI, 27, 29: "Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord... For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body." From which apostolic words we gather: Whoever by unworthily eating the blessed bread and drinking the cup of the Lord become guilty of his very body and blood of Christ, they in the Holy Supper truly and really receive the body and blood of Christ; But unworthy communicants, etc. Therefore.

You say: Guilt is contracted by the unworthy, not by unworthily eating the very body of Christ, or unworthily drinking the blood; but by approaching the Holy Supper, profaning the sacred symbols, and treating them irreverently, inasmuch as the unworthy with profane impiety of heart do not even worthily esteem the symbols; just as he is considered guilty of lèse-majesté who tears up and tramples a royal diploma, even if he does not substantially touch the king. Response: 1) The unworthy do not become guilty of some act, but of an object, namely the body and blood of Christ; not by approaching unworthily, but by eating and drinking unworthily, which cannot happen unless the object to be eaten and drunk, against which they sin, is presupposed. They become unworthy by not discerning the Lord's body; therefore, this is exhibited to them to be eaten. 2) The simile is dissimilar. For the bread and wine is not a bare sign of the body and blood, like the diploma of an absent king; but it is at once the organ and vehicle by which the body of the Lord is conferred upon us. Nor does he who tears up the king's diploma touch the very substance of the king; but only his majesty, office, and authority. Hence, he is never said to become guilty of the king himself, but of the royal majesty. But the unworthy communicant is said to become guilty of the substance, guilty of the Lord's body and blood.

2) From 1 Cor. X, 16. Whoever receive the blessed bread, by which the body of Christ is communicated, and partake of the Lord's cup, they also become partakers of the Lord's body and blood; But unworthy guests in the Holy Supper, etc. Therefore.

3) From the reception of the whole sacrament. Whoever receive the whole sacrament of the eucharist, they receive not only the earthly thing, but also the heavenly. But unworthy guests, etc. The minor is proved; because faith does not constitute the essence of the sacrament, nor does it contribute to its integrity, but the integrity of the sacrament depends on the institution of Christ.

The antithesis is of the Anabaptists and Schwenkfeldians, who deny that unworthy guests receive the body and blood of Christ in the Holy Supper. Their arguments are:

I. Whoever eat the body of Christ are spiritually quickened, John VI, 54: Hypocrites are not spiritually quickened; for they are destitute of faith, without which there is no spiritual life; Therefore. Response: The body of Christ is always life-giving in the first act; but hypocrites are not quickened by the same in the second act; because they impede the operation of the body of Christ by their malicious hypocrisy.

II. If Christians cannot at the same time drink the cup of the Lord and of devils, it follows that hypocrites cannot receive the body and blood of Christ; The antecedent is true, as Paul testifies in 1 Cor. X, 20: Therefore, so is the consequent. The consequence is proved; because hypocrites persuade themselves that they can approach the sacred synaxis, and yet at the same time be present at feasts which the gentiles have prepared from foods which they have sacrificed to their gods, or from idol-sacrifices. Response: The Apostle speaks of right, not of fact; but the question is now about the thing itself.

III. Christ and Belial cannot be at the same time in the same man, as Paul testifies in 2 Cor. VI, 15. Therefore, the body of Christ cannot be received by the unfaithful. The reason for the consequence is; because in the unfaithful the devil dwells and operates. Response: We distinguish between participation in the body and blood of Christ, and gracious inhabitation. Hypocrites are indeed made partakers of the body and blood of Christ, but to judgment, on account of their lack of faith; Therefore, Christ does not graciously dwell in them.

IV. Whoever do not rightly use the sacrament of the supper do not receive the body and blood of Christ; Hypocrites do not rightly use the sacrament of the supper; Therefore. The major is established; because outside the sacramental use there is no sacrament. Response: We distinguish between the formal use of the sacrament and the final, or salutary, use. Outside the formal use there is no sacrament; but hypocrites do not obtain the salutary end and fruit, because to obtain this, besides the sacramental eating, which is done with the mouth of the body, spiritual eating is also required, which is done with the mouth of faith.

V. The unfaithful reject Christ; Therefore, they do not receive his body in the Holy Supper. Response; Just as the unfaithful receive the word of God with their corporeal ears, which they nevertheless reject with their heart; so the same, externally using the Holy Supper, receive the body of Christ to judgment, because they do not receive Christ with true faith. They receive with the mouth what they spurn with the heart; because they reject Christ not orally, but morally.

VI. The impious are dogs and swine, and therefore not worthy for the body and blood of Christ to be offered to them, Matth. VII, 6. Response; 1) The notoriously impious are to be completely kept away from the use of the supper; but hypocrites feign piety, just like Judas Iscariot, who was admitted by Christ to the Holy Supper, which Luke clearly records. When he had recited the words of institution, he adds in ch. XXII, 21: "But, behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table." 2) The impious are not worthy of the sun and daily bread, upon whom nevertheless the heavenly Father confers many benefits.

VII. "For we being many are one bread, and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread." The unfaithful are not one body with the faithful; Therefore, they do not partake of the body of Christ with them. Response; 1) It is certain that the unfaithful partake of the one eucharistic bread, which is the κοινωμία of the body of Christ. 2) The major speaks of the mystical body, which is the church, which is either visible, the assembly of Christians, in which hypocrites are mixed with the faithful, or is invisible, by reason of faith and election. Hypocrites pertain to the visible body of the church.

Question XIX. Is the sacrament of the supper to be offered to the laity under both species?

The sacrament of the supper is to be offered not only to the clergy, but also to the laity under both species.

Proof. 1) Whoever were commanded by Christ in the institution of the eucharist to eat the blessed bread, the same were also commanded to drink the blessed wine; But all the Apostles, and under their name all adult faithful, were commanded by Christ in the institution of the eucharist to eat the blessed bread. Therefore, all the Apostles, and under their name all adult faithful, were commanded to drink the blessed wine. The major is clear; for to the same to whom Christ said: "Eat," he similarly said: "Drink." Indeed, he also expressly added: "Drink from it, all of you!" Matth. XXVI, 27. The truth of the minor concerning the Apostles is plain; For to all of them the Lord says: "Take, drink." Mark adds in ch. XIV, 23: "they all drank of it." It is also plain concerning all adult faithful. The Apostles, whom Christ commanded to eat and drink, represented either only the clergy, or both the clergy and the laity. But not only the clergy; because thus no Christian layman ought to receive the sacrament of the supper, either under one or under both species; Therefore, they represented all adult faithful, whom Christ under the name of the Apostles commanded to eat the consecrated bread and drink the consecrated wine (*).

You say: I. Communion under both species was indeed instituted by Christ, but not commanded. Not all things which God instituted did he command to all. God instituted matrimony by imperative words, yet he did not command it to all. Response; Although divine institution and command differ; if, however, the persons for whom the institution was made are added, the institution is equal to a command, especially if it is done by imperative words, such as are here, "eat! drink!" For matrimony was not only instituted by God, but also commanded to all persons who are fit for marriage and do not have the gift of continence, to avoid fornication and all impurity.

(*) This consideration also has great weight; that the blood of Christ is not just some part of this sacred action, but is also the principal part, is effected from this principle; Without the shedding of blood there can be no remission of sins, Hebr. IX, 22. Therefore, the death which Christ suffered for us, if it had not been bloody, would not have been valid for expiating the sins of men. Therefore, if someone partakes of the body of Christ, given to death for us, but does not likewise drink his blood, shed for us, he will have only a general remembrance of the death of Christ, but not a special one of the bloody death, in which lies the greatest force of consolation.

II. The Apostles commanded to eat represented all the faithful, but commanded to drink represented only the priests. Response; a) If Christ had regarded the Apostles in a different respect when he said: "Eat," than when he said: "Drink," certainly he himself, or Paul, repeating the Lord's institution in 1 Cor. XI, would have made at least a slight indication of that double respect. b) Christ in the first eucharist regarded the Apostles not as priests, but as communicants.

Proof 2) Paul repeated the words of institution, 1 Cor. XI, 23, where he exhorts all who can prove themselves to eat of this bread and drink of this cup, v. 28.

Proof 3) The same Apostle in 1 Cor. X, 14, says: "Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry. I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say. The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?" Where observe; 1) That Paul addresses all the faithful of Corinth, both teachers and learners, and exhorts them with an argument (among others) taken from the communion of the whole supper. 2) That he himself distinguishes the blessed cup from the broken bread, calling the former the κοινωνία of the blood, the latter of the body of Christ.

The antithesis is of the Pontificians, who maintain that the blessed cup is not to be offered to the laity. Who rely on the following arguments:

I. Whoever receive the blood of Christ under the consecrated bread, to them the blessed wine is not to be offered; But the laity, etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because those who have received the blood of Christ under the blessed bread have no need to receive the blood of Christ under another symbol. The minor is established; because the body of Christ is not bloodless. Response; 1) If this argument is valid, it can be inferred that not even to the clergy is the blessed wine to be offered, since they also receive the body of Christ full of blood under the blessed bread. 2) We distinguish between the natural union of the body and blood of Christ, and the sacramental union of the body and blood of Christ under distinct symbols, instituted by Christ. If you look at the natural union, the body of Christ is never without the blood, and the blood is never without the body of Christ; yet if you consider the sacramental union, it pleased the Savior, under a distinct symbol to give and distribute to us his body, and under a distinct symbol his blood, the former for eating, the latter for drinking. We ought not, however, to be wise beyond what is written and instituted by Christ, 1 Cor. IV, 6.

II. Whoever both by words and by deeds approved the celebration of the Holy Supper under one species, he did not will the same to be necessarily celebrated under both species; But Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved; Christ approved the celebration of the Holy Supper under one species 1) by words, John VI, 50 ff., where he four times promises eternal life to those who eat his flesh, with no mention made of drinking. 2) He approved the celebration of the Holy Supper under one species by deed, Luke XXIV, 30, where Christ offered the sacrament to two disciples in the inn at Emmaus under the species of bread alone. Response; John VI deals with spiritual eating; Luke XXIV deals with a common breaking of bread, or a charitable meal, not a eucharistic one. For the same words are read of the feeding of the people, Matth. XIV, 19; Mark VI, 41. Grant that Luke XXIV is to be understood of the celebration of the Holy Supper; yet the position of one will not be the exclusion of the other. The breaking of bread does not exclude the distribution of wine.

III. There are abstainers who cannot taste even one drop of wine. To these the sacrament of the supper must be exhibited under one species. Response; 1) Those abstainers are few and rare, on account of whom the blessed wine is not to be stolen from all the laity. 2) Abstainers are to be well instructed, so that with true faith they may spiritually eat and drink Christ, with all his benefits.

IV. The Catholic church did not approve communion under one species without grave causes; to wit, a) because there is not a supply of wine in all places; b) because irreverence for the sacrament is to be feared, if one drop should fall into the beard, clothing, or onto the ground; c) it has, however, meanwhile conceded the ablution cup. Response; a) In any place there is as much supply of wine as is required for the celebration of the Holy Supper. b) The blessed cup, outside the use of drinking, is not the κοινωνία of the blood of Christ. c) The ablution cup is a common cup, not a blessed cup.

Question XX. What is the end of the eucharist?

End of the Holy Supper. The end of the eucharist is: a) the remembrance and proclamation of the passion and death of Christ, which is performed with faith and thanksgiving; b) the sealing of evangelical grace; c) the mutual love of the communicants.

Proof a. Christ, the institutor of the Holy Supper, says in Luke ch. XXII, 19: "This do in remembrance of me." Paul, repeating these words in 1 Cor. XI, 24, 25, adds in v. 26: "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come." The remembrance and proclamation of Christ's death is done 1) by true faith, by which we ponder and believe that his body, which he offers to us to be eaten with the blessed bread in the Holy Supper, he offered as a victim for us on the altar of the cross, and that his blood, which he exhibits to us to be drunk in the blessed cup, he offered for us, that he might obtain for us the grace of God and the remission of sins. And thus the application of faith, inasmuch as it is directed to the body of Christ given to death for us, is called the spiritual eating of the body of Christ, and inasmuch as it is directed to the blood of Christ shed for us, it is made the spiritual drinking of the blood of Christ, concerning both of which see John VI, 35 ff. Without this spiritual eating, oral eating does not receive the salutary fruit of the eucharist; because all spiritual benefits are received by faith. Meanwhile, however, the oral eating of the body of Christ is a medium promoting the spiritual eating and fruition of Christ; just as the corporeal reception of the word of God within the ears is a medium promoting the spiritual cognition of the mind. cf. Dr. CHRIST. FRANCK, Exam. Antipap., p. 562.

Proof b. Christ offers us his body to be eaten and his blood to be drunk for this end, that the evangelical grace, that is, the divine grace promised and offered to us in the gospel, may be applied to us individually and be sealed; Which becomes more abundantly known to us as we ponder the acts of applying grace. God promised, through regenerating grace, to give faith to all, Acts XVII, 31. Which regenerating grace, and its effect, namely faith, God confirms, strengthens, and increases through the eucharistic sacrament. For he who receives the body and blood of the Lord can most firmly resolve that the evangelical promise pertains to him individually. For he receives here and now the body of Christ, offered to him individually, the Lord himself saying: "Take, eat, this is my body given for you." Then, through justifying grace God remits the sins of the reborn and imputes the righteousness of Christ; Which justifying grace and remission of sins are sealed by the sacrament of the supper. For when we receive that very body of Christ which was given to death for us, and that very blood which was shed for us for the remission of sins, in the sacrament of the supper, we are thereby, as by a seal of the N.T., made most certain that the remission of sins, procured by the giving of the body and the shedding of the blood of Christ, has been granted and applied to us who believe in Christ. Through indwelling grace God graciously unites himself with us, which mystical union is rendered closer and firmer by the eating of the body and drinking of the blood of Christ. "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him," says Christ, John VI, 56. Surely it is an indication of ineffable charity that Christ, not content to have dwelt in us spiritually by faith, in addition comes to us with his body and blood by a special approximation, and thus joins himself to our body as well as to our soul. Through renewing grace, spiritual powers are conferred on us, so that we may bear the fruits of righteousness. In the Holy Supper we are more closely united to Christ, as to a vine, so that in him, as branches, we may bear more abundant fruit, John XV, 5. Through conserving grace we are preserved from sins and refreshed with consolation. The sacrament of the supper is a medicine against daily sins, in the judgment of AMBROSE, L. V, de Sacram., c. 4. And just as the complete refection, or nutrition of bodies consists of food, which is dry nourishment, and drink, which is moist nourishment; So in the eucharist Christ is proposed to us as food and as drink, lest we should think that anything is lacking to us for our complete nourishment, or spiritual nutrition, in the opinion of AUGUSTINE, tract. XXVI on John. Through glorifying grace, blessed immortality is conferred on us, of which the symbols or pledges are the body and blood of the Lord, taken in the Holy Supper. "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life," says the Savior in John VI, 54. "We have the Lord's body here, as the root of the resurrection," says ATHANASIUS, quoted by Theodoret, L. I, c. 22.

Proof c. Through the sacred supper, being united to Christ the head, we are also united among ourselves, as members of the mystical body, and so the eucharist is the foundation of charity between us and our neighbor. Paul touches on this end of the Holy Supper when he says in 1 Cor. X, 17: "For we being many are one bread, and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread." Whence it is also a mark of ecclesiastical communion, and a token of that church with which we communicate in faith.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, Arminians, and Anabaptists, who deny that faith is confirmed by the eucharist, but maintain that it is only a ceremony, instituted in commemoration of the Lord's death. Their arguments are:

I. The eating of bread and drinking of wine can work nothing in the soul of man; Therefore, it cannot confirm faith in the soul. Response: Common eating and drinking can work nothing in the soul of man; but the eating of the body of Christ and the drinking of the blood of Christ is the nourishment of the soul and the firmament of faith.

II. The Holy Supper was instituted for the commemoration of Christ's death; Therefore, not for the confirmation of faith. Response: That commemoration is not bare, but ἐνεργητική, conjoined with a fiducial application.

III. It is possible that someone may approach the Holy Supper with a firm faith; Therefore, his faith is not confirmed by the Holy Supper. Response: No faith is so firm that it cannot receive increments, or that it may not sometimes waver. The apostles, confirmed in faith, sought a more abundant confirmation, Luke XVII, 5. And to Abraham, the father of believers, circumcision was a seal of the righteousness of faith, Rom. IV, 11.

Question XXI. Is the mass a sacrifice, properly so called?

The mass is not a sacrifice, properly so called, propitiatory for the sins of the living and the dead.

Obs. I. There is a distinction between the Christian mass and the superstitious or idolatrous mass. The former is the legitimate celebration of the Holy Supper; The latter is defined by the Pontificians as being an unbloody sacrifice of the N.T., propitiatory and satisfactory, in which a properly so-called priest, and the sole communicant, upon a properly so-called altar, offers to the heavenly Father the same Christ, and the same host, which was offered on the cross, under the species of bread and wine, for the sins, pains, satisfactions, and other necessities of the living and the dead, not yet fully purged in purgatory.

Obs. II. The name "sacrifice" is taken either improperly or properly. It is taken improperly 1) for every work that is done so that we may adhere to God in holy society, related to that end by which we can be truly blessed, as AUGUSTINE speaks, L. X, de Civ. Dei, c. 6. 2) for the worship of the N.T. and the preaching of the gospel, Rom. XV, 16; Phil. II, 17. 3) for beneficence and offices of charity towards one's neighbor, Phil. IV, 8; Hebr. XIII, 16. 4) for prayers and thanksgivings directed to God, Hebr. XIII, 16; Apoc. V, 8. A properly so-called sacrifice is either מִנְחָה, an oblation of inanimate things, both solid, e.g., from bread, salt, incense, and liquid, which were called libations; or it is זֶבַח, a bloody sacrifice, in which animate things are immolated in honor of God by divine command. We do not deny that the mass, or the celebration of the eucharist, can improperly be called a sacrifice; because 1) it is a work which is done so that we may adhere to God in holy society; 2) it is not the last part of the worship of the N.T.; 3) formerly, when the eucharist was celebrated, gifts were wont to be offered, which would go to the use of the ministers of the church and the poor; 4) conjoined with the Holy Supper. The administration of the supper with prayers and thanksgivings is instituted in memory of the sacrifice of Christ offered on the altar of the cross.

Obs. III. A distinction must be made between sacrifice taken materially and formally. If we take it materially, in the eucharist it is the same sacrifice in number as was on the cross, the being and substance being entirely the same; the same, I say, victim or host. But if we take sacrifice formally, or for the act of sacrificing, then, even if the victim is one and the same in number, it is not, however, the same action or immolation that occurs in the eucharist as the immolation that was performed on the cross. For on the cross the offering was made through the true passion and death of a living thing being immolated, without which a sacrifice properly so called can in no way exist; but in the eucharist the offering is made through prayers, and through the commemoration of the death, or sacrifice, offered on the cross.

Proof of our assertion: 1) What living thing is properly sacrificed is killed and destroyed by death; The living body of Christ in the mass is not killed, nor is it destroyed by death; Therefore, the body of Christ in the mass is not properly sacrificed. The major premise is clear from the nature of a sacrifice properly so called. The minor is clear from the testimony of Paul, Romans VI, 9.

2. A sacrifice that must be repeated is imperfect and argues for an imperfect priesthood; The sacrifice of Christ is neither imperfect, nor does it argue for an imperfect priesthood; Therefore, it should not be repeated. The major and minor are evident from Hebrews VII, 27 and c. IX, 25, 26.

3. If the mass were a sacrifice properly so called, it would have been instituted by Christ at the last supper. But it was not instituted in it. Therefore, it is not a sacrifice properly so called. The reason for the consequence is; because according to the Papists the mass does not differ from the eucharist, as to the thing; but the eucharist was finally instituted at the last supper. The consequent is proven; because the institution of a sacrifice properly so called, by which a living thing is offered, implies a command to slay that which is to be offered. But concerning the slaying of Christ, no command is contained in the institution, neither explicitly nor implicitly.

4. According to the mind of our adversaries, the mass is an unbloody sacrifice. From which we infer; No propitiatory sacrifice, properly so called, occurs without blood, Hebrews IX, 22. But the missal sacrifice occurs without blood. Therefore, it is not a propitiatory sacrifice, properly so called.

5. No sacrament can be a sacrifice; The Eucharist is a sacrament. Therefore. The major is proven; because in the sacraments God offers and confers His grace upon men; but in sacrifices men offer certain gifts to God (*).

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, who state that Christ is sacrificed in the mass properly, but in an unbloody manner. Their chief arguments are:

I. If the sacrifice of the new testament must be daily and universal, it follows that the missal sacrifice should not be called into question (for it is daily and universal); The antecedent is true, according to Malachi c. I, 11. Therefore also the consequent.

Resp. The cited passage is not understood as an expiatory sacrifice, properly so called, but as a spiritual sacrifice, namely the preaching of the gospel in the whole world, Rom. XV, 16, a sacrifice of charity, or beneficence, a sacrifice of prayers and a host of praise.

II. Whoever is a priest after the order of Melchizedek, his office is to be performed by offering bread and wine; But Christ etc. Hebr. V, 6. Therefore. The major is proven; because Melchizedek is said to have sacrificed and offered Abraham bread and wine. Gen. XIV, 18.

Resp. 1) Melchizedek did not sacrifice, but brought bread and wine to refresh Abraham and his soldiers. 2) Christ sacrificed once, and immolated Himself on the altar of the cross, Hebr. IX, 12.

Instance; But the sacrifice of Christ must be eternal; because He is a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek. Resp. The sacrifice of Christ performed on the altar of the cross is eternal, not because of perpetual repetition, but because of its perpetual value, Hebr. X, 10.

III. No true religion can exist without a constant and perennial sacrifice. But the Christian religion is a true religion. Therefore. The major is proven; because the Israelite religion was not without daily sacrifices; Indeed, even the gentiles sacrificed. Resp. 1) The Christian religion is based on the sacrifice of Christ, which, in terms of its value, is eternal, Hebr. X, 14. 2) The Christian religion is practiced through daily eucharistic sacrifices, or hosts of praise and prayer.

(*) There is also in the missal sacrifice a great heap of errors and false principles, of which the worst are these; that Christ underwent only eternal vicarious punishments; that man himself must satisfy for temporal ones; that sins must be expiated by some Purgatorial fire, I know not what, and temporal punishments endured, unless either satisfaction for them has been made before departure from this life, or liberation has been effected by the benefit of indulgences; that the works of those who are still among the living, and especially the office of the Priests, by which Christ is daily immolated, can make the torments of the dead in that fictitious fire both more tolerable and shorter.

SUSPIRIUM

Dou, JESUS CHRIST, ALMIGHTY LORD, fount of life and immortality, I pray and beseech, as devoutly as can be, that by Your most HOLY SPIRIT you would illumine my mind, filled with innate darkness, so that concerning the sublime mystery of your sacred supper I may think, feel, speak, or write nothing that is either alien to your majesty, or abhors from the truth, or deviates from the words of your testament! And as often as I am to approach Your holy table, for the sake of refreshing my soul, I beseech You, make me, unworthy, worthy by Your grace, cleanse me who am impure, clothe me who am naked, so that Your body full of divine virtue, and Your most precious blood, may not lead me, Your lowest servant, to judgment or punishment, but to a monument of your death, suffered for me, to the strengthening of my faith, to a pledge of the remission of my sins, to a bond of closer union with you, to an increase of holiness, to the root of a blessed resurrection, to a down payment of eternal life!

CHAPTER VI.
ON THE
PENITENCE OF THE SINNER
IN GENERAL, AND
ON CONTRITION IN PARTICULAR.

Question I. What is penitence?

PENITENCE IS A movement of the soul, aroused by the grace of the Holy Spirit, converting and regenerating, by which a sinful man, having recognized his sins from the divine law, seriously detests them with sorrow, and at the same time, with true faith, apprehends and applies to himself the satisfaction and merit of the mediator Christ, and the mercy of God obtained thereby, promised in the gospel, so that, having obtained the gratuitous remission of sins, he may be saved eternally.

Obs. I. Penitence can be described succinctly as a movement of the soul, seriously detesting its sins with sorrow, and apprehending the grace of God, founded on the merit of Christ, with true faith.

Obs. II. Penitence is an ἀποτέλεσμα, or a common effect of divine converting and regenerating grace; because through conversion, strictly speaking, contrition is aroused, and through regeneration, faith in Christ is divinely excited: Since this has been demonstrated in the preceding section, c. III, & IV, there is no need to treat here of the efficient cause of penitence.

Obs. III. Penitence is also called intransitive conversion, by which the sinner, being prevented by the Holy Spirit and furnished with supernatural powers, is said to convert himself; also repentance, by which the sinner returns to a better mind. In Greek it is called μετάνοια, μεταμέλεια. This denotes a change of mind, by which we disapprove of the evil which we previously approved, and approve of the opposite good; that denotes a change of will, by which we grieve because of the memory of the evil perpetrated, and are solicitous about obtaining the good. The former can be rendered in German as die Nachwis; the latter as die Nachsorge. In Hebrew it is called תשובה which generally designates a return, specifically the return of a sinner to God. The same for נחם which denotes displeasure.

Question II. In how many ways is the name penitence taken?

Homonymy of penitence. The name penitence is used in either a general or a special sense. In a general sense, penitence denotes a change of mind, by which the things we have done later begin to displease us and to afflict and distress our soul with sorrow a). In a special and proper sense, penitence denotes the internal change of a sinful man, by which the sins with which he is polluted displease him, and afflict his soul with sorrow, so that he meditates on offering satisfaction to God, whom he has offended, to obtain the remission of sins; in which special sense penitence is taken either μερικῶς, partially, for contrition, which is a change of mind to sorrow b), or ὁλικῶς, totally, for the whole intransitive conversion, which is a change of mind to sorrow and trust at the same time c). In an improper sense, it designates an external change, or one declared by external signs d).

Prob. a. Penitence is formally a displeasure of a deed combined with sorrow, and therefore denotes any change of mind by which a deed displeases and afflicts the mind with sorrow. In this sense the name penitence is taken in Hebrews XI, 17. Where Esau is said not to have found a place for repentance, however much sought, i.e., Esau could not move his father Isaac with his tears to change his mind and revoke, retract, and render void the blessing by which he had transferred the right of the firstborn to Jacob.

Prob. b. When faith, or a related word, to believe, is added to penitence, then in Holy Scripture penitence is not understood as the whole intransitive conversion, but only contrition. This is clear from Mark 1, 15. μετανοήτε καὶ πιστεῦτε ἐν εὐαγγελίῳ, "Repent and believe the gospel." Where penitence cannot be understood as the whole intransitive conversion of man; because τὸ πιστεῦν is expressly annexed to penitence.

Prob. c. When an express denomination of faith is not added to penitence, and yet a saving effect is attributed to it, by penitence the whole intransitive conversion of man is denoted; This is established from Luke XXIV, 47, where our Savior says: "It was necessary for Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead on the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name." Here a saving effect is connected to penitence, namely the remission of sins, which is not obtained without faith in Christ, Acts X, 43. Therefore, by penitence in this passage is understood the whole intransitive conversion, which is completed by contrition and faith, as its essential parts.

Prob. d. External penitence is also called ecclesiastical. Because penitent sinners are accustomed to testify to their inner sorrow, arisen in the soul from the recognition of sins, with lamentation, fasting, sordid clothes, ashes cast on the head, and other gestures and actions, and to make it publicly known by these as signs; therefore the name of penitence has also been accustomed to be transferred to those actions and external signs, by a metonymy of the sign for the thing signified. To which can be referred the oracle of Christ, Matthew XI, 21. "If the mighty works which were done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes."

Question III. How many kinds of penitence are there?

Division of penitence. Penitence, with respect to the subject, or the penitent man, is twofold, of the fallen, and of the standing a). The fallen are either unbelievers, who have never been reborn through baptism or circumcision, and yet by the grace of the Holy Spirit are converted from idols to the true God b); or malicious sinners, who, though reborn through baptism, or in the Old Testament through circumcision, have lapsed into deliberate sins and are illuminated by the thunder of the law and the light of the gospel, so that they may repent c). The penitence of the standing is a daily sorrow for sins of infirmity, and a daily fiducial embrace of divine grace, obtained by the merit of Christ d).

Prob. a. Paul makes mention of the standing and the fallen, 1 Cor. X, 12. "Let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall." The standing are those who persist in the covenant of grace through faith; The falling are those who fall from grace through voluntary sins.

Prob. b. From 1 Thess. 1, 9. "You turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God." The Thessalonians, converted from the worship of idols to the worship of the true God, performed the first penitence.

Prob. c. From Apoc. II, 5. "Remember therefore from where you have fallen, and repent." With these words Christ addresses the bishop of Ephesus, whose ardor for converting the Ephesians had grown tepid, due to the persistent resistance of the Jews and gentiles. And since he is accursed who does the work of the Lord negligently, Jer. XLVIII, 10, this bishop, having gravely fallen, is urged to do penance.

Prob. d. Standing Christians daily sigh, Matthew VI, 12. "Father, forgive us our debts." For there is no man who does not sin, 1 Kings VIII, 46. Standing Christians do not indeed sin from deliberate purpose; but from infirmity and ignorance (*).

(*) Two things are altogether required for daily penitence; 1) a continual remembrance both of the former sorrow for voluntary sins, perpetrated before the return of the soul to God, and also of the evangelical message of forgiving grace, perceived with saving trust, Ps. LI, 5. 1 Cor. XV, 9. 1 Tim. I, 13, 14.; 2) a continual inquiry into, recognition and detestation of the sins of infirmity, with which the man who has returned to God feels he still labors, and partly an imploring of grace, and a confirmation of the saving trust placed in Christ.

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that perfect Christians, as they call them, do not need penitence. They support their opinion with the following arguments;

I. Christ says explicitly: "The just have no need of penitence," Luke XV, 7. Resp. AUGUSTINE on Ps. LXI understands Christ's words to be about the just κατὰ δόξαν, according to opinion, such as the Pharisees were. But it is more accurately distinguished between the penitence of the standing and of the fallen, in this sense: the just do not need such penitence as those who are carried away into the byways of mortal sins require (*).

II. Matthew IX, 13. The Savior says: "I came to call sinners to repentance, and not the just." Resp. All men are sinners, 1 Kings

VIII, 46. But those who are just in their own opinion, i.e., swollen with the persuasion of their own justice, think that they do not need Christ's call to penitence.

III. Certain men are called perfect, like Josiah, 2 Paral, XXXIV, 2. But those who are perfect do not lapse into sins, and therefore do not need penitence. Resp. I distinguish between comparative and absolute perfection, not only of parts, but also of degrees. Josiah was not perfect in all respects, which is evident from the useless war he waged, to his own and his people's harm, against Pharaoh Necho, 2 Paral. XXXV, 3. He also did penance; for he is said to have turned to God with his whole heart, 2 Kings XXIII, 25. Moreover, all men are commanded to repent; Acts XVII, 30.

Our doctrine concerning this daily penitence, and its necessity, rests on this foundation and principle: that the condition of a man born again and renewed is indeed good, but always imperfect; that no voluntary sin is committed by him, but many out of ignorance and haste of mind, 1 Cor. IV, 4. Jas. III, 2.; that he himself has sin, and feels its enticements within himself, though very unwillingly, although he himself commits no sin knowingly and consenting, Rom. VII, 15. seq. coll. with VIII, 1. 1 John 1, 8, 9. III, 9. Therefore, there is a great necessity and consequence of this matter. Nor is the necessity of the precept less, as is wont to be said. The name of the penitence of the standing is written in Apoc. II, 16: μετανοήσον. This Christ commands to a man born again, and even persisting in faith, but sinning in some matter out of ignorance and without purpose, v. 13, 14, 15. As to the matter itself, the formula of prayer, prescribed to us by Christ, provides us with a most valid argument. He Himself taught us, indeed commanded us, to pray thus to God, as a Father reconciled and benign to us: "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors!" To whom, indeed, does this pertain? Certainly not to the impious, who have not yet repented of their evil deeds, who neither will nor can offer prayers pleasing to God, and in whose minds no vice is wont to be more tenaciously fixed than implacable hatred, so that they are unwilling to forgive their brothers their debts and forget injuries. Christ addressed in this way the men added to His discipline. Let us also consider both the connection and the order of the words and things. The things that precede the fifth prayer all indicate the good disposition of a renewed soul. The two things that follow it signify the imperfect condition of the same, not to be perfected before we depart from this life by a blessed transit. From this link in the prayer a twofold argumentation is effected. One: When we are in such a condition that we hallow the name of God, perpetually desire the kingdom of God, piously venerate the will of God, receive our bread with a grateful mind (petitions I, II, III, IV); then it is our duty to ask forgiveness of sins from God. The other is this: As long as we are subject to many and various vexations and incitements to evil, and not yet delivered from all evil (petitions VI & VII); so long must this prayer be continued: "Propitious Father! forgive us our debts!"

We have as adversaries in this cause not only the Socinians, but also the Pseudo-mystics and fanatical men, and all those who, with rash audacity, go about asserting legal perfection, both of parts and of degrees, for a renewed and, as it were, adult man.

(*) That this is so, appears 1) from the very meaning of the words: Those whom Christ counts among His sheep are certainly not from the number of the Pharisees, but are truly added to Christ and truly just. It is also evident 2) from the coherence of the words, the occasion and the scope, if we now compare this verse 7 with v. 1. ἀμαρτωλοί, men hitherto notoriously wicked, had approached Christ. Therefore, the just, already reconciled to God, who nevertheless daily and accurately examine, sorrowfully feel, and studiously correct their many defects, are not in need of that μετάνοια of which those men were in need, and which is the return of an impious man from sins to God.

Observe here the difference between men as wayfarers and angels. Good angels do not need penitence; evil angels are neither called to penitence, nor can they hope for the grace of conversion; but all men as wayfarers are in need of penitence, and are called to it by God.

Question IV. How many parts of penitence are there?

Parts of penitence. The parts of penitence are two, contrition and faith. This bipartite division is proven; 1) From the nature of penitence. For since penitence is the intransitive conversion of the sinner, it moves between two terms; namely, between the term from which, and to which. The term from which is the sin committed, from the acknowledgment of which contrition is born; The term to which is God, to whose mercy on account of Christ the sinner flees by faith, Acts XIV, 15.

2) From the principal efficient cause. The justice and mercy of God show that there are two parts of penitence. From the consideration of justice, contrition arises; from the meditation of mercy, trust springs forth, Dan. IX, 15. "We have sinned, we have done iniquity, we have been impious," v. 18. "But yours, O Lord, is mercy and remission."

3) From the twofold intermediate cause of penitence. Since there is a twofold kind of doctrine by which God effects penitence in us, the law and the gospel; and it is the role of the law to crush sinners; but of the gospel, to kindle living faith; it is clearly established that contrition and faith are the two parts of penitence.

4) From the effect. Penitence is a spiritual movement by which sins are abolished, and we are reconciled to God, who was offended by sins. But for the abolition of sins, there is required 1) a moral retraction of sins, which is accomplished by contrition, and 2) the offering of satisfaction for the injury and offense inflicted upon God, by which we are freed from the debt of undergoing punishment, or from the guilt of punishment, which is not accomplished except by faith, apprehending the satisfaction of Christ, and applying it to ourselves and offering it to God.

5) In Holy Scripture, penitence is described as a conversion to the living God, Acts XIV, 14, to God, c. XX, 21, repentance unto life, c. XI, 18, repentance and conversion εις τὸ ἐξαλειφθῆναι τὰς ἁμαρτίας, that sins may be blotted out, c. III, 19, conversion from darkness to light, c. XXVI, 18. But without faith in Christ, it is impossible for there to be penitence, or conversion to God, to life, to light, to the remission of sins. Through faith in Christ we obtain the remission of sins, Acts X, 43. Through faith, saving penitence is distinguished from destructive penitence, as the example of Peter and Judas shows. If faith did not enter into the essence of penitence, all of penitence would be a work of the law; from which there is no consolation, no justification; Indeed, penitence would also be deprived of its term to which.

6) From the examples of the truly penitent, our first parents, David, the hearers of John the Baptist, the sinful woman, the prodigal son, the thief on the cross, in whose penitence two things are seen, contrition and faith.

Antithesis is 1) that of the Papists, according to whose opinion there are three parts of penitence: contrition of the heart, confession of the mouth, and satisfaction of the work. 2) That of the Arminians, asserting that penitence is the correction of life. 3) That of the Socinians, according to whose mind, new obedience is almost the only part of penitence. Whose arguments are:

I. Faith is contrasted with penitence, Mark 1, 15: "Repent, and believe the gospel." Resp. Then penitence is understood μερικῶς, or partially so called, and denotes contrition. Faith pertains to the whole scope of saving penitence.

II. Faith precedes penitence: Therefore, it is not a part of penitence. The antecedent is evident from Jonah III, 5. "The Ninevites believed in God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth." Resp. Historical faith precedes penitence; because no one seriously grieves for sins unless he believes that God is a severe hater and avenger of sins; But saving faith constitutes penitence.

III. The faith which is required for penitence cannot be a certain trust in the remission of sins; because the Ninevites believed in God, and yet they doubted the remission of sins; which is established from their words, Jonah III, 9. "Who knows? God will turn and repent, so that He may turn from the heat of His anger, that we may not perish?" Resp. 1) The Ninevites did not doubt the remission of guilt, but the forgiveness of temporal punishment and affliction; since God sometimes sends temporal afflictions even to truly faithful penitents who are certain of the gratuitous remission of sins.

David, Job, and others are examples to us. 2) The particle, "who knows," is not always of one who doubts, but sometimes also of one who hopes well. Vid. 1 Sam. XIV, 6. 2 Sam. XII, 22.

IV. Penitence, or contrition, is a moral virtue, faith a theological virtue, which cannot concur to constitute one essential thing. Resp. Contrition is not an active virtue, but a sorrow and passion of the soul. Nor here is faith considered as a theological virtue, but as an ὀργάνον, or a medium receptive of divine grace and the merit of Christ.

V. Penitence, by the force of the word, denotes displeasure of some deed combined with sorrow, but the word does not signify faith or trust. Therefore, faith is not a part of penitence. Resp. Although among profane authors of the Latin language penitence denotes displeasure combined with sorrow; yet among sacred and ecclesiastical authors it is taken with such latitude that it designates the whole conversion to God, and the abolition of sins.

VI. "Pænitentia" is derived from "pæna," and "pænitet" means the same as "pæna me tenet" (punishment holds me). Therefore, "pænitentia" denotes a certain external punishment for sins, which ecclesiastical authors commonly call satisfaction. Resp. To ERASMUS "pænitere" is the same as "pone tenere" (to hold after) because later thoughts are better; but to us the verb "pænitere" seems to be primitive, not derivative. What "pænitere" means from the usage of the Latin language, GALLUS ASINIUS & LARGIUS LICINIUS, ancient writers, teach, according to A. GELLIUS, book XVII. Attic Nights. c. I. when they say "pænitere," we are then accustomed to say, when the things which we ourselves have done, or which have been done by our will and counsel, afterwards begin to displease us, and we change our opinion on them.

Instance: If the name penitence in its meaning includes sorrow for a past life, it certainly follows that it includes some punishment. Resp. Punishment is taken in two ways: 1) in a general and improper sense, by which it denotes an evil, or a harm inconvenient to an intelligent nature, contracted on account of guilt. 2) In a special and most proper sense, by which it designates an evil, or harm, by which guilt is vindicated, and an injury inflicted upon someone is compensated. In a general and improper sense, penitence with respect to its prior part, or contrition, can be called a punishment; for it is a certain evil, inconvenient to the nature and will of man, and that contracted on account of guilt, namely an evil placed in the lack of delight and tranquility of soul, which is also commonly considered as a punishment. But in a special sense, contrition is not a punishment, but only a certain disposition to faith, to be kindled by the voice of the gospel; for by contrition man does not compensate for the injury inflicted upon God, but is only disposed to conceive faith in Christ. Confer, MUSAEUS disp. II. de convers. p. 78. seqq.

VII. The true parts of penitence are salutary to man; Contrition is not salutary to man. Therefore. The major is clear; because penitence is given for life, Acts XI, 18. The minor is proven from 2 Cor. VII, 10. & the example of Judas, whose contrition was not salutary. Resp. 1) In general. Something is said to be salutary either remotely or positively. Contrition is salutary partly remotely, inasmuch as it removes the purpose of sinning, which is an obstacle to faith and the remission of sins; partly positively, not indeed effectively, as if it effected salvation by itself, but yet pedagogically, inasmuch as through it the way is prepared and made plain for the Lord, to be received by true faith, Matthew III, 3. 2) In particular, to 2 Cor. VII, 10. The sorrow of the world, conceived from impatience of punishments and the loss of earthly goods, works death, but not the sorrow according to God, aroused by the Spirit of God through the moral law, and conceived from the offense of the best Deity and the loss of divine grace. 3) The penitence of Judas was not joined with faith in Christ, by which it ought to be tempered, so that it might be not only pedagogically, but also effectively and therefore completely salutary.

VIII. Whatever works penitence is not a part of penitence. But contrition &c. Therefore. The major is clear; because nothing works itself. If, therefore, contrition were penitence, or a part of penitence, it could not work penitence. The minor is proven from 2 Cor. VII, 10. "For godly sorrow produces repentance that leads to salvation without regret." Resp. Godly sorrow is that which God not only commands or approves, but also excites by the word of the law, making the heart of man contrite, and thus works penitence unto salvation, inasmuch as through contrition it softens, prepares, and disposes the hard heart of man to receive saving faith from the gospel, by which penitence may be saving.

IX. Contrition precedes penitence; Therefore, it is not a part of penitence. The antecedent is clear from Acts II, 37, 38, where St. Peter urges those who were already pricked in their heart to do penance; and therefore the pricking of the heart precedes penitence. Resp. 1) By denying the consequence; because the parts by nature precede the whole. 2) More is required for contrition than the pricking of the heart, namely, the detestation of sin and faith in Christ.

Question V. Is new obedience a part of penitence?

New obedience is not a part, but an effect of penitence.

Obs. New obedience is the study of good works, or a serious and indefatigable study of keeping the precepts of God, and of living soberly, justly, and piously, and it is distinguished into new internal and external obedience. The former is the internal purpose of the mind and will to obey the divine precepts promptly; the latter is the external execution of the internal purpose. Confer. D. HULSEM. breviar. c. IX. p. 526.

Prob. 1) From Matthew III, 8, where the study of good works is called the fruit of penitence. Therefore, just as the fruit of a tree is not a part of it, so new obedience is not a part of penitence.

2) Scripture describes the study of good works as a consequent of conversion. Christ admonishes the bishop of Ephesus: "Repent, and do the first works," Apoc. II, 5. where good works are distinguished from penitence and are placed after it.

3) Penitence is divinely ordained for the remission of sins, Acts III, 19. Luke XXIV, 47. But new obedience is the fruit of the remission of sins. The Apostle to the Gentiles says gravely: "But now having been set free from sin, and having become slaves of God, you have your fruit to holiness, and the end, everlasting life," Rom. VI, 22.

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, who opine that new obedience is a most essential part of penitence. They rely on the following arguments:

I. Penitence is called in Greek μετάνοια, i.e., a change of mind and of all actions flowing from it, and therefore μετάνοια denotes the entire reformation of man. Resp. Μετάνοια is a change of mind either only to sorrow for sins committed, and is called contrition, and is penitence μερικῶς so called; or to sorrow and at the same time to a trust resting in Christ, and is penitence ὀλικῶς understood. But μετάνοια in Holy Scripture is not used for sanctification, which is the fruit of the remission of sins. Rom. VI, 22.

II. Holy Scripture describes penitence through the study of good works. Therefore, new obedience is a part of penitence. The antecedent is clear from Ps. XXXIV, 15. "Depart from evil, and do good." Ezech. XVIII, 27. "Turn from your wickedness and do justice." Resp. In the cited places, the conversion of a sinner is not described according to its essential parts, but the renewal which follows conversion and which notifies and declares it a posteriori.

III. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, art. XII, counts new obedience among the parts of penitence. "You see, here two parts are joined, contrition, when sins are argued, and faith, when it is said: Believe the gospel. If anyone here says that Christ also includes the fruits of penitence, we will not disagree. For this is sufficient for us, that these parts are chiefly named, contrition and faith." Resp. 1) The Apology of the Augsburg Confession expressly calls new obedience the fruit of penitence; therefore it is not a principal part of penitence. 2) If penitence is taken broadly, as it includes its immediate effect, we will not disagree either.

Question VI. Is new obedience a necessary and inseparable consequent of penitence?

New obedience follows penitence with an inseparable connection, and cannot be separated from it even in the dying.

Prob. 1) Penitence without new obedience is like a tree that does not bear good fruit and is to be cast into the fire, Matth. III, 10.

2) Faith without good works (at least internal ones) is dead, James II, 20. For which reason, concerning those who in the agony of death do not seriously propose to themselves that they wish to pursue new obedience, it cannot be said that they truly repent.

Question VII. Are mortification and vivification true parts of penitence?

If by mortification is understood the passive mortification, by which our hearts are crushed and mortified by God through the law; and by vivification, living faith, by which our hearts are raised up and sustained, this bipartite division is conformable to orthodoxy a). But if by mortification is understood the active putting off of the old man, and by vivification the putting on of the new man, this dichotomy is to be referred not to conversion, but to renewal b).

Prob. a. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, p. 160, admits these parts of penitence, namely mortification and vivification; but by mortification it understands the serious sorrow of the heart and conscience, excited by the legal sermons on account of sins committed through the power of the Holy Spirit; and by vivification it understands the unshaken trust of the heart, by which we are plainly certain of the remission of sins through and on account of Christ.

Prob. b. Active mortification and vivification belong to the reborn and justified man; This we learn from Rom. VIII, 12, 13. "Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live according to the flesh. For if you live according to the flesh you will die; but if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live." The Apostle addresses the brethren, who are inhabited by the Holy Spirit, v. 11. But spiritual brethren are reborn and justified men, who in continued renewal mortify the flesh, subduing its desires.

Question VIII. What is the end of penitence?

The end of penitence. The simply ultimate end of penitence is the glory of God a), with respect to man the ultimate end is eternal life b). The intermediate and proximate end is the remission of sins c).

Prob. a. The penitent give God the honor of omniscience, justice, mercy. Vid. the example of Achan, Josh. VII, 19.

Prob. b. God gave the Gentiles repentance unto life, Acts XI, 18.

Prob. c. From Acts III, 19. "Repent therefore and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." But the remission of sins is the end and effect of penitence not by reason of contrition, but by reason of faith, which is, as it were, the soul of penitence.

ON CONTRITION.

Question IX. What is contrition?

Definition of contrition. Contrition is a serious and holy sorrow of the heart, by which a sinner, having recognized his sins from the divine law, detests them.

Obs. Not a simulated or feigned sorrow, such as that of hypocrites and Pharisees, Matth. VI, 18. nor a worldly sorrow, conceived from impatience of punishments, or the loss of earthly things, such as that of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, Exod. XII, 30. but a serious and holy one, i.e., excited by the most holy Spirit through the divine law, illustrated by the ray of the gospel, is true contrition.

Question X. Is contrition a meritorious cause of salvation, or at least a causal means of salvation?

Contrition is neither a meritorious cause of salvation a), nor a positive causal means of salvation b). But it is only a means of order, and that a privative one, removing the impediments to the remission of sins and eternal salvation c).

Prob. a. 1) Merit is an undue, perfect work, proceeding from one's own powers, equal and proportionate to its reward. But the contrition of a sinner is due, imperfect, proceeding from supernatural powers conferred by the Holy Spirit, and in no way equal or proportionate to meriting eternal life. Therefore, contrition is not a meritorious cause of salvation.

2) The one and only meritorious cause of the remission of sins is the satisfaction and merit of Christ. For what the law could not do (from which is contrition), in that it was weak through the flesh, God did by sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, on account of sin; He condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us, as Paul teaches, Rom. VIII, 3, 4.

Prob. b. The causal means of salvation that exhibit it are the word of God and the sacraments; The means of salvation that apprehends, or is receptive, is faith resting on the merit of Christ. "He who believes in the Son has everlasting life," John III, 36. But contrition is destitute of the faculty of apprehending Christ the mediator.

Prob. c. Although contrition is not a causal and positive means of obtaining salvation; It is, however, a means of order, established by God; Just as passing through a road is an ordinal means, but not the cause of the journey. For thus said Jehovah: "To this one I will look; to him who is poor and of a contrite spirit, and who trembles at My word," Is. LXVI, 2. For God has sanctioned this order, that the sinner should recognize his miserable state, fear the wrath and punishments of God the judge, grieve bitterly for his sins, and detest them with his whole heart; because He does not want to remit sins unless the recognition and detestation of them precedes in the subject to be justified and saved. But nowhere in the sacred code is it said that the recognition and detestation of sins merits remission. For which reason contrition is not a meritorious cause, or a causal and positive means of the remission of sins and eternal salvation, but only a means of order, and that a privative one, removing, prohibiting, just as in surgical medicine the removal of pus precedes; because a wound cannot be healed or close as long as the pus is not removed. But just as the removal of pus is not a positive cause of healing, but only a privative and removing means of an obstacle, without the removal of which healing could not follow; So sorrow for sin is not the cause of remission, but only a means removing obstacles, which would otherwise impede remission from following; for it removes the opinion of not being in need, and the purpose of continuing in sins. Conf. D. HULSEMANN. breviar. cap. IX. pag. 503. & D. DANNHAV. hodos. phanom. XI. p. 120.

Antithesis is that of the Papists, asserting that contrition is necessary for obtaining the remission of sins and salvation, and that it in its own way merits the remission of sins. Whose arguments are:

I. "Godly sorrow works repentance unto salvation," 2 Cor. VII, 10. Godly sorrow is contrition; Therefore. Resp. Godly sorrow is that which God Himself excites, so that a preparation and disposition may be made for conceiving faith, with which conjoined penitence becomes salutary.

II. If contrition did not merit the remission of sins, God would not look upon the contrite sinner with propitious eyes; But he does look etc. Therefore. The reason for the consequence is; because a man is looked upon with a serene countenance on account of his merits. The truth of the consequent is evident from Is. LXVI, 2. Resp. God does not look upon contrition itself as a merit for remission, but upon the contrite man, who recognizes his own misery and flees to the mercy of God with true faith; for in the penitent heart, contrition is tempered by faith.

III. That to which spiritual vivification is attributed has the power of justifying (because justification is spiritual vivification); But to contrition etc. Therefore. The minor is established from Ezech. XVIII, 27. "When the wicked man turns away from his wickedness which he has committed, and does what is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive." Resp. By conversion is understood not only contrition, but also faith, from which the entire intransitive conversion consists. Faith vivifies not ενεργητικῶς, effectively, by producing spiritual life, but ληπτικῶς, by receiving the life of grace and glory; But contrition removes the obstacles to spiritual life.

IV. Whatever is a sacrifice, that placates God, and is a meritorious cause of the remission of sins; But contrition is a sacrifice, Ps. LI, 19; Therefore. Resp. 1) Whatever is a ἱλαστικὸν sacrifice, that placates God; I grant. But the contrition of the standing is a εὐχαριστικὸν sacrifice. 2) The cited passage speaks of the subject that pleases God, not indeed of the cause from which that favor befalls us. 3) Contrition is a sacrifice grateful to God, not inasmuch as it is separate from faith, but inasmuch as it is tempered by faith resting in the merit of Christ, 2 Cor. VII, 10.

Question XI. Is contrition a good work?

The contrition of the fallen is not a good work, properly speaking.

Obs. 1) There is one contrition of the fallen, who live in a state of wrath; Another of the standing, who by regeneration and justification have been translated into a state of grace. The question is understood concerning the contrition of fallen men. For we not unwillingly grant that the contrition of the standing, which follows faith and concerns the remnants of sin, can come into the account of good works, in the opinion of D. KROMEYER in theol. positivo-polem. p. 382 (*).

(*) If a good work is understood strictly and properly, this name does not sufficiently suit the daily penitence of the standing either, the effect of which is a daily more ardent study of good works, so that we may also profit more and more. I demonstrate the matter thus: Strictly and properly named, a good work is an action consonant with the divine law, by which someone promptly does his duty, willingly doing it out of trust in Christ, and love

2) Good works are usually taken in two ways: 1) generally; and thus all movements of the soul which are prescribed in the word of God are called good works, whether they be internal or external acts, and whether they be formally free actions, or whether they be passions and movements excited by the Holy Spirit, without the free consent of man. 2) Specially and properly: Thus good works are the free actions of man, which he, as a new creature, exercises through the powers given by the Holy Spirit. Confer. D. MUSÆI praelect. in Form. Concord. p. 177.

Our assertion is proven: 1) Every good work proceeds from justifying faith, Phil. I, 11, Rom. XIV, 23. But contrition precedes faith.

Prob. 2) Every good work is a free action of a reborn and justified man, performed through the grace of renewal according to the prescription of the divine law. But the contrition of the fallen a) is not an action, but partly a passive movement of the soul, inasmuch as it is sorrow for sins, partly a privative movement, inasmuch as it is displeasure of sins. b) It is not free; because a fallen man, before he is transferred into a state of grace, enjoys no liberty in spiritual matters, whence sorrow for sins, which is λύπη κατὰ θεόν, is not placed in the choice of the penitent, but is on his part an involuntary passion of the soul, or inconvenient to the nature and will of man, since by contrition he is deprived of his delight and tranquility of soul. c) Contrition precedes regeneration, justification, and renewal. Therefore, contrition is not a good work.

Antithesis is that of the Papists, who maintain that contrition is to be counted among good works. They go about flouring their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Whatever is a work of the Holy Spirit, which He works in us through the word of the law, that is a good work; But contrition &c. Jer. XXIII, 29. Therefore. Resp. Whatever is a work of the Holy Spirit inhabiting us, that is a good work, properly so called; I grant. But contrition is an effect of the grace of the Holy Spirit externally assisting, striking and crushing the heart through the hammer of the law; and therefore it is not a good work properly so called.

II. Every action, prescribed in the word of God, is a good work; Contrition is an action &c. Therefore. Resp. 1) For a good work, the command of God is not sufficient, but grace is also required for it. The indwelling Holy Spirit, and faith, without which it is impossible to please God, Hebr. XI, 6. 2) If in a general and improper sense a good work is called that which is commanded in the divine word, we readily grant that contrition can be called a good work. 3) Contrition is not an action, but an involuntary passion of the soul. For God actively crushes the sinner, the sinner is passively crushed.

Instance 1. To full contrition pertains the recognition of sin, meditation on the divine law, detestation of sins, which are true actions. Resp. The recognition of sin and meditation on the law concur to contrition, not formally or constitutively, but antecedently and efficiently. But the detestation of sins is an effective displeasure, which is a privative movement.

Instance II. If contrition is not voluntary, it will be forced: The consequent is absurd; since God does not compel a reluctant man to penitence. Therefore, it is voluntary. Resp. Contrition, by reason of its cause, is not voluntary because it does not proceed from the natural powers of free will; nor is it forced; since God does not convert man by for God reconciled to him. 1 John V, 3, 4. But the prior part of daily penitence pertains to grieving for the neglect of duty, not indeed voluntary, but yet contrary to the divine law and the religion of duty: The other part altogether looks to the supreme benefit of saving grace, to be known and perceived more clearly and certainly. But the more a good man knows the defects of performing his duty, reproaching himself every day, and the more the saving knowledge of the benefits of God's grace in Christ is increased; the more eager he becomes to do his duty, in which he still experiences much deficiency. Universal virtue, which is the general ability and alacrity of a soul inclined to all good movements of the soul, and good acts, commanded by divine laws, this virtue, I say, proceeds from saving trust, and therefore the one is distinguished from the other, as an effect from its cause, and they are the standing to whom that exhortation pertains, from 1 Peter 1, 3, 4, & 5. Therefore, just as the beginning of faith, in the penitence of the fallen, is not itself a good work, strictly so called, but is the cause of all; so the increase of the same faith, in the penitence of the standing, is not itself a good work, but is the cause of a new and daily corroborated study of all things, whatever are truly good works.

irresistible force; but it is excited through the law, by a supernaturally acting cause, namely by the Holy Spirit, whose grace bends the mind of man, and finally overcomes his repugnance.

III. Contrition is either good, or it is bad. If it is good; why can it not be called a good work? If it is bad; it is forbidden by the divine word, which is false. Resp. The contrition of the fallen is indeed pedagogically good; because by it man is divinely prepared for faith in Christ; but it is not a free action of a reborn and justified man, performed through the grace of renewal.

Question XII. What are the requisites of true contrition?

Requisites of true contrition. To true contrition, as the prior part of penitence, by which sins are morally retracted, there pertains and is required antecedently the recognition of sin a), not only theoretical, but also practical b): Formally it is constituted by an effective displeasure, or detestation of sins, joined with serious sorrow c).

Prob. a. Penitence, or intransitive conversion, is directed to the abolition of past sins, lest they remain morally. But they have it, so that they remain morally, partly from the fact that, after they have been perpetrated, they are held as ratified, or certainly because they are not retracted; partly from the fact that the offense and injury inflicted upon God, and the obligation born from this to satisfy God for it, has not been removed by the satisfaction rendered, nor is the wrath of God against sins placated. Whence penitence, or intransitive conversion, is also directed in that twofold reason; one, by which it may cause them no longer to be held as ratified; the other, by which it exhibits satisfaction to God for the offense and injury inflicted upon him, and placates the offended God through it. That sins may not be held as ratified, after they have been perpetrated, conversion effects through their retraction, opposed to ratification, which by ecclesiastical writers is commonly called CONTRITION; to which various acts pertain, of which some look to the intellect of the man to be converted, others to his will. To the intellect pertains the RECOGNITION OF SINS, which is preredquired as a necessary condition, and without which the retraction of sins finds no place; since the will, to which it formally pertains to retract what once pleased, is a blind power, and in its acts so depends on the previous cognition of the intellect, that it can render nothing null, unless it has first been known by the intellect. Which the practice of the scriptures also proves, in which, when secure sinners were to be led to their conversion through the ministry of the word, it is found that the beginning was always made from the manifestation of sins, by which they might be led to their recognition. See the example of David, 2 Sam. XII, 7. seq. Ps. LI, 5. This recognition of sins is made a) by a judgment of the speculative intellect, by which sins, whether they present themselves to the mind by themselves (when they are more serious), or are known by a more diligent examination or scrutiny of past life, and a more accurate comparison instituted with the norm of the divine law, are known to be adverse to the divine law, hateful to God, and worthy of temporal and eternal punishments; as in Rom. III, 20 the recognition of sin is said to be through the law; b) by a judgment of the practical intellect, which dictates that the sinner should not proceed or persevere in his sins, but should diligently apply himself to their abolition, and solicitously consider how and by what means they can be abolished. But it is established from the examples of the penitent in scripture, how, having known their sins, they solicitously sought by what means they could abolish their sins, e.g., Josiah, 2 Kings XXII, 11. seq. of certain Jews at the time of John the Baptist, Matthew III, 6. Mark 1, 5.

Prob. b. From the part of the will, there is required for contrition, or the retraction of sins. DISPLEASURE and detestation of them. For if the intellect recognized even all sins, and dictated that one should not persist in them; they would not however be retracted, unless they displeased the will. But displeasure is twofold: one simple, by which sins known according to some reason of evil displease the will, without the intention of fleeing them; the other effective, by which a thing, known as evil, so displeases that the will at the same time intends to flee it, and is otherwise called DETESTATION. For contrition, or the retraction of sins, simple displeasure is not sufficient, such as is also in the impenitent, who see and approve better things, but follow worse; but an effective displeasure, or detestation, is required, by which we utterly avert ourselves from sins, inasmuch as we wish to render them undone, if it were possible, and abhor from perpetrating similar ones.

Prob. c. Through effective displeasure, or detestation, sins cease to be voluntary, and take on the nature of involuntary actions. But involuntary actions are accompanied by an individual connection with SORROW, which is a passion, perturbation, and inquietude of the soul, arisen from the apprehension of sin as a present evil, and the cause of many evils, to be atoned for in this life and the next. And this sorrow is indeed the graver, the more deeply the sinner considers the foulness of sins, the offense of God, the punishments of this and the future life merited. Whence it is clear that the bites and terrors of conscience are contained under this sorrow. Conf. D. MUSAEUS. disp. III. de conversione, p.131. seqq. D. SCHERZERI system. LXI. p. 297. D. BAYERI comp. theol. p. 687.

Obs. These requisites of true contrition are enumerated and explained otherwise by other authors. D. MART. CHEMNITZ, in Exam. Conc. Trid. Fol. 38. proposes them in the following manner: It pertains to contrition; 1) That the mind of the sinner from the judgment of the law should understand, acknowledge, and seriously consider the manifold uncleanness and abomination of sin before God; 2) From the doctrine of the wrath, indignation, and judgment against sins, the conscience understanding how seriously and horribly God is angered by sins, and wishes to punish them, acknowledges that on account of sins it is held entangled in the bonds of the wrath and judgment of God to eternal condemnation; 3) Thence arises in the conscience fear, terror, dread of the wrath and judgment of God against sins; 4) From this follows sorrow of the conscience, grieving gravely that it has sinned, and by sins has offended God; It begins therefore to hate and detest sin, and to cast away the purpose of it; 5) But this recognition, this dread and sorrow excites and urges the conscience, so that it thinks and seeks whether, and how it can escape the wrath of God, and the judgment of condemnation, as the Baptist says: "Who warned you to flee from the wrath to come?"

D. GERHARDUS in confess. cathol. f. m. 1262. writes concerning the requisites of true contrition: Although five things occur in contrition; 1) In the memory, the recollection of sins, 2) in the mind, the consideration of the divine offense, 3) in the will, the detestation of the recognized sins, 4) in the heart, the fear of vengeance and of the future judgment; 5) In the conscience, wounded by the sting of the law, horror, sorrow, bite and compunction; yet the essence of contrition does not consist in the first two degrees, which are internal acts, but rather in the latter three. For the former do not so much constitute contrition as effect it; They relate to it προκαταρκτικῶς rather than ἐσιωδῶς. They are the efficient cause, not the formal cause of contrition; since it is properly a passion of the heart.

D. DANNHAVERUS in hodos. phen. XI. p. 1281. judges thus concerning the requisites of contrition: Formal contrition consists 1) in sadness for the good omitted, and sorrow for the evil committed, so great as is wont to be in the loss of friends and offspring by death. This sadness is not worldly, which flows from the consideration of the loss of temporal things, from impatience, from melancholy excited by Satan, from the bites of conscience, of which kind was the sadness of Judas, such as was also in Cain, in Ahab over Naboth's vineyard, in the incestuous Amnon; but divine, from the loss of spiritual good and the foulness of sin as such; a sadness serious and sincere, not perfectly at an ἰσοῤῥοπὸν weight, so that God desires nothing in it. For who can understand his errors? Ps. XIX, 13, let alone grieve precisely for all of them. Sin, like indigestible food, creates torments in the stomach far more bitter and prolonged than was the duration of pleasure in its consumption. 2) In hatred, aversion, and detestation, 2 Sam. XIII, 15, but a hatred not only of the act, but also of the affection for sinning, and in self-denial, Luke IX, 23. 3) In fear and terror, which although by itself turns away from God, yet accidentally works for good, and leads to God by another way, and by God's intention is salutary, Jer. XXXI, 19. 4) In shame, on account of God being offended. Finally 5) in a real desertion of sin. "Hassen und Lassen gehören zusammen" (Hating and leaving belong together).

From these requisites of true contrition, a more abundant definition of it can be deduced: Contrition is a passive movement of the soul, excited by the Holy Spirit through converting grace, by which a sinful man, having recognized his sins from the divine law, feels the wrath of God, fears His temporal and eternal punishments, is afflicted with grave sorrow on account of the foulness of sin, the offense of God, and the loss of divine grace, is affected with shame, and so detests both original evil and actual sins, that he casts away and exterminates from his heart the purpose of sinning.

Question XIII. Do the terrors of conscience, instilled by the law, also pertain to contrition?

The terrors, instilled into the conscience by the divine law, pertain to the essence of contrition.

Prob. 1) All sorrow instilled into the soul, on account of the offense of the supreme Lord and Judge, is joined with terror and dread in the conscience. But contrition is such a sorrow. Therefore. The minor is explained by the Apol. Aug. confess. p. 165. "We say; contrition is the true terrors of the conscience, which feels that God is angry with sin; and grieves that it has sinned."

2) The examples of penitent sinners teach this. King David, repenting, says, Ps. XXXVIII, 9. "I am feeble and severely broken; I have roared because of the groaning of my heart." Conf. Ps. VI, 3.

Antithesis is that of the Papists, who deny that the terrors instilled into the conscience by the law enter into the essential constitution of contrition. Whose arguments are:

I. The terrors instilled into the soul are natural affections, which are found both in children and in beasts, who are incapable of penitence. Resp. Contrition is not simply called terror, but terror arisen from the recognition of sins and the view of divine wrath, which is a movement of the soul excited by the Holy Spirit, and therefore is not by nature in children and beasts.

II. Terrors are also given in devils, James II, 19, who yet do not repent. Resp. The terrors of the evil demons are neither joined with an effective displeasure of sins, nor with the hope of pardon, and therefore are not penitential.

III. Penitence flows from love, not from terror, as the example of the prostitute shows, Luke VII, 47. "Her many sins have been forgiven, for she loved much." Resp. 1) Christ is not speaking in that place of penitence, but of the remission of sins, which is the effect of penitence. 2) The particle, "for," is not taken αιτιολογικῶς, causally, as if love were the cause of the remission of sins, but συλλογιστικῶς, ratiocinatively, to indicate the reason of the consequence from the posterior. This is abundantly clear from the comparison of this verse 47 with those, 42, 43. 3) That that sinful woman felt terrors and sorrows of conscience, her tears abundantly testify.

Question XIV. Are only actual sins, or also habitual ones, retracted through contrition?

Through contrition, actual sins are retracted proximately and immediately a). Consequently and by means of the acts of sinning, also habitual ones b).

Prob. a. Actual sins, when they have been perpetrated, present themselves to the sinner's soul by themselves and immediately, and burden and distress his conscience; and therefore intransitive conversion tends to their abolition first, proximately, and immediately.

Prob. b. King David, after perpetrating the crimes of adultery and homicide, repenting, besides the sins actually committed and now past, also disapproved, and with much sorrow detested his own connate malice, as the cause and fount of the perpetrated crimes, Ps. LI, 7. And although original sin cannot be completely extirpated in this life, yet the inordinate motions, erupting from it against the will, can be restrained and inhibited by the reborn, lest it give birth to voluntary and actually mortal sin.

Question XV. What are the reasons that impel a fallen sinner to contrition?

Causes of contrition. There are very many and most grave causes that move a fallen sinner to sincere contrition.

Prob. A sinner, constituted outside the state of grace, is impelled to serious contrition by 1) the offense to the divine majesty; 2) the rupture of the baptismal covenant, on the part of the malicious sinner; 3) the foulness of deliberate sin; 4) the shipwreck of faith, which is inconsistent with deliberate sins; 5) the lack of the solace of the Holy Spirit; 6) the gravity of temporal and eternal punishments; 7) the scandal given to the weak; 8) the lack of angelic protection; 9) the rigor of divine judgment; 10) the loss of eternal life.

Question XVI. What is the end of contrition?

The end of contrition. The end of true contrition is preparation for faith in Christ, to be conceived from the gospel.

Prob. 1) Just as the law is a pedagogue to Christ, Gal. III, 24; so contrition, which is from the law, is a pedagogical means to faith in Christ, to be kindled by the word of the gospel.

2) By contrition the way of the Lord is made plain, Matth. III, 3, inasmuch as by it are removed the obstacles which would otherwise impede the generation of faith in Christ. Whence the Form. Concord. p. 688. "True and saving faith is not in those who lack contrition and have the purpose of continuing and persevering in sins."

Question XVII. What are the signs of true contrition?

Internal signs of contrition. The signs of true contrition are some internal and certain, others external and probable. The internal are: a) the abnegation of an evil purpose, and the omission of deliberate sin; b) indeed the legal and pedagogical desire for a most approved physician, or a most benign and most powerful liberator.

Prob. a. Contrition is formally a serious sorrow for sins committed, joined with an effective displeasure, or detestation of sins. But it cannot be that sins seriously displease someone, or that someone seriously detests sins, and yet has the purpose of sinning. But here a careful distinction must be made between the purpose of amending one's life, and the abnegation of an evil purpose. The former, as an internal work, follows justifying faith; The latter precedes faith, and is not a good work; because it does not consist in a positive action or commission, but only in the omission of an evil work, the cessation of morose resistance, and the removal of acts impeding regeneration. Conf. D. HULSEMANN. breu. p. 523.

Prob. b. From Acts II, 37. "Now when they heard this (the Jews), they were cut to the heart, and said to Peter and the rest of the apostles, 'Men and brethren, what shall we do?'" The hearers of Peter, by the preaching of the divine word, were cut to the heart no differently than if their hearts had been pierced or transfixed by sharp swords. Which compunction of heart excited a general and confused desire, which they express with the question: "What shall we do?" A distinction must be made here between a legal and an evangelical desire. The former supposes a knowledge of the disease, the latter a knowledge of the physician. The former is pedagogical, the latter is actually saving; The former is a consequent and testimony of contrition, the latter is an effect of faith, seeking an effective medicine in the wounds of Christ.

Question XVIII. What are the external and probable signs of contrition?

The external and probable signs of contrition are detected in the sinner's mouth, in his habit, and in his external work.

Question XIX. What external sign of contrition is observed in the mouth of the penitent sinner?

External [signs] in the mouth. The external and probable sign of true contrition, which is observed in the mouth of the sinner, is the confession of sins, which is either of the whole church, since it confesses its sins then ordinarily in public prayers, and extraordinarily in public calamities a); or it is of a private person, who confesses his sins immediately before God b), before the church c), before a minister of the church d), before his neighbor e).

Prob. a. That a general confession of the sins of the whole church is necessary and useful, is clear, among other things, from Lev. XVI, 21. "Aaron shall lay both his hands on the head of the live goat, and confess over it all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them on the head of the goat, and shall send it away by the hand of a suitable man into the wilderness." We observe here: 1) A public confession of the whole church is made, with the voice of God's minister preceding, such as the priest Aaron once was. Conf. 1 Sam. VII, 5. Neh. IX, 1. Jud. X, 10. 2) Public confession is joined with faith in Christ, whose type was once the ἀποπομπαῖος, or emissary goat; For Christ is the lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, John 1, 29, on whom we lay the hand of faith.

Prob. b. From Ps. LI, 6. "Against You, You only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Your sight." King David confesses his sin to God, as the supreme lawgiver, judge, and καρδιογνώστης (knower of hearts), as one whose law he had violated. He had indeed also sinned against his neighbor, but principally and ultimately against God the lawgiver. This confession, which is made immediately to God, is called by LUTHER the confession of faith.

Prob. c. Achan confessed his theft before the face of the entire Israelite church, Josh. VII, 19. This confession before the church was once called ἐξομολόγησις, and was either voluntary, by which the sinner willingly published his crime, or involuntary, to which he was compelled by the church to make it.

Prob. d. From Matthew III, 6. "And were baptized by him (John) in the Jordan, confessing their sins." The hearers of John, testifying to the internal contrition of the heart by the external confession of the mouth before this sacred preacher, received baptism as an efficacious means of regeneration and justification.

Prob. e. From James V, 16. Where the Apostle says: "Confess your trespasses to one another, and pray for one another, that you may be healed." The Apostle James is not speaking of a confession to be made to a priest; because this is not mutual. St. James says: Εξομολογεῖθε ἀλλήλοις, i.e., mutually and in turn. But a neighbor confesses guilt to a neighbor, either for the sake of reconciliation, when he has affected his neighbor with an injury, see Matthew V, 23; or for the sake of seeking counsel, when a hidden crime has wounded the conscience; or also for the sake of mutual prayers, so that one may pour out pious prayers to God for the well-being and salvation of the other. This confession, which is made to a neighbor, is commonly called the confession of charity.

Question XX. What signs of contrition are detected in the face and external habit of the sinner?

In the face and habit. In the face and habit of the sinner certain external signs of contrition are observed: a) tears; b) haircloth and sackcloth; c) sprinkling of ashes; d) striking of the breast and thigh; e) tearing of garments; f) squalid lying on the ground.

Prob. a. Tears, shed without hypocrisy, are ambassadors of sorrow, and the blood of a wounded heart. The penitent Israelites shed tears, Exod. XXXIII, 4. David, Ps. VI, 7. Peter, Matth. XXVI, 75. the sinful woman, Luke VII, 38.

Prob. b. The king of Nineveh, about to declare his penitence by external signs, arose from his throne, and laid his robe from him, and covered himself with sackcloth, Jonah III, 6. Sackcloth is also called haircloth, and is a mournful, vile, hairy garment, woven from the hairs of beasts, narrow, pricking and tearing the skin, an indicator of a mourning, humbled, suppliant soul.

Prob. c. The repenting Israelites sprinkled themselves with ashes, 2 Sam. XIII, 19. Neh. IX, 1, by which they then testified that they were nothing but ashes and dust, and then were to invite God to commiseration towards his fragile work, formed from dust.

Prob. d. The penitent publican struck his breast, saying: "God, be merciful to me a sinner," Luke XVIII, 13. To strike the breast is to chastise a hidden sin with an evident blow, says AUGUSTINE, serm. 8. on the words of the Lord.

Prob. e. The Hebrews tore their garments in the highest mourning, and in the more vehement commotions of the soul, Vid. Gen. XXXVII, 34. 2 Sam. III, 31. That the tearing of garments is a sign of penitence is evident from Joel II, 13.

Prob. f. King David, struck with grave sorrow, lay on the ground, 2 Sam. XII, 16, which χαμευνία or lying on the ground, is a sign of a submissive soul.

Question XXI. What external signs of contrition are detected in the work itself?

In the work. About internal contrition, a) fasting, b) satisfaction, testify externally.

Prob. a. Fasting is a voluntary abstinence from food, so that the flesh may be coerced, and the soul humbled. When Ezra undertook the journey from Babylonia to Jerusalem, he immediately proclaimed a fast for this purpose, that the flesh might be afflicted, and the Israelites might be more fit to ask for a right way from the Lord. Vid. Ezra VIII, 21. Thus the Ninevites fasted, Jonah III, 5. Jehoshaphat, 2 Paral XX, 3. Nehemiah, c. I, 4. Daniel, c. X, 3.

Prob. b. Satisfaction here is understood as that which is rendered to an injured neighbor, or to the church, offended by a public scandal. Thus Zacchaeus, being penitent, said, Luke XIX, 8. "If I have taken anything from anyone by false accusation, I restore fourfold." Therefore, Zacchaeus made satisfaction not to God, but to the defrauded neighbor (*). That incestuous man, whom the Apostle mentions, 1 Cor. V, 1, was delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit might be saved. About this the Apostle writes in 2 Cor. II, 6. "This punishment, which was inflicted by many, is sufficient for such a man." The Corinthian church, admonished by St. Paul, had gravely rebuked (for ἐπιτιμία denotes a rebuke joined with infamy) the incestuous man, and had shunned his company; afterwards, by the will of the Apostle, it forgave this repenting sinner his crime, and consoled him, lest he rush headlong into desperation, but imposed no fine by which he might satisfy God for the temporal punishment. Conf. CHEMNITZ ex. concil. Trident. fol. 721. where this most grave author also shows that the ἐπιτιμία of the Greeks is more fitting for the church than the satisfaction of the Latins; since that word is more inconvenient and arrogant.

(*) The necessity of this satisfaction is effected from the very nature of a true change of mind. For to this is also required care and solicitude, partly concerning abolishing the injury inflicted on another, partly concerning removing the things in which the sin consisted. A serious detestation of sin is surely so powerful that a man vehemently desires that the deed could be made undone. But this is possible, insofar as the sin is a violation of human

Question XXII. Are the mentioned signs of contrition infallible?

They are probable, but not infallible. Prob. Those external signs of contrition sometimes do not proceed from serious sorrow, but are assumed by art, and for this reason are hateful to God. Vid. Is. LVIII, 5. Luke XVIII, 12.

Question XXIII. Is a special enumeration of each and every sin to be required in confession?

Concerning the enumeration of individual sins. A special enumeration of each and every sin according to circumstances is not necessary in confession before a minister of the church.

Prob. 1) An enumeration of each and every sin according to circumstances is impossible. "Who can understand his errors?" "Cleanse me from secret faults, O Lord," says King David, Ps. XIX, 13. This king was of a most perspicacious genius, and yet he did not have all his שגיות (errors) known. Therefore he sought cleansing from secret sins, which escape memory.

2) That articular, special, and circumstantial confession is a torture of consciences, and the nearest way to desperation. For sinners are deterred by shame, or fear of punishment, from disclosing each and every sin; indeed, many are also obliterated by forgetfulness when the confession is made. But a snare is tied to consciences, that there is no remission for sins not expressed in confession.

3) That special confession is superstitious; for it is considered to be meritorious, on which absolution is to be suspended.

4. It is hostile to honesty and modesty, pernicious to the secret counsels of Princes and private individuals, and a machine of avarice (*).

Antithesis is that of the Papists, who require a special enumeration of each and every sin in confession before a priest. They rely on the following arguments:

I. Whatever has been enjoined upon us by God, that is necessary by force of a divine command; But a special confession of sins is &c. Therefore. The minor is proven from James V, 16. "Confess your trespasses to one another." Resp. The Apostle James speaks of the fraternal confession of charity, not of ecclesiastical confession.

Instance; Christ commanded the leper to show himself to the priests, Matth. VIII, 4. Therefore, a special confession of sins is necessary by force of a divine command. Resp. The cause of the delegation to the Levitical priests was not a special confession of sins, but the showing of the cleansing already done.

II. Whatever has a divine promise annexed to it, that is necessary for Christians; A special confession of sins &c. Therefore. The minor is proven from 1 John I, 9. Resp. St. John in that place deals with a law, it can therefore be done in two ways: 1) in words, by revocation; 2) in deeds, by restitution, if the thing taken away is still intact in the hand and power of the unjust possessor, and he himself is strong enough to repair the damage; or, if restitution cannot be made, compensation. 18. Vid. Ex. XXII, 3. Dan. IV, 24. Lev. VI, 4, 5. XVIII, 31. And these words, James IV, 8. καθαρίσατε τὰς χεῖρας, seem to me especially to be understood thus: if you hold anything ill-gotten in your hand, by the example of Zacchaeus, Luke XIX, 8.

(*) This is not the only argument from which it appears how pernicious it is. The evil is increased by another certain evil counsel, by which a most special confession is required from each one, so that satisfaction may be imposed on the confessor, according to the variety of circumstances, now graver, now lighter, which also has much value before God, and which the Roman Catholics think is the third part of penitence, indeed the principal one, so that it may truly be called penitence, by which name it would scarcely be worthy, as they say, unless some punishment were inflicted on him who had confessed the crime.

confession to be made before God, not before a priest.

III. Whoever ought to remit sins, to them sins must be recounted; But priests &c. Therefore. The major is established; because to remit and to confess sins are related. But if one of the related terms is posited, the other is also posited. The minor is proven from Matth. XVI, 19. Matth. XVIII, 18. John XX, 22. Resp. A general confession is sufficient, a special and circumstantial confession is not necessarily required.

Instance; The key of loosing and binding denotes the power of judging; But to a judge, the deed with all its circumstances must be recounted; Resp. The key of loosing and binding does not infer the power of judging, but of discerning sinners, and of decently applying promises and comminations to certain individuals. God is an omniscient judge, priests are ministers and messengers. He αὐτοκρατορικῶς, or principally, they διακονικῶς, ministerially remit sins.

IV. In what manner Christians confessed their sins in the Apostolic church, in the same manner let us also confess our sins; But in the Apostolic church Christians confessed their sins specifically and individually. Therefore. The minor is proven from Acts XIX, 18. "And many who had believed came and confessed and told their deeds." Resp. 1) CHRYSOSTOM takes this place to be about miracles; because the verb ἀναγγέλλειν is never used for the confession of sins. 2) Let it be understood of evil deeds, yet that confession was not private and auricular, but public, before the whole assembly of believers. 3) They did not recount each and every sin with their individual circumstances, but the more atrocious ones, especially acts of curious vanity and magic art. Vid. the following verse 19.

Question XXIV. Is private confession before a minister of the church rightly retained in the orthodox church?

Concerning private confession. Private confession, in which sins are recounted before a minister of the church in general and in particular the more atrocious ones and those that prick the conscience, is rightly retained in the orthodox church, not under the condition of absolute necessity for salvation, but on account of its most abundant utility.

Prob. 1) From the general command of God, Lev. V, 5. "He shall confess that in which he has sinned," & Num. V, 7. "They shall confess their sin." Every Israelite who had sinned brought sacrifices, and confessed his private offenses to the priest before the slaughter and offering of the sacrifices, especially the more atrocious ones; which is gathered from Lev. c. IV, V, & VI.

2) From the rite of private absolution. The power of privately absolving has been divinely granted to the minister of the church, Matth. XVI, 19. XVIII, 18. John XX, 22. Therefore, the power of privately hearing the confession of sins has been granted to the same.

3) By the examples of David, 2 Sam, XII, 13, the sinful woman, Luke VII, 38, those baptized by John, Matth. III, 5.

4) Because confession and absolution do much, a) for the information of the young, b) for the correction of the dissolute, c) for the testing and preparation of the guests who are to partake of the Lord's supper, d) for the special application of the remission of sins, e) for the consolation of afflicted consciences.

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, Anabaptists & Weigelians, who abominate private confession and absolution. They attack our assertion with the following arguments;

I. Whatever confession enervates and subverts ecclesiastical discipline, that is to be abrogated; Private confession of sins before a minister of the church &c. Therefore. The minor is proven; because formerly malicious sinners, when they had once turned away from grave sins and returned to their vomit, were exterminated from the embrace of the church. Resp. Ecclesiastical discipline is not taken away by private confession of sins, but only the degrees of ecclesiastical censure are observed, according to the admonition of Christ, Matth. XVIII, 15. Public ecclesiastical censure, by which sinners are barred from the use of the sacraments, is to be used modestly and prudently.

II. Whatever pertains to the relics of popery, that is to be abrogated; Private confession of sins &c. Therefore. Resp. There is a great difference between the confession used among the Papists and the Evangelicals. The former is a confession of sins, special and circumstantial; the latter is a general confession of all sins and only respectively special, viz. with respect to the sin pricking the conscience. The former is considered absolutely necessary; the latter is seemly by reason of order, useful by reason of solace, just by reason of a scandalized neighbor. The former is held to be meritorious; the latter is declarative of internal penitence. The former is a way to desperation; the latter to consolation and the δοκιμασία (testing) of the conscience.

III. Whatever confession brings with it very many inconveniences, that is to be abrogated: Private confession &c. Therefore. The minor is proven; because a special confession of a more atrocious sin a) casts a man into the most present danger to his reputation and life; b) establishes the avarice of the ministers of the church, who eagerly receive penitential money; c) inflames envy among them, when one has a smaller, another a larger number of confessants. Resp. a) A special confession of an enormous offense is not held by us to be simply, but only hypothetically necessary, for a fuller exoneration and information of the conscience, but the confessor should impress the seal of silence on his mouth. b) Penitential monies have been abrogated in certain orthodox churches, in some they are offered to the ministers of the divine word as gratuitous gifts, not as prices by which the remission of sins is for sale. c) Envy is of dogs, not of the ministers of the church; that it should arise by accident, detracts nothing from confession itself.

Question XXV. Does temporal punishment remain after the guilt is remitted, to be redeemed by one's own satisfactions?

After the guilt is remitted, no τιμωρία, or punishment, properly so called, threatens converted and justified sinners a); yet sometimes παιδεία, or fatherly chastisement and medicinal affliction, remains b).

Prob a, 1) From the perfect remission of guilt; For whomever all guilt is remitted, in them no guilt of punishment remains. But for all believers guilt is remitted, Acts X, 43. Therefore. The major is confirmed from the relation of guilt and punishment. Where there is no guilt, there is no place for punishment; since it is the vindication of guilt.

2) From the explicit testimony of the Apostle, saying, Rom. VIII, 1. "There is therefore now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus." Where there is no condemnation, there is no guilt of punishment.

3) From the parabolic illustration. The heavenly King not only remits the debts to the servant burdened with very great debts, but also the punishments, Matth. XVIII, 32.

4) Christ most fully satisfied divine justice, not only deriving our sins upon Himself, but also the punishments of sins, Is. LIII, 5. For which reason, much is derogated from the most cumulative satisfaction of Christ by the persuasion of one's own satisfaction.

5) From the defect of our powers to satisfy God. To render satisfaction to God requires infinite virtue, which no mere man possesses. For which cause our redeemer had to be God, so that He could pay a λύτρον ἰσόρροπον, a most sufficient price of redemption, to divine justice.

Prob. b. "For whom the Lord loves He chastens (παιδεύει)," Hebr, XII, 6. & 1 Cor. XI, 32. "We are chastened (παιδευόμεθα) by the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world." Therefore, παιδεία, chastisement, is imposed on the faithful, which arises not from an angry God, but a placated one, and does not lead to condemnation, but to the amendment of the chastised.

Antithesis is that of the Papists, who impose various satisfactions on the penitent for temporal punishments. (*). Moreover,

(*) It can hardly be said what a great troop of many others is closely joined with this error. 1) What is the foremost πρῶτον ψεῦδος (first falsehood), they think that Christ indeed took upon Himself the entire guilt of our sins, but did not bear all the vicarious punishments, but only the eternal ones. a) They feel, therefore, that each one must still make satisfaction for temporal punishments, either after death, in the fire they have invented, purgatory, or before their last day. 3) Satisfaction in this life, in their opinion, is rendered in various ways, but especially in these three: fasting, to which they refer all stricter discipline; 4) liberality towards the poor, or, as they commonly say, almsgiving, as well as prayer. 5) In explaining the definition of each of these, they err vehemently and greatly. 6) They admit a manifest contradiction of things; and not just one; For a) a duty always owed can never become a satisfaction for another and neglected duty; b) All satisfaction for undergoing punishment cannot but be the suffering of an evil, to be felt with a sad mind; but the exercises of their duties are surely good actions, to be undertaken with a cheerful mind, see e.g. Rom. XII, 8.

they assign three kinds of satisfactory works: Prayer, fasting, and almsgiving.

They refer to prayer those things which are exhibited immediately to God, as praises, acts of thanksgiving, acts of contrition and confession; To fasting, those things which afflict the body, and are repugnant to the concupiscence of the flesh, as are hair-shirts, ashes, flagellations; To alms, all works of mercy, which are repugnant to avarice, and lead to the utility of the neighbor. They rely on the following arguments:

I. A punishment was announced to King David after his guilt was remitted, 2 Sam. XII, 14. Resp. Distinguish between τιμωρία, or punishment, inflicted by an angry God, and between παιδεία, or chastisement, sent by a placated God. Not the former, but the latter was announced to David, so that it might be both a memorial of a most grave past lapse, and a προφυλακτική medicine, preserving from sins. AUGUSTINE elegantly says: "Calamities before remission are punishments, after remission they are contests and exercises of the pious."

II. The prophet Daniel gave King Nebuchadnezzar this counsel: "Redeem your sins with alms," Dan. IV, 24. Resp. In the original text it has פָּרַק, which means, "he broke off." Whence in the source the words flow thus. "Therefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable to you, that you break off (change) your sins into righteousness, and your iniquities into mercy on the afflicted." From this it is clear that in that place is not understood a satisfactory redemption, but an emendatory change.

III. Tob, XII, 9. The angel Gabriel says: "Almsgiving delivers from death, and it is that which purges sins, and makes one find mercy and life." Resp. 1) The Book of Tobit is apocryphal. b) It is understood as a liberation from an untimely death, which God often averts from those who are beneficent to the poor out of true charity, Ps. XLI, 1, not as if beneficence were satisfactory for punishment, but because God compensates it out of grace. c) Almsgiving purges not past sins, but future ones, by inducing a habit opposite to the former. For while a man studies beneficence, he avoids avarice, rapacity, inhumanity, and similar vices. d) The last words in the source sound thus: "They who do alms and righteousness shall be filled with a long and lasting life."

IV. The penitent Ninevites fasted, clothed themselves in sackcloth, sprinkled themselves with ashes &c. to make satisfaction for temporal punishments. Jonah III, 5. Resp. Those were not satisfactory works, but external signs and testimonies of internal penitence.

7) In a strange manner they impose on the penitent a punishment which he ought to inflict on himself. 8) They have subtly made a distinction of the satisfaction of passion, which is assigned to the purgatorial fire, and of satisfaction for averting it. But they also wish to appear very liberal and merciful. Namely 8) they say it is not so simply necessary that each one should make satisfaction for himself; but it is permissible for a miserable person, whose flesh and skin may perhaps be very tender, it is permissible therefore to redeem this burden, imposed on you, for a certain price. You ask, how? 9) They answer: by the benefit of indulgences. By whose authority? Why 10) that of the Roman Pontiff, as if he were truly the vicar of Christ. From where do they come? 11) From the treasury of the church, and indeed of the Roman one. And what is that treasury? 12) That, forsooth, in which the merits of holy men, collected for many centuries, and increased more cumulatively every year, are preserved with the greatest care. Who are those holy men? 13) Not all the blessedly deceased, but only those whom the Roman Prelate has judged worthy, whom he, moved by political reasons, has referred to the number of the saints, who are barbarously called canonized, and to whom others are thought inferior, whom they are accustomed to call beatified. About those blessed and saints, the matter is very uncertain, whether they are also blessed and holy by divine judgment, indeed it is agreed among all today that some of them were never even men. What finally are their merits? Namely, 14) as they say, works entirely excellent and abundant, or, as they love to speak barbarously, works of supererogation, which surpass the whole number of precepts, and which are thought to be sufficient not only for the saints themselves, but can also bring pardon of sins and salvation to many others. You are silent about more. What the ancient Doctors, at the time when a stricter ecclesiastical discipline flourished, were accustomed to signify by the name of satisfaction and indulgences, and how far their mind was from the sense of the Roman-Catholics, today no one fails to know, unless he who has brought a mind utterly foreign from the monuments of sacred history.

Instance: In the primitive church, canonical satisfactions were received in use. Resp. They were imposed on sinners who had lapsed into graver crimes, not to satisfy God for the punishment, but a) for the exercise and probation of serious penitence; b) for the example and terror of others; c) for the authority and reconciliation of the church offended by the scandal, to which satisfaction had to be made by an external declaration of penitence.

SUSPIRIUM

With the powers of grace, O most HOLY GOD, instruct and strengthen me, a most miserable sinner, that I may restrain and inhibit the vicious motions of my soul, lest they erupt into grave crimes! Give me, HEAVENLY FATHER, true and sincere penitence, give me a contrite heart, give to my head water, and a fountain of tears to my eyes, that by temporal weeping I may prevent the weeping and gnashing of teeth! Slay, I pray, my flesh, prone to evils, break and crush my hard heart, so that, the obstacle being removed, the spirit of faith may inhabit, live, and reign in me!

CHAPTER VII. ON FAITH IN CHRIST.

Question I. What is faith in Christ?

FAITH IN CHRIST is a gift of the Holy Spirit, by which a converted and reborn sinner salutarly recognizes the evangelical promise of God's grace and the remission of sins and eternal salvation, to be obtained on account of the satisfaction and merit of Christ, approves it with solid assent, and with singular trust applies it to himself, that he may be justified and be saved eternally.

Obs. Etymology. "Fides" is said from "fidendo" (from trusting), and so, by the force of the word, it is trust. CICERO indeed in Book 1 of De Officiis, c. 7, adduces another etymology of faith, saying: "We believe, because what is said, fiat (may it be done), faith was so named." But this is an allusion, not a genuine derivation.

Question II. What kind of faith is understood here?

Homonymy. It is not understood here as objective faith, or that which is believed; but subjective, by which one believes a): not false, or dead, but true and living b): not another's, but one's own c): not historical, or dogmatic, nor miraculous, but justifying d): not general, but special e): not considered absolutely, but relatively f).

Prob. a. Objective faith, or that which is believed, is the doctrine of faith; which is improperly called faith, because it is the object of faith. Conf. Acts VI, 7. c. XIII, 8. cap. XVI, 5. Rom. XII, 6. But subjective faith, or that by which one believes, is faith properly so called, which is in the believing man, as its subject.

Prob. b. False faith, or vain and dead faith, is equivocally called faith, since it is only an empty persuasion and boasting of faith, or a rash presumption concerning the mercy and grace of God, on account of the merit of Christ, in an impenitent man, indulging his sins, about which James in his epistle, chap. II, 20. Do you want to know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead and not saving? Our discussion here is about true and living faith (*), which has received its life from Christ, and when it has justified the converted sinner, it shows and manifests itself to be alive through charity and the study of good works.

Prob. c. We are not dealing at present with another's faith, by which the necessities of a neighbor are commended to God, and temporal and spiritual goods are obtained for him, Matth. IX, 2. but with one's own faith, about which the Prophet Habakkuk, c. II, 4. and with him Paul, Gal. III, 11. "The just shall live by his faith." As anyone naturally lives by his own soul; so anyone spiritually lives by his own faith. Observe, that by one's own faith here is not understood a faith of our own words and deeds, which is called faithfulness, integrity of soul, and candor; but the faith receiving the word of the gospel and the merit of Christ.

(*) The blessed Author said nothing superfluous, but deliberately employed both these epithets: true and living. Both are necessary, and opposed to the terrible error of the Roman Catholics, which they openly professed in their Council of Trent, Session VI. ch. 15. & can. 28: faith can be true, although it is not living; if anyone thinks otherwise, let him be ἀνάθεμα (anathema / accursed)! The false principle, from which so destructive a decree was born, is a false definition of faith, concerning which we shall see hereafter.

Prob. d. Historical faith, which is also called dogmatic, is twofold; one rests on human authority; the other on divine revelation. That the former is different from justifying faith is beyond doubt; saving faith embraces the latter; just as the rational soul embraces the vegetative and sensitive soul. But just as the vegetative soul in plants, and the sensitive in brutes exists without the rational soul; so historical faith exists without saving faith in hypocrites. For they know the documents of divine grace and the deeds of Christ externally and historically, so that they do not place their trust in Christ, the author of salvation. But trust is the complement, soul, and life of faith in Christ. Historical faith is found even in devils, Jas. II, 19. Moreover, the historical faith of impious men differs from the faith of demons; not indeed essentially, but accidentally: 1) In the principle of knowledge, which in impious men is only scripture, in demons also αυτοψία (seeing for oneself). 2) In the applicability of the object believed, which demons lack, but not men. The faith of miracles, or miraculous faith, is that by which we firmly resolve that what God has either predicted, or willed to be done, either by us, or by others, for our or others' benefit, will happen from the infinite and absolute power of God; Matth. XVII, 20. It is subdivided into active and passive. The former is that by which someone is divinely endowed with the special gift of performing miracles, Matth. XVI, 17. The latter is that by which a man certainly resolves that he will be a participant in the singular benefits which happen through miracles, Matth. IX, 27. But the faith of miracles differs from justifying faith. The former is an extraordinary and periodic gift; the latter is ordinary and perpetual. Without the former many have been saved; without the latter no one. The former is given in hypocrites and the impious, Matth. VII, 22. only the truly converted and reborn have the latter. The object of the former is the omnipotence of God; of the latter, His mercy. Yet miraculous faith is 1) a certain, as it were, image of saving faith. For Christ in visible miracles adumbrated His invisible grace, in healing the saving, in resurrection the vivifying, which the healed and the resurrected received, with no cooperation of their own good work. 2) The end of the same miraculous faith is saving faith, which if present, saves, not because it is miraculous, but because through the miracle that faith which is saving was excited. Confer. D. DANNHAV. in hodos. phanom. XI P. 1302.

Prob e. General faith is that by which a man to be saved believes all things to be true which have been revealed in the divine word; we are not now speaking of this general faith, because we consider faith as a means of salvation, and therefore in order to a special, or particular object, which has the power of recovering salvation, lost through sin, and in view of which faith can be reckoned among the means of salvation. Therefore, it is a special faith, by which a converted and reborn sinner applies to himself individually the universal promises concerning Christ the mediator and the grace of God, to be obtained through him, and believes that God wants to be propitious to him also, and to remit sins on account of the satisfaction of Christ, rendered for his and all men's sins. It is therefore called special faith, not because it has some special promise for its object, which was made particularly to the believer, but on account of the application, by which under the universal promise of the grace of God and the merit of Christ it descends to himself individually. Thus Job, making a profession of his faith, said: "I know that my redeemer lives," Job. XIX, 25. & Paul, Gal. II, 20. "The Son of God loved me, and gave Himself for me."

Prob f. Faith at present is not looked at absolutely, as it is a good work, pertaining to the first precept of the decalogue; but relatively, inasmuch as it looks to Christ, and apprehends his merit. To justify relatively is nothing other than to justify by the power of its correlate. Faith therefore justifies relatively, i.e., the thing believed, the merit of Christ apprehended by faith, justifies. The faith WHICH justifies is knowledge, assent, and trust &c. but faith, INASMUCH AS it justifies, is a naked reception of the benefits of the Messiah, passive, admitting the motions of the holy spirit, reposing, resting in the merits of Christ. Conf. D. DANNHAV. l. c. p. 1305.

Question III. In how many ways is the word, to believe, taken?

The word, to believe, is taken in three ways.

Prob. For it is one thing to believe God to be; another, to believe God; another, to believe in God. We believe God to be, by knowledge; we believe God, by assent; we believe in God by trust (*).

Question IV. What are the causes of faith?

The cause and means of kindling faith are the same as those of regeneration.

Prob. Regeneration is formally the conferring of the powers of believing, and the gift of faith itself. Therefore, it is pointless to deal here with the causes and means of kindling faith.

Question V. Who believes in Christ?

The subject of faith. Men believe in Christ a) who are sinners b), both converted and reborn adults c), and infants reborn through baptism d).

Prob. a. Only men are capable of faith in Christ, of whom he is the mediator, 1 Tim. II, 5. The devils believe that Christ is the Son of God and the supreme judge (see Matth, VIII, 29); but they tremble, Jas. II, 19. Therefore they do not place their trust in Christ, as their mediator and the author of their salvation.

Prob. b. Just as Christ was given not to whole, but to fallen men as a mediator, Matth. I, 21; so faith in Christ was not in man in his state of integrity, but is only given in sinful man.

Prob. c. True and saving faith is not in those who lack contrition and have the purpose of continuing and persevering in sins, says the Form. concord. p. 688. Wherefore it is necessary that the sinner, indulging the desires of the flesh, be converted from the darkness of sin to the light of faith, Acts XXVI, 16. But the light of faith is kindled by the grace of regeneration; For everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God, 1 John V, 1.

Prob. d. Baptized infants put on Christ, Gal. III, 27. Therefore, they believe in Christ. But we have treated more fully of the faith of infants in the preceding section, c. IV.

Question VI. Is faith in the intellect, or in the will of man?

The subject in which. Faith is in the intellect, by reason of knowledge and assent; in the will, by reason of trust.

Prob. 1) The converted and reborn sinner not only believes that Jesus is the Christ, 1 John V, 1, by an act of knowledge and assent, which is in the intellect; but also believes in Christ, John III, 36, by an act of trust, which is in the will.

2) The promise of the gospel, which is the object of faith, proceeds not only from the knowledge, but also from the will of God; Therefore, the acceptance of the promise is not only an act of the intellect, but also of the will.

3) The converted and reborn sinner receives the promise of the gospel as true, with the intellect; as good for himself, with the will. With the intellect he knows and approves the truth of the promise; with the will he embraces, and with singular trust appropriates to himself its goodness.

Antithesis is that of Bellarmine, who maintains, book I. de iustificat, c. 6, that faith cannot exist simultaneously in the intellect and the will, because one virtue cannot be in two powers, distinct in kind. But the hypothesis of Bellarmine, that one virtue cannot be in two powers, fails in a composite unity, through collection and subordination. SUAREZ. tom. II. disput. 44. sect. 4. num. 4. says: "One virtue of faith is composed of a habit of the intellect and a pious affection in the will." THOMAS AQUINAS, cited by D. GERHARD in confess. cathol. f. m. 1459, says: "Something is said to be in two principles first in this way, that it is equally in both; In this way it is impossible for one virtue to be in two powers. Secondly, in a certain order; and thus one virtue can pertain to several powers, so that it is principally in one and extends to the others by way of diffusion or disposition." Thus the image of God consists in the concreated wisdom of the intellect and the integrity of the will. Free will is in the intellect, by reason of choice, in the will, by reason of freedom. Heresy respects in part the intellect, in part the affection, says ALEXANDER of HALES, cited by D. SCHERZER in system. p. m. 300. Prudence is in the intellect, by reason of consultation; in the will, by reason of election. Prayer, as defined by THOMAS in 2. Question 83. art. 1. is an act of practical reason, explaining the desire of the will, and postulating something from another. Which BELLARMINE himself

(*) A clearly exceptional place, in which those three propositions are joined, is found in John XIV, 10. "Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me?" v. 11: "believe Me," & v. 12: "he who believes in Me." We use the word, to believe, in this place, not as it is customary in Latin, but as it is in scripture.

in lib. I. de bonis operibus c. 1. explains thus: "The intellect and the affection concur in praying. The affection concurs by desiring that good which it lacks; the intellect, indeed, by explaining and proposing that desire." From which it is evident that a distinction must be made between a simple habit, which cannot be in different powers, and an aggregated, or composite habit from different acts terminated to the same object, and indeed having an order among themselves to one and the same object, which can reside in distinct faculties.

Question VII. What is the object which faith regards?

The object of faith. The object of general, or dogmatic, faith is every revealed word of God a). The object of special, or saving, faith is Christ the mediator, inasmuch as he is offered to us by the evangelical promise as the meritorious cause of God and the remission of sins b); or, which is the same, the grace of God, remitting sins on account of the satisfaction of Christ, and promised in the gospel c); or, which amounts to the same thing, the evangelical promise of the grace of God and the remission of sins, to be obtained on account of the satisfaction of Christ d).

Obs. One thing, as to the matter, is signified as the object of trust, whether you say it consists in Christ the mediator, or in the grace of God, or in the promise of grace, made on account of Christ the mediator. There is only a diversity in the mode of conceiving and speaking. For by the first mode of speaking, the reason of the object is constituted in Christ the mediator, as the meritorious cause of the grace repaired and promised to us, and the grace of God repaired for us by him is connoted. By the second, however, the reason of the object is constituted in the grace of God repaired by Christ, remitting sins, as in the internal impulsive cause of God, but Christ, as its meritorious cause, if not expressed in words at the same time, is yet tacitly understood. By the third mode of speaking, finally, the reason of the object is constituted in the promises of the remission of sins on account of Christ, which proceeds from the satisfaction of Christ and the grace of God, and by which both, namely the merit of the mediator and the mercy of God, are offered to us. In whatever way, therefore, you speak, the trust of a man about to obtain remission of sins with God will always return to one and the same object, namely Christ the mediator, inasmuch as he is the cause of the repaired mercy of God for us, and of the remission of sins to be obtained with God. Vid. D. MUSEI disp. III. de conv. p. 179.

Prob. a. Dogmatic, or general, faith is directed to every word of God, inasmuch as it is of God, 1 Thess. II, 13, to which, on account of the authority of God revealing, indubitable assent must be rendered.

Prob. b. Special, or justifying, faith is directed to Christ, as the meritorious cause of the remission of sins, and of eternal salvation; about which John, rep. II, 2: "Christ is the propitiation for our sins," and Paul, Rom. III, 25. "God set forth Christ as a ἱλαστήριον, a propitiation through faith in His blood," q.d. Because Christ by satisfaction for our sins has made God propitious to us, let us fix the trust of obtaining the remission of sins in the blood of Christ. This object of faith is such that, when it is posited and applied, justification itself is posited and the question is satisfied; on account of what are we justified and saved? This is evident from Acts XVI, 31, where we read that to the question of the jailer at Philippi: "What must I do to be saved?" the Apostles answered roundly: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved, you and your household." Whence we argue: On whom we ought to believe, because he is the cause of the remission of sins and eternal salvation, he is the object of saving faith, which it regards. But on the Lord Jesus Christ &c. Therefore.

Prob. c. From Rom. III, 24. "Being justified freely by His (God's) grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." Whence we argue: By whatever we are justified, to that, as an object, justifying faith is directed: But we are justified by the grace of God, reconciled to us by the redemption of Christ: Therefore.

Prob. d. 1) From Rom. IV, 16. "Therefore it is of faith that it might be according to grace, so that the promise might be sure." That on which faith firmly rests, that is its object: Faith firmly rests on the promise of divine grace: Therefore.

2) From Gal. III, 22. "But the Scripture has confined all under sin, that the promise by faith might be given to those who believe." The Apostle understands the federal, or testamentary promise concerning the seed of Abraham, which is Christ, v. 16. & 19. Just as this promise was given to believers; so it is to be received by true faith for salvation, which the Apostle teaches, 1 Tim. 1, 15. "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." It is gathered from these things that the promise of Christ, the author of salvation, was given so that it might be accepted by believers for eternal salvation. But whatever is given to a believer, so that he may apprehend salvation by faith, that is the object of saving faith.

Antithesis is that of the Papists, who maintain that the object of faith extends as widely as the word of God. They object to us:

I. Whatever is to be believed on account of the authority of God revealing, that is the object of justifying faith; But every word of God &c; Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between general, or dogmatic, faith, and special, or saving, faith. The object of the former is every word of God, even the word of the law, from which, however, there is no justification, Gal. III, 11. The object of the latter is the evangelical promise, Gal. III, 22.

II. The object of faith, comprehended in the apostolic symbol, is the object of justifying faith; The object of faith, comprehended in the apostolic symbol, is not only mercy in Christ; Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between the common and the proper object of justifying faith. Justifying faith does not exclude the common object, namely the doctrine of faith concerning the Holy Trinity, creation, preservation, and governance; but it supposes or includes it. But just as the sum, scope, end, and goal of the whole scripture is Christ in his mediatorial office, John XX, 31; so saving faith, although it generally assents to the entire word of God, with a special reason looks to the scope of the whole scripture, and refers all other articles to the promise of grace, on account of Christ the mediator. Just as AUGUSTINE, book II. on the trinity, discerns the faith of Christians from the faith of demons by the last articles: "I believe in the remission of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting." And faith is busied in vain about the other objects of scripture, if it does not hold the head of scripture, Christ, Col. II, 19, says CHEMNITZ, in loc. theol. de iustific. f. m. 268.

Instance: In the apostolic symbol not a word is had about the special mercy of God. Resp. The name of Father, Savior, Sanctifier, remission of sins, breathes mere grace and mercy. When I confess: "I believe in the remission of sins," I apply to myself individually the universal mercy of God, founded on the merit of Christ. For the meaning here is not: I believe that the gift of remission is in the church; since even the demons believe this; but this is the meaning: I believe that God wants to remit my sins.

III. Whatever faith regards the power of Christ, its adequate object is not the mercy of God, proposed to us in Christ; But the faith of penitent men &c. Therefore. The major is established; because the power of Christ and the mercy of God differ greatly. Christ also exerts His power on the impious, on whom God does not have mercy. The minor is established by the example of the blind men, Matth. IX, 28. "Do you believe that I am able to do this?" The blind men answered: "Yes, Lord." Resp. 1) The passage speaks of miraculous faith, not justifying faith. 2) The faith which justifies, regards the power of Christ as a common object; but inasmuch as it justifies, it is directed with a special reason to the mercy of God, remitting sins on account of the satisfaction of Christ. Christ exercises His power on many who are not justified.

IV. Whatever faith is directed to the divinity of Christ, its object is not the special mercy of God; But justifying faith &c; Therefore. The minor is proven by the example of Simon Peter, Matth. XVI, 16. saying: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." Where Peter's faith did not regard the mercy of God, but the divinity of Christ. Resp. The divinity of Christ the God-man is not to be opposed to the mercy of God, because the latter is founded on the merit of Christ, but to be joined with it. The grace of God would not have been repaired, unless Christ, God and man, had begotten it for us by His merit.

V. Luke XVIII, 11. The Pharisee confessed that he was just, and therefore praying said: "God, I thank You that I am not like other men." Here he placed his trust in the mercy of God, and yet was not justified. Resp. The trust of the Pharisee was hypocritical and mercenary, resting on his own works, not on the merit of Christ. For he stood in the temple, as if proudly and arrogantly discoursing with God about his own justice; but not, like the publican, fleeing with a contrite heart to the mercy of God repaired by the merit of Christ.

Instance: The publican in his penitential vow makes no mention of Christ. Resp. The publican prays: "God ἰλάσθητί μοι," as if to say: "on account of the ἰλαστήριον, which is Christ, in whom I trust, have mercy on me."

VI. The object of justifying faith is the resurrection of Christ, as Paul teaches, Rom. X, 9: Therefore not the mercy of God. Resp. The Papists play with the elenchus of opposites; for the resurrection of Christ does not exclude the mercy of God. Christ rose, as our sponsor, by whose release from the prison of death it became most clear that the grace of God has been reconciled to us. Vid. Rom. IV, 25.

VII. Whatever object was not of the faith of Abraham, that is not the object of our justifying faith (for Abraham is the father of believers, Rom. IV, 11.); But the mercy of God, obtained by the merit of Christ, was not the object of the faith of Abraham. Therefore. The minor is established; because Abraham believed that he would be from a ninety-year-old and sterile woman the father of many nations, Rom. IV, 17. Resp. Distinguish between the primary and secondary object of Abraham's faith. The former was the promise of mercy, on account of Christ, that blessed seed, Gal. III, 16; the latter was the promise of the bodily fecundity of Sarah. For since all promises of other goods are yes and amen in Christ, according to 2 Cor. I, 20, Abraham could not have believed that he would obtain a promised son from Sarah, and other bodily goods, unless he had first had faith in the Messiah, or Christ the mediator, and had believed that he had God propitious to him on account of His satisfaction, to be rendered for his sins in the fullness of time.

Question VIII. Is Christ the mediator the primary or secondary object of faith?

Christ is true God a), and for all who believe in him the cause of the remission of sins b) and of eternal life c), and therefore is not the secondary, but the primary object of justifying faith.

Prob. a. From 1 John V, 20. "This (Jesus Christ) is the true God and eternal life."

Prob. b. From Acts X, 43. "To Him all the prophets witness that, through His name, whoever believes in Him will receive remission of sins."

Prob. c. From John III, 16. "Whoever believes in Him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that trust is to be placed in God as the primary object, but in Christ as a secondary object (*). They argue:

As to obedience, they refer it to the commands of God, not only the old, which they say were not abrogated by Christ, but also new ones, by which they dream that the moral law was enlarged by Christ.

I. He who is not the ultimate purpose of faith is not the primary object of trust; But Christ, etc.; Therefore. They attempt to prove the minor premise from John XII, 44, "He who believes in me, does not believe in me, but in him who sent me." Response: The cited words are to be understood not in an opposite or exclusive sense, but in a composite and inclusive sense, with this meaning: He who believes in me, does not believe in me only, but also in him who sent me.

II. The one through whom we believe in God is not the primary object of faith; But through Christ, etc.; Therefore. The major premise is clear; because the one through whom we believe in God, our trust does not rest in him, but through him it tends toward the ultimate end, namely God. The minor is proven from 1 Peter I, 21. "Through Christ you believe in God, who raised him from the dead." Response: Peter here considers Christ with respect to his prophetic office, and in view of that he says that through him, who informs us of the will of God, we believe in God. Notwithstanding this, it is also correctly said that we believe in Christ, the true God, 1 John V, 20, the author of salvation, Acts IV, 12, the leader and perfecter of faith, Hebrews XII, 2, to be honored equally with the Father, John V, 23.

(*) The Socinians, with whom in this matter the Remonstrants also, as in nearly all things, agree, constitute two parts of faith, namely trust and obedience. See the Racovian Catechism, sect. VI, chap. 9. But these are indeed false; 1) this division, since Holy Scripture declares obedience to proceed from faith itself, as a necessary effect from its cause, 2 Peter 1:5, 10; 2:11; 3:6. The effect, however, is not a part of the same. Also false is 2) the explanation of this division. For by trust they understand nothing more than a certain expectation of good things, which God promised to us through Christ, the interpreter of the divine will, not meriting but promising, not by his own authority but in the name of the Father. Thus they first deny the satisfaction of Christ as meritorious; then, moreover, they plainly confound among themselves 1) that faith which is toward God and that faith which is toward Christ, which is expressly said to be in his blood, since in him we have the atoning sacrifice, Romans III, 25; and faith in him, Romans V, 1, 2, 3; so that I may pass over in silence many more modes of difference.

Question IX. Does justifying faith concern universal promises, or special and singular ones?

Justifying faith, before the act of justification, is presented with universal promises concerning the mercy of God, who remits sins for Christ's sake a), which promises the converted and reborn sinner, in the very act of justification, applies to himself individually and specifically, and relies on them with firm trust b). This application is perfected and strengthened by the solving key of the ministry c), the sacrament of baptism d), and the Lord's supper e).

Proof a. The divine promises concerning the grace of God and the remission of sins, to be obtained for Christ's sake, are universal, and they promise eternal salvation to all who accept them with true faith, for example: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten son, that whoever believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life," John III, 16. "Whoever believes in him will not be ashamed," Romans X, 11. "To him all the prophets bear witness, that everyone who believes in him receives remission of sins through his name." Acts X, 43. These universal promises are laid under justifying faith as a solid foundation, so that it can validly rest upon them.

Proof b. The converted sinner, in order to obtain the remission of sins and eternal salvation, should descend from the universal propositions to himself as an individual, and believe with certainty that for him also, in particular, the grace of God and remission of sins have been restored through Christ, and that God is now willing to remit his sins as well. For this is the force of universal signs: that when added to some common term, what is said of the common term is signified to apply to all the singulars contained under it. Which also in the present matter, for this purpose are so often added and inculcated in the scriptures, that sinners, anxious and troubled about their sins, may lift themselves up by the universality of the satisfaction rendered by Christ for all sins, and of the grace and remission of sins thereby restored, and that they may and should safely and firmly believe that these things pertain also to them as individuals. Thus says the royal Prophet: "God remits all my sins," Psalm CIII, 3. and Paul: "Christ loved me, and gave himself for me," Galatians II, 20. "Therefore I have obtained mercy," 1 Timothy 1, 16.

Proof c. Etus, Rom. V, 1. 2. 3. to now pass over in silence the many modes of difference. As for obedience, they refer it to the commands of God, not only the ancient ones not abrogated by Christ, but also new ones, by which they dream that the moral law was augmented by Christ.

Proof c. The solving key of the ministry contributes greatly to individual application. For when the minister of the word addresses the penitent sinner with the solemn formula of words: "I absolve you from your sins in the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit;" the contrite sinner receives this absolution with special faith: "I am now absolved from my sins in the name of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit."

Proof d. From Galatians III, 27. "Those who have been baptized have put on Christ." In baptism, anyone who is baptized apprehends the righteousness of Christ with the hand of faith, as a most beautiful garment, and puts it on himself.

Proof e. In the distribution of the Holy Supper, each communicant eats the body of Christ and drinks his blood for the remission of sins. From which the penitent sinner concludes and believes: As truly as I eat the body of Christ and drink his blood, so truly do I receive the remission of sins.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who state that no one can believe, by the power of the divine promises, that God is willing to be propitious to him also in particular and to remit sins for Christ's sake (*).

Their arguments are: I. Whatever has not been revealed by God is not an object of justifying faith: The special promise, that (*) "If anyone believes with certainty that his sins are forgiven him, and that he has returned to grace with God, they think this is known to him not from the universality of the evangelical promise, but from some special revelation. This they are accustomed to call privileged faith. The Reformed also oppose our doctrine, since they deny that saving grace is common to all and every man, certainly obtained and offered for each, or, as is customary to say, universal."

God is willing to remit the sins of me, you, CHRISTOPHER, MARTIN, etc., has not been divinely revealed; Therefore, that special promise is not an object of justifying faith. Response; 1) A distinction is made between the object of faith and its act. Faith in Christ, which is also called special faith, has as its proper object the promises of God's grace and the remission of sins for Christ's sake, and these are not particular and made to each one individually, but universal, made to all universally. The proper act of faith, on the part of the intellect, is a special assent, by which the penitent sinner is so carried into the universal promises that under their universality he descends to himself, and applies them to himself as an individual, and believes that in them grace and the remission of sins for Christ's sake are offered and promised to him in particular as well. This is what our D. CHEMNITIUS teaches excellently in his examination of the Council of Trent, p. 163. "With knowledge must be joined assent, not indeed merely general, but by which, with firm persuasion, each believer may determine that the universal promise privately (individually) pertains also to himself, that he also is included and comprehended in that universal promise." 2) God himself applies the universal promise to me; "I, even I, am he who blots out your iniquities for my own sake, and I will not remember your sins," Isaiah XLIII, 25. which divine promise I eagerly accept and believe pertains to me. 3) God offers and exhibits to me the indeterminate promise of grace determinately and as an individual through the solving key and through the sacraments, so that I can say intrepidly: I believe the remission of my sins.

II. He to whom it has not been divinely revealed that he has true faith in Christ, cannot, under the universal promises of grace, descend to himself with the assent of faith and believe that God is willing to be propitious to him and to remit sins for Christ's sake. To no sinner has it been divinely revealed etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the promises of God's grace and remission of sins include faith itself, John III, 16. Acts X, 43. Response; 1) Deny the major premise; because although it is divinely revealed to no one that he has true faith, yet the converted and reborn sinner is certain of his faith, a) from the co-witnessing of the divine spirit with our spirit, Romans VIII, 16. b) From testing, 2 Corinthians XIII, 5. 2) For special faith it is sufficient that the penitent sinner believes in Christ his mediator, who has merited for him in particular the grace of God and the remission of sins by his satisfaction, nor is it required that he believe that he believes with an assent based on divine revelation. For the faith which is included in those promises does not relate to special faith as an object to be believed, but is itself special faith.

III. Justifying faith precedes the remission of sins; the special faith by which one believes that his sins are remitted for Christ's sake does not precede the remission of sins; Therefore. The major is proven; because justifying faith is the cause of the remission of sins. But the cause is prior to the effect. The minor is clear; because when one believes that his sins are remitted to him, he is already justified, and so this act of faith is subsequent to justification. Response; Special faith is not correctly explained. For special faith is that by which one, under the universal promise of grace, descends to himself as an individual and believes that God is willing to be propitious to him also in particular, and to remit his sins now, for the sake of Christ's satisfaction, rendered for his own sins and for the sins of the whole world. But that act of faith by which one believes that his sins are remitted to him is not formally justifying faith, but an act of faith which has justified.

Question X. What is the twofold power, force, and office of faith in Christ? The duty of faith.

The force and power (ἐνέργεια) of faith is twofold; receptive, or apprehensive, and operative. The former is that by which faith passively receives Christ and all the benefits obtained by his merit a). The latter is that by which faith actively exerts itself through works of charity and the other virtues b).

Proof a. The passages of scripture testify concerning the taking (λήψις), or apprehension of Christ and his benefits, John, I, 12. c. XVII, 8. Col. II, 6. 1 Tim. I, 15. Rom. V, 17. Acts X, 43. James. I, 12. Gal. III, 14.

Proof b. From Galatians V, 6. "Faith works through charity." D. HULSEMANNUS skillfully explains these words, as cited by CALOVIUS in his illustrated bible on this passage, p. 624. "That epithet, to work through charity, is an attribute of faith that has justified, not an attribute of faith that is about to justify, much less the form or essence of justifying faith, insofar as it justifies. For the Apostle is not describing the office of justifying faith, insofar as it justifies, but another office of faith, namely to work through charity, to the praise of God and the utility of the neighbor."

Obs. I. The distinction of the twofold power of faith is of no light moment; because by it the twin office of faith, and the twin effect resulting from it, is expressed. D. BRENTIUS in his apology for the Württemberg Confession, p. 319, explains this distinction thus: "Faith, so to speak, has two hands: one, which it extends upward, and apprehends Christ with all his benefits, and by this part we are said to be justified; the other, which it extends downward to perform works of charity and the other virtues, and by this part we indeed testify to the truth of faith, but we are not justified." D. CALOVIUS in his theological system vol. X. p. 326. says: "The Holy Scriptures attribute a twofold act to saving faith: 1) the formal, as it is called in the schools, which is the apprehension of divine grace founded in the merit of Christ, or, what is the same, the merit of Christ, insofar as divine grace is reconciled to us by it; 2) the effective, they say, by which it extends itself now not to Christ the mediator, but to God and the neighbor, and embraces them with charity."

Obs. II. Although, by reason of its twofold power and effect, faith can be distinguished into justifying and operating, or sanctifying; yet essentially it is one faith; just as in man the rational, sensitive, and vegetative soul is in itself one.

Question XI. In what does justifying faith formally consist?

The form of faith, which justifies, consists in the taking (λήψις), apprehension, reception and special application of the justifying object, which is the satisfaction of Christ, and the grace of God obtained thereby, remitting sins, promised in the gospel. For justifying faith receives the evangelical promise a), in the promise Christ b), in Christ divine grace c), from the grace of God the remission of sins d), and eternal life e). The form of justifying faith.

Obs. I. Here is understood an apprehension, or reception, not corporal, but spiritual, which takes place in the intellect and will of the converted sinner, and is therefore metaphorical, a similitude drawn from a hand apprehending a friend, or some other thing, e.g., an alms. For justifying faith is a receptive organ, and as it were the hand of a miserable sinner, by which he applies to himself, and receives to himself, embraces and possesses those things which are offered in the gratuitous promise of the gospel. God, the supreme King, from heaven extends the hand of grace, obtained by the merit of Christ, and in it offers salvation; the sinner, constituted in the abyss of misery, with the begging hand of faith accepts what is offered. The offering and the reception are correlates. Wherefore, let the hand of faith, which apprehends and receives the offered treasure, correspond to the hand of grace, which offers the treasure of righteousness and salvation.

Obs. II. Intellectual apprehension among the philosophers, taken in a stricter sense, is referred to the first operation of the mind, and is truly called with an apposite term simple apprehension, or apprehension of simples. But in this place, to apprehend is the same as, on the part of the intellect, to transfer a thing to oneself by knowing it, but on the part of the will, to be carried toward the known thing, as being good for oneself, and to accept it, and to hold it as if enclosed in the hand, lest it be snatched away, e.g., King David promised Mephibosheth that he would daily take the sustenance of life from the royal table, 2 Samuel IX, 7. Mephibosheth apprehended the promise with his intellect, as true; with his will, as good. With his intellect he apprehended it by knowing; with his will, by desiring and adhering to it.

Obs. III. The reception of Christ by faith is also called in the sacred letters the "putting on of Christ," Galatians III, 27. The spiritual "taste, eating and drinking of Christ," Psalm XXXIV, 9. John VI, 50. and even κόλλησις, or a gluing together with Christ into one spirit, 1 Corinthians VI, 17. and therefore implies a certain union, such as is between the apprehending hand and the apprehended treasure, and is called the formal union of faith, distinct from the mystical union, as its effect. The rejection of Christ, of grace, of the gospel is opposed to the reception of Christ by faith.

Proof a. From Galatians III, 13, 14, where Paul teaches that Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith (ἵνα... λάβωμεν). Namely, the promise of the Holy Spirit concerning the remission of sins, to be obtained for the sake of Christ's redemption, is not accepted except by faith.

Proof b. From John I, 12. "But as many as received (ἔλαβον) him, to them he gave the power to become children of God, to those who believe in his name." By which statement of John, to believe in the name of Christ is explained by receiving him, as a most desired guest and greatest King. Paul agrees, Colossians II, 6. "As you have therefore received (παρελάβετε) Christ; so walk in him."

Proof c. From Romans V, 17. "For if by one man's offense death reigned through the one; much more will they who receive (λαμβάνοντες) abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness reign in life."

Proof d. St. Paul excellently describes faith, that it receives the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness, and therefore he warns, Hebrews IV, 16. "Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy." From Acts X, 43. "To this (Christ) all the prophets bear witness, that everyone who believes in him receives remission of sins through his name."

Proof e. From Revelation II, 10. "Be faithful until death; Then I will give you the crown of life." The crown of life is given to the faithful, that they may receive and carry it away, as the end of faith, 1 Peter 1, 9.

Question XII. How manyfold is the apprehension or reception of the merit of Christ and the mercy of God founded on it?

The apprehension, or reception of the merit of Christ, and of the mercy of God founded on it, is threefold: cognitive, which is through knowledge; approbative, which is through assent; appropriative, or adhesive, through trust. Apprehension or reception of the merit of Christ, how manyfold.

Proof. We apprehend Christ the mediator by knowing his universal merit, by applying it to ourselves with special assent, and by embracing it with singular trust, and firmly adhering to it.

The antithesis is that of BELLARMINE, who in book I on justification, ch. XVI, denies that apprehension formally belongs to faith, moved by the following little reasons:

1. Whatever does not pertain to the first operation of the mind, intellectual apprehension does not belong to it; Faith does not etc.; Therefore. The major is established; because apprehension is commonly referred to the first operation of the mind. The minor; because faith is an assent, which is in the judgment, which does not apprehend a thing, but discerns whether it is true or false. Response; 1) Faith is not only assent, but also knowledge and trust. 2) Every cognition of the intellect is an apprehension, although it may not be a simple apprehension, but a judgmental or discursive one. By judgment we know and apprehend the union of one thing with another, or its division from another. 3) To apprehend here signifies, on the part of the intellect, to transfer something to oneself by knowing it, or to know a thing with its application to the knower, which is done through special assent.

II. To trust is not to apprehend, but to adhere firmly; Therefore, apprehension does not belong to trust, but firm adhesion. Response; Apprehension and firm adhesion are not opposites. Joab, 2 Kings II, 28, apprehended the horns of the altar, and so strongly adhered to them that he could not be pulled away from them.

III. If Christ is not made objectively present through trust, he is not apprehended by it; The antecedent is true; Therefore so is the consequent. The reason for the consequence is; because the intellect indeed apprehends Christ, while by knowing it makes him objectively present to itself; but trust rests in the present Christ. But to rest in something does not mean to apprehend someone. Response; A distinction is made between the apprehension of the intellect and of the will. The intellect apprehends Christ the mediator when it not only makes him objectively present by knowing, but also applies his universal merit to the converted sinner; but the will embraces the already present mediator Christ with singular trust, and firmly adheres to him.

IV. Whatever apprehends Christ, according to the opinion of the Lutherans, is faith; But love and joy apprehend Christ; Therefore, love and joy, if the opinion of the Lutherans is true, are faith. The Cardinal proves the minor from AUGUSTINE, Confessions, book VIII, ch. 2. "They all wanted to seize him and carry him into their heart, and they seized him by loving and rejoicing. These were the hands of those who seized." Response; 1) Trust embraces Christ as a present good, related as a cause for obtaining for us another arduous and difficult good, namely the grace of God and the remission of sins. But love does not apprehend Christ under the relation of a cause to obtain for us grace and the remission of sins, but absolutely as the highest good. Nor is love an act of concupiscence, by which we wish Christ as a good suitable for us, and in him other goods for ourselves, which is required for fiducial apprehension; but it is an act of benevolence towards Christ, by which we wish well to Christ himself, and by the fruit of his benefits we are excited to signify a grateful mind, and to the right uses of grace received. 2) Joy does not have for its object Christ the mediator as the cause of grace and remission of sins yet to be obtained; but as all joy is about a good obtained and possessed; so joy in Christ has for its object Christ the mediator, as the cause of grace and remission of sins actually obtained, already apprehended and possessed, and it is a complacency, or a certain spiritual delight in Christ the mediator, already fiducially apprehended, and in the remission of sins obtained through him.

Question XIII. How many are the acts, degrees, or parts of justifying faith?

Acts or parts of faith. The acts, degrees, or parts of justifying faith, by which it apprehends the justifying object, are three: Knowledge, assent, and trust. (*).

Obs. Theologians devoted to the Augsburg Confession differ in enumerating the acts of faith. Some favor a bipartite division, among whom is D. IO. MUSAEUS in his lectures on the Formula of Concord, p. 168. "Justifying faith consists in a special assent, both with respect to the object and with respect to the subject; and this assent always has conjoined the trust of the will, so that it can rightly be called a fiducial assent." This author refers the knowledge of Christ and the desire for grace among the presuppositions of justifying faith, insofar as it justifies. D. FRIDEM. BECMANN follows him in his institutes, p. 417. Nor does D. BAIER seem to dissent from this in his compendium, p. 642, by whom faith is called a sensual trust. A quadripartite division seems more suitable to others, among whom D. CHEMNITIUS excels, who delineates the degrees, or acts of justifying faith thus: "By what movements faith apprehends and receives the promise of the gospel is understood in the true exercises of justifying faith. For there such movements and degrees are noticed, just as they are described in scripture. I. Knowledge, or science, thought and meditation on the promise of God concerning the benefits of Christ the mediator, concerning the mercy of God, concerning gratuitous reconciliation, etc. II. To this knowledge must be joined assent, not indeed only general, but by which with firm persuasion every believer may determine that the universal promise privately pertains also to himself, that he also is included and comprehended in that universal promise," Romans IV. "It was written not for Abraham's sake only, but for ours also, to whom it will be imputed, if we believe." III. "From that knowledge, or assent, the heart, or will, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, conceives a desire so that, because it seriously feels itself burdened with sins and the wrath of God, it desires, wishes, seeks, and asks that the benefit of justification, which is proposed in the promise of the gospel, be given and communicated to it, and it apprehends it by faith, so as to receive it to itself. IV. When in this way and from the sentence of damnation, which is announced to us by the law because of sins, faith flees to the throne of grace and to the mercy seat, which the heavenly Father has set forth in the blood of Christ, trust is added," Ephesians III, "by which, from the promise, it determines that God then gives, communicates, and applies to it the benefits of the promise; and that in this way it truly receives those things which the gratuitous promise of the gospel offers, righteousness, salvation, and eternal life. From this trust follows boldness (παρρησία), which has access to God," Ephesians III, "peace of conscience," Romans V, "joy of the Spirit," Romans XIV, so that the heart may rest in the promise of mercy, even in the cross, in temptation, and finally in death itself, retaining the hope of the glory of God," Romans V, in exam. concil. Trid. fol. 163. & loc. theolog. part. II fol. 270. D. GERHARD supports this in his academic disputations, P. 1. pag. 289, D. HOEPFNER, in his tract on the acts of justifying faith, p. 140, D. DANNHAV. in his hodo. p. 1317, D. BREITHAVPT. in his theological institutes, p. 328. Most Theologians mention three acts, or parts, of faith; knowledge, assent, and trust; who include the desire for grace under trust. I adduce as witnesses D. CALOVIUS and D. QUENSTEDT. The former, in vol. X of his system, p. 303, says: "Trust is to seek Christ," Isaiah LV, 5, "to desire him eagerly," Psalm LXXIII, 28, "to pant for him," Psalm XLII, 2, 3, "to desire his attraction," Canticles 1, 3,

(*) "All these three exist conjoined in 1 Timothy 1, 15, 16, namely 1) knowledge: ὅτι Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς ἦλθεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον, ἁμαρτωλοὺς σῶσαι; 2) assent: πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, καὶ πάσης ἀποδοχῆς ἄξιος; 3) trust: ὧν πρωτότος εἰμι ἐγώ. And again: ἐν ἐμοὶ πρώτῳ."

John VI, 44. The latter, in his system, Part IV, p. 291, writes: "Trust denotes a desire and access to Christ, and the application and appropriation of his merit."

Question XIV. What is the knowledge of faith? Knowledge of faith.

The knowledge of faith is a supernatural, evangelical, explicit knowledge, kindled by the Holy Spirit through illuminating grace, concerning all things to be believed, primarily concerning Christ, his merit and the grace of God, the remission of sins and eternal salvation, to be obtained through Christ the mediator.

Proof. 1) The knowledge of faith is not natural (*); because Christ and the grace of God, founded in the merit of Christ, are not known from the light of nature; Therefore it is kindled by the Holy Spirit through the grace of supernatural illumination. 2) This justifying knowledge is not legal, because from the law there is no justification, Galatians II, 16, but evangelical, whose scope and nucleus is Christ. Whence it is called the faith of Christ, or that whose object is Christ, Galatians II, 16. But in the merit of Christ is founded the grace of God, remitting sins, or justifying and saving, Romans III, 24. 3) That implicit knowledge, by which one says he believes what the church believes, is not sufficient to obtain remission of sins and eternal salvation, is clear, because it is the duty of the faithful to search the scriptures, John V, 39, to meditate on the law of the Lord, Psalm 1, 2, to follow only the voice of Christ the chief shepherd, John X, 4, to beware of false prophets, Matthew VII, 15, to test the spirits, 1 John IV, 1, to test all things, and to hold fast to what is good, 1 Thessalonians V, 21. Which duties of the faithful cannot be performed with implicit knowledge. Moreover, although the knowledge of the reborn concerning the obtaining of remission of sins and eternal salvation is explicit; it is not, however, perfect, 1 Corinthians XIII, 9, nor is it equal in all, but in some it is fuller, in others it is weaker.

4. That the knowledge of Christ should be counted among the acts and parts of faith is established; a) Because to believe is explained by to know, John VI, 69. "We have believed and have known that you are the Christ, the Son of God." b) Because unbelief, the opposite of faith, is called ignorance, Acts XVII, 30. Therefore faith is knowledge. c) By whatever, on our part, we are justified and saved, that is justifying and saving faith; But on our part we are justified and saved by the knowledge of Christ; Therefore the knowledge of Christ is justifying faith. The minor is proven from Isaiah LIII, 11. "By his knowledge my righteous servant shall justify many." Where the knowledge of the righteous servant is not active, by which he knows, 2 Timothy II, 19, but passive, by which he is known; for it is the knowledge of the most bitter sufferings and bloody passion of the Messiah, as set forth in Isaiah LIII. To this prophetic oracle we add that statement of Christ, John XVII, 3. "This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent." Whence saving faith is not incongruously described as the knowledge of salvation, Luke 1, 77.

(*) "Naturalists, as they are called, for the most part indeed invent a certain natural faith; but in defining it, philosophical Naturalism is different from the fanatical. For those philosophers who think that the natural knowledge and veneration of God is sufficient to recover man's salvation, they therefore require no other than a trust placed in the benignity of God, that he himself will remit sins, if anyone repents of them. As for Christ the sponsor, they either reject him entirely, or, if they are more moderate, they think that the knowledge of him, to be perceived from revelation, is not simply necessary for every man. Fanatical Naturalists are so named because they say that faith in Christ is an illumination of the mind by a certain internal word, which they are accustomed to call Christ in us, and they separate and tear this internal word from the external one, consigned to letters, and indeed they even imagine that it is already in some way naturally implanted in all men. Thus they are openly contrary to PAUL, by whose most ample testimony faith comes from hearing, Romans X, 17, and indeed so much so that there can be no faith at all without hearing, ibid. v. 14, namely the hearing of the Gospel, delivered to all the inhabitants of the earth by divine messengers, v. 15, 16, 18. But it is faith in Christ of which the divine man speaks, v. 8. ff."

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who deny that knowledge is an act or part of faith, (*) who object;

I. Whatever is above the grasp of reason is not known, but believed; But the mysteries of faith etc. 1 Corinthians II, 14. Therefore. The major is established; because we only know those things which do not exceed the grasp of reason. Response; 1) Whatever is above the grasp of reason is not known by natural cognition; I concede, but the same can be known by supernatural cognition, through the grace of illumination, kindled by the Holy Spirit through the written word, read and heard. 2) A distinction is made between reason left to itself, and reason illustrated by the light of the divine word. The mysteries of faith exceed the grasp of reason left to itself; yet illustrated reason receives them, as an instrument and subject, although it is not the judge or norm of the articles of faith.

II. Whatever is a step to understanding is not understanding itself; But faith is etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because a preceding disposition precedes the thing, it does not constitute it. The minor is proven from Isaiah VII, 9. "If you will not believe, you shall not understand." Response; a) The Vulgate version has poorly rendered the original text. The source flows thus; "If you will not believe; surely you will not be established." b) There is no consequence; If you will not believe, you will not understand. Therefore faith is a step to understanding; just as it does not follow; If it is not a rational animal, it is not a man; Therefore a rational animal is a step to man; If it does not have a principle of motion, it does not have a soul; Therefore a principle of motion is a step to a soul. Nonsense!

III. If the intellect is to be taken captive under the obedience of faith; faith is not knowledge; The antecedent is true; Therefore so is the consequent. The reason for the consequence is that where the knowledge of truth shines in the intellect, there the intellect is not to be taken captive. The truth of the antecedent is clear from 2 Corinthians X, 5. Response; The natural, fierce and rebellious intellect is to be taken captive; The illuminated intellect submits itself with a sweet and ready obedience to the prescription of the divine word.

IV. Whatever befalls impious men and devils is not an act of justifying faith; But knowledge about Christ etc.; Therefore. The major is proven; because by a justifying act converted men are justified. But the impious and devils are not converted, and therefore they are not justified by their knowledge. The minor is clear from James II, 19, and daily experience. Response; Theoretical knowledge about Christ befalls the impious and demons, not practical knowledge, conjoined with trust in Christ.

V. Paul distinguishes knowledge from faith, 1 Corinthians XII, 8, 9; 1 Corinthians XIII, 2. Therefore, knowledge is not faith. Response; In both cited places, miraculous faith is understood, which is distinct from justifying knowledge, if not in kind, certainly in degree.

Question XV. What is the assent of faith? Assent of faith.

The assent of faith is an approving judgment of the intellect, by which those things which the sacred scripture hands down concerning Christ the mediator, and the divine grace restored through him, as well as the remission of sins and eternal salvation to be obtained, are judged to be true. The assent of faith is distinguished into general and special. By general assent, the universal promises concerning the grace of God and the merit of Christ are judged to be true. By special assent, the converted and reborn sinner determines that those general promises pertain to himself as an individual.

Proof. From 1 Timothy 1, 15. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief. But for this reason I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show all longsuffering, as a pattern to those who are going to believe on Him for everlasting life." In this Pauline statement, the general and special assent of faith are joined. By general assent this sentence is to be approved, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save all sinners. From this universal proposition the Apostle descends to himself as an individual, and believes that for Christ's sake he has obtained the mercy of God for salvation. From which it is clear that the merit of Christ is universal, and the promises concerning the gratuitous remission of sins to be obtained for Christ's sake are indeterminate. But when they ought to actually benefit this or that man, it is necessary that the universal merit of Christ and the indeterminate promises be applied and determined to this or that penitent sinner through special assent.

(*) "They do indeed refer knowledge to faith, but they think that implicit knowledge, which is in reality ignorance, is sufficient. They also require assent, but not a divine one, but a human one, which rests entirely on the authority of the church, and indeed of the Roman church. Such knowledge and assent can certainly exist in the most wicked man. You see, therefore, from what source that detestable decree flowed, in the Council of Trident. sess. VI. cap. 15, that the most grievous crimes do not take away true faith, although it is not living, and thus that many are FAITHFUL fornicators, adulterers, effeminate, abusers of themselves with mankind, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners, and all others who commit lethal sins. Horrible to say! As if PAUL judged men, most defiled with all vices, worthy of the name of the faithful, 1 Timothy I, 9, 10, to which place they have impudently dared to appeal."

Obs. Special assent is elicited with a twofold respect. 1) With respect to the object, which is the merit of Christ, and the divine promises concerning the gratuitous remission of sins for Christ's sake. These promises, which include the merit of Christ, are the proper object of justifying faith. 2) With respect to the Subject; and thus it is called a special assent of faith, by which the converted sinner believes that the merit of Christ also pertains to him as an individual, and that he has God in heaven propitious to him, and the remission of sins for Christ's sake.

Question XVI. What is trust fixed in Christ? Trust.

Trust is an act of the will, by which the sinner, converted and reborn, eagerly desires and seeks the mercy of God, obtained by the merit of Christ, and embraces him, both as his present good, and as the cause of the remission of sins and eternal salvation, leans upon him against all terrors, and securely rests and acquiesces in him.

Obs. I. We have described trust fixed in Christ in a broader sense, in which it includes the desire for divine grace; because trust is an act of concupiscence, by which we wish and desire a good suitable for us, and in it other goods for ourselves. But express mention of the desire for grace ought to be made in enumerating the acts of faith; a) because of the testimony of Christ, by which righteousness and blessedness are attributed to this evangelical desire (we dealt with the legal desire in the preceding chapter), Matthew V, 6. "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be filled." Where hunger and thirst for righteousness is the desire for the imputed righteousness of Christ; for by it sinners, needy and eager for spiritual food and drink, are fully satisfied. b) Because of hypocrites, who maintain that God is propitious to them; whose most vain dream is validly refuted by the fact that they truly desire neither the grace of God, nor the remission of sins, nor eternal life; Otherwise they would remove the obstacles to salvation—the opinion of not being in need and the purpose of continuing in sins—and would rightly use the means of salvation. c) Because of the tempted, whom hunger and thirst press all the more, the less trust is found in them. Those weak brethren not rarely sigh: "If only we had the faculty of believing! Grant faith, O God! Relieve the infirmity of believing!" Which desire for faith is true faith, although it may not manifest itself with firm trust. D. CHEMNITIUS rightly says: "When the object is true in the word, and the aforesaid motions follow, or at least an attempt and desire, then it is true faith," in loc. theol. part. II. de iustific. fol. 271. It can, however, be referred to trust, because this also is a certain act of concupiscence, as we said above.

Obs. II. What trust is will be clear to us by considering generally both the object and the form of trust. Trust has for its object a) a present good. For we are not said to trust in future things in the same way we hope for them. The impious trust in the riches they possess, or in men and their power; but the pious trust in the present God, and his goodness, truthfulness, and power. But by a present good is understood that which is present either really and physically, or only morally, by reason of promise, merit, and value, or is apprehended as present. Thus the pious in the Old Testament rightly trusted in the Messiah to come, and in the satisfaction for sins to be rendered by him at some time; and we trust in the same satisfaction once rendered by his passion and death. For Christ, and his passion and death, extends itself morally, and by reason of its merit, to all past ages, as well as the present and future, and has been at all times the cause for believers of obtaining remission of sins and salvation. For Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today, and forever, Hebrews XIII, 8. b) Our good, or what in some way pertains to us. For because we trust in those goods which are a help to us for obtaining some effect, it is necessary that they be ours, or at least through friendship, or a pact, which exists between us and him to whom they belong, they pertain to us in some way, and in this regard are esteemed as ours. Whence we rightly trust in the merit and satisfaction of Christ, as in some good of our own; because it was rendered for us and in our place. From which also Theologians call fiducial apprehension appropriative. c) A relative good, as a cause for obtaining another good, and that an arduous and difficult one, or what is known as the cause of obtaining another good, e.g., an emperor places trust in his army, insofar as it is the cause of obtaining victory; a miser trusts in money, insofar as it is conceived by him as the cause of obtaining help in harsh times; a student trusts in erudition, as the cause of obtaining promotion. Thus the reborn fix their trust in Christ the mediator as the cause of obtaining grace with God, the remission of sins, and eternal salvation. The form of trust consists in the embrace, adhesion, and acquiescence of the will. For trust eagerly embraces and holds the present good, which is known as the cause of obtaining another, adheres to it, and leans upon it against all terrors, and so securely rests and acquiesces in it. For example, a miser embraces his money with singular trust, as the cause of rendering aid, leans upon it against harsh circumstances, and securely acquiesces in it. Therefore, trust is formally an acquiescence of the will in some present good, which is related as a cause to obtaining another good, and therefore includes a certain security about attaining a future good, opposed to dread, since it is a rest from the disturbance of fear. Confer D. MUSAEI disput. III. de convers. p. 172. In which sense MELANCHTHON in his theological loci describes trust, that by it the will acquiesces in the promise of mercy, granted for the mediator's sake. "Trust adds to assent the quiet of the will acquiescing in the promise," says D. DANNHAVER, in hodo. p. 1322, who delineates justifying faith thus: "The faith WHICH justifies is knowledge, assent, trust, and full assurance (πληροφορία): The faith BY WHICH, or INSOFAR AS it justifies, is the bare apprehension of the benefits of the Messiah passively, an admission of the movements of the Holy Spirit, a reclining, a resting in the merits of Christ," in hodo. p. 1305. And KOENIG in theol. posit. §. 899. "When we call apprehension justifying trust, we understand an apprehension not theoretical, merely assent-giving, when one holds for indubitable in his intellect that Christ died not only for all, but also for himself as an individual (for thus even the impious themselves, who do not desire that salvation should befall them for the sake of Christ's merit, can infer); but practical, which involves the reclining of the whole heart and will in the merit of Christ."

Obs. III. The difference between trust, hope, and love is manifest. 1) Trust is concerned with a present good; hope with a future good. The former acquiesces in a good that is ours, or pertains to us; the latter tends toward a future good, that it may become ours. Trust is about a present good, related as a cause to obtaining another good; Hope is simply about a good to be obtained, and is born from trust. Whence the former is prior, the latter posterior: The former has the nature of a cause, the latter of an effect. 2) Love embraces Christ absolutely, as a good; trust embraces Christ, with relation to another good, known as a cause. The former pertains to an act of benevolence, by which we wish all the best for Christ (*): the latter to an act of concupiscence, by which we desire Christ for ourselves, as a good suitable for us, and in him other goods (**).

(*) "By which we are prompt and ready for all things, both to do and to suffer willingly, whatever a grateful mind towards Christ, and the conscience of so many benefits, demands. John XV, 10. Philippians I, 29."

(**) "The former is a necessary consequent and effect; the latter is a preceding and necessary cause of it. Luke VII, 42, 43, 47. For the mind of man, unless it believes God to be reconciled to it, is always hostile to God. Our ancestors excellently stated in the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, chap. III, p. 583. 'Therefore, God is not loved, unless after we have apprehended mercy by faith; only then does he become a lovable object.' Moreover, what you might think trivial, it is more correctly said love in Christ, than love of Christ, because that word is both more Latin and more significant. For that word, to love (amare), is worth much more than this, to esteem (diligere)."

It is proven that faith in Christ formally and intrinsically includes trust resting on the merit of Christ.

1. Because faith in Christ is not only an act of the intellect, or knowledge and assent; but also an act of the will. This is confirmed a) from the very phrase: "TO BELIEVE IN CHRIST"; which by the force of the preposition "IN," constructed with the accusative case, insinuates a certain act of the believer, tending into Christ, by which the believing man is, as it were, carried outside of himself into Christ, or adheres to him; b) from the custom of speaking, which AUGUSTINE rightly urges, tract XXIX, on John. For the demons are said to believe Christ, and to believe that he is Christ; yet they are not said to believe in Christ. And we are said to believe Paul, to believe Peter; we also believe Paul and Peter to exist; yet we are not said to believe in Paul and Peter. Therefore, to believe in someone, besides the act of believing, or assenting, implies some act concerning the object believed, which neither befalls demons, nor has Peter, Paul, or any creature as its object; Namely, an act by which the believer tends into the object, known and believed under a certain and peculiar reason, which falls upon no creature. Which certainly must be an act of the will. For it is of the will to be carried outside itself into an object; just as, on the contrary, it is of the intellect to know an object in itself through species impressed upon it. c) The condition of the object proves the same. For Christ is not proposed in the scriptures to the fallen race of mortals to be known for the sake of speculation, but as a mediator and the cause of the remission of sins and of eternal life. See 1 Timothy II, 5. John I, 29. c. III, 16. Which our goods, flowing to us from Christ, are proposed in the scriptures to be known and believed, not that the intellect may rest in the knowledge and assent of them, but that being known and believed they may be represented and exhibited to the will, so that the will may be carried into them, may rest in them, and by trust in them the sinner may raise and console himself against the wrath of God and the terrors of conscience. We conclude: Every act of the will, concerning a present good, related as a cause to obtaining another arduous and difficult good, is formally trust; But that act, which faith in Christ includes on the part of the will, is an act of the will concerning a present good, related as a cause to obtaining other arduous and difficult goods; Therefore.

2. From the names attributed to faith in Holy Scripture. For it is described by Paul a) as ὑπόστασις, Hebrews XI, 1, which word signifies trust, confidence, or (as ERASMUS SCHMIDT translates) an untroubled consistency of mind, yielding to no dangers. It is said to be from ὑφίστασθαι, which means to stand, to subsist, to consist; because faith does not flee from the sight of God, does not fall, but stands unshaken in the divine promises, consists, and acquiesces like a thing subsisting by itself. Both the noun ὑπόστασις and ὑφίστασθαι are military terms. See CRAUSER's Phosphorus, p. 310. b) As πληροφορία, Romans IV, 21. Colossians II, 2. Hebrews VI, 11. Πληροφορία is said to be from πλήρης, full, and φέρεισθαι, to be carried, because through it the mind of the believer is fully carried into the object, just as a ship is carried into port with full sails. But the mind is fully carried into an object when it is carried into it according to every reason according to which it is objected to; by the intellect, indeed, insofar as it is under the reason of true; by the will, however, insofar as it is objected under the reason of good and desirable. Therefore πληροφορία is not of the intellect alone, but most especially of the will, and of trust, which is carried into a good object with full impetus, represented by the intellect, illuminated by divine revelation. c) As πεποίθησις, Romans VIII, 38. 2 Timothy I, 12. Πεποίθησις originates from the verb πείθω, I persuade. Therefore πεποίθησις is a persuasion of the mind and will. The former is a certain assent; the latter an immovable trust. Thus Paul says: Πέποιθα δὲ ἐν κυρίῳ, "But I trust in the Lord," Philippians II, 24. d) as παρρησία, Hebrews IV, 16, which word taken strictly denotes freedom of speech, sometimes accepted more broadly denotes trust of the heart, with a connoted alacrity and firmness of believing (*).

(*) "Παρρησία specifically denotes both the freedom of speech, with which we ask of God whatever can truly be conferred on us as good, 1 John V, 14. These two are distinguished, παρρησία, and προσαγωγή, the most certain persuasion, which is πεποίθησις, as a twofold effect from its cause, Ephesians III, 12. For from this is first effected προσαγωγή, access to a placated God, and to the θρόνον τῆς χάριτος, without any trembling, Hebrews IV, 16; then παρρησία, prayer without any doubting."

3. From a comparison of passages from the Old and New Testaments. What in the O.T. is attributed to those who are confident and to trust, that in the N.T. is attributed to believers and to faith. What is said in Psalm II, 12: "Blessed are all they that put their trust in him," that is said in Mark XVI, 16: "He that believeth shall be saved."

4. From exegetical declaration. For the Holy Spirit explains faith by trust, 1 John V, 13. "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God: And this is the confidence that we have in him."

5. From the object; which Paul thus explains, Romans III, 25. "God hath set forth Christ to be a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον), a mercy-seat through faith in his blood," i.e., a mediator and placator of divine wrath, by reason of his satisfaction and merit, rendered by his blood shed for our sins, to be apprehended by faith. From which we conclude: Whatever act of the will has for its object Christ as the meritorious cause of placating the divine wrath, that is formally and intrinsically trust; But that act, which faith in the blood of Christ includes on the part of the will, is an act of the will, which has for its object Christ as the meritorious cause of placating the divine wrath: Therefore.

6. From its opposite. Fear of heart is opposed to faith; Therefore faith is trust. The reason for the consequence is; because trust struggles against fear. The antecedent is proven from Luke VIII, 50. "Fear not, only believe."

7. From the justification of the ungodly man. Whoever, being ungodly, is justified by faith, is justified by trust placed in the satisfaction of the mediator; But the penitent ungodly man etc. Romans IV, 5. Therefore. The major is of unshakable truth; because God, the most just and severest avenger of crimes, cannot justify the ungodly without satisfaction being rendered (either his own or vicarious), Proverbs XVII, 15. But the ungodly man himself is not able to make satisfaction; Therefore it is necessary that he fix his trust in the vicarious satisfaction of Christ, who died for the ungodly, Romans V, 6.

8. From the effects of faith. Whoever by their faith resist the devil, overcome the world, obtain peace, pray with saving fruit, their faith is trust; But converted and reborn sinners etc. The major is established; because those effects proceed from trust. For strong men by trust in the strength of their arms resist their enemies, and extort victory and peace from them. A son by trust in paternal benevolence implores his father's help. The minor is clear from the testimonies of scripture, 1 Peter V, 9. "Resist the devil, steadfast in the faith." 1 John V, 4. "This is the victory that has overcome the world, even our faith." Romans V, 1. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God." James 1, 6. "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering!";

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who deny that justifying faith is trust. They object:

I. The effect of faith is not faith itself; But trust is the effect of faith; Therefore. The minor is proven from Ephesians III, 12. "In whom we have boldness and access with confidence through faith in him." Where Paul distinguishes trust from faith, and teaches that we have trust through faith, and therefore that trust is related to faith as an effect to a cause. Response; 1) The words in the source flow thus: "In whom we have boldness (παρρησίαν), confidence in speaking and access in confidence through faith in him." The confidence of speaking is certainly an effect of faith, according to Psalm CXVI, 10. "I believed, therefore I have spoken." 2) Trust is an effect of faith, taken for assent-giving knowledge; because by knowing that Christ the mediator is for us the cause of obtaining grace and remission of sins with God, it represents to the will Christ the mediator, as the cause of obtaining some difficult and arduous good, and as far as in it lies, it directs it through the representation of the Object to elicit the act of trust; but trust is not the effect of faith in Christ; for faith in Christ, or to believe Christ, in its formal concept includes and embraces knowledge, assent, and trust. 3) A distinction is made between the trust of a man to be justified, and of one who is justified. The former is fixed in the merit of Christ, as the cause of obtaining grace and the remission of sins; The latter is placed in the grace of God obtained, as the cause of peace of conscience and spiritual joy, which trust is certainly an effect of faith in Christ. The sense of the Pauline statement is; We, being reconciled with God, have the freedom to speak with God, and access to him joined not with trembling, but with trust placed in the grace of God, which we have received through faith in Christ.

II. Whatever is joined with fear is not trust (because trust is opposed to fear); But faith etc.; Therefore. The minor is clear from Hebrews XI, 7. "By faith Noah, being warned of God, moved with fear, prepared an ark." Response; Noah's fear was not servile, but filial; not of flight, such as Adam's was after he had committed sin; but of caution, such as Joseph's was, when guarding himself from adultery. Filial fear consists well with trust *).<sup>308</sup>

III. The object of trust is not every word of God; The object of faith is every word of God; Therefore, faith is not trust. The major is clear; because the object of trust is the promise of grace concerning the obtaining of remission of sins and eternal life for the merit of Christ. But the promise of grace is not every word of God. The minor is clear; because every word of God is to be received with firm faith on account of the authority of the one speaking. Response; A distinction is made between general, or dogmatic, faith, and special, or justifying, faith. The object of the former is every word of God; the object of the latter is the word of promise concerning the gratuitous remission of sins and eternal salvation, to be obtained for the merit of Christ.

IV. Trust is strengthened hope, as defined by THOMAS Aquinas II-II. q. 129. a. 6. Faith is not strengthened hope (because it is distinguished from hope, 1 Corinthians XIII, 13); Therefore faith is not trust. Response; We disapprove of the definition of THOMAS; for trust rests in a present good; but hope tends toward a future good. See Obs. III. Instance; Trust also is concerned with a future good. For the patriarchs of the O.T. placed their trust in the Christ to come. Response; Christ the Mediator was present to the patriarchs morally, by reason of promise, merit, and value, although, as to his human nature, he was not present physically or really.

V. If faith were trust; its act in the Holy Scriptures would not be expressed by "to believe," but by "to trust"; But it is not expressed by "to trust"; Therefore faith is not trust. The reason for the consequence is; because conjugates explain each other. Response; 1) Deny the antecedent; because in the O.T. the act of faith is mostly expressed by "to trust." See Psalm II, 12. The reason that in the N.T. it is mostly explained by "to believe" is; because besides trust it also embraces assent. 2) A distinction is made between believing someone, and believing in someone. The former denotes assent, the latter denotes trust conjoined with assent. But trust is, as it were, the soul and completion of faith, so that if it is absent, bare assent is not a complete, not a living and efficacious, but a dead faith.

VI. Justifying faith precedes the remission of sins; Trust in the remission of sin for Christ's sake does not precede the remission of sins; Therefore, trust in the remission of sin for Christ's sake is not justifying faith. Response; We concede the whole argument. For we maintain that justifying faith is trust fixed in the merit of Christ, as the cause of obtaining grace and the remission of sins from God; but trust in the obtained remission of sins for Christ's sake is the effect of justifying faith.

Question XVII. Is faith to be defined by obedience?

Obedience is twofold, evangelical and legal a). The obedience of the gospel b) and of the doctrine of faith c) is faith itself, by which the repentant sinner admits, approves, and applies to himself the evangelical doctrine not unwillingly. But the obedience of the law, or of works, is a virtue, conformable to the divine law, not essentially constituting faith d), but following it as a fruit and effect e).

Proof a. From 1 John III, 23. "This is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another." St. John joins the evangelical commandment concerning faith in Christ, and the legal one concerning charity; just as the evangelical will of God is also described, John VI, 40. "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life." But the legal will of God is our sanctification, 1 Thessalonians IV, 3. To both divine commandments our obedience ought to correspond.

Proof b. From 2 Thessalonians 1, 8. "God will take vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," 2 Thessalonians I, 8. To obey the gospel means to give it fiducial assent. For St. Peter also calls assent the obedience of truth, 1 Peter 1, 22. On the contrary, not to obey the truth, Galatians III, 1, is the same as not to believe.

(*) "The word, εὐλαβηθεῖς, properly does not denote fear, but reverence and piety towards God; and such is the nature of that fear which is commonly called filial. To Christ himself, who surely with the highest and most perfect trust perpetually embraced his eternal Father, is attributed εὐλάβεια, Hebrews V, 7."

Proof c. From Romans I, 5. "By whom we have received grace and apostleship, for obedience to the faith among all nations, for his name." By faith the Apostle understands objective faith, or that which is believed. St. Paul therefore received the apostolic office, that he might preach the doctrine of faith and that the gentiles might accept it with fiducial assent.

Proof d. From Romans III, 28. "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." Whatever is opposed to the office and nature of justifying faith does not enter into its essence. But obedience of the law is opposed to the office and nature of justifying faith. Therefore.

Proof e. From Matthew III, 8. "Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance." The fruits of repentance are good works, Acts XXVI, 20, of which number is obedience (*).

The antithesis is that of the Socinians and Arminians, who define faith by obedience under the hope of attaining eternal life. Their main arguments are:

I. Blessed are the obedient, Hebrews V, 9. Blessed are the believers. Therefore believers are obedient, and consequently faith and obedience are one and the same. Response; 1) In the major premise, either the obedience of the gospel or the obedience of the law is understood. The former is faith itself; the latter is a sign of faith, by which the subject to be saved is specified, yet the causal reason for salvation is not given. Blessed are the obedient, but not through obedience. 2) A distinction is made between subjective and formal identity. Faith and obedience agree in one subject, so that believers are called obedient; but they do not agree formally. Although therefore believers are obedient; faith is nevertheless not obedience; Just as a certain philosopher is a theologian, yet philosophy is not theology.

II. The faith of the Ninevites was obedience, Jonah III, 5. "The people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth." Response; From the words of Jonah you will in vain conclude that faith is obedience. For the faith of the Ninevites is distinguished from the obedience of works.

III. Daniel's faith was obedience, Daniel VI, 23, compared with v. 22. Response; You conclude poorly: Daniel served God obediently; Daniel believed God; Therefore to believe God and to obey him is the same thing. Otherwise I argue by the same reason; David believed; David spoke, Psalm CXVI, 10. Therefore to speak and to believe is the same thing. Things that are conjoined agree in one subject, but are not formally the same.

IV. If unbelief is disobedience, faith will be obedience. The first is true; Therefore so is the latter. The consequence is manifest; because the reason for opposites is opposite. The antecedent is clear from Psalm LXXVIII, 22, in which the Israelites are accused of unbelief, because they did not render due obedience to God. Response; The Israelites are accused of unbelief a posteriori, or by concluding from the effect to the cause; because disobedience is the effect and sign of unbelief.

V. Paul in 1 Thessalonians I, 9, makes two parts of the Christian religion, and therefore of faith, of which one is to obey God, the other to expect his Son from heaven. What else is this than to obey God and Christ under the hope of obtaining immortal life? Response; Religion and justifying faith are not synonyms; since religion besides faith in Christ requires the whole chorus, or harmony, of virtues worthy of a Christian.

VI. That without which faith is dead is its internal form; Without obedience and the pursuit of good works faith is dead; Therefore. The major is proven; Just as the body is dead without the soul, as its internal form; so faith is dead without obedience. The minor is clear from James II, 20, 26. Response; The major is not universally true. For just as the body is dead without respiration, yet respiration is not the internal form of the body, so faith without the pursuit of good works is dead, yet the pursuit of good works is not the internal form of saving faith.

Question XVIII. What is the end of faith? The End of Faith.

The intermediate end of faith is justification a) and renewal b). The ultimate end, on the part of man, is eternal life c); on the part of God, it is the glory of divine mercy d).

(*) "Indeed, obedience is a universal genus, which contains within its scope all virtues and good actions. For they are all a conformity of the powers of the soul and of actions with the norm prescribed by God. The true reason for all of them is placed in this: God must always be obeyed, commands must be done, prohibitions must be fled."

Proof a. From Galatians II, 16. "We have believed in Christ Jesus, that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law." But we are justified by faith in Christ, i.e., in Christ instrumentally (ὀργανικῶς); because faith is the instrument, or medium, which receives the merit of Christ, and the grace of God obtained by it, which remits sins, offered in the evangelical promise, just as the hand receives an alms, the mouth food, the eye light. For faith is not here regarded as a good work, by which a righteousness valid before God is acquired, but as the organ of a beggar, by which the merit of Christ is apprehended. The Apostle to the gentiles inculcates this very thing, Romans IX, 30, 31, 32. "The Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness; even the righteousness which is of faith; But Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness. Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law."

Proof b. Faith works through charity, Galatians V, 6. And he who remains in Christ by faith, bears much fruit, John XV, 5. But faith flows into the production of good works as an emanative efficient cause, as we shall show more clearly in the following chapter.

Proof c. The end of faith is the salvation of souls, 1 Peter 1, 9. Therefore faith is the medium of salvation.

Proof d. Abraham was strengthened in faith, giving glory to God, Romans IV, 20. Abraham, strengthened by faith, gave glory to God for His grace, truth, and power; because he was fully persuaded that whatever God had promised, He was able to perform. So far is the faithful man from seeking his own glory, that he denies himself, and celebrates the riches of divine mercy, obtained by the satisfaction of Christ, by which he is justified and saved.

Question XIX. How many types of justifying faith are there? Divisions of justifying faith.

Justifying faith, considered essentially and absolutely, is one; Accidentally and respectively it is distinguished; a) by reason of degree, into small and great; b) by reason of duration, into temporary and final; c) by reason of the mode of knowing, into direct and reflex; d) by reason of exercise, into habitual and actual.

Proof a. Small or weak faith (in Greek ὀλιγοπιστία) is when either a faint light of the knowledge of Christ glimmers in the intellect, or the promise of grace is received with a weak and languid assent, or trust struggles with the dread of conscience. Thus the father of the lunatic said, Mark IX, 24. "I believe, Lord; help my unbelief." Yet weak faith is also true faith; just as a spark hidden under ashes is true fire, and a tender infant is a true man. Great or firm faith (in Greek πληροφορία) is a clear knowledge of the divine mercy, proposed in Christ, a solid assent, an intrepid trust that conquers all terrors. Firm faith is compared to the pulse of an artery in a healthy man, weak faith to the movement of a weak artery in a sick man. Concerning the πληροφορία of Abraham, see Romans IV, 18 ff.

Proof b. Temporary faith is that by which a man believes for a certain time, but afterwards, either fascinated by false opinions, or overcome by the desires of the flesh, or by the adversities of the world, he falls away from the true faith. In Greek it is called πρόσκαιρος faith, from Luke VIII, 13. Final faith is that which perseveres whole until the last breath of life, Matthew X, 22.

Proof c. Simple and direct faith is that which is directed straight to Christ, and the grace of God reconciled by him, e.g., infants believe, Matthew XVIII, 6, but they are not yet able to explore their faith due to the defect of full judgment. Reflex and discursive faith is that by which a reborn man believes and feels that he believes, so that he can say with Paul, from 2 Timothy I, 12, "I know whom I have believed."

Proof d. Actual faith is an act of the human intellect and will, by which a man so knows the doctrine concerning Christ the mediator, and concerning the grace of God, the remission of sins, to be obtained from God through his merit, that by the divine power conjoined with that doctrine, he not only judges with full persuasion that it is true, and that Christ has merited grace for him with God; but also acquiesces in Christ, as the cause of obtaining grace with God; for the cause of obtaining righteousness and salvation. Habitual faith is a habit of the intellect and will of knowing those things which are divinely revealed and to be believed, especially concerning Christ the mediator and the grace of God and salvation, to be obtained through Christ, and of assenting to the same through and for the sake of divine revelation, and of fiducially acquiescing in Christ, divinely bestowed, for the cause of obtaining righteousness and salvation.

Question XX. Is the distinction of faith into unformed and formed to be admitted?

The distinction of faith into unformed and formed is destitute of solid foundation, and therefore is to be rejected.

Proof. 1) Truly justifying faith is always formed; because by its form (which is the special application of the mercy of God remitting sins, founded in the merit of Christ, and promised in the gospel) it is that which it is. 2) Unformed faith is vain, not true; dead, not living, and therefore not justifying. For according to the mind of our adversaries, unformed faith can consist with presumptuous sins; But true faith does not consist with voluntary sins. For "whoever is born of God (i.e., endowed with true faith in God) does not commit sin," 1 John III, 9. 3) It is absurd that faith should be moved by charity, as by a higher directive principle, since charity is an effect of faith, and faith is rather operative through charity, as Paul testifies, Galatians V, 6.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who state that the form of faith is charity; on the contrary, that unformed faith, devoid of charity, and conjoined with mortal sins, is true faith. Their principal arguments are:

I. Faith is moved and acts through charity, as Paul testifies, Galatians V, 6. Therefore charity is the essential form of faith. Response: The words of the text are; Πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, "faith working through charity." The participle, ἐνεργουμένη, is of the middle voice, and has an active signification. Confer Romans VII, 5. 2 Corinthians IV, 12. Ephesians III, 20. The sense is; Faith operates through charity, as something consequent, and as it were through an accidental form, as fire is said to act through heat.

II. James says in ch. II, 14. "What does it profit, my brethren, if someone says he has faith but does not have works? Can that faith save him?" Response: St. James is speaking not of true faith, but of a hypocritical or vain boast of faith.

III. Paul says in 1 Corinthians XIII, 2. "If I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, but have not charity, I am nothing." Response: The Apostle's discourse is about miraculous faith, which can sometimes exist without charity, as is established from Matthew VII, 22.

IV. John XII, 42. "Many of the rulers believed in him; But because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue. For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God." Response: Those rulers had historical faith, but not saving faith; Which is clear a) from the defect of confession, as a necessary fruit of true faith; b) from the seeking of human glory, to which divine glory was postponed.

Question XXI. What are the affections, or properties of true faith?

The affections of faith are: a) certainty, b) fruitfulness, by which it produces good works. Affections of faith.

Proof a. Certainty belongs to faith in Christ; a) On the part of the object which is believed, to which it is repugnant for anything false to underlie it. For the word of God, which is received with the assent of faith, is most certain, on account of the authority of the revealing God. b) On the part of the subject, or of him who believes, and most tenaciously adheres to and relies on the divine promises. For faith is πραγμάτων οὐ βλεπομένων ἔλεγχος, i.e., the evidence or conviction of things not seen, Hebrews XI, 1. The mind is also convinced both by the authority of the promising God, and by the efficacy of the gospel to an undoubted assent. Faith is ὑπόστασις, the unterrified confidence of the soul, ibid.; it is πληροφορία, a making certain (a word frequent with ULPPIAN), a certain assent and full trust, Romans IV, 21. Colossians II, 2. Hebrews VI, 11; it is πεποίθησις, a firm persuasion, or an immovable adhesion of the soul to the divine promises, Ephesians III, 12, by which the believer is joined to the Lord, 1 Corinthians VI, 17, all of which designate the certainty of faith in the subject.

Proof b. Faith is a good tree producing good fruits, Matthew VII, 17, and bearing the fruits of righteousness, Philippians I, 11. Which noble fruits are either immanent, such as purity of heart and body, Acts XV, 9. 2 Corinthians VII, 1, peace of conscience, Romans V, 1, spiritual joy, Isaiah LXI, 10; or transient, such as are charity toward God and neighbor, hope of heavenly goods, access to God through sighs and prayers, patience victorious over evils, etc. Faith destitute of these fruits is dead, James II, 17. The certainty of faith.

Question XXII. Can a converted sinner be certain of his faith?

Converted and reborn men can and are accustomed to know with infallible certainty that they truly believe, both from the co-witnessing (συμμαρτυρία), or joint testimony of the Holy Spirit with the testimony of their own spirit, that is, of their illuminated and reborn soul a); and from the testing (δοκιμασία), examination or proof of faith b).

Proof a. Concerning the co-witnessing (συμμαρτυρία) of the Holy Spirit with our spirit, Paul says in Romans VIII, 16. "The Spirit Himself bears witness (συμμαρτυρεῖ) with our spirit that we are children of God"; and John, in his epistle V, 9. "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater; For this is the witness of God which He has testified of His Son; He who believes in the Son of God has the witness in himself." Here the testimony of the Holy Spirit and of our spirit concur. The testimony of the Holy Spirit is revealed, applied, and sealed, and is efficacious in our hearts. It is revealed in the word of the gospel: "He who believes in Christ is a Son of God," Galatians III, 26, "has remission of sins," Acts X, 43, "eternal life," John III, 16. This testimony of the Holy Spirit is applied and sealed through individual absolution and the administration of the sacraments. It is efficacious through spiritual movements. The testimony of our spirit, or of the illuminated and reborn soul, is this: I know and believe that the Holy Spirit dwells in me through faith. For so says John, in his epistle IV, 13. "By this we know that we abide in him, and he in us, because he has given us of his Spirit." This testimony of our spirit is experimental, about which AUGUSTINE says in book XIII on the Trinity, c. 1. "Each one sees his own faith in himself, and holds it with most certain knowledge."

Proof b. Concerning the testing (δοκιμασία), or examination and proof of faith, the Apostle says, 2 Corinthians XIII, 5. "Examine yourselves, whether you be in the faith; prove your own selves; Or do you not know that Jesus Christ is in you? Unless you are reprobates." As if to say: You can feel and experience in yourselves the virtue of Christ, who dwells in the hearts of the faithful. For he works faith in you; which you can notice and prove from the movements of the Holy Spirit, from the love of God, from prayers, from efficacious consolation, from a living hope, from peace of conscience, and spiritual joy: unless you have become altogether reprobate, i.e., unless by your impenitence you have lost faith and the Holy Spirit; for in these Christ has also ceased to work. This testing (δοκιμασία) of faith can be instituted from the antecedents, constituents, and consequents of faith. We prove our faith 1) from the antecedents of faith. Whoever has seriously detested his committed sins with sorrow, so that he has cast away the purpose of sinning, and has attentively listened to, read, and meditated on the word of the gospel, the Holy Spirit has regenerated him and endowed him with true faith; But I have seriously detested my sins with sorrow, etc. Therefore. The major is clear from 1 Peter 1, 23, where the word of the gospel is called the seed of regeneration; which certainly regenerates contrite hearts, in which stubborn resistance has ceased. The minor is established from the testimony of my spirit, or from the sense of my heart. We prove our faith 2) from the constituents of faith. I acknowledge the promise of the gospel concerning obtaining the grace of God for the sake of the satisfaction of Christ, and I approve it with my consent as most true, and therefore I accept the offered grace with ardent desire and singular trust; Therefore I have true faith. The reason for the consequence is: because the acts of faith are knowledge, assent, and trust. Our intellect, reflecting upon its own acts, knows that it knows, assents, and inclines the will to trust; from which reflection of the mind arises the experience of faith. We prove our faith 3) from the consequents of faith. Whoever loves God and his neighbor, confesses his Jesus, adores the Father in his name, crucifies his flesh, does not commit presumptuous sin, but sincerely keeps the divine law as far as is possible in the infirmity of this life, he is certain of his faith; But I love my God and my neighbor, etc. Therefore. The major is confirmed by most true biblical sayings, Galatians V, 6. 1 John IV, 13. John XVI, 23, collated with James I, 6. Galatians V, 24. 1 John III, 9. 1 John II, 3. The minor is established from the testimony of my spirit, or from the sense and experience of my heart, excited by the Holy Spirit dwelling in me, so that I can truly say with those blind men, Matthew IX, 28, with the father of the lunatic, Mark IX, 24, with the disciples of Christ, John VI, 69, with the eunuch, Acts VIII, 37, I BELIEVE; and even with Paul: I KNOW WHOM I HAVE BELIEVED, 2 Timothy I, 12, and also with John: "We have known and believed the love that God has for us," 1 Epistle IV, 16. Which examples are virtually universal, according to that of Paul, Romans XV, 4.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who deny that any man can be infallibly certain of his faith, unless by a new revelation, which they call privileged and special faith, it is manifested to him by God. They object:

I. Whatever is not revealed in the sacred scriptures, no one can infallibly believe; But it is revealed to no man in the Holy Scriptures that he truly believes; Therefore. The major is clear; because divine revelation is the formal object of faith. Response: Revealed is said in two ways: a) explicitly and formally; b) implicitly and virtually. If the major is understood in this way, that nothing is to be believed infallibly which is not expressly, formally, and in so many letters revealed, it is false; because when God has revealed something universally, he has virtually included the singulars. Whence a singular enunciation, which is elicited from a universal proposition, formally and explicitly revealed, by a good and ready consequence, is virtually revealed. Conclude: That every man who receives Christ the mediator with fiducial assent truly believes, is divinely revealed, John I, 12. I receive Christ the mediator with fiducial assent; Therefore that I truly believe is divinely revealed, not by a formal and explicit revelation, but by a virtual and implicit one. You say: I. The minor is not revealed, but depends on human sense. Response: It does not depend on human sense, but on the sense of a heart reborn through the grace of inhabitation. For "he who believes in the Son has the testimony of the Holy Spirit in himself," 1 John V, 10. The conclusion is of the same nature as the major proposition, which contains the principle of believing. You say: II. Even a hypocrite could appeal to the sense of his heart, and say: I believe. Response: The subject of faith is not a hypocrite, but a converted sinner, seriously detesting his sins with sorrow, and casting away the purpose of sinning. When a hypocrite says he believes, he lies, and is like a man dreaming of golden mountains, who when he rises, is a beggar.

II. Whoever does not feel faith, does not believe: A tempted man does not feel faith; Therefore a tempted man does not believe. The conclusion is absurd, the absurdity of which flows from the major. For indeed the Evangelicals wish to know the presence of faith from the sense of the heart. Response: From the sense of faith to faith itself, with Holy Scripture shining beforehand, it is rightly concluded affirmatively, but not so negatively, since in the severe heat of temptations faith lies hidden as if in a faint. For which reason, although a tempted man does not feel fiducial assent, yet he feels a hunger and thirst for righteousness, and a desire for faith and grace; Which desire in a tempted heart is faith, although it be small and weak, such as was that of the afflicted father: "I believe, Lord: Help my unbelief!" Mark IX, 24, who doubted not the sincerity of his faith, but its perfection. Therefore faith struggles in the tempted soul with unbelief.

SUSPIRIUM

To you, LORD JESUS, throne of grace and fount of salvation, I approach with filial trust, that I may receive mercy, and find grace for timely help, while the gate of salvation is open! I, a most sorrowful sinner, look upon you, who are the lamb of GOD, taking away the sins of the world: I come to you, poor, because you are my most precious treasure: I flee to you, because you are my safest asylum: I recline in you, as the firmest rock of salvation: I acquiesce in you, as the most tranquil harbor. My faith seeks you, desires and pants for you, as my mediator, and the cause of restored divine grace, and of obtaining the

CHAPTER VIII.
ON THE EFFECTS OF FAITH, OR
AND THEIR EXERCISE

Question I. What are good works?
Definition.

GOOD WORKS ARE the free acts of justified men, performed through the renewing grace of the Holy Spirit, according to the prescription of the divine law, with true faith in Christ shining beforehand, for the honor of God and the edification of men.

Obs. I. The works of reborn and justified men are called good, not absolutely, as if they were perfectly good; but in their own kind, because a) they derive their origin from the good Spirit of God, Psalm CXLIII, 10.; b) they proceed from a good heart, Matthew XII, 35.; c) they are in some measure conformable to the good will of God, expressed in the law, Romans XII, 2. and d) they intend a good end, the glory of God.

Obs. II. By works here are understood not only external actions that meet the eyes, but also internal affections of the heart, and movements of the will, and therefore the whole inherent obedience and righteousness of the reborn. Therefore, a distinction must be made between internal and external good works. The former are visible only to the eyes of God, and comprise the inner thoughts of the mind, movements of the will, and good affections of the heart; The latter are those which are conspicuous not only to the eyes of God, but also of men, and which manifest themselves through external gestures, words, and external actions. External, internal Good Works.

Question II. What is the efficient cause of good works? The efficient cause of Good Works.

The principal efficient cause of good works is God a), the Father b), the Son c), and in a special manner, or appropriatively, the Holy Spirit d). The subordinate and secondary cause, and the subject of denomination, is the reborn, justified, and renewed man, who produces good works not by natural powers, but by supernatural ones, received in regeneration and renewal from the Holy Spirit e).

Proof a. From Philippians II, 13. "It is God who works in you both to will and to do." Which words AUGUSTINE explains excellently, in his book on grace and free will, c. 17. "That we may will, God works without us; But when we will, that we may do, he cooperates with us; Yet without him either working, that we may will, or cooperating, when we will, we are capable of nothing towards the good works of piety."

Proof b. God the Father works even until now, not only in the kingdom of power, but also in the kingdom of grace and glory, John V, 17. He prunes the branches in Christ, that they may bear more fruit, John XV, 2. We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God has prepared, that we should walk in them, Ephesians II, 10.

Proof c. Christ says, John XV, 5. "I am the vine, you are the branches. He who abides in me, and I in him, he it is that bears much fruit; For without me you can do nothing."

Christ flows into the renewed man, as a vine into a branch. Whence whatever kind of work does not proceed from Christ, as the vine, through a gracious influx into the branch, is not counted by the name of a good work.

Proof d. Good works are the fruit of the Spirit, Galatians V, 22, who dwells in the reborn as in a temple, 1 Corinthians III, 16, he leads them, that they may act, Romans VIII, 14, he helps their infirmities, ibid. v. 26.

Proof e. The secondary cause of good works is the reborn, justified, and renewed man. For indeed the reborn man is created in Christ Jesus for good works, Ephesians II, 10. The Apostle speaks of regeneration, which is like a new creation. The justified man shows his faith by good works, James II, 18. The renewed man crucifies his flesh with its passions and concupiscences. Whence, living in the spirit, he walks in the spirit, Galatians V, 25. To walk in the spirit signifies to exercise the works of the spiritual life, and by them to testify to the grace of the indwelling Spirit. But the renewed man is the secondary cause of good works; because he is subordinated to God, and the grace of God moves man before he, moved by grace, acts. AUGUSTINE teaches this in his book on correction and grace, c. 2. "Let them understand, if they are sons of God, that they are led by the Spirit of God, that they may do what is to be done, and, when they have done it, that they may give thanks to him by whom they are led; for they are led that they may act, not that they themselves may do nothing." Meanwhile, however, that cooperation of the reborn in good works by no means excludes, but requires the perpetual help of the Holy Spirit.

Question III. Through which intervening principle does a renewed man produce good works?

The principle by which a renewed man performs good works is true and living faith in Christ a), which is called the cause of good works by emanation b).

Obs. The words of D. SEB. SCHMIDT in his later biblical college, p. 258, deserve to be noted here. "The reborn, or faithful, man is the principle which of good works: But his faith is the primary principle by which. I say the primary principle by which, to distinguish it from the secondary and proximate principle by which, which are the Christian virtues, e.g., charity, with respect to acts of charity. For faith does not produce acts of charity immediately, but mediately through charity; according to that of the Apostle: 'In Christ Jesus faith avails, which works through charity.'"

Proof a. From Galatians V, 6. "Faith works through charity." Where it is to be accurately observed that faith, in order to the production of good works, fulfills a twofold function. One is that it determines the intellect to assent, both in general to all things which are revealed in the sacred scriptures, and in particular to the promises concerning the gratuitous remission of sins for Christ's sake: For thus, practical conclusions being deduced, it prescribes what is to be done, and what is to be avoided, with the addition of reasons and motives, by which the will is impelled to follow the study of piety. In another way, faith inclines the will itself, in which it also subjectively inheres, to resist the depraved concupiscence of the flesh, and to do that which the intellect, concerning any spiritual object already believed, prescribes by way of practical judgment. See BAYER in Compend. p. 780.

Proof b. From Matthew V, 16. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." Just as the sun scatters its rays, the soul its faculties, a tree its fruits, spontaneously and without laborious effort; so the sun of faith of its own accord emits the rays of good works from itself. For faith is something living, efficacious, powerful, so that it cannot but always work well. Nor does faith first ask whether good works are to be done; but before inquiry is made about it, it has already effected many works, and is always occupied in acting, as the words of LUTHER in his preface to the epistle to the Romans, rendered into Latin, are read in the Form. Concord. p. 701. Therefore AMBROSE, cited in the Augsburg Confession, article XX, calls faith the mother of good will and just action; and AUGUSTINE calls it the root and mother of good works, epistle 143. D. KOENIG says nervously in his positive theology on faith, §. 908. "As to the influx into the production of good works, faith has itself in analogy to a form to its properties, of which it is the cause by emanation."

Question IV. What is the norm of good works? The Norm of Good Works.

The adequate and infallible norm of good works is the divine law, comprehended in the decatalogue, which perfectly and sufficiently commands things to be done, and prohibits things to be avoided.

Proof. From Deuteronomy XII, 32. "What thing soever I command you, observe to do it; thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it." In doing good works, the divine law is to be perpetually regarded, as a mirror of the divine will and an express image of divine justice.

Question V. Is conscience the norm of good works?

The conscience of a renewed man is not indeed the primary and simply infallible norm of good works a). Yet it can be called a secondary norm of good works, insofar as it applies the divine law to a particular or singular action, and shows what is to be done here and now b).

Proof a. Conscience is not a norm that norms, because it is normed by the divine law; nor is it an infallible norm, because from original sin and the lapses of infirmity even in the reborn the judgment of conscience is blunted. Therefore the Apostle says in 1 Corinthians IV, 4, "For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified," as if to say, The celestial Judge is so sharp-sighted, or perspicacious, that he sees many defects in us, which escape the eye of conscience. But the norm of things to be done and avoided ought to be infallible.

Proof b. The end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned, 1 Timothy I, 5. Charity is born from a pure heart, i.e., justified and renewed; from a good conscience, which, as POLO notes on this passage, is not badly described as being the conformity between the law of the mind and the law of God; from a faith not hypocritical, but true, which is the mother of good will and just action.

Question VI. Is the gospel the norm of good works?

The gospel is not the norm, or directive principle of good works, but it is a collative and productive principle; Collative, because it confers the Holy Spirit, by whose impulse, bestowing of strength, and cooperation we work well; Productive, because it produces faith, the foundation of every good action. I seek the proof of this assertion from the solid declaration of the Formula of Concord, p. 720. "It must be distinctly explained what the gospel does for the new obedience of believers, and what is the office of the law (with respect to the works of believers). For the law indeed inculcates that it is the will and command of God that we should walk in newness of life; But it does not grant the strength and ability by which we can begin and perform new obedience. But the Holy Spirit, who is given and received not through the preaching of the law, but of the gospel, Galatians III, 2, renews the heart of man. Then the same Spirit uses the ministry of the law, to teach the reborn through it, and to show them in the decatalogue what is the good and acceptable will of God," Romans XII, 2, "that they may know in which works they should labor, which God has prepared, that we should walk in them," Ephesians II, 10.

Question VII. What is the form of good works?

The form, or formal reason of good works, when they are considered absolutely and in themselves, is conformity with the law of God (ἐννομία) a); but when they are regarded in relation to the special complacency of God, insofar as, although they do not exactly conform to the law, they are nevertheless pleasing to God, their form is faith in Christ b). The Form of Good Works.

Proof a. The goodness of every work, to be done according to the prescription of a certain norm, consists in its agreement with its norm.

Proof b. By the very fact that good works do not exactly agree with the law, they cannot be simply and absolutely pleasing to God, as on account of their agreement with the norm; And therefore the form, in view of which they are pleasing to God, is not that imperfect conformity (ἐννομία), but faith in Christ. For 1) the faithful are pleasing to God, and are not under the law, but under grace, Romans VI, 14. Whence 2) their good works, as spiritual sacrifices, are accepted through faith in Christ, without which no one can please God, Hebrews XI, 6. And although 3) those works are imperfect and impure, they are nevertheless pleasing to God; because their stains are covered by the veil of the most perfect obedience of Christ, which the reborn apply to themselves by faith and make their own, and the same 4) do them not from the coercion of the law, but from the renewal of the Holy Spirit, promptly and spontaneously from the heart, Psalm CX, 3; 2 Corinthians IX, 7.

Question VIII. Are the honest works of the unregenerate truly good and pleasing to God?

The honest works of unregenerate men, which contribute to external discipline and the preservation of human society, are civilly and morally good in some way a); but they are not theologically and spiritually good, nor do they please God b), and so, insofar as they are destitute of the requisites of truly good works, they are rightly called splendid sins c).

Obs. The virtues and excellent deeds of the gentiles, e.g., the liberality of Cimon, the fortitude of Alexander, the continence of Scipio, the justice of Aristides, etc., are considered good before the human forum; but before the divine forum they are not truly good, nor do they please God.

Proof a. From Romans II, 14. "The Gentiles, which have not the law, do τὰ τοῦ νόμου, the things of the law." The gentiles have a law not prescribed divinely, but inscribed by nature. Wherefore, with nature as their guide, they were able to do τὰ τοῦ νόμου, some things (not all) which are of the law. Which works of the unregenerate, although, as to the substance of the act, they import some conformity with the law and right reason; yet in their circumstances they deviate from the rule of rectitude in many ways. For the human will (of the unregenerate) can in some way effect civil righteousness, or that of works: It can speak of God, exhibit a certain worship to God in external work, obey magistrates, parents, in choosing an external work, it can restrain hands from murder, from adultery, from theft, as the Apology of the Augsburg Confession teaches, p. 218.

Proof b. Works that are spiritually good and accepted by God are 1) the fruit of the Holy Spirit, Galatians V, 22, by whose indwelling grace the unregenerate are destitute. 2) They are done by friends of God, or by persons reconciled to God through Christ, John XV, 14; Romans V, 10. But the unregenerate are enemies of God, Colossians 1, 21. 3) Good works proceed from a pure heart, a good conscience, and unfeigned faith, 1 Timothy I, 5. "But unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled," Titus I, 15. The mind of the unbelieving is polluted, because they do not know the true God in a saving manner. Their conscience is polluted, because they do not rightly apply the norm of the divine law to things to be done, nor do they judge incorruptibly about things done. Finally, they are devoid of saving faith, without which nothing is pleasing to God, Hebrews XI, 6. 4) Good works are spontaneous and free actions, 2 Corinthians IX, 7. But the honest works of gentiles and the unregenerate are either extorted by fear of punishment, or elicited by love and hope of reward. 5) Truly good works are directed to the glory of God, Matthew V, 16; the unregenerate by their honest deeds seek their own glory: for they are proud and boastful, Romans 1, 30.

Proof c. The honest works of the unregenerate are called sins, because they are destitute of the requisites of truly good works. And indeed, this defect of actions is not supplied by the imputation of an alien righteousness; since the unregenerate do not accept the vicarious obedience of Christ and apply it to themselves by faith, but repudiate it by their unbelief (ἀπιστία). But now, "whatsoever is not of faith is sin."

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who assert that unbelieving men can perform truly good works. They argue:

I. Whoever does τὰ τοῦ νόμου (the things of the law), they do good works (because ὁ νόμος, or the law, is the norm of good works): But the gentiles etc. Romans 11, 14. Therefore. Response: a) Whoever perfectly does all the things that are of the law, they do truly good works (*): But the gentiles deviated enormously from the law. b) A

(*) "This indeed will not defeat that opposition, since something can be truly good, although it is not perfectly good, and b. The Author a little before accurately taught that born-again men, whose works are truly good, can never attain to performing all duties perfectly. But these things will be especially to be noted. 1) It must be firmly held that the divine law must be considered in two ways, first materially (to use a common manner of speaking): insofar as it commands man actions suitable to human nature, useful, indeed necessary, for there is no law which commands us any other action, unless it be some medium to human felicity, to living well and blessedly; then formally, insofar as it is the sanction and precept of God, and has its binding force from the decree of the supreme distinction is made between a work that is civilly, or morally good in some way, and a work that is theologically, spiritually, and evangelically good, which is the fruit of the Holy Spirit and thus shines forth from true faith in Christ. The honest works of the gentiles are not good before the political forum, but are contaminated by sins, although they are esteemed morally good before the forum of the world.

II. If the honest works of the gentiles are not good because they are imperfect, neither will the works of Christians be good, because they are likewise imperfect; But the works of Christians are good, notwithstanding their imperfection; Therefore the works of the gentiles are also good, although they are imperfect. Response; Deny the consequence; because the works of Christians are called good not on account of their perfection, but because they are done sincerely for the glory of God, according to the prescription of the law, by the guidance of the Holy Spirit, by persons reconciled to God through faith in Christ, from a free heart; which requisites the works of the unregenerate lack.

III. The virtuous works of the unregenerate are either good or evil; They are not evil; because they are not contrary to the law of nature; Therefore they are good. Response; I concede the whole argument, that they are good 1) morally to some extent, Legislator. Not in the latter, but only in the former way is τὰ τοῦ νόμου ποιεῖν (to do the things of the law), and even νόμον τελέσαι (to fulfill the law) said in Romans II, 14 and 27. The mind of the unrenowned man, always hostile to God, and therefore not at all obedient to the will of God, Romans VIII, 7, wherefore man indeed feels the force of conscience, Romans II, 15, but most unwillingly, and not without the most vehement resistance of his desires, as long as he himself is not reconciled to God; but he serves himself and his own interests solely. Not because God has ordered him to do it, but because he understands it to be advantageous for himself, and suitable for his own uses, he does τὰ τοῦ νόμου. The same is the reason for natural repentance. A man repents of a bad deed, he regrets it, and is ashamed. But why? Not because he acted unjustly and violated the divine law; but because he managed his own affair unwisely and incautiously, and harmed himself. 2) The difference must be carefully observed, which is indeed very great a) between virtue and its exercise, which is always directed to the norm of right reason, and a natural propensity, which proceeds from a man's temperament, which is commonly said to arise, as a sanguine person, although he thinks neither of God nor of the divine laws, is by his nature inclined and prone to compassion and liberality; and b) between moral virtue, which is the highest study of obedience towards God, from the reason of conscience, illuminated by the word of God (because God has commanded this, forbidden that), and civil virtue, from a reason no other than political, by which a man, prudent indeed, but not religious and a lover of God, has respect to men and the bond of human society. 3) Beware of confusing these two things: It is one thing to do the law, νόμον ποιεῖν; another, to do it lawfully, νομίμως, 1 Timothy I, 8; 2 Timothy II, 5. To be sure, in every action conformable to the law, several circumstantial things are joined, determined by the laws, of which if you neglect even one, the action is not that very one which the Legislator commanded you. Therefore it is not truly good, but what seems good is evil, and thus a specious cause and a splendid sin. E.g., one must labor diligently; but if you have exceeded the measure, if arrogance or avarice has inflamed your mind with the pursuit of assiduous labor, if you have consumed holy time, destined for the public worship of God and the tranquility of your own mind, in labor, you have certainly sinned much. This distinction of an action considered in itself, and of the circumstantial things which pertain to it, that it may be truly good, declares the truth of this most certain statement; When two do the same, it is not the same. But the chief of those circumstantial things are: right principles, namely trust in the grace of a reconciled God through Christ, and love for God, 1 John V, 3; the manner of acting, and finally, just ends. But the principle of every action, if it seem ever so good, which a man not yet renewed undertakes and performs, is always false; Therefore the whole action must necessarily be false. You always act, whatever you do, impelled by self-love (Φιλαυτία), which is for you the first, indeed the only, principle of acting, and therefore a perverse self-love. From which 1) you do only that which is agreeable to your natural propensity, or to political reason, 2) only that which seems pleasant and fruitful to you. In other things you deflect from the law knowingly and willingly, and the mindset (φρόνημα) of one not yet reconciled to God cannot but be enmity against God (ἔχθρα εἰς Θεόν). Romans VIII, 7.

2) as to the substance of the act being in some measure conformable to the law *),<sup>3113</sup>) before human judgment. But they are evil 1) spiritually, 2) as to their circumstances, 3) before the divine judgment.

IV. Whatever is affected by rewards from God is good; But the honest works of the gentiles etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because God never affects with rewards that which is evil. The minor is proven by the example of the midwives in Egypt, Exodus 1, 20. Response: 1) Those midwives were either Hebrews, as most Rabbis think, or of Egyptian origin, but converted to the faith of the Israelites; otherwise the Hebrew women would not have so easily entrusted themselves to them. 2) God affects the virtues of the gentiles directed toward honesty with temporal rewards, but does not dignify them with eternal rewards.

V. Cornelius the gentile performed good works. For he was a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always, Acts X, 2. Response: Cornelius was a proselyte, who, having rejected idolatry, was converted and justified. He believed in the Messiah with a saving faith, but was destitute of this dogmatic, or historical, faith, that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, the gospel concerning the exhibited Christ not yet being widely propagated (*).<sup>312</sup>

Question IX. Are works of free choice truly good works, accepted by God?

Works of free choice, which anyone devises for himself with a good intention, or which are done according to human traditions, are not truly good works, pleasing and approved by God.

Proof. 1) Because the adequate norm of good works is the divine law, Psalm XIX, 8; Deuteronomy IV, 2. Therefore whatever is commanded by the divine law neither immediately and formally, nor mediately and virtually, that is not a good work, pleasing to God. 2) Because works of free choice are vain, and devoid of all fruit. "In vain do they worship me with the commandments of men," Matthew XV, 9. "Who has required this at your hand?" Isaiah I, 12. 3) They are expressly prohibited and rejected. "Every plant, which my heavenly Father has not planted, shall be rooted up," Matthew XV, 13. By a plant not planted by God, Christ understands a work not commanded by God. Confer Ezekiel XX, 18.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who state that worship chosen at one's own discretion is pleasing to God; whence so many works of free choice flourish among them, fasts, vows, fraternities, the cult of saints, monasticism. They rely on the following arguments:

I. The patriarchs, Abel, Genesis IV, 4, Noah, Genesis VIII, 20, and others offered sacrifices to God, to which they were bound by no divine command. Therefore the divine law does not command all good works. Response: a) In the words of BELLARMINE from book 1 on the mass, chap. 2. "God first without doubt inspired Abel, and other holy men, with the use of sacrifices." Divine inspiration is an internal command. b) The sacrifices were offered by faith, Hebrews XI, 4. Therefore they pleased God. But sacrifices which God did not require are not pleasing to him, Isaiah I, 12. From which we conclude that the sacrifices were required and commanded by God.

(*) "And not even that should be affirmed so simply. For to the entire substance of an action two parts are required; One is the internal occupation of the mind, applied to that thing with great pleasure; The other then is the external consummation of the work. The mind of a man not yet renewed is entirely empty of truly good and holy movements. In it there is never love for God, unless it is false and mercenary, never filial fear of God, such as it certainly ought to be, never the pursuit of true, perpetual, and common salvation, always false and corrupt self-love (φιλαυτία), reigning everywhere. Therefore the Augsburg Confession, art. 18, most rightly animadverts on those who teach that without the Holy Spirit, by the sole powers of nature, we can do the precepts of God, as to the SUBSTANCE OF THE ACTS (namely the whole, by reason of both those parts); For although nature can effect EXTERNAL works IN SOME WAY, for it can restrain the hand from theft, from murder; yet it cannot effect the INTERIOR MOTIONS."

(*) "Grant that he was not in the number of the proselytes of justice. This is certain, that he was already imbued with the knowledge of Christ, and indeed of Jesus of Nazareth, born and consummated; for Peter expressly testifies this, Acts X, 36, 37. See Smalcald Articles, p. 332."

II. The ordinances of the church, of councils, and of bishops are to be duly observed; although they do not have an express command of God. "He that heareth you," says Christ, "heareth me," Luke X, 16. "Obey them that have the rule over you," Hebrews XIII, 17. Response: Christ granted to the church, to councils, and to the Apostles themselves a power not absolute, but circumscribed by the limits of his commands, Matthew XXVIII, 20. And St. Paul expressly testifies that it is not lawful for himself, nor for the other Apostles, to propose anything beyond the gospel received from Christ, Galatians 1, 8.

Nevertheless, those things are observed which have been sanctioned and handed down with wise counsel either by sincere and more ancient councils, or by pious leaders of the churches; not under the opinion of worship, but for the sake of decency (εὐσχημοσύνης); They are observed as adiaphora, not as necessary requisites of divine worship.

III. Whatever things are directed to a good end with a good intention, those are truly good and pleasing to God. Works of free choice are directed to a good end with a good intention; Therefore. The major shines with its own light; because the goodness of an action is judged from the goodness of the end. The minor is proven by an example: If someone were to piously meditate on a pilgrimage to the sepulcher of Christ, that work would not be divinely commanded, and yet it would be good. Response: 1) A good intention, respecting a good end, is not sufficient in spiritual matters, unless that end is intended through means ordained by God. 2) A pilgrimage to the sepulcher of Christ is not evil in itself, provided that the opinion of worship pleasing to God in itself, or the trust of some merit, by which the grace of God and righteousness valid before God is acquired, does not accompany it.

IV. Whatever holy men have done is imitable (because they supply examples of virtues); Holy men have done works of free choice; Therefore. The minor is proven a) by the example of the Rechabites, Jeremiah XXXV, 6, to whom their father Jonadab had commanded abstinence from wine, from agriculture, from the habitation of houses. b) The Apostles ordered the gentiles to abstain from things strangled and from blood, Acts XV, 20, which Christ, however, had never commanded. Response: Whatever good work holy men have done according to the prescription of the divine word is imitable. The major being thus limited, the minor is denied. For a) abstinence from wine, from agriculture, from the habitation of houses are not properly speaking good works, because they are nowhere prescribed in the law; but at least secondary aids, by which the sons of Jonadab were called away from drunkenness, avarice, and pride. Meanwhile, however, the Rechabites were bound to obedience by the fourth commandment of the decalogue. Therefore their obedience was not will-worship (ἐθελοθησκεία). Nor b) is abstinence from blood and from things strangled a moral good work, but it was sanctioned by the Apostles so that the converted gentiles might better coalesce into one body; for the Jews were greatly offended by the eating of blood and things strangled.

Question X. How are good works to be distinguished? Division of Good Works.

Good works are to be distinguished by reason of their object, which is God, the neighbor, and the man himself who is working.

Proof. Some works pertain immediately to the love of God, others to the love of neighbor, others to the love of ourselves, which are to be considered distinctly according to the individual precepts of both tables of the decalogue. See above, section 1 of this chapter, Q. XXVII ff. The Apostle Paul, having respect to the threefold object of good works, gravely warns that we should live piously (εὐσεβῶς) and holy towards God; justly (δικαίως) towards our neighbor; soberly (σωφρόνως), chastely, temperately towards ourselves, Titus II, 12. For with these three adverbs the Apostle has comprehended all the duties of the Christian life. Moreover, the good works which are comprehended in the individual precepts of the decalogue are either internal or external. See Q. I.

Question XI. Are some works of the law, others of grace, or of the spirit?

In a general sense, all good works of the reborn and the unregenerate, considered by reason of their norm, are works of the law; but the same, viewed by reason of their efficient cause, differ. For thus the works of the regenerate are fruits of the spirit; but the works of the unregenerate are absolutely called works of the law. I seek the proof of this assertion again from the solid declaration of the Formula of Concord, p. 721.

"There is a difference in the works because of the difference of the men who strive to live according to the law and will of God. For a man not yet reborn, however much he lives according to the law of God, and does the works of the law, does so because they are commanded in that way: And he renders that obedience out of fear of punishment, or hope of some reward: He is still under the law, as a servant, and his works are properly called by St. PAUL works of the law; because such works are extorted by the law: And these are Cain-like saints (i.e., hypocrites). But when a man is reborn through the Holy Spirit, and freed from the law, i.e., from the coercion of the law, and is now led by the Spirit of God; then he lives according to the immutable will of God revealed in the law; all things, insofar as he is reborn, he does with a free and ready spirit," 1 Timothy I, 9. "And such works are properly not works of the law, but works and fruits of the spirit: Or as Paul calls them, they are said to be the law of the mind and the law of Christ," Romans VII, 23 & VIII, 2. "For these men are no longer under the law, but under grace. And although they are in the law, and live and walk according to the law of God, they are not, however, under the law, that is, they do good works from the coercion of the law."

Question XII. Is a good purpose also to be counted among good works?

A good purpose is to be counted among internal good works.

Proof. 1) A good purpose is an intention of the will, conformable to the divine law; since the law is conformable not only to external acts, but also especially to internal acts of the mind and will, a good work not indeed external, but internal. 2) Just as an evil purpose, arising from a depraved desire, is a sin; So a good purpose is a good work.

Question XIII. For what ends do we do good works? The End of Good Works.

Since our good works are concerned with God, our neighbor, and ourselves, good works vary with respect to this threefold object. The ultimate and principal end of our good works is the glory of God a). The secondary end is the edification of our neighbor b) and of ourselves c).

Proof a. From Matthew V, 16. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." We glorify God, a) by rendering prompt obedience to his will and command, 1 Thessalonians IV, 3. b) by declaring our gratitude, Colossians III, 17. c) by imitating the holiness of God, as far as can be done in this way of life, Leviticus XIX, 2; 1 Peter I, 15.

Proof b. We do good works for our neighbor's sake, that we may 1) love him, Leviticus XIX, 18, and by loving, relieve the afflicted, Matthew XXV, 35. 2) scandalize no one, 1 Corinthians X, 32. 3) either win over the impious by good deeds, or, if they are obstinate, put them to shame, 1 Peter III, 16; Titus II, 8. 4) confirm and edify the pious more and more, 1 Thessalonians V, 11.

Proof c. We should do good works for our own sake: 1) To declare our faith by good works, James II, 18. 2) To make our calling and election sure (as far as it can be known, and a posteriori), 2 Peter 1, 10. 3) To live a life worthy of Christians who are illuminated, converted, reborn, justified, mystically united with God and renewed, Ephesians IV, 1; Philippians I, 27; Colossians 1, 10. 4) To obtain from the most benign God gratuitous rewards, spiritual, corporal, and eternal. For "godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." To the exercises of piety are promised the corporal goods of this present life, Deuteronomy XXVIII, 1 ff., spiritual augmentations and establishments of grace and righteousness, Ephesians IV, 15; Philippians 1, 6. The eternal rewards are degrees of celestial glory, not the common and essential glory itself, which is called a free gift (χάρισμα) in Romans VI, 23. 5) Lest by the omission of good works we should work evil, and bring upon ourselves temporal and eternal punishments, Matthew III, 10; Romans VIII, 13.

Question XIV. What are the affections of good works?

Good works, however many there are, are a) imperfect actions; b) free and spontaneous; c) necessary for those to be saved. Affections of Good Works.

Question XV. Are the works of reborn and renewed men imperfect?

The good works of reborn and renewed men neither rise to such a degree of perfection that they cannot grow a); nor do they correspond exactly to the norm of the divine law b); nor are they so consummate that they can sustain the rigid examination of divine justice c); but they are imperfect d). Imperfect Good Works.

Proof a. From Ephesians IV, 15. "Being without guile in love, let us grow up into him in all things, who is the head, even Christ." The scope of Paul's apostolic instruction is a more abundant progress in the souls of his hearers or readers, not only of knowledge, but also of love and of good works, so that under the head Christ, to whom they are joined by faith, like members, they may grow and aspire to perfection. But as long as a member is growing, it has not yet reached the highest degree of perfection.

Proof b. From Romans VII, 14. "For we know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal." Renewed men, being partly carnal, do not render an obedience perfect in all its parts to the law, which demands an internal and full obedience of the heart, because the law is weakened through the flesh, Romans VIII, 3.

Proof c. From Psalm CXLIII, 2. "Enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." The works of the most pious king David did not shine with such purity that they could sustain the examination of the censorial judgment of God.

Proof d. From James III, 2. "In many things we all stumble." LACTANTIUS says aptly in book IV of his institutes, c. 24. "The mortal condition does not permit a man to be pure from every stain."

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, Schwenckfeldians, and Anabaptists, who assert the perfection of good works. Their principal arguments are:

I. Whatever works are not perfect cannot be called good; But the works of the reborn are called good, Titus III, 8. Therefore. The major shines with its own light; because good is judged from the whole cause, evil from any defect. Response: Whatever works are not perfect cannot be called absolutely and simply good; I concede. But the works of the reborn are called good not absolutely or simply, but in a certain respect and with a certain regard, namely κατὰ τὸ ἐπικρατοῦν, from the better part, or from the prevailing quality. For if a work is good in its kind, and the spirit prevails, it will be a good work; But if a work is good in its kind, and yet the flesh prevails (as if someone gives alms to the poor, or offers prayers, only to be seen by men, and to gain praise from it), it will be an evil work. Nevertheless, even in that first work, if God wished to act rigidly and to judge strictly, some imperfection and infection would be found; which, while it is not imputed to the reborn who believes in Christ, the work is accepted by God as good for Christ's sake, by whose benefit whatever stain is left in it is covered. Conf. DANNHAVER. in hodom. Pap. phantasm. IX. p. 175.

II. No good tree can bring forth evil fruit, says Christ, Matthew VII, 18. But a reborn man is a good tree, Psalm I, 3. Therefore. Response: 1) No perfectly good tree can bring forth evil fruit; I concede; But a reborn man is not perfectly good. 2) The major is to be taken in a composite sense, or formally and reduplicatively, in this manner: No good tree, insofar as it is good, can bring forth evil fruit; otherwise, if it is taken in a divided and material sense, it is false, for the just, who are good trees, can sin venially, as our adversaries admit. Venial sins, however, are not the fruits of good, but of evil. Furthermore, the just are not yet so confirmed in good that they cannot, overcome by the flesh, sin mortally.

Instance: If the works of the regenerate are fruits of evil, they will not be good works, but sins, filth, and defilements. Response: We do not say that the good works of the regenerate are evil fruits, or sins, in themselves and formally, but that they are imperfectly good works, to which some stain of sin adheres.

III. Every branch grafted into Christ bears perfect fruit, or a perfectly good work; but the regenerate are etc. John XV, 2. E. The major is proven from the requisites of perfect fruits. For the spiritual branches are in the vine, Christ, John XV, 4. They draw from Him the sap of grace, John IV, 14. They have sufficient heat, Luke XXIV, 32. There is no impediment, neither internal, Rom. VIII, 1, nor external, Rom. VIII, 38. E. Nothing is lacking for regenerate men, that they should not be able to bear perfectly good fruits. Response: There is indeed an internal impediment, namely, the original evil concupiscence; which although it does not actually condemn the regenerate, it nevertheless tempts to sin. From it the spiritual branches draw a certain vicious sap, whence they do not bear perfectly good fruits.

IV. Whatever works are like gold, silver, and precious stones remaining in the fire, and receiving a reward, those are perfect; But the works of certain regenerate men etc. 1 Cor. III, 12. 13. E. The major is clear; because gold, silver, and precious stones have a notable perfection over wood, hay, and stubble; They are tested by fire; because they withstand the fire of divine judgment; They receive a reward; because they have a sufficient proportion to the reward. Response: The Apostle in this place is not dealing with the life and works of the regenerate, but with teachers, and their doctrine; which if it is pure and uncorrupted, and consonant with the word of God, as a dogmatic foundation, is compared to gold for its purity, preciousness, and durability.

V. Whatever work is commanded by God with a good intention, that is perfect; But the work of a regenerate man (e.g., almsgiving) is a work commanded by God, and is done with a good intention, namely to relieve an afflicted neighbor; Therefore. The major is established from Matthew VI, 22. "If your eye is single, your whole body will be full of light," i.e., if your intention is good, your whole work will be good. Response; a) The intention makes the work praiseworthy to a certain extent, but not perfect; because for perfection an exact conformity with the divine law is required. d) By the single eye is not understood a right intention, but the light of the mind kindled by the Holy Spirit through the word (*); whose guidance if the

(*) It appears indeed from the coherence and scope of the words, by the similitude drawn from the eye, that in this place is signified a right counsel and purpose, or, as it is commonly said, a right intention; for it is opposed to the false, as was the custom of the Pharisees, v. 1. 2. 5. 16. But 1) it is most true, that that right intention is like the eye of an illuminated mind; the false, on the contrary, like the eye of a mind obscured by the darkness of errors. 2) If it is true and consonant with the divine will, it will certainly happen, that the renewed man will use no other means than just ones, and will also observe the manner of acting, divinely prescribed, with as much accuracy as he can. For to obtain just ends, the means to be employed cannot be sufficiently suitable, unless they are just; since human wisdom will never be able to find anything better and more suitable than what the most wise legislator has prescribed; Nor can there be any just means, except those destined by God for seeking and attaining some just end, or several. Therefore, the coupling and comparison of ends and means is so necessary, that, if the proposed ends are truly just, just and entirely suitable means cannot but be used, and if these were unjust, the end seems good, but is not. To illustrate the matter with one or two examples; If someone seems to himself to have undertaken a certain action with the intention of worshipping God in some special way, but that action does not agree with the divine law, he has found a false means, indulging his own genius; which he certainly would not have found, unless a false opinion had deceived him about the end he set for himself, namely, what and of what kind the worship of God ought to be. For to the true manner of worshipping God there can be no other means, than those which are destined by divine authority for this end; and if it were otherwise, this absurdity would follow, that there would be some defect in the divine laws, as to the means prescribed to us, and that man could supply that defect with his own wisdom. So likewise, if anyone, with the intention of being liberal and generous to the poor, should steal a great amount of wealth from a rich man, since that very ample means is entirely unjust, the end also is not truly good. For there is nothing less than true liberality, to be liberal with what belongs to another. Besides this, there is something to be accurately weighed, which I will briefly explain. For the intention of man, as it is called, to be truly good, two things are required. It is not sufficient, 1) that the end which he sets before himself is commanded by God; but it is also necessary, 2) that this precept of his be known by the man, and that the man be studious of this end for this very reason, because the divine constitution so demands. For there can be no observance of the law and agreement of an action with the law, without a right and sufficient knowledge and conscience of it. But he, whose mind is to obey God in one thing, and to do that which is commanded by God, and to do it because God has so commanded it; he will certainly burn with no less zeal to obey God in all other things, led by the same reason, because God has commanded all those actions equally; by virtue of this axiom: Where the reason is the same, there the consequence cannot but be the same. See James II, 10. 11. I will complete the argument; The end is that to which the whole action with all its surrounding circumstances pertains, nor would that action be commanded, unless the ends were proposed; Therefore, he who pursues a truly good, and truly known end, because God has established it, with the highest zeal, and provides that there be nothing in heart follows in desiring, the hand in doing, the tongue in speaking, the whole work is full of light, but not immediately totally; just as the moon at its full is called bright, yet it is nevertheless joined with spots, darkness, and parallax.

VI. Whatever works are imperfectly good, on account of the adhering stain of sin, these are not pleasing to God; But the works of the regenerate are pleasing to God; Therefore, they are not imperfect on account of the adhering stain of sin. The major is established; because the stain of sin is not pleasing to God, and therefore neither are the works infected with that stain. Response: The good works of the regenerate are considered either νομικῶς and legally, inasmuch as they are measured against the law, as a norm; or ευαγγελικῶς, inasmuch as they are considered as works of the regenerate who believe in Christ. Legally regarded, they are not pleasing to God absolutely and simply; but in a certain respect, and insofar as they are conformed to the law and good; but evangelically considered, they are pleasing to God absolutely and simply. For although in themselves they are imperfect, and the adhering imperfections cannot please God; yet because they proceed from faith in Christ, and are done by those who are in Christ Jesus, and in whom there is no κατὰκριμα, Rom. VIII, 1; the adhering imperfections are forgiven to the doers freely, for the sake of Christ's merit, apprehended by faith, and therefore their works are simply pleasing to God, as if they were altogether and in every way perfect, for the sake of Christ's merit, apprehended by faith.

VII. If the good works of the just were sins, God Himself would sin: The consequent is blasphemous: Therefore, also the antecedent. The consequence is proven: because God Himself works in us both to will and to do, Phil. II, 13. Response: 1) We do not assert that the good works of the just are in themselves and formally sins, but that they are indeed good, yet are vitiated by certain circumstances. 2) The defect adhering to the good works of the regenerate is not to be attributed to the first cause, perfectly influencing and operating; but to the second cause, or man, not perfectly receiving the influx and operation of God; Just as the generation of animals from the sun is not attributed to their vice or defect.

Question XVI. Are there works of supererogation?

Works of Supererogation. Since the regenerate do not perfectly perform the works which they are bound to do by divine law; much less will they perfectly execute those which they are not bound to do. Proof: Because the divine law demands of us the highest perfection, Deut. VI, 5. Matth. XXII, 37. Mark XII, 30. Rom. VII, 14. but no mortal in this infirmity of life attains that peak of perfection; since there is no man who does not sin, 1 Kings VIII, 46; it is easy to conjecture that we wayfarers cannot attain a higher degree of perfection, transcending the precepts of God (*). The antithesis is of the Papists, who dream of works of supererogation; for whom works of supererogation are undue works, to which man is not obligated by divine precept. The Papists object:

I. Paul testifies in 1 Cor. IX, 15 that he preached the gospel for free, though he could have demanded compensation for his labors by a most just right; Therefore, the preaching of the gospel, done for free by Paul, was a work of supererogation. Response: According to the circumstances, it is not always seeking that end not consonant with the divine will; he will certainly, for the same reason, equally take care, lest anything in the whole action be committed by him, which does not agree with the divine will. This I believe to be the meaning of Christ's words, and this its reason; so that it is one thing, when we say: if you have proposed to yourself a truly good end, as we have now explained, you will be zealous for the whole good action; but it is quite another, what the Roman Catholics, especially the Doctors of the Society of Jesus, profess: that a good intention (which, if it is separated from the other things pertaining to the action, and commanded by God, can never be truly good) is sufficient for a good action. How absurd this is, and contrary to all reason, the necessity of the coupling of ends and means, and of all the surrounding circumstances that constitute the entire action, can teach anyone.

(*) And indeed there can never be any degree of perfection greater than the entire divine law, whatever man's condition may be. For he always depends safely on the will of God, and he has no strength to act, unless it is given to him by the benevolence of God; and nothing can ever be done by him, unless it is determined by the will and legislation of God.

expedient that we do what is permitted. Sometimes regard must be had for weak brethren, and even for detractors, lest anyone be offended. Paul, to refute the opinion of those who thought that he was eager for temporal goods, preached the gospel for free. But we are commanded by the divine word to avoid offenses or scandals to the weak, Matth. XVIII, 7. 1 Cor. VIII, 13.

II. The Samaritan says to the innkeeper, Luke X, 35, "If you spend anything more, I will repay you." Response: a) Allegorical theology is not argumentative. b) The Greek source flows thus: "Whatever more you spend, I, when I return, will restore to you." The Samaritan is an example of a beneficent and merciful man; whatever good he bestows on the afflicted and sick, he does according to the prescription of the divine law, Lev. XIX, 18. The innkeeper also does not exceed the perfection of the mandate. For when the Samaritan says: "Take care of him," he certainly commands the innkeeper to see to it that the sick man lacks nothing. If the innkeeper, after the two denarii were spent, had then neglected the sick man, and had spent no more for him, would he not have openly transgressed the command: "Take care of him" (**)?

Question XVII. Are the good works of the regenerate free actions?

Liberty of the Regenerate. Good works are not free actions from the necessity of obligation or duty a); but they are called free actions from the necessity of coercion b) and immutability c), and are done spontaneously by the regenerate, through the Holy Spirit who has freed them from the servitude of sin d).

Proof a. Since all men, and especially those who have been regenerated and renewed by the Holy Spirit, are debtors to do good works, as the Epitome of the Formula of Concord teaches, p. 589. For the good works which are commanded in the decalogue are not to be considered arbitrary, or indifferent; so that they can be done, or omitted, without sin, or their opposites be done; but what the law commands to be done, or omitted, all are obligated to do, or omit, and those who do otherwise, sin gravely. By reason of this obligation, the good works which are commanded in the decalog are rightly said to be necessary in the regenerate; which will be shown more clearly in the following question.

Proof b. The good works of the regenerate are free actions; because they are not coerced, or extorted by threats of punishments, or done externally, and indeed in appearance against the will (*). For God does not approve of such hypocritical works; but wills that the people of the new (**) Since our adversaries seek the chief support for their very bad cause partly in the sacrifices of the Old Testament, which someone offered to God of his own accord, partly in the special vows of the Nazirites and Rechabites; Firstly, our blessed Forefathers taught excellently in the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, chapter XIII, how great a distance separates the vows of monks from those of the Nazirites and Rechabites. Secondly, it is clear that in those sacrifices offered voluntarily, and in those vows undertaken voluntarily, it was never lawful for anyone to offer to God, or to vow, whatever and however he pleased; nothing of them was, unless determined by divine laws. Finally, in those sacred institutions, as in most of all the ceremonies of the Old Testament, there was some secret and typical reason, so that by these shadows the spiritual sacrifices of the New Testament might be signified, which are indeed voluntary, but by no means arbitrary, Ps. CX, 3. A voluntary action is said to be that which someone, in accordance with his duty, undertakes with a ready mind, without any coercion, and not at all unwillingly, his mind inflamed with love for God and his Jesus. An arbitrary, or, as it is barbarously called, elective action is that which a man has devised by his own genius and will, in no way commanded by God, a self-willed worship (ἐθελοθρησκεία), which God has condemned, so far as it from ever being able to be pleasing and acceptable to God. Col. II, 23. Matth. XV, 9.

(*) A free action is called, either arbitrary, without precept (but may such be far from us! see the preceding note); or voluntary, without force and coercion, without fear, without reluctance, an occupation in commanded things with great pleasure of the mind. Every such action befits a renewed man, Ps. CX, 3. Rom. XII, 8. 2 Corinth. VIII, 12. IX, 7, in which place a will acting willingly is openly opposed to the coercion and reluctance of the will. Besides these testimonies, which are indeed most firm, we draw an argument from this principle: Every truly good action proceeds from faith in Christ, and from love for God reconciled to testament be a willing people, Ps. CX, 3 (*), and that they offer spontaneous sacrifices, Ps. LIV, 8, and render obedience not unwillingly, or by coercion, but from the heart. For the Lord loves a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. IX, 7.

Proof c. After conversion and regeneration, man is free from the necessity of immutability; since his will is no longer determined to always think and do evil, as before conversion; but he can freely choose and do good works through supernatural powers, received from the Holy Spirit, he can also choose evil works through the remnants of the flesh still adhering in him, since he is not determined to good in the same way as the angels.

Proof d. After conversion and regeneration, there is in man freedom from the servitude of sin; because he is no longer a servant of sin, but freed from that captivity and servitude by the Holy Spirit, John VIII, 36. Rom. VI, 18. 2 Cor, III, 17. He can therefore, through the spiritual powers received in renewal, freely cooperate with the Holy Spirit, Rom. VIII, 14. 1 Cor. XV, 10.

Question XVIII. Are good works necessary?

Necessity of Good Works. Good works in the regenerate are necessary by a necessity of a) command, b) debt, c) order, d) presence, e) and of consequence after faith and justification (**).

us, John XV, 5. 2 Petr. 1. 3. 5; But love always makes the mind ready and eager to do what is commanded willingly. From this John himself in 1 Ep. V, 3. concluded thus: "his commandments are not grievous (βαρεῖαι οὐκ εἰσίν)." Let the difference between words and things be carefully noted. It is one thing to be difficult; another to be heavy, burdensome, troublesome and unpleasant, in which way also the German words: schwer & beschwerlich differ from each other, although in common parlance they are very often confused. Namely, that is called difficult which requires much study and labor, but the study is nevertheless pleasant, if one applies one's mind to that thing willingly, like one who burns with the desire to learn, and therefore has already long borne and done much, has sweated and been hot. Who would deny that in the exercise of good works the greatest study and labor must perpetually be employed, "giving all diligence (σπουδὴν πᾶσαν)," 2 Pet. I, 5. But that is finally named heavy which one undertakes unwillingly, and bears with difficulty, as a troublesome burden imposed on oneself. Therefore, nothing is heavy and troublesome, unless it is hateful. To hate the good, commanded by law, is to be averse to the law itself. Therefore, also to the legislator. But that is the property of a wicked mind, Rom. VIII, 7. Therefore, every action, consistent with the divine laws, can be heavy and burdensome to no one, except the wicked.

(*) But do not interpret this in such a way as to think that good men under the economy of the Old Testament were entirely deprived of the benefit of this Spirit. Consider this most evident saying, Ps. LI, 14, and many others of this kind. But a greater degree, both of joy and of alacrity of mind, was to follow in the New Testament, with the abrogation of the ritual law, as a certain yoke of servitude, from which we have been completely freed. Gal. IV, seqq. V, 1.

(**) That fivefold necessity, always welcome and pleasant, differs much and greatly from the necessity of coercion, which is always troublesome and unpleasant. Therefore, those sayings are easily compared and reconciled, by which is preached the supreme pleasure of Christ, with which he did and bore all things, John IV, 34. Ps. XL, 9, and those which testify that all things had to be accomplished and borne by Christ with the utmost necessity, Luke II, 49. XXIV, 26. And that necessity was indeed quite unique, and it was twofold: 1) the necessity of a means to appease the wrath of God and to recover the salvation of men, 2) the necessity of the fulfillment of all the prophecies of the Old Testament, ibid. v. 27. That place in particular, John IV, 34, excellently illuminates the matter. To take food is certainly a necessary means for sustaining and preserving life; yet a healthy man does nothing more willingly, in whom there is a great appetite for food. Generally I will say: Whatever a man knows as good, as his good, and suitable to his purpose, as a greater and preferable good to others, for whatever reason it may be necessary, he vehemently desires it, and, if it is to be done, he does it most willingly. What disputes were once agitated among our theologians concerning these words, necessary, and free, is clear from the Formula of Concord, chap. IV.

Proof a. From Isa. 1, 17, where Jehovah says: "Learn to do good," Lev. XIX, 2. "You shall be holy: for I Jehovah, your God, (am) holy." Therefore the command of God imposes on us the necessity of doing good works.

Proof b. Since every creature owes obedience and gratitude to its Creator, so especially man, endowed with reason—by the great names of many benefits, namely of creation, Acts XVII, 24, of redemption, Luke I, 72, of vocation, 1 Thess. IV, 7, of regeneration, Eph. II, 18, of justification, Rom. VIII, 1—is bound to the pursuit of good works, by which God is glorified.

Proof c. From Rom. VIII, 13. "If by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live." God has sanctioned this order, that those who are to live eternally, with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, should put to death the deeds of the flesh. To mortify the flesh is a signal work.

Proof d. Good works in the regenerate and those to be saved are necessary by reason of presence, lest they lose the grace of God and faith, and fall from the hope of the inheritance, although not by reason of efficacy for obtaining righteousness and salvation.

Proof e. The pursuit of good works follows justifying faith by a necessary and indivisible connection. Paul inculcates this very thing, Titus III, 8. "This is a faithful saying, and these things I want you to affirm constantly, that they who have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works." The Apostle's meaning is: Those who have been gifted with true faith by the grace of the Holy Spirit, and have been justified by it, must necessarily walk in the way of good works, so that they may shine before others as an example of piety.

Question XIX. Are good works necessary for justification?

Good works are not necessary for justification a), because they are its effects b).

Proof a. From Rom. III, 28. "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law."

Proof b. Good works are the fruit of righteousness, Phil. I, 11. The fruit neither effects nor constitutes the nature of the tree, but follows it. AUGUSTINE says aptly in his book On Faith and Works, c. 4. "Good works do not precede those who are to be justified, but follow those who have been justified."

Question XX. Are good works necessary for men to be saved?

Good works are necessary for men to be saved, that is, for those who are to be saved, as proper adjuncts of the heirs of eternal salvation a); they are not necessary for the saved, insofar as they are saved, as causes and means of salvation b).

Observation. That proposition: "Good works are necessary for men to be saved," is true in a specificative, or material sense, which denotes the quality of the subject; not in a reduplicative, or formal sense, by which the cause, on account of which the predicate is attributed to the subject, is indicated.

Proof a. "Blessed are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy," Matthew V, 7, 8. The subject of beatitude is described in these words by a proper adjunct, which is mercy, not by the cause, on account of which we receive mercy, or will see God; and therefore the words of the Savior are to be understood in a specificative, or material sense, not a reduplicative, or formal one.

Proof b. From Rom, IV, 6. "Blessedness is of the man, to whom God imputes righteousness without works." Paul excludes good works not only from the justification of the sinner, but also ἀπὸ τοῦ μακαρισμοῦ, from beatification. He adds the reason in v. 16, "that the promise might be sure." For the promise of beatitude would not be sure, as far as we are concerned, if it depended in any way on the condition of works.

Question XXI. Are good works necessary for salvation?

Good works are necessary for eternal salvation neither by the necessity of a means to acquire it a), nor by the necessity of merit to earn it b), nor by the necessity of a condition without which it cannot be obtained c). And therefore that phrase: "Good works are necessary for salvation," is neither to be used, nor to be defended d).

Objection. A careful distinction must be made between a requisite of the subject that is absolutely necessary, and one that is respective. The former is that which is necessarily connected with the subject not in respect of causal efficiency, but only by reason of existence, e.g., Color is necessary for tasting an apple, but not for the tasting of the apple. Ears are necessary for a painter, as a whole man, but not for painting. So good works are necessary for a man to be saved, but not for salvation. The latter is that which, being necessarily connected with the subject, directly and in itself implies a respect to a peculiar function and its proper effect, e.g., Diligence is necessary for a beginner and a learner, and for learning. Fortitude is necessary for a soldier and one who is to live, and for obtaining victory. Thus the active and passive obedience of Christ is necessary both for the man to be saved and for the attainment of salvation, by a necessity of merit. True faith in Christ is necessary both for the one to be saved and for salvation, by a necessity of means.

Proof a. Because faith alone is the necessary means for receiving salvation, John III, 15. "Whoever believes in the Son of God does not perish, but has eternal life." Cf. Mark XVI, 16.

Proof b. Eternal life is a χάρισμα, Rom. VI, 23. A χάρισμα is a free gift, obtained by no merit. Eternal life is a promised inheritance, not earned by the works of the law, as Paul teaches, Gal. III, 18: "For if the inheritance is of the law, it is no longer of promise." But God gave it to Abraham by promise, He bestowed it out of grace. Here the emphasis of the words should be observed. For an inheritance is not obtained by merits, but comes freely. A promise is not apprehended by merits, but by faith. And what God κεχάρισται, has graciously given, to that works have contributed nothing, Rom. XI, 6.

Proof c. From Eph. II, 8. "By grace you have been saved through faith; And that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; Not of works, lest anyone should boast." From which arises the argument; Whoever are saved by faith out of the liberality of God who gives (both faith and salvation), not indeed from works, their salvation is not suspended on the condition of works; But the regenerate etc.; Therefore.

Proof d. That phrase; "Good works are necessary for salvation," is 1) ἄγραφος, nowhere expressed in the sacred letters, 2) It establishes other causes of salvation than of justification, and so conflicts with the whole apostolic doctrine, because good works are excluded from the business of both beatification and justification, Rom. IV, 6. Eph. II, 8. Tit. III, 5. 3) It snatches away the true consolation of the gospel from troubled and afflicted consciences, and gives occasion for doubting the grace of God. For faith cannot validly rest on our imperfect works. 4) It confirms presumption and a false opinion of one's own righteousness, and confidence in one's own dignity. For as much as we attribute to works in the business of salvation, so much we ascribe to our own righteousness and dignity. 5) It overturns the distinction between the law and the gospel; Which is evident from Gal. III, 21. "If a law had been given that could give life, righteousness would indeed be by the law." But the scripture has concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe. 6) It derogates from the praise of the absolute perfection of Christ's merit. For if our salvation consists in Christ alone, and in no other, Acts IV, 12, then our works are associated with Christ's merit in vain. 7) It has the enemies of truth as its authors, and favors their heterodox opinion. 8) It is obscure, ambiguous, slippery, and fallacious.

The antithesis is of the Papists, Socinians, Arminians, and Anabaptists, who assert the necessity of good works for obtaining eternal salvation *).<sup>319</sup> They contend with us with the following arguments:

I. Whoever will not see the Lord without holiness, for him holiness is necessary to see the Lord. But the regenerate man etc. Hebr. XII, 14. Therefore. Response; a) In the original text, the word is not αγιοσύνη, which denotes our work, but ἁγιασμός, which word signifies the operation of the Holy Spirit, and sometimes denotes the gift of holiness, Rom. VI, 19, sometimes the application of the merit of Christ by the Holy Spirit in the word of the gospel, 2 Thess. II, 13. 1 Petr. 1, 2. Hebr. X, 10. Either meaning fits this passage of ours perfectly. For we ought to pursue both the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, which is the application of Christ's merit through the gospel, by which faith is not only aroused, but also confirmed; and that which is the gift and increase of holiness, when in the order of salvation we so conduct ourselves that the Holy Spirit can rightly carry out His work of sanctification in us, and is not hindered. Therefore, it is not licit to conclude; Without sanctification, by which God sanctifies us, no one will see the Lord; Therefore our good works are necessary for salvation. For if sanctification is taken for the application of Christ's merit; this will be the sense; that no one will see the Lord, unless the application of Christ's merit is made through the Holy Spirit and the gospel, by which faith is kindled. But if sanctification is taken for the gift of holiness; cannot we say that the Apostle means this, that no one will enter into eternal life and to the beatific vision, unless in the resurrection he is clothed with perfect holiness? May we not argue thus: What no one in the other life will see the Lord without, that we ought also to pursue in this life; But without sanctification etc. Therefore. From which it certainly does not follow that the holiness of this life is necessary for salvation, that it is a condition sine qua non. Cf. D. SEB. SCHMID. in his commentary on this passage, p. 1349. b) Grant that by ἀγιασμόν, our work is understood; yet there is no probative force in the argument. For whoever will not see God without holiness, as a respective requisite of the man to be saved, for him holiness is necessary to see God; I concede. But whoever will not see God without holiness, as an absolute requisite of the man to be saved, for him holiness is necessary to see God; I deny. Otherwise I argue by the same reason: Without risibility no one will dispute; Therefore risibility is necessary for disputing; Without its innate gravity, baptismal water will not regenerate; Therefore the gravity of water is necessary for regeneration. Nonsense! The words: "Without holiness," pertain to the description of the subject, not to the modification of the predicate in this sense; He who is not holy will not see the Lord; because God has established this order, that a regenerate man, who will obtain the beatific vision of God through faith, should be zealous for holiness of life.

II. Patience is necessary to receive the promise of salvation, Hebr. X, 36. Patience is a good work; Therefore, some good work is necessary to receive the promise of salvation. Response; In the source is the word, ὑπομονή. The Apostle understands in this chapter the ὑπομονήν of light, that is, persevering faith, or the perseverance of faith; which is clear a) from the conjugate verb, ὑπομένειν, Matth. X, 22. "he who endures (ὁ ὑπομείνας) to the end will be saved"; b) From the context. For the Apostle understands that ὑπομονήν which in v. 35 he calls παρρησίαν, and in v. 38 πίστω, and to which he opposes ὑποστολήν, drawing back, or defection from faith; c) From the Apostle's scope, who argues thus: ὑπομονή is necessary for you. Therefore, do not cast away your confidence of faith. How does this proceed more fittingly than if ὑπομονή is perseverance of faith? But let it be that the ὑπομονή of the cross, or patience, is understood, with a careful analysis two propositions emerge. The former is: The regenerate have need of patience, that they may do the will of God. The latter is: Those who do the evangelical will of God, i.e., believe in Christ, John VI, 28, receive the promise.

III. Whoever by mortifying the flesh will live eternally, for them good works are necessary for eternal life; But justified men etc. Rom. VIII, 13.; Therefore. The major is established; because Paul wants the promise of eternal life to be suspended on the condition of the mortification of the flesh. Response; I deny the major, because the mortification of the flesh is indeed an absolute requisite of the justified and those who will live eternally, but not a respective one, that is, implying a causal relation to eternal life, as its proper effect.

Instance I. The conditional particle, IF, denotes a condition sine qua non. Response; The particle, IF, in this place, denotes a condition of the subject, and connects the mortification of the flesh with eternal life, not by reason of influx, merit, or means, but by reason of the order, established by God, so that the proposition is to be understood in a specificative, material, or subjective sense, not a reduplicative, formal, or causal one.

Instance II. Because good works precede eternal salvation, by a precedence of order, they can be called necessary for salvation, as a condition sine qua non, which is not a cause properly so-called. Response; a) There is no positive and active condition sine qua non which is not a cause. b) A virtuous moral action, such as a good work, necessary for obtaining an effect, is not only a condition sine qua non, but a meritorious cause.

IV. Confession is made with the mouth for life, Rom. X, 10. The confession which is made with the mouth is a good work; Therefore, a certain good work is made for life. Response; a) An ignorance of the point is committed. For it is one thing, to be made for salvation; another, to be necessary for salvation. This implies merit and means; that implies some kind of precedence. Thus the title of Doctor contributes to the esteem of a learned man, but it is not simply necessary. b) By confession is understood either faith declared by the mouth, or an adjunct of faith, and a work, pertaining to the second precept of the decalogue. If the former opinion is assumed, the sense will be; Faith kindled in the heart receives the righteousness obtained by the merit of Christ, and afterwards with the mouth celebrates the salvation received from the Savior, and glories in the same. But if the latter pleases, the Apostle's meaning is; Confession is made with the mouth to testify and declare the salvation which is in Christ (*).

V. Whoever work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, for them good works are necessary for salvation; But the regenerate etc.; Therefore. The major is established; because no one can work out his own salvation, unless his work is the cause of salvation. The minor is proven from Phil. II, 12. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." Response; Whoever works out his salvation by a positive and efficacious influx, for him good works are necessary for salvation; I concede. But the regenerate work out their salvation only by the diligent use of the means of salvation; just as a sick person works out his health not efficiently, but by admitting, or receiving remedies. The Greek verb, ἐργάζεσθαι, does not always signify the same as to effect. See Rev. XVIII, 17. John VI, 27, where it means the same as to be busily engaged, or to be occupied with some thing. The Apostle therefore admonishes that the Philippians and all the regenerate should be occupied in the causes of salvation, in receiving and retaining the word and sacraments, not without the fear of caution, that is, that they should beware of and flee from willful sins, by which faith is extinguished, and salvation is lost.

VI. For what faith is required, for that good works are required. But saving faith is required for obtaining salvation; Therefore. The major is evident; because things that are joined together respect the same effect. Response; a) By denying the major, and arguing by a similar reason; For what eyes are required, for that ears joined with eyes are required; But eyes are required for seeing; Therefore also ears. b) Distinguish between an absolute and a respective requisite of the subject. Not all things, which are absolutely joined with the subject, as to its existence, have the same end. The intellect is joined with the will. The former respects and intends the knowledge of the true, but the latter the appetite for the good.

VII. Good works for obtaining salvation are either necessary, or arbitrary; But they are not arbitrary, because if they are omitted, a man falls from salvation; Therefore, they are necessary for obtaining salvation. Response; There is a third option. Good works are neither necessary, nor arbitrary for obtaining salvation, because they infer no causal respect to the obtaining of salvation; yet they are necessary by the necessity of command, of debt, of order, of presence, and of consequence.

VIII. If the end of the pursuit of good works is eternal life, then good works respect this end; The antecedent is true. Therefore, also the consequent. The consequence of the major is clear; because the end is that for the sake of which the efficient cause uses means respecting the end. The truth of the antecedent is clear from Rom. VI, 22. Response; τὸ τέλος, the end, is spoken of ambiguously. Sometimes it denotes the end of intention, which the means respect. Sometimes the end of termination, or the outcome. The Apostle wanted to teach that, just as the outcome and final clause of sins is death and destruction; so eternal life follows good works, as a desired clause, because works of piety precede eternal life in order, not by causal influx.

IX. If good works necessarily precede eternal life, by a necessity of order, like a way, then good works are necessary for salvation; The antecedent is true; Therefore, also the consequent. The reason for the consequence is; because the way, by which we reach the goal, necessarily respects this goal. The truth of the antecedent is plain; because the pursuit of good works is the path of the divine commandments, Ps. CXIX, 35. It is the way of the Lord, in which the regenerate must walk, Ps. CXLIII, 8. BERNARD says in book I on grace and free will; "Good works are the way to the kingdom, not the cause of reigning." Response; a) Distinguish between the way in the kingdom, and to the kingdom of God. The way to the kingdom is Christ, John XIV, 6. Through Christ, who is the efficacious way by doctrine, example, and merit, we reach the goal, that is, eternal life. Good works are the way in the kingdom of grace, not respecting the goal in themselves, directly and causally. b) Although this phrase: "Good works are necessary for salvation by a necessity of order," can be excused in some part, so that the words, "for salvation," denote not an effect to be produced by the works, but only the end of the way; it is nevertheless an ambiguous, obscure phrase and scarcely intelligible to the learned. For in the whole universe of things there is no virtuous moral action necessary for obtaining an effect by reason of order, which is not at the same time a meritorious, or moral cause of that effect. Therefore we rightly abstain from the ambiguous phrase, and say: Good works, by reason of order, are necessary for the man who is to be saved, or who will attain eternal salvation.

(*) The profession of faith, especially at a time when many and great vexations are to be undergone and sustained for the truth of Christ's doctrine, the profession therefore is a sign of a firm and constant faith. But for righteousness true faith is indeed sufficient; but for eternal salvation is necessary not only true, but also constant faith. This seems to me to be the reason why the Divine Man attributed righteousness to faith in Christ, and assigned eternal salvation to the profession of the same.

Instance: Whatever is necessary for the man who is to be saved, that is also necessary for salvation. Response: Whatever is necessary for the man who is to be saved, as such, in a reduplicative sense, that is necessary for salvation. But good works are necessary for the man who is to be saved, not as such, but who is to attain salvation, in a specificative sense.

X. It is necessary that you have the faith, that you have good works; because true faith is not without good works; It is necessary, that you be justified, or obtain salvation, that you have true faith; Therefore, it is necessary, that you be justified, or obtain salvation, that you have good works. Response: I deny the major, because it is just as inept as if you were to say: It is necessary that I have a good tree, that I have fruits. The major can be inverted: It is necessary that you have good works, that you have true faith. Meanwhile, good works are not necessary for having faith, but for declaring and showing it, so that it may be known, James II, 8.

Question XXII. Are good works necessary for preserving righteousness and salvation?

Our righteousness and salvation are preserved not by good works, but by the grace of God, through the word and sacraments confirming our faith, which apprehends and, having apprehended, retains righteousness and salvation.

Proof: 1) From 1 Peter I, 5. "Who are kept by the power of God through faith for salvation." God by His gracious power keeps us ( $\Phi\rho\upsilon\rho\epsilon\iota$ , He garrisons us) through faith, which looks to the means of grace for salvation, so that it may not be intercepted from us by the force or fraud of enemies. 2) From Rom. V, 1-2. "Therefore, since we have been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Through whom also we have obtained access into this grace in which we stand, and we rejoice in hope of the glory of God." Christians by faith not only have access to grace, but also stand in faith, conferred by the grace of regeneration, like the manner of strenuous soldiers, who persist unmoved in the line of battle, so that they do not yield even a hair's breadth.

Question XXIII. Are good works meritorious of eternal life?

The good works of regenerate men, properly speaking, do not merit eternal life; because God gives this by the decree of predestination a), by reason of both right b) and full possession, out of grace founded on the merit of Christ c), to the regenerate d), to whose works also all and singular the requisites of merit do not apply e).

Observation. The name of merit is taken either properly or improperly. Merit properly so-called is an undue work, which a worker does by his own powers for the benefit of another, so that a reward equal to the labor may correspond. Improperly, merit signifies that which, by way of a bare antecedent and by reason of order, not by the dignity of the work, obtains or acquires something. In this sense, he is said to merit, who obtains or acquires something from someone, even if he obtains it by grace, or liberality, or a similar manner, e.g., a beggar merits alms by his prayers, i.e., he obtains them. In which looser sense ecclesiastical writers have often used this word, merit. AUGUSTINE in book 1 on grace and free will says: "The waters above the firmament have merited so sublime a place." We at present use the name of merit in its proper signification.

Proof a. God predestined us to the adoption of sons through Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will, Eph. I, 5. The good pleasure of the divine will is the most merciful and most gracious will of God. From which arises the argument; Whoever are predestined to eternal life by the most merciful and most gracious will of God, to them eternal life is given out of grace, without the merits of works; But the regenerate etc.; Therefore. The major is clear; because there is a most exact agreement and harmony between the decree and its execution.

Proof b. We are justified freely by His grace, Rom. III, 24. In justification the right to eternal life is conferred on us. I argue; Whoever are justified by divine grace, provoked by no merits of their own works, they are saved without any merits of works. But the regenerate etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because for the same causes that the right to eternal life is conferred on us, for the same causes the possession of eternal life is granted to us.

Proof c. 2 Tim. I, 9. "He has saved us and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the ages began." By these words the Apostle wishes to exclude all respect of our merit from our salvation and calling, and to think only of the purpose and grace of God.

Proof d. Eternal life is called χάρισμα, a free gift, Rom. VI, 23. It is also called an inheritance, Gal. III, 18. But an inheritance is given without regard to merits.

Proof e. Merit properly so-called is an undue work, which a worker does by his own powers for the benefit of another, that he may receive a reward equal to the labor. But our works 1) are due, to which we are obligated by the right of creation, redemption, vocation, regeneration, justification, and renewal. Luke XVII, 10, "When you have done all that is commanded you, say: We are unworthy servants; for we have done what we were obliged to do." 2) They are not so much ours, as the works of God, working in us. Christ says, John XV, 5. "Without me you can do nothing." 3) They confer no value on God, Job XXXV, 7. "If you are righteous, what do you give to him? Or what does he receive from your hand?" 4) They are unequal to the celestial kingdom, just as a drink of water is unequal for meriting the kingdom of France, or Spain. In addition, the less the perfection of our good works is, the less is the συμμετρία and proportion of our impure works to the most consummate glory of heaven. Rom. VIII, 18. "For I consider that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that will be revealed in us."

The antithesis is 1) of the Papists, who state that a man not yet justified, by the natural powers of free will, can merit justification by a merit de congruo; but a justified man can merit eternal life by good works, as by a merit de condigno. A merit of congruity, or de congruo, is so called because it is fitting, and it befits God, to confer the first grace of justification on a man working according to his natural virtue. Some more recent Papists reject the merit of congruity. STAPLETON in vol. II of his works, book II on justification, c. 16, p. 265, says: "The merit de congruo, with respect to the first grace, has now been exploded from the Catholic schools." They call a merit de condigno a work proceeding from the grace of the Holy Spirit, by which a justified person merits eternal life. It is called de condigno because it is worthy to have eternal life repaid to it. 2) Of the Arminians, who state that good works indeed do not have a proportion with eternal life, if they are considered in themselves; but they do have, if they are accepted by God out of grace, and are considered according to the moderation of the gospel. They try to defend their opinion with the following arguments:

I. The sacred pages testify that works of mercy merit some retribution. Siracides says, c. XVI, 14. "Every mercy will make a place for each one according to the merit of his works." And the Apostle in Heb. XIII, 16. "Do not forget to do good and to share. For with such sacrifices God is well-pleased (promeretur Deus)." Response: The Vulgate version does not flow purely from the Greek source. Siracides says: Πάση ἐλεημοσύνη ποιήσον τόπον, ἕκαστος γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτῷ ἐυρήσεται. "For every alms make a place: For each one will find according to his works." No mention is made of merit here. Εὐρίσκειν does not mean to merit, but to find. You say: But Siracides asserts:

But each one will find according to his works. Response: It is one thing to find a reward according to works; another to find it on account of works. We obtain rewards according to the qualities of the works, not on account of their merits. The Apostolic passage is likewise poorly translated. The original text reads thus: Τοιαύταις γὰρ θυσίαις ἐναρεστεῖται ὁ Θεός, "for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." The Vulgate has barbarously rendered it; promeretur Deus (God is merited), in a passive sense, when however the verb promereor is deponent, which does not have a passive signification.

II. Whoever are worthy of eternal life, merit it; But justified men etc. Therefore. The major is established from Luke X, 7. "The laborer is worthy of his wages," i.e., he merits his wages. The minor is clear from Luke XX, 35. 2 Thess. I, 5. Rev. III, 4. Response: Dignity is one thing legally, another evangelically. Legally, no one is worthy of the kingdom of heaven, who has not rendered perfect obedience to the divine law in all respects; which, however, no one can render in this infirmity of nature, Rom. VIII, 3. Evangelically, they are worthy, not who have actively made themselves worthy of the kingdom of glory by their merits, but who are passively esteemed worthy out of grace on account of the merit of Christ, apprehended by true faith.

III. Every reward is acquired by the merits of works; for a reward is a prize equal to the labor; Eternal life is a reward, Matth. V, 12. c. X, 42. Response: a) Distinguish between eternal life considered essentially, as it consists in the beatific vision of God, and considered accidentally, as it denotes the accidental rewards of eternal life, or greater degrees of celestial glory. Eternal life, common to all the blessed, is nowhere called a reward, but χάρισμα, Rom. VI, 23. The Savior indicates this, Matth. V, 12, when he does not say: "Heaven will be a reward;" but: "In heaven the reward will be plentiful." b) Distinguish between a reward acquired from debt, and one imputed from grace, Rom. IV, 4. Eternal life, considered accidentally, is called a reward promised from grace, not counted from debt. In the phrase of scripture, reward denotes a prize, sometimes corresponding to the merits of works, sometimes gratuitous and liberally promised. Thus children are called a reward, Ps. CXXVII, 3. God Himself is called Abraham's reward, Gen. XV, 1.

Instance I. Eternal life, as a reward, is rendered for labor performed, Matth. XX, 9. "Call the laborers, and pay them their wages": Where by wage is understood eternal life. Response: The denarius and the wage, Matth. XX, does not denote eternal life; because it is also given to the murmuring and envious, who are not heirs of eternal life. It is also given to the last, who had labored only one hour; Therefore not from condignity. For if the master had wished to count out a reward proportionate to the labor according to the rigor of the law, he certainly ought to have distributed more to one, less to another, according to the measure of the labor exhausted. He therefore renders the reward promised by pact, not owed by the rigor of justice.

Instance II. Every promise falls into debt; Therefore, eternal life is due to us from debt. Response: a) Debt, strictly and properly so-called, arises from the dignity of the work, to the performance of which someone is obligated by a certain right from the rule of proportion and the law of commutative justice; Debt, broadly and improperly so-called, is born from a gratuitous promise. AUGUSTINE indicates this distinction in book II of his confessions, c. 4. "God repays debts, owing to no one." b) Moralists warn that not every promise confers a right on another to demand the thing as due. For powerful and gracious men sometimes seriously promise their recommendation, intercession, promotion, or support; which however they do not want to be demanded from them by a certain right, but they want it to be imputed entirely to their humanity and truthfulness. As for divine promises, it is indeed impossible for the immutable and most truthful God to revoke them; yet it seems too proud to say that a mortal seeks a right for himself against God from a promise, as PUFFENDORF opines, book III on the Law of Nature and of Nations, ch. 5, sec. 6, p. 57. And not even a son can sue his father if a promise is not kept, according to the judgment of DANNHAVER, hodom. Pap. post p. 201.

IV. Whoever will render to each one according to his works, he in distributing rewards respects the dignity of the works; But God etc. Rom. II, 6. Matth. XVI, 27. The major is established: because to render according to works pertains to distributive justice, by virtue of which a reward is rendered according to the proportion of the labor. Response: a) God will render to each one according to his works, not on account of the merits of the works. He will render according to the qualities of the works, but not on account of the works, as meritorious causes of eternal life. b) From the quality of the works arises their difference. If therefore the faithful are compared with the faithful, God will render greater rewards according to the purer and more numerous works; But if they are compared with the unfaithful, He will distribute to these, as they deserve, punishments, and to those, as they are reputed worthy out of grace, accidental rewards, not eternal life itself. c) When the particle, ACCORDING TO, takes on the reason of a cause, Paul expressly denies that we are saved according to our works, 2 Tim. I, 9.

V. Good works are the cause of eternal life; Therefore, they merit it. The reason for the consequence is; because every virtuous moral action, which is the cause of an effect, is meritorious. The antecedent is proven from Matth. XXV, 34-35, where Christ says: "Possess the kingdom as an inheritance; For I was hungry, and you gave me something to eat." Response: 1) An inheritance is not acquired by the merits of works. 2) The particle, γὰρ, here is not causal, or does not denote the cause of the thing, but is ratiocinative and eventual, designating the reason of a consequence, or an inference a posteriori, drawn from the works, as fruits and testimonies of faith, which is the true cause of obtaining life.

Instance: The particle, PER, which is causal, is also used, 1 Tim. II, 15. "A woman will be saved through childbearing, if she continues in faith and love," Acts XIV, 22. "Through many tribulations we must enter the kingdom of God." Response: a) The particle, PER, in the cited places is not designative of a cause, but of an order divinely constituted, so that the sense is; A woman will be saved through generation, i.e., in the state divinely ordained, in which she bears children; We must enter the kingdom of heaven amidst afflictions sent by God. b) The generation of children is a natural work, and therefore not meritorious of eternal life; And afflictions are not good works.

VI. Whatever God renders to man out of justice, that he renders to him on account of the merits of works: Eternal life etc.; Therefore. The major is proven; because rewards, rendered out of justice, presuppose merits, and are equal to them. The minor is clear from 2 Thess. 1, 6-7. "It is just with God to repay with affliction those who afflict you, and to give relief to you who are afflicted along with us." Furthermore, in 2 Tim. IV, 8, eternal life is called the crown of righteousness, which God the righteous judge gives to those who love him. Response; In 2 Thess. 1, 7, the justice of God is understood not commutatively, founded on the merits of men, but remuneratively, founded on the love of God and the gratuitous divine promises. Eternal life is called the crown of righteousness, partly imputed on account of the merit of Christ, partly the righteousness of truthfulness and constancy, by which God fulfills His promises. This crown is given to those who love Christ, not because love is the meritorious cause of salvation, but because love is a note and testimony of saving faith.

VII. Whoever distributes rewards without regard to merits, he is a respecter of persons (προσωπολήπτης). God is not a respecter of persons; Therefore, he does not distribute rewards without regard to merits. The major is proven; because he is a respecter of persons, who in distributing rewards looks at the person, whom he favors, without observing merits. The minor is established from Acts X, 34. Response: He who distributes rewards, which he ought to render by right, without regard to merits, he is a respecter of persons. But God owes man nothing; He regards the merits not of us; for they are none, but of Christ.

VIII. Whoever lends to the Lord, he can lawfully reclaim the interest. But the merciful man etc. Prov. XIX, 17. Therefore. Response: Distinguish between interest properly, and analogically so-called. Properly speaking, man can lend nothing to God. The gratuitous divine compensation is analogically called interest. For just as a man pays the interest, to which he is obligated, by right; so God repays alms out of grace.

IX. Whoever enters eternal life through the observation of the divine commandments, his good works are meritorious of eternal life; But the regenerate man etc. Matth. XIX, 17. Therefore. The major is proven; because the observation of the divine commandments is the pursuit of good works, through which no one can enter eternal life, unless he merits it. Response; I deny the major. For all merit is undue and equal to the reward. But the observation of the divine commandments is due for those entering eternal life, and unequal to the celestial kingdom. In the cited place, the question was proposed by the young man legally. Therefore it is solved by Christ not from the gospel, but from a legal hypothesis. The Savior's meaning is; If by doing good you wish to enter eternal life, keep the divine commandments perfectly; of which perfection the test will be the selling of your goods, which are to be given to the poor. The young man went away sad, convicted of his own imperfection. For which reason Christ's admonition was not confirmatory, but refutatory and corrective.

X. Evil works merit eternal condemnation; Therefore, good works merit eternal salvation. The reason for the consequence is; because the reason of opposites is opposite. Response; Paul denies the consequence, Rom. VI, 23. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." The Gentiles were cast out of Palestine on account of their injustice, yet the Israelites were not brought into it on account of their own justice, Deut. IX, 4. The argument from opposites is therefore invalid; because evil works are evil in a perfect, or intense degree, while good works are imperfectly good.

Question XXIV. Are good works pernicious to salvation?

So far are good works from being pernicious to believers, that rather, considered in themselves, they are most useful a); but the confidence of salvation, placed in the merits of works, is noxious b).

Proof a. From 1 Tim. IV, 8. "Piety is profitable for all things, having the promise of the present and the future life." Neither this, nor the future life is owed to piety, but the accidental rewards of the present and future life are promised by the benevolent disposition of God to pious men. LUTHER says excellently in ch. III of Galatians: "Outside the cause of justification, no one can commend true good works magnificently enough. Who can sufficiently preach the utility and fruit of even one good work, which a Christian does from faith and in faith? For it is more precious than heaven and earth."

Proof b. From the solid declaration of the Formula of Concord, p. 688. "If anyone wishes to mix good works into the article of justification, to place his righteousness, or the confidence of his salvation in them, to merit the grace of God by them, and to obtain salvation through them; we respond not indeed we, but St. Paul himself, and he repeats it a third time (Phil. III, 7), that to such a man his works are not only useless, and an impediment to salvation; but even pernicious: The fault of which thing, however, is not of the good works in themselves, but of that vain confidence, which is placed in them against the express word of God."

Question XXV. Is the confidence of righteousness and salvation to be placed in good works?

Our confidence of obtaining righteousness and salvation rests not on our good works a), but solely on the mercy of God b), proposed to us in Christ the mediator c).

Proof a. From Rom. IV, 6. "Blessedness is of the man, to whom God imputes righteousness without works."

Proof b. From Dan. IX, 18. "We do not present our pleas before you on the basis of our righteousness, but on the basis of your great mercies." The testimony of BELLARMINE in book V on justification, c. 7 can serve as an exposition: "On account of the uncertainty of our own righteousness, and the danger of vain glory, it is safest to place all confidence in the sole mercy and kindness of God."

Proof c. From 1 John II, 1-2. "My little children, I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin. But if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. And he is the propitiation for our sins." Which words GREGORY THE GREAT elegantly explains in homily 7 on Ezekiel: "Our advocate will not defend the just in judgment; because we both know and accuse ourselves as unjust. Therefore let us not trust in our tears, not in our actions, but in the allegation of our advocate."

The antithesis is of the Papists, who trust in the merits of their own works. Their more powerful arguments are:

I. King David trusted in his own righteousness, to which he appeals, Ps. VII, 9. "Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness." Response: Distinguish between the righteousness of the cause, and of the person. David in that cause, which he had against king Saul, and in which he was accused of sedition and of aspiring to the kingdom, was innocent before God; Otherwise he acknowledges his great sins, Ps. CXXX, 3.

II. King Hezekiah relied on his works, commemorating them before God, Isa. XXXVIII, 3. Response: 1) Hezekiah commemorates his works as effects and testimonies of sincere faith, not as the foundations of his confidence. 2) Hezekiah, by commemorating his works, seeks a corporal benefit, namely liberation from his present illness and danger of death. Now it is not denied that in such goods God also has regard for innocence of life. See Ps. XLI, 1 seqq. Yet it does not follow from this that the confidence of obtaining righteousness and salvation rests on the merits of works.

Question XXVI. Is it lawful to do good works with a view to a reward?

The regenerate in the exercise of good works primarily look to the glory of God a), but secondarily and with a filial affection they can look to the rewards of this and the future life, not as a due wage, or servile salaries, but as gratuitous gifts and divine benefits, to be ultimately terminated in the glory of God b).

Proof a. "Do all to the glory of God," 1 Cor. X, 31.

Proof b. Because piety is profitable for all things, and has the promise of this and the future life, 1 Tim. IV, 8, effort must be made that we may obtain the rewards promised to the pious. Cf. Hebr. XI, 26.

The antithesis is of the Papists, asserting that good works are to be done with a view to a due reward. They object:

I. The promises of retributions were not made in vain by God, and consigned in Holy Scripture, but that the regenerate in the practice of piety may look to them. See Gal. VI, 8-9. 1 Cor. IX, 24. Matth. VI, 33. Response: For the regenerate who do well, the glory of God is primarily before their eyes, secondarily they look to the promised rewards, which they do not demand by right, but expect from the grace of God.

II. They object with examples: a) of Moses, who looked to the μισθαποδοσίαν, Hebr. XI, 26. b) of Paul, striving with utmost effort for the prize, Phil. III, 14. Response to a): Moses looked not to a reward of debt, but of grace. For God, who in the future life is all in all to the blessed, 1 Cor. XV, 28, was his reward, Gen. XV, 1. To b): Paul looked to the prize, not as a salary to be imputed from debt, but as a gift and benefit of God, promised out of grace; He looked to it with an affection not servile, or mercenary, but filial.

Question XXVII. In what work is the exercise of faith and the practice of piety chiefly seen?

The work most pleasing to God, in which the true faith of regenerate men and the interior worship of God is chiefly expressed and exercised, is oration, or prayer.

Proof: From Gal. IV, 6. "Because you are sons, God has sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba! Father!" The regenerate are sons of God by faith in Christ, Gal. III, 26. They express this faith of theirs by a filial cry, excited by the Holy Spirit; for the Holy Spirit cries when he makes us cry. The regenerate invoke and address God: Abba! Father! By which they testify their filial confidence fixed in the paternal benevolence of God. We are therefore dealing here with prayer, as a signal fruit of faith*),<sup>321</sup> and a work both internal and (*) Generally I will still have to discuss this: that, and in what way, all good works, without exception, are necessary fruits and effects of a salutary and unfeigned confidence. I call that a necessary effect which is produced by a certain cause and by it alone, and always, so that it can never be without this cause, and can never not be through this cause. That this necessary reason of consequence, that, and in what manner, good works are effected from true faith in Christ, can ever be explained and proven by clear arguments, that masked MELODIUS denied too confidently, who at the same time sharply criticized the words of our blessed LUTHER, in his golden preface, prefixed to the letter to the Romans, which words themselves have been rightly approved in our Declaration of the Formula of Concord, c. IV. p. 701. I will complete the demonstration a priori, which he indeed thought could never be done, by the force of three principles. Nor will I bring forth anything new. Our theologians have long argued from the very nature of salutary confidence.

Principle I. Salutary confidence placed in the merits of Christ, and that indeed alone, furnishes us with all powers, sufficient for every good work. 2 Peter I, 3.

Explanation. In every moral action, insofar as it is moral, the powers sufficiently suitable for acting are principles and arguments, both teaching the intellect and moving the will, sufficiently known and perceived. The principles of all of man's duties towards God are the benefits, divinely bestowed upon us, and the right and complete knowledge of them. The grace of God reconciled to us, and our salvation recovered through Christ, is certainly the greatest of all benefits, both in dignity and in amplitude. Therefore, the knowledge of the salutary truths, which pertain to faith in Christ, if it is true, certain, and complete, contains in itself also the knowledge of our greatest obligation towards God and Christ, Rom. VIII, 12, especially since this obligation is a certain end of the benefits of God through Christ,

Luke I, 74-75, and therefore a necessary condition, joined with such well-placed benefits, 2 Peter I, 4. To this explanation of the theological principle are to be added two philosophical axioms:

1. The intellect, endowed with a true, certain, and complete knowledge of the principles and arguments, pertaining to actions, so that no error, no doubt, no preconceived opinion intervenes, it therefore by a moral necessity determines the will to act. Nothing can be done without a reason; The reasons are in the intellect; Therefore there can never be any determination of the will to act, therefore no action, without the knowledge and judgment of the intellect, either true, or false, whether wholly, or in some part. Nor can an action be done otherwise than in a manner consistent with the knowledge of the principles and arguments. What and how great the knowledge is in the intellect, such and so great cannot but be the determination of the will to act.

2. Whoever vehemently desires a certain supreme benefit, and indeed even rejoices in it already being imparted to him, he also willingly and with the highest zeal observes the adjoined conditions, the established order, and his own duty arising from the fruit of the benefit. And whoever ardently desires and wishes for the end, he no less ardently desires and eagerly seizes all those things, which pertain to that end, and are closely coupled with it.

Assumption; But, that we may enjoy the supreme benefit of God, by receiving with salutary confidence what our Jesus liberally promises us: "come to me, all of you," this order is prescribed for us: what ought to precede, namely that we be "laboring and heavy laden (κοπιῶντες καὶ πεφορτισμένοι)," what ought to follow: "take my yoke upon you and learn from me (ἄρατε τὸν ζυγόν μου ἐφ' ὑμᾶς καὶ μάθετε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ)."

Consequence; Therefore the true, certain, and complete knowledge of so great a benefit, by a moral necessity, makes the mind ready and prepared to perform all duties most willingly.

Principle II. The true, firm, and complete knowledge of the benefit, with which God has enriched us, the greatest of all, cannot but inflame the soul with a most ardent love for God, 1 John IV, 19. But such is the nature of this love for God, that it is able to excite and increase the highest zeal for pleasing God, and for always conducting our affairs congruently with the divine will; and it also makes the mind ready and cheerful, so that we do what is commanded not unwillingly, 1 John V, 3.

Principle III. True confidence in Christ overcomes all impediments to virtues, and all allurements to evil, 1 John V, 4.

Explanation; Κόσμος, in this place, is the lust for sinning, and therefore the entire genus of evil desires (per loc. parall. 1 John II, 16). The reason for the name lies in this; that in every enticement to sin, in which man indulges and which he obeys, his whole mind turns away from the Creator, and shamefully forgetting him, seeks all pleasure of the soul in created things, and indeed in the perverse use of them, in vain. But forbidden desire is always the cause of every consummated voluntary sin, James I, 14. Therefore, by the force of salutary confidence, which far and much surpasses all lust for sinning, there cannot but be effected a zeal for virtue, and the exercise of all good works.

Illustration from this axiom; A certain greater, and at the same time more certain good, sufficiently known, and therefore accepted with firm confidence, we always judge to be preferred to a lesser, and very uncertain one.

Assumption; But the salutary knowledge of Christ brings us the supreme good, much greater and more excellent than all earthly pleasures (Rom. VIII, 32) and far more certain (ibid. v. 38, 39, add. 1 John II, 17. 2 Tim. IV, 8 & 18). This is what PAUL says, "the surpassing worth of knowledge (ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως)" (Phil. III, 8), and therefore concludes: "we are more than conquerors in all these things (ὑπερνικῶμεν ἐν τοῦτοις πᾶσιν)" (Rom. VIII, 37).

Consequence; Therefore the salutary knowledge of Christ, provided it is true, certain, and complete, so surpasses earthly pleasures and all enticements to sin, that no more excellent victory has ever been won anywhere.

Consummation of the argument; When all things required for acting are present, the action is now morally necessary. There are altogether three things which are required for any action whatsoever; 1) sufficient powers; 2) zeal and inclination of the will; 3) the external, about which D. W. LYSERUS judges not badly: "Faithful prayer is the real exercise and practice of all interior worship, suitable to the eternal Deity from the first table," in system. theol. p. 463.

Question XXVIII. What is prayer, generally considered?

Definition of Prayer. Prayer is a religious act, by which a converted and regenerate man, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, suppliantly addresses the Triune God with true confidence of heart, resting on the merit and intercession of Christ the mediator, for the glory of God and his own and others' salvation.

Question XXIX. How is prayer divided?

Division of Prayer. Prayer is divided by St. Paul into δέησις, or supplication, προσευχή, prayer, ἑντεύξις, intercession, and ευχαριστία, or thanksgiving.

Proof. From 1 Tim. II, 1. "First of all, then, I urge that supplications (δεήσεις), prayers (προσευχάς), intercessions (ἐντεύξεις), and thanksgivings (ευχαριστίας) be made for all people." Δέησις, or supplication is, by which we ask for the aversion of some evil, which either presses upon us, or threatens us: Προσευχή, or prayer is, by which we ask that good things, corporal and spiritual, be conferred upon us: ἑντεύξις, intercession, is, by which we intercede for others, that God may either impart some good to them, or avert some evil from them: Ευχαριστία, or thanksgiving is, by which we give thanks to God for benefits, conferred upon us or others.

Question XXX. In what does prayer formally consist?

Form of Prayer. Prayer formally consists in the fiducial address to God.

Proof. The form of prayer comprises 1) confidence, fixed in the merit of Christ, and the mercy of God thereby obtained, according to that of James I, 6. "Let him ask in faith, with no doubting": 2) a venerable address to the eternal Deity, not indeed that words must always be emitted from the mouth, but also a word formed in the heart of the believer is sometimes sufficient through mere sighs. For prayer consists chiefly in the elevation of the heart to God; which however is not to be taken exclusively, but since the tongue is granted by God as an organ both of praises and also of complaints, it is to be referred to God in that reason of its assigned end. LYSER. l. 6.

Question XXXI. What is the efficient cause of prayer?

Efficient Cause of Prayer. The principal efficient cause of prayer is the Holy Spirit a). The subordinate cause and subject of denomination is the converted and regenerate man, pouring out prayers pleasing to God, not through natural powers but supernatural ones, received from the Holy Spirit in regeneration b).

Proof a. The Holy Spirit is the spirit of prayer, Zach. XII, 10, not only because he teaches and compels us to pray rightly, but also because he himself excites and forms the prayers in us. For through the Holy Spirit we cry: "Abba! Father!" Rom. VIII, 15.

Proof b. The subordinate, or secondary cause of prayer, and the subject of denomination, or the worshipper, is the converted and regenerate man, who seriously detests his sins with sorrow, and adheres to Christ with true faith. Such a true worshipper adores God in spirit and in truth, John IV, 24, where the Savior opposes spirit to hypocrisy, truth to the shadows and Levitical ceremonies. The worship of God ought to be in Spirit, so that it is commanded by the Holy Spirit, and defined in the word of the Spirit, and does not consist in external customs, or in outward appearance and simulation; but in true internal motions of a faithful heart, excited by the Holy Spirit, which the flesh, or reason of man cannot effect, or elicit, but they must be fruits of the Spirit, who illuminates the mind, creates a clean heart, and works in us the internal motions of the heart, devotion, groanings, and prayers. Cf. D. CALOVIUS in bibl illustrat. on this passage, fol. 716.

destruction of all impediments. But salutary confidence placed in the merits of Christ, and that indeed alone, 1) confers on us all powers, sufficient for all good works (per principle I); 2) excites the highest zeal and a most ready will for rendering obedience to God, and increases it more and more daily (per principle II); 3) overcomes all impediments to good works (per principle III); Therefore, good works, one and all, are the necessary effects of salutary confidence, or faith in Christ.

Question XXXII. Who is to be invoked and adored?

Object of Prayer or Invocation. To be invoked and adored is the triune God alone a), the Father b), the Son of God, who is Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) c) and the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. From Matthew IV, 10. "You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve." Cf. Deut. VI, 13. Isa. XLII, 8.

Proof b. From John XVI, 23. "Amen, amen, I say to you: Whatever you ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you."

Proof c. From John V, 23. "That all may honor the Son, just as they honor the Father." The human nature of Christ is not excluded from the worship of adoration, but the same, in personal union with the divine nature itself in the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), is to be worshipped and adored with one and the same adoration, Phil. II, 9-10. Rev. V, 12.

Proof d. From 2 Cor. XIII, 14. "The communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all!"

Question XXXIII. Are the departed saints also to be invoked?

On the Invocation of the Departed Saints. The departed saints are not to be invoked.

Observation. We do not detract due honor from the departed saints, nor do we treat them with contempt, but we deny that they are to be religiously worshipped, invoked, and adored. For religious worship is one thing, which is due to God alone, on account of his independent, omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, most merciful essence; Non-religious worship is another, which is due to creatures dependent on God, to whom greater honor is due on account of their greater excellence, but it is non-religious. Our Augsburg Confession, article XXI, renders due honor to the saints departed in the Lord: "Concerning the worship of the saints they (our churches) teach that the memory of the saints may be set before us, that we may imitate their faith and good works, according to our calling." We therefore approve that of AUGUSTINE in the book On True Religion, c. 55. "The saints are to be honored for imitation, not to be adored for religion."

Proof. 1) God alone is to be religiously invoked, Deut. VI, 13. Matth. IV, 10. Exod. XX, 3. Isa. XLII, 8. Therefore, the departed saints are not to be religiously invoked. The Papists make an exception, and say that a distinction must be made between λατρεία and δουλεία. The former is due to God alone; the latter also to the departed saints. They also add ὑπερδουλεία, which they assign to the human nature of Christ and to the Blessed Virgin Mary. But we respond that the δουλεία of the first table is nothing other than λατρεία, with which God is to be served, Matth. IV, 10. But the δουλείαι pertaining to the second table of the decalogue are either of service, which is shown to the living, or of memory, which we do not detract from the departed saints. But Ὑπερδουλεία is a monster of a word and of a thing, devised by the Scholastics.

2. He who is religiously invoked ought to be a) omniscient and a knower of hearts (καρδιογνώστης), that he may be able to hear our prayers and groans, Ps. XLIV, 21, and b) omnipotent, that he may be able to bring aid to the afflicted, Exod. XV, 2. Ps. LXII, 8. But the saints are not omniscient and knowers of hearts, 1 Kings VIII, 39. Isa. LXIII, 16, nor are they omnipotent, Gen. XVII, 1. Therefore the departed saints are not to be religiously invoked. The Papists except: a) That the saints in the essence of God, as in a mirror, see creatures clearly and distinctly, and therefore our prayers. b) That God reveals our groans to them. Response to a): The saints, by virtue of the beatific vision, see that which is in God, actually and formally, but they do not know that which is in God virtually and eminently. To b): If God reveals our prayers and groans to the saints, how do the departed saints carry our prayers to God?

3. We ought not to religiously invoke him in whom we do not believe, as Paul teaches, Rom. X, 14. But we do not believe in the departed saints; for we believe in God alone; Therefore.

4. The invocation of saints is not commanded in the word of God, but rather prohibited by the first commandment; Therefore, it is self-willed worship (ἐθελοθρησκεία), condemned by God, Col. II, 23. Matth. XV, 9.

5. Christ alone is to be invoked, as our mediator and intercessor with God, 1 Tim. II, 5. 1 John II, 1.

The antithesis is of the Papists, who state that the departed saints can be usefully invoked. They argue:

I. If we ask living saints to pray for us, we can also ask departed saints to intercede for us; The antecedent is true; Therefore, also the consequent. The reason for the consequence is; because the departed saints are closer to God, and therefore can better intercede for us than living men. Response: Distinguish between the dutiful asking of the living, and the religious invocation of the departed saints. The asking of the living does not proceed from a religious cult of adoration, but from fraternal affection. The living saints know our necessities, but the departed do not know them in particular. The asking of the living has a foundation in Holy Scripture, namely, a command and an example. See 1 Thess. V, 25. James V, 16. The religious invocation of the departed saints is destitute of both.

II. We dare not approach any Prince, or King, without a secretary, or other intercessor; Therefore much less should we attempt to approach God, without some saintly intercessor. Response: Distinguish between the mystical, or spiritual kingdom of Christ, and some political, or temporal kingdom. In a political kingdom it is customary not to approach the king or prince immediately. But to use the intercession of someone, namely a counselor or secretary. But in the mystical kingdom of Christ everyone can appear before the heavenly Father, without the intercession of the saints; for we rely on the intercession of Christ, our only mediator.

III. Whoever intercede for us, they can be invoked by us as intercessors; But the departed saints etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the help of a good intercessor can be usefully implored. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession concedes the minor, p. 224, and it can be confirmed from Jer. XV, 1. Rev. V, 8. Response: 1) Distinguish between general intercession, and special. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession concedes that the departed saints pray in general for the universal church; but just as they are ignorant of the groans of individuals, so they do not intercede for individuals in particular. 2) Even if the blessed in heaven pray for the church, they are not therefore to be invoked. For living Christians in Asia or Africa also pray for the church of Christ; yet it is not lawful to address them by invoking them.

Question XXXIV. Are images of Christ and the saints to be venerated with religious worship?

On the veneration of images. Images of Christ and the saints are to be venerated neither with direct and terminative religious worship a), nor with analogical and reductive religious worship b).

Proof a. Direct religious worship is due to God alone, who is omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, and infinitely merciful.

Proof b. 1) The analogical and reductive worship of images (which ought to redound, ultimately be referred, and be terminated not in the image, but in the prototype itself) has no divine command, nor any example in the sacred letters. Therefore, it is self-willed worship (εθελοθρησκεία), an elective cult. 2) The worship of the omnipresent and omniscient God is not to be tied to an image, or a statue, since we can venerate the same in all places without regard to images. 3) The reductive worship of images smacks of paganism. For, as LACTANTIUS testifies in book II of his Institutes, c. II, the gentiles excused their idolatry with this pretext, that they do not adore the idols themselves, but God through them; To whom LACTANTIUS responds: "Why then do you not lift your eyes to heaven?" When the Israelites formed a golden calf for themselves, they did not attribute worship directly to the calf, but they wanted this to be a type moving them to a more devout worship of God.

The antithesis is of the Papists, who defend the analogical and reductive worship of images, whose trivial arguments we will summarize. They object: 1) The Israelites adored the ark, upon which were the Cherubim, Exod. XXV, 22. II) The same looked upon the bronze serpent, that they might be healed, Num. XXI, 8. Therefore, it is also lawful for us in our worship to look upon images. III) Miracles were done through images, as EUSEBIUS testifies in book VII of his Ecclesiastical History, c. 14. IV) The images of princes are honored; Therefore, the images of Christ and the saints are to be honored. Response to 1): The Israelites did not adore the ark of the covenant, but at the ark. The ark was not the object of adoration, but the place of the manifestation of the gracious divine presence. To II): Not everything, which being placed on high, worshippers look at, is an object of adoration. For worshippers generally look at the heavens; Therefore, do they adore the heavens? To III): Not everything, through which miracles are done, is to be adored; otherwise even the staff of Moses would have been to be adored, through which many miracles were done. To IV): The images of princes are honored civilly; But we do not detract civil, or external worship, from the images of Christ and the saints.

Question XXXV. What causes move and impel men to pray?

Impulsive Causes of Prayer. The impulsive causes of prayer are: a) the will of God declared by command and divine promise; b) our own want and necessity; c) the utility of prayers.

Proof a. We read the threefold command of Christ, Matthew VII, 7. "Ask, seek, knock." The threefold promise is also added: "You will receive, you will find, it will be opened."

Proof b. From Isa. XXVI, 16. "O Jehovah, in distress they sought you."

Proof c. From John XVI, 23. "Amen, amen, I say to you, whatever you ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you."

Question XXXVI. What things are to be asked from God?

Object. Both corporal and spiritual goods are to be asked from God. Corporal goods are to be asked and expected from God with the condition of the divine will, and without the prescription of manner or time a). But spiritual and celestial goods are to be sought simply and without condition b).

Proof a. From 1 John V, 14. "This is the παρηγοία, the confidence, that we have toward him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he hears us." Wherefore the will of God is always to be regarded in the petition of corporal goods; because God knows better what is profitable for us than we ourselves. Thus David committed himself wholly to the divine will, 2 Sam. XV, 25, as did that leper, Matth. VIII, 2, and even Christ himself in the state of his deepest humiliation, Matth. XXVI, 39.

Proof b. Spiritual and celestial goods are simply, absolutely and without condition promised to us in the divine word. 1 Tim. II, 4. Luke XI, 13. Therefore, the same are to be sought without condition.

Question XXXVII. For whom should we pray?

Subject. We should pray both for ourselves a), and for other men, and indeed in general for all b), in particular for the faithful c).

Proof a. From Ps. L, 15. "Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver you, and you shall glorify me."

Proof b. From 1 Tim. II, 1. "I urge, then, first of all, that petitions, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for all people." We pray for unbelievers and enemies, that God may illuminate and convert them.

Proof c. Spiritual brethren pray for one another, 1 Thess. V, 25, that they may persevere in the faith.

Question XXXVIII. Should we pray for the dead?

For men who have died piously, prayers that are meritorious, or satisfactory, are not to be poured out, nor impetratory ones, on account of which God may grant grace after this life for the punishment remaining after the remission of guilt.

Observation. We do not disapprove of all prayers for the dead with AERIUS. "We" (the words are of the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, p. 274) "do not prohibit prayers for the dead, nor do we patronize Aerius." Namely, we do not reject, but we retain the encomiastic commemoration of the piously departed, as well as eucharistic prayers for a blessed departure from this life, and votive ones, by which we wish for the souls released from the body a blessed rest in the heavens, for the body a tranquil repose in the bosom of the earth, and for both a glorious reunion on the last day. We wish, however, for the soul a blessed rest, not because it has not yet attained it, but because we sincerely desire a sweet rest for the pious soul, and we wish for it a perpetuity of joys. Therefore, eucharistic and votive prayers are clear symbols of our charity towards the deceased.

Proof. 1) From the lack of a divine command, promise, and approved example. For in the entire canonical scripture of the O. and N. T. we find no command, no divine promise, no example of prayer for the dead. But whatever is undertaken for the sake of exhibiting sacred worship without a divine command and promise, that is self-willed worship (εθελοθρησκεία).

2. From the analogy of faith. For the departed are either blessed, and thus do not need our prayers; or they are damned, and thus cannot be helped by our prayers; For the wrath of God remains upon them, John III, 36.

3. The intercession of Christ alone is meritorious and satisfactory; Our prayers do not have the force of meriting and satisfying.

4. Those who depart in the faith of Christ are absolved both from guilt and from punishment; with guilt remitted, no punishment is to be feared.

The antithesis is of the Papists, who assert that one should pray for the dead, that they may be freed from the temporal punishment remaining after the remission of guilt. They urge especially the example of Judas Maccabeus, who is said to have sent 2000 drachmas of silver to be spent for the dead, and commanded that prayers be made for the deceased, 2 Maccab. XII, 42 seq. Response; 1) The books of Maccabees are not in the canon. 2) Judas Maccabeus ordered sacrifice and prayer ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν, on account of the dead, so that the particle ὑπὲρ denotes the cause of the prayers, namely, lest the sin of the dead be imputed to the surviving people. For he knew very well that certain enormous sins are sometimes imputed to the whole people; in what way God once in the time of Joshua punished the whole people for the sin of Achan, Josh. VII, 11. 3) Even if Judas had sacrificed and ordered prayer for the dead, this example would prove nothing, because it is destitute of a divine command.

Question XXXIX. What is the end of prayer?

End of Prayer. The end of prayer is both the glory of God a), and our own and others' temporal and eternal salvation b).

Proof a. True worshippers attribute to God alone the glory of omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and infinite mercy, Isa. XLII, 8.

Proof b. On our part, the ends and effects of prayers are various: the obtaining of the Holy Spirit and of spiritual gifts, the attainment of temporal aid, and eternal rewards.

CHAPTER IX.
ON THE ISAGOGICAL, OR EXECUTIVE,
MEANS OF SALVATION,
IN PARTICULAR,
ON DEATH
AND
THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Question I. What are the executive and isagogical means of salvation?

THE EXECUTIVE AND isagogical means of salvation are the means divinely ordained, without the precedence of which God does not execute the sentence of glorification, and by the intervention of which men, persevering in faith, are proximately introduced into the highest beatitude, which are: death a), the resurrection of the dead b), the last judgment c), and the consummation of the age d).

Observation 1. The means of salvation in the stricter sense are called causal means, such as are both the exhibiting means, the word of God and the sacraments, and the receiving medium, which is faith in Christ. But death, the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, and the consummation of the age, are called means of salvation in a broader sense; because they are means of an order, divinely established, without the precedence of which no one is admitted into eternal glory. For just as a way is something intermediate between the starting point of motion, and the end point; so death, the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, and the consummation of the age are intermediates between this temporal life, and the eternal one. For which reason eternal life is not related to death etc. as an effect to causes, but as a terminus to preceding means of order.

Observation 2. For the faithful, death, the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, and the consummation of the age are executive means of glorification; for the unfaithful, they are executive means of condemnation.

Observation 3. Among the isagogical means of salvation there is some difference, because some precede the glorification of the elect more remotely, others more closely. In the first place, it should be noted that the consummation of the age is not required for the execution of the sentence of glorification with the same necessity as death, resurrection, and judgment. For God could glorify the pious, and damn the impious, even if the world did not burn. He could not, however, saving His decrees and justice, glorify the pious and condemn the impious, unless death (either properly, or analogously so-called), and resurrection, and judgment preceded. Wherefore we call the consummation of the age an executive medium because God has freely decreed to execute the final sentence only after this age has been consummated. Cf. D. HULSEM. breviar, cap. 16, p. 1127 & D. OSIANDER colleg. System part. VI, p. 278.

Proof a. The faithful groan and want to become more present to the Lord through dissolution, 2 Cor. V, 4. Therefore death for the faithful is a medium leading to life. The consequence is proven; Unless glorification were a consequent to death, by divine institution as to a preceding medium, there would not be in the faithful a desire for dissolution, but rather for continuing the union.

Proof b. From Dan. XII, 2. "And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and others to shame and everlasting contempt." Therefore the resurrection of the bodies of the faithful is a medium for promoting glory; but of the unfaithful, a medium for summoning to punishment.

Proof c. On the day of the last judgment the King will praise those who will be placed at his right hand, and will say: "Come, you blessed etc." But to those who will stand at his left, he will say: "Depart, you cursed etc." Matthew XXV, 34, 41. Therefore the last judgment is a medium for commending and admitting the faithful into beatitude; but for convicting the unfaithful, and publicly condemning them to eternal punishment.

Proof d. The consummation of the age serves the acceleration of the faithful to glory: "for if those days (of the last tribulation) were not shortened, no flesh would be saved; but for the sake of the elect they will be shortened," Matthew XXIV, 22.

Observation. Although these words immediately refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, because however the destruction of Jerusalem is a type of the destruction of the world, they are rightly referred to the consummation of the age.

ON DEATH

Question II. What is temporal death?

Definition of death. Temporal death is the privation of the natural life of men, proceeding from the dissolution of the soul and body.

Homonymy. More fully it is defined: Temporal death is the privation of natural life, proceeding from the dissolution of the soul and body, through the sin committed by the first humans, at the instigation of the devil, ordinarily to be undergone by all sinful men, by the decree of God, the most just judge, for the glory of divine justice.

Observation. The name of death is used in the sacred letters both in a proper sense and in an improper sense. We have already described death properly so-called, which they also call the death of the body.

Improperly, death is taken either metonymically, or metaphorically. Metonymically, death denotes a deadly thing, 2 Kings IV, 40. Exod. X, 17. Metaphorically, it signifies spiritual death, which is either of the unfaithful, or of the faithful. The spiritual death of the unfaithful is the privation of spiritual life, proceeding from the separation of the impenitent and unfaithful soul from God, and it is both of this, and of the future age. The spiritual death of the unfaithful in this age is the privation of the life of grace. Thus a wanton and promiscuous widow is said to be dead in sins, 1 Tim. V, 6, i.e., destitute of the life of grace, because Christ the life of the soul does not live in her through faith. The spiritual death of the unfaithful in the future age is the privation of the life of glory, arising from the lack of the beatific vision and fruition of God, joined with the suffering of the most immense torments in hell. It is called the second death, Rev. XX, 14. The faithful are dead 1) to sin, partly through justification, inasmuch as sin on account of the merit of Christ, apprehended by faith, is not imputed to them by God out of grace, Rom. VI, 7, partly through renewal, by which a regenerate and justified man is freed from the dominion of sin, so that he does not indulge in it, or enslave himself to it, but sends it a notice of dismissal, 1 Petr. II, 24. 2) The faithful are dead to the world, insofar as they renounce the pleasures of this world, Gal. VI, 14. 3) The faithful are dead to the law, both the ceremonial and the moral, being completely freed from the obligation of the former, and immune from the coercion, accusation, and condemnation of the latter; for they have been given a spontaneous spirit, and are freed from the condemnation of the law by the grace of justification, Rom. VII, 1-2.

Question III. In what does the death of the body formally consist?

Form. The death of the body formally consists in the privation of natural life.

Proof. Because death is privatively opposed to life, and therefore denotes the absence of animal life from a subject, apt to have it. You say: Corporal death formally consists in the dissolution of the soul and body, or in the separation of the soul from the body. Response: The formal reason of death consists in the privation of life, which the dissolution of the soul and body precedes;

just as natural life is not the union itself of body and soul, but follows it.

Question IV. What are the efficient causes of temporal death?

Causes. Temporal death, considered formally, as the privation of natural life, properly speaking has no efficient cause a); but regarded metaleptically, as it is the dissolution of the soul and body, its efficient causes are some moral, to which the dissolution of the body and soul is imputed; and others are physical, which really destroy the bond of union by which body and soul are joined. The moral causes are: the devil, by instigating to sin, directly intending the death of man b), and man, by obeying the devil's instinct, meriting death by his sin c). But death, considered as a penal evil, arises from a decreeing and inflicting cause, namely from God, the most just judge d).

Proof a. Since death formally is a privation, or a defect, it cannot be an effect produced by a positively acting cause.

Proof b. The devil is the moral cause of death; because by giving the most cunning counsel about eating the forbidden fruit, he directly intended the temporal, spiritual, and eternal death of man. Therefore he is called a murderer from the beginning, John VIII, 44.

Proof c. Eve, embracing the devil's counsel, and drawing Adam into the partnership of sin, and Adam, listening to his wife's blandishments, and violating the divine law, brought upon themselves the guilt of sin and punishment, and subjected not only themselves, but also their posterity to the necessity of dying, Rom, V, 12.

Proof d. God did not indeed make death, Wis. 1, 13, and therefore by His antecedent will He did not will the death of man; but by His consequent will, on account of the preceding sin, He decreed to inflict death, as a punishment, on man, and He executes His decree. Therefore He threatens the penalty of death, Gen. II, 17, defines the limit of life and death, Job XIV, 5, and finally commands man to depart from this mortal station, Ps. XC, 3.

Question V. What are the physical causes of temporal death?

The physical causes of death are some natural, some preternatural, some violent. The natural cause is the consumption of the radical moisture, and the extinction of the native heat a). The preternatural causes are more serious diseases b). The violent causes are external things, inflicting such force on the body, that the bond of natural union, by which the body and soul are joined, is broken c).

Proof a. For since the innate heat and radical moisture (which, we state, coincide as to substance, but differ as to qualities) are proximately joined to the soul, it is easily gathered that when that is consumed, death invades man. Therefore, those die a natural death, whose innate heat is gradually weakened, and whose radical moisture, with the progress of time, dries up more and more without a more serious illness.

Proof b. More vehement diseases, e.g., malignant fevers, dropsy, phthisis, plague, destroy the powers of the native heat, so that it is overthrown not by successive consumption, but by a just more vehement shock.

Proof c. He who pierces a man's heart with a sword, ejects him from life by applied external force (*).

Question VI. Which men must undergo death?

Subjective. Temporal death is ordinarily to be undergone by all sinful men a), but those who are exempted from this ordinary law of dying, by God's extraordinary dispensation, nevertheless undergo a change, analogous to death b).

Proof a. Death passed upon all men through sin, Rom. V, 12.

Proof b. Enoch and Elijah, by God's extraordinary dispensation, were exempted from the necessity of dying. And those men, whom the last day will find alive, will not indeed die; but they will be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, 1 Cor. XV, 52. What is understood by the Apostle is not a substantial change, but an accidental one, consisting not in a troublesome passion, or a painful experience of some adverse thing, which is similar to the dissolution of the soul and body, but both in the end of (*) Violent causes are contained within the general scope of the preternatural, commonly so-called, and are not only external, but sometimes also internal, and therefore to be numbered among the moral, as, if someone with a disturbed mind, extreme wickedness, or desperation on account of the consciousness of his crimes, commits voluntary death upon himself.

animal life, and in the transition into a supernatural state, so that the bodies of those men are not separated from their souls, but joined to them, and are suddenly transferred from the state of mortality into the state of immortality.

Question VII. What is the end of death?

End. The end of death, on the part of the devil, is the manifestation of his hatred and envy towards God and men a); on the part of God, the end of death, considered in itself, is the vindication of sins, and the declaration of divine justice b); but by accident it happens, that for the faithful death is the end of evils, and the transition to a glorious life c).

Proof a. The devil vomited out all the venom of his envy and hatred against God and man, by depriving the latter of his concreated immortality through solicitation to sin. In which final respect, he is called both a murderer, John VIII, 44, and envious, Wis. II, 24.

Proof b. Death in itself is the wages of sin, Rom. VI, 23.

Proof c. By the economy of divine grace it has been brought about, that from believers in Christ the guilt of punishment has been taken away, and death has been made the gate to life, and an entrance into rest, Rev. XIV, 13. (**).

Question VIII. How is death distinguished with respect to men emigrating from this life?

Distinction of death. Death is either of the pious and faithful, or of the impious and unfaithful. The death of the pious is the local separation of the soul from the body, as a medium, on the part of God, leading man to glorification. The death of the impious is the local separation of the soul from the body, as a medium, on the part of God, disposing man to undergo the punishment he has merited.

ON THE STATE OF SOULS AFTER DEATH.

Question IX. Is the soul immortal, and truly living after separation from the body?

Immortality of the soul after death. The soul is immortal, and released from the body, it functions separately with its own actions.

Proof. 1) From the testimony of Christ, Matthew X, 28. "Do not fear those who can (**) Death itself is also called rest, and is very often compared with sleep. Care must be taken in investigating the reason for this name, of which one is indeed false, but the other is true.

I. They invent a false one, who refer the force of this sacred word to the soul, as if it, as soon as it has departed from the body, is seized by sleep, and is void of all thought and sense, until that day, when it, having been separated, will be joined again with its body. Many have fallen into this error, both of the ancients and of the more recent, whence the name Psychopannychites has stuck to them. They openly oppose 1) reason, if we consider the nature of the soul, which is a Spirit, always occupied in thinking and deciding, 2) revelation; for the dead are said to sleep in the earth, Dan. XII, 2, in their beds, Isa. LVII, 2. But the body lies buried in the earth, from which the soul, being separated, has passed to another dwelling, Eccl. XII, 7. Luke XVI, 22-23. Therefore, it is evident that the comparison of death and sleep in no way pertains to the soul.

II. There is a twofold true one, both of which relate to the body. Namely, in sleep, properly so named, two things are chiefly to be considered, of which one indeed constitutes the nature of sleep, the other happens to it, as a consequent and event. 1) Sleep is the rest of the body, with the operation of the external senses ceasing, and of the motions of the mind, insofar as it indeed uses reason, in communication with the body. Isaiah, respecting this, LVII, 2, transferred this name, sleep, to signify the state of death. 2) In sleep there is the expectation of the time when the sleeping man will awake. We indeed, when dying, rely on the firmest hope of the reawakening of the body. Thus Christ compared death with sleep, John XI, 11.

Consequence: Since a pleasant rest cannot be without the consciousness of affairs well done, and that is proper to the blessedly departed; but the future recall to life of the inanimate body is common to all men; it follows that in the former reason the death only of blessed men, but in the latter reason the death of all is compared with sleep. Concerning the former, see Isa. LVII, 2. Concerning the latter, Dan. XII, 2, in what way it has been recorded of impious Kings; that they fell asleep, e.g., 1 Kings XIV, 20, 31.

kill the body but cannot kill the soul." What cannot be killed by anyone, that is immortal; But the soul etc.; Therefore.

2. From the testimony of Solomon, Eccl. XII, 7. "The spirit will return to God, who gave it." Whatever spirit, separated from the body, returns to God, that one lives after separation from the body; But the human soul is a spirit etc. Therefore.

3. From the testimony of John, Rev. VI, 9. "I saw under the altar the souls of those who had been slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held, which cried out with a loud voice." What souls cry out, those live; The souls of the slain cry out; Therefore.

4. From the light of reason; No spirit is mortal; But the soul is a spirit; Therefore. I prove the minor from the spiritual operations of the soul, such as; to contemplate God and eternal things, to abstract universals from particulars, to infer the future from the past, to desire eternal felicity, etc. Which actions are independent of matter, and producible without any cooperation of a bodily organ, and therefore spiritual. But what soul performs spiritual operations, that is a spirit; for an effect is never more excellent than its cause.

The antithesis is of the Socinians" who assert that the soul is indeed incorruptible, but not properly immortal, or living after its release from the body (*). Their arguments are;

I. Whatever soul truly lives, it is united with the body; But the separated soul is not united with the body; Therefore. The major is proven; because for life the union of body and soul is required. Response; 1) This syllogism at first glance seems to be in the second figure; but in reality it is in the first figure due to the transposed terms, and then the minor is viciously negative. 2) Distinguish between the life of the composite, and of the part, which lives through itself and originally. For the life of man, or of the whole composite, the union of body and soul is required. But the soul is the nobler part of man, living through itself and originally, from which the body has communicated life. Hence it is, that the soul separated from the body truly lives.

II. The soul in operating needs bodily members as organs; Therefore, outside the body it performs no operations, and consequently does not live. The antecedent is plain; because the soul needs eyes for seeing, ears for hearing. Response; Distinguish between material human actions, and immaterial ones. Seeing and hearing are material actions, dependent on the cooperation of the organic body. But there are other immaterial and spiritual actions, for which the concurrence of bodily members is not required, e.g., to understand, to contemplate, to discourse, to will, to choose, to trust, to love etc. The soul, released from the body, functions with these, truly vital, operations.

III. King Solomon says; "As the beast dies; so also man dies. And there is one spirit for all, nor is there a prerogative of man over the beasts; because all is vanity. All go to one place." Eccl. III, 19-20. From which saying of Solomon it may be gathered that the soul of man perishes just as the souls of beasts. Response; 1) There are those who persuade themselves that Solomon assumed the persona of some Epicurean, or profane man, philosophizing crudely about the perishing of man, and comparing it with the perishing of beasts. 2) Others more rightly respond with the blessed LUTHER, that Solomon discourses about man and beasts from the principles of reason, with respect had to the external events, common to man and beasts, in respect of which the entrance of man into this world and his exit do not seem to differ from the entrance and exit of beasts. But indeed, sound reason gathers the immortality of the human soul from another principle, namely from the spiritual operations of the soul; which Solomon expressly affirms in the same little book, c. XII, 7. "The spirit returns to God."

Question X. What is the state of souls from the body?

Quality of this state. The state of souls of the perseveringly faithful, and separated from the body, is blessed in heaven a). The state of unfaithful souls, released from the body, is damned in hell b).

Proof a. and b. We have shown this lucidly in the preceding section, ch. IX; we do not wish to belabor the point here.

On the intermediate state. Question XI. Is there, between the blessed and the damned state, an intermediate state of certain separated souls in purgatory?

(*) They imagine that the soul is not dead, but sleeping. They are therefore to be numbered among the Psychopannychites, of whom we have already spoken.

There is no intermediate state after this life between the state of eternal beatitude and eternal condemnation a). Therefore purgatory is a most vain invention of men b).

Proof a. 1) Holy scripture divides all men into believers and non-believers, or into the faithful and the unfaithful. Whoever, dying, truly believe, are saved; who do not believe, are condemned, Mark XVI, 16. Therefore, between the blessed and the damned state after this life there is no middle state.

2. The author of salvation, Jesus, in Matthew VII, 13-14, shows two ways, which men run in this life to two places after this life; he makes no mention of a third way to a third place. The Savior's words are: "Enter by the narrow gate; for the gate is wide and the way is broad that leads to destruction, and there are many who enter through it. For the gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to life, and there are few who find it." Therefore, however many men run the broad, trodden way, with sinners who know not how to repent and believe, they rush into eternal destruction; those who walk the narrow way of faith, go into eternal life.

3. Whoever from the first moment of their departure from this world are blessed, they are not thrust down into purgatory; But all and singular who have died piously in the Lord etc. Rev. XIV, 13. Therefore. The major is proven; because according to the mind of the Papists in purgatory there are burning flames and most intense torments, which cannot consist with beatitude *).<sup>325</sup>

(*) To these arguments are to be added several, in which there is certainly very much weight:

1. In the most holy assertion of Christ, John V, 24, there is a threefold nerve of probation: 1) Nothing at all intervenes between temporal death and eternal life; "he has passed (μεταβέβηκεν) from death to life (ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωὴν)." 2) This blessed lot is common to all, whoever dying adhere to Christ with true confidence; "he who hears... he who believes (ὁ ἀκούων... ὁ πιστεύων)," i.e., each and every one. 3) The cause of this transition from death into life, with no delay interposed, the cause, I say, is said to be no other than salutary confidence; "he who hears my word (the proper voice of Christ, which is evangelical) and believes him who sent me (ὁ τὸν λόγον μου... ἀκούων, καὶ πιστεύων τῷ πέμψαντί με)." But with the efficacious cause present, and that indeed the only one, nothing remains, why the effect should be deferred and retarded.

2. This saying, 2 Corinthians V, 9, contains in its whole compass these propositions: 1) The soul, separated from the body, remains surviving; 2) It passes to beatitude; 3) That transition happens, without any delay, after departure from this mortal body, and from this life, as from a lodging, so that nothing intervenes, v. 1, 6, 8, so that there is also no desire for a better lot, no expectation of it, inasmuch as we have it, while we are in the body, v. 4 & 6; 4) That beatitude, therefore, to be obtained immediately after death, is eternal, v. 1; 5) It is also perfect, as far as pertains to the soul, namely an intimate union with God, v. 8, and therefore the contemplation of God, so that there is nothing intermediate between "faith (πίστιν)" and "sight (εἶδος)," v. 7; 6) This benefit is common to all, nor does Paul arrogate any excellence to himself, v. 1, 7, 10. If the Roman Catholics are asked: whether they think that Paul also felt the force of the fire of purgatory? They will answer by denying; for they wish martyrs, and especially the Apostles, to be excepted; they also except two other kinds of men, of whom, however, with no one, except among themselves, is there so great, and so singular an esteem. But, what Paul professes of himself, he promises the same to all true Christians. Add. 2 Tim. IV, 8. 7) It is also a great solace; "we are confident (θαρροῦμεν)," v. 8. You see therefore, how great is the moment of the cause, about which we are disputing.

3. From that speech of Christ, Luke XVI, 12 seqq., three truths shine forth: 1) The souls of the departed, whether of the blessed, or of the damned, do not perish; 2) They are always conscious of themselves, thinking and feeling (Therefore they do not lie lulled in sleep, as the Psychopannychites dream); 3) Immediately after they have emigrated from their bodies, without delay, they are placed in that state, in which they are to remain perpetually (Therefore there is no middle state at all). You say: But that is a parable. So be it; although it is probable that a thing truly done is commemorated by Christ. But, you say, from parables a firm argument cannot be made. This indeed I know well. Do you not know, that even in a similitude nothing should ever be brought forth, which does not agree either with its scope, or with any part of sacred doctrine?

Prob. B. The founders of purgatory have laid as their foundation the venial sins of many faithful souls who have departed from this life contaminated by them. And since nothing unclean will enter heaven, Rev. XXI, 27, they conclude that the souls of the faithful, being so impure, must be purified for a certain time by the fire of purgatory, so that they may thereafter enter into celestial glory. But this foundation is ruinous. For the faithful are purified partly in this life, partly after this life, yet in such a way that the purgatory which the Papists imagine does not exist. In this life, indeed, they are purified with respect to the form of sin, namely the guilt of fault and punishment, through justification. For in those who are in Christ Jesus through faith, there is no κατάκριμα, or anything that is imputed for condemnation, Rom. VIII, 1. They are purified through renewal, with respect to the dominion of sin, so that they may be holy in Christ, Phil. I, 10. Moreover, the imperfection adhering to their incipient sanctity is covered by the veil of Christ's obedience, which the reborn apply to themselves through faith and make their own. But after this life, they are purified with respect to the material of sin, in death itself, and after death they are divinely adorned with such perfection that they are devoid of every stain. For in death, the evil concupiscence, which adhered in part from the sensitive appetite, is destroyed with the body. After death, they are purified 1) on the part of the soul, by the infused light of glory, by which the intellect, elevated to know God intuitively, is purged of all ignorance, blindness, and error, and the will, through the intuitive knowledge of God, is elevated and directed into the most intense love of God, so that it loves nothing except in order to God and for the sake of God, being free from inordinate love and evil concupiscence, 2) On the part of the body, however, they are wholly purified in the resurrection of the dead. For the bodies of men who die in the faith of Christ will be resurrected and reunited with their souls, spiritual and glorious, 1 Cor. XV, 42. Seqq. And conformed to the glorious body of Christ, Phil. III, 21. So that without any inordinate concupiscence they may be perfectly subjected to the glorified soul for the performance of perfectly holy actions. E. there is no need for

4. That this promise of Christ, Luke XXIII, 43, also has great force for proof, appears from this, that that thief, hanging on the cross, was not able in so short a time to make satisfaction for expiating his sins, nor was he of the number of those, for whom, as they say, the fire of purgatory is not to be feared. Nor was he a Martyr; nor a Doctor, who had merited outstandingly from the Roman church, nor a monk, or any other holy man, conspicuous for the form, that is, of supererogatory works.

5. From the volumes of the Old Testament, among many proofs, this one clear and significant description, frequently used, stands out: The congregation of the dead, and the joining with their people. I will premise the definition: A people is a multitude of those men who live in one society. Therefore, there are three things required for the notion of a people: 1) a multitude of men, 2) living, 3) joined in a certain society. And our people is a multitude and society not of strangers and sojourners, but of citizens, with whom we have always been accustomed to associate. These are the citizens of the heavenly fatherland, as Paul interprets, Hebr. XI, 13.—16. For our πολιτεύμα is in heaven, Phil. III, 20. Since in this mortal life we are not so much citizens as sojourners, 2 Cor. V, 6. 1 Petr. II, 11. Therefore, that congregation of the dying with their people is opposed to 1) ejection from the number of citizens, 2) pilgrimage, which is called a sojourn on earth, Hebr. XI, 9. 10. 13. 14. 1 Chron. XXIX, 15. Indeed, Paul manifestly referred to that manner of speaking of the O.T., 2 Corinth. V, 6. ἐκδημῶμεν, that is, we are absent from our people, abroad, and not, except at that time when we are enclosed in these bonds of the mortal body; to which the contrary is v. 8. εἰδημῆσαι πρὸς Κύριος, that is, to be with our people, and indeed with the Lord. Therefore 1) the congregation of the blessedly dying with their people is nothing other than the accession to the perpetual habitation in the heavenly fatherland; 2) And it happens as soon as the soul has departed from the body; for which reason this expression, "he was gathered to his people," is closely joined with the commemoration of death; 3) Nothing intervenes between death and the eternal blessedness of the holy soul. If you should think that by that sacred manner of speaking, burial is designated; if you should dare to confirm this with sayings of this kind, 1 Reg. XXII, 20: the arguments already brought forth will teach you that by those two expressions not one and the same thing, but distinct things are signified, of which one pertains to the departing soul, the other to the body.

purgatory, nor does it rest on a solid foundation.

The antithesis is that of the Papists (*), who imagine a purgatory, in which the

(*) In general, our doctrine of no intermediate state whatsoever for souls separated from the body is opposed by many, addicted to various sects, who all indeed agree in this, that the state of souls is not of such a kind as we have declared by the testimonies of scripture; but in explaining and defining what and of what sort the condition of souls is, they dissent much among themselves. Therefore, by their own right, they are to be distributed into various classes.

CLASS I is of those who, either denying that the soul of man is a spirit, or not knowing what a spirit is, do not fear to say that the soul is mortal. Of these, some, the cruder ones, trifle that the soul perishes completely, and no hope of restitution remains; against whom Solomon disputes in the book of Ecclesiastes, especially chap. III, 19. 20. 21. XII, 7. Others, however, the more subtle, persuade themselves that the soul is indeed extinguished together with the body, but that the same will at some time be recalled to life with the body. This monster of ingenuity was excluded in the 3rd century by certain obscure men, who were given the name Arabians from their place of sojourn, and who on account of their error were called θητοψυχῆται. In more recent times COWARD, a certain physician in England, brought forth nothing new.

CLASS II contains those who embrace the most ancient error not of certain dissenting Philosophers, but of dreamers, when with μετεμψύχωσιν, or rather μετενσωμάτωσιν, they invent a manifold migration of souls from one body into another.

In CLASS III are those, in whose opinion souls are indeed always surviving, and not associated with other bodies, yet never conscious of themselves, perpetually sleeping, and devoid of all thought and sense; whence they are called ψυχοσευχῆται. As for what pertains to these sayings, Ps. VI, 6. LXXXVIII, 12. 13. And others of this kind; the interpretation is not difficult. 1) In both places, the discourse is about an angry God, and his avenging justice. Death is therefore considered, insofar as it is a punishment, the effect of vindictive justice, and thus the beginning of eternal damnation. Nor is it so written; that the souls of the dead remember nothing. But in this way; that they do not celebrate with praises the recollection of divine benefits. This is certainly the most miserable condition of the damned, who departing from this life experience the eternal wrath of God. This wrath of God, this damnation, this condition of the damned, David prays to avert from himself. A) The souls of the blessed, from the time they have departed from the body, do not just remember the divine works in the way they were accustomed in this life, namely so that they partly excite other souls of mortals to the knowledge and veneration of God by their example, Ps. LXXI, 18. And partly they themselves delight in new daily proofs of the admirable power of God in the kingdom of both nature and grace, Ps. LXXXVIII, 11. The same is the meaning of the words, Ps. CXV, 17. Which, if they were to be understood so simply, would accomplish more than the adversaries themselves wish. The most absurd consequence would follow, and one most openly contrary to the most ample testimonies of scripture; that no salvation at all is ever to be expected after death.

CLASS IV we assign to those who affirm indeed that souls separated from the body always think and feel; but they deny that they, before the last judgment and the restitution of the body, attain to either eternal beatitude or eternal damnation, thinking therefore that in the meantime they are kept in a certain middle place and state. It is not indeed to be concealed that some of the most ancient Doctors of the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th centuries were of this opinion; who, when they speak either of hell, of prison, or of paradise, of the bosom of Abraham, of heaven, of the hand of God, they understand something quite different from what the divine writers signified by the same names. But three things are also to be considered: 1) Those Fathers, although they established a certain middle state, were yet utterly ignorant of purgatorial fire, until the 4th century, in which AUGUSTINE and others began to speak doubtfully of this matter; see Smalcald. Art. P. 308; 2) If some of them, like ORIGEN and his followers, discoursed much on a certain purgation of man after death, they thought it pertained not to the blessed, but to the damned, and they reasoned that these were to be purged not in a certain middle state, but in damnation itself. 3) Not all were of the opinion that there was some middle state. It will be enough for me to have named one, CYPRIAN, who in his excellent little book on mortality, expressly names paradise our fatherland, and a little after, the delight of the celestial kingdoms, and perpetual felicity. Therefore he says that death is to be wished for, so that we may quickly come to paradise, quickly to Christ. In the same place, he professes himself, that for a blessed death nothing more is required than this one thing, that we believe in Christ. There is a deep silence there about satisfaction, to be rendered by man himself, about purgation after death, about sacrifice for the dead.

CLASS V is of those who say that souls, as soon as they depart from their bodies, pass indeed into that state in which they are to remain forever, yet not a perfect one, nor to be consummated before the day of the supreme judgment. The ambiguity of the word should be noted. When beatitude, or the damnation opposite to it, is called perfect, this can be understood in a twofold way: Either subjectively, as it is customary to speak, which pertains to the whole man; in which sense indeed there is no doubt that it is imperfect, until the return of the soul into its body, raised from the ashes; see 2 Timoth. IV, 8. Or formally, in which nothing is lacking, as far as the soul is concerned, but especially the principal part of beatitude, namely the perfect knowledge and contemplation of God; in this sense we deny and utterly deny that the beatitude of the soul is imperfect before it has been joined with the revived body. As soon as seeing has ceased, endowment begins, 2 Cor. V, 7.

Finally, in CLASS VI, we number those who concede indeed that all the souls of damned men, without any delay, are sent away into eternal perdition, and also that some of the blessed are forthwith admitted to the perception of eternal joy; but the rest, they say, not yet sufficiently purged, are detained in a certain middle state, so that they may be afflicted with great torments in it, until their consummated purgation. But they too are divided into parties, and although they all agree in this, that they fable some purgation of separated souls to be necessary, yet in explaining the mode and definition they differ much among themselves. The Jews imagined the matter differently, and, among the profane nations, the Platonist Philosophers, from whom are not far the Pseudomystics and fanatical men; the Greeks feel differently about it, differently the Roman Catholics, in whose minds the opinion of a certain purgatorial fire, distinct from hell, is deeply fixed. Its false principles are these: 1) That Christ made satisfaction only for eternal punishments, but not for temporal ones, for which each person must make satisfaction himself, either in life or after death. 2) That satisfaction is a certain part of penance, indeed the principal one. From which it should be understood, in what way they try to make their purgatorial fire from this precept: μετανοῦτε. Our Apol. Aug. Conf. chap. VI, p. 186, justly castigates this argumentation as most absurd. See how they construct their reasons; Penance is supremely necessary (correctly!); But it consists of three parts, contrition of heart, confession of mouth, satisfaction of work (falsely!); E. every one who repents of his sins must perform satisfaction; E. if in life he has not made full satisfaction, he will have to supply this defect when dead in purgatory. 3) That the punishment is not entirely remitted, even if all the guilt has been pardoned. 4) That faith in Christ is not the sole and perfect cause of salvation, but that there is also a great necessity of good works for salvation. I pass over more. But behold! A manifest contradiction. This intolerable error of the Roman-Catholics contradicts 1) another certain error in which they are engaged, namely concerning extreme unction, which they say is the consummating sacrament of penance, to which they attribute such power that it wipes away sins, if any still remain to be expiated, and all the remnants of sin. See Concil. Trident. Sess. XIV. But all, when they are dying, ought to be partakers of extreme unction. Who then are to be purged thereafter? Or what remains in them to be expiated, purged, wiped away, after their fate? What need is there then for purgatorial fire? Or, if it be needed, what avails extreme unction? It contradicts 2) the truth which they profess with us, concerning the supreme judgment, and the immediately following entry of the blessed into the eternal dwelling prepared for them, Matth. XXV, 46. 1 Thess. IV, 17. In which place the word, ἅμα, together with them, carries much weight with it, with no interval of time interposed. But what, we ask, will become of those who will still be among the living on the very day of judgment? In what way, finally, will they be purged, or will they be able to make satisfaction for the punishments to be endured in purgatorial fire? Is it credible that they will all to a man be so perfect as to need no purgation or satisfaction? But a certain difficulty remains.

souls of the just, which have not been sufficiently purged in this life, are purged after this life, before they are admitted to heaven and the clear vision of God. We shall weigh their arguments:

I. Whosoever of the just die with venial sins, their souls after departure from this life must be purified by the fire of purgatory, otherwise they will not enter into the kingdom of glory, Apoc. XXI, 27. But many of these etc. E. The Minor is clear; because in many things we all stumble, Jac. III, 2. Resp. I deny the minor. For venial sins are so called because they are not actually imputed for condemnation, on account of the satisfaction of Christ rendered for sins, and apprehended by the repenting sinner through true faith. But whatever is not imputed, is morally held as not done. Whence the scriptures teach that God so remits sins that He wills no longer to remember them. Ezech. XVIII, 22. That he casts them into the depths of the sea, Mich. VII, 19. That he blots them out like a cloud, Is. XLIV, 22. Therefore, the just do not die with venial sins.

Instance: When guilt is remitted, a temporal penalty sometimes remains. Resp. This openly conflicts with the formal reason for the remission of sins. For to remit sin means to not impute sin for punishment; Whatever is not imputed for punishment, for that no punishment is to be undergone. God sometimes reserves for Himself paternal chastisements, when guilt is remitted; but not punishments, which must necessarily proceed from a still angry judge; penitents, however, are chastised in this life.

II. Whose works are tested by fire, the same are tested by purgatorial fire. But the works of the dead etc. 1 Cor. III, 13. E. The Major is established; because purgatorial fire is ordained for testing the works of men. Resp. 1) The whole context of Paul is allegorical, and therefore a fire is understood not as material, or properly so called, as the purgatorial fire is considered to be; but as metaphorical, and so called by similitude, which the little word ὡς, as if, also suggests. It does not, however, designate a fire of purification, or of expiation of sin, but of probation, of examination, or of exploration of doctrine, asserting itself by the power of the Holy Spirit through the written word of God, not without the fire of the cross and of temptation, either in danger of persecution and life, or in the final article of agony, by which true doctrine is tested and perfected, like gold, while the erroneous is consumed, like hay. For both scripture, Jer. XXIII, 29. Luc. XXIV, 32. And the temptation of the cross, 1 Petr. 1, 7. Are compared to fire. But the truth of the doctrine is tested in this, not the future age, to which purgatory is referred by the Papists. 2) That phrase, σῶζεσθαι ὡς διὰ πυρός, is proverbial, and signifies extreme danger, as GROTIUS thinks on this passage. So that the sense is: That teacher who builds hay and stubble upon the foundation of faith will be in the utmost danger of salvation, and will be saved, as if through fire, as if snatched from a perilous conflagration, with the stubble of errors also being burned up. Compare, ep. Jude v. 23.

III. Those whom Christ will purge with fire as if with a refiner's fire, He will send into purgatorial fire; But many sinners etc. Mal. III, 2. E. Resp. The prophet speaks of the purgation which occurs in this life through a fire not proper, but metaphorical, such as is the word of God, joined with the cross, or affliction.

Instance: Sinners are said to enter into fire and water, and yet to be brought out into a broad place, Ps. LXVI, 12. By which words is indicated the thrusting into purgatorial fire, and after the purification is completed,

The question Is about these dead?" concerning whom indeed it is not established that they died again, since it could have happened that they were thereafter taken up alive into the blessed seat. Whatever the case may be; this one thing is in dispute; where were their souls dwelling during that time when each was separated from its body? Was it in heaven? It seems harsh to us, and unworthy of the benignity of God, nor consistent with the consummated order of salvation, to cast down souls, already perfectly blessed, again into this calamitous life. Was it in hell? From hell there is no redemption. What then is to be thought? Is there some third place and state, intermediate between the two? But we have brought it to a clear conclusion that there is absolutely none. Among so many and so discrepant opinions, I understand this one to be both safer and more probable; that they were in heaven indeed, but as sojourners, not yet as citizens, so that they delighted in a singular and exceptional foretaste of eternal beatitude. To illustrate this matter serves what Paul, still alive but caught up out of himself, experienced something most similar to this. 2 Corinth. XII, 2. 3. 4.

the future liberation. Resp. The fire of the cross, or of temptation, is understood in that passage. This is evident from the preceding vv. 10. 11. You tested us, O God, you refined us as silver is refined; you brought us into the net; you laid a crushing burden on our backs.

IV. Whatever sins are remitted to men in the future age, from these they must be purged by purgatorial fire; But certain sins etc. Therefore. The Major is clear; because God does not remit the sins of the impure, insofar as they perseveringly pursue impurity. The Minor is proved from Matth. XII, 32. The sin against the Holy Spirit is remitted neither in this age, nor in the future. Resp. The words of Christ import an absolute negation, so that the sense is; the sin against the Holy Spirit is not remitted εἰς αἰῶνα, forever, as Mark interprets, c. III, 29. But that Christ uses a distributive locution, and says; neither in this, nor in the future age, this is done to exaggerate the sin against the Holy Spirit, as if to say: If it were possible that some sin could be remitted even after this life, yet the sin against the Holy Spirit is so great that it cannot be remitted even after this life.

V. Whosoever are brought out of the pit in which there is no water, they are brought out of purgatory: But certain sinners etc. Zach. IX, 11. Therefore. The Major is evident; because a pit without water is not found in this world; nor are we brought out of hell, because from it there is no liberation. Therefore, we are brought out of purgatory. Resp. In that passage is understood the pit of extreme misery, such as is pre-eminently the misery of hell. We have been brought out of the pit of extreme misery, in which there is not even a drop of solace, through the liberation made by the blood and death of Christ, not because we were actually cast into the infernal pit, or damned, but because we were damnable and guilty of eternal punishment.

ON THE BURIAL OF THE BODY

Question XII. Are the bodies of Christians to be buried?

Burial of the body. The lifeless bodies of the pious, who have departed from this life in communion with the church, are to be honorably, but without immoderate luxury and pomp, committed to the earth.

Prob. 1) By examples: The first mention of burial is made in the history of Abraham, of whom Moses, the most ancient of all writers, relates that he bought a field from the Hittites with a cave, in which he buried his deceased wife Sarah, Gen. XXIII, 4. God Himself honored the body of Moses with burial in the land of Moab, Deut. XXXIV, 6. The men of Jabesh are praised because they committed the bodies of Saul and Jonathan to the earth, 2 Sam. II, 4. 5. Christ himself, having died on the cross, was laid in an honorable monument by Joseph of Arimathea. 2) Inhumation is a most beautiful type of our future resurrection. For our body is sown, or committed to the earth like a seed, 1 Cor. XV. 37. so that on the day of universal judgment it may revive; it sleeps in the dust of the earth, Dan. XII, 2. to be awakened by the voice of Christ, Jo. V, 28. Therefore, the lifeless bodies of Christians are not to be cremated by fire, not to be thrown to beasts, not to be cast into the water.

Question XIII. Are the infants of Christians, not baptized, to be buried with solemn rites?

The bodies of infants, born of Christian parents, who are snatched away by sudden death before receiving baptism, are to be buried with solemn rites.

Prob. For they are born in the bosom of the church, and commended to God by the prayers of their parents, and therefore holy (with external sanctity), 1 Cor. VII, 14. since a sudden fate, not contempt, deprived them of baptism.

Question XIV. Is an honorable burial to be granted to obstinate heretics and men of extreme wickedness?

Neither to obstinate heretics, leading others away from orthodoxy, nor to men of utterly wicked malice, is an honorable burial to be granted.

Prob. The sacred letters show us the examples of Jeroboam, 1 Kings XIV, 13. Ahab and Jezebel, 1 Kings XXI, 23. Jehoiakim, Jer. XXII, 19. who, having harmed others either by introducing heterodoxy or by a bad example, were either thrown to the dogs or buried like donkeys.

Question XV. Should we despair of the salvation of those who have not been buried?

If they die in the true faith, there is no need to doubt their salvation.

Prob. Burial is a matter of decency, if it can be had, not of the necessity of salvation;

otherwise, we would have to despair of the salvation of a great many martyrs; about whom AUGUSTINE writes, in Book I of The City of God, c. 12. Many bodies of Christians the earth has not covered, but no one has separated any of them from heaven and earth; which the presence of Him who knows whence to resurrect what He created fills completely.

ON THE RESUSCITATION AND RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

Question XVI. What is the resuscitation of the dead?

Resuscitation of the dead is the action of the Triune God, by which He, through the power of His justice, will reproduce the bodies of all the deceased, and will unite them with their souls for the participation of either eternal beatitude or eternal damnation. Resuscitation of the dead.

Obs. Resuscitation and resurrection differ as cause and effect. The former is the cause of the latter, since they do not rise unless they are first resuscitated. Resuscitation is the action of God, resurrection is the term of that action, and therefore a divine work.

Question XVII. What is the resurrection of the dead?

Resurrection of the dead is the work of the Triune God, by which all deceased men will receive the same bodies in number, which they had in this life, raised from death, and reunited with their souls, for the full participation of either beatitude or eternal damnation, and for the manifestation of divine remunerative and vindictive justice. Resurrection of the dead.

Obs. The resurrection of the dead is taken either in a proper sense or in an improper sense. Properly, it denotes the resurrection of bodies from natural death. Improperly, it is taken either metonymically; thus Christ is called the resurrection, i.e., the cause of resurrection, Jo. XI, 25. or metaphorically, then for liberation from adversities, Ps. XLI, 9. then for the conversion of a sinner, which is otherwise called the first resurrection, Apoc. XX, 5. Confer. Eph. V, 14.

Question XVIII. Is the resurrection of the dead to be proven from the light of nature, or from the light of scripture?

Is it known from the light of nature? Although the possibility of the resurrection of the dead can be shown with probability from the light of nature (*): its certainty, however, is validly demonstrated only from (*) This opinion of others among our countrymen pleases me: that the thing can indeed happen, this is certainly established from natural principles; but that it will truly happen, this anyone can attain only with probability by natural perception. I will declare both a little more fully.

I. That it can happen, a man using right reason certainly establishes 1) from this principle of Natural Theology: In God there is immense knowledge, and power, and authority, and it pertains to all things whatsoever that are of the genus of the possible. Nothing is simply impossible, except what contains in itself an open contradiction. In this matter there is none, not what may seem, but what is, a contradiction, nothing that contradicts either itself or any other truths. E. the infinite power of God can do this, if He Himself wills it, although the reason of a finite mind cannot grasp the manner in which it can be done. 2) From two principles of natural science, of which one indeed is: Into what a thing is finally dissolved, from that it must have first received its origin: The body is finally resolved into earth: Therefore, that the body of man was first originated from the earth is concluded by necessary reason. But in what way could an animated body, so skillfully composed, have drawn its first origin from the earth, without the infinite and immense power of some most wise Creator, most knowledgeable of all things? Why then should not the same Creator, in whom there is no change or defect, be able, without any trouble, to raise again from the earth the body created from it and returned to it; to join together its individual particles, however and to whatever extent they have been dissipated, to separate them from other bodies with which they have been mixed, and to render to each his own body, far more illustrious? Therefore Christ, disputing against the Sadducees, reproaches them for their shameful ignorance not only of scripture, but also of the power of God, known by nature, Matth. XXII, 29. and Paul closely connects the restitution of the body, that was, with the first creation of it, that was not, Rom. IV. 17. The other is this: It cannot happen naturally the prophetic writings of the Old b) and the apostolic writings of the New Testament c).

Prob. a. If human reason can to some extent investigate the creation of man; why not also the resurrection of men? For thus the sound reason of man collects with probability: he who could create from nothing the heaven, the earth, and whatever is in them, can also reproduce the dead and turned-to-ash bodies of men, and unite them with their souls; especially because the soul is immortal, and naturally desires the body to which it was united. That this natural desire should be in vain, and never be fulfilled by God, is hardly believable; since the soul would otherwise be left in an imperfect and preternatural state. To this is added, that divine providence and justice require that it be well for the good, and ill for the evil. Since this often does not happen in this life; reason collects that it will happen in the other life, so that the body, which was the organ of the soul in good and evil works, may also become a partaker of rewards and that any matter, or even the smallest part of it, should utterly perish, or be converted into another nature. What once was, to reduce it entirely to nothing, is equally divine and proper to immense power, as to cause that which is nothing to exist. So likewise it befits God alone, the maker of all things, to change entirely the nature of things. Will God then destroy the human body, just as by immense power he will at last destroy the bodies of brute animals, indeed all things in which there is nothing but matter? If you should opine the former, you must posit a huge miracle, when this miracle, confirmed by the authority of divine revelation, seems to you utterly incredible precisely because it is a miracle. From this principle of reason has arisen the distinction of a twofold matter, which pertains to this mortal body with which we are now clothed. One is indeed constant, or, as it is commonly said, essential, namely necessary for the nature and constitution of the body, that it be truly a human body, composed of its members, connected among themselves and fitting; But the other is mutable, which is wont to be called accidental, and this pertains to the nourishment and conservation of the body, as long as it is a mortal body. Suppose then that the lifeless body of a man is devoured and consumed by living beings, whether brute or savage in their ferocity. Its constant and natural matter is not consumed, and indeed cannot be (according to this principle: The nature of no thing, and its natural parts, can, except by the will, power, and authority of the one Creator, be entirely converted into another nature). For daily there occurs in man a continuous change of the body, by the departure of some particles and the accession of others. Yet the very nature of the body is always one and the same, never increased nor diminished. With this distinction applied, the specious defense of the adversaries, on which alone they relied, collapses entirely.

II. That the thing will truly happen, a man, following nature alone as his guide, can never know with certain reason of the matter, especially for this reason, that no one, unless revelation shines before him, can perceive the intimate corruption of human nature, and its restoration to integrity, whether, and of what sort it is. But he concludes with probable argumentation from the fact that 1) the body of man is the other part of human nature, and therefore the soul, unless it be completely brutalized, burns with a most ardent desire for perpetual conjunction with its body; but since this tends not to destruction but to perfection, it is to be attributed not to the corruption but to the constitution of human nature; nor is it credible that it has been implanted by nature in every man in vain and without a most wise counsel befitting Him; 2) that the whole man, and not the soul alone, was devoted either to virtue or to vice, for which reason it seems consonant with justice that the whole man should also be affected either by rewards or by punishments; especially if we consider 3) that the remuneration of virtue in this life is often much lacking, where it goes ill with the good and well with the evil, Eccl. VIII, 14. IX, 2. indeed 4) this entire life is destined not so much for perfecting remuneration as for consummating labor; for the perfect reward is given to each when their labors are entirely completed; but as long as we sojourn on earth, we must continually labor, and all parts of earthly felicity are to a one means for more labor, and incitements to greater study. Experience is also a witness, since we read it related, Acts XVII, 32. that some indeed of the citizens of Athens held in derision Paul's assertion about the dead being recalled to life, but the rest did not reject it, as not improbable, being vehemently desirous of hearing more on this subject, not from a desire for novelty (as you might perhaps suspect from v. 21.), but from a zeal for truth, to be known for certain, v. 34.

punishments. Whence it seems consistent that the dead body will at some time be resurrected.

Prob. b. From Dan. XII, 2. Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; these to everlasting life; but the rest to reproach, to everlasting shame. From this prophetic oracle we learn that there will certainly be some resurrection not only of the pious, but also of the impious; for the former, the resurrection is a way to a glorious life; for the latter, a passage into shame.

Prob. c. From Jo. V, 28. 29. The hour is coming, in which all who are in the tombs will hear the voice of the Son of God, and will come out; those who have done good, to the resurrection of life; those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment. These words of Christ are not to be understood of a spiritual resurrection through penitence. For those who rise spiritually do not come out of the sepulchers of sins to the resurrection of condemnatory judgment, which is asserted of some who come forth from the tombs upon hearing the voice of Christ. Therefore, a universal resurrection of bodies is understood. For the Savior speaks of all lying in the sepulchers, and divides them into those to be saved and those to be damned (*).

The antithesis is of the Atheists, Sadducees, and Epicureans (**),<sup>329</sup> who deny the universal resurrection of bodies. They object:

I. Giants will not rise, Is. XXVI, 14. Resp. The giants will not rise to this temporal life, they will not rise up to the height of their former power. For the prophet adds: You have scattered them, and have destroyed all their memory.

II. He who, when he has slept, does not revive, he does not rise again; But man etc.; Job. XIV, 12. Therefore. Resp. Job does not deny the resurrection absolutely, but with a limit. For he adds this limitation: until the heaven is worn out. For the universal resurrection will be deferred until the day of the last judgment, on which the heaven itself will be worn out, Is. LI, 6.

III. Whomever God resurrects, He remembers them; But of many men He does not remember, Ps. LXXXVIII, 6. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between simple and benevolent memory. God forgets no man, but after death, He does not remember the impious benevolently, so as to affect them with eternal benefits.

IV. Those whose end is like the departure of beasts, they will not rise again; But the end of some men etc. Eccl. III, 19. Therefore. Resp. King Solomon speaks of the necessity of dying, by which both beasts and men are bound, not of the state after death.

Instance: But King Solomon adds: Who knows whether the spirit of man ascends upward, and the spirit of beasts downward? Resp. From external events, which happen to both beasts and men, reason left to itself does not certainly know the blessed immortality of souls; but from the word of God, Solomon knows, and any reborn man, that the spirit returns to God, Eccl. XII, 7.

V. The wicked will not stand in the judgment, Ps. I, 5.; E. they will not rise again. Resp. The wicked will not stand well in the judgment, they will not hold their ground,

(*) There are indeed far more testimonies extant, to be drawn from both testaments, which the author seems to have omitted for this reason, because they teach us not only the recall of the body to life itself, but also its manner and the glorious form of the revived body, about which we will have to speak hereafter.

(**) And of certain heretics among Christians, in the first age of the N.T. church. Against them Paul disputes, 1 Cor. XV, 12. He names Hymenaeus and Philetus as belonging to this error, who both dared to deny not all recall of the dead to life, but that it would ever happen. It is not clear what both meant, professing this; that it had already happened entirely. Most people think the cause of the error was this; that they interpreted every ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν improperly, either of the spiritual resurrection of men converted to Christ, or of the civil restoration of the Jewish republic, with the bonds of Babylonian captivity loosed, to its former integrity, Ezech. XXXVII, 12. 13. 14. But to me it seems that those heretics understood the relocation of the dead into life properly so called indeed, but thought that all of it was to be attributed to Christ alone, being unwilling to perceive the force and necessity of the consequence. I will produce that very testimony, 1 Cor. XV, 12. from which words it appears that no Christian doubted the recall of Christ's body to life, but many denied only this, that it would follow as a consequence that our bodies also would be raised from the dead.

but, destitute of the goodness of their cause, they will fall into ruin.

VI. Whoever rise to eternal life praise God; The dead do not praise God, Ps. VI, 6. E. they do not rise to eternal life. Resp. The dead, insofar as and as long as they are dead, do not praise God with their bodily members, although their soul celebrates God; but when the bodies of the pious are resurrected, both their bodies and souls will sing the praises of God.

Question XIX. Who will resuscitate the dead?

The resuscitator. The Triune God will resuscitate the dead, the Father a), the Son of God b), and the Holy Spirit c). Yet in a singular manner, the resuscitation of the dead is appropriated to Christ, the God-man (θεανθρώπου) d).

Prob. a. From 2 Cor. IV, 14. He who raised Jesus, the same will also raise us through Jesus. But God the Father raised Jesus, Acts III, 26.

Prob. b. From Joh. V, 25. The dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live.

Prob. c. From Rom. VIII, 11. If the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you; he who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies on account of his Spirit who dwells in you. The Holy Spirit preserves spiritual life in us, and if we constantly follow His leading, He guards us for obtaining eternal life, into which we enter through the resurrection.

Prob. d. The resurrection of the dead is in a singular way appropriated to Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου); because, 1) just as God the Father gave Christ the power to execute judgment, because he is the son of man, Jo. V, 27. so also He committed to Christ, as man, the power to resuscitate the dead. 2) The fruit of the glorious resurrection of Christ is that He might be Lord of both the dead and the living, Rom. XIV, 9. Which universal dominion King Jesus will exert in the resuscitation of the dead. 3) Christ with a sensible voice and conspicuous in the clouds will call the dead from their tombs to judgment. Matth. XXV, 31. 1 Thess. IV, 16. 4) Because Christ is the cause of the resurrection not only efficient, but also meritorious, with respect to the glorious resurrection of the faithful. This the author of life himself implies in Jo. XI, 25. "I am the resurrection and the life, he who believes in me, though he die, shall live; and everyone who lives and believes in me shall not die forever."

Question XX. Will all men rise again?

To be resuscitated. All men who were dead will rise again a) b), both the pious c) and the impious d).

Prob. a. The universal resurrection of the dead is established from Dan. XII, 2. & Jo. V, 29. which classic passages we adduced above, q. XVIII.

Prob. b. From Is. XXVI, 19. Your dead shall live, and with their bodies they shall rise. From which prophetic utterance we gather two things: 1) The subject of the resurrection to be dead men; wherefore Enoch and Elijah, who never died, and those men whom the last day of the world, with the judge Christ appearing, will find alive, will not rise from natural death; because their soul was not separated from the body, yet they will be changed by the celestial judge; about which change Paul informs us, 1 Cor. XV, 51. "Behold! I tell you a mystery: we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet." Paul calls the doctrine of this change a mystery; because that ἀλλαγῇ, or change, will be singular, miraculous, incomprehensible and ineffable; he says the same, that it will not happen that we shall all sleep. Therefore, this miraculous change will not be substantial, inferring either a dissolution of soul and body, or another substance of the body; but accidental, with regard to the state and qualities, so that the corruptible body of the living on the last day will suddenly put on incorruptibility, by which neither the bodies of the impious will be annihilated by the flames, nor the bodies of the pious before the throne of God will undergo any alteration. 2) We gather that the subject of the resurrection is not the soul, but the body of the deceased man; for the prophet says: with their bodies they shall rise. The soul, since it is immortal, as it does not die, so it does not rise. For resurrection formally is the repeated standing of the same thing that fell: Only the body, not the soul, fell; Therefore only the body, not the soul will rise.

Prob. c. From the testimony of Christ saying, Jo. XI, 25. He who believes in me, though he die, shall live. From which Paul, 1 Thess. IV, 14. says: God will bring with Him those who have fallen asleep through Jesus.

Prob. d. 1) From Acts XXIV, 15. I have a hope toward God, which these themselves also await, that there will be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust. You say: The resurrection of the unjust, since it is not good, cannot be hoped for. Resp. It can be hoped for secondarily, inasmuch as the innocence of a just man accused by the unjust and oppressed by calumnies, such as Paul was, becomes most clearly known in the resurrection and judgment of the unjust. 2) From 2 Cor. V, 10. For we must all be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ, that each one may receive the things done through the body, according to what he has done, whether it be good or any evil. Whoever as architects of wickedness will suffer punishment in the body, their body also will rise for punishment. For the consequent being posited, viz. the judgment divinely exercised upon the body, the antecedent resurrection of the body must be posited.

The antithesis is of the Socinians (*), who deny the resurrection of the impious. Who object;

I. The impious die eternally, 2 Thess. 1, 9: E. they do not rise. Resp. The impious die eternally, because they will be deprived of the glorious life of the elect, yet they will live eternally the ignominious life of the reprobate; which life is called death, because it is deprived of all felicity, all solace.

II. The impious will not rise in the judgment, Ps. I, 5. Resp. The word קום means not only to rise but also to stand. The impious will not stand fast in the judgment, they will not be able to sustain the rigor of the divine examination. Conf. Is. VII, 9.

III. Resurrection is a huge benefit, Phil. III, 11. of which the impious are unworthy. Resp. Resurrection to eternal life is a huge benefit; but resurrection to eternal condemnation is a huge punishment.

IV. God will bring with him those who have fallen asleep through Jesus, 1 Thess. IV, 14. E. only Christians who finally believe will rise. Resp. Paul in that place deals with the glorious resurrection of the just; but he does not speak exclusively, he does not exclude the resurrection of the unjust, of which he makes mention, Acts XXIV, 15.

Question XXI. Will the impious be resurrected by the virtue of Christ's merit?

Christ will not resuscitate the unjust to eternal condemnation as a gracious mediator, but as an omnipotent and severe judge; and therefore the impious will not rise by the virtue of Christ's merit a), but by the virtue of divine decree, and of vindictive justice b).

Obs. Here a careful distinction must be made between the merit of Christ considered in terms of acquisition and application. Christ by his universal merit has merited and acquired resurrection to eternal life for all, and therefore also for the impious; but the impious, due to a lack of application, do not possess that acquired and merited resurrection to life. Hence it is that they do not rise to eternal condemnation by the virtue of Christ's merit, but by the virtue of divine justice.

Prob. a. 1) From 1 Cor. XV, 23, where those who are to rise by the virtue of Christ's merit are said to be his members. Hence arises the argument: To whom the resurrection, to be accomplished by the virtue of Christ's merit, pertains, they are members of Christ; But the impious are not members of Christ; Therefore, the resurrection to be accomplished by the virtue of Christ's merit does not pertain to the impious. You say: The impious are not spiritual members of Christ, but natural; for they are bone of his bones and flesh of his flesh, Eph. V, 30. Resp. Christ is called our head not naturally, but spiritually; therefore his members are not natural, but spiritual, due to the spiritual union through faith, Gal. II, 20. Eph. III, 17. Whence the members of Satan cannot be members of Christ; for he who does not have the Spirit of Christ is not his, Rom. VIII, 9.

Prob. b. 2) The resurrection, which occurs on account of Christ's merit, is a great benefit (for it is ordained for eternal life, Jo. XI, 25. Jo. XIV, 19.); But the resurrection of the impious is not a benefit, but a great punishment; E. the resurrection of the impious does not occur on account of Christ's merit. The minor is proven; because the resurrection of the impious is ordained for eternal condemnation, and therefore is not a benefit, but a great punishment. From this argument flows that other one; No fruit of Christ's merit comes to a man without faith in Christ; But the resurrection comes to the impious, men without faith in Christ; E. the resurrection of the impious is not a fruit of Christ's merit.

Prob. c. That the impious rise by the virtue of a decree and divine justice is evident from the divine oracle, Gen. II, 17. On whatever day you eat of the fruit of that tree, you shall die the death. In which oracle is contained the decree of God the most just judge, embracing temporal and eternal death, and therefore the punishment of this and the future age. But the body, the companion of sins, cannot suffer eternal punishment unless it is raised from the dust of the earth to endure perpetual torments in hell. Wherefore, even if Christ had never come in the flesh, nor ever merited anything good for men; yet sinful men would have had to rise, to suffer the eternal punishment of their sins, by the virtue of divine vindictive justice. We conclude; Whatever would have happened to men without the intervention of Christ's merit, that is not a fruit of Christ's merit; But resurrection to eternal punishment would have happened to the impious without the intervention of Christ's merit. Therefore.

You say; Resurrection to punishment is not indeed an effect of Christ's merit; but resurrection considered generally (γενικῶς) and formally, as it prescinds from resurrection to glory and to ignominy, is an effect of Christ's merit. Whence the impious will indeed rise by the virtue of Christ's merit, but not to punishment. Resp. The merit of Christ in itself regards an end salutary to man. And therefore resuscitation considered abstractly and formally is an action of divine omnipotence, but resurrection to salvation is a fruit of Christ's merit.

The antithesis is of Benedictus Aretius, Henricus Boëthius and others, who maintain that even the impious rise by the virtue of Christ's merit. They argue;

I. That the resurrection of the pious and the impious depends on the resurrection of Christ, Paul shows not obscurely, 1 Cor. XV, 12. up to v. 34. For in that place he expressly urges that men will rise because Christ has risen. But the Pauline inference would not suffice to solve the question raised, unless the resurrection of Christ were the cause why the pious and the impious rise. For the question was not about the resurrection of the pious only, but the question was raised generally about the resurrection of all the dead. Resp. 1) The Apostle's inference does not tend to demonstrate the necessity of a universal resurrection, as if it depended on the merit of Christ, but to refute the pretended impossibility and to defend its truth, taking the argument from the truth of Christ's resurrection, and the power of the one rising, 1 Cor. XV, a. v. 3. to 12. and also by a reduction to absurdity, from v. 12. to 20. and from v. 29. to 33. 2) Although the Apostle in that passage directly and immediately proves only the resurrection of the pious, yet from it, indirectly and mediately, the resurrection of the impious is afterwards deduced, on account of the necessary connection of the resurrection of the pious and the impious, dependent on the divine decree.

II. Paul says, 1 Cor. XV, 22. As through Adam all die; So through Christ all are made alive. From which they conclude; Whoever die in Adam, are made alive through Christ; But all men etc. Therefore. Resp. The universal sign in the latter part of the Pauline proposition must be taken restrictively, so that it refers to those who are members of Christ, v. 23. and rise to eternal life. But it does not follow; All who rise to eternal life rise by the virtue of Christ's merit; E. also the reprobate. For these do not rise to eternal life. For it is just as if you were to infer; Rom. V, 18. "Just as through the sin of one man it resulted in condemnation for all men; so through the righteousness of one man it resulted in justification of life for all men." Therefore all men, the elect and the reprobate, are simultaneously actually saved. It is not absolutely necessary that the parts of an opposition be of equal breadth.

III. The merit of Christ is universal, 1 Tim. II, 6. E. it pertains also to the impious. Resp. The merit of Christ in itself is universal, as to the acquisition of benefits; but for anyone to actually possess them, application through faith is required, which the impious lack. Whence their resurrection is not a benefit, but a punishment.

IV. Whosoever are resuscitated from death by the voice of Christ the mediator, they rise by the virtue of Christ's merit; But the impious also are roused from death by the voice of Christ the mediator, Jo. V, 28. Therefore. Resp. Whosoever are resuscitated by the voice of Christ to eternal life, they rise by the virtue of Christ's merit; I concede; But the impious rise to eternal ignominy, which does not descend from the merit of Christ. Therefore, the impious are resuscitated by the voice of Christ, as an angry judge, not as a mediator, or a gracious head, since they were never joined and incorporated to him through faith.

Question XX. Will the same bodies, in number, which fell, rise again?

The same bodies in number, which men carried about in this mortal life, will rise on the last day a), but clothed with new qualities b).

Prob. a. 1) Resurrection formally is the repeated standing of the same thing that fell through death. Wherefore, those who deny the resurrection of the same body in number, utterly deny true resurrection. 2) Paul in 1 Cor. XV, 53. says, "For this corruptible must put on incorruptibility." Not without cause does the Apostle use the demonstrative pronoun, τῷτο, this, but to show that this body, which in this life is corruptible, will in the resurrection be rendered incorruptible by God. (*) 3) Each one will receive what he has done in his body, good or bad, 2 Cor. V, 10. Therefore, the same body which was a companion in the struggle in this age will be crowned in the future age, and what was a partaker of evils will not be exempt from ignominy by the virtue of divine vindictive justice. 4) He who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to our bodies, on account of His Spirit dwelling in us, as Paul testifies, Rom. VIII, 11. Whatever bodies were the dwelling places of the Holy Spirit in this life, they will be given life by God; But the same bodies which the pious bear in this life were the dwelling places of the Holy Spirit. E. 5) Job, broken by many evils, raises himself up with the hope of his completely enervated body being divinely resuscitated, c. XIX, 26. "After my skin, they will surround these; and from my flesh I shall see God." The sense is: after my skin has been reduced to dust, these my bones will be surrounded with skin, and with these my bodily eyes I shall see the incarnate God.

Prob. b. 1) The glorified bodies of the faithful in the resurrection will be like the clarified body of Christ, Phil. III, 21. But this was adorned with new qualities. E. & they too will shine with new ornaments. (*)

2) Paul, about to describe the accidental change which happens by the benefit of the resurrection, says: 1 Cor. XV, 42. "It is sown in corruptibility, it is resuscitated in incorruptibility: It is sown in ignominy, it will be resuscitated in glory: An animal body is sown, a spiritual one will be resuscitated." Therefore, the bodies which we carry about in this life differ from the resuscitated bodies not in respect of substance, but 1) in respect of duration; the former are corrupted and perish, the latter, immune from corruption, endure forever. 2) In respect of external form. The former become deformed, pale, foul-smelling corpses; the latter will be graceful, shining, most beautiful; 3) In respect of strength. These are sown into the earth flaccid, destitute of sense and motion; Those will be vigorous, robust, endowed with

(*) In this saying there are four sinews of proof: 1) The duplicated force of both the article and the pronoun: τὸ φθαρτὸν τῷτο, τὸ θνητὸν τῷτο. 2) This description, φθαρτὸν, to which ἀφθαρσία is opposed, and θνητὸν, to which ἀθανασία is contrary. Each one of them does not constitute the very nature of the thing, but happens to it, and is numbered among the qualities. E. it will not be another nature of the body, but there will be other properties of the same. 3) The predicate, ἐνδύσεται, denotes not a change of nature, but of accidents in the same subject. For that which is clothed with something, as with a garment and ornament, is already present, nor does it cease to be what it has been hitherto. 4) The coherence of the words. Paul interprets what was said metaphorically, drawing a simile from a sown grain, which certainly does not perish, nor does it change into another nature, but the same thing, more cumulatively increased and copiously adorned, comes forth from the earth, v. 42. 43. 44.

(*) This most ample testimony confirms not only this second point, but also the one above, with a fourfold sinew of proof: 1) the article, which has the force of demonstration, τὸ σῶμα, 2) the determining addition, τῆς ταπεινώσεως, 3) the predicate, μεταχηματίσει, by which word the change of the nature itself is never wont to be signified, but always that of accidents and qualities, 4) the comparison of the body of Christ and our bodies. It is, however, most true that the body of Christ, after He had revived, was the same one that a little before had been lifeless and buried. Jo. II, 19. Luc. XXIV, 39. The fable of the Socinians, about the body of Christ, when they say that after the ἀνάστασις it was indeed one and the same, but then, after the ἀνάληψις, it suddenly vanished and was converted into a completely different nature, this fable, I say, is both ἄγραφος and ἀντίγραφος, Acts. I, 11.

excellent senses, liable to no defect. 4) In respect of operation and passion. The former are subject to generation, nutrition, augmentation, local progression, they need drink, food, marriage; The latter will be wholly vacant for spiritual actions, nor will they need nourishment or conjugal society.

The antithesis is of the Socinians who deny (**), that the same bodies in number will rise again. Their arguments are:

I. The resuscitated body is called spiritual, 1 Cor. XV. 44. E. it differs essentially from this animal body. Resp. It is called spiritual, in respect of its qualities and operations, not in respect of its substance. Nor indeed is it converted into a spirit by resurrection. The Galatians are πνευματικοί, Gal. VI, 1. yet they are not spirits.

II. We shall be after the resurrection ισάγγελοι Luc. XX, 36. But angels are spirits. E. & we blessed shall be spirits. Resp. We shall be like angels with a likeness not absolute, but respective. We shall not be the same as angels, but like them, not by essence of nature, but by congruence of qualities and glory.

III. God will destroy the belly and foods, 1 Cor. VI, 13. E. the same body in number will not rise. Resp. The belly will be destroyed in respect of its use, insofar as there will be neither food, nor appetite or use of food; thus the belly will be destroyed as to the use of foods. Yet the substance of the belly will not therefore be abolished. Christ, resuscitated from the dead, to whose body our own will be σύμμορφον, Phil. III, 21. did not lack a belly, Luc. XXIV, 43.

IV. Flesh and blood will not possess by inheritance the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. XV, 50. E. the same body in number as to substance will not rise. Resp. Animal flesh and blood, insofar as it possesses only natural qualities, with supernatural axioms excluded, or is also subject to sins, will not possess the kingdom of God by inheritance. For it is necessary that, having shed its natural and vicious qualities and infirmities, it be clothed with spiritual qualities, so that it requires neither the use of food, nor the procreation of offspring, nor is it subject to sin or any infirmity. (*)

(**) Nor without manifest contradiction. They concede that the nature of a spirit is other and different from the nature of a body, even the most subtle. Matter is not spirit, nor is spirit matter. But nevertheless, they imagine that the whole nature of a glorious body will be spirit, devoid of all matter. They are of the opinion that this body which we now have must be utterly abolished and destroyed, and a completely different one substituted in its place (which should not even be thought worthy of the name of ἀναστάσεως); and for that reason, they say corruption is annihilation. You see, therefore, the contradiction, as it is said, in the adjective, when they define a spiritual body in this way: a body whose whole nature is spirit. But if, with Paul preceding us, we interpret a spiritual body thus: a body, with respect to its nature, endowed with spiritual qualities and perfections; there is nothing in it that contradicts itself.

(*) In the divine scripture, where mention is made of the still mortal body, both words, σὰρξ and σῶμα, are used, but not with entirely equal and same power. σῶμα denotes the very nature of the body, insofar as it is a body; σὰρξ signifies its infirmity, insofar as it is a mortal body. From which is understood what is the difference of these words, Col. 1:22. Ἐν σώματι τῆς σαρκός, and that in that phrase, σώματι, this apposition is not superfluous, as if an empty repetition; τῆς σαρκός. This is the meaning: in that body, which was subject to the suffering of evils, even unto death. Just as it is said, πόλις τῆς σαμαρίας, that is, the city which is Samaria; so σῶμα τῆς σαρκός is said to be the body which is flesh, a fragile and mortal body. But with mortality overcome, that same body, with life recovered and endowed with immortality, is everywhere called σῶμα, nowhere is it named σὰρξ, if you depart from one place, Luc. XXIV, 39. when our resurrected Lord was in it, so that He might first make his disciples certain of the truth of the matter, before He entered His glory. And in that very place, σὰρξ is not opposed to τῷ σώματι, but to τῷ πνεύματι. But that entire space of his past life, in which Christ bore all the weakness of human nature, is designated by that manner of speaking: Ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς σαρκός αὐτοῦ, Hebr. V, 7. This they understood well, among the most ancient Doctors, GREGORY Nazianzen, and THEOPHANES, when they confessed that Christ in His glorious state is σωματικός indeed, but by no means ἀσώματος. What Job confidently professes and declares: מְשִׁרֵי אֶחָוָה אֱלֹהִים, this should be referred equally to the miserable weakness of the body that then afflicted him, to be taken away and changed Instance; The substance of flesh and blood consists of elements by nature contrary to each other. But all these are corruptible. Flesh can be bruised, blood can flow out, and be corrupted in other violent ways. Resp. a) The conflict of elements befalls an animal body, not a spiritual one. b) Even in the integral Adam, the conflict of elements, insofar as it brings about destruction, had no place.

Question XXIII. Will there be a distinction of sex in the resurrection?

Men raised from the dust of the earth will come forth with different sexes, male and female.

Prob. 1) The same bodies that fell will rise. But if a man comes forth in the place of a woman, the same body that fell through death does not rise. 2) Christ, when asked by the Sadducees, Matth. XXII, 28. whose wife the woman would be, did not answer that the distinction of sex would be removed in the other life, but that there would be no place for marriage there, because the saints would be ισάγγελοι. Indeed, when Christ said that in the other life men neither marry wives nor are given in marriage, he clearly asserts the distinction of sex; for to marry is of men, but to be given in marriage is of women.

The antithesis is of certain Fathers and scholastic doctors, who deny that there will be a distinction of sex in the resurrection. Their arguments are:

I. In the resurrection men will be like angels, Luc. XX, 36. But among angels there is no sex. Resp. They will be like angels not absolutely, but in a certain respect, namely with respect to spiritual qualities, not with respect to the substantial members of the body.

II. Every faithful man in the resurrection of the dead will be a perfect man to the measure of the stature of Christ, Eph. IV, 13. E. in the other life there will be no women. Resp. Paul in that place does not deal with the resurrection of the dead, but with the progress of the reborn in this life.

III. The female sex is an imperfection of man; But all imperfection will be banished from the gloriously rising. Resp. Woman was created in the state of integrity, in which all things were most perfect.

Question XXIV. In what does the resurrection of the dead formally consist?

Form of the resurrection. The resurrection of the dead formally consists a) in the reproduction, or repair of the same body that fell through death, from the atoms, or particles of that body, scattered and dissipated here and there; b) in the reunification of the same with the soul.

Prob. a. Resurrection differs from creation; because creation is from nothing, or from unfit matter, from which a body such as is first produced never emerged; but resurrection presupposes matter, from which it is reproduced by the infinite power of God.

Prob. b. A living body cannot be made unless it is united with the soul, the breath of life. Wherefore, for the body to resume life, it is required that 1) it be reproduced from its former matter, 2) that it be united with the soul.

Question XXV. What is the end of the resurrection?

End of the resurrection. The end of the resurrection, with respect to God the resuscitator, is the glory of divine remunerative and vindictive justice a). But the end of the resurrection with respect to the men being resuscitated is either common or proper. The common end for all being resuscitated is the appearance before the tribunal of Christ the judge b); The proper end, with respect to the faithful, is the consummated participation of eternal beatitude c); with respect to the unfaithful, the consummation of eternal damnation d).

in the future, as that saying of Paul, Phil. III, 21. ὃς μεταχηματίσει τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν, not insofar as it carries about the ταπεινώσις attached to it, and therefore as σῶμα, or σῶμα τῆς σαρκός, is considered; but insofar as it is σῶμα, to endure perpetually, to be raised from the ashes, and with all its parts composed, to be illustrated and perfected with a most splendid form. From these things now explained it appears that Paul in this place, 1 Cor. XV. 50. by the name of σαρκός καὶ αἵματος indicates the mortal body, insofar as it is mortal, which, unless it is clothed with glory and immortality, cannot be a partaker of eternal beatitude. This interpretation is entirely consistent not only with the perpetual use of the word in the sacred letters, but also with this context. For Paul does not speak of the very nature of the body, but of its infirmities, θνητῷ and φθαρτῷ, to the abolishing of which is opposed the future ἀθανασία and ἀφθαρσία.

Prob. a. For just as God is moved to resuscitate men by His justice, partly remunerative, by which He rewards the good, partly vindictive, by which He punishes the evil, so that each one may receive τὰ διὰ τὸ σώματος, the things done through his body, 2 Cor. V, 10: so He is rightly said to intend the glory of both kinds of justice by resuscitating the dead.

Prob. b. For this end all men will be resuscitated, that they may be placed before the tribunal of Christ, Rom. XIV, 10. This the Apostle implies, Hebr. IX, 27. It is appointed for men to die once; after this, the judgment, that is, after they have been resuscitated from the dead, they will be presented for judgment.

Prob. c. & d. From Acts XXIV, 15. There will be a resurrection of the just and the unjust; of the former indeed to eternal life, of the latter to eternal ignominy, Dan. XII, 2. Therefore, with respect to the end, the resurrection can be distinguished into the glorious resurrection of the just, and the ignominious resurrection of the unjust.

SUSPIRIUM

Dou, LORD JESUS, SAVIOR of the world, Victor over death, Leader of life, I pray, venerate, implore, as devoutly as can be, make me through Your most HOLY SPIRIT a partaker of the first resurrection, that the second death may have no power over me! Arouse my torpid soul to frequent and pious meditation on the future resurrection, so that, whether I drink, or eat, or do anything else, your divine voice may always resound in my ears: "Arise, you dead, come to judgment!" Grant me, I beseech, a peaceful death, a glorious resurrection, eternal life!

CHAPTER X.
ON THE
LAST JUDGMENT
AND THE
CONSUMMATION OF THE AGE.

Question I. What is the final universal judgment?

THE FINAL UNIVERSAL judgment is a solemn act, by which the triune God, through the Lord Jesus Christ, appearing in a visible form and with the highest glory, will bring to His tribunal angels and all men, and by judging all thoughts, words, and deeds, those of the pious according to the norm of the gospel, but those of the impious according to the prescription of the law, will assign and confer eternal joys to the former, and eternal torments to the latter, to the glory of His mercy and of His remunerative and vindictive justice.

Obs. The last judgment is twofold: one is particular, and as it were private, by which in the hour of death the state of glory or of ignominy is adjudicated to each man; the other is universal and ecumenical, by which on the last day of the world a sentence of absolution or of condemnation will be pronounced and solemnly promulgated for all men. We are concerned with the latter at present.

Question II. Is it certain that there will be a universal judgment?

Certainty of the same. That there will be a universal judgment, in which, at a time divinely appointed, all men will be presented at the tribunal of Christ, is certain from the scriptures of the old and new testament. It is also certain that on one and the same day there will be both the resurrection of the dead and the last judgment b). But when the day of the great judgment will come, is clear to no mortal c).

Prob. a. The prophetic writings of the old testament testify that God has prepared His throne for judgment, and that He will judge the world in justice, Ps. IX, 8. 9. Let us all hear the sum of the matter! Fear God, and keep his precepts; for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment, even every hidden thing, whether good or bad, Eccles. XII, 13. 14. In the new testament is brought forth the prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam, who said: "Behold, the Lord comes with myriads of His saints, to execute judgment against all and to convict all the impious among them of all their works of impiety which they have impiously committed and of all the hard things which impious sinners have spoken against him," ep. Jud. v. 15. Paul, standing in the midst of the Areopagus, said: "God has appointed a day on which he will judge the world in justice by the man whom he has destined," Acts. XVII, 31. Moreover, the process of the last judgment is described in Matth. XXV, 31.

Prob. b. The advent of Christ to judgment is joined with the last day of the world, 1 Thess. IV, 16. "The Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first." Therefore, the last day of the created world will be the great day of judgment, epist. Jud. v. 6.

Prob. c. Which will be the last day of the world is not clearly established, and therefore in what year, day, and hour Christ will come to judgment, no mortal can know exactly and precisely. For thus says the Savior in Mark XIII, 31. seqq. "Heaven and earth will pass away; But my words will not pass away. But of that day and hour no one knows, neither the angels who are in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father (alone). Therefore, watch, be vigilant, and pray; for you do not know when the time will be."

The antithesis is of the Epicureans and Empaistae, who deny the advent of Christ to judgment. Their arguments are:

I. If the world has persisted for so many ages unmoved and invariable, it is consistent with truth that it will also endure as such in the future, and Christ will not come to judge and destroy the world; The antecedent is true. Therefore, the consequent as well. see 2 Pet. III, 4. Resp. What is deferred is not taken away. The long passage of time does not remove the most true promise and threat of God, but testifies to the long-suffering of God; for He grants enough time to the impious to repent, whose duty it was to use correctly the granted time of grace for penitence. See ibid. v. 9.

II. Now is the judgment of the world, now the prince of this world will be cast out, as Christ testifies, Jo. XII, 31. Therefore, there will be no judgment on the last day of the world. Resp. In that passage, "judgment" is taken metonymically, by a metonymy of cause for effect, and denotes vindication from the unjust possessor, the devil. For the fruit of Christ's passion is that the souls of men are vindicated into liberty from the unjust possessor, the devil, because Christ by His passion and death conquered this tyrant, and cast the vanquished one from the hearts of men through the word of the gospel. But we here are dealing with judgment properly so called.

III. If on the last day of the world all men are to be judged, either believers or unbelievers are to be judged; Not unbelievers; for they are already judged, Jo. III, 18; Nor believers; because he who believes is not judged, Jo. III, 18. E. no men are to be judged on the last day. Resp. Unbelievers are said to be judged with respect to the decree and judgment manifested concerning them in the divine word; but the solemn promulgation and execution of this judgment is deferred to the last day of the world. Believers do not come into the judgment of condemnation, although they are not exempt from the judgment of appearance and discussion.

IV. To whom a definitive sentence is promulgated in the hour of death, it is not to be promulgated to him on the last day of the world (for it is not probable that the same sentence would be passed twice by the celestial judge); But a definitive sentence of absolution or condemnation is promulgated in the hour of death; Therefore. The minor is evident; because to the soul released from the body, either the celestial paradise or hell is assigned forthwith, Luc. XVI. Resp. Distinguish between the particular and the universal judgment. The former must be undergone by each one separately in the hour of death; the latter will be published on the last day of the world, so that the justice of God may be openly acknowledged and celebrated by all, and that the whole man, consisting of soul and body, may be judged and receive according to what he has done in the body, whether good or bad, 1 Cor. IV, 5.

Question III. Will certain signs precede the advent of the Lord, from which it can be known when the last day will come?

By the will and ordinance of God, signs divinely revealed will precede the supreme day, from which it is permitted to know that that great day is approaching. Signs.

Obs. The prognostic signs of the last day are distinguished into remote, or common, and proximate, or proper. The former occur over more than one century, and often recur or are continued. The latter are those which are to be seen only when the judgment is drawing nearer, but not equally in prior ages. The common and more remote signs, although they may not seem to signify the time of judgment, yet by the institution and intention of God they do signify and ought to warn Christians that some solemn judgment is to be expected, from the power of divine justice and the truth of the predictions. But of the more proximate, or proper signs, the difference is this, that some precede the judgment by a longer interval, some by a shorter one; which therefore do not themselves signify a certain time determinately.

Prob. The signs that precede the last day by either a longer or a shorter interval are: 1) Security and nefarious impiety, Matth. XXIV, 37. 38. Conf. 2 Petr. III, 3. 4. 2) The multiplication of heresies, Matth. XXIV, 11. 2 Petr. II, 1. 3) The turmoil of the whole world through wars, seditions, pestilential diseases, earthquakes, Luc. XXI, 9. 10. 4) The notable decline of the Roman monarchy, Dan. II. 31. seqq. 5) The revelation of the Anti-Christ, 2 Thess. II, 3. 6) Prodigious eclipses, the falling of stars from the sky, and horrendous tempests, Matth. XXIV, 29. There are some who expound the words of Christ mystically concerning a significant change in the church, the obscuring of celestial doctrine, and the ἀποστασία of the doctors of the church. See D. IO. ADAMI OSIANDRI colleg. systemat. P. VI. pag. 278. Others persuade that the literal sense should not be abandoned. See CALOVII bibl. illustrat. on this passage fol. 420 (*).

Question IV. Who will be the ecumenical, or universal judge?

Universal Judge. The universal judgment over all men and angels, with respect to majesty, authority, power, and decree, belongs to the entire Holy Trinity a). By economy, however, or singular dispensation of God, the visible Christ in his assumed humanity will be the immediate judge b), and thus will perform the office of judge not only according to his divine, but also his human nature c).

Prob. a. 1) The function of universal judgment is an action ad extra, common to the entire Holy Trinity. From which the Psalmist says, Ps. IX, 8. Jehovah has prepared His throne for judgment. 2) God the Father, as the ancient of days, sits for judging; Dan. VII, 9. He who has destined to judge the world in justice by one man, Act. XVII, 31. who also gave the judgment to the son of man, Jo. V, 22. 3) The Holy Spirit is heard as the Spirit of judgment, Is. IV, 4. who just as in this life he contends with men, Gen. VI, 3. and convicts them of their sins, Jo. XVI, 8; so the power of judging on the last day, and of inwardly convincing the hearts of men, belongs to him.

Prob. b. The ecumenical judgment will be a visible act, whose judge will be obvious and exposed to the eyes of all men. Although the body of Christ, by virtue of its glorified state, is invisible; yet by economy, or the singular disposition of God, it will happen that Christ the judge will appear visibly in his glorified body. The visible advent of Christ to judgment was indicated by the angels, conspicuous in the form of two men, Acts. I, 11. "Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking up into heaven? This Jesus, who has been taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you have seen him going into heaven." More clearly the Savior himself says, Matth. XXIV, 30. "Then the sign of the son of man will appear; and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, and they will see the son of man, coming on the clouds of heaven, with power and glory." God the Father will not judge the world in visible form, but Christ, to be openly seen in human form, will promulgate with a sonorous voice the definitive sentence of the omnipotent and omniscient God concerning all men, and will immediately command the promulgated sentence to be executed.

Prob. c. From Jo. V, 22. 27. "For the Father judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son; because he is the son of man." We learn from this oracle that the ἐξουσία, or judicial power, does not belong to the human nature of Christ per se, but communicatively. For the particle ὅτι, because, is not αἰτιολογική, or causal, since human nature is not the cause from which judicial power depends; but it is ὁριστική καὶ δεικτική, showing and determining the nature to which judicial power has been communicated by virtue of the personal union. You say: Christ says, Jo. XII, 47. "And if anyone hears my words, but does not believe; I do not judge him; for I did not come to judge the world, but to save the world." Resp. These words of Christ are to be understood of the first, humble advent of Christ, in which Christ came as a priest, to offer himself for the sins of the world, and as a teacher, to preach the gospel; but the other advent of Christ will be most splendid in majesty, in which, as universal King, he will judge all men.

(*) These signs are of the genus of those which are called προφασικά. Of such signs, the force and reason is threefold. They pertain either to confirming the event certainly to be expected, or to declaring the properties of the future thing, or to determining the approach of the time at which the thing is so to happen. The signs of the supreme judgment; 1) those which confirm the certain event are primarily the destruction of the Jewish land, and the revelation of the Antichrist, which do not allow us to doubt that the day appointed for the supreme and common judgment will as truly and certainly come, as we truly and certainly know that those things were done, and in them the event corresponded entirely to the prediction. 2) Those which indicate the properties of that day, Christ foretells, Matth. XXV, 31. to the end. 3) Those which are apt for signifying the approach of the time are the weakening and destruction of the Antichrist, 2 Thess. II, 8. the marvelous changes of the celestial bodies, Matth. XXIV, 29. Luc. XXI, 25.

Question V. What will be the quality of Christ's advent to judgment?

Quality of the judge's advent. The advent of Christ the judge will be public and by far most glorious, terrible to the impious, most desired by the pious.

Prob. From Matth. XXIV, 30. "Then the sign of the son of man will appear; & then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, & they will see the son of man coming on the clouds of heaven with power & glory." The advent of Christ will be glorious, because he will come with power and glory, viz. with the glory of omnipotence, omniscience, justice, and omnipresence. And therefore they will see the sign of the son of man, by which we understand the splendor of Christ's body joined with the light of the cloud. This splendor will be terrible to the impious; therefore they will mourn, i.e., they will beat their breasts, their limbs will tremble, they will pour out complaints mixed with tears. To the pious, the advent of Christ will be most desired; for they will see the son of man, their brother, Goel, and mystical head, to whom they were grafted by faith, as spiritual members.

Question VI. Who will be the ministers of the ecumenical judge?

Ministers of the judge. The ministers of the celestial judge appearing in the clouds of heaven will be partly angels, as companions, trumpeters, and executors of his sentence a), partly apostles and other holy men, as assessors, witnesses, and approvers of the judgment passed by Christ b).

Prob. a. The office of the angels on the last day will be: 1) to accompany the arriving judge honorably, Matth. XXIV, 31. & XXV, 31. 2) to manifest the advent of Christ with a loud voice and with trumpets blown, ib. conf. 1 Thess. IV, 16. 3) to execute the will of Christ, by gathering and separating men, Matth. XXIV, 31. Matth. XIII, 41.

Prob. b. In the entire choir of assessors, the apostles will pre-eminently, Matth. XIX, 28. Then all the elect patriarchs, prophets, martyrs, and other saints will sit as assessors, 1 Cor. VI, 2. 3. who will judge the world, not by promulgating a definitive sentence, but by sitting as assessors, testifying, approving, and presenting themselves as examples of penitence and faith.

Obs. All men, and therefore also the saints, are to be presented before the tribunal of Christ, but soon to be caught up to meet Christ in the air, and together with Christ and the apostles, who as the chief and principal assessors will be closest to Christ the judge, they are to judge the world. See GERHARD. loc. de extremo iudicio §. 43. fol. 75.

Question VII. What cause moved God to the universal judgment?

Impulsive cause. The internal impulsive cause is remunerative and vindictive justice a). The external impulsive causes are partly the merit of Christ apprehended by faith b), partly sins c), and primarily the final impenitence d) of the men to be judged.

Prob. a. From 2 Thess. 1, 6. "It is just with God to repay with affliction those who afflict you; and to you who are afflicted, rest with us, at the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with his mighty angels."

Prob. b. The merit of Christ, apprehended by faith, moves God to a judgment of absolution, because by it we have been reconciled to God, Rom. V, 10.

Prob. c. "We must all be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ, that each one may receive the things done through the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad," 2 Cor. V, 10. The evil things that anyone has done in the body move God to wish him to be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ, to receive just punishments in the body.

Prob. d. From Jo. XII, 48. where Christ says: "He who rejects me, and does not receive my words, has one who judges him: The word that I have spoken, that will judge him on the last day." Which is the same as if he had said, ἀπιστίαν, that contempt of the gospel of Christ moves the celestial judge to condemn the obstinate contemner of the gospel in the last judgment.

Question VIII. Who are to be judged?

Subject of the judgment. Those to be judged are all men, pious and evil a), living and dead b), and besides these, the evil angels c).

Prob. a. 1) From Rom. XIV, 10. "We shall all stand before the tribunal of Christ." 2) From 2 Cor. V, 10. "We must all be made manifest before the tribunal of Christ."

Prob. b. From 2 Tim. IV, 1. "Christ will judge the living and the dead." By this phrase of scripture, all men to be judged are divided into the living and the dead. By the living are designated those men whom the last day will find alive; by the dead are understood those who, having previously departed this life, are resuscitated on the last day, to be presented at the tribunal.

Prob. c. From 2 Pet. II, 4. "God did not spare the angels who sinned, but casting them down to Tartarus with chains of darkness, delivered them to be reserved for judgment," Confer. Epist. Jud. v. 6. The demons indeed were adjudged to eternal punishments immediately after their fall; but the completion will be added to them on the day of universal judgment (pantocritico), when the chains of darkness will be bound more tightly, which, with God permitting, are still sometimes loosened for them, but after the day of universal judgment no power of wandering out of hell will be granted to them by God.

Question IX. What will be judged in men and fallen angels?

Object of the judgment. In men will be judged both faith and infidelity a), and the effects of faith and infidelity, namely good and evil works, internal and external b), in the evil angels their apostasy (ἀποστασία) c).

Prob. a. Men will be judged immediately based on faith and infidelity. For in Jo. III, 18. Christ says: "He who believes in him is not judged (with a judgment of condemnation); but he who does not believe is already judged (by virtue of the divine decree)."

Prob. b. Since good works are the fruits and τεκμήρια of faith, and evil works the effects and testimonies of infidelity, the works of men will also be judged, Matth. XXV, 35. (*) to which are also to be referred the words of men, Matth. XII, 36.

(*) In this place, three things are to be weighed with particular accuracy, so that we may root out all scruples injected into our minds. It is asked: 1) Why is no mention made of saving trust? 2) Why are not all good works proclaimed, but only those which pertain to love and mercy? 3) For what reason are not even all of those commemorated, but only liberality towards the poor? for there are many more things which proceed from love and mercy, especially the care of souls, and the zeal for correcting the erring and leading them to the right path? The response to each will not be difficult.

To question I. 1) The effect testifies of its cause. Good works are the necessary effects of saving trust, and its most certain signs. Nor does Christ say: you gave food and drink to the hungry and thirsty. But thus: to me when I was hungry, to me when I was thirsty. Therefore, looking upon me, you did this, led by moving arguments proper to Christian doctrine, see Mark. IX, 41. 2) Faith itself is also not obscurely indicated, and indeed by a twofold argument: a) when Christ addresses the blessed men by the name of his sheep, v. 33. But they are compared to sheep, not only because they obey the voice of the best shepherd, but also and especially for this reason, because they know Christ as the one who has reconciled them to God by his own blood, and delivered them from all evil, Joann. X, 12. & 14. b) when the elect are called blessed, and the same are called heirs of divine beatitude, v. 34. From which I argue: Whoever are heirs of God, they are sons of God; for inheritance is a necessary consequence of new birth and adoption, Rom. VIII, 17. But we are adopted into the number of the sons of God in no other way than through faith in Christ, Jo. I, 12. Gal. III, 26. E. when they are called heirs of God, by that very fact their faith in Christ is openly and plainly signified.

To question II. The reason lies in this: because love for other men, even of the lowliest station, is the first of all virtues contained in the second table, and the fulfillment of the entire law, Rom. XIII, 10. And unfeigned love for men is proof of love for God, 1 Jo. IV, 20, 21.

To question III. 1) It would surely have been too long if Christ had wished to enumerate every single part of one's duty. It was enough to name one as an example for all, and indeed that one which was most suited to the time. They were most difficult times, which demanded mercy and liberality as especially necessary, on account of the abundance of those who, professing the name of Christ, were in need of all things. 2) Christ proceeds from more special examples to a general rule, v. 40. 3) In those things which are brought forth for the sake of example, there is great force of argumentation, not only from the species to the genus, but also from the lesser to the greater: If the Judge will so severely punish those who did not offer help to the miserable; what should not those fear who not only did not benefit others, but also harmed many with cruel savagery!

and the thoughts and secrets of their hearts, Rom. II, 16. 1 Cor. IV, 5.

Prob. c. From ep. Jud. v. 6. The evil angels will be judged, because they did not keep their origin (original justice) but left their proper dwelling (they lost their glorious state through their own fault). With which words their ἀποστασία is graphically described.

Question X. According to what norm will the sentence be pronounced on the last day?

Norm of the judgment. The faithful and the unfaithful will be judged according to the rule of the divine word a). To the faithful and pious men eternal joy will be decreed according to the gracious norm of the gospel b). To the unfaithful eternal death will be decreed according to the law, illustrated by the light of the gospel c).

Prob. a. Generally speaking, the norm of the last judgment is the word of God. "The word that I have spoken, that will judge him on the last day," says Christ, Jo. XII, 48.

Prob. b. Those who are saved only by the gospel, to them salvation will be adjudicated on the last day from the gospel; But the faithful are saved only by the gospel (not by the law, from which there is no blessing and justification, Gal. III, 10. 11.) Therefore.

Prob. c. From Rom. II, 12. "As many as have sinned under the law will be judged by the law." But since the law alone and considered by itself is ignorant of Christ, nor does it formally convict of unbelief in Christ, it is necessary that it be illustrated by the light of the gospel.

You say: I. All men seem to be judged according to the gospel. For Paul says, Rom. II, 16. "On the day when God will judge the secrets of men, according to my gospel, through Jesus Christ." Resp. The judgment is said to be according to the gospel not simply, as if threats and punishments also pertain to the gospel, but in a certain respect: 1) because eternal life will be adjudicated to the elect, according to the gospel; 2) because unbelief, which is directed against Christ, is declared in the gospel, inasmuch as in it is shown the object, the righteousness and merit of Christ, which the unfaithful reject, although ἀπιστία, considered generically, is convicted in the law, as a sin against the first precept, and thus damnation redounds from the law; 3) because we are taught that the judgment is to be instituted by Christ, not through the law, but through the gospel.

You say: II. Whoever are sinners, according to the norm of the law, are to be judged; But all men etc. 1 Kings VIII, 46. E. Resp. Whoever are sinners not justified, are to be judged according to the norm of the law. But the faithful are justified, and absolved from guilt and punishment, because they have accepted the satisfaction of Christ, offered in the gospel, and have interposed this surety for themselves.

You say: III. Whoever are judged according to works, they are judged according to the law (because not the gospel, but the law is the doctrine of works); But the pious etc. Matth. XXV, 34. 35. E. Resp. Whoever are proximately and immediately judged according to works, they are judged according to the law; I concede; But the pious are proximately and immediately judged according to faith, of which good works are the fruits, whose directive principle is the law, whose productive principle is the gospel.

Question XI. In what does the last judgment formally consist?

Form of the judgment. The process of the last judgment formally consists a) in a most accurate investigation of the case, according to the law and the gospel; b) in the pronouncement of the sentence; c) in the execution of the sentence passed.

Prob. a. From Rom. XIV, 10, 12. "We shall all stand before the tribunal of Christ. And each one of us will give an account of himself to God," and therefore the celestial judge will investigate the case of each one, and indeed the case of the faithful man, according to the gospel; the case of the unfaithful, according to the law.

Prob. b. Christ will promulgate the decretory sentence by addressing first the elect; "Come!" then the reprobate; "Depart!" etc. Matth. XXV, 34. 41.

Prob. c. The execution will immediately follow the promulgated sentence; "And these (the unjust) will go into eternal punishment, but the just into eternal life," Matth. XXV, 46.

Question XII. How is the judgment of Christ distinguished with respect to form, or process?

Distinction of the judgment. The judgment of Christ, with respect to its process, is distinguished into a judgment of discussion and of retribution. In the judgment of discussion, the case of all men, both the just and the unjust, will be investigated, and the evil works of the unjust, having been accurately examined, will be published. In the judgment of retribution, a sentence appropriate to each will be pronounced, which will be twofold: of approbation, or absolution, by which eternal life will be assigned and conferred upon the elect, and of reprobation, or condemnation, by which the reprobate will be sent away into eternal fire.

Question XIII. Will the sins of the faithful also be examined and published on the day of the last judgment?

That the individual sins of the faithful will be specifically examined and published by Christ on the last day is not probable.

Prob. 1) From the divine promise. God has promised that he wants to blot out our sins, like clouds, Is. XLIV, 22, to cast them behind his back, Is. XXXVIII, 17. to cast them into the depths of the sea, Mich. VII, 19. so that he may no longer remember them, Is. XLIII, 25. But what God does not want to remember, he does not publish. 2) From the immutability of God. The will of God is immutable, Mal. III, 6. Since, therefore, God has remitted the sins of the faithful in this life, it is improbable that the same God will recall the remitted sins to a rigid examination in the other life. 3) From the affection of the judge. Christ will come to judgment as our redeemer, Luc. XXI, 28. He who presents to himself a splendid church, not having a spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, Eph. V, 27. will not expose the spots of the saints.

The antithesis is of the Papists, who maintain that in the judgment of discussion the sins of the elect will be examined and published by Christ. They object:

I. "The day will declare it, because it will be revealed by fire; and the work of each one will be made manifest," 1 Cor. III, 13. Resp. In that passage, not the last day is understood, but the day of temptation, in which the doctor of the church, who upon the foundation of faith has built up hay and stubble, or useless and erroneous dogmas, placed in the highest danger, or in the agony of life, is examined as if by fire, is tested, and is finally saved. The last day is not a day of probation, but of retribution.

II. Whoever brings all good and evil works to judgment, he will examine and publish the evil works of the pious; But the celestial judge etc. Eccl. XII, 14. 1 Cor. IV, 5. 2 Cor. V,

10. Resp. All thoughts, words, and works of men are said to be made manifest not collectively, as if all the sins of both the pious and the impious are to be revealed; but distributively, that the good works of the pious and the evil works of the impious, secretly perpetrated without witnesses and arbiters, are to be brought into clear light, as may be gathered from the judicial process, Matth. XXV, 34, seqq.

III. Whoever have spoken idle words, they will give an account of them, Matth. XII, 36. But the reborn etc. Jac. III, 2. E. Resp. Whoever have spoken idle words and have not received remission for them, will give an account of them. But for the elect, sins have been remitted in this life.

IV. "All men will stand before the tribunal of Christ, and will give an account of themselves," Rom. XIV, 10. 12. E. the sins of all men will be examined and published. Resp. I deny the consequence. For all men will give an account of themselves either according to the evangelical ἐπιείκεια, or according to the rigor of the law. The elect will be judged according to the gospel, and therefore will not come into a judgment, neither of legal discussion, nor of condemnation.

V. If all the books are to be opened on the last day, and men are to be judged from them; surely the book of conscience will also be opened to sustain the examination; The antecedent is true, Apoc. XX, 12. E. the consequent as well. Resp. On the last day the books of life, or the gospel, will be opened, and the books of death, or the law, and the faithful will be judged from the book of the gospel, the unfaithful from the book of the law.

VI. Whose sins Christ will not examine on the day of universal judgment (pantocrítico), he will judge them with their case unheard; But he will judge no one with their case unheard. E. The Major is evident; because it is the duty of a judge, without προσωποληψία, to discuss and examine the good and evil works of all. Resp. It is the duty of an earthly judge to discuss and examine the works of all according to the records and proofs; but the celestial judge needs neither records nor proofs, but inspects all things most thoroughly, and therefore knows who are his, 2 Tim. II, 19.

VII. The lapses of the pious have been related in the sacred letters; E. & on the last day they will be published. Resp. They have been related in the sacred letters for the sake of the living in the time of grace, both so that they may solicitously decline sins, and so that they themselves, having lapsed, may be converted and conceive hope of remission in their souls. But on the last day it is not the time of grace, but the time of judgment, nor is there then a return open for salutary penitence.

Question XIV. What is the end of the last judgment?

End of the last judgment. The principal end of the last judgment is the glory of the celestial judge a). The less principal end is the introduction of the elect into the kingdom of glory, and the actual rejection of the reprobate into eternal fire b).

Prob. a. From 2 Thess. 1, 10. "The Lord will come, to be glorified in his saints." Christ will be glorified in the saints: 1) because he will communicate perennial glory to them, as to his members; 2) because he will be glorified by them not without the highest admiration. For on that great day will shine forth most clearly the admirable justice of the celestial judge, remunerative and vindictive, joined with ineffable mercy, wisdom, and power.

Prob. b. The last judgment is an isagogical means of admitting the pious into beatitude, and of casting the impious into eternal torments.

Question XV. Is the millennial kingdom of Christ, conspicuous for its exceptional knowledge of divine mysteries, sanctity, and the earthly felicity of those who are considered to be destined to live in it, to be expected before the advent of Christ to the last judgment?

On the millennial kingdom of Christ. The millennial kingdom of Christ, most conspicuous, most flourishing, for its exceptional knowledge of divine mysteries, sanctity of life, and the earthly felicity of those who are considered to be destined to live in it, is not to be expected by the sons of God on this earth.

The antithesis is 1) of the Jews, who have so perverted the prophecies of the holy prophets about the most ample kingdom of the Messiah, that they believed it would be splendid with a certain pomp and earthly glory, that the Jewish religion would be propagated far and wide, but that the nations opposed to it would be destroyed. To this pertains what is in Luc. XVII, 20. the Pharisees asked Christ; when the kingdom of God would be? Concerning the dreams of the Jews of today, see BUXTORF. in synagog. iudaic. c. XXXVI. p. 645. seqq. 2) of Cerinthus, a contemporary of the Apostles themselves, or at least of John, addicted in part to Judaism, and circumcised, who, being born for his belly, dared to measure the millennial kingdom of Christ by the pleasures of the flesh, as DIONYSIUS ALEXANDRINUS testifies, cited by Eusebius, book III. hist. eccl. c. XXVIII. 3) of Papias, the bishop of Hieropolis, σφόδρα σμικρὰ τὸν νῦν, i.e., of not very refined judgment, and a lover of unwritten traditions, who defined the millennial kingdom by both the holy delights of the soul and the pleasures of the body, but licit ones. Following him were TERTULLIAN, LACTANTIUS, APOLLINARIUS, CORACION, and especially NEPOS of Egypt. Conf. GERHARD. LL. theol. de confummat. seculi §. 67. But the most learned fathers, DIONYSIUS of Alexandria, JEROME, AUGUSTINE, and others, refuted the fable of such a millennial kingdom of Christ. See PHILASTRIUS haeres. LIX. EPIPHANIUS, haeres. LXXVII. 4) As the papacy grew, the millennial kingdom was defended by JOACHIM, Abbot of Fiore, UBERTINO DE CASALE, and the Bishop of Chemnitz, author of the book called onus ecclesiae, about whom see FLACIUS in catal. testium veritatis, book XVIII. p. 1795. 5) Of the Fanatics and Anabaptists, about whose madness PHIL. MELANCHTHON in tom. I. Opp. wrote: "The Anabaptists affirm that before the last day there must exist on earth such a kingdom of Christ, in which the pious will dominate, and will oppress and destroy all impious kings." 6) of CASPAR SCHWENCKFELD, who, anticipating a new kingdom of Christ, in his published book on the threefold life of men, c. XLIII, wishing to distinguish his opinion from the Cerinthian and Anabaptist, thus discourses: "Our opinion is thus, that we hope that he, the Lord and Head of the Churches, Christ Jesus, will yet spread his heavenly kingdom over us wretched ones with Power, Spirit, and Might, will gather the scattered children of God in the holy Spirit, yea, will beget many of them through the word of truth, and let his knowledge and glory break forth more clearly, that he will endow the Church and its members with more grace, light, and understanding, and richer spiritual gifts, that men also will be more zealous, more spiritual, more pious, and more godly." PHILIPPUS AUREOLUS THEOPHRASTUS BOMBASTUS von HOHENHEIM, from the Hermitage of the Swiss, born of a noble family, commonly called PARACELsus, gave his thumb to this, who asserted that the golden age is still to come, which he also called the age of the Holy Spirit. Following Schwenckfeld and Theophrastus was VALENTINUS WEIGELIUS, pastor of Zschopau near Freiberg in Misnia, who, having assumed the name of Udalricus Wegweiser of Utopia, and having published a book on the wonderful work, established three ages: I. Of the Father, who submerged his enemies in a flood of water; II. Of the Son, who destroyed his enemies with a flood of blood; III. Of the Holy Spirit, who will destroy his adversaries with a flood of fire. Moreover, the dreams of a millennial kingdom of Christ were approved by HEINRICUS NICOLAI, ESAIAS STIFELIUS, AEGIDIUS GUTMANN, EZECHIEL METH, DAVID GEORGIUS, JACOB BOEHME, a shoemaker of Görlitz, the brethren of the Rosy Cross, QUIRINUS KUHLMANN, CHRISTIANUS HOBURGIUS, IO. GUIL. PETERSENIUS, the Quakers, and many others. Conf. D. PFEIFER's antichiliasmum, & D. MEUMANNI's disput. antichilias.

Exposition

Obs. I. The false dogma about the kingdom of Christ is also called chiliasm, from the Greek word χίλια, or χιλιάς, a thousand. AUGUSTINE, in his work on heresies to Quodvultdeus, c. 8, translates Chiliaistae as Millenarians; elsewhere in Book XX of The City of God, he calls them Millenarii. PHILASTRIUS, haeres. LIX, calls them Chilionetidae. They are called Millenarii by ISIDORE in Book VIII of his Etymologies.

Obs. II. The Chiliasts do not hold one single opinion about the blessed millennium on this earth. For which reason, B. AFFELMANNUS in his heptad of questions reduced the Chiliasts to five classes. I. Is of those who write that Christ will return corporeally before the last day, and will institute such a kingdom on this earth. II. Of those who restrict it more specifically to the land of Canaan, into which they say the Jews are to be brought back. III. Of those who claim the felicity of some millennium only for the martyrs, to be resuscitated before the last day. IV. Of those who understand a spiritual felicity, and refer it to the destruction of the Anti-Christ, the extinction of the Turk, the overthrow of heretics, the cessation of persecutions, and a catholic evangelical church. V. Of those who interpret that felicity both spiritually and corporeally, and promise us a felicity as great as was in paradise before the fall, before the last judgment.

Obs. III. Some Theologians distinguish Chiliasm into the crude, or Cerinthian, and the subtle, or Papian. The former measures the blessed millennium by the illicit pleasures of the flesh; the latter by delights both of the body and of the soul, but licit and honorable. See D. HANNEKEN. de moribus regni Christi §. 6. To others, however, a trichotomy is pleasing, who distinguish between crude, subtle, and most subtle Chiliasm. The crude is Cerinthian, the subtle Papian, the most subtle Schwenckfeldian and Weigelian; although not even this one agrees in all things. In this, however, the Chiliasts conspire: a) that with great consensus they state that there will be a greater illumination of the Holy Spirit, and a more excellent knowledge of divine mysteries in the millennial kingdom, than in this spiritual kingdom of grace; b) The members of the chiliastic kingdom will be perfectly holy; c) With all persecutions ceasing, peace and earthly felicity in that most blessed millennium will be most pleasant and most abundant; and therefore the martyrs will be resurrected, so that, since they sustained such dire torments on this earth, they may be made partakers of that terrestrial prosperity; d) The conversion of the Jews in the most prosperous millennium will be so solemn, brilliant, and illustrious, that it will deserve to be called universal; e) The destruction of the Roman Anti-Christ, and his total excision, will undoubtedly happen. We shall weigh each of these with an equitable estimation of mind.

We prove the assertion. I. That the kingdom of Christ is threefold, we learn from the divinely-inspired word (θεοπνευστω). For the kingdom of Christ is either the kingdom of power, or of grace, or of glory. The millennial kingdom is neither the kingdom of power, nor of grace, nor of glory. It is not the kingdom of power; because in it the subjects of Christ are both all creatures and all men, both pious and impious, and even the cacodemons themselves. But these are not said to be in the millennial kingdom. Nor can this be the kingdom of grace. For a) the kingdom of grace is already present; but the chiliastic kingdom is expected as future. b) The kingdom of grace is spiritual, not secular, and therefore not to be estimated by earthly felicity, Jo. XVIII, 36. for it does not come μετὰ παρατηρήσεως, with observation, i.e. μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, with royal splendor, riches, triumph, such as the Pharisees expected, and now the Jews also expect, as GROTIUS explains, but it is justice, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit, Rom. XIV, 17. But the millennial kingdom, in the opinion of the Chiliasts, is conspicuous for the external splendor of earthly felicity. Nor is it the kingdom of glory; because this is eternal, not to be defined by the space of a thousand years. We conclude: Whatever kingdom is neither the kingdom of power, nor the kingdom of grace, nor the kingdom of glory, that is not a true kingdom of Christ, but is an entity of reason, and the dream of waking men; But the chiliastic kingdom is neither etc. E.

II. In the millennial kingdom there cannot be a greater illumination of the Holy Spirit than there was in the kingdom of grace in the times of the Apostles; But the knowledge of God (θεογνωσία) in the kingdom of grace in the times of the Apostles was imperfect. E. The Major is established; because the Apostles were men inspired by God (θεόπνευστοι), 2 Pet. 1, 21. who most wisely explained the way to heaven. The Minor is evident from 1 Cor. XIII, 9.10. "We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect has come, then that which is in part will be done away." For we have seen now through a mirror in an enigma, but then face to face. The Apostle gives the reason for the imperfect knowledge of God in 2 Cor. V, 6. 7. "While we are at home in the body, we are away from the Lord; for we walk by faith, not by sight (appearance)." For which reason Paul says that he has not been made perfect, Phil. III, 12.

III. The citizens of the millennial kingdom cannot excel in a more perfect sanctity than that with which the Apostles were endowed; But they were endowed with imperfect sanctity; of which imperfection the Apostles themselves complain. Paul, Rom. VII, 18. "I know that in me, that is in my flesh, good does not dwell. For to will is present with me; but to do good, I do not find." John, 1 ep. I, 8. "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." James, epist. c. III, 2. "We all stumble often." As long as men on this earth behold this light, they will pray: "Lord, forgive us our debts!" Matth. VI. Therefore, on this earth, until the day of the last judgment, men will not live perfectly holy.

IV. Christ teaches, Matth. XIII, 30. that it will be that the tares will grow together with the wheat, until the harvest, and he understands by the tares the sons of the evil one (πονηροῦ), i.e. of the devil, by the wheat, or the good seed, the sons of the kingdom, by the harvest the consummation of the age, and asserts that the reapers, or angels, will finally at the harvest gather the tares and burn them with fire. E. The field of the church before the conflagration of the world will not be free of tares, but the segregation of the evil goats from the holy sheep will finally take place on the day of the last judgment, Matth. XXV, 32.

V. Whoever in this world are subject to many afflictions and persecutions, cannot promise themselves perpetual halcyon days on this earth; But all the beloved sons of God, etc. The Minor is proved from Jo. XVI, 33. "These things I have spoken to you, that in me you may have peace; in the world you have affliction." By these afflictions all the pious are chastised first in this life, before they are transferred into celestial glory. The words of the Holy Spirit are clear, Hebr. XII, 6. "Whom the Lord loves, he corrects; and he chastises every son whom he receives," 2 Tim. III, 12. "All who wish to live piously in Christ Jesus will suffer persecutions," Acts. XIV, 22. "Through many afflictions we must enter the kingdom of heaven."

VI. The state of the church, or the kingdom of Christ, towards the end of the world, on account of the most corrupt morals of the impious, and the most bitter afflictions of the pious, will be most turbulent and most sad. Therefore, the kingdom of Christ towards the end of the world will not flourish or be eminent for exceptional sanctity and earthly felicity. The Apostles confirm the antecedent; Paul, 2 Tim. III, 1. "But know this, that in the last days difficult times will come. For men will be lovers of themselves, covetous, boastful, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, ungrateful, profane, devoid of charity, truce-breakers, slanderers, intemperate, fierce, not loving good, traitors, rash, inflated, lovers of pleasures more than of God, having a form of piety, but denying its power; and avoid these!" Peter, 2 ep. III, 3. "Knowing this first, that scoffers will come in the last days, who will walk according to their own lusts, and will say: Where is the promise of his coming?" Jude v. 17. "But you, beloved, remember the words which were spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord, Jesus Christ; for they said to you that in the last time there will be mockers, who will walk according to their own impious lusts." But if the face of the last times will be so dark and so sad, then the kingdom of Christ in that stretch of time will flourish neither with the sanctity of very many men, nor with the earthly felicity of the few elect.

VII. That the solemn advent of Christ, distinguished from the daily advent of grace, is only twofold, and indeed the former humble, the latter sublime and majestic, is evident from the sacred letters and the more ancient symbols. Paul expressly says in Hebr. IX, 28. "Christ, having been offered once to bear the sins of many, ἐκ δευτέρου, a second time without sin will be seen by those who wait for him for salvation." That that second advent will be visible and conspicuous in the clouds, is clear from Acts. I, 11. Matth. XXIV, 30. immediately joined with the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, and the consummation of the age, Matth. XXIV, 27. c. XXV, 31. 2 Thess. 1, 7. About which the Apostles' Creed testifies with clearest words: "From thence he will come, to judge the living and the dead." If Christ will appear with his second majestic advent in the clouds for this purpose, to resuscitate the dead, to judge, and to consummate this world; he does not come to establish a millennial kingdom in this world: The antecedent is true: E. the consequent as well.

VIII. At the time when all impious, unjust, and reprobate men will rise, at the same time all pious, just, and elect men, and therefore also all pious martyrs, will rise; But on the last day all impious men etc. Therefore. The Minor is clear; because Christ most openly teaches the simultaneous resurrection of the pious and the impious, Jo. V, 28. "The hour is coming (and it will come as certainly as if it were present now) in which all who are in the tombs will hear his voice and will come forth, those who have done good, to the resurrection of life, but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment." Conf. Dan. XII, 2. That this universal and simultaneous resurrection will be on the last day, the Savior affirms in Jo. VI, 40. "This is the will of him who sent me, that everyone who sees the Son and believes in him should have eternal life, and I will raise him up on the last day." Conf. Jo. XI, 24. c. XII, 48. Acts. XVII, 31.

IX. Those souls that receive the retribution of a most splendid reward in heaven for their temporal affliction, that they should be sent back from heaven by God into bodies to be companions of earthly felicity, is incredible. But the souls of the reborn, released from their bodies, of all pious men, and especially of martyrs, etc. Therefore. The Major is established; because earthly felicity is in many parts less than celestial rewards. But if God were to send souls enjoying celestial rewards back into bodies living on this earth, their blessed state would not be advanced to something greater, but would be immeasurably diminished. The Minor is clear from the words of Christ, Matth. V, 12. "rejoice and be glad, because your reward will be plentiful in the heavens": there is the crown of justice, 2 Tim. IV, 8.

X. True Christians at every moment watch for their salvation, because they expect the sudden and to them unknown advent of Christ to judgment; E. true Christians do not expect a blessed millennium to precede the last judgment. The antecedent is proven from the clear words of the Savior, Mark, XIII, 31. "Heaven and earth will pass away: but my words will not pass away. But of that day and hour no one knows, neither the angels who are in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father. See, watch and pray, for you do not know when the time will be." But if Christ is to come to judgment only after the millennium; what need is there for such a grave exhortation to consider the last judgment of Christ, and to ponder it with no day omitted? According to the mind of the Savior, the day of the last judgment is to be unknown to us. But, if the universal judgment will be held after the millennium, which is thought not to have begun even today, it is most exactly established for us that Christ will not come to judgment within the course of many years.

XI. The hypothesis of the millennial kingdom of Christ does not kindle piety, but extinguishes it, or certainly checks its course. For a) by the Chiliastic hypothesis men are turned away from the desire for celestial and spiritual goods, which desire is nevertheless of true Christians, Rom. VIII, 23. Phil. III, 20. b) The Chiliastic opinion nourishes the security of men, who think either nothing or little of the last judgment. For, fascinated by this weak opinion, they persuade themselves that the advent of Christ is very far off, and therefore that one should live for the day. c) Through the Chiliastic opinion, an occasion for inciting rebellion against the ordinary magistrate is supplied to men eager for novelty and more apt for disturbing things than for managing them. This perverse opinion in the previous century excited and aroused the minds of the peasants to refuse the command of the magistrate.

Refutation

The Chiliasts object. I. That the Apostle John most openly teaches the millennial kingdom of Christ, Apoc. XX, 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. & 8. whose words are most worthy of memory. "Afterwards I saw an angel descending from heaven, who had the key of the abyss, and a great chain in his hand. He seized the dragon, that ancient serpent, who is the devil and Satan; and bound him for a thousand years; and cast him into the abyss, and shut him in, and sealed it over him, that he should not deceive the nations any more, until the thousand years were completed. But after this he must be loosed for a short time. I saw further thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given to them; also the souls of those beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and who had not worshiped the beast, nor his image, and they reigned with Christ for a thousand years. But the rest of the dead did not live again, until the thousand years were completed. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he who has a part in the first resurrection. For over these the second death has no power; but they will be priests of God, and of Christ, and will reign with him for a thousand years. But when the thousand years are completed, Satan will be loosed from his custody, and will go out to deceive the nations." Resp. 1) Because the apocalyptic book is prophetic, full both of most abstruse prophetic visions and of allegorical and, as it were, enigmatic formulas of speaking, difficult to understand, it must therefore be explained according to the analogy of faith, built upon clear and perspicuous places of scripture (*).

(2) The Chiliasts cannot from this place cited rightly prove their doctrine of a literal millennium. For they gladly try to show a solemn advent of Christ and the establishment of a millennial kingdom, in which (a) the perfected saints will appear, (b) the consummated sanctity will shine forth, (c) the martyrs will rejoice in resurrection, (d) the primordial Antichrist will be overthrown. But the Apostle's words require a more sober interpretation, which we will first briefly paraphrase and then respond to what is objected.

The words of John: And I saw an angel descending from heaven — this indicates, in the order of visions, not an actual angel (uncreated Christ, who alone abolishes Satan's power, descends, binds, casts away, according to Genesis III, 15; Luke X, 22; Hebrews II, 14). Having the key of the abyss, and a great chain in his hand — the key is the symbol of authority, Revelation I, 18; the abyss signifies hell. The great chain symbolizes the power of Christ by which Satan is subjected. He seized the dragon, the ancient serpent, who is the devil and Satan — this gradatim reproduces John's description. The devil is comprehended both as prince of paganism and idolatry, and as seducer of the nations. Christ himself, through the Apostles, quickly after his ascension and victory, bound him. And bound (*) Indeed the Chiliasts ought to have known these two laws, partly hermeneutical, partly elenctic, to be firmly maintained in theology. I. The interpreters of the divine oracles of the ancients are the later prophets and writings of the New Testament; but the preface of John is the book of all divine oracles the ultimate, and the interpretation of these words, which the Author abundantly handed down, and to which most of our divines and foremost interpreters give their assent, is much more fitting than that perverse exposition of the Chiliasts, so much at variance with the most clear testimonies of Scripture. II. From words more obscure no firm proof is to be drawn, much less a principal one. Rather the more obscure sayings are to be illustrated by the clearer, not these by those. In this very place, however, the sharpest defenders of Chiliasm think that they have found a defense most firm, nay almost unique, upon which their entire opinion rests. For if there were to be a millennium: (1) it would still be awaited; (2) such a future, as those dreamers have imagined; (3) so momentous, and to be so highly regarded, that in the doctrines of the Christian faith it would have to be held not in the lowest place (since Pseudo-Papias, others besides, for this cause, as for their altars and hearths, earnestly contended). Yet it is far removed from all resemblance to truth, that the other sacred writers, and especially the Apostolic Legates themselves, should have passed over in silence so fruitful, indeed so entirely necessary a matter, and that not one of them left anything at all clearly and most plainly written concerning it from the Scripture.

him for a thousand years — the binding of Satan is the restraint of his horrid tyranny, by which, when Christ's kingdom was propagated, he could no longer prevent the spread of the gospel. This binding is not absolute, but limited and partial, within which he is bound as to certain acts, but not utterly deprived of liberty. And cast him into the abyss — that is, into confinement, as restrained from his former dominion.

This happened at the time when the shrines of the pagans were destroyed, the altars torn down, and the magic books burned), and shut him up, and set a seal on him (He now teaches (d) the guarding and sealing of Satan, by which the license of going out, wandering, and harming was taken from him) that he should not deceive the nations (by violent and tyrannical seduction, through gentile kings and emperors, devoted to idolatry, who had persecuted the church by military assault and had impeded the public preaching of the gospel) until the thousand years were completed (There are some who take this number indefinitely, for a great interval of time; others wish for a definite millennium of a certain time to be expressed; since it does not seem probable that John would say χίλια ἔτη, a thousand years, six times, and indeed four times with the article, τὰ χίλια ἔτη. Nor, however, is it permissible to define the epoch of the thousand years by a certain mathematical point. And so, if we cannot precisely determine the year in which Satan was bound, it is sufficient for us to have shown the century of the satanic binding and loosing. Therefore, we are persuaded that the beginning of the satanic binding occurred in the 4th century, with Constantine the Great holding power, and the beginning of the diabolical loosing in the 14th century, when the Ottoman kingdom began to be erected). And after that he must be loosed for a little while (just as the seizure, binding, casting down, and guarding of Satan was done step by step; so also his loosing has its degrees. For although the beginning of the loosing falls in the 14th century, the devil nevertheless began to wander and rage most greatly in the 15th century, when Constantinople, the seat of the eastern emperors, was occupied by Mehmed II, who gave an example of more than Stygian cruelty).

And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them (John had beheld the turbulent state of Christ's champions, now he sees their more blessed state; he sees them sitting on thrones, i.e., reigning and enjoying peace), and judgment was given to them (by which, in approving the judgment of Christ, they disapprove and condemn gentile idolatry, Matthew 19:28), and the souls of those who had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and who had not worshiped the beast, nor its image, and had not received its mark on their forehead, and on their hand: who lived and reigned with Christ for a thousand years (The Apostle cast the eyes of his mind into the heaven of glory, and there in spirit he saw the martyrs and confessors of the gospel of Christ. Of the souls of the martyrs he says: ἐζησαν, they lived, not ἀνέζησαν, they lived again; for since they are immortal, they always live, they do not, however, rise from the dead, or revive. The confessors did not worship the beast and its image, they did not venerate the Anti-Christ, and not even in an image did they worship him. The mark on the forehead denotes an open profession of Anti-Christianism, the mark on the hand denotes a ready obedience in the works of the flesh. These lived and reigned in the kingdom of glory, never to depart from the state of glory, within this chiliad, and while it runs its course in the kingdom of grace. See Revelation 3:12. To reign signifies to live most happily, and to live well and blessedly, and no longer to be subject to that shameful servitude of sin and the world). But the rest of the dead did not live again until the thousand years were finished (The rest of the dead are the spiritually dead, who did not live again through conversion to Christ, as long as that salutary millennium lasts). This is the first resurrection (from the death of sin). Blessed and holy is he who has part in the first resurrection (he who, having been converted to Christ, persists in the state of grace through true faith to the end). For on such the second death has no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years (The first death is the privation of the life of grace, the second death is the privation of the life of glory, or eternal condemnation; Spiritual priests are reborn, justified, and renewed men, who offer eucharistic sacrifices to God; Spiritual kings are those who through faith conquer the world, the devil, and the flesh, and dominate sin). And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations (Just as Satan was bound, in his sons and organs; so now, being loosed, he in turn made war on the church of Christ, with the foulest idolatry being brought back).

We note the following epoch of the millennium. Constantine the Great in the year of Christ 312, having seen the sign of the cross in the sky with the inscription: ἐν τῷ νικῇ, "in this sign, conquer," won a victory over his enemies, and having converted to Christianity, gave peace to the church; which year, therefore, the fathers call most happy for the church; on the contrary, in the year of Christ 1307, Michael IX, Emperor of the Greeks, was conquered and defeated, so that you might call it an unlucky and fatal year for the entire East. Cf. D. NEVMANN'S disput II. Antichilist. §. 9. His guarding and sealing was done in the 5th century, when that ecumenical Council of Chalcedon was celebrated, namely in the year 453, in which paganism was not only exterminated, but heresies were also condemned.

You say: 1) The souls of the beheaded lived and reigned with Christ for a thousand years; Therefore, Christ will establish a millennial kingdom with his saints on this earth.

Resp. a) The souls lived, they did not live again, not on this earth, but in heaven. b) The term to reign does not denote an earthly, visible, and corporal kingdom; but a heavenly, invisible, and spiritual one, which consists not in temporal felicity, but in eternal blessedness. For to reign, according to John, signifies, after overcoming the enemies, to live most blessedly, in which sense this word is also used by Paul in 1 Timothy 2:12.

You say: 2) In that millennium, which begins in the 4th century and ends in the 14th century, Satan was not bound; because a) Julian the apostate ascended the imperial throne in the same century, and b) various heresies (Arian, Pelagian, Photinian, and many others) grew like tares, which Satan sows.

Resp. a) In the 4th century Satan was bound, in the 5th century he was sealed up. God, moved by the most just causes, loosened for a time the chain to which Satan was bound, so that his slave, Julian, might ascend the throne; but it was a little cloud, quickly passing. After he died, no pagan Emperor was crowned with a diadem within the course of that millennium. The binding of Satan is limited, not absolute. Satan was bound, lest he seduce the nations with violent and tyrannical seduction; the seduction of heretics is not so much violent as it is fraudulent. AUGUSTINE used this distinction in his commentary on Psalm 9. The first persecution of the church was violent, when by proscriptions, tortures, and slaughters, Christians were forced to sacrifice. The second persecution is fraudulent, which is carried on through heretics and false brethren. The third, in the time of the Antichrist, is both violent and fraudulent, having force in its power, and deceit in its miracles. John speaks of the first, not of the second. Then, some persecutions of the church are general, initiated by pagans, others are certain special disturbances, which the devil causes, both with the word, through heretics, and with the sword, through tyrants. The text in the Apocalypse speaks again of the former, and its very fulfillment has confirmed this; nor is Satan said to be bound ἀπλῶς & ὁλικῶς, simply and absolutely, but κατὰ τὰ προσδιοριστικῶς, in a certain respect and with a certain qualification, namely with respect to the seduction of the gentiles. For so the text has it: And he cast him into the abyss, and shut him up, and set a seal on him, that he should not seduce the nations (to persecute Christians atrociously, in the former manner). This is evident from the fact that it is soon said, for example, that Satan, after those thousand years of his binding, being loosed from his prison, is again to seduce the nations, or peoples, συναγαγεῖν αὐτὸς εἰς πόλεμον, to gather them together to battle, where it is most manifest that what Satan is said to be about to do after his loosing, he must have desisted from during the time of his binding. The blessed HUNNIUS illustrates the matter with a most suitable simile, in disp. de regno Christi §. 75. Just as, when in Judges 3 it is read that, after Eglon, King of the Moabites, was killed by Ehud, a peace of 80 years followed, this is not understood simply, with respect to all the enemies of the Israelite nation equally; but with respect to the Moabites, about whom it specifically discusses there; so also, when Satan is written to be bound, this is not to be understood simply, but in a certain respect, namely with respect to the gentiles, formerly under pagan rule, and thus with respect to the assault of the gentiles on the church of Christ; just as John manifestly explains his own prophecy, adding that he should not seduce the nations any more. For to expect a time in this world when Satan will plainly no longer rage against Christians is absurd and contrary to the prediction of the sacred letters.

You say: 3) The millennium, which begins in the 4th century and ends in the 14th century, was not without violent seduction. For the Ostrogoths, Huns, Vandals, and other peoples, during the course of that millennium, poured into Italy and cruelly raged against the followers of the true Christian doctrine.

Resp. Perpetual peace is not the eminent good of wayfaring men, but of the blessed. The barbarian nations either embraced the catholic faith or adhered to Arianism, with Paganism having been rejected.

You say: 4) The loosing of Satan lasts for a short time. See Rev. 20:3. The loosing of Satan from the founding of the Ottoman kingdom does not last for a short time; for it has already lasted for the course of three centuries, and more. Therefore, that in the Apocalypse of John is not to be understood. Resp. A short and small time is left for Satan, whether it is compared with the thousand years past, or with all past time, in which from the origin of the world he has variously raged among the gentiles, or finally with eternity itself, in view of which one chiliad is not otherwise than as one day, Ps. 90:5.

II. The Chiliasts call upon Daniel 2:44 sqq. in their aid, collated with v. 35, where Daniel, about to explain the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, says: But in the days of those kingdoms the God of heaven will set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, and its kingdom shall not be left to another people; it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, but it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as you saw that a stone was cut out of the rock, not by hands, and that it broke in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold, v. 35. And the stone that struck the statue became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. From this prophetic oracle the Chiliasts argue: Whatever kingdom is spiritual, filling the whole earth and breaking in pieces the other kingdoms, that is neither the kingdom of grace, nor the kingdom of glory, but some intermediate kingdom, to wit, the millennial kingdom of Christ; But the kingdom of Christ, predicted by Daniel, etc. The major premise is established; because 1) the kingdom of grace indeed fills the whole earth, but it does not break in pieces or consume the other kingdoms; 2) The kingdom of glory fills heaven, not the earth; Resp. to 1) The kingdom of grace is entirely understood by Daniel, which by the preaching of the gospel fills the whole earth, Col. 1:23. This breaks in pieces and consumes the other kingdoms, not by corporal desolation, but by spiritual subjugation; it does not abolish polities, but subjects Kings and citizens to Christ, that they may kiss this Son of God, Phil. 2:12. 2) The kingdom predicted by Daniel cannot be the millennial kingdom. For that one is eternal; this one, after a thousand years have elapsed, is finished; that one breaks in pieces and consumes all the other kingdoms; the millennial kingdom, however, will not break in pieces the kingdom of Gog and Magog, Rev. 20:8.

You say: The spiritual kingdom of Christ is not eternal. For it is terminated by the consummation of the age, when Christ will hand over the kingdom to the Father. Resp. The consummation of the age will not terminate the substance of Christ's kingdom, but the mode of rule through the word and sacraments.

III. The Chiliasts strive to establish the millennial kingdom of Christ from Daniel 7:26, 27. Afterwards judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to destroy and overthrow it, even to the end. And the kingdom and dominion, and the majesty of the kingdoms under all the heavens shall be given to the most holy people; Whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve him, and obey him. The Chiliasts argue: Whatever kingdom shall be given to the most holy people under heaven, after the fourth monarchy is destroyed, that is neither the kingdom of grace, nor the kingdom of glory, but the millennial kingdom of Christ. But the kingdom in Daniel, promised by the angel, will be given to the most holy people, and indeed under heaven, after the Roman monarchy is destroyed; Therefore. The major premise is established; because that kingdom, which will be given to the most holy people under heaven, cannot be the kingdom of glory, because this is given not under heaven, but in heaven; nor the kingdom of grace; since this is given while the Roman monarchy is prevailing and flourishing. Therefore, some intermediate kingdom (namely, the millennial) is understood in Daniel. Resp. The kingdom of glory is understood in Daniel, which will indeed be conferred on the most holy people under heaven, but will be consummated in the heavenly fatherland. For the spiritual kingdom of Christ is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, Rom. 14:17; which is begun under heaven, but is consummated in heaven. But the millennial kingdom cannot be understood in Daniel. For the kingdom mentioned in Daniel, considered consummatively, will be given after the last judgment, with all earthly kingdoms destroyed, and will last forever; which predicates certainly do not at all suit the millennial kingdom.

Question XVI. Is a universal, or at least an illustrious and notable, conversion of the Jews to be expected towards the end of the world?

Although access to repentance and faith in Christ is not closed off to the Jews by an absolute decree of God a), and many of them since the apostolic age have in the course of time returned to grace with God b); nevertheless, a universal, or at least an illustrious and solemn conversion of them is not to be expected towards the end of the world c).

The antithesis is of 1) many of the Fathers, 2) most of the Papists, 3) certain of the Reformed, 4) some of our own Theologians, 5) the Chiliasts, to adduce the lengthy words of all of whom is superfluous. Let it suffice for the present to have cited one, HOBURG, in his mystical postils, Dom. Iudic. p. 456, writing: "I fear that no people under the sun dishonors you more than your very own Christians; Therefore you will also finally dishonor them again, and will again look upon, have mercy on, and accept the blind Jews, who in former times out of blind ignorance and untimely zeal dishonored you." In the Apologia Praetoriana the same Mystic says on p. 282: "We hold to it, that before the last day the Jews will be converted, the Gentiles will come to the community of the Church, and that before this the sectarian Babel-existence of the Christians will fall, and before this does not happen, no last day is to be hoped for."

Exposition

Obs. I. A distinction must be made between a universal and simultaneous conversion of the Jews, and their particular and successive conversion. That universality, in turn, is viewed either ᾧπλῶς, simply, and embraces all Jews whatsoever, who are, were, or will be; or κατὰ τὶ, and is considered in a certain respect; in which sense it denotes the greatest part of the Jews entering into the assembly of Christ at one and the same time.

Obs. II. A successive and particular conversion of the Jews is sometimes solemn, notable, and splendid; sometimes it is less solemn, private, and thus as if obliterated. The former happens more rarely, the latter can be expected daily.

Prob. a. From Rom. 11:1, 2. Has God cast away his people? By no means. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God has not cast away his people, whom he foreknew. The Apostle teaches that the Jews have been rejected from grace not by an absolute decree of God, or by an irreconcilable hatred, but the cause of their reprobation is the final impenitence and ἀπιστία of many Jews. But those Jews, whom God foreknew would believe in Christ, He has not rejected. Wherefore the Jewish nation has not been rejected from mere hatred of God, or by an absolute decree.

Prob. b. Both sacred scripture and ecclesiastical histories declare that from the apostolic age very many Jews have been converted. When the Apostle Peter preached the gospel of Christ, three thousand Jews were converted, Acts 2:41. At another time, almost innumerable thousands embraced the worship of Christ, Acts 21:20. In succeeding times this multitude of believing Jews increased. Cf. History of Magdeburg Cent. VI. OSIANDER. Cent. V. book I. c. 34. Cent. VI. book IV. c. 4. Cent. VII. book II. c. 7.

Prob. c. We demonstrate that a universal conversion of the Jews is not to be expected. 1. From the clearest testimony of the Apostle Paul, which we read in 1 Thess. 2:15, 16. The Jews killed the Lord Jesus, and their own Prophets, and have persecuted us (the Apostles); and they please not God, and are contrary to all men, Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always; for which reason the wrath has come upon them εἰς τέλος, to the end. Concerning the phrase, εἰς τέλος, THEOPHYLACT says: "It is not given," he says, "that, as formerly, a return from captivity and a reaching of the promised land is to be hoped for, but the wrath of God has come upon them to the end, that is, the wrath of God will always remain upon them." From the Pauline saying is born for us a most valid argument; Of whomever, on account of the most cruelly killed Lord Jesus, and their most harshly treated Prophets and Apostles, have incited perpetual wrath and curse upon themselves, their universal conversion is not to be expected; But the Jews, etc. Therefore.

You say: If this argument is valid, not even one Jew will enter the church of Christ. Resp. That out of the nation of the Israelites, who crucified the Lord Jesus, one and another is converted, this the Apostle calls a μυστήριον, Rom. 11:25.

II. We have no certain hope of a universal conversion of the Jews; because a threefold curse presses upon them; a) a general one, Deut. 27:26. "Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them; And all the people shall say, Amen!" Because the Jews do not do all the words of the law, they are subject to the Mosaic curse. From this curse they could be freed, if they believed in Christ the redeemer, of whom Paul says: "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree; that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith," Gal. 3:13. But the blinded Jews reject Christ the liberator; Therefore they remain subject to the Mosaic curse. b) A special and proper curse, willingly invoked with those dreadful words: "His blood be on us, and on our children," Matt. 27:25. The Jews committed the most grievous of all sins, by crucifying the Lord of glory, and to this sin they added so horrendous a curse: Who then can be brought to believe that there will be a future conversion of all, or at least of most, Jews? c) The curse of Christ, uttered through the mouth of David, presses upon the Jews, Ps. 69:24 sqq. "Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and make their loins continually to shake. Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger take hold of them. Let their habitation be desolate; and let none dwell in their tents. For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten; and they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded. Add iniquity unto their iniquity; and let them not come into thy righteousness. Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous." 1This curse of the Messiah is not a thunderbolt from a basin, but truly denounces perpetual punishment upon the Jews. Cf. Ps. 109:17.

III. Whosoever stubbornly and persistently reject the means of grace and salvation, their universal, or at least notable, conversion is not to be hoped for; But the Jews, etc. Therefore. The major premise is open to none but the obvious. For when a profane man despises the instruments, or means, of the Holy Spirit, and is unwilling to hear the word of God, no injustice is done to him if he is not illuminated by the Holy Spirit, but is left in the darkness of his infidelity, and perishes. On this matter it is thus written: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Matth. 23:37, says Form. Concord. p. 627. The minor premise also is free from all doubt. For the Jews for many past centuries, up to this day in which we live, refuse to read the writings of the Evangelists and Apostles, they rarely even look at the monuments of the Prophets, being content with the knowledge of the Pentateuch, they value the fables of the Talmud most highly, they retain circumcision, and detest baptism, they laugh at the sacrament of the supper, they so disdain the preaching of the gospel that the temples of Christians are vile to them, in the first bloom of their children's tender age they instill and impress a hatred of Christians, so that they refuse to associate familiarly with the children of Christians. Cf. BUXTORF'S Synag. iudaic. chap. III. p. 152. For which reason the hope of a universal conversion of the Jews is cut off.

IV. Whosoever burn with such immense hatred against Jesus, the author of salvation, that they spew forth dire blasphemies against him with profane mouths, their significant conversion is by no means to be hoped for; But the Jews, etc. Therefore. The major premise is confirmed by St. Paul, 1 Cor. 16:22. "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha!" The minor is established by experience itself. For the Jews in their synagogues are accustomed to call our Jesus Thalui, and when his name is mentioned, to add: "may his name and memory be blotted out" (*)! and to spit on the ground, as BUXTORF testifies in the same place, p. 167. Who then could persuade himself that that stubbornly impious nation, which assails the most holy name of Jesus with unspeakable insults, will be illuminated and converted by the grace of the Holy Spirit?

V. Whosoever by the most just judgment of God are cast out of the kingdom of God and excluded from the heavenly supper on account of persistent ἀπειρίαν, their solemn conversion is not to be expected; But the Jews, etc. The minor is established from the words of Christ in Matthew 8:11, 12. "Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness." And Luke 14:24. "I say unto you, That none of those men (the Jews) which were bidden shall taste of my supper."

VI. That the generation of circumcised Jews shall not pass away, until all things are fulfilled, Christ himself numbered among the signs of the last judgment, Luke 21:32 (**). Therefore, such a multitude of Jews will not be added to the Christian church before the day of the last judgment, that all Israel may be said to have been converted. The Savior's discourse in that place is about this very generation, which is distinguished from the uncircumcised gentiles by the rite of circumcision. But, if either all, or most Jews, with circumcision abrogated, were to be baptized, this Jewish nation would not remain, but would become Christian, and thus its existence would not be a prognostic sign of the imminent last day. But the Savior wished to teach us something else by the cited words.

VII. The Jewish people will be left as exiles from the Israelite kingdom until the end of the world, perpetual fugitives and wanderers; Therefore, their catholic and simultaneous conversion is not to be hoped for. The consequence is solid; because the Jewish nation is dispersed through the most extensive parts of the world, Europe, Asia, and Africa, and therefore through the ordinary means of grace, the word and sacraments, so many myriads of Jews cannot be converted at one and the same time, but many centuries will pass before all are called, illuminated, and converted to the church. The antecedent is clear from the prophecy of the Prophet Daniel, chap. 9:27. "Until the consummation and decision, (the wrath of God) shall drip upon the desolation," and the prediction of Christ, Matthew 23:38. "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate;" and Luke 21:24. "For they (who are in Judea) shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." But the fulfillment of the times of the Gentiles is rightly extended by CHRYSOSTOM to the consummation of the age, as judged by the blessed CALOVIUS in his illustrated bible on this passage, fol. 637, and Matthew 21:43. "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

VIII. In whatever nation a blinding is to endure perpetually, its conversion is to be hoped for only as particular; But in the Jewish nation, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved by the words of Christ, Matthew 13:14, 15. "In the Jews is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, which says: By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive. For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." Paul agrees, saying, Rom. 11:25, "πρωσις, hardening in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." But the entrance of the gentiles into the Christian church will last until the consummation of the age; because a) Christ joins the promulgation of the gospel among the gentiles with the consummation of the age, Matthew 28:19, 20, and b) he connects the πλήρωμα καιρῶν τῶν ἐθνῶν, the fulfillment of the times of the gentiles, with the last day, Luke 21:24. Therefore, both the hardening of some Jews and the conversion of some will continue until then.

IX. Whichever people God foreknew would believe in Christ, that one he did not reject, but converted and chose, Rom. 11:2. But he foreknew some would believe in Christ; Therefore. The minor is clear; because election is κατὰ πρόγνωσιν of faith, 1 Pet. 1:2, 2 Thess. 2:13. But faith is not of all, 2 Thess. 3:2, and election is of the few, Matth. 20:16.

(**) Therefore so far is it from Christ having included some solemn or plainly common conversion of the Jews among the signs of the supreme judgment.

X. Whichever Jews do not continue in unbelief, they are received into the kingdom of grace, Rom. 11:23. But there are few Jews who do not continue in unbelief. Therefore. The minor is clear: because not all believe the gospel, Rom. 10:16, nor are all who are of Israel, Israel, Rom. 9:6.

XI. The Jews to be converted are described as λείμματα, remnants, Rom. 11:5, as λοιποὶ, the rest, v. 7, as τινὲς ἐξ αὐτῶν, some of them, v. 14. In Hebrew they are called שארפליט יתרושריר, Is. 10:20, chap. 11:11, Mic. 2:12, chap. 5:2, 3. They are emphatically depicted as a tenth selected from the fruits, Is. 6:13. They will be like a grain of wheat, separated from the chaff, Amos 9:9. Indeed, like the ears of a sheep torn, which are snatched from the mouth of a lion, chap. 3:12. Therefore the conversion of the Jews is not universal, not notable and significant, but particular.

XII. Sacred Scripture depicts for us the last times as horrendous, as full of hypocrites and heretics, 2 Tim. 3:1, Matth. 24:24, Luke 18:8. Therefore in the last times of the world not even an illustrious or notable conversion of the Jews is to be hoped for.

XIII. Just as the πλήρωμα τῶν ἐθνῶν, the fullness of the Gentiles, enters the church of Christ not at once and together, but successively, sparsely, and step by step: So also πᾶς Ἰσραήλ, all Israel, or the entire assembly of elect Jews, is aggregated to the Christian church not at once and together, but sparsely and successively. For the Apostle Paul says, Rom. 11:25, 26, "Hardening in part has happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved."

XIV. Whatever conversion and justification is through the merit of Christ, apprehended by true faith, that belongs to all times, and is not to be restricted to the end of the age; But the conversion of the Jews, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from Rom. 11:26, where the Apostle says: "All Israel shall be saved, as it is written: There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." These words are taken from Is. 59:20, where the prophet speaks of the advent of Christ in the flesh, since he is said to come from Sion, that is, from the afflicted church of the Jews, to redeem Jacob, that is, the Israelites, from sin. Therefore, just as the redemption of Christ is valid for all times: So also for the Israelites, at no time is access to this deliverer closed.

XV. Whatever conflicts with the nature of the testament and divine covenant, that, without compromising the justice of God, cannot be asserted: But that the people of God should be deserted for such intervals of time, and be converted only at the end of the world, conflicts with the divine covenant. For this is the testament of God, that he wishes to take away their sins, Rom. 11:27, Jer. 31:31. But the removal of sins comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe, Rom. 3:22. Now how will the divine covenant stand with the whole people of God, which so late, namely at the end of the world, will be salvific for the whole people?

XVI. Whatever conversion Paul adduces in Rom. 11:25, to suppress the pride of the Gentiles, he understood it not of a time immediately preceding the last day, but primarily of the present, and the subsequent interval of times: But the conversion of the Jews, etc. Therefore. DANNHAVER solidly confirms the major premise: It does not follow: You Romans ought to put down your crests, and not oppress the Jews; because after the course of seventeen centuries they will still be converted in great number. They would have replied: let these things be said to those Romans who are then living: what is it to us, the last of men? whom as we do not know, so neither can we despise them, Apocal. Myster. Apostol. pag. 97.

XVII. The hypothesis of the adversaries, who maintain that the conversion of the Jews will only happen around the end of the world, obscures and overturns the doctrine of the universal grace of God. For the paternal heart of God is revealed as merciful to all universally and equally, Rom. 11:32, "God has concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." But how catholicly, how equally, if the latter rain of divine grace is only abundant at the evening of the world, and in the former orbit of ages distills its dews sparingly on a few, with others being excluded by an absolute decree?

Solution

The dissenters object: I. from Zechariah 14:6, 7. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear, nor dark: But it shall be one day which shall be known to the LORD, not day, nor night; but it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light." If at evening time there will be light in Judea (of which the Prophet Zechariah speaks), undoubtedly the Jews will be illuminated and converted at the end of the world; The antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent.

Resp. 1) D. SEBASTIANUS SCHMIDIUS in the Latin bible which he published, intending to show the summary of chapter 14 of Zechariah and its parts, writes; This chapter contains a significant change of things under the new testament. Its parts are four. I. The devastation of Jerusalem by the gentiles. v. 1, 2. II. The preaching of the Gospel in Judea after the ascension of Christ. v. 12. Also the conversion of the gentiles through preaching. v. 9. III. The punishment of the enemies of Jerusalem, or the church. v. 12. IV. The state of Jerusalem and the church of the gentiles. v. 16. From these it is clear that the Prophet's discourse is not simply about the last times, immediately preceding the end of the world, but about the time following the ascension of Christ (v. 4) and preceding the conversion of the gentiles through the preaching of the gospel (v. 9). The sense of the Prophet's words is therefore; Christ having been carried up into heaven, in Judea (where there will be a small light of faith), the gospel will be preached by the Apostles, so that even around evening, i.e., in the time of the N.T., a more abundant light of saving knowledge may shine upon the Jews. Evening, physically speaking, is the last hour of the day, or its end. Therefore, speaking ἀλληγορικῶς, the time of the N.T. is the evening. For the Apostle John said; "We know that it is the last hour (it has even now begun)," 1 Ep. 2:18, and Paul, 1 Cor. 10:11, "Upon us the ends of the world are come." 2) D. CALOVIUS in his illustrated bible, fol. 1031, explains this prophetic passage somewhat more generally, saying; "Others think that the vicissitudes of the church are generally designated here, and that no specific time is regarded; which vicissitudes are found to be three main ones in the ecclesiastical history of the new testament. The first, when there was darkness under the ten persecutions of the tyrants, but at the evening of those calamities, in the time of Constantine the Great, light arose. The second, when darkness in turn fell due to the faction of the Arians and other heretics, which however was dispersed, with light having arisen in the church, until thirdly under the Anti-Christ darkness was made again; where however there was a day that was neither day nor night; because it had some light, on account of some part of catechesis being left, and the evangelical light shining solidly through the confession of the witnesses of truth; until at the evening of the world a fuller light shone forth at the time of the evangelical reformation."

II. From Hosea 3:4, 5. "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the LORD their God, and shall come with fear to the LORD, and to his goodness in the latter days." From the words of Hosea an argument is born; Whosoever shall return to the LORD in the latter days, their universal conversion is to be hoped for at the end of the world; But the Israelites, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because the latter days is the time immediately preceding the end of the world. Resp. Denying the major. For 1) the Prophet does not speak of all Israelites, but only of the ten tribes of Israel, who in the time of Jeroboam had separated themselves from the Jews, and for a long tract of time had lived in a most afflicted state without a king and without the divinely instituted worship. Their return to the LORD is not a universal conversion of the entire Israelite people. 2) The phrase the latter days in scripture commonly designates either the very time of the advent of the Messiah, or the entire time after Christ has been manifested, up to the consummation of the age. Cf. Is. 2:2, Joel 2:28, Mic. 4:1, Acts 2:17, Heb. 1:2. See, if you please, B. CALOVIUS's illustrated bible part II. O.T. fol. 720, and the same part II. N.T. fol. 1107. Therefore, whatever Hosea says will happen באחרית הימים, in the latter days, he signified would come to pass either at the very advent of Christ in the flesh, or during the whole time of the new testament. For which reason from the prophecy of Hosea a particular and successive conversion of the Israelites is rightly inferred, but not a universal and simultaneous one. The chief glory of the successive conversion of the Israelites, however, is to be left to the apostolic age; although we do not deny that after the death of the Apostles not a few Israelites were converted to Christ sparsely and successively.

III. From Rom. 11:26. Καὶ ὅτωπᾶς Ἰσραὴλ σωθήσεται, And so all Israel shall be saved, to wit, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in, verse 25. From which words of the Apostle an argument can be formed; He who says that all Israelites will be saved after the conversion of the Gentiles is fulfilled, by this very fact asserts that all Jews will be converted to Christ at the end of the world: But Paul, etc. Therefore. Resp. Denying the minor. For 1) if, according to the mind of many interpreters, you take all Israel to mean the spiritual assembly of Israel, gathered from Jews and Gentiles, according to the Pauline phrase, Rom. 2:28, chap. 9:6, Gal. 6:16, and the context (συνάφειαν) of this chapter, which deals with the contention of both peoples in being saved, v. 11, 12, 13, 14, 21, 23, the dissenters will never prove a universal conversion of the Jews from the cited passage. But if you understand Israel according to the flesh (because both the use of that word in the preceding verses and the opposition of the πλήρωματος of the Gentiles seem to demand it); nevertheless, not all Israel according to the flesh in a reduplicative sense, insofar as it rejoices in carnal generation, but in a specificative sense, which at the same time is truly Israel by faith, or which has been reborn by the Holy Spirit and is elect, is to be understood. Wherefore the Pauline proposition is universal, not absolutely, but with a limitation. The limitation is found in this very chapter 11 of Romans, v. 2, "God has not cast away his people, whom he foreknew," and v. 5, "Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace"; and also v. 23, "And they also (the Israelites), if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in." Wherefore, with the limitation added, this sense emerges: All Israel, whom God foreknew would believe in Christ, will be saved; or, all Israel, elected to eternal life, will be saved; or, all Israelites who do not persist in unbelief, will be saved. But from this it is not permissible to conclude: the entire Israelite nation, or the greatest part of the Jews, will be converted; since it is established that faith is not of all, nor is the election of many. 2) The particle ἄχρις &, until, or up to, does not always denote the cessation or end of something, but frequently in affirmative propositions denotes continuation, so that it is equivalent to while (τῷ 'while'). Confer Ps. 110:1, Ps. 123:2, Matth. 28:20, 1 Cor. 15:25, 1 Tim. 4:13. Wherefore the Apostle's meaning is: As long as the conversion of the Gentiles and their entry into the church shall continue; so long will the Jews be successively converted. But the conversion of the Gentiles will continue for the whole time of the new testament; Therefore, so will that of the Jews.

You say: There will be no mystery, if certain Israelites, who believe the gospel, are saved, when yet the Apostle expressly calls it a mystery, Rom. 11:25. A successive and particular conversion of the Jews, since it is a most well-known thing, does not deserve to be designated by the name of mystery. Resp. A mystery, according to scripture, is a hidden and so sublime a dogma that it transcends the grasp of reason, and is not understood, except from divine revelation. Now, it transcends the grasp of our reason that for the Jews, who killed Christ the author of salvation, and held the means of salvation in contempt, the gates of divine grace are open until the consummation of the age. This we would not have perceived, unless God had revealed it to us. Therefore, it remains a mystery, although it has become known to us by revelation.

Question XVII. Will the great Anti-Christ be so overcome by a certain majestic advent of Christ, that he will be overthrown before the millennial kingdom of Christ is established?

The antithesis is of the Chiliasts, who maintain that the Anti-Christ will be destroyed by a certain majestic advent of Christ before the millennial kingdom of Christ is established, so that the church, within that blessed millennium, may enjoy the most pleasant tranquility. CHRISTIAN HOBURG asserts this very thing in his apol. Praetoriana, p. 287. "The Great Prince Michael will arise and save his people, overthrow the Anti-Christ, bind Satan, and make his kingdom in the world known and glorious for a short time. Then, after the destruction of the fourth monarchy, the fifth will be established through the coming of the Lord Christ, where all kings, princes, and potentates will lay down their rule and offices, and none shall any longer let themselves be called lords." And QUIRINUS KUHLMANN, in the book which he inscribed: Neubegeisterter Böhm, chap. XIV. "The very last time will soon break forth, and will open all hidden things, because the restoration of all things is approaching. All world-empires will fall as soon as it dawns at midnight. The Papacy, Turkdom, along with all sects and religions, will then reach their certain end. Thereafter he shall appear again with Noah, Moses, and Elijah, and Elijah will give fire-signs in the world as a sign. The breaking of the great city of Babel, of confused Christendom, is at the door, all sects shall soon be unsected. In short, the Anti-Christ, along with the beast, the whore, and the false prophet, will be discovered and suffocated by a youth. A great king and ruler of the earth will be born a little after noon on the sixth day, great heroes are around him, prophets prophesy of him, and his splendor goes forth, from sunrise to sunset. The conversion of the Turks, Jews, and Heathens is to be expected straightway. One shepherd will gather the peoples into one flock. The mystery of the Jesus Monarchy or Kingdom of God will be completed at seventeen o'clock, and thereafter there will be a tabernacle of God with men."

Exposition

Obs. I. The word Anti-Christ is taken in two ways in the sacred code; a) Generally, for any heretics who disseminate false doctrines that are adverse to the doctrine of Christ, and persistently defend them. Of whom St. John says: "Even now," he says, "there are many Anti-Christ," 1 Ep. chap. 2:18, who are commonly called the lesser Anti-Christ; b) Specially and κατ' ἐξοχήν for that notable adversary of Christ, described in 2 Thess. 2:3 sqq., whom for the sake of distinction, we call the great Anti-Christ.

Obs. II. A distinction must be made between the eastern Anti-Christ, or Mohammed, who, sitting outside the temple of God, wishes it to be completely torn down; and the western Anti-Christ, or the Roman Pontiff, who sits in the temple of God, 2 Thess. 2:4, i.e., he dominates in the midst of the church, which he does not wish to be utterly destroyed, like Mohammed, but to be governed by himself with monarchical power. In the present we are dealing with the ruin of the western Anti-Christ, sitting in the temple of God.

Obs. III. Our discourse is not of the partial ruin or fall of the Anti-Christ, but of the total. The authority and power of the Anti-Christ has indeed fallen in many places; yet he will retain some dominion, which he has arrogated and assumed for himself over the church of Christ, until the day of the last judgment, although it has been broken and diminished.

Confirmation

We prove our assertion I. from the classic text of 2 Thess. 2:8. "And then shall that Wicked be revealed (ἀποκαλυφθήσεται), whom the Lord shall consume (ἀναλώσει) with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy (καταργήσῃ) with the brightness of his coming (τῇ ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς παρεσίας αὐτοῦ)." In which words the Apostle speaks of three eventualities befalling the Anti-Christ. a) He describes the ἀποκάλυψις, or revelation, of the Anti-Christ, which happened many centuries ago through the witnesses of truth, especially through LUTHER and his associates, who observed the growing dominion of the Roman Bishop and uncovered his cunning machinations. b) The Ἀνάλωσις, the consumption made gradually, through the word of God and the ministry of Luther and other faithful doctors, who wore down or diminished the authority of the Roman Pontiff, not in one moment, but little by little and successively, just as the Anti-Christ was not elevated to such great dignity in one moment, but little by little. c) The κατάργησις, the abolition; Κατάργησις, in this place opposed to ἀναλώσει, designates the total destruction of the Anti-Christ. Christ will abolish his great adversary τῷ ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς παρεσίας αὐτοῦ, "by the appearance of his coming." The word ἐπιφάνεια, whenever it is used of Christ, denotes either his first or his second solemn and visible advent. Confer 1 Tim. 6:14, 2 Tim. 4:1. Παρεσία, however, when used of the advent of Christ, denotes none other than the glorious one, as DANNHAVER says, hodos. p. 804. We note further, that the Apostle Paul in both epistles written to the Thessalonians, deals with the advent of Christ to judgment. Conf. 1 Thess. 1:10, chap. 2:19, chap. 3:13, chap. 4:15, chap. 5:2, 2 Thess. 1:7, chap. 2:1, 2, 8. From which this argument arises. He whom Christ will destroy by his solemn, visible, and glorious advent to judgment; his destruction will not precede the advent of Christ by a whole millennium; But Christ will destroy the great Anti-Christ etc. Therefore.

II. At the time when the devil will be cast into the lake of fire and sulfur, at the same time the Anti-Christ and his helpers will rush headlong into the infernal fire; But the devil is cast into the lake of fire and sulfur on the day of the last judgment; Therefore. The major premise is proved, because, as in seduction, so also in punishment the devil, the beast, and the false prophet are joined, Rev. 20:10. καὶ ὁ διάβολος, ὁ πλανῶν αὐτὲς, ἐβλήθη εἰς τὴν λίμνην τοῦ πυρὸς καὶ θῶς, ὅπερ τὸ θηρίον καὶ ὁ ψευδοπροφήτης, καὶ βασανιοθήσονται ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever. We note for the present that in the words of the Apostle, saying: ὅτε τὸ θηρίον καὶ ὁ ψευδοπροφήτης, where (to which place) the beast and the prophet, no verb has been added, and therefore from the preceding clause ἐβλήθη, was cast, must be repeated, to which place the beast and the prophet were cast. For even τὸ ὅτε sometimes signifies motion to a place. But if a substantive verb is to be understood, εἰσι, are, can be conveniently added, so that the sense is: where the beast and the prophet are together, and together they undergo eternal torments. Many have contracted the two propositions of this text into one, in this manner: where both the beast and the false prophet will be tormented. Thus the Vulgate, the Dutch, VATABLUS, ERASMUS, PAGNINUS, MARLORATUS, ERASMUS SCHMIDTUS.

You say: The verb ἦσαν, were, can be understood. For LUTHER translated thus: "Where the beast and the false prophet were." This exposition rests on a certain foundation; because chap. 19 of the Apocalypse deals with the destruction of the Anti-Christ, while chapter 20 deals with the millennial kingdom. Therefore the ruin of the Anti-Christ precedes the millennial kingdom. Resp. It is better to understand εἰσι, are, than ἦσαν, were, because the devil and the beast are joined in punishment. Most conveniently, however, the verb ἐβλήθη is repeated. For which reason the Apostle's words do not necessarily infer a preceding casting of the Anti-Christ into hell, but they note a simultaneous public condemnation, so that at the same time that the devil was cast into hell by Christ the judge, the Anti-Christ was also cast into that abyss. Mention was indeed made in chapter 19 of the casting of the beast, or Anti-Christ, into hell, but it is repeated in this chapter, and is joined with the punishment of the devil, to indicate that the devil and the Anti-Christ will be publicly condemned by Christ the judge at one and the same time on the last day.

III. As long as tares exist in the field of the church, so long will the Anti-Christ endure. But the tares will exist in the field of the church until the harvest, or until the consummation of the age. Therefore. The major is established; because the Anti-Christ is the most pernicious of tares, he is ὁ τὸ πονηρὲ, the son of that evil one. The minor is clear from Matth. 13:30, 39.

IV. The genuinely orthodox Theologians agree with us. D. LUTHER says, on Ps. 110, Jena ed. tom. I. "Only the last day shall destroy the Papacy." D. GERHARD, in Anti-Chiliasmo p. 304. "The ἀνάλωσις and κατάργησις of the Anti-Christ are distinguished by reason of time and instrument; For the Apostle predicts the former will be by the spirit of Christ's mouth before the last day, but the latter by the brightness of Christ's glorious advent on the day of judgment." D. CALOVIUS, in his illustrated bible on Revelation, fol. 1911. "No century thus far has been without heresy, nor will it be, since the Anti-Christ, the worst of heretics, is to endure until the end of the world." D. CLUVERUS, Commentary on Revelation, p. 314. "That the Anti-Christ and his false prophet are apprehended alive and taken to punishment is a sufficiently clear indication that the tyranny of the Pontiff will not perish at all, until the Lord himself destroys it by the glorious illustration of his advent, as Paul speaks, 2 Thess. 2:8, and John agrees; because the appearance and illustration of the Lord's advent is always taken to mean his final advent." D. KROMAYER, Commentary on Revelation, p. 433. "Kingdoms have defected from obedience to the Roman see, and more will defect, until the Son of God by his final advent utterly abolishes τὸν ἄνομον (the lawless one)." D. DANNHAVER, in Anti-Christosophis p. 253. "The terminus of the duration of the Anti-Christ reaches the last judgment."

You say: D. DANNHAVER writes, in Anti-Christosoph. p. 421. "It is nothing strange or singular if the Roman synagogue perishes on the last day, on which the whole world will be reduced to nothing." Resp. The most consummate Theologian speaks there precisely of the city of Rome and its demise, not of the destruction of the entire Anti-Christian kingdom.

Solution

Those on the opposite side object; I. The Apostle John saw the casting of the Anti-Christ into the lake of fire before, in Rev. 19, the blessed millennium in which Satan was bound, Rev. 20. Therefore, the Anti-Christ will perish before the millennial kingdom is established. Resp. I distinguish between the order of the visions and of the event. It is common for prophets not always to narrate in a later place what happens at a later time. Isaiah in chap. 7:14 and chap. 9:6 deals with the birth of Christ, and in chap. 45:1 finally deals with Cyrus, who preceded the birth of Christ by a long interval of time.

II. Long before the blessed millennium arose, an angel from heaven with a mighty power and voice cried out: "Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird," Rev. 18:2. Therefore, the ruin of the Anti-Christ precedes the blessed millennium. Resp. 1) By Babylon the great is denoted Rome, because of a similar tyranny and a similar end. Some interpreters wish the corporal destruction of the city of Rome to be indicated. HUGO GROTIUS says: "That angel announces the consequences, the burning of Rome (of which Rev. 17:16 speaks), with a certain explanation of what was said before. Just as the devastation of ancient Babylon is predicted not once, but often by Isaiah and Jeremiah." 2) Others wish a spiritual understanding of the ruin of Babylon, or the Anti-Christian kingdom, and that not total, but partial, which there is no doubt precedes the final advent of Christ to solemn judgment. Let us hear our CALOVIUS commenting thus on this passage: "Babylon has fallen, with respect to the public manifestation of its ruin, and the fall of its authority with Frederick II, the Emperor, who declared that many Anti-Christes were in the Romans. It fell with Philip, king of the Gauls, who wrote to Boniface VIII in this manner: 'Philip, by the grace of God, king of the Gauls, to Boniface, acting as supreme pontiff, little or no greeting! Let your greatest foolishness know, that in temporal matters we are subject to no one, that the collation of churches and prebends pertains to us by royal right etc., and we consider those who believe otherwise to be fools and simpletons.' It fell with Louis IV, the Emperor, who publicly declared the Roman Pontiff to be the Anti-Christ. It fell with the eastern churches, which responded thus to the Roman Pontiff demanding obedience: 'We firmly believe your supreme power over your subjects, we cannot tolerate your supreme pride, we are unable to satisfy your supreme avarice, the devil be with you, because the Lord is with us.' What's more? Even today the Greek church, on the Sunday of Lent, publicly excommunicates the Roman Pontiff as a heretic every year. It fell, attacked, shattered, and diminished by the spiritual arms of the Blessed MARTIN LUTHER, that most valiant champion of Christ, so that very many churches detest the Anti-Christian doctrine of the Roman Pontiff."

III. The kingdom is given to the holy people of God after the Anti-Christ has been condemned, Dan. 7:26. Therefore, the millennial kingdom of Christ precedes the ruin of the Roman Pontiff. Resp. The passage cited does not deal 1) with the millennial kingdom, but with the kingdom of glory. For it is called eternal, Dan. 7:27, which the Chiliastic kingdom is not. 2) Not with the western Anti-Christ, but with the eastern one, whom St. John teaches will survive after the blessed millennium, Rev. 20:8.

ON THE CONSUMMATION OF THE WORLD

Question XVIII. What is the consummation of the world?

Definition of the consummation of the world. The consummation of the world is an action of the triune God, by which he will destroy and annihilate by fire the whole machine of heaven and earth, and all created things, intelligent creatures excepted, for the glory of his truth, power, and justice, and for the liberation of elect men.

Obs. I. By world here is denoted the structure of heaven and earth, and of all created things, with only creatures endowed with intellect, namely angels and men, excepted.

Obs. II. The consummation of the world is otherwise called the consummation of the age, Matth. 28:20: "Behold, I am with you always, even unto the consummation of the age," where αἰών, age, by metonymy of the adjunct for the subject, denotes the world (*). Indeed, with the world destroyed, time will end together with it. It is also called the conflagration of the world, from 2 Pet. 3:10, and the end of all things, 1 Pet. 4:7.

Question XIX. Does the conflagration of the world precede the ecumenical judgment?

The conflagration of the world does not precede the universal last judgment, but follows it.

(*) But sometimes this manner of speaking, συντέλεια τῶν αἰώνων (synteleia ton aionon / consummation of the ages), denotes the consummation of various ages of the old testament, as Hebr. IX, 26.

Prob. 1) Because the heavenly judge will come in the clouds, Matth. 24:30. 2) Because, after the sentence has been pronounced, the pious will be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, 1 Thess. 4:17.

Question XX. Is the consummation of this world certainly to happen?

Certitude. The consummation of this universe is certainly to happen.

Prob. 1) From the O.T., and indeed from Is. 51:6. "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment." See also Ps. 102:26, 27. 2) From the N.T. "Heaven and earth shall pass away (παρελεύσονται)," Matth. 24:35. Just as the word of God will endure as to its effect, so heaven and earth will pass away and lose all their efficacy.

The antithesis is of some Philosophers, Jews, and Empaectae, who maintain that the world is eternal. Who object:

I. Whatever is the dwelling place of God and the footstool of his feet will never perish (otherwise God would not have a dwelling place); But heaven and earth are etc; Therefore. The minor is established from Is. 66:1. Resp. Heaven and earth are indeed called the dwelling place of God and the footstool of his feet after they were created, because in them he manifests his presence; otherwise God, an independent and infinite Spirit, needs neither a dwelling place nor a footstool, since he dwells most sweetly in himself.

II. God promised that seedtime and harvest, summer and cold will never perish, Gen. 8:22. If seed and harvest, cold and summer will never cease, the world will never perish. Resp. The vicissitudes of seedtime and harvest, of cold and summer, will not cease as long as the earth stands; but with this destroyed, those mobile changes of things will cease.

III. If the hills will endure forever, the world will also endure forever; But the hills will endure forever, as Moses testifies, Deut. 33:15. Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between a periodic עולם and an absolute one. Sometimes it denotes a long time, not an eternity devoid of end.

IV. The world has stood invariable for the course of so many centuries; Therefore, it will never perish. Resp. Just as the world has stood unchanged for the course of so many centuries by the will of the Creator, so also by the will of the Creator it will perish.

Question XXI. Who will destroy the world?

Destructor. The triune God will dissolve the structure of heaven and earth.

Prob. 1) The consummation of the world is an action ad extra, and therefore common to the entire Holy Trinity. 2) From Ps. 102:26, 27. "O my God, of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure;" and "all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed."

*) But sometimes this manner of speaking, συντέλεια τῶν αἰώνων, denotes the consummation of the various ages of the old testament, as in Hebr. 9:26.

Question XXII. By what means will God destroy the world?

Medium. God will destroy the world by a true and proper fire a), but whose force and nature is investigable by no mortal b).

Prob. a, From 2 Peter 3:12. "The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat." A fire that is kindled so that the elements are not only burned by it, but also melted, must be a true fire.

Prob. b. The properties and powers of that fire, which will consume the whole machine of heaven and earth, escape the keenness of human intellect. For that fire cannot be elemental, which will annihilate all things, and consume itself.

Question XXIII. In what does the consummation of the world formally consist?

Form of the consummation of the world. The consummation of the world formally consists not in the change or alteration of the qualities of this world, but in the total abolition, or annihilation, of the substance of the world.

Prob. 1) Heaven and earth will so perish that they will be no more, Rev. 21:1. Therefore, they will be utterly annihilated. For whatever is changed only according to its qualities, still remains. 2) From 2 Peter 3:12. "The elements shall melt with fervent heat." From which I infer; Whatever composite consists of elements in such a way that it cannot exist without the elements, that thing, with the elements abolished, will be reduced to nothing; But the world, etc; Therefore. 3) From Rev. 20:11. "From his face, who sat on the throne, the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them." Of whichever natural body no place is given, that, as to its substance, is not present; But of the perishing heaven and earth no place is any longer given. Therefore. 4) From Ps. 102:26, 27. "The heavens shall perish, but thou shalt endure." In the manner that God endures, in that manner heaven and earth do not endure; But God endures according to substance; Therefore, heaven and earth do not endure according to substance.

The antithesis is of certain Fathers and Scholastics, according to whose opinion the world will be changed as to its qualities, so that it may be advanced to a better state, but its substance will not be annihilated. Who object;

I. The world will stand forever, Ps. 104:5. Therefore, it will not be annihilated. Resp. Here עולם denotes a long-lasting time.

II. The fashion (schema) of the world passes away, 1 Cor. 7:31. Therefore, not the world itself. The reason for the consequence is; because σχῆμα is only the external figure. Resp. In this passage, by σχῆμα is understood not the external figure of the world, but the external splendor of worldly things, such as is seen in food, drink, clothing, company, and buildings, which will not be changed for the better, but will utterly pass away like a little cloud.

III. Whatever is changed like a garment, its substance does not perish; But the world, etc. Ps. 102:26. Therefore. The major is clear; because a garment is changed so that the inner side becomes the outer. Resp. The words of David are these; "All of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them." A garment growing old is finally worn out, so that it is nowhere to be seen.

IV. Whatever is renewed, is not annihilated; But the world, etc; Therefore. The minor is proved from Ps. 104:30. "Thou sendest forth thy Spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth." Resp. The Psalmist speaks of the annual renewal, which happens especially in the spring time, not of the renewal which will happen at the end of the age.

Question XXIV. What is the end of the conflagration of the world?

Its end. The primary end of the conflagration of the world is the glory of God a). The secondary end is the liberation of the pious b).

Prob. a. The annihilation of the world testifies to the power of God, just as creation does, and the conflagration of created things is a manifestation of divine justice and wrath against sins. See Deut. 4:24.

Prob. b. From Luke 21:28. "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." The consummation of this universe is for the pious the consummation of all temporal calamity.

SUSPIRIUM

Appear before Your tribunal, O most JUST GOD, with serious sorrow and fear. I fear that I have offended You, most HOLY GOD, with my sins! I grieve that I have violated your law, having obeyed the desires of the flesh! If you should wish to rigidly call to account all and each of my thoughts, words, and deeds, I, a wretch, have perished, nor is any hope of salvation left for me. But I flee as a suppliant from the tribunal of justice to the throne of grace. Spare, O divine clemency, a man confessing his crimes! O mercy, look upon me, a wretch! O JESUS, heavenly judge, be propitious to me in the hour of judgment! Remember your most ardent love for me! Remember your blood shed for me!

In view of which, absolve me from my sins, and grant that on the last day I may hear that joyful sentence: "Come, you blessed!"

PART IV OF THEOLOGY.

CHAPTER I. ON THE CHURCH.

Question I. Do wayfaring men who are to attain eternal salvation coalesce into one body?

WAYFARING MEN, USING the ordinary means of salvation, by the gratuitous favor of God, on account of the merit of Christ, are gathered by the Holy Spirit into one sacred assembly, or mystical body, which is called the synthetic church, which the sure reason of method requires that we now finally consider.

Prob. The law of an accurate method demands, 1) that in dogmatic theology, men to be saved be treated of singly first, before they are considered collectively, because the collection presupposes the single individuals; 2) We have thus far considered general theological dogmas, in which both the common corruption of fallen men and the universal principles and means of salvation are explained. Now we descend to special dogmas, in which the particular duties of the ministers of the church and hearers, of the magistrate and subjects, of husbands and wives, of masters and servants are expounded. Whence some authors divide theology, just as other practical disciplines, into a common and a proper part. In the common part, all men indifferently are taught the means of obtaining salvation; In the proper part, which has the character of sacred polity, the church and the hierarchical states are treated. Confer. D. HILDEBRAND. in theol. dogmat. p. 25.

Obs. I. Church is a word of Greek origin, and descends ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐκκαλεῖν, from "to call out," so that it is a certain kind of "calling out," or an assembly of those called out from the promiscuous multitude of men. For which reason the name church denotes both a separation, by virtue of the particle, ἐκ, with respect to the starting point, and a collection, by virtue of the verb, καλεῖν, with respect to the destination point. The name church owes its origins to the Athenians, among whom ἡ ἐκκλησία was an assembly of citizens, selected and called out from the rest of the populace by the voice of a herald, for the sake of the republic, to hear the opinion of the senate; this is the most ancient meaning of the name church. From which the sacred writers transferred it to the assembly of men who, selected by the voice of the heralds of the divine word to hear the sentence of God concerning obtaining salvation through Christ, have been called out from the profane crowd of impious men. Therefore, the starting point of the church is both the rabble of impious men and the state of sin and wrath; the destination point is the kingdom of God and the state of grace.

Obs. II. The word church is ambiguous. 1) Church generally denotes any convened assembly. See Ps. 26:4, 5. Acts 19:32, 39. Specially it denotes the congregation of the faithful, who are convened for the cause of religion, and to differentiate it from a profane assembly it is usually called the church of God, Acts 20:28, the church of Christ, Matth. 16:18, the church of the saints, 1 Cor. 14:33. 2) Some ecclesiastical writers and Canonists designate by the name church the place of sacred gatherings, or the temple, just as the Germans use the word Kirche (as if, house of the Lord, κυριακή) for the place of sacred gatherings. But in the sacred letters this signification of church for a place of congregation does not occur. Whence ISIDORE of PELUSIUM, book II, epist. 246, says: ἄλλο ἐστὶν ἐκκλησία καὶ ἄλλο ἐκκλησίας ἡριον, "a church is one thing, and a church building is another." The saying of Paul is indeed objected, 1 Cor. 11:18, "When you come together in the church," i.e., in the temple. Resp. Church in that place denotes not the building, but the congregation of the people. For at that time Christians did not have public temples.

Question II. Why is the church called synthetic?

The synthetic church is the church taken collectively, consisting of teachers and hearers, joined by the bond of the same faith a), and it is called the synthetic church, to differentiate it from the representative church, which is an assembly of teachers, solemnly gathered to decide questions about the doctrine of faith and Christian morals b).

Prob. a. The synthetic church is so called ἀπὸ τῆς συνθέσεως, from the collection or composition of all the living members of the church, which make one mystical body, which does not consist of mere eyes, or doctors, but also of hands and feet, or hearers.

Prob. b. The word church in the sacred code is sometimes taken by a synecdoche of the whole for the part, for the assembly of doctors and legates of the church, who represent the synthetic church, and whatever they do in a public name by granted power, that is held as ratified by the other members of the church, and is esteemed to be done or to have been done by all. Thus the word church is taken in Matth. 18:17, where Christ says: "Tell it to the church," understanding the representative assembly of each synthetic church in a council, synod, or consistory. From which, however, the Papists cannot infer that one individual, e.g., the Roman Pontiff, can represent the church, since the name church is collective, and a collection is of many.

Obs. The word church, properly and exquisitely taken, denotes the assembly of the truly believing and saints. But when the signification of the word church is restricted to the assembly of doctors, that restriction is made by a synecdoche of the whole for the part; on the contrary, when the signification of the word church is so amplified that it denotes the promiscuous assembly of the called, consisting of the truly believing and intermingled hypocrites, that amplification is made by a synecdoche of the part for the whole, by which what properly belongs to the better part is attributed to the whole aggregate, e.g., a heap consisting of grains of wheat and intermingled chaff, in popular speech is called a heap of wheat, a denomination by synecdoche, taken from the better part.

Question III. In how many ways is the term "synthetic church" understood?

The synthetic church is understood in two ways: a) κυρίως, strictly, properly, and precisely, for the assembly of men who are truly believing and saints, joined to Christ, their head, by faith, and constituting one mystical and living body: b) παχυλῶς, broadly and improperly, and by synecdoche for the assembly of the called, aggregated from the truly believing and saints, and intermingled hypocrites and evil men, yet professing the same faith.

Obs. I. Other authors teach that the word church is taken in two ways: a) for the assembly of τῶν κλητῶν, the called, who profess the same doctrine of faith and use the sacraments instituted by Christ; b) for the assembly of τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν, the elect, who believe in Christ with true faith. For the elect, the Augsburg Confession, article VIII, substitutes the truly believing and saints; because besides the elect, others, not elected to eternal life, are living members of the church, namely the πρόσκαιροι, who truly believe in Christ, and are truly saints, and therefore genuine members of the church in that state, although they are not elected to glory. Some therefore distinguish between those elected to grace and those to glory. By those elected to grace they understand all the reborn, who either believe for a time only, or persevere in faith until the end of life. We, on account of the ambiguity of the word election, call the church strictly, properly, and principally spoken of, with the Aug. Conf., the assembly of men who are truly believing and saints, or the assembly of the reborn.

Obs. II. The assembly of the reborn is called invisible by reason of its internal form (which is founded on justifying faith, by which the members are joined to Christ the head); but the promiscuous assembly of the called is visible by reason of its external form (which consists in the public society of the profession of the same faith).

Prob. a. That the church κυρίως, strictly, properly, and exquisitely spoken of, is the assembly of the truly believing and saints, is proven; 1) Because it is expressly called the church of the saints, 1 Cor. 14:33, a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, 1 Pet. 2:9. In the apostles' creed it is called the communion of saints; likewise one holy, catholic church, which epithets and honorable encomia primarily, in themselves, and properly befit the church precisely taken, for the congregation of the truly believing and saints. 2) The church is a pure virgin and the bride of Christ, 2 Cor. 11:2. Espoused to Christ by faith, Hos. 2:20. Wherefore a man, devoid of faith, is not a true part of the church. She is also called the mother of the sons of God, Gal. 4:26. But we are the sons of God by faith in Christ Jesus, Gal. 3:26. Therefore the church is the mother of the faithful, not of hypocrites, not of the impious, not of heretics; she is the mother of the living, not of the dead. 3) Eph. 4:16 describes the church as a spiritual body, which entirely, according to all its joints (by which it is joined together and constituted in the rationale of one body) depends on Christ as on the head, i.e., by an influx, such as flows from the head into the members, that from this they may receive a growth suitable for the body, and this through charity. Whence it is inferred that all those and only those are true members of the church properly spoken of, who live by the supernatural grace and influx of Christ the head, and of his Spirit, and therefore possess true faith, joined with charity. 4) The church is the spiritual kingdom of God, which is within us, Luke 17:21, it is the kingdom of Christ, which is not of this world, John 18:36. Therefore the church is a kingdom distinct from the kingdom of the devil. It is certain, however, that the impious are in the power of the devil, and are members of the kingdom of the devil, as Paul teaches, Eph. 2:2, when he says: the devil is effective in the unbelieving. Wherefore since the church is truly the kingdom of Christ, it is properly the congregation of saints. For the impious are ruled by the devil, and are captives of the devil, they are not ruled by the spirit of Christ. Conf. Apol. Aug. Conf. pag. 147.

Prob. b. Broadly, improperly, and less exquisitely the church is called the promiscuous assembly of the called, aggregated from the truly believing and saints, and intermingled hypocrites and evil men, yet professing the same faith, who constitute one body of Christ and one church in the same way that a heap of wheat and intermingled chaff are said to constitute one heap of wheat, by a denomination of synecdoche derived from the better part. For in this broader sense, the church is compared by John the Baptist to a threshing floor, containing both chaff and wheat, Matth. 3:12 *).<sup>341</sup>

Question IV. What is the church strictly and properly speaking?

Definition of the church strictly and properly speaking. The church, strictly, properly, and exquisitely spoken of, is the assembly of the truly believing and saints, whom God, moved by mercy, in view of the merit of Christ, has called out by the ministry of the divine word from the impious rabble of the world and the state of sin to his kingdom and the state of grace, has regenerated, justified, and ingrafted into Christ the redeemer, and sanctifies and preserves them together with other reborn, for the mutual edification and salvation of the whole body and of the individual members.

Obs. I. The church, κυρίως and properly spoken of, can, according to the received allegory, be described as being a mystical, or spiritual body, aggregated and united in

(*) In the same way Christ himself used one and another comparison, Matth. 13:41 & 47.

Christ, as the head, through faith, from the truly believing and saints, from which, imparting an influx through the ministry of the word and sacraments, it draws life, sense, and motion, and with new members being subsequently born, it receives a growth suitable to itself, for its own preservation and salvation.

Obs. II. We have described the church according to the proper and principal signification of the word, church, following the counsel of PHILIP MELANCHTHON, which he gave in the Apol. Aug. Conf. p. 146. "Although hypocrites and evil men are associates of this true church, according to the external rites; yet when the church is defined, it is necessary to define it as that which is the living body of Christ, likewise that which is the church in name and in reality. And there are many reasons. For it is necessary to understand what thing principally makes us living members of the church. If we define the church only as an external polity of good and evil men, men will not understand that the kingdom of Christ is the righteousness of the heart, and the gift of the Holy Spirit, but they will judge it to be only an external observation of certain cults and rites."

Question V. How is the church strictly and properly speaking divided?

Division of the church strictly and properly speaking. The church, strictly and properly spoken of, is divided into the militant and the triumphant. The former is that in which reborn men, under the leadership and, as it were, the banner of Christ, constituted against Satan, the world, and carnal concupiscence, fight in this life a). The latter is that in which the blessed, their military service completed, and having gained victory over their enemies, rejoice and triumph with Christ in eternal life b).

Prob. a. The church militant is so called from the spiritual warfare, or fight against the devil, the world, and the flesh; of which fight against Satan, Eph. 6:11, 1 Pet. 5:8, 9, against the world, 1 John 5:4, against the flesh, Rom. 7:14, Gal. 5:17, it is treated.

Prob. b. The church triumphant has obtained its name from the spiritual triumph, or victory won over its enemies, about which see Rev. 2:10, chap. 4:4, 6:2.

Obs. The church militant and triumphant differ, because in the former live wayfarers, in the latter the blessed; the former have a right to the thing, the latter a right in the thing; yet of both there is a sweet communion in the same right under one and the same head, Christ, Ephes. 1:22, Hebr. 12:23. The Papists add the church laboring in purgatory, but without solid foundation.

Question VI. What is the twofold nature of the church militant?

The church militant and its division. The church militant is divided into the church of the old and the new testament. The former was enclosed within the narrow limits of Judea, and whoever wished to learn the true worship of God and the way of obtaining eternal salvation before Christ was born, it was necessary for them to approach and be joined to the Israelite people a); the latter is gathered to Christ from all languages and nations, with the voice of the gospel sounding everywhere. The former was not to last forever, but was to be terminated by the advent of Christ; the latter is to last as long as the machine of the world shall stand (*). The former is called Israelite, the latter Christian. The former is more frequently called a synagogue, the latter more often a church b).

Prob. a. The assembly of the faithful before Christ was born is called ἐκκλησία Ἰσραήλ, Sirach 24:15. Moses was ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ, as Stephen testifies, Acts 7:38. That this Israelite church was restricted to the Jewish people, Moses teaches, Deut. 4:8.

Prob. b. Although the congregation of the faithful Israelites, made for the cause of religion, more frequently comes under the name συναγωγῆς among the LXX interpreters and in the N.T., this however is not perpetual. For St. James in his epistle 2:2 used the name synagogue for the assembly of

(*) This is the reason; because the church of the O.T. professed Christ who was to come, inasmuch as he was to come, signified by prophecies both literal and typical, the expectation of which was temporary, until his very advent; the church of the N.T. professes Christ, manifested and consummated in the flesh, inasmuch as he is such, which consummation of his is perpetual. Nor indeed is there any other difference between the two churches than this, as is apparent from those things which we have discussed concerning the distinction of the two testaments.

Christians, saying: "If there come unto your assembly (ἐκ συναγωγῆν ὑμῶν)." Conf. Hebr. 10:25.

Question VII. How is the militant synthetic church of the old and new testament subdivided?

The militant synthetic church of both testaments is distinguished into universal and particular. The universal church is either absolutely or respectively universal. The absolutely universal church is the assembly consisting of the faithful of all places and times, whom God has called to the actual communion of spiritual goods, from the beginning of the world, through the preaching of his word, and still calls today, and will call until the consummation of the age a). The relatively and respectively universal church is the assembly of all the faithful at the same time, anywhere on earth, persisting in one and the same internal communion of faith and charity b). The particular church is the assembly not of all, but of certain faithful in a certain place called to partake of salvation, and persisting in internal spiritual communion c).

Prob. a. The absolutely universal church is universal both by reason of place and by reason of time, and is described by D. HULSEMANN in his breviar. c. 17. q. 9. as being the church taken collectively, consisting of the university of the faithful, both doctors and hearers, of the present, future, and past time. For the church of the old and new testament has one head, Christ. From thence, "through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we believe to be saved, even as our fathers" of the old testament, Acts 15:11.

Prob. b. The apostolic church was universal in a certain respect and by reason of places, because "their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world," Rom. 10:18. And today the assembly of all men truly believing in Christ and of the saints is universal in a certain respect and relatively.

Prob. c. The church of Christ, diffused throughout the globe of the earth, contains several particular assemblies, which themselves claim the name and definition of the church. Whence in the plural number they are called churches, Acts 15:41, 1 Cor. 16:19. There are therefore several particular churches distinct among themselves. And even in the singular number, a certain particular church is spoken of with some restriction added, e.g., "the church which is at Jerusalem," Acts 8:1, "the church of God which is at Corinth," 1 Cor. 1:2, "the church of the Thessalonians," 1 Thess. 1:1.

Question VIII. How is the particular church divided?

The particular church is divided into composite and simple. The former is that which consists of other churches; the latter is that which is not composed of other churches.

Obs. A certain particular church is called simple, not absolutely, that it is devoid of all composition (for thus it would not be a church, since it is formally an assembly of a plurality of faithful men); but in a certain respect, and in a certain genus; because it does not consist of a plurality of smaller churches.

Prob. A composite particular church is distinguished 1) by reason of secular government. Thus, since formerly the supreme empire was divided into eastern and western, the church itself was also bipartite into eastern and western, or what comes to the same thing, into Greek and Latin. 2) By reason of ecclesiastical government. Thus there is one church which is constituted under one ecclesiastical government; several, whose government is diverse, or as they say today, whose consistories are diverse. Formerly in the ancient church a Bishop resided in the major city of a province, who had inspection over the surrounding churches, and this was a diocesan church. The Bishop, who presided over the sacred rites in the metropolis of the province, called the Metropolitan, cared for the churches of the whole province, and had the bishops themselves committed to his inspection and faith, and this church was provincial, just as there is a Saxon church, a Pomeranian church, etc. 3) By reason of nation. Thus formerly there was an Asiatic church, another African, etc. Today there is a German one, another Swedish, another Danish, etc. 4) By reason of the unity of doctrine, which churches otherwise distinct profess. A simple church does not consist of other smaller churches; such as was the Paradisiacal, the Noachic, etc. Today all smaller churches, which are not composed of others, are simple, to which are also to be referred domestic churches.

Question IX. Is the church rightly divided into visible and invisible?

The church of Christ, which is on earth, taken strictly and properly for the assembly of the truly believing and saints, diffused far and wide throughout the globe of the earth, is not distinctly visible and conspicuous a), but only confusedly so b). But taken broadly and improperly for the promiscuous assembly of the called, it is so visible that it can be recognized as true and distinctly as to its members, and can be discerned from other false or corrupt churches c). It can happen, however, by God's permission, that the true church is in no part of it visible, when a conspicuous and illustrious assembly of men publicly professing the true doctrine is lacking, and heretics and schismatics are predominant everywhere d).

Obs. I. We do not assert that the visible and invisible church are two specifically different or contrarily opposed churches; but we say that one and the same church is visible and invisible in different respects: visible, with respect to the called, invisible, with respect to the reborn and elect; visible, with respect to its flourishing and free state, invisible, with respect to its oppressed and corrupt state; which different modes of consideration and respects neither constitute different species, nor infer a contrary or contradictory opposition; because the invisible assembly of the reborn is contained under the visible assembly of the called, and lies hidden in time of persecution.

Obs. II. Visible here is the same as that which is subject to our sensual and intellectual cognition, or that which is obvious to the eyes of the body and mind. But since our cognition is twofold, either confused or distinct, the church can also be denominated visible, or knowable, either in order to our confused, or in order to our distinct, notice of it. Wherefore the question can be understood in a twofold sense. One: whether the church of Christ is invisible, or knowable confusedly? The other: whether it is visible, or knowable by us distinctly?

Obs. III. A distinction is made between the external and internal form of the church. The former consists in the harmony, or public society of the same doctrine of faith; the latter consists in the union of called men, and in spiritual communion with Christ through faith. By reason of its internal form the church is invisible; but by reason of its external form the same is visible.

Obs. IV. The members of the church are considered either materially or formally. Materially considered, the members of the church are called men, professing the heavenly doctrine, and using the sacraments, who are certainly visible. Formally considered, the members of the church are reborn, holy, and elect men; these, by reason of faith, internal sanctity, and election, are invisible.

Obs. V. A distinction is made between the free and flourishing state of the church, and its corrupt and oppressed state. The flourishing and free state of the church is when no impediment is placed in the way of the public ministry of the word and the exercise of true religion. The corrupt and oppressed state, however, varies, according to the different degrees of oppression and corruption. For sometimes heretics are eminent and predominant, and the true church is so oppressed by tyrants that a conspicuous assembly of those who externally profess the true heavenly doctrine is scarcely to be found.

Obs. VI. The church is called invisible, partly negatively, partly comparatively. Negatively invisible the church is called by reason of its internal form, i.e., by reason of the spiritual union with Christ through faith. Comparatively invisible it is called, by reason of external splendor; which, as the flourishing church has in the public ministry of the word and external profession of faith, so the oppressed church loses in a corrupt state, where with heretics and schismatics prevailing, the church is so oppressed that there is not a conspicuous, illustrious assembly, and one that strikes human eyes, of those who externally profess the true heavenly doctrine, but the true doctrine and its confessors lie hidden, being oppressed.

Prob. a. 1) From the clear sayings of scripture: "God alone knows the hearts of men," 1 Kings 8:39, and "those who are his," 2 Tim. 2:19, and Christ alone, the supreme pastor, infallibly knows his own sheep, John 10:14. Therefore we do not distinctly know holy hearts, elect men, and faithful souls. 2) From the apostles' creed, in which we profess: "I believe in the church." Whence we argue: Whatever we believe, that we do not see; But the church, etc. Therefore. The major is established from Hebr. 11:1. 3) From the internal form of the church, which is the internal union with the head, Christ, through faith. But no one sees that, because he is not a knower of hearts (καρδιογνώστης). We conclude: That whose essential form is invisible, is itself indivisible by reason of its essential form; But the essential form of the church is invisible. Therefore. 4) Just as Judas, the betrayer of Christ, was visible materially, as to his being a man, but not formally, as to his being a betrayer (for the disciples were asking, "Lord, who is it?" John 13:25); So believers are seen materially, as to their human existence and presence, but formally, as to the faith fixed in their hearts, they cannot be infallibly known and discerned from hypocrites.

Prob. b. The church of Christ, which is on earth, taken properly and principally for the assembly of the reborn and elect, can be said to be conspicuous and visible only confusedly. For wherever there are congregations in which the word of God is taught and the sacraments are administered, there we infer from the divine promises that there are some truly believing and saints who constitute a part of the church, Is. 55:10, Matth. 13:8, although who those truly believing and saints are, we cannot certainly and distinctly know. For from the certainty of the coexistence of the faithful with the unfaithful in some assembly, the consequence to the discretion of individual faithful from the unfaithful is not valid.

Prob. c. The church is visible, taken more broadly for the promiscuous assembly of the called, both by reason of the men externally professing the internal and incorrupt catholic faith, and by reason of the means through which the church is gathered on this earth; As also with respect to the external exercises of religion, which are the profession of doctrine, the use of sacraments and ecclesiastical discipline, the preaching of the word and the administration of the sacraments, as well as the other external exercises of religion, which strike the eyes and ears. With respect to these, therefore, the church is visible.

Prob. d. It can happen that everywhere, with doctors professing false doctrines being eminent and prevailing, the true church lies hidden, oppressed and as if covered with clouds, and is therefore comparatively invisible and inconspicuous. For 1) Elijah, a most sharp-sighted Prophet, instructed with the greatest divine gifts, could not see the oppressed church, 1 Kings 19:14. Therefore the oppressed church, and deprived of external splendor, which consists in the public exercise of true religion, is comparatively invisible. 2) Whatever church lies hidden in deserts, mountains, dens, and caves of the earth, is comparatively invisible; But the oppressed church, etc. Hebr. 11:38. Therefore. 3) At the time of the passion and resurrection of Christ, the Christian church was invisible. For the apostles, fearing the violence and threats of the Jews, fled from the sight of men, John 20:19.

The antithesis is a) of the Papists, who maintain that there is no invisible church. b) of the Weigelians, who deny that there is a true visible church. The Papists object:

I. Whatever opinion involves a contradiction, is to be rejected; But the opinion of the Lutherans about the visible and invisible church, etc. Therefore. The minor is evident; because it involves a contradiction, to be at the same time visible and invisible. Resp. I distinguish between a true contradiction and an apparent one. The contradiction which is objected to us by our adversaries is only apparent, because it is not in the same respect. For the flourishing church, according to its external form, is visible, according to its internal form the same is invisible.

II. Whatever church is one, cannot be twofold; Visible and invisible. The church of Christ is one. Therefore. Resp. The church is essentially one; but according to a different mode of consideration, it is distinguished into visible and invisible; Which different modes of consideration, or respects, do not constitute different species.

III. An assembly of men can be seen; The church is an assembly of men; Therefore. Resp. The church is an assembly of faithful men, who can be seen materially, as men, not formally, inasmuch as they are faithful; just as Judas the betrayer of Christ was visible to the apostles as a man, but invisible as a betrayer.

IV. A city set on a hill cannot be hidden; The church of Christ is a city set on a hill, Matth. 5:14. Therefore. Resp. The passage does not deal with the church, but with the apostolic office, and it is taught that the apostles, by reason of the office which they discharge, ought not to lie hidden, just as a city set on a hill cannot lie hidden; since they ought to preach the gospel with the greatest freedom. Besides, it can happen that a city, covered either by a dense fog or the darkness of night, is not seen.

V. Whatever is placed in the sun, is absolutely visible; But the church, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from Ps. 19:4. "In the sun," i.e., in a conspicuous place, "hath he set his tabernacle," i.e., his church. Which words AUGUSTINE thus explains: "He has placed his church in the open, so that just as salt cannot be hidden at all, so neither can the church be hidden." Resp. 1) The sun is most visible; yet it can also be said to be invisible, both when due to the interposition of the moon, as happens in eclipses, and due to its recession from our horizon, as happens at nighttime. 2) In the original text the words are otherwise, namely in this manner: "For the sun he has set a tabernacle in them," to wit, the heavens. The Psalmist shows how even by the guidance of the light of nature, from creatures, and especially from the heavens and the celestial bodies, God and his glory can be known. It is said, therefore, that God has prepared a tabernacle for the sun in the heavens, i.e., a certain space, within which it completes its course, so that even from the sun the divine glory and majesty may be known naturally. Of the church and its absolute visibility the Psalmist does not treat in that place, but compares Christ, dwelling in the heaven of grace, to the sun.

VI. If the church were invisible, access to it would be open to no one; But access to the church is open to all men (because the call to the church is universal, Matth. 28:19): Therefore the church is not invisible. Resp. If the church were always oppressed, so that it was never seen; if it were invisible both by reason of its external and internal form; access to it would never be open. Thus the whole argument is indeed conceded, but it does not strike our thesis; because we maintain that the church sometimes flourishes, sometimes lies hidden oppressed; that it is seen by reason of its external form, not by reason of its internal form.

Instance I. The church which is oppressed by heresy and external persecution is certainly visible; because persecution requires a visible object, which strikes the senses of heretics and tyrants. Resp. It is one thing for tyrants to persecute the church as a visible object; another, for the persecution to become so strong that there is no conspicuous assembly of those who publicly profess the true doctrine.

Instance II. It is repugnant to divine mercy, if it permits even for a small time that the church should become invisible. For assuming such a state, a gentile will have no means of being converted; he will perish not by his own fault, but by God's; which is foreign to the mercy of God. Resp. 1) The church will never be brought into that state of invisibility by the permission and consequent will of God, so that the way of salvation is closed to the gentiles; For a gentile approaching the church, where the ministry of the word is corrupt, is regenerated by the power of the word preached and baptism administered. 2) A gentile regenerated by the ministry of the word and baptism is endowed with the spirit of discretion, and becomes a sheep of Christ. He who is endowed with the spirit of discretion can discern a prophet from a deceiver, and he who is a sheep of Christ hears the voice of Christ, not of a stranger, John 10:27. Therefore, if a gentile perishes, having once imbibed the poison of errors, he perishes not by the fault of God, who works effectively by his word, but by his own fault, inasmuch as he prefers to attend to spirits of error, rather than to follow the light of regeneration once conferred.

VII. Just as three things can be considered in a civil republic, 1) the multitude of men, 2) the external government, 3) the internal affection of the citizens, by which the citizens are united among themselves; So the same things can be considered in the church, 1) the multitude of men, 2) the external ecclesiastical government, 3) the internal faith and charity of Christians, by which they are united among themselves. The first two, both in the civil republic and in the church, are visible. The third in both is invisible. But just as the republic is absolutely visible, although the affection of the citizens is not visible; So the church is visible, although the internal faith and charity is not visible. Resp. It is not permissible to argue from the civil republic to the church, because there is a huge difference between the two. For the entire republic is an external society, placed in the conspicuous order of rulers and subjects, which therefore as a whole falls under the senses, so that its citizens are known to all, and can be pointed out with a finger. Although citizens are also accustomed to be united by an internal and mutual affection, which is not pervious to the eyes of men; that internal affection, however, is not of the formal reason of citizens, and if someone is not well affected towards his fellow citizens, he does not for this reason cease to be a citizen. But the church, taken strictly and properly, is formally and by essence an internal society of the truly believing and saints, joined to Christ the head by the bond of faith, and among themselves by the bond of charity, which in itself does not fall under the senses, but is believed by faith.

VIII. The faith of Christians is seen and known by their works, James 2:18. Therefore the Christian church, by reason of its internal form, which is founded on faith, is not invisible. Resp. The faith of Christians is indeed known to some extent by good works, but that knowledge is not certain and infallible; but uncertain, probable, and conjectural, to which falsehood can be subject; since hypocrites also perform external good works, just as the Pharisees of old seemed to be renowned for their zeal for good works (*).

Question X. What is the principal efficient cause of the church?

Efficient cause of the church. The principal efficient cause of the church is the triune God a) and b).

Prob. a. The church is the people of God, whom he has called into his marvelous light, 1 Peter 2:9, 10. God has called the human race from the state of sin and wrath into the kingdom of grace, which is the church.

Prob. b. The calling, collection, and governance of the church, since it is a divine action ad extra, is common to all three Persons of the divinity. God the Father leads the church, as a bride, to his son, and prepares the wedding for her, Matth. 22:2. The Son of God is the bridegroom, to whom the church is espoused, 2 Cor. 11:2. The Holy Spirit, through the ministry of the word and sacraments, cleanses and adorns the church as a bride for her husband, Eph. 5:27. God the Father is the architect of the church, as a spiritual house, 1 Tim. 3:15. The Son of God is the cornerstone and foundation of this house, by which it is sustained, 1 Peter 2:6, 1 Cor. 3:11. The Holy Spirit is the principal dispenser and steward, in this house through the ministers of the word unlocking and distributing the treasures, earned by the passion and death of Christ, and deposited in it, Acts 20:28, 1 Cor. 4:1. God the Father exercises a provident and truly paternal care for the church, as for his daughter, Ps. 45:13. The Son of God, in the manner of a head, graciously flows into the church, and as Lord rules it, Eph. 1:22, 23. The Holy Spirit, in the manner of a soul, moves, informs, and perfects this mystical body, Eph. 4:3, 4.

Question XI. What cause moved God to gather a church for himself?

Impulsive cause. To gather a church for himself from the human race, gratuitous favor internally moved God a), and the merit of Christ the mediator externally impelled him b). The misery of men, having lapsed into sins, offered God the occasion to commiserate c).

Prob. a. That God called the human race to his kingdom out of mere grace, Paul teaches clearly, 2 Tim. 1:9. "God has called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus." The called he also regenerated out of mercy, and endowed with faith, through which men become true members of the church. See 1 Pet. 1:3, James 1:18.

Prob. b. The merit of Christ is the external impulsive cause, which moved God to gather the church. For just as by the power and value of the merit of Christ all the gifts of grace come to us from above, according to that of Paul: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ," Eph. 1:3: So Christ by his satisfactory obedience, both active and passive, merited with God the Father, that he might gather a church for himself from all nations, and offer the benefits of the redeemer to them; for which reason Christ is said to have purchased the church with his own blood, Acts 20:28.

Prob. c. Human misery could not causally move God to gather the church, since it was contracted by man's own fault, and so unless the satisfaction and merit of Christ had intervened, God, the most just avenger of sins, would have averted himself from and condemned men who had lapsed into sins, just as he did the apostate angels. Therefore it happens not in itself, but by accident, that from the misery of man arises the commiseration of God, who from profound misery, from which man could not emerge by his own strength, took for himself the occasion of commiserating and doing good.

(*) You will perhaps wonder that the blessed Author omitted the oppositions of the Weigelians, of whom he himself had nevertheless made mention. But I think they were not omitted, but left out deliberately, since there was no need of refutation. For the whole force of all the arguments with which those fanatical men fight is placed in this, that they think abjectly of the external use of the word and sacraments. This false principle being destroyed (and it has been destroyed in other places), all the corollaries will be of no value.

Question XII. What ministers does God use in gathering the church?

Ministerial cause. In gathering the church God uses heralds of the divine word, as coworkers a), such as in the O.T. were the Patriarchs and Prophets b), in the N.T. the Apostles c), and today are all rightly called and ordained doctors and pastors d).

Prob. a. The heralds of the divine word are συνεργοί, or coworkers of God in the collection of the church; for it is theirs to plant and to water, but God gives the growth, 1 Cor. 3:6, 9. For God does not always and everywhere call men immediately, but generally mediately through his ministers, through whom also the called believe, 1 Cor. 3:5, inasmuch as by their work the gospel is applied to the hearers by the authority and mandate of Christ.

Prob. b. From Hebr. 1:1. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the Prophets."

Prob. c. Christ, being about to gather the church of the N.T., addressed the Apostles, Matth. 28:19, 20. "Go ye therefore, and teach (make disciples for me) all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." From this mandate and promise of Christ we infer: 1) The Apostles were the planters of the church; 2) Christ provided a gracious and effective influx into the planting of the Apostles; 3) The presence and influence of Christ was promised to all doctors of the church, until the end of the world.

Prob. d. From Eph. 4:11. "And Christ gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God." From this apostolic oracle we learn that the church is not a confused confluence of men (as the Areians wish), but an ordered congregation; because it is described by the Apostle as a body, consisting of distinct members, rightly coordinated and subordinated.

Question XIII. By what means does God gather the church?

Intermediate cause. God gathers a church for himself and gives it the life of faith through the word of the gospel a), and baptism b).

Prob. a. 1) From 2 Thess. 2:14. "God has called us by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." God has called us to the kingdom of grace and glory through the word of the gospel, as through the word of reconciliation, 2 Cor. 5:19. The law after the fall is the word of wrath, Rom. 4:15, and therefore is not a means of calling grace to the church. 2) By the word of the gospel the church is not only gathered, but also vivified, or given the life of faith. For the assembly of the called is regenerated not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever, 1 Peter 1:23. "In Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel," says Paul in 1 Cor. 4:15.

Prob. b. "He who is not born of water and the Spirit cannot enter into the kingdom of God," John 3:5. For disciples of Christ are made by baptism, Matth. 28:19, by which called men are regenerated and renewed, Tit. 3:5.

Question XIV. What are the parts and members of the church?

Church's matter. The constitutive parts of the church, and its true and spiritually living members, are men a) who are truly believing and holy b), as long as they are such c).

Prob. a. The true members of the church are men, not angels; because the church is the society of those whom God has purchased with his own blood, Acts 20:28. But he has purchased only men, not angels, with his blood.

Prob. b. That men who are truly believing and holy are the living and properly called members of the church, is clear: 1) because the church is the congregation of saints, a pure virgin and the bride of Christ, the mother of the sons of God, and the kingdom of God, to which men devoid of true faith and sanctity do not belong. See question III. 2) From Romans 8:9. "He who has not the Spirit of Christ is not his." Which words THOMAS Aquinas aptly explains in his commentary on chap. 8 of Romans. "Just as that is not a member of the body which is not vivified by the spirit of the body: So he is not a member of Christ who does not have the spirit of Christ." From which we argue: Whoever does not have the spirit of Christ is not a true and living member of the church;

But a hypocritical and unholy man does not have the spirit of Christ; Therefore. The major is established; because he who is not a true member of Christ the head, is also not a true member of the church, which is the mystical body of Christ. 3) Whoever does not truly believe in Christ cannot be a living member of the church; But a hypocrite does not truly believe in Christ; Therefore. The major is proved from Hab. 2:4, Gal. 3:11.

Prob. c. The truly believing and holy, inasmuch as and as long as they are such, are living members of the church. If by willful sins they cast out the Holy Spirit, from being members of Christ they become members of a harlot, 1 Cor. 6:15, nor do they remain in the vine, John 15:4 sqq., but are dead members; just as David, from being a man after God's own heart, or a true and living member, became a son of death, or a dead member, 2 Sam. 12:5, and the faithful city became a harlot, Isai. 1:21. (*).

The antithesis is of the Papists, who recognize as true members of the church all, universally, who are in its visible communion, although they may be great sinners and hidden infidels. Whose principal arguments are:

I. Whoever, just as believers, hear the word of God and use the sacraments, are true members of the church; But hypocrites and the unholy, etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because hypocrites hearing the word and using the sacraments are either in the church, or they are outside the church. They are not outside the church. Therefore they are in the church and consequently its members. Resp. The major is denied. To the proof we say, that hypocrites are in the church, but not of the church (**). For they are in the church in name, not in reality. They are in that assembly in which the church is, but they are not that assembly which is the church, because they are not united by faith with the head, Christ, although they externally profess the doctrine of Christ. They are therefore in the church as bad humors, not as true parts of the body.

Instance; Those who by an external profession of the same doctrine of faith are joined to the faithful, are true exterior parts, and therefore also members, although dry and dead, of the body of the church. Resp. Just as members, though dry and dead, are called members of a living body only equivocally, because they are not informed or ruled by the soul; so hypocrites belong to the church, not truly and univocally, by reason of spiritual conjunction with Christ, but equivocally and putatively, with respect to the external profession and society with the faithful, to whom they adhere by accident and besides the intention of Christ.

II. The church is compared to a threshing floor, in which there is wheat and chaff, Matth. 3:12; to a net, or dragnet, by which not only good fish are caught, but also rotten ones, Matth. 13:47. By which similes it is indicated that hypocrites and the unholy are mixed with the truly believing and holy in the church. Resp. Hypocrites are mixed with the truly believing, just as chaff adheres to wheat. But just as chaff, on account of this mixture, is not called a part of the wheat; so by the fact that the unholy are mixed with the church, which is the mystical body of Christ, they are not living true parts, or members of the church. And just as bad fish, although mixed with the good, are cast out; so it will be that the unbelieving will be cast out and excluded from the kingdom of God. But if they are to be excluded from the kingdom of God, it follows that they are not living members of the church.

III. All doctors and pastors are true members of the church; Some doctors and pastors are hypocrites; Therefore some hypocrites are true members of the church. The major is proved; because doctors and pastors are appointed by Christ, as Paul testifies, 1 Cor. 12:27, 28. "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers." Eph. 4:11. Who would believe that Christ appointed doctors and pastors in the church as false members? Resp. Christ appointed doctors and pastors in the church as organs, ordained for a sacred function and operation, and to this end he granted them ministering gifts: He also willed, and seriously intended, that they should be doctors who are true and living members of the church, through faith and sanctifying gifts. But when the doctors of the church allow themselves to be overcome by the flesh, so that by indulging in willful sins they cast out the Holy Spirit and extinguish faith, they are not true, living, and univocal members of the church, but putrid, dead, and equivocal ones, although they can be operative organs. Confer D. GERHARD'S catholic confession, book II, art. V, c. 1, fol. 712.

(*) Indeed, from two sacred expressions a most firm consequence is effected, when the church is called 1) the body of Christ, and 2) the kingdom of God. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, chap. IV, has set both argumentations in the light. One, p. 145, in these words: "This church alone is called the body of Christ. ... Wherefore those in whom Christ works nothing, are not members of Christ. Therefore the adversaries confess that the wicked are dead members of the church." The other, p. 147: "If the church, which is truly the kingdom of Christ, is distinguished from the kingdom of the devil; it is necessary that the impious, since they are in the kingdom of the devil, are not the church."

IV. An impious man can be a brother of the believing and holy: Therefore an impious man can be a true and living member of the church: The antecedent is proved from Matth. 18:15. "Moreover if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone." He who sins so that he must be reprov'd, is certainly an impious man; But a certain brother sins thus: Therefore a certain brother is impious, etc. The consequence is proved; because a brother of believers is a Son of God, and therefore a true member of the church. Resp. He is called impious who indulges in sins and perseveres in them. A brother of the believing and holy can be overcome by the flesh and lapse into sins, but he does not continue or persevere in sins; but rises again through penitence. For which reason he is held as a brother as long as any hope of amendment shines forth; this vanishing, he is to be cast out as a gentile outside the holy society.

V. Every baptized person is a member of the church; Some impious men are baptized; Therefore. Resp. Every baptized person is a true member of the church as long as he lives a life worthy of baptism. Since an impious man does not do this, he becomes a dead member.

VI. Whoever maintain that the true members of the church are only holy men, rush headlong into the heresy of the Donatists and Anabaptists; But the Lutherans, etc. Therefore. Resp. The Donatists and Anabaptists assert that the true members of the church are perfectly holy men, marked by no stain; we, however, acknowledge and maintain the imperfection of human holiness in the way of this life, and that a return to penitence and the state of grace is open to believers who have lapsed into mortal sins.

Question XV. Are catechumens, before receiving baptism, true members of the church?

Catechumens. Catechumens, imbued with the knowledge of the Christian religion, even before receiving baptism, are true and living members of the church.

Prob. 1) Because catechumens informed by Christian doctrine have received faith from the preaching of the gospel, Rom. 10:17, but by faith they are sons of God, and therefore also sons of the church. For of those who are spiritually regenerated, God is the Father, the church the mother, Gal. 4:26. 2) Likewise they are partakers of the goods of the church, namely the remission of sins and the renewal of the Holy Spirit. 3) The thief on the cross, the Emperor Valentinian, and the martyrs snatched away to torments before receiving baptism, were made citizens of the triumphant church. Therefore they were also citizens of the militant church.

Question XVI. Are excommunicated men members of the church?

Excommunicated. Men excommunicated for just causes are not members of the church a). But those unjustly excommunicated do not cease to be members of the catholic church, even if they are cast out of the visible and particular church b).

Proof a. 1) A man excommunicated for just causes is impenitent and lacks faith, which is the formal reason for being a member of the church. Therefore, by Christ's judgment, he is to be regarded as a gentile, Matthew 18:17, and by Paul's admonition, he is to be removed from the midst of the church, 1 Corinthians 5:13. 2) Excommunication is therefore nothing other than an expulsion from the church, similar to death, by which men are completely separated from the entire commonwealth. (*)

(*) But that separation from the established society should never be made without any hope of recovering communion. The most wicked men are not utterly excluded from the benefits of saving grace. A return to the church will always be open to them if they repent. 1 Corinthians 5:3, 4, 5, cf. 2 Corinthians 2:6, 7, 8.

Proof b. Illicit excommunication does not harm the one censured, but condemns the one excommunicating. For he who has not separated himself from it through impenitence and unbelief cannot be separated from the catholic church by the judgment of men. Christ foretold to the Apostles: "Ἀποσυναγώγους ποιήσεσιν ὑμᾶς," they will put you out of the synagogues, John 16:2. The Apostles, however, did not cease to be members of the church through the illicit excommunication of the Jews; for Christ lifted them up with the most effective comfort, saying: "Blessed are you when people hate you, and when they exclude you," Luke 6:22.

Question XVII. Are schismatics true members of the church?

Schismatics. Those who knowingly and willingly, out of mere malice against their conscience, instigated by admiration of their own virtues and by a spirit of causing trouble for others, stir up disturbances in the church, are not true members of the church a). But those who, having been unjustly excommunicated from a certain church, depart and cease to communicate with it, cannot be charged with the guilt of schism, and so they do not cease to be true members of the church b).

Observation I. By schism here is denoted a division of the church into parts, with the removal of mutual charity and peace, regarding the actual ecclesiastical communication that ought to exist between spiritual brothers and members of the household of faith (**This name, schism, is sometimes extended more broadly to denote any dissension and departure combined with contumacy, and thus it also contains heresy within its scope. The blessed man now uses this word in this most ample signification. Usually, however, schism is distinguished from heresy. The main difference between σχίσμα and αἵρεσις is that the former is a particular and contumacious opinion which is opposed to external matters and rites approved by the common consent of the church; the latter, however, is a capital error, contrary to some momentous part or parts of doctrine, and defended with an obstinate mind.

They agree, however, in this: that in both there is 1) arrogance and contumacy, 2) a departure from the right and common opinion.(**).

Observation II. Schism arises a) from a dissent in doctrine concerning the foundation of faith. For when the unity of faith is lacking due to a disparity in the external profession of faith, the actual communion of the church ceases, and the pertinacious defense of an error conflicting with the foundation of faith necessarily also entails the guilt of schism; just as in former times heretics who, having gathered a crowd of followers, established their own separate religious assemblies, were also excommunicated from the orthodox church. b) From a dissent in less necessary parts of doctrine. Such was the schism between the Roman and African churches in the time of STEPHEN, Bishop of Rome, and CYPRIAN, Bishop of Africa. For CYPRIAN maintained that heretics, and those baptized by heretics, if they wished to return to the bosom of the church, should be rebaptized; STEPHEN, on the contrary, asserted that they should be received only by the laying on of hands, see EUSEBIUS, book VI of his ecclesiastical history, ch. 1. c) From dissent in ceremonies. Thus VICTOR, Bishop of Rome, gave cause for a schism between the Roman church and the Asiatic churches, who disagreed about the day of Easter. See EUSEBIUS, book V of his ecclesiastical history, ch. 1. d) From dissent in those things which pertain to ecclesiastical government. Such a schism or dissension arose between the oriental Bishops and JULIUS, Pope of Rome; the latter affecting dominion over them, while they manfully defended their liberty. See SOZOMEN, book III, ch. XIII.

Proof a. Properly called schismatics are those who of their own accord and with deliberate intent separate themselves from the church, and by rashly exciting disturbances in it, aim at nothing else in their entire effort than to rend the unity of the church. In this class of schismatics can be counted MARCION; who indeed, according to EPIPHANIUS, heresy XLIII, is said to have declared: "Σχίσω τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ὑμῶν, καὶ βάλω σχίσμα ἐν αὐτῇ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα": I will split your church, and I will cast a schism into it forever. This kind of schismatic is by the most just right denied to be a part of the church. For it is the part of true members of the church both to be closely joined with Christ the head and to be connected by the bond of charity, Ephesians 4:16. Indeed, even from the punishment with which God once acted against this kind of schismatic, it is manifest that these schismatics are unworthy to be numbered among the members of the church. For the schism of Dathan, Korah, and Abiram was punished by the earth opening up, and their followers were consumed by fire from heaven, Numbers 16:32 ff.

(*) This name, schism, sometimes extends more widely, so that it denotes any dissension and secession joined with contumacy, and therefore also contains heresy within its scope. The blessed Man now uses this word in this most ample signification. But for the most part schism is distinguished from heresy. Between σχίσμα (schisma / schism) and αἵρεσις (hairesis / heresy) this chiefly differs, that the former indeed is some singular and contumacious opinion, which opposes external things and rites approved by common consent of the church; but the latter is a capital error, contrary to some important part or parts of doctrine, and defended with obstinate mind. Nevertheless they agree in this: that on both sides there is 1) arrogance and contumacy, 2) secession from right and common opinion.

Proof b. Those who are unjustly excommunicated because they are unwilling to accept errors obtruded as articles of faith, their conscience protesting, are not to be charged with the guilt of schism, because they do not turn away from the church out of malice, but are expelled by a greater force. Thus, the Protestants of the Augsburg Confession are not to be counted as schismatics; because they did not create a schism, but suffered it; they did not of their own accord separate themselves from the Roman church, but were cast out of it by the most unjust excommunication of the Roman Pontiffs, and by the frauds and cruelty of doctors professing false doctrine. Although, therefore, they were forced to depart from a particular church, they remain nevertheless true members of the catholic church.

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who accuse the Protestants of heresy and schism, and deny that they are true members of the church. Their arguments are:

I. No one can depart from the communion of the apostolic Roman see without the crime of heresy or schism, since the Roman church is commended for its true and catholic faith, Romans 1:8. (*) Response: 1) We distinguish between the pure Roman church, as it was in the time of Paul, and the corrupt Roman church, as it is in our times. It is not from the former, but from the latter, that the Protestants have departed. Not all who are separated from the communion of the Roman see are heretics or schismatics. For VICTOR, the Roman Bishop, had excommunicated the Asiatic churches because they celebrated Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon, as EUSEBIUS relates in book V of his ecclesiastical history, ch. 25, and yet the holy Fathers, who at that time had the care of souls, did not charge them with the crime of heresy or schism. Pope STEPHEN excluded CYPRIAN, and all who sided with him, from fraternal communion, as DIONYSIUS, Bishop of Alexandria, testifies, according to Eusebius in book VII of his ecclesiastical history, ch. 1, whom yet other bishops did not condemn for heresy or schism.

II. Whoever dissolves the unity of the church is a schismatic; LUTHER and his followers dissolved it, etc. Therefore. Response: Not LUTHER and his followers, but the Roman Pontiffs and their parasites, dissolved the unity of the church, by excluding the adherents of the Augsburg Confession from Christian and fraternal communion, and by persecuting them with fire and sword.

Question XVIII. Who is the head of the church?

Head of the church. The head of the church is Christ the θεάνθρωπος (God-man) a), not only because of his eminence and perfection above the members, but also especially because of the moral and physical, or real, influence b), which he, according to both natures c), bestows upon the members of his mystical body.

Observation. The church is a being by aggregation with order, where there is someone supreme on whom the rest depend. He on whom the church depends is called the head, metaphorically and by a similitude taken from the head of the human body, and here indeed not as to the material concept of the head, as it is an integral part of the body, and has the same relation to the whole body as the other members (for Christ cannot conveniently enough be called a member of the church, since he in no way depends on it); but formally, inasmuch as the head is the directing principle of the body, and by its influence governs, nourishes, and assists the whole body and all its members.

(*) But this is neither uniquely nor principally so; for other assemblies also, consecrated to Christ, are commended for the same reason, and that which is said in 1 Thessalonians 1:7-8 is much more significant.

Proof a. Christ is expressly called the head of the body, the church, Colossians 1:18, whom God gave to be head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all, Ephesians 1:22-23. Christ is the head; from whom the whole body, joined and held together by every joint with which it is supplied, when each part is working properly, makes the body grow so that it builds itself up in love, Ephesians 4:16.

Proof b. The influence which Christ bestows on the members of the church is twofold: 1) Moral, which consists in this, that Christ by the virtue of his merit acquired all spiritual goods. This the Apostle signifies in Ephesians 1:3, where he says: "God has blessed us in Christ with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places." 2) Physical, so called in opposition to moral, or real, is that which Christ provides to the members of the church effectively, through actions terminated in them, kindling, increasing, and confirming faith, charity, and other Christian virtues, comforting anxious minds, sustaining the wavering, bringing back the wandering, and governing each and every one in the course of life. This influence in its substance is supernatural, and can depend only on him who possesses infinite power and is true God, as from a head and principal cause.

Proof c. Christ is the head of the church according to both natures. 1) According to his human nature; because just as in the human body the head is conformed to the members, so in the mystical body of Christ the head had to be conformed to the members in nature and be a true man. And just as in the human body the head is the first part and holds the supreme place, so Christ not only as God, but also as man, excels all others in dignity in his church and holds the primary place, which the Apostle indicates in Colossians 1:18, saying: "Christ is the head of the body, the church. He is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead, that in everything he might be preeminent." To this is added that just as in the human body the head is more perfect than the other parts, because in it are all the senses, and they exert themselves; so Christ also according to his human nature surpasses in perfection all the members of the mystical body, because in him all the fullness of the Godhead dwells σωματικῶς, corporeally, Colossians 2:9. 2) According to his divine nature, however; because the influence which he, as head, bestows upon the members is of infinite virtue, which belongs formally to the divine nature, and communicatively to the assumed human nature. Christ, however, provides this influence to the members of the mystical body through ordinary means, namely through the word and sacraments. For by these the church was planted in the beginning, and afterwards propagated far and wide, and has been preserved to this day, and so also through these means of grace and salvation it will be illuminated, sanctified, and preserved until the end of the world. Through the same means, from Christ the head, the most abundant gifts flow into the church, both ministering and sanctifying, with which all the faithful are adorned, and especially the leaders of the church, Apostles, Prophets, Pastors, and Doctors, whose ministry Christ uses in diffusing his gracious influence, Ephesians 4:11.

Question XIX. Is there, besides Christ, another, and that a visible head, which visibly governs the universal church in the place of Christ?

The visible head of the church is denied. Besides Christ, another head of the church, which in Christ's stead visibly governs the universal church, is to be acknowledged neither from necessity a), nor from the free will and institution of Christ b).

Observation. The question is not: Whether there is, besides Christ, another head of the church, which bestows upon it an internal influence, from which it has spiritual life; for the saner Papists acknowledge that, with respect to internal influence, there is no other head of the church besides Christ. But the question is: Whether, by reason of external order and governance, there is some visible head of the church, which acts as Christ's vicar on earth, possessing supreme authority and power over the universal church diffused throughout the whole world, so that all the faithful are bound to hear its decrees and decisions in church matters, and to acquiesce in them without hesitation.

Proof a. 1) A visible head of the church, by which it is ruled as a sacred monarchy, is not required by necessity. For just as the simple and upright forms of commonwealths are three—monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy—and each commonwealth can be suitably governed and preserved for the public welfare; so also the church, considered from the standpoint of its external government, can be governed and preserved not only by one head, but also by several bishops of equal power among themselves, by way of an aristocratic government, so that it is not of necessity that it be governed visibly by one visible head. 2) Christ, according to both natures, is the head of the church—omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent—and therefore does not need a vicar. 3) The functions which a head has, one mortal man cannot perform for the universal church. For one mere man (ψιλάνθρωπος) cannot rightly rule over all, nor institute sacraments, nor establish articles of faith, nor bestow the gifts (χαρίσματα) of the Holy Spirit, nor give motion and sense while absent, nor defend all the members of the church, nor unite them by a spiritual bond, nor be heard by all with divine infallibility.

Proof b. 1) If Christ, when about to ascend into heaven, so committed the church to be planted and governed by the Apostles that he gave equal power to all; it follows that he constituted no visible head of the church, to whom some singular power above the others was granted. The antecedent is true; therefore also the consequent. The consequence is clear; for those who received the same and completely equal power from Christ, none of them received a singular power above the others, by which he was constituted the visible head of the church. The antecedent is proved from Matthew 28:19. "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations," etc. Here the Savior, shortly before his ascension into heaven, instructs the Apostles on those things which they should observe after his ascension in planting and governing the church, and he commands all equally to teach the nations, to baptize, to admonish men to observe all that he had commanded them. No mention is made here of a singular power granted to one of the Apostles above the others, by which he was constituted the visible head of the church. Furthermore, the antecedent is proved from John 20:21, where Christ addresses the Apostles in a general way: "As the Father has sent me, even so I am sending you." Here he sends the Apostles equally to plant and govern the church; nor does he say that he sends one of them in a more dignified manner than the others, who should be the visible head of the church. In verse 23, Christ says: "If you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven them." Here again Christ commits the power of the keys equally to the Apostles, nor does he grant greater power to one than to another, by which he should be the visible head of the church. 2) Paul in 1 Corinthians 12:28 and Ephesians 4:11 lists the entire hierarchical order instituted by Christ; yet in neither place does he make any mention of a visible head, to whom supreme power over the universal church belongs, but in the hierarchical order he gives the first place to the Apostles, who are equal in power and office. 3) The same Apostle, when he distinguishes the body of the church from Christ the head, calls all the faithful, of whatever state and condition they may be, not only members in relation to Christ, but also says they are ἀλλήλων μέλη when compared among themselves, that is, members of one another, Romans 12:5. Therefore, none of those who are under Christ is the head of the others. 4) Although the praised Apostle often deals with the head of the church, Colossians 1:18, Ephesians 1:21, chapter 4:15, he nowhere names another head besides Christ. Surely if there were some visible head in the church, the Apostle would have said that it was appointed by God or by Christ. But he nowhere says that a vicarial head has a place in the church. 5) Neither in the time of the Apostles, nor for some centuries after, was anyone found who would assume for himself the superiority and the role of a visible head over the universal church, or say that it belonged to him by divine right. Not in vain did GREGORY the Great write in book 6, epistle 30: "Whoever calls himself the universal priest, or desires to be so called, in his pride is a forerunner of Antichrist."

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who maintain that besides Christ there is another head of the church, and that a visible one. Their arguments are:

I. Every visible body must have a visible head; The church is etc. Therefore. Response: 1) The true and sincere church is invisible; because it is a mystical and spiritual body, joined to Christ the head by the bond of faith, which, formally considered, does not fall under the senses, but is believed by faith. Any particular church, inasmuch as it consists of true believers and admixed hypocrites, is indeed visible; but the universal church cannot be seen, and therefore does not require a universal visible head. 2) Although Christ has withdrawn his visible presence from the church militant until the last day of the world, he nevertheless governs it most presently through pastors and doctors as his organs and ministers. 3) It is not necessary for the head of a society to be always seen. Charles V was not seen in Spain for many years, which he nevertheless governed prosperously. Instance: When the King is not seen, a pro-king is needed. Response: 1) The reason secular kingdoms require pro-kings is the king's impotence, ignorance, and absence. But Christ is the head of his mystical body and the king of his spiritual kingdom—omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent. Therefore, he does not need a vicarial head or a pro-king. 2) Secular kingdoms do not necessarily require a pro-king on whom all the king's ministers depend.

II. Whatever form of government is the best and most perfect, that is fitting for the church by the will of the best and most perfect God; But monarchical government is the best and most perfect; Therefore. Response: 1) The whole argument can be granted; because Christ is the hieromonarch, governing the church through certain organs and ministers. 2) The consequence is invalid. For if you conclude firmly: the monarchical form of government is always and everywhere the best and most perfect; therefore the same is due to the catholic church; by the same reasoning I will infer; therefore the same is due to the republic of Venice, of Switzerland, of Holland. Surely, one must not see here which form is more perfect or more excellent, but which the subject matter can bear. The form of a shoe which is most perfect for robust men is nevertheless not suitable for boys or girls.

Question XX. Was the Apostle Peter the visible head of the church, and did he have the primacy of power and jurisdiction over the universal church of Christ?

Neither was Peter. Christ never constituted the Apostle Peter as the universal head of his church, nor did he grant him the primacy of power and jurisdiction over the catholic church.

Proof. 1) Christ, when about to ascend into heaven, committed the church to be planted and governed not to Peter alone, but to all the Apostles, and he gave them equal power, John 20:21, 23, Matthew 28:19. 2) So far was Christ from granting primacy of power to Peter, that when the Apostles were arguing among themselves and contending for primacy, he said: "You know that the rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them. But it shall not be so among you; but whoever would be great among you must be your servant, and whoever would be first among you must be your slave," Matthew 20:25. 3) If the disciples were permitted not only to send Peter to Samaria, but also to contend with him, so that he in his own person was subject to their accusation and examination, he certainly was not the supreme monarch of the church; But the antecedent is true. See Acts 8:14, Galatians 2:11. Therefore, the consequent is also true. Furthermore, no one can rebuke the ecumenical Bishop of the church and say: "Pope, what are you doing?" But Paul rebuked Peter and opposed him to his face, Galatians 2:11 ff. Finally, an ecumenical Pontiff cannot err, if one may believe the Papists. But Peter erred, and therefore incurred the rebuke of Paul. (*)

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who assert that Peter was constituted by Christ as the visible head of the church and the ecumenical Bishop. They rely on the following arguments:

I. Upon whom the entire church is so solidly built that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it, he is the head and monarch of the church; But upon Peter, etc. Matthew 16:18. Therefore. Response: The words of the text are: "And I also say to you: you are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." From these words it is clear that Peter is not the rock, but that the confession which Peter made, and which Christ still praises, is that rock from which Peter is named. For Christ does not say: "You are the rock, and upon this rock I will build"; but: "You are Peter, και ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ οἰκοδομήσω, and upon this same rock I will build." Christ had commended in verse 17 Peter's confession which he had made concerning Christ: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." Christ had said that this confession was of divine revelation; he wished to add that it is the foundation of Peter and the church. The sense of the words is therefore: "You are πέτρος, a rock-man, standing upon your confession as upon a most firm stone or rock; and upon this rock I will build my church, so that it may be of rock, immovable and (*) Peter himself does not think so arrogantly of himself as to have attributed such excellence and preeminence to himself. He calls himself συμπρεσβύτερον, a fellow elder, and by this very fact professes that he is of equal condition, in his first letter, 5:1.

impregnable, as long as it stands upon this confession or doctrine (that I am the Christ, the son of the living God), as upon an immovable rock." (*)

II. To Peter were entrusted the keys of the kingdom of heaven, Matthew 16:19. Therefore, the ecclesiastical principality was committed to him. The reason for the consequence is; because when cities are surrendered to a prince, the keys are offered to him as a sign of subjection. Response: 1) Christ gave the keys to Peter, not as a prince, but as a minister and steward. Now, not only Peter, but also the other Apostles were constituted as stewards by Christ, 1 Corinthians 4:1. Therefore, the keys promised here to Peter were also given to the other Apostles. Furthermore, the power of a steward is not αὐτοκρατορικὴ, monarchical and absolute, but διακονικὴ, ministerial and restricted. 2) By the keys is designated the ordinary power of the ministry of loosing and binding, or remitting and retaining sins, which was both promised and conferred equally upon all the Apostles, and not the supreme ecclesiastical power. For just as Peter alone responded when all were questioned, Matthew 16:15-16, so in one man the keys were committed to all, and were wielded equally by all, as scripture testifies in Matthew 18:18 and John 20:23.

III. Christ, after his resurrection, committed to Peter alone, as the ecumenical Pastor and head, not some, but all the lambs and sheep to be fed, repeating it three times, John 21:15-17. Therefore, Christ constituted Peter as the head and monarch of the universal church. Response: 1) Peter is called three times to feed the sheep, so that he might, as it were, wash away the stain of his threefold denial with a threefold confession, and thus, having made a threefold profession of his love for Christ, he might be restored to his sacred office. 2) The duty of feeding was committed to Peter, not dominion. The leaders of the church feed by the preaching of the word and the dispensation of the sacraments, but lordship is forbidden to them, Matthew 20:25. 3) Christ did not universally commend all the sheep or lambs to Peter, but indefinitely, he says, "feed my sheep"; which is enjoined equally upon all pastors, Acts 20:28, 1 Peter 5:2.

IV. In Luke 22:31, Christ says to Peter: "I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail. And when you have turned again, strengthen your brothers." Therefore, Christ gave the primacy to Peter. The reason for the consequence is; because when the Lord speaks to Peter individually, and says that he has prayed for him in a special manner, he indicates sufficiently that this man will be the head of the other Apostles. And to strengthen the brothers is fitting for a man as he is the head and prince of others; for confirmation pertains to him who performs the office of a superior. Response: 1) Christ prayed for all the Apostles, that their faith might not fail, John 17:20. The fact that he prayed individually for Peter does not argue for a monarchical eminence of Peter, but for the greater danger threatening Peter, and his more grievous fall. Peter, however, was preserved from a final defection of faith by the prayers of Christ. 2) The confirmation of weaker brothers does not imply ecclesiastical principality. For Paul also says in 1 Thessalonians 3:2 that he sent Timothy to strengthen the Thessalonians, and yet a monarchical primacy is not to be attributed to Timothy for that reason.

V. The Apostle Peter was always held to be the prince of the apostles because of the singular prerogatives by which he excels. Therefore, the Evangelists, when listing the Apostles, put Peter in the first place, Matthew 10, Mark 3, Luke 6, Acts 1. Response: 1) We grant that Peter can be called first by priority of age, or of vocation, or of zeal, or of order; but we deny that he can be called first in respect of power or jurisdiction over the other Apostles. For he calls himself a συμπρεσβύτερον, a fellow elder, in 1 Peter 5:1. 2) In Galatians 2, the pillars of the church are named, and the first place is given to James. 3) Paul had many privileges over Peter. For Paul alone was called by Christ from heaven, Acts 9:6; he alone was caught up to the third heaven, 2 Corinthians 12:2; he alone was sent to the Gentiles, Acts 9:15; he wrote more than the other Apostles, planted more churches, and labored more than the others, 1 Corinthians 15:10, 2 Corinthians 11:23. He bore the care for all the churches, 2 Corinthians 11:28. Hence, Paul was more profitable to the Christian church than Peter, as BELLARMINE admits in Book I, On the Roman Pontiff, ch. 2.

(*) In precisely this way the most numerous and chief of the ancient Doctors, especially ORIGEN, CYPRIAN, CHRYSOSTOM, AUGUSTINE, HILARY, and BEDE, interpreted the words of Christ, whom our forefathers commemorate in the Smalcald Articles, tractate on the power and primacy of the Pope, p. 345. This is also most worthy of great consideration, that Paul, when he preaches that we are built upon the foundation (that is, the doctrine) of the Apostles and Prophets, assigns nothing singular and special to Peter. Ephesians 2:20.

Question XXI. Is the Roman Pontiff the successor of Peter, and the visible head and Monarch of the catholic church?

The Roman Pontiff. Neither is the Roman Pontiff the successor of Peter in the Episcopate a), nor the head or Monarch of the catholic church b).

Proof a. 1) That Peter was in Rome cannot be evidently shown from the sacred letters. For a) Paul, writing to the Romans and greeting those known to him in chapter 16, makes no mention of Peter at all; whom he certainly would not have passed over, if he had been in Rome. b) Paul, upon arriving in Rome and being honorably received by the brothers, and living in Rome in his own hired lodging for two years, does not testify with even a single jot that Peter was seen by him in Rome, Acts 28:14-15. c) Paul wrote certain epistles from his Roman prison, namely to the Colossians, to Philemon, and the latter to Timothy. But in none of these epistles does he make mention of Peter; indeed, in 2 Timothy 4:16 he expressly writes: "At my first defense no one stood by me, but all deserted me." Peter would doubtless have stood by Paul and not deserted him, had he been in Rome at that time.

2. Although we do not entirely deny that Peter was in Rome and taught there, since the Fathers testify to this—IRENAEUS, EUSEBIUS, ATHANASIUS, TERTULLIAN, LEO the Great, CYPRIAN, AUGUSTINE, LACTANTIUS, whom you may see cited in the ecclesiastical history of D. HORNEUS p. 32 ff.—we nevertheless deny that the Apostle Peter was the proper Bishop of the city of Rome, and that he erected the papal see in that city. For a) Saint Peter indeed calls himself an Apostle of Jesus Christ, 1 Peter 1:1, and a fellow elder, chapter 5:1, but nowhere the Bishop of the Roman church. But an Apostle differs from a Bishop, as CHRYSOSTOM teaches in his Homily 19 on Matthew. For the Apostles were teachers of all nations, and bore the care of all the churches they planted; But Bishops are fixed to certain places, and have particular care for particular churches. Hence to the Roman Bishop only the care of the suburban churches was assigned by the ecumenical council of Nicaea. The Apostle Peter was called immediately by Christ. The Roman Pontiff is destitute of an immediate call. Peter ordained bishops in Alexandria and Antioch; which is not permitted to the Roman Pontiff. b) If Peter was the Bishop of Rome, much more was Paul the Roman Bishop. For Paul was the Apostle to the Gentiles, and therefore also Bishop of the gentile city of Rome. But Peter was the Apostle of the circumcision, Galatians 2:7. Paul taught the Romans with a most excellent epistle; Peter wrote his epistles to the dispersed brothers (Jews) in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Who then would believe that Saint Peter erected a teaching chair in Rome, in which the Roman Bishop succeeds him? Suppose Peter had a chair in Rome; the Roman Pontiff never ascended it. For Peter was a preacher of the gospel; the Roman Pontiff casts the office of teaching onto the shoulders of others. Therefore, the Roman pontiff is not the successor of Peter in the teaching chair.

3. The Roman Pontiff is not the successor of Peter in doctrine. For Peter commends the Holy Scripture for its clarity, and exhorts to its reading, 2 Peter 1:19. The Pope accuses scripture of obscurity, and keeps the laity from reading it. Peter places the confidence of salvation in Christ alone and only, Acts 4:12. The Pope teaches that salvation is to be sought not only in the merit of Christ, but also in the merits of the saints, in one's own merits and satisfactions, in monastic vows, in papal indulgences. Peter teaches that the remission of sins is received by faith in Christ, Acts 10:43. The Pope teaches that sins committed after baptism are redeemed by good works, and are obtained not by faith alone, but also by one's own satisfactions. Peter teaches that Christ alone is the foundation and cornerstone of the church, 1 Peter 2:6, and the universal Bishop, v. 25. The Pope calls himself the foundation of the church and the universal Bishop. Peter teaches that Christ, by dying once, perfected the offering for the sins of this world, 1 Peter 3:18. The Pope teaches that Christ is daily immolated for our sins in the sacrifice of the mass in an unbloody manner. Peter teaches that our calling and election can be made firm, 2 Peter 1:10. The Pope teaches that one must be in doubt concerning the grace of God and the remission of sins, and therefore also concerning election. Peter demands obedience to magistrates, 1 Peter 2:13. The Pope exempts his clergy from obedience to the magistrate, and also teaches that Christians cannot tolerate an infidel or heretical magistrate.

4. The Roman Pontiff is not the successor of Peter in life and morals. Peter says: "I have no silver and gold," Acts 3:6, for which the Pope is most greedy. Peter was not, like the Pope, adorned with gems, covered with gold, carried on a white horse, flanked by soldiers, surrounded by clamoring ministers, as BERNARD says to Eugene. Peter lived in matrimony, Matthew 8:14, 1 Corinthians 9:5. The Pope, however, condemns the marriage of clergy. Peter was pious, holy, chaste, honest. But how many Pontiffs have been impious, fornicators, authors of slaughter and wars?

Proof b. 1) That the Roman Pontiff is not the head of the catholic church is clear: because besides Christ, there is no other, and that a visible, head of the church. See above, question XIX. 2) If the church, which is a mystical body, had two heads, namely Christ as the invisible head, and the Roman Pontiff as the visible head, the church would be a two-headed body, and therefore monstrous. The Papists object: Not every many-headed (πολυκέφαλον) body is monstrous. For one man can have several heads, for instance, a mystical one, which is Christ; a political one, which is a King, Prince, or Magistrate; a marital one, if she is a woman; whence no monstrosity arises. Response: No man, and no body, can have several heads of the same order and respect without monstrosity. Thus, for example, although a woman can have the three heads just mentioned, which are of different order and respect, in one and the same order she cannot have two heads, for example, two marital heads, without ceasing to be a legitimate wife and degenerating into a monstrous adulteress. 3) What none of the Apostles had or exercised, the Roman Pope cannot arrogate to himself. But they never arrogated to themselves the principality of the church, not even in title, much less did they usurp it in fact. 4) Whatever conflicts with the condition of the ecclesiastical ministry, the Roman Pontiff ought also to judge as foreign to himself. But principality conflicts with the condition of the ecclesiastical ministry. Therefore. The minor is proven from Luke 22:25 and 1 Peter 5:3. 5) The true head of the church ought to be united to it as its mystical body, perpetually present, bestowing life, motion, and sense, sanctioning and protecting the order of the spiritual members, knowing their necessities, hearing their prayers, and providing for their difficulties. The only such true head of the church is Christ, not the Roman Pontiff. The Pope is not always united to the church, but can be taken away from it; indeed, the Roman see is often vacant of a Bishop; in which case the church would be deprived of its head, if he were a head in the true sense of the name. 6) After the times of the Apostles until CONSTANTINE the Great, nothing is found in ecclesiastical history about a visible head of the church, which was constituted as such and acknowledged by the church; in the first three centuries, when the church suffered severe persecutions, the Bishops acknowledged themselves as equals. But from the time of CONSTANTINE the Great, when the state of the church was tranquil, the church was governed by Patriarchs, Metropolitans, and Bishops. The Metropolitans presided over the sacred matters in the metropolis of the province, and there were five; the Roman, the Constantinopolitan, the Alexandrian, the Antiochene, and the Jerusalemite. The primacy of honor was granted to the Bishop of Rome, on account of the eminence of the city of Rome, in which he held his episcopate; for Rome was the seat and mother of the Roman empire. But the primacy of power and jurisdiction does not belong to the Roman Bishop by right. We learn this from Canon VI of the Council of Nicaea, whose words are: "Let the ancient customs in Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis prevail, that the Bishop of Alexandria have jurisdiction in all these, since the like is customary for the Bishop of Rome also. Likewise in Antioch and the other provinces, let the Churches retain their privileges and dignities." 7) When ZOSIMUS, the Roman Pontiff, and his successors, BONIFACE I and CELESTINE, sought dominion over the African churches, and under the pretext of a certain canon, which they pretended was from the Council of Nicaea, claimed a certain right of appeal from the judgments of the Africans to the Roman see, the African Fathers resisted, and so manfully defended their rights and liberty that they openly rebuked the Pontiffs for their pride, and bitterly reproached them for having abused the authority of the Council of Nicaea to establish their dominion. Their epistle to Pope CELESTINE is extant in ZONARAS and BALSAMON in their commentary on the canons of the councils. 8) From that time, however, the Bishops of Rome did not cease to seek supreme power over the universal church, but other Bishops strongly resisted, especially the Constantinopolitan. Finally, in the time of the Emperor PHOCAS, a most wicked man, BONIFACE III, Bishop of Rome, requested from the Emperor PHOCAS that the primacy of power over the universal church be confirmed to him, which happened at the beginning of the 7th century. BONIFACE III, however, acted subtly in this matter, for it was known to him that PHOCAS had been sharply reprov'd by the Bishop of Constantinople for the murder of the Emperor MAURICE, and that PHOCAS was incensed at him on that account. Wherefore BONIFACE approved the deed of PHOCAS, and obtained the confirmation of the primacy. From these things it is clear that the Pope was constituted head and Monarch of the church not by Christ, but by a parricide.

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who fight most fiercely for the ecclesiastical principality of the Pope. Their arguments are:

I. The Roman Pontiff is the successor in the chair of Peter, who was constituted by Christ as the visible head of the church. Response: 1) The Pope is the successor of Peter neither in the chair, nor in doctrine, nor in life and morals. 2) The Apostle Peter neither had nor ever exercised ecclesiastical principality.

II. From the times of CONSTANTINE the Great, the primacy has always been granted to the Roman Bishop: Therefore, the ecclesiastical principality cannot be denied to him. Response: The primacy was granted to the Roman Bishop not by divine right, but by ecclesiastical constitution. This is inculcated by canon law, dist. 22, from the council of Constantinople: "The Bishop of the city of Constantinople ought to have the primacy of honor after the Roman bishop, because it is the new Rome." Therefore, not by divine right, but by ecclesiastical constitution, the Roman Bishop obtained the primacy, and indeed not a primacy of monarchy, power, or jurisdiction, but only of honor and of see. For if the second place is given to the Bishop of Constantinople on account of the new Rome, that is, on account of the Roman empire being transferred to Constantinople, it follows that the first place of honor was given to the Roman Bishop because there is the old Rome, that is, the old seat of the empire. Whence also in the second council of Constantinople, canon 3, it was established that the Bishop of Constantinople should have equal privileges and the same degree of dignity as the Roman.

3. The church of the New Testament is to be governed in the same way as the church of the Old Testament was governed: But that was governed by one high priest, as a visible head: Therefore, this one is also to be governed so. Response: I deny the major premise. For what consequence is this: The Israelite synagogue, defined by narrow boundaries, was governed by one visible head. Therefore, the catholic church, diffused throughout the whole world, is likewise to be governed by one visible head? It is as if you were to infer (I speak with DANNHAVER): The magistrate of a village can be adequate for ruling the whole village; therefore also for the whole city, therefore for the whole kingdom. Surely the Jewish people, as one people, could be ruled more conveniently and easily by one ruler than the catholic church, propagated far and wide throughout the whole world and all peoples. Besides, the Pontiff of the Old Testament did not have monarchical power, although he was the inspector of the other priests and the director of ecclesiastical affairs; nor was he a type of the Roman Pontiff, but of Christ alone, although this one is far greater than that one, admitting no successor.

Question XXII. What is the internal form by which the assembly of men is constituted into the being of the church properly so called?

Internal form of the church. The internal and essential form of the church consists in the spiritual union a) of the truly believing and holy, who are bound to Christ the head by a true and living faith b), which is followed by the communion of mutual charity, as members of the church, among themselves c).

Observation I. D. HULSEMAN in his Breviary, ch. XVII, § 13, p. 124, expresses the essential form of the church thus: "The internal form of the church is the communion of all the faithful, concerning the justifying and sanctifying grace of Christ through the same means, the communion of the same faith and profession concerning both that grace of Christ, and finally the communion of mutual charity." And for these reasons chiefly the church is called one, holy, catholic.

Observation II. By union here is not understood an external and local union of bodies, but an internal and spiritual conjunction of souls. For although the faithful also have local sacred assemblies, these are not of the essence of the church. (*)

Proof a. The church is a being by aggregation with order, where one constituted in the supreme place rules the other inferiors, and, as the head, vivifies and governs the rest of the body. Therefore, it is necessary that this body be joined to its head by a firm bond.

Proof b. By faith, Christ the head is united with his mystical body and its members. For converted and reborn men receive Christ, John 1:12, put on Christ, Galatians 3:27, and adhere so closely to him and are, as it were, glued to him, that they are one spirit with him, 1 Corinthians 6:17. What is understood in the present context is not a general or historical faith, but a special and saving faith, which besides knowledge and assent on the part of the intellect, also includes on the part of the will trust; or an act of such a kind, by which the will rests in Christ the mediator, as a good present and ours, and the cause of another good, namely the remission of sins and the attainment of eternal life.

Proof c. Just as faith is prior to charity by nature; so it is necessary that the members of the church first have union in their head Christ through faith, and constitute one body of the church; and then, however, embrace each other with mutual love. But just as charity necessarily follows faith; so it is altogether required that the living members of the church pursue each other with mutual love. Mutual love is therefore the character of a living member of the church. "By this all people will know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another," says Christ, John 13:35.

Question XXIII. What is the end of the church?

End of the church. The proximate end of the church is edification, both of the whole body and of the individual members a). The ultimate end, on the part of the church, is eternal salvation b), and on the part of God, the praise of his glorious grace c).

Proof a. The most merciful God gathers and preserves the church for this purpose, that its members may mutually edify one another by teaching, exhorting, correcting, and consoling. For he gave pastors and teachers for the restoration of the saints, for the work of ministry, for the edification of the body of Christ, Ephesians 4:12. Wherefore it is fitting that one Christian should exhort another with words, and edify by example, 1 Thessalonians 5:11.

Proof b. Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her, that he might sanctify her, having cleansed her by the washing of water with the word, so that he might present the church to himself in splendor, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that she might be holy and without blemish. The church will be absolutely holy, without blemish, and free from wrinkle and spot in the future state of glory, where it will be splendid not only internally, but also externally, Ephesians 5:27.

Proof c. Just as God ultimately chose those who believe in Christ, that the glory of his grace might be praised, Ephesians 1:5-6, so he has called and preserves the church, or the assembly of believers, that his most glorious grace may be celebrated everywhere.

Question XXIV. What are the affections, or attributes, of the church properly so called?

Attributes of the church. The attributes of the church, properly so called, are commonly established as four: Unity a), holiness b), catholicity c), and apostolicity d).

Proof a. The church is one, partly absolutely and in itself, partly exclusively, or in opposition to a plurality of assemblies of the same kind. For it should be noted here that "one" is taken in a twofold sense. One 1) is the same as undivided; 2) is the same as unique. The church can be called one in both ways. For 1) the church is undivided; because all members of the church are united in Christ, as the head, through faith in Christ, which is joined with love not only of God, but also of neighbor, by an indivisible bond. This is understood, however, as fraternal and reciprocal love, in such a way indeed, that the union through charity in the first act, or φιλαδελφία, has a place among all Christians, as something entirely necessary. As for the second act of love, however, it is not always joined with faith, nor is it absolutely necessary that the members of the church always show works of charity to one another. For the exercise of charity can be hindered by too great a distance of places, by ignorance, or by infirmity. 2) The church is also unique: a) because it does not acknowledge several assemblies of the same kind existing at the same time; for the catholic church is the assembly of all believers, united to Christ the head by faith. If, therefore, the church includes all believers, there certainly does not coexist with it another church, or another assembly of believers, otherwise the universal church would not be the assembly including all believers. b) The catholic church is also one; because it does not acknowledge a succeeding church; for it never wholly perished, and will never wholly perish; but from its first beginning, by a perpetual succession of believers, it has lasted to these times, and will always last, until the consummation of the age.

(*) This, I think, can be excellently confirmed by these words, Matthew 18:20, whose meaning is to be understood not only of the congregation of men in one place, but also of the consent of minds conspiring into one thing, as appears most plainly 1) from the close connection of v. 19 and 20; for this, συναχθέντες εἰς, Christ himself so interprets: συμφωνήσωσιν 2) from another saying, 1 Corinthians 5:3-4. Paul, though absent in body, yet present in spirit, promises and pledges to the Corinthians: συναχθέντων ὑμῶν καὶ τοῦ ἐμοῦ πνεύματος.).

Proof b. The church is holy: 1) because of its most holy head, which is Christ. For such a high priest was fitting for us, holy, innocent, unstained, separated from sinners, Hebrews 7:27, who makes his church a partaker of his holiness. "For their sake I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified," John 17:19. 2) With respect to the members, who are holy: a) By imputed holiness, placed in the remission of sins and the righteousness of Christ, derived to the members of the church on account of the merit of Christ apprehended by faith; b) By inherent holiness, which consists in charity and the other Christian virtues. This inherent holiness is indeed imperfect in this life; but it is sufficient that there is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who do not walk according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, Romans 8:1. 3) The church is called holy because of the word and sacraments, by which means it is sanctified by the divine Spirit, and also because of the holy worship to which it is devoted.

Proof c. The church is called catholic; which word is found in the Apostles' Creed, but is not θεόπνευστος (God-breathed). Now καθολικὸν means the same as καθ' ὅλον, according to the whole, or universal, and the church is called catholic, either by reason of quality, or by reason of quantity. By reason of quality; on account of its doctrine and faith, inasmuch as it professes that faith which the universality of believers has always professed; by reason of quantity; on account of its diffusion through the whole world; inasmuch as it is gathered not from a particular people or nation, like the church of the Old Testament, but from all nations in the whole world. Authors, wishing to explain this notable distinction more clearly, some distinguish between internal catholicism, which is of faith or doctrine, and external, which is of place, time, and persons. But doctrine and faith are called catholic which are required of all who are to be saved. Cf. D. SCHERZER, Systema, p. 708. Others observe that the church is sometimes called καθολική as it is opposed to heresy, that is, to heterodox churches; sometimes it is called καθολική in respect and opposition to particular churches. In the former way, when the church is called καθολική, it is not the same as universal; but it is the same as the true and orthodox church, and is so called from the catholic doctrine, i.e., the orthodox doctrine of Christ and the Apostles, which, when heresies were becoming prevalent in the church, was called catholic, inasmuch as it, proceeding from Christ and the Apostles, was commended to all the faithful, and was received and believed by their unanimous consent. In this sense also a particular church embracing the catholic, or orthodox, doctrine is called catholic. Thus the Emperor CONSTANTIUS calls the church of Alexandria catholic, in SOCRATES, Book II, ch. 18. SOZOMEN calls Callinicus the Bishop of the catholic church which is in Pelusium, Book II, ch. 24. In the latter way, when the church is called καθολική, namely in relation to particular churches, it is the same as the universal church, and in this way it is not sufficient for the catholic church that it embraces the doctrine of Christ and the Apostles, for a particular church also receives this, but it is required further for the catholic church that it include all believers of all places and times within its scope. Cf. D. HULSEMANN, Manual on the Augsburg Confession, p. 258, & D. BECHMANN, Theological Institutes, p. 575. Others note that the catholicism of the church is to be estimated primarily and per se from its consent with the doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles, and also that conspiracy of faith which God uniformly works in all who adhere to the church; secondarily from the amplitude of places, and the diffusion through all peoples. Cf. D. JO. ADAM OSIANDER, Collegium systematicum, P. VII, p. 30. For by reason of its actual diffusion through all places and peoples, not even the apostolic and primitive church was catholic, although it was to be diffused through all peoples, and thus was prepared to receive all into its bosom, without distinction of nation, sex, or status. Moreover, Catholicism of places, persons, and times is a property of the church of the new testament, and indeed of the whole, by which it differs from the church of the old testament, which was restricted to the Jewish people, and from any particular assemblies.

Proof d. The church is called apostolic, partly because it was planted by the Apostles, partly because it has embraced the doctrine of salvation handed down by the Apostles and is built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, with Jesus Christ himself being the cornerstone, Ephesians 2:20.

Question XXV. What is the church broadly, improperly, and synecdochically so called?

Definition of the church broadly and improperly so called. The church broadly, improperly, and synecdochically taken, is the promiscuous assembly of men, called to the kingdom of God and the participation of spiritual and heavenly goods, by means of the ministry of the word, and consenting in the external profession of the same doctrine, for the praise of God and the eternal salvation of those very ones who are called.

Observation I. PHILIP MELANCHTHON, Part III of his Theological Loci, p. 16, describes the church broadly taken as being "the visible assembly of those who embrace the gospel of Christ and rightly use the sacraments, in which God is efficacious through the ministry of the gospel and regenerates many to eternal life, in which assembly, however, there are many who are not reborn, but who agree on the same doctrine."

Observation II. The promiscuous assembly of the called is improperly called the Christian church, because within its society it admits hypocrites and the unholy, who are putrid, dead, and equivocal members of the church. Such a church is called synecdochical, because the name of the church is attributed to the promiscuous assembly, consisting of the regenerate and the admixed unregenerate, by a synecdoche of the part for the whole, by which that which is proper to the true part is attributed to the whole assembly, composed of good and bad. Indeed, an assembly of men consisting merely of hypocrites and the unholy is a synagogue of Satan and not the church of Christ. Therefore, the promiscuous assembly is called the church of Christ, on account of the regenerate and elect, who are the more worthy and noble part of the church.

Observation III. The promiscuous assembly of the called is said to be the visible church; a) by reason of the external means by which it is gathered, which are the word and sacraments; b) by reason of the men who are in it; c) by reason of the external form and society, which consists in the use of the means and in external profession.

Question XXVI. What is the form of the church broadly taken?

Form of the same. The form of the church broadly taken consists in the consensus of the external profession of the same doctrine, and in the participation of the same sacraments.

Observation. The consenting profession of the same doctrine of faith is called the external form of the church, and as D. HULSEMANN teaches in his Breviary, ch. XVII, p. 1271, it consists in the public society of the profession of the same faith, and its public exercise in preaching the authentic word of God, and administering only those sacraments which were instituted by Christ.

Proof. Although in the church, broadly so called, the unholy are mixed with the holy, they must nevertheless agree in the external profession of doctrine and the participation of the same sacraments. Saint John teaches this in his 2nd epistle, v. 10: "If anyone comes to you and does not bring this (evangelical) doctrine, do not receive him into your house (a private one; therefore much less into the house of God, the church, to the communion of the sacraments, which are the tokens of faith), nor say 'greeting' to him (therefore much less call him a brother in Christ). For whoever says 'greeting' to him communicates in his evil works (heterodoxy)."

Question XXVII. Of which members does the church broadly taken consist?

Members. The church, broadly taken, consists of living and dead members, that is, of holy men and hypocrites a), between whom there is not only a civil society, but also an ecclesiastical one b).

Proof a. 1) The pillars of the church, among whom was Peter, sometimes fall, Galatians 2:14. Therefore, the church of the called does not consist of mere saints. 2) The visible church from the beginning of the world has not been without hypocrites. In the church of Adam there was Cain, a hypocrite, and finally a fratricide. In the church of Noah there was the impious Ham. Abraham had Ishmael, the mocker of Isaac, in his church; Isaac had Esau, a profane man; Jacob had Reuben and Judah, who were incestuous, Simeon and Levi, murderers, and the immodest Dinah. Christ had in the company of his disciples Judas, who was greedy, a thief, and a traitor. That in the churches planted by the Apostles the bad were mixed with the good is taught by the Acts of the Apostles, the Pauline epistles, and the Apocalypse of John. 3) The same is gathered from parables and similitudes, in which the church is compared to a threshing floor, containing both chaff and wheat together, etc. See above, Question III, Proof b. To which add that the church is the garden of God, Song of Solomon 4:12. In this garden there are not only fruit-bearing trees, but also barren ones, Matthew 3:10, Luke 13:7. Indeed, just as one tree has some branches that are green and fruit-bearing, and others that are dry: so the church has some members that are green, bearing the fruit of good works, and others that are putrid and dead, luxuriating only in the leaves of words. The church is a vine, producing not only grapes, but also wild grapes, Isaiah 5:4. 4) In the church there are men who say, "Lord, Lord," but do not do the will of the heavenly Father, Matthew 7:21; having the appearance of godliness, but denying its power, 2 Timothy 3:5; professing to know God, but denying him by their works, Titus 1:16. Therefore, there are hypocrites in the church.

Proof b. Because hypocrites profess the same faith with their mouth, and use the same sacraments.

The antithesis is that of the Novatians, Donatists, and Anabaptists, who deny that assembly to be the true church in which the unholy are mixed. Their arguments are:

I. The church is the congregation of saints. Therefore, in it there are by no means any unholy persons. I respond with the words of the Augsburg Confession, article VIII: "Although the church is properly the congregation of saints, yet in this life many hypocrites and evil men are mixed in." To be sure, the evil are in the church of the called, although they are not in the church of the regenerated and elect.

II. In whichever assembly men do not conform themselves to the rule of Christ, that assembly is not the Christian church; But in that assembly in which there are hypocrites, men do not conform themselves etc. Therefore. Response: 1) In which assembly no men conform themselves to the rule of Christ, that assembly is not the Christian church; I grant. But we assert that the promiscuous assembly of the called is called the Christian church synecdochically, because its principal part conforms itself to the rule of Christ. This synecdoche is common to the sacred writers. For Paul in the beginnings of his various epistles, addressing the whole assembly, e.g., of Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, etc., calls them saints. Concerning this synecdoche, AUGUSTINE writes in his epistle to Paulinus: "It is the custom of scripture to speak of a part as if it were the whole, just as the Apostle praises the Corinthians in the first parts of his epistle as if they were all such, when only some of them were praiseworthy."

III. Christ sanctified and cleansed the church by the washing of water with the word, so that he might present it to himself as a splendid church, not having spot or wrinkle, i.e., lacking vices and defects: Ephesians 5:26-27. But that assembly in which the evil are mixed with the good does not lack vices; Therefore, that assembly is not the church of Christ. Response: The church militant in this life is cleansed, or regenerated and justified, as well as sanctified inchoatively and continuatively; but the same church in the future life, having overcome its enemies, will be presented as triumphant, splendid internally and externally, having no spot or wrinkle, that is, consummately holy, immune from all sin and the remnants of sin. In this life the church with all its members acknowledges its imperfection, daily praying from the Lord's Prayer; forgive us our debts! (*)

IV. Whichever church is all beautiful, in it there are no evil ones; But the church of Christ is etc., Song of Solomon 4:7. Therefore. Response: When the church is called the bride of Christ, all beautiful, then the assembly of the regenerated and elect is precisely understood, which is beautiful with an imputed beauty, because it shines with the rays of the bridegroom Christ, and with an inherent beauty, which is said to be wholly perfect, not by reason of degrees, since its members often fall out of infirmity, but by reason of its parts, because it strives not to violate any divine precept with deliberate malice. We, however, are here dealing with the church broadly taken, as it is the assembly of the called, using the preaching of the word and the sacraments.

V. Whoever are in the Christian church are its members and have the spirit of Christ, 1 Corinthians 10:17, Romans 8:9. Hypocrites are not members of the church, nor do they have the spirit of Christ. Response: Whoever are in the invisible church, or the assembly of the regenerated and elect, they are true and living members of the church, informed by the spirit of Christ. But in the visible church, or the assembly of the called, there are hypocrites and unholy persons, who are dead members, and are called members by reason of the external profession of faith, not by reason of internal union with Christ through faith. Instance: Hypocrites have no communion with the regenerated. For what communion has light with darkness? 2 Corinthians 6:15. Therefore, they do not in any way belong to the church. Response: Hypocrites have no internal communion with the regenerated; because they are not joined to the head Christ by the bond of saving faith; however, they have with them in the church of the called an external communion, and that not only civil, such as exists in the Turkish empire between Mohammedans and Christians, but also ecclesiastical, on account of the consensus in the external profession of the same faith, and the participation in the same sacraments.

VI. From whom the truly believing and holy are commanded to separate themselves, with them they cannot constitute one church; But they are commanded to separate from hypocrites and the unholy, etc. 2 Corinthians 6:17. Therefore. Response: 1) A distinction is made between mental and local separation. The truly believing and holy are commanded to separate themselves in mind and spirit from the impious, lest they follow their impurity or impiety; yet the impious can be in the church, as chaff in a heap of wheat. 2) We do not say that hypocrites constitute one church with the truly believing, but that they adhere to them by accident and contrary to the intention of Christ, just as chaff adheres to wheat, yet they do not constitute one heap of wheat with it.

Question XXVIII. How manyfold is the church broadly taken, as a visible assembly of the called?

Division of this church. The visible church of the called is either true, or pure, or false, or impure.

Proof. Just as it usually happens that, when hypocrites and the unholy are mixed in one assembly with the truly believing and holy, sometimes the latter, and at other times the former, are eminent or prevail (and the holy are indeed considered to prevail, both by reason of doctrine, when it is publicly preached pure, with noxious errors expelled, and with respect to the integrity of morals, when good examples of Christian virtues flourish, with vices suppressed; but the unholy prevail and are eminent, with respect to morals indeed, when vices run rampant with impunity, or reign, and with respect to doctrine, when false dogmas are publicly spread, and true doctrine and its confessors are oppressed): so then, at last, the promiscuous assembly of the called is simply and absolutely called the church of Christ, or with the added encomium, the true and pure church, when the holy prevail by reason of doctrine and morals; but when the unholy, especially by reason of doctrine and public profession, are eminent in the church, then that promiscuous assembly, aggregated from the holy and the unholy, is not called the church absolutely, but in a certain respect, or with the addition, a false, impure, corrupt

(*) In a certain way, however, the church still militant is worthy to be called perfectly holy, without any stain or spot, namely by reason of justification, and the vicarious obedience of Christ attributed to each true member, Numbers 1:7. As far as renewal is concerned, however, the sanctity of the church, and of its individual members, is always imperfect as long as it is militant.

church. Cf. D. BAYER in Compendium Theologiae, part III, ch. 13, p. 1006.

True Church.

Question XXIX. What is the true church?

The true, or pure, church (*), is the assembly of men, in which all things that are necessary to be believed for salvation, and to be done for the sanctity of life, are taught perspicuously from the word of God, without the admixture of noxious errors, and the sacraments are rightly administered according to the institution of Christ, and thus spiritual sons are born, who by true faith are joined to Christ the head, and in him become one body.

Question XXX. Is the true church of the called to be said to be one, holy, apostolic, and catholic?

The true visible church, in a certain respect, is one, holy, apostolic, and catholic.

Proof. The true visible church, aggregated from the regenerated and elect, and admixed hypocrites, is 1) one, by external unity, on account of the profession of the same doctrine of faith, and on account of ecclesiastical peace and concord; but by internal purity, or of saving faith and sincere charity, the regenerated and elect are joined, who are contained in the visible assembly of the called, which professes true doctrine. 2) It is called holy; by a synecdoche of the part for the whole; because the better part, that is, the truly believing and holy, are eminent and prevail in the true church. 3) It is apostolic; because the doctrine which resounds publicly in it is built upon the foundation of the Apostles. 4) It is catholic, by reason of internal catholicism, because it professes the catholic doctrine whole and incorrupt; but it is not catholic, if you consider external catholicism, because it does not embrace all the truly believing and holy, since sons of God are also born in a corrupt church.

Question XXXI. Are there also heretics in the true church?

Manifest heretics are not eminent or prevalent in the true church a). However, secret heretics can exist in the orthodox church b). But they are not of the true church c).

Proof a. A church in which heretics dominate, and errors that subvert the foundation of faith preponderate, is not true, pure, and orthodox, but false, impure, and corrupt.

Proof b. 1) From 1 Corinthians 11:19: "For there must be factions among you in order that those who are genuine among you may be recognized." It is not absolutely, but hypothetically necessary that there be heresies in the church, supposing, that is, the blindness of the intellect and the malice of the human will, as well as the cunning of the devil, which God permits, so that the faithful may be tested, and the approved may become known to all. 2) From Acts 20:30: "And from among your own selves will arise men speaking twisted things, to draw away the disciples after them." Those heretics who arise from the true church certainly exist in it, although they may lie hidden for a time.

Proof c. Heretics are not of the true church, because they are not its living members. For they lack saving faith, which is the formal reason for being members of the church.

Question XXXII. What is a false, or impure, church?

False church. A false, or impure, church is an assembly of men in which the doctrine of faith from the word of God is publicly proposed with the admixture of errors and corruptions, and the sacraments are indeed administered, but are not dispensed in the manner and for the purpose for which they were instituted by Christ.

(*) The force of these words is not one and the same. A church, in which some principal parts of the means of grace and of true Christian doctrine are preserved by public profession, with the gravest errors mixed in, is corrupt as far as the errors are concerned, but as far as the truths are concerned, it is true; just as wheat, mixed with chaff, is indeed true, although it is not pure. Otherwise it could not happen that in a corrupt church sons of God would be born, which however the blessed Author, in the following question, rightly teaches in his final words. And in no way is the true church altogether non-existent. See the observation to question XXXII, and also question XXXIV and ch. I, question X, antithesis II. But the church which professes the use of the means of grace, without any defect or addition, and the true doctrine of Christ, whole and uncontaminated by any errors, that at last is the true and pure church.

Observation. True and false church are here opposed to each other not contradictorily; in which sense a church is false which is plainly not a church, e.g., the assembly of Mohammedans, which destroys all true religion; but privatively, so that a false church is one that is falsified, vitiated, corrupt, impure.

Question XXXIII. What are the proper and infallible marks of the true visible church?

Marks of the true church. The proper marks of the true visible church, from which it becomes infallibly known to a Christian man, skilled in the sacred letters, are the pure preaching of the divine word, and the legitimate administration of the sacraments.

Observation I. Our discussion is not about the common marks of a true and a false church, but about the proper marks and signs of a true church, from which its truth is so known that it can be discerned from any false church. The common marks of a true and a false church are the preaching of the divine word and the administration of the sacraments. But the proper marks of a true church are the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments.

Observation II. The most proper mark of the true church is the pure preaching of the word, to which the legitimate dispensation of the sacraments is commonly joined, as being virtually included in the profession of the truth, a mark indeed proper to the true church alone, but not competent to every one, nor always. For there was once a church before Abraham without the ordinary provision of sacraments, and for forty years in the desert the church was without circumcision. Cf. DANNHAVER in Hodosophia Phaenomenologica, II, p. 130. For which reason, the pure preaching of the word is the mark of the church πρώτως, or primarily; the legitimate dispensation of the sacraments, as an appendix to the preached word, is its mark δευτέρως, and secondarily. Hence the use of the sacraments, e.g., the Eucharist, is sometimes interrupted, namely in time of persecution, the church nevertheless remaining.

Observation III. The marks of the true church already mentioned are marks of the visible church, or of the church taken for an assembly aggregated from true believers and admixed hypocrites. If it happens by God's permission that the church, oppressed by the tyranny of persecutors, has no public exercise of religion, no public ministry, by whose work it may publicly teach and profess the faith which the faithful have fixed in their hearts, then it will lie hidden, and by this very fact, that it lies hidden, it will have no sensible marks. These marks therefore apply to the true church in a flourishing and free state, not in a corrupt and oppressed one.

Observation IV. After the churches were torn apart into parts by schism, every particular church is visible. But since every particular church claims for itself the name of the true church, the question began to be asked: which particular church is true and pure from corruptions? The universal church, embracing all true believers and saints of all places, as it is invisible, cannot be distinctly known from certain signs and marks.

Observation V. By the preaching of the word is understood the public doctrine of faith, revealed in the word of God, whether it be pure or impure, which ought to be known from the symbols and public confessions, issued in the name of the whole church, or approved by the whole church, not from the opinions or writings of this or that doctor. Moreover, the preaching of the word is called pure which does not involve corruptions and errors that subvert the foundation of faith, either directly or indirectly. Those corruptions which are concerning faith, and leave the foundation of faith safe, do not make the church false and impure; but there are different degrees of purity. The purer and more sincere the doctrine, the purer and more sincere is the church.

Observation VI. When the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments are called marks of the true church, this is to be taken of marks from which the truth of the church can and should become known to a Christian man, to whom the infallibility of Holy Scripture is established. To an unbelieving and pagan man, however, the divinity and infallibility of the scriptures must first be shown, before it can be demonstrated by certain marks which among the churches, torn by schism, is the true church. This must be shown from certain external κριτήρια, criteria, which we treated in prolegomenon III, question XXIX.

Observation VII. When the pure preaching of the word is established as a mark of the true church, then the name of preaching is taken generally for the profession of doctrine, common to all members of the church, pastors and hearers, and for the public reading of biblical texts, which is like preaching, Acts 15:21. Preaching strictly taken is rather a proper action of pastors than of the whole church, nor is it simply and absolutely necessary to the church, as the times of the gravest persecutions show, in which the church could be preserved by the reading of scripture alone, without the public pure preaching of doctrine.

Proof of our assertion: 1) By what means the church is gathered and preserved, by the same it is known: But by the preaching of the word and the dispensation of the sacraments, etc. Therefore. The major is evident, because the principle of being is also the principle of knowing. We have proved the minor above in Question XIII.

2. Whatever is more known than the church, and belongs to it alone and always, that is a genuine mark of the church: But the pure preaching of the word is more known than the church, and belongs to it alone and always. Therefore. The major is clear; because every mark is more known than what is marked. The minor is clear; because I cannot judge which is the true church, unless I first judge whether its public doctrine is conformed to the revealed word of God.

3. Whatever is a mark both of true Christians and of true doctors of the church, that itself is a mark of the whole true church: But the pure preaching and diligent observation of the divine word is a mark both of true Christians and of true doctors of the church: Therefore. The major is manifest in itself. For what makes a true member of the church, that also makes a true church; which is the congregation of true Christians. The minor is proved from the words of Christ in John 8:31: "If you abide in my word, you are truly my disciples"; and in John 10:27: "My sheep hear my voice." And just as false prophets are known from their wicked doctrine, so true doctors are to be known from pure doctrine.

4. What were the marks of the true churches in the time of the Apostles, those are still the marks of the true church: But the reception of the apostolic, or evangelical, doctrine, and the right administration of baptism and the Holy Supper, were the marks of the churches in the time of the Apostles;

Therefore, they are still the marks of the church. The minor is evident from Acts 2:40-42, where Peter said: "Save yourselves from this crooked generation." So those who gladly received his word were baptized, and there were added that day about three thousand souls. And they devoted themselves to the Apostles' doctrine and the fellowship, to the breaking of bread and the prayers. If anyone here should ask; whence was it known in the time of the Apostles that the church was true and pure? By the force of this passage, the answer must be; this was known from the fact that it adhered to the doctrine of the Apostles, which was pure and without corruptions, and also that it received the sacrament of baptism and the Holy Supper without corruptions, just as the sacraments were administered by the Apostles themselves.

5. By what the true church is discerned from the church of the wicked, those are the marks of the true church: But by the sincere preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments it is discerned, etc. Therefore. The major is evident in itself; because by proper and essential marks one thing is discerned from another. The minor is proved: For these two a) formerly in the Old Testament distinguished the Israelite church from the pagans, Deuteronomy 4:6, Psalm 147:19-20, Genesis 17:10-11, Exodus 12:48. b) The Arians were formerly distinguished from the orthodox in no other way than by doctrine. Wherefore TERTULLIAN says excellently, in his book On the Prescription Against Heretics, chapter 21: "Those are the true churches, which hold what they received from the Apostles, and what the Apostles from Christ, and Christ from God. But other churches, which were not instituted by the Apostles, nevertheless, if they conspire in the same faith, are to be reputed no less apostolic, on account of the consanguinity of doctrine."

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who deny that the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments are the proper marks of the true church, and substitute other proofs (τεκμήρια) for it. Their more important arguments are:

I. The marks of the true church are inseparable from it: The pure preaching of the word is not inseparable from the true church: Therefore. The major is evident; because the marks of the true church ought to be such that the true church can always be known from them. The minor is established from the examples of the Corinthians and Galatians. In the Corinthian church, the resurrection was denied, 1 Corinthians 15:12. In the Galatian church, the observance of the Mosaic law and justification by works of the law were inculcated, Galatians 3. These were true churches, but they could not be known from the pure preaching of the word, because this had ceased in them. Response: The parity of doctrine is to be judged from the public confession of the whole church. But the whole Corinthian church did not deny the resurrection of the dead. For Paul expressly says: "How can some of you say that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Of the Galatians the same Apostle says: "There are some who are troubling you," Galatians 1:7. Besides, there are distinct degrees of purity; sometimes the word is preached more purely, sometimes less purely.

II. Every true mark ought to be more known than what is marked: The pure preaching of the word is not more known than the church: Therefore. The minor is proved: because what is the true and pure preaching of the word must be learned from the church. Therefore, the church must be known first, before the preaching of the word is known, and so the pure preaching of the word is not more known than the church. Response: 1) I deny the minor premise. For the pure preaching of the word is more known than the true church, both in nature and to us. To us indeed; because it is closer to the senses. For the preaching of the word can be perceived by hearing, and the legitimate administration of the sacraments partly by hearing and partly by sight. The church, however, in itself and as it is a congregation of the faithful, can be perceived by no sense. But what is closer to the senses is more known to us. But it is more known by nature; because the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments is the principle and cause by which the church is gathered, nourished, and preserved. That whose knowledge proceeds from generating and preserving causes, its knowledge proceeds from things more known by nature. But no knowledge is more certain and solid than that which comes from causes. 2) Although a pagan and a person to be converted receives probable knowledge of scripture from the testifying and commending church; a Christian man, however, acquires infallible knowledge of the true church from the public doctrine conformed to scripture. A distinction must therefore be made here between a man to be converted and a converted man, and also between probable and infallible knowledge.

III. Whatever marks do not distinctly and certainly notify which men are truly believing and holy, they do not produce an infallible knowledge of the true church: But the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments do not distinctly and certainly notify, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the church, properly so called, is the assembly of the truly believing and holy. The minor is evident; because even hypocrites preach the divine word and administer the sacraments; who nevertheless are not truly believing and holy (*) Response: The pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments are marks of the visible church, that is, taken for a promiscuous assembly, aggregated from true believers and admixed evil persons, and this they show distinctly, certainly, and infallibly. If, however, they are referred to the true believers alone, who properly constitute the church of Christ, then they can and should show them only confusedly. For of the church, precisely taken for the truly believing and holy, there are no marks which show it distinctly, certainly, and infallibly. For which reason some authors note very well that the question here is not about the marks of the truly believing definitively, or by discretion according to individuals (which God alone knows, 2 Timothy 2:19, 1 Kings 8:19); but about the marks of the truly believing indefinitely, by reason of the true assembly, or in which assembly above others true believers are to be sought, and by which marks that assembly can be distinguished from false churches. Cf. D. SCHERZER in Systema, locus XXV, p. 710.

IV. Whatever is common to all sects is not a mark of the true and pure church: But the preaching of the word is common to all sects:

(*) If any Roman Catholic argues thus, he contradicts his own sect, and has no force against us, unless perhaps arguing for the sake of argument. For they wish every church to be visible, but they deny that what is called the invisible church is a church, and much less do they grant that it is properly so called. See question IX and its antithesis.

Therefore. The major is clear; because an adequate and infallible mark of the true church ought to discern it from any sectarian and false church. The minor is proved; because all sects and churches, even false ones, boast of the purity of their doctrine. Response; I deny the minor. For although every sect, every church, even a false one, boasts of the purity of its doctrine; a vain boast or empty brag is one thing, and the demonstration of the purity of doctrine by practice itself is another. But by the very fact that all sects appeal to the purity of doctrine, they show that it is the genuine mark of the true church.

V. The form of the true church is not its mark; The pure preaching of the divine word, etc. Therefore. Response; The pure preaching of the word is not the formal cause, but the efficient, and indeed the instrumental, cause of the true church; but the consensus concerning the external profession of the same pure doctrine is the form of the visible church. Since, however, the sincere preaching of the word founds and preserves the church, and shines forth actively in it, it certainly notifies it, because science is the knowledge of a thing through its cause. Instance; The pure preaching of the word is a mark of the ministers of the church, but not of the whole church. Response; The name of preaching is here taken generally for the profession of celestial doctrine common to all members of the church, pastors and hearers.

VI. There are marks of the true church that are more certain and evident than the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments, namely: 1) The name Catholic; 2) Antiquity; 3) Long duration; 4) Amplitude, or multitude of believers; 5) The succession of Bishops in the Roman church, derived from the Apostles to us; 6) Conspiracy in doctrine with the ancient church; 7) The union of the members among themselves, and with the head, that is, with the Roman Pontiff; 8) The sanctity of the doctrine; 9) The efficacy of the doctrine; 10) The sanctity of the life of the authors, or the first Fathers of the true religion; 11) The glory of miracles; 12) The prophetic light; 13) The confession of adversaries; 14) The unhappy end of its enemies; 15) The temporal felicity granted to those who have defended the church. Response; a) Generally. The mentioned marks of the true church, with the purity of doctrine and the legitimate use of the sacraments removed, are doubtful and fallacious. b) Specifically, response to 1) The name catholic was not always used in the church. The name of Christians was used in the primitive church, Acts 11:26. Of catholic there was deep silence. To this is added that even heretics attributed the name catholic to their false churches. CYPRIAN testifies concerning the Novatians, epistle 37, that "in the manner of apes, who though they are not men, yet imitate men, they attributed to themselves the name of the catholic church." Thus of the Arians SIXTUS of Siena reports in Bibliotheca Sancta that they called themselves catholics, but others Athanasians and Homoiousians. The Donatists called their assembly the catholic church, as AUGUSTINE testifies in vol. V, in the collation of the 3rd day with the Donatists. To 2); Without divine literature, antiquity is of no moment; for truth is more ancient than all things, as TERTULLIAN judges in his Apology, ch. 19. To 3); Long duration, with respect to past time, coincides with antiquity; duration with respect to future time is neither present nor certain to us. The promise of the perpetual duration of the church does not pertain to this or that particular and visible one, but to the catholic and invisible church of the elect founded in Christ as on a rock. Long duration is not proper to the true visible church, but common to the Mohammedan sect and the Jewish synagogue. To 4); Amplitude is not a proper and perpetual mark of the true church. For in the times of Adam, Noah, and the suffering Christ, the true church was a little flock, Luke 12:32. The church of Satan is always more ample than the church of Christ; because few enter by the narrow way of salvation, Matthew 7:14. To 5); Succession in true doctrine and faith is to be held in high esteem; But local and personal succession of bishops is not a proper and adequate mark of a pure church, because a) it does not belong to it perpetually and always. For the primitive church, in which Christ and the Apostles taught, was the flower of the church, yet it lacked local and personal succession of Bishops; nor b) does it belong to the true church alone. The Jewish synagogue in the time of Christ had a succession of priests. The Greek church traces its succession of Bishops back to the Apostles. (*) Indeed, in the Arian church there was a succession of Bishops. But if heresy breaks the thread of succession, the succession of the Roman chair has long since been interrupted, which so many heretics and impious Pontiffs have occupied. To 6); By the ancient church is understood either that which existed many centuries ago, but was very corrupt; or the apostolic church. If the former; the true church cannot be known from a corrupt ancient church; if the latter; that mark indeed holds good, but it returns to our position. For to agree with the ancient apostolic church means to embrace the pure doctrine which it had. (**) To 7); By the union of the members among themselves with the head, is understood either an internal union, which is through faith, by which the members are joined to Christ the head, and the members are united to one another by charity; or an external one, by reason of doctrine. If the former; the union of the members with the head and among themselves cannot be a mark, because internal faith and charity are not certainly known to us. If the latter; this mark has no place, because it is also common to a false and impure church. Surely in the Arian churches there was a union as to doctrine, but from this it could not be concluded that the Arian church was the true and pure church. To 8); Doctrine cannot be holy unless it is true and pure. To 9); The efficacy of doctrine can be understood in two ways: a) as a doctrine being efficacious which is received by many, b) by which men are effectively converted to God. In the first way, it cannot be a mark of the true church, because it also belongs to a false church, namely that of the Antichrist, as Paul testifies in 2 Thessalonians 2:9, 11. In verse 9 the Apostle says that the coming of the Antichrist will be according to the ἐνέργειαν, efficacy of Satan, and in v. 11 he says: "Because they did not receive the truth, God will send them a strong delusion," so that unbelieving men may believe a lie. Surely in a false church the doctrine of heretics effectively moves and deceives many. In the latter sense, efficacious doctrine is nothing other than true and pure doctrine. To 10); Sanctity of life is either internal or external. Neither can be a mark of the true church; Not internal; for this consists in faith and inherent justice, which, as it is not known to us, cannot be a mark by which we are led to the knowledge of the true church; nor external; for this is also common to a false church. The Novatians called themselves Cathars, on account of the external sanctity of their life. The Donatists professed external sanctity to such a degree that they denied a church to exist where the good were contaminated by the communion of the evil. To 11); The glory of miracles is also not a mark of the true church; for Saint Paul testifies, 2 Thessalonians 2:9, that the coming of the Antichrist will be according to the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders. The glory of miracles in the church of the New Testament was to last only for a time, and many centuries have passed in which the true church has had no miracles. The miracles performed by Christ and the Apostles conciliate authority for the church. To 12); The prophetic light is not a perpetual gift of the orthodox church, but peculiar to the beginnings of the church. False prophets sometimes also boasted of the prophetic gift, e.g., Balaam, Numbers 23. A disguised Samuel, i.e., a demon, foretold the end of Saul. To 13): The confession of adversaries is not a genuine mark of the true church. For how will the testimony of him be certain and infallible, who has not perceived the nature of both true doctrine and the church, or, if he has perceived it, is yet unwilling to embrace that doctrine and associate himself with that church? The true church remains, even if it is utterly destitute of the confession of adversaries. To 14): The unhappy end of the enemies of the church is not a mark of the true church; because often enemies, e.g., TRAJAN, AURELIUS, ANTONINUS VERUS, SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS, etc., died peacefully; on the other hand, the Apostles, martyrs, and many pious men perished miserably. To 15): Temporal felicity is not a mark of the true church. For according to scripture: "All who desire to live a godly life in Christ Jesus will be persecuted," 2 Timothy 3:12. The church in the time of the Apostles was true, though destitute of temporal felicity.

(*) The Episcopal Anglican Church also contends vehemently with the Roman Church concerning the succession of Bishops. But what should be noted in the first place is that the Roman Catholics have deflected much from the ancient institution, since their opinion, both concerning the order and dignity of Bishops, and concerning their office, by no means agrees with what we read reported about the origin of the Christian church. In the age of the Apostles, Bishops were neither superior to Presbyters, nor different from them, Acts 20:17, cf. with v. 38; 1 Peter 5:1 & 2. They performed the office of teaching, and therefore in Ephesians 4:11, no mention is made of any singular order of Bishops; for these were the same as the pastors and doctors, as is plainly apparent from the two places already indicated. In the Roman church, however, they neither are, nor wish to be, true Bishops, but political Dynasts and Princes, who neither preach and teach, nor baptize, nor administer the supper, nor perform any work and office of the church. Thus it is most truly written in the Smalcald Articles, P. III, C. 10.

(**) And it is indeed clearer than light that the Roman Catholics have departed from the ancient doctrine. As an indication are all their errors, and most especially the interdict on the reading of the sacred letters, as well as on the use of the consecrated cup, from which the Laity, as they call them, are prohibited. The book of the blessed HUNNIUS on the apostasy of the Roman church is to be most highly recommended to all.

Question XXXIV. Are spiritual sons of God also born in a false church?

A false church, inasmuch as it is false, does not bear spiritual sons to God a). However, in a corrupt, or false, church, spiritual sons can be born, and are born to God through the word of God, which is still preached there, and through baptism, which is whole in its substantial b).

Proof a. A false church is one in which false dogmas are joined to true ones. But just as true faith is not generated from false and erroneous dogmas; so in a false church, inasmuch as it is false and contaminated with errors, no spiritual sons of God, or true believers, are born. Whence it is clear that he is not a son of God who pertinaciously adheres to the errors of a false church and strives to defend them.

Proof b. 1) In which church the word of God is publicly read and preached, and baptism is administered whole in its substantial, in it spiritual sons of God and heirs of eternal life can be born, and are born; But in a certain corrupt church (Roman, Greek, etc.) Therefore. The major proposition is evident from the efficacy of the word and sacraments, Isaiah 55:10, Titus 3:5, 1 Peter 3:21, Ephesians 5:26. The minor, however, is established by experience. 2) If in a corrupt church there were no salvation, all infants baptized by the Papists, when transferred to the bosom of our church, would have to be rebaptized. The consequent is false, therefore so is the antecedent. You say: In a false church the truth is oppressed and errors prevail; Therefore, in a false church there is no true faith. Response: Just as according to Christ's parable in Matthew 13, in that field in which the householder sowed good seed, and the enemy sowed weeds, wheat can nevertheless grow from the good seed; so in those assemblies where errors are joined with true dogmas, faith can nevertheless be conceived from the word of God, the errors not penetrating the souls equally, or being cast out again, as indeed the faithful by the grace of God can discern between the precious and the vile.

Question XXXV. Is the true church to be diligently sought by a man who is to be saved?

Necessity of seeking the true church. The inquiry for the true church is very useful, and in some measure necessary, for a man who is to attain eternal salvation.

Observation. We confess that it is not ἀπλῶς, simply, and precisely necessary for salvation to know which and where the true visible church is. For we ourselves teach against the Papists that this is necessary only by an ordinary, not an absolute necessity, and that a man can be saved even if he is ignorant of it, provided he is a member of the invisible church. For it can happen that someone may die blessedly, even an adult, who does not yet know what the church is. Cf. D. HULSEMANN in Breviary, ch. XVII, p. 1209, & D. SCHERZER, Collegium Antifocinianum, p. 1041.

Proof. 1) The church is the body of Christ, Ephesians 1:23, the kingdom of heaven, Matthew 2:2, the city of God, Revelation 3:12, the house of God, 1 Timothy 3:15, the sheepfold of Christ, John 10:16, our mother, Galatians 4:26, and the communion to which spiritual goods (the word, sacraments, regeneration, etc.) are ordinarily entrusted, Ephesians 4:11, and the promise of a gracious presence is made, Matthew 18:20. Whence outside the visible church there is no salvation; And "he who does not have the church on earth as his mother, does not have God in heaven as his father," in the judgment of CYPRIAN, book On the Unity of the Church. Therefore, it is very useful and necessary to diligently seek the assembly in which God ordinarily dispenses the means of salvation, and exhibits his gracious presence, and thus to associate oneself in both spirit and body with the mystical body of Christ, with the citizens of the kingdom of heaven, with the household of God, with the sheep of Christ, with our spiritual mother.

2. Christ commands us to avoid false prophets, Matthew 7:15, and to turn away from them, Romans 16:17. "Wherefore we are as much separated from heretics as they are fugitives from the church," according to CYPRIAN, Book I, epistle 5, to Cornelius.

You say: There is salvation in a false church: Therefore, it is not necessary to seek the true church. Response: In a false church, considered reduplicatively, or inasmuch as it is false and contaminated with errors, there is no salvation. In a false church, considered specifically, inasmuch as in it the word of God is publicly read, and baptism is administered whole in its substantial, regeneration and salvation are given; but not without great peril to souls: for they can be so obscured by false dogmas that either the light of faith is not kindled, or, having been kindled in baptism, it is overwhelmed and extinguished by errors: just as a robust man in a house infected with a pestilential plague can be kept safe; but not without present danger to his life.

Question XXXVI. Is the Roman church true and catholic?

The truth of the catholic pontifical church is denied. The Roman, or Pontifical, church is neither true a), nor catholic b).

Observation. By the Roman church is understood not only that which is in the city of Rome, but all particular churches, attached to the Roman Pontiff, wherever they may be contained.

Proof a. The true church has one head, Christ, Ephesians 1:22; it has one adequate principle of faith, namely Holy Scripture, 2 Timothy 3:16; it imparts the word of God as a clear light to all for reading and meditation, John 5:39; it venerates only God religiously, Matthew 4:10; it frankly confesses the defect of free will in spiritual matters, 1 Corinthians 2:14; it acknowledges that the exact fulfillment of the law with respect to the flesh, by which it is weakened, is impossible in this life, Romans 8:3; it seeks and finds righteousness and eternal life only in the universal satisfaction and merit of Christ, Romans 3:28, ch. 4:2 sq., Philipians 3:9; it asserts the certainty of faith, Romans 8:38; it judges marriage to be honorable for all suitable persons, Hebrews 13:4; it rightly administers the sacraments according to the institution of Christ, Matthew 26:27, ch. 28:19; it teaches that those who finally believe are saved, and that those who persistently disbelieve are condemned, and acknowledges no intermediate state between the state of glory and eternal ignominy, John 3:16 sq., Mark 16:16. But the Roman, or Pontifical, church has two heads, Christ and the Roman Pontiff; to Holy Scripture it adds the consensus of the Fathers, the traditions of the church, and the decrees of the Pontiffs, as principles of faith; it forbids the reading of Holy Scripture to the common people; it transfers the religious worship due to God alone to deceased saints; it builds righteousness and eternal life on the merits of one's own works; it vainly boasts of the powers of free will in spiritual matters; it impudently contends that the full implementation of the law is possible in this mortal life; it disapproves of the certainty of faith, and defends doubt concerning divine grace; it affirms that marriage is unbecoming for clerics, and prohibits it on that account; it mutilates the sacrament of the supper, by taking away the blessed cup from the laity, and transmutes it into the sacrifice of the mass; it asserts an intermediate state between the state of glory and eternal ignominy: Therefore, the Roman church is not a true, but a false, impure, and corrupt church.

Proof b. The Roman church is not catholic, whether you look at the internal catholicism of faith and doctrine, or whether you consider the external catholicism of places, persons, and times. For it neither professes the catholic faith and doctrine which the Prophets and Apostles taught and propagated: which we have already given proof of; nor does it embrace in its scope all particular churches and all true believers, saints, and elect. For the Papists cannot deny that outside the Roman church spiritual sons and heirs of eternal life are born to God, namely in the Greek, Lutheran, and Reformed churches. Since, therefore, the Roman church is neither orthodox nor universal, it is not truly catholic, but a particular, and that an impure and corrupt, church.

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who maintain that the Roman church is true and catholic. Their more important arguments are:

I. The faith of the Roman church is proclaimed in the whole world, Romans 1:8. Therefore, the Roman church is true and catholic. Response: 1) We distinguish between the ancient Roman church, as it was in the time of Paul, namely pure and orthodox; and the modern one, which is so impure and deformed, that the epistle of Paul seems to be written not to the Romans, but against the modern Romans. 2) There is no force of consequence in the argument. For the ancient Roman church was not catholic because its faith was proclaimed in the whole world; but it was a particular church, such as the Jerusalemite, Antiochene, etc. Indeed, the same praise that is given to the Roman church is given to the ancient Thessalonian church in 1 Thessalonians 1:8: "For not only has the word of the Lord sounded forth from you in Macedonia and Achaia, but your faith in God has gone forth everywhere." Yet the Thessalonian church is not catholic.

II. The gates of hell will not prevail against the church, as Christ testifies, Matthew 16:18. Therefore, the Roman church could not have lapsed into errors. Response: Against the universal church the gates of hell will not prevail, so as to cause it to fail completely; but many particular churches have failed, e.g., that of the Corinthians.

III. The Lutherans, who accuse the pontifical church of having departed from the truth of the doctrine of faith, cannot indicate the time when it departed. Therefore, they unjustly accuse it of defection. Response: 1) The Lutherans are not obligated to indicate to the Papists the time when their church departed; for it is sufficient that false dogmas are found in it, which testify that the Roman church is impure. A gardener discovers weeds in his garden, but no one demands that he indicate the time when they began to grow. A physician indicates to a patient that he is suffering from consumption, yet it is not necessary for him to indicate the time when the patient began to suffer from this disease.

2) The errors with which the modern Roman church is defiled did not begin at one and the same time; and therefore one time for them cannot be indicated. At one time the opinion of habitual righteousness, by which we are just before God, became prevalent; at another time the dogma of the celibacy of priests, at another the dogma of transubstantiation, at another the erroneous doctrine of communion under one kind only, etc.

IV. Many Lutherans to this day call the Roman church catholic; which is a clear indication that it is truly catholic. Response: 1) The Roman church in a contradictory sense, or in the state of due confession, when we contradict those in error, is not to be called catholic, by the argument of the passage, 2 Corinthians 11:12. 2) Lutherans, when not in a state of confession, call the Roman church catholic in the same sense and with the same liberty with which we call the Jews, Jews, who are nevertheless a synagogue of Satan, Revelation 2:9 (*)

Question XXXVII. Is the Lutheran church true and catholic?

The truth and catholicism of the Lutheran church. The Christian church, which adheres to the unaltered Augsburg Confession, is true a), and embraces catholic doctrine, b); but by reason of quantity or amplitude, it is not catholic, or universal, but particular c).

Proof a. The church attached to the Augsburg Confession, which is commonly called Lutheran from the ministry of LUTHER, is true (**): because it embraces and teaches the truth revealed in sacred scripture, John 17:17. For the Lutheran church has one mystical head, Christ; nor does it admit any other word as a fitting norm of faith and morals than that which the Prophets and Apostles have left; nor does it acknowledge any other foundation of salvation than Jesus Christ; nor does it use any other sacraments than those which Christ himself instituted, namely baptism and the Lord's supper; nor does it attribute its righteousness and salvation to any of its own qualities, dispositions, and works, but solely to the divine grace and the merit of Christ; while in the meantime it fervently contends that diligent effort must be given to good works, prescribed by God; Therefore, the Lutheran church is a true church.

(*) We do not say Catholics, but Roman-Catholics, since the Roman Prelate himself demanded that name at the time when the Crypto-Jansenist disputes in France were agitated with the most vehement emotions of minds. But the whole force and reason of Roman Catholicism is placed in this; that all, whoever are truly devoted to the Roman church or wish to seem so, must with all their votes profess the singular power of the Roman Pontiff, and not side with those who think him to be inferior to a Council.

(**) True and pure (see the notes on p. 1208): For it professes not only the truth, but also the integrity of the truth. For the doctrine to be integral, and thus the church pure, two things are required: 1. that nothing of the truth has been taken away, 2) that nothing of error has been added, Deuteronomy 12:32, Matthew 28:20, Galatians 1:8.

Proof b. Catholic doctrine is that which, having proceeded from Christ and the Apostles, has always and everywhere been commended to all the faithful, and has been received and believed by their unanimous consent; The church attached to the Augsburg Confession receives, believes, and professes that catholic doctrine. Therefore, by reason of its doctrine, it is truly catholic.

Proof c. By reason of quantity, or amplitude, the Lutheran church is not catholic, or universal; because it does not embrace in its scope all the regenerated and elect of all places and times. Therefore, the Lutheran church is indeed orthodox, but particular.

The antithesis is that of the Papists, who deny that the Lutheran church is true and catholic. They object:

I. The Lutheran church is not diffused throughout the whole world; Therefore, it is not catholic. Response: The Lutheran church is called catholic not by reason of its amplitude, or diffusion throughout the whole world (for we confess that it is particular); but by reason of its catholic doctrine; because it is orthodox.

II. Whichever church began only in the last century is new, and therefore not a true church (for truth is most ancient); But the church of the Lutherans, etc. Therefore. Response: 1) I deny the major premise. In a similar way, someone in the second century after Christ's birth could have argued: "Which church began only in the previous century, namely the first, is new, and therefore not a true church." But the church of Christ, etc. Therefore. Which argumentation is inept. It should be known, therefore, that the newness which is objected by dissidents does not stand in the way of the truth of the doctrine and the church. For of Christ's doctrine it is said in Mark 1:27: "What is this? A new teaching!" Cf. Acts 17:19. 2) The Lutheran church (not indeed under this name, but by reason of its doctrine) existed long before the Papacy, since it agrees exactly with the doctrine and church of the apostles, and is therefore prior to the papacy.

III. In the Lutheran church there is no union, nor consensus; but there are various dissensions and sects in it; Therefore, it is not a true church. The reason for the consequence is; because the members of the true church are joined by the bond of charity. Response: 1) In the Roman church there are no less dissensions than in the Lutheran church. 2) Those who dissent in fundamental dogmas of faith from the Augsburg Confession and the other symbolic books, have gone out from the church attached to the A.C. But those who dissent in questions outside the fundamentals, agree in the foundation, and thus do not subvert the truth of the church.

Question XXXVIII. Do the particular churches taken together constitute one catholic church?

The particular and visible churches which exist today in the east and west do not constitute one catholic church.

Proof. If all the assemblies of the called, throughout the whole world, professed the catholic faith purely and incorruptly, and were joined among themselves by the bond of charity and peace, we would not hesitate to assert that, taken together, they constitute the catholic church, or universal, so called by synecdoche, in whose scope the universal multitude of believers is contained, and outside of which there is no salvation. But after the particular churches have been so torn apart by schisms that they neither profess the same doctrine of faith, nor pursue each other with mutual love, they do not constitute one catholic church.

Question XXXIX. Is the church so infallible that it cannot err, and indefectible that it cannot be cut off?

Concerning the infallibility of the church. The catholic and invisible church, which embraces each and every one of the regenerated and elect, cannot err in the foundation of faith, nor completely fail, but will endure until the consummation of the age a). Any particular visible church, however, can be so contaminated with fundamental errors that they prevail, and doctors professing false doctrine constitute the public ministry, with the fewness of true believers lying hidden under the multitude of those in error b).

Observation 1) The sense of our assertion is; the entire catholic church never errs in such a way that there do not remain some who, following the simple guidance of the word, are sanctified and preserved in truth and faith by the direction of the Holy Spirit, so that retaining the foundation of salvation by the power of God they are kept through faith for salvation, although these are sometimes few, and in the most troubled times of the church lie hidden, so that the assembly of true believers is not illustrious and distinctly conspicuous; But that each particular and visible church can err in faith and in fact has at times erred, if it departs from the rule of the heavenly word, from which danger of erring we do not except even the Roman church, from which alone they so greatly strive to remove it, as says the blessed D. GERHARD, in his locus On the Church, § 107.

Observation 2) The church is called indefectible with an indefectibility a) conditional, as long as it adheres to its head Christ, from whom nothing but sin can separate it (this indefectibility is common to the invisible church with the visible); b) catholic, as to the whole (τὸ σύνολον), individual faithful can fall away, but not the universal church, which indefectibility is proper to the invisible church; c) final, as to the church of the elect.

Proof a. 1) The gates of hell shall not prevail against the catholic church, Matthew 16:18. Therefore, the catholic church is indefectible from the heavenly truth, and impregnable. For πύλαι, gates, signify the place of counsels and judgments, where the force and power of a city was situated.

Wherefore the gates of hell are nothing other than the counsels, schemes, power, force, and strength of the devil and of tyrants. 2) The spiritual kingdom of Christ (the church) on this earth is perennial, Luke 1:33. From which Christ also promised his gracious presence to the true members of this spiritual kingdom until the consummation of the age, Matthew 28:20. Therefore, the church of Christ will endure until the end of the world. 3) The church is the house of God, the pillar and repository of truth, 1 Timothy 3:15. Therefore, it will stand impregnable as long as the heavenly truth, or the word of God, which remains forever, shall survive, 1 Peter 1:25. 4) The word of God will always be preached, Isaiah 59:21, Jeremiah 30:13 (though not always purely), and the partakers of the Eucharist will proclaim the Lord's death until he comes (to judgment), 1 Corinthians 11:26. Therefore, there will always be the regenerated and the elect. For wherever the word of the Lord is preached, it always bears fruit in some, Isaiah 55:10, Matthew 13:24.

Proof b. 1) From the Pauline admonition, Romans 11:20-22: "Do not be haughty, but fear. For if God did not spare the natural branches, neither will he spare you. Note then the kindness and the severity of God: severity toward those who have fallen, but God's kindness to you, provided you continue in his kindness. Otherwise you too will be cut off." Whence the impregnable argument: Which church a) ought to beware of falling; to which b) it can happen that God does not spare it; which c) if it does not remain in the faith, is to be cut off, that church is defectible. But a particular and visible church is thus situated. 2) Immunity from the danger of erring has not been divinely promised, except to the true and living body of Christ, which is not always constituted by those who externally prevail in the church and perform the public ministry, but sometimes is constituted by those who, oppressed under the multitude of the erring, lie hidden and groan, whose splendor is not external, but they are like a hut in a vineyard, or in a cucumber garden, and like a devastated city, Isaiah 1:8, like a remnant of seed, ch. 6:13, as a poor and needy people, Zephaniah 3:12, as a little flock, Luke 12:32. 3) Experience teaches that a particular and visible church has often defected from the heavenly truth. The Israelite church, contemporary with Moses, defected, which, with Aaron leading, worshipped the calf, Exodus 32. The church contemporary with Elijah defected, who thought himself to be the only true believer, when yet, by the grace of God, seven thousand true believers remained, who lay hidden under the multitude of the wicked, and had not bent their knees to Baal, 1 Kings 19:10. The church contemporary with Christ defected, which was ignorant of the foundation of faith, namely, the Messiah, a heavenly, not a worldly king, a priest to be offered as a most holy sacrifice for sins, an enemy and persecutor of Jesus of Nazareth, the true Messiah, revealed by so many lights. The churches planted by Paul defected: the Ephesian, Philippian, Colossian, Corinthian, Galatian. When the Arian heresy predominated, the church was to be sought not in walls, not in roofs and buildings, but in mountains, in forests, in lakes, prisons, and caves. Cf. AUGUSTINE, epistle XLVIII; Sozomen, book III of his ecclesiastical history, ch. XIII. In the time of the Antichrist, it was predicted in the scriptures that the wicked and those addicted to the false doctrines of the Antichrist would be everywhere, and that the church of Christ would be hidden under the vast throng of the Antichrist's satellites, Revelation 12:14, 2 Thessalonians 2:3.

Antithesis. The antithesis is 1) that of the Papists, who deny that the Roman church can err in faith. 2) that of the Socinians and Arminians, who maintain that the catholic church can completely fail.

The Papists object; I. Against which church the gates of hell do not prevail, that one cannot err or fail; Against the church of Christ, etc. Matthew 16:18. Therefore. Response; Against the catholic, or universal church, the gates of hell do not prevail; but we have demonstrated that many particular churches have failed.

II. The pillar and foundation of truth does not fall. But the church is, etc. 1 Timothy 3:15. Therefore (*) Response; The catholic and invisible church, which is the assembly of the regenerated and elect, is, first, per se and properly called the pillar of truth, because it is firm, constant, and like an immovable pillar, stable in guarding and preaching the truth entrusted to it, and will never defect from it. Not that, considered absolutely and in itself, it cannot utterly fail from the truth (for it consists of men, still exposed to manifold infirmity, and who individually can be deceived and deceive); but that by the grace and assistance of Christ it cannot happen that it should fail from it in things necessary to be believed. Secondly, improperly, and by a synecdoche of the part for the whole, a particular and visible church is called the pillar and foundation of truth, on account of the regenerated and elect who are contained in it. When, however, the admixed evil in it gain dominion, and corrupt the public profession of faith, the visible assembly, whose public profession is corrupt, is not and is not called the pillar of truth; although the few, true believers, hiding in it, are custodians and witnesses of the heavenly truth; for the denomination is from the more excellent part.

III. Whichever church is governed by Christ, as the supreme head, that one cannot err or fail; But the Christian church, etc. Ephesians 1:22. Therefore. Response; We distinguish between the absolute and the ordered governance of Christ. The latter occurs through ordinary means. Whichever assembly of the called deserts those means, is deserted and falls into errors.

IV. The church is led by the Holy Spirit into all truth, John 16:13. Therefore, it is infallible. Response; According to the intention of Christ speaking, that promise primarily and proximately regards the instruction of the Apostles for the function of their Apostolic office, by which they were to serve all nations by preaching the word of truth. Secondly, that promise can be accommodated to the universal church; which is infallible conditionally, if it follows the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

V. Christ prays for the church, John 17:17. Therefore, it cannot fail. Response; The intercession of Christ averts from the church a total defection, not a partial one. That the assembly of true believers and saints does not completely cease to exist is to be attributed to the grace and intercession of Christ; Yet it is established that very many assemblies of the called have shaken off their faith in Christ.

VI. The church is to be heard under penalty of anathema, Matthew 18:17. Therefore, it cannot err. The reason for the consequence is; because the church would never be to be heard under so great a penalty, if it were liable to errors. Response; 1) That passage does not deal with articles of faith; but with ecclesiastical discipline, which even a corrupt church observes. 2) The church is to be heard, as long as it itself hears the voice of the shepherd Christ, and adheres to the divine word.

VII. Individual particular churches can fail; Therefore, also the universal church. The consequence is proved; because the universal church is nothing other than the complex of particular churches. Resp. Individual particular churches can fail separately, not jointly or collectively; just as individual men die, but the entire human species does not.

(*) There is a twofold interpretation of these words, explained by different very learned men. It will not be difficult to judge which is to be preferred to the other. The church is compared to a house. A house is not a pillar and foundation. Therefore, when it says στυλοῦς καὶ ἐδραῖωμα τῆς ἀληθείας, that must be understood as that on which the whole building rests, namely Christian doctrine, and its principal part, on which all the others depend. That, therefore, is not to be referred to ἐκκλησίαν, but to τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον, v. 16.

The universal church is indefectible not absolutely and in itself, but because of the grace, assistance, and governance of Christ, its spiritual head and king, who is not without a body and a spiritual kingdom. (*)

ON THE REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH

Question XL. What is the representative church?

Definition of the representative church. The representative church is the congregation of doctors, representing the synthetic church in its own way.

Proof. For the synthetic church is represented both through the ecclesiastical ministry and through a council, or synod. The profession of faith, which is issued by the voice of pastors when they inculcate the doctrine of Christ in public assemblies and declare it to the understanding of their hearers, is considered the common confession of the whole church and of its individual members. In councils, however, are gathered the doctors and delegates of the church, to whom has been committed by the whole communion of believers the power of taking cognizance and judging concerning the public interpretation of doctrine in doubtful and controversial articles, concerning ceremonies that contribute to good order in the church, as well as concerning the power of correcting public offenses.

Question XLI. What is an ecclesiastical council?

Definition of an ecclesiastical council. An ecclesiastical council is a solemn assembly of the doctors and delegates of the church, gathered by the instigation and moderation of God, and convoked by public authority, to rightly weigh and judge questions that have arisen concerning the dogmas of faith, the morals of Christians, and the rites of the church, so that the glory of God may be propagated, concord in one faith may be established, and schisms, heresies, and public offenses may be averted.

Obs. I. The word concilium (council) is not derived from consulendo (consulting), as the spelling itself attests, nor from conciliandis (reconciling) differing opinions, which is an inadequate derivation, but from concalando, i.e., convocando (convoking). For a council is a gathering of men convoked for consultation; whence also FESTUS says concilium is as if it were concalium (which is from ἀπὸ τοῦ καλῶν). In Greek it is called σύνοδος, or a congress of many.

Obs. II. Although the name council, in its native meaning and by force of its notation, designates any assembly, whether ecclesiastical or political, gathered for the purpose of consultation, here it is used in a stricter sense, to denote a congregation of the doctors and delegates of the church.

Question XLII. What is the principal efficient cause of councils?

Efficient cause. The principal cause and author of councils is God.

Proof. The origin of councils is divine. This is evident 1) from the councils of the Old Testament, which were convoked with God commanding and moderating, Exod. 20:20. Num. 11:16. Deut. 17:9. Ps. 122:5. 2) From the apostolic council held in Jerusalem, in which, as in the clearest mirror, the genuine form and sketch of a legitimate council is exhibited to us, whose president was the Holy Spirit, Acts 15:28. For the Apostles say: "It seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us." 3) Christ himself refers us to the representative church, saying: "Tell it to the church," Matth. 18:17. Where by church is understood a judging body; but a promiscuous multitude does not judge; Therefore, the representative church, which is the congregation of doctors, is implied. But Christ would not have referred us to the church, unless a tribunal had been divinely constituted in it.

Question XLIII. In whom does the power of convoking councils reside?

The power of convening councils. The power of indicting and convoking councils resides in the orthodox political Magistrate a); in his absence, the faithful themselves can, without injury to heterodox territorial lords, institute an ecclesiastical congregation b).

Obs. I. The question is not whether some consent of the political Magistrate is required for holding councils, but the question being debated is about the power of indicting and compelling councils. The

(*) The blessed Man passed over the arguments of the Socinians and Arminians in silence, a defect which you will easily supply from the books of the Theologians who have disputed by design against both, or either one, of those sects.

Papists do not deny consent to the magistrate; but they concede that he can request and subsequently consult on a council; they deny, however, that the right and authority to compel a council belongs to him.

Obs. II. Even if the Magistrate sometimes defers his right of indicting councils in his diocese to Theologians, they nevertheless use that right not as lords, but as ministers of a higher power, and so that power is not their own, but delegated.

Proof. a. 1) From the authority of the magistrate. The convocation of a council is an act of jurisdiction, implying some superiority, and therefore should always be instituted by him who has some jurisdiction, or authority, or superiority in the causes for which the convocation is made. But jurisdiction of this kind does not reside in Bishops or Presbyters, 1 Peter 5:3, but in the magistrate, Rom. 13:1.

2. From divine sanction. Those to whom it is sanctioned and commanded that they should kiss the Son of God, open the gates to him in the world, and promote his kingdom and the growth of the church, it is their duty, if it is expedient for the church, to assemble councils; But to the magistrate, as the custodian of both tables of the law, this is sanctioned and commanded, Ps. 2:10. 24:7. Is. 49:18. Therefore.

3. From the custom of the Israelite church, in which Moses, Exod. 19, Joshua, ch. 19, David, 1 Chron. 13, Solomon, 1 Kings 8, Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. 20, Hezekiah, ch. 30, Josiah, ch. 34, convoked synods.

4. From the practice of the primitive church of the New Testament. The Council of Nicaea was assembled by CONSTANTINE THE GREAT; the first of Constantinople by THEODOSIUS the elder; that of Ephesus by THEODOSIUS the younger; that of Chalcedon by the Emperor MARCIAN.

Proof. b. If the magistrate is heterodox and an infidel, the right and power of convoking councils does not expire, if the orthodox themselves request it. But if he does not grant their petition, the Bishops themselves can, by the example of the Apostles, as it were, by entreaty, assemble councils. Thus in Acts 15:2, when a dispute arose in the church of Antioch concerning the necessity of circumcision and the law for salvation, the Apostles and elders gathered a council to discuss this controversy.

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, who maintain that the power of convoking councils, especially general ones, resides in the Roman Pontiff. They object:

I. Whatever council is not gathered in the name of Christ is not legitimate; Whatever council is gathered by a political magistrate is not gathered in the name of Christ; Therefore. The minor is proven, because the Magistrate does not preside over the church in the name of Christ, but the Roman Pontiff, who is Christ's vicar and the visible head of the church.

Resp. 1) That council is gathered in the name of Christ which is convoked for the doctrine and glory of Christ; which is also done by an orthodox Magistrate. 2) We deny that the Roman Pontiff is the ecumenical vicar of Christ and the visible head of the church.

II. Whoever in the fold of Christ are not shepherds, but sheep, they do not have the power of assembling councils; But the political Magistrates etc. Therefore. The major is proven: Just as it is not for the sheep to gather the shepherds; So it is not for secular Kings and Magistrates to convoke Bishops, as shepherds, to a council.

Resp. Magistrates are considered in a twofold manner; a) insofar as they are internally illuminated, converted, and sanctified through the means of salvation; b) insofar as they externally defend, preserve, and restore the Christian religion. In the former way, they are to be considered as sheep; in the latter way, they are custodians and defenders of the fold of Christ.

III. Whoever does not have all the members of the universal church subject to him cannot indict a general council; But the Emperor does not have all the members etc. Therefore. Resp. 1) Neither does the Roman Pontiff have all the members of the church subject to him. 2) The Emperor compels the Bishops subject to him to a council by command; those who are outside his territory, he invites by courtesy. It is sufficient that the decrees of the council be transmitted to others and be approved by them.

Question XLIV. Who is the president of a council?

President of the council. The invisible president of a council is the Holy Spirit a). The visible president is either political or ecclesiastical. The political president is the Emperor, King, or Christian Prince, or someone delegated by him b). The ecclesiastical president is one or more Bishops, elected by the Emperor, King, or Prince, or by the common suffrage of the whole council c).

Proof. a. The Holy Spirit is the supreme and infallible president of a council, Acts 15:28, who, by means of the word contained in the sacred letters, speaks, teaches, illuminates, and directs the minds of the assessors of the council.

Proof. b. The political president moderates the external order of the council, provides security from external force to the speakers, prevents tumults, restrains brawlers, approves the decrees of the greater and better part, sanctions them by public edict, and commits them to execution. Thus, CONSTANTINE THE GREAT governed the Council of Nicaea as to its external affairs, THEODOSIUS the elder the First Council of Constantinople, THEODOSIUS the younger the Council of Ephesus, through legates, and the Emperor MARCIAN the Council of Chalcedon, through consular men whom he himself had appointed as judges, as EVAGRIUS testifies, book II, ch. 4.

Proof. c. The ecclesiastical president moderates τὰ ἐσώτερα τῆς ἐκκλησίας, the internal affairs of the church, or the ecclesiastical actions themselves, which concern the doctrine of faith, not with coercive but with ordinative authority, accurately proposes the questions to be deliberated upon, explains them candidly, asks for and collects suffrages and opinions, pronounces the definitive sentence, draws up the synodical acts, and hands them over to the whole congregation to be reviewed and confirmed. Sometimes several episcopal presidents were elected, who presided over the synod either in turns or by common authority: In the Council of Nicaea, the Bishop of Corduba; in the Council of Constantinople, TIMOTHY of Alexandria, MELETIUS of Antioch, NECTARIUS of Constantinople, and CYRIL of Jerusalem, Bishops; In the Council of Chalcedon, ANATOLIUS of Constantinople, MAXIMUS of Antioch, and JUVENALIS of Jerusalem, were the presiding Bishops. Wherefore it is not necessary that the Roman Pontiff be the president of all councils, even general ones.

Question XLV. Who are the assessors and judges in councils?

Assessors & judges. The assessors and judges in councils, besides the presidents, are not only Bishops, Doctors, and Pastors, but also laymen, skilled in the sacred letters, pious, lovers of truth and peace, delegated by the churches, to pass sentence on the matters proposed.

Proof. 1) From the solemn celebration of the Council of Jerusalem described in Acts 15, in which not only the Apostles, but also the presbyters and the people convened, and the suffrages of the entire church, consisting of clergy and laity, were heard. Wherefore also the decree of the synod was conceived in these words, Acts 15:22: "It seemed good to the Apostles and elders, with the whole church," and v. 25: "It seemed good to us, being assembled with one accord."

2. From the clear words of scripture. It is said to all the faithful, that they should test the spirits, whether they are of God, 1 John 4:1. Paul addresses the Corinthians: "I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say," 1 Cor. 10:15. Cf. Rom. 14:12. We concede indeed to the doctors of the church the greater parts in deciding doubtful and controversial questions; but we deny that it is theirs to pass and publish a binding sentence, without the consent of the laymen delegated from the churches, whose role it is to consult together, to give their opinions, and to define.

Question XLVI. Around what matter are councils concerned?

Matter of the council. In councils are weighed questions concerning the dogmas of faith, morals, and ceremonies of the Christian church.

Proof. From Acts 15:19. In the apostolic council (which exhibits the idea of a legitimate council) there was a question of faith: Whether eternal salvation cannot be obtained without the reception of circumcision and the observance of the entire law? The question concerning the morals and ceremonies of the church was: Whether it is necessary to abstain for a time from the enjoyment of things prohibited by the ceremonial law, so that the church to be gathered from Jews and Gentiles might more easily coalesce?

Question XLVII. What is the norm for deciding questions in a council?

Norm of the council. The one principle and norm for deciding controversial questions about dogmas and morals is the canonical scripture.

Proof. The decisions of councils concern the faith and duties of Christians; which, just as they depend on the Holy Scripture as the sole principle of knowing and acting, so also the decisions concerning them have the scripture alone as the perfect and adequate principle and norm of deciding. Compare the words of scripture, Deut. 4:12. Is. 8:20. 2 Tim. 3:15. Gal. 1:8. ch. 6:16. In the first councils, the codex of the gospels was placed on a high throne, so that it was exposed to the eyes of all.

Question XLVIII. What is the form of councils?

Form of councils. The form is the decent order of the council, or the legitimate process, regarding the duties of the individual assembled parts.

Proof. For a council is a being by aggregation with order, which cannot exist without a legitimate process of the parts. The presidents observe this by rightly directing, the assessors by deliberating, opposing, responding, deciding.

Question XLIX. What is the purpose of councils?

Purpose of councils. The purpose of councils is the propagation of divine glory a), the concord of the church b), and the avoidance of schisms, heresies, and scandals c).

Proof. a. Councils are gathered in the name of Christ, Matth. 18:10, i.e., for the glory of Christ.

Proof. b. The concord of the church is established by the consensus of the profession of faith; a council is convoked lest this be broken by heterodoxy. Thus in the apostolic council, Acts 15, the Christian doctrine of obtaining eternal salvation without receiving circumcision was defended.

Proof. c. By the apostolic council, Acts 15, the true opinion on the Mosaic law was so explained that the pseudo-apostles' opinion on the necessity of observing the Mosaic rites was solidly confuted and utterly extirpated; moreover, fornication was perpetually forbidden, and the enjoyment of blood and things sacrificed to idols was forbidden for a time.

Question L. How are councils divided?

Division of councils. Councils are divided into universal or general (which in Greek are called οἰκουμενικά) and particular (in Greek μερικά, τοπικά). Universal are those to which learned and pious men are called from all, or from most parts of the Christian world a). Particular are either national, to which learned and pious men of one nation are summoned; or provincial, in which the doctors of one province convene; or diocesan, which consist of the religious men of one diocese b).

Proof. a. Indeed, there has never existed in the whole world a council that was absolutely universal, in which all the Bishops and delegates of the militant church convened; therefore councils are called universal, or ecumenical συγκριτικῶς, or relatively, in respect to national, provincial, and diocesan councils. Although, therefore, they are not simply universal, they are nevertheless held as such on account of the subsequent ratification of all particular churches, by which they were approved. The first four ecumenical councils are held in the highest esteem: The Nicene, convoked by the Emperor CONSTANTINE THE GREAT in the year 325, in which, with 318 Bishops present, the heresy of Arius, who denied the divinity of Christ, was condemned: The First Council of Constantinople, indicted by THEODOSIUS the elder, in the year 381, in which MACEDONIUS, and those who sided with him, the pneumatomachi, were condemned by 150 Bishops: The First of Ephesus, assembled by THEODOSIUS the younger, in which more than 220 Bishops convened in the year 432, who condemned NESTORIUS, who denied the communication of idioms: The Chalcedonian, held under the Emperor MARCIAN, in the year 451, against EUTYCHES and DIOSCORUS, who confounded the two natures in Christ, who were condemned by 630 Bishops.

Proof. b. A national council was held in Carthage in Africa, with CYPRIAN presiding. In opposition, CORNELIUS, the Roman Bishop, instituted a national council, in which the Bishops of all Italy convened, as EUSEBIUS testifies in his ecclesiastical history, Book II, ch. 2. Provincial councils were those of Mainz, Cologne, Aachen, and many others held in Germany and described in Tom. IV of the Councils. Diocesan councils are synods, or assemblies of one diocese under one Bishop, and therefore of lesser authority.

Question LI. What is the authority of councils?

Authority of councils. Councils possess great authority, both decretory a) and decisive b), which they do not have from the fact that they represent the universal church exactly c), but they have it dependently on sacred scripture and the agreement of their decrees with the same d); although from the subsequent consent of the churches existing throughout the world some authority accrues to them e), which however is not infallible or immune from the danger of erring f).

Proof. a. A public Doctor of the church, through piety, erudition, and love of truth, conciliates no small authority for himself, so that his judgment is held in high regard; therefore, the authority of many pious and erudite Doctors, who, after comparing and examining their opinions on matters, decree unanimously, is far greater. But the decretory authority of councils in constituting good order, and in sanctioning rites and correcting the morals of the church, is most highly esteemed, so that all things may be done εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν, decently and in order, 1 Cor. 14:40.

Proof. b. In dogmas of faith, about which doubt and controversy have arisen, the decisive authority of councils is of no little value; whose decision, however, is not simply judicial, but diaconal and ministerial, bound to the ordinary method of interpreting the sayings of scripture and of eliciting theological conclusions from them.

Proof. c. The authority of councils is not born from a perfect representation of the catholic church, since there is no council which exactly represents the universal church, and therefore there is no council that is absolutely universal and ecumenical. In the first council of Nicaea, from the west there were only two presbyters sent from Italy, one Bishop from Gaul, one from Spain, one from Africa. In the second and third Councils, there were none from the west; yet the Pontiffs DAMASUS and CELESTINE confirmed those councils, in their own name and that of the other Bishops of the west, whom they themselves had gathered at Rome. In the fourth council, there were only the legates of LEO, and besides, he himself sent the consent of the other Bishops of Spain, Gaul, and Italy, who, having celebrated councils in their own provinces, wrote to Leo that they followed his opinion in all things. See BELLARMINE, Book 1 on councils, XVI.

Proof. d. The sole norm of councils is Holy Scripture, from which they obtain all certainty. Wherefore councils that follow the word of God, sincerely declare the catholic faith.

Proof. e. Those councils which are received by many churches are considered to be of such authority that from them the doctrine of the true church may be collected not invalidly.

Proof. f. The decrees of councils, even if they are confirmed by the Roman Pontiff, are not of absolute infallibility. For 1) those who are liable to error outside a council, remain such when gathered in the council itself. But the doctors of the church outside a council are liable to error, unless they follow scripture alone as their guide and light. Therefore. 2) From the sacred letters it is certain that the Jewish ecclesiastical council erred most gravely, in which, although the high priest presided, with the whole synagogue and the entire sanhedrin sitting with him, yet Christ the Savior was blasphemously condemned as a seducer, Matth. 26:65. Which error was not only of fact, but also of faith. For Christ was condemned for this reason, because he said he was the Son of God, and so the sanhedrin stumbled on a fundamental article of faith. 3) That particular councils, whether national or provincial, have erred not lightly, is clearly established. For CYPRIAN instituted three national councils in Africa, in which the dogma of rebaptizing those who had been baptized by heretics was confirmed, as AUGUSTINE testifies in Book III on baptism against the Donatists. But, you will say: Particular councils, confirmed by the Roman Pontiff, do not err. Resp. The Roman Pontiff has no privilege of infallibility. That many Popes were heretics, Dr. GERHARD clearly shows in his Catholic Confession, book I, part II, chap. 2, fol. 71 (*).

4. That general councils are not immune from error, the second Council of Ephesus alone teaches by its example, which was general (**), and yet confirmed the Eutychian heresy, as BELLARMINE testifies, Book I on councils, ch. 6, fol. 10.

(*) Indeed, every single Roman Prelate, as the head of a corrupt church, is involved in many great errors.

(**) General councils, properly and strictly so named, are those whose decrees have been approved by the common consent of the whole church. For this reason, therefore, our theologians count no more than four ecumenical councils, and least of all do they think the second of Ephesus, in which things were impiously conducted, worthy of being held in their

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, denying that universal councils confirmed by the Roman Pontiff can err. They object:

I. Whatever represents the universal church is infallible; But a universal council, convoked and confirmed by the Pope, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the universal church, which is the pillar of truth, cannot err in the foundation of faith. Resp. There has never been an absolutely universal council which has perfectly represented the militant universal church.

II. The supreme judgment of Christians ought to be infallible; But a legitimate council is the supreme judgment of Christians, Matth. 18:17. Therefore. Resp. The supreme judgment of Christians is infallible as long as it is consonant with its norm, that is, the divine word. But it can happen that Christian judges either do not interpret the word of God correctly, or do not accurately elicit conclusions from it, and consequently fall into error.

III. Christ is in the midst of the Bishops gathered in his name, who gives them the light of wisdom which they seek, so that they cannot err, Matth. 18:20. Resp. In the words of Christ, there is a promise, given to all true Christians, of his gracious presence and of the hearing of their prayers. But if from this promise a privilege of infallibility could be inferred, it would be common to all the faithful gathered in the name of Christ.

Question LII. Are councils necessary?

The necessity of councils. Councils are necessary not absolutely a), but hypothetically b).

Proof. a. 1) Holy Scripture, without a numerous congregation of men, is sufficient, both for ἐλεγχον, or the solid refutation of false dogmas, and for ἐπανόρθωσιν, or the emendation of vicious morals, 2 Tim. 3:17. 2) God has given to each particular church also pastors and doctors, Eph. 4:12, so that the hearers, imbued with their information, may grow in faith and piety. 3) Even by letters, in the absence of presbyters, a controversy or schism can be composed, 1 Cor. 5:3. Therefore, councils are not absolutely necessary.

Proof. b. Councils are necessary for well-being, so that heresies may be repressed with greater authority, scandals may be removed by public censure, and ecclesiastical discipline may be solemnly sanctioned.

ON THE ANTICHRIST, THE ENEMY OF THE TRUE CHURCH

Question LIII. Who is the principal enemy of the true church?

The principal invisible enemy of the church is the devil a), the visible is the Antichrist b).

Proof. a. From 1 Peter 5:8. The principal adversary of the true believers and saints is the devil, like a roaring lion, walking about, seeking whom of them he may devour. Cf. Eph. 6:12.

Proof. b. From 2 Thess. 2:3, where the Antichrist is called the man of sin, the son of perdition, and the adversary (ἀντικείμενος), because he is the slave and author of sin, guilty of the perdition which he brings upon himself and others, and the enemy of Christ; since without his authority and right, he constitutes himself the head, king, and monarch of the church.

Question LIV. Who is the Antichrist?

Definition of the Antichrist. The Antichrist is the great adversary of Christ, arrogating to himself universal rule over the church of Christ a), extolling himself above Caesar, Kings, and Princes b), having his seat principally in the city of Rome c), introducing various corruptions of doctrine and public worship under the appearance of singular sanctity d), and propagating them by fraud and violence against the oppressed confessors of the true faith e), to be manifested at a time divinely appointed f), and to be destroyed by the spirit of the divine mouth, and to be utterly abolished by Christ when he comes for the final judgment g).

Obs. I. The name Antichrist is taken in two ways in the scriptures: a) Generally, for any heretics who disseminate false doctrines that are adverse to the doctrine of Christ, and pertinaciously defend them. Of whom John says: "even now," he says, "there are many Antichrists," 1 John 2:18, who are commonly called lesser Antichrists. b) Specifically and κατ' ἐξοχήν for that signal adversary of Christ, described in 2 Thess. 2, census. In a broader sense, indeed, the name of general assemblies has sometimes also been attributed to those which were instituted by the authority of the Emperors. But not even so does this name suit it.

whom for the sake of differentiation we call the great Antichrist.

Obs. II. Some authors distinguish between an Eastern and a Western Antichrist. They state the former to be Mohammed, the latter the Roman Pontiff. We admit that some properties of the Antichrist apply to Mohammed, but not all of them taken together, or collectively. For the great Antichrist sits in the temple of God, 2 Thess. 2:4, that is, he dominates in the midst of the church, which he does not want to be completely destroyed, like Mohammed, but preserved, and governed by him with monarchical power. We have described that great Antichrist according to all the characters and properties which are attributed to him in the sacred letters.

Proof. a. The Antichrist is ἀντικείμενος, that is: the great adversary, who opposes Christ not only in life and practice, but also in public doctrine, 2 Thess. 2:4, and sits in the temple of God. To sit, in sacred phraseology, is the same as to reign. The temple of God, however, is the church, Eph 2:20, in which the Antichrist sits not with respect to the position of his body, but with respect to the arrogation and usurpation of rule over the church. For he sits, and shows himself as if he were God, by arrogating to himself divine power, or supreme and monarchical power over the entire church, the power of making laws by which the consciences of Christians throughout the entire church are bound.

Proof. b. The Antichrist is described in 2 Thess. 2:4 as ὑπεραιρόμενος ἐπὶ πάντα λεγόμενον θεὸν, ἢ σέβασμα, extolling himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped. λεγόμενοι are earthly gods, or magistrates, Ps. 82:6. Σέβασμα, as ERASMUS interprets, is properly said of that which we adore and venerate with the highest reverence, and which excels in majesty, and can be translated into Latin as Numen. The Antichrist proceeds to such pride as to exalt himself above all magistrates, above all venerable things.

Proof. c. The general seat of the Antichrist is the church. The special one is the city of Rome. For the woman (that great harlot) in Rev. 17:3 is said to sit on a beast having seven heads, by which seven mountains are denoted, according to v. 9, which is a manifest description of seven-hilled Rome. And thus in 2 Thess. 2:6, 7, Paul teaches that there is something κατέχων, or someone κατέχων, i.e., restraining or holding back, which preventing, the kingdom of the Antichrist cannot yet be erected, namely the (Roman, not the modern, but that old one to which Rome was subject) empire, or the Emperors, who ruled in Rome with power; But with these removed, that ἄνομος (lawless one) would come, who hitherto could not have his throne in the same seat which the Emperors actually held.

Proof. d. An ἀποστασία, or a defection from heavenly truth and orthodox faith, is attributed to the Antichrist, 2 Thess. 2:7, where an apostasy is understood not as common, but horrendous in quality and very great in quantity. The Antichrist does not want this apostasy to be laid bare, but to be hidden, and therefore his mystery of iniquity is said to be effective, 2 Thess. 2:7. But the mystery of iniquity is impiety, cloaked with the appearance of piety. To spread this impiety, the boasting of miracles does not a little. For the coming of the Antichrist is according to the working of Satan, in all (miraculous) power and signs and lying wonders, 2 Thess. 2:9.

Proof. e. The Babylonian harlot, who is the Antichrist, sheds the blood of the saints and of the prophets (who contradict her), Rev. 16:6, so that she is drunk with the blood of the saints, the martyrs of Jesus, Rev. 17:6.

Proof. f. The ὁ ἄνομος will be revealed in his time, 2 Thess. 2:8. The Antichrist is ἄνομος, or lawless, who wants to be constrained by no bonds of laws, whose pride, affected monarchy, violence, and frauds will be uncovered and argued against at the divinely appointed time.

Proof. g. The Lord will destroy the Antichrist with the spirit of his mouth, and will abolish him with the brightness of his coming, 2 Thess. 2:8. Christ overcomes the Antichrist with the spirit of his mouth; because his wickedness is spiritual, and therefore to be destroyed not by carnal but by spiritual arms, until by the most glorious coming of Christ to the universal judgment he is utterly abolished.

Question LV. Is the Antichrist a specific human individual?

By the Antichrist in the sacred letters is not understood a specific human individual, or a single man lacking a successor, and completing all his malice within the space of a few years.

Proof. 1) The Antichrist, as Paul teaches, 2 Thess. 2:6, 7, was to come then, when that which stood in the way of his kingdom being erected, the Roman empire, namely the western, had been taken away, and he was to last until the glorious coming of Christ, ibid. v. 8. But one human individual cannot survive for so many centuries as intervene from the destruction of the western Roman empire until the glorious coming of Christ. Therefore, by the Antichrist is not understood a specific human individual.

2. In the lifetime of one man, neither could the kingdom of the Antichrist have been planted, nor can the things be carried out which are predicted in the scriptures to be carried out in it. Therefore, the Antichrist is not one human individual. The consequence is evident. The antecedent, however, is proven; because a) the kingdom of the Antichrist was to be planted not by open force and arms, but by false doctrines, speciously encrusted with manifold fraud, and also by lying signs and wonders, confirmed in appearance with Satan cooperating, 2 Thess. 2:9, 10. b) The fraud of the Antichrist was to spread far and wide throughout the world, so that peoples and nations everywhere would be induced to ἀποστασίαν, or to a defection from the truth, Rev. 17:1, all of which cannot happen in the lifetime of one man.

Question LVI. Is the Roman Pontiff the Antichrist?

The Roman Pontiff is the great Antichrist.

Proof. Whoever is ἀντικείμενος, or the great adversary of Christ, 1) arrogating to himself universal rule in the church, 2) extolling himself above Kings, Princes, and the Roman Emperor himself, 3) having his seat principally in the city of Rome, 4) introducing various corruptions of doctrine and public worship under the appearance of singular sanctity, 5) and propagating them by fraud and violence against the oppressed confessors of the true faith, 6) manifested at a divinely appointed time, 7) to be destroyed by the spirit of the divine mouth, and to be utterly abolished by Christ when he comes for the final judgment, he is the great Antichrist. But the Roman Pontiff is ἀντικείμενος etc. Therefore. We have demonstrated the truth of the major in Question LIV. The individual members of the minor are validly established. For

1. The Roman Pontiff is ἀντικείμενος; because without the command and authority of Christ he wants to be the ecumenical Bishop, and that infallible, the head, monarch, and spouse of the church; and therefore he arrogates to himself the honor proper to Christ. He sits therefore in the temple of God, and shows himself as if he were God.

2. The Roman Pontiffs have learned from BONIFACE VIII to exalt themselves so much above the Roman Emperor, τὸν σεβαστὸν (as he is called, Acts 25:21, 25), as the sun is preferred to the moon. Whence they have dared more than once to depose Caesars, Kings, Princes from the throne, to transfer empires, kingdoms, and principalities to others, to absolve subjects from their oath of fidelity, and thus in fact to exalt themselves against all that is called God or Numen.

3. The Pope has his seat in the seven-hilled city of Rome, with τῷ κατέχοντι, the Roman empire, having been removed.

4. The apostasy of the Roman Pontiff from the heavenly truth has been shown above in question XXXVI.

5. How much Christian blood has been shed at the instigation of the Roman Pontiff, Germany, France, Spain, Belgium, etc., have learned by many experiments.

6. The mystery of papal impiety was revealed by LUTHER and his followers.

7. Christ successively overcomes his adversary, namely the Pope, with spiritual arms, whom he will so abolish by the brightness of his coming to the universal judgment, that an end will be put to his ecclesiastical monarchy.

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, who deny that the Pope is the Antichrist. Their more important arguments are:

I. The Antichrist is one, 2 Thess. 2:4. The Pope is not one; because many Roman Pontiffs are constituted. Therefore, the Pope is not the Antichrist. Resp. The Antichrist is one, not in a numerical or monadic unity, in the way that the sun is one, but in a successive unity in the way that there is one king of France, who has his successors.

II. The Antichrist departs from Christ, 2 Thess. 2:3. The Roman Pontiff does not depart from Christ. Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between a total and a partial defection. The defection of the Roman Pontiff from the doctrine of Christ is not total, since he is said to sit in the temple of God; but it is partial, and for that reason notable and horrendous in quality, and very great in quantity, i.e., in accomplices, places, and times.

III. The Antichrist denies Christ, 1 John 4:3. The Roman Pontiff does not, etc.

Therefore. Resp. The Roman Pontiff denies Christ not openly, but consequently, while he undermines the mediatorial office of Christ, and teaches that the merit of Christ is not sufficient for our sins, but that the merits of the saints must be added to it, and that indulgences for sins are to be bought for a certain payment of money.

IV. After the Roman empire is overthrown, the Antichrist comes. But in these our times, the Roman empire has not yet been overthrown. Therefore, in these our times, the Antichrist has not yet come. The major is proven from 2 Thess. 2:6. Καὶ νῦν τὸ κατέχον οἶδατε, "And now you know what is restraining," that he may be revealed in his time. "For the mystery of lawlessness is already at work; only he who now restrains will do so until he is out of the way." The ancient Fathers agree, understanding by τὸ κατέχον the Roman empire, which stands in the way of the Antichrist's kingdom being erected. Resp. I distinguish between the old western Roman empire, and the modern Holy Roman-German empire. Not the latter, but the former stood in the way of the Antichrist's kingdom. For since the seat of the Antichrist was to be fixed in the city of Rome, and this was subject to the old Roman empire, and was its primary seat, it could not happen that the Antichrist had his seat fixed at Rome. For two supreme empires, such as the old Roman was, and such as the kingdom of the Antichrist was to be in its time, could not subsist together in one Rome.

V. Two witnesses will come at the same time that the Antichrist comes, Rev. 11:3. But these two witnesses (whoever they may be) have not yet come. Therefore, neither has the Antichrist come. Resp. All confessors of the truth and adversaries of the Antichrist are called two witnesses, both on account of their small number, and because according to the law of God in the mouth of two or three witnesses every truth consists.

VI. The Antichrist will cast fire from heaven to earth; The Roman Pontiff does not cast fire from heaven to earth. Therefore. The major is evident from Rev. 13:13. Resp. I distinguish between proper and metaphorical fire. Although the Pope does not cast down proper fire onto the earth, he nevertheless casts down metaphorical fire, namely the thunderbolt of excommunication, upon all who resist his superstition.

VII. The Antichrist will reign for 42 months, Rev. 11:2. The Pope has reigned for many centuries. Therefore, etc. Resp. I distinguish between lunar and mystical months. The cited passage cannot be understood of lunar months properly so called; because those unfortunate works which the Antichrist will perform cannot be accomplished in so brief a time. And therefore, mystical months are noted. But a mystical month comprises 30 years, see Ezek. 4:5, 6. Therefore, 42 mystical months are 1260 years. Since, however, the year of the beginning of the Antichrist is not clearly established for us, from this term the final year of the world cannot be certainly concluded.

SUSPIRIUM

To You, GOD the FATHER, FATHER of mercies, fount of consolation, preserver of the works which You have created, be praise and immortal glory, that You have called me, redeemed by the most precious blood of your only-begotten SON, to the fellowship of Your true church. With a grateful heart I acknowledge that, with You as my guide and protector, I have been made a member of that mystical body, whose head is my JESUS, with whom it is my care and heart's desire to be joined by a perpetual bond of faith. Preserve me, I pray, in the kingdom of grace, and at last transfer me to the kingdom of glory, so that in the triumphant church, full of joy, I may triumph, and sing your praises forever.

CHAPTER II.
ON THE
THREEFOLD HIERARCHICAL STATE, AND IN PARTICULAR
ON THE
ECCLESIASTICAL STATE OR MINISTRY.

Question I. How many states or orders are divinely instituted in the church?

THE STATES OR orders divinely instituted in the church are three: The ecclesiastical state, the political, and the domestic. Proof. The ecclesiastical state serves for the collection and instruction of the church, and is opposed to heresies and corruptions of doctrine: The political state serves for the defense and external governance of the church, and is opposed to tyranny and robbery: The domestic state serves for the propagation of the church, and is opposed to wandering lusts. This threefold state is also called a threefold hierarchy.

Question II. What is the ecclesiastical ministry?

Definition of the ecclesiastical ministry. The ecclesiastical ministry is a sacred and public office, divinely instituted, and committed to certain and suitable men through a legitimate vocation, so that, instructed with a special power, they may teach the word of God, administer the sacraments, and preserve ecclesiastical discipline, for the promotion of the glory of God and the salvation of men.

Question III. What is the principal efficient cause of the ecclesiastical ministry?

Principal efficient cause. The principal efficient cause of the ecclesiastical ministry is God a), the Father b), the Son c), and the Holy Spirit d).

Proof. a. Just as God is the author of grace, so in him resides the force and power of instituting and preserving the office by which the means of grace are applied to men. God is the author of the ecclesiastical ministry: 1) by promising doctors of the church, and calling the promised to the sacred office, Jer. 3:15. 1 Cor. 12:28; 2) by revealing those things which pertain to rightly carrying out the sacred ministry, e.g., what doctrine is to be preached, Gal. 1:8, what pertains to teaching, reproof, exhorting, 2 Tim. 3:14, what sacraments, and how they are to be administered, 1 Cor. 11:23; 3) by instructing the doctors of the church with necessary gifts, 2 Cor. 3:5. ch. 4:6. 4) by concurring with the actions of the ministers, and bestowing salutary success, Matth. 10:20. 1 Cor. 3:6.

Proof. b. The constitution of the ecclesiastical ministry, and the vocation of certain persons to the sacred office, is a divine action ad extra, common to the three persons of the divinity. Concerning God the Father, Paul says in Gal. 1:16: God called me, that he might reveal his son in me.

Proof. c. Christ gave Apostles, Prophets, Evangelists, Doctors and Pastors, Eph. 4:11, 12, who expressly says: John 20:21, As the Father has sent me, so I send you.

Proof. d. The Holy Spirit has appointed Bishops to feed the church, Acts 20:28.

Question IV. What is here understood by divine vocation?

Vocation. By divine vocation here is understood the deputation of a certain and suitable person to the ecclesiastical ministry with the power of publicly teaching, administering the sacraments, and exercising ecclesiastical discipline, made by God either alone, or with the intervening arbitrary work of men.

Obs. Therefore, a distinction must be observed between the vocation of all men to the church, and the vocation of certain persons to the particular ecclesiastical state. The former is called general, the latter personal.

Question V. How manyfold is the divine vocation to the ecclesiastical ministry?

Division of Vocation. The vocation to the ecclesiastical ministry is twofold, one immediate, or extraordinary, the other mediate, or ordinary (*).

The immediate, or extraordinary vocation is (**) that by which God alone calls, either by immediately addressing a certain person and sending him to teach, or by immediately commanding others to designate this or that doctor, or by showing by an external sign whom he himself has chosen a).

The mediate, or ordinary vocation is that by which God calls a certain person to the ecclesiastical ministry, with the intervening arbitrary work of those men who are members of the church b).

Proof. a. God calls immediately in a threefold way (***): 1) By immediately commanding a certain person to teach. Thus God immediately and αὐτοπροσώπως addressed Moses; I send you to Pharaoh, Exod. 3:10. Jeremiah; I have appointed you a prophet to the nations, Jer. 1:5. And Christ αὐτοπροσώπως called the Apostles, Matth. 10:1. 2) By immediately commanding others to designate this or that doctor. Thus God immediately commanded Moses to declare Aaron a priest; Elijah, to declare Elisha a prophet of the Lord, Exod. 28:1. 1 Kings 19:16. 3) By an external sign, showing whom God himself had chosen. In this way we read that Matthias the Apostle was called and elected, Acts 1:14 ff., where the Apostles, having prayed, said; You, Lord, who know the hearts of all, show (by an external sign, which was the lot) whom you have chosen; God therefore, by the lot, as an external sign, showed that he himself had chosen Matthias, v. 26. And so this vocation was also immediate, otherwise Matthias could not have been held a true Apostle, since for the Apostolate a divine, and that immediate, vocation is especially required (*).

Proof. b. Although the mediate vocation, which is done by the church with God moderating, does not obtain a rank of dignity equal to the immediate, its principal cause is nevertheless God, so that the mediate vocation should also be considered divine. For 1) The Lord of the harvest sends laborers

(*) Paul himself not obscurely indicates this very distinction, in Gal. 1:1; Ἀπόστολος οὐκ ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων (An apostle not from men) is a false Apostle, who ran by the impulse of his own desire, never having been ordered by God to go; δι' ἀνθρώπου (through man), is one sent mediately by God, in the manner of Matthias, for whose election God indeed declared his will by a certain sign; yet the Apostles, obeying this will, commanded this very office in God's name, immediately coopting him into their college. (For that is properly called an immediate legation in which God employs no minister and interpreter of his will at all; ἀλλὰ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (but through Jesus Christ) (which little word in this expression has the same force as ἐκ, see Rom. 1:4) καὶ θεοῦ πατρός (and God the Father), is he whom God and Christ have sent, with no one in any way being an interpreter of the divine will).

(**) There is some difference between these two. Everything immediate is indeed extraordinary; but not vice versa. It sometimes happens that what is called a mediate legation is carried out in a just manner, but in a singular way, by reason of certain circumstances, connected with each other by divine providence otherwise than is usually the case. But everything rare, singular, and exceptional is something extraordinary.

(***) If the name of immediate legation is used in a broader sense, so that it is that by which God himself makes his will known, whether to the man being sent, or to a minister, who is to make him certain of God's will.

(*) The necessary properties of an Apostle, besides this one, were two: 1) that he had seen Christ with his own eyes, 1 Cor. 9:1. 2) that he was a common Doctor of the universal church.

into his harvest, Matth. 9:38. He sends, as long as the harvest lasts; but it lasts until the consummation of the age. But he does not always send immediately, but mediately: Therefore, those who are sent by the mediation of men are also sent by God. 2) The Ephesian presbyters, mediately called, are said to have been appointed by the Holy Spirit himself to feed the church of God, Acts 20:28. Silvanus and Timothy were approved by God, so that the gospel might be entrusted to them (mediately), 1 Thess 2:4, cf. ch. 1:1. Archippus, though not immediately called, received his ministry from the Lord (namely, through the mediation of men), Col. 4:17. 3) The mediate vocation happens according to the order divinely prescribed, 2 Tim. 2:2. Tit. 1:5-9. Therefore, it is divine. 4) God adorns those mediately called with excellent gifts. An example is Stephen, mediately elected and called, whom God instructed with wonderful gifts, so that no one could resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spoke, Acts 6:10. 5) God grants salutary success to ministers mediately called. For Timothy, ἐμμέσως (mediately) called, could save both himself and those who heard him, 1 Tim. 4:16.

You say: I. Besides the immediate and mediate vocation, there is a mixed one, such as was that of LUTHER for the purifying of the doctrine of faith from the corruptions of the Papists, which was extraordinary, and yet mediate.

Resp. The vocation of LUTHER to the work of reformation was mediate, although in the work of reformation itself he was blessed by God with extraordinary grace and success.

You say: II. God does not accompany the mediate vocation with special grace; because in it many arts and many abuses intervene.

Resp. As God does not cease to cooperate with created things by a general concurrence, although many things may intervene contrary to his intention in the action; so by a special concurrence God influences the mediate vocation, even if arts or abuses intervene. For a distinction must always be made between the human and the divine work. When a King is to be elected, very many arts intervene, yet the divine ordinance does not cease, Rom. 13:4.

Question VI. Is an immediate vocation to be expected today?

An immediate vocation is not to be expected An immediate vocation is not to be expected in the church today.

Proof. 1. Those who are to teach publicly in the church after the Apostles, it is necessary that they be suitable and faithful, having received the commission of teaching from other men. For thus Paul addresses Timothy: "The things that you have heard from me among many witnesses, commit these to faithful men who will be able to teach others also," 2 Tim. 2:2. Where the suitability of the subject and the commission of the office on the part of others who are calling is supposed, there a mediate vocation, carefully attending to the qualities of the man, made by men, has its place.

2. Titus was to appoint presbyters in Crete; and indeed such as were adorned with a good testimony of doctrine and life, Tit. 1:5. Therefore, an immediate vocation after the times of the Apostles is no longer to be expected. The reason for the consequence is; because 1) Titus called mediately: 2) Paul prescribes to Titus certain laws of prudence, lest by error he should place an unworthy man over the church. But to God who calls immediately, or is about to call, laws of prudence or caution cannot be prescribed, lest he should err in calling, prefer the unworthy to the worthy, or obtrude a scandalous person upon the church with scandal. Therefore, all these things are prescribed to men, who could err in calling, and through whom God calls mediately.

Question VII. What is the less principal efficient cause of the ecclesiastical ministry?

Less principal cause. The less principal cause constituting the ministry is the church, to which has been granted by God the right of electing, ordaining, and calling suitable ministers of the divine word a), while however observing a decent order in the exercise of this right b).

Obs. I. Distinguish between the supreme right of calling ministers of the divine word, and the delegated right. The former belongs to God, as the principal cause, calling mediately or immediately by his own authority; the latter belongs to the church, as the less principal cause, calling not by its own authority, but in the name of God. Whence we know that prayers were once joined with the act of vocation, Acts 6:6.

Obs. II. Distinguish between the right of calling ministers, and the exercise of the right. The right of calling belongs to the universal church, and to all its orders and members; the exercise of the right, however, varies, according to the different convention and custom of a particular church, whose duty it is, however, to preserve decent order and avoid confusion.

Proof. a. 1) Whatever touches all, especially in a matter of salvation, ought to be carried out by the suffrages of all; But the vocation of ministers, etc. Therefore.

2. Whoever are ministers of the church ought to be called by the whole church; But the preachers of the divine word, etc. 1 Cor. 1:22. 2 Cor. 4:5. Col. 1:25. Therefore. The major is established; because the church, as the mother of the family, cannot be deprived of the right of hiring ministers.

3. The church has, as to a spouse, been given the keys of the kingdom of heaven by Christ the spouse, Matth. 16:18, ch. 18:17, and therefore just as it is hers to open and close the kingdom of heaven, so it is hers to appoint ministers, through whom she closes and opens.

4. Those whose duty it is to beware of false prophets and to test the spirits whether they are from God, a pastor of the church should not be called without their consent; But it is the duty of all members of the church, even the laity, to beware for themselves, etc. Therefore. The minor is evident from Matth. 7:15. 1 John 4:1.

5. This was the practice of the primitive church, from the time of the Apostles, that public ministers were appointed with the consent of all the members of the church. Thus the Apostles said to the multitude of the disciples, or the faithful; "Therefore, brethren, seek out from among you seven men of good reputation, full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business," Acts 6:3. They were indeed deacons, specifically destined for the care of the ecclesiastical treasury, yet not strangers to the office of teaching, but rather to be chosen before others on account of their skill in sacred doctrine, so that they could teach. Cf. ch. 14:23, where Paul and Barnabas are said, having collected the suffrages of the faithful (χειροτονήσαντες, so that individuals cast their votes by raising their hands), to have appointed presbyters in every church. And that ministers of the church were accustomed to be appointed in this way for the course of many centuries after the time of the Apostles, Dr. GERHARDUS shows at length in his loci, on the ministry, q. 94-199.

Proof. b. The vocation of ministers, taken generally and collectively, as it comprises the election, ordination, and vocation specifically so called, by the whole church and all three estates, must be conducted in such a way that due order is preserved and confusion is avoided. For God is not the God of confusion, but of order, 1 Cor. 14:33. Therefore, examination, ordination, and inauguration belong to the presbytery; nomination, presentation, and confirmation by letters of vocation belong to the Christian magistrate; consent, suffrage, and approbation belong to the people.

The Antithesis is that of 1) the Papists, who assert that the right of calling ministers of the divine word belongs to the presbytery alone; 2) the Arminians, who assert it for the magistrate alone; 3) the Anabaptists, who assert it for the common people alone. Their more important arguments are (*):

I. In the same way that Aaron and the Apostles were once called, in the same way today the preachers of the divine word are to be called: But they were called without the suffrage of the magistrate and the people. Therefore. The major is proven; 1) From the express words of Paul, Hebr. 5:4. 2) Because the sacred preachers are the successors of the Apostles. The minor is proven; 1) because Aaron was called by Moses, Exod. 28. 2) The Apostles were called by Christ, without the consent of the magistrate and the people, John 1:21. Resp. 1) I distinguish between a general and a special agreement. Our vocation ought to agree with the vocation of Aaron and the Apostles in general, that it be a divine and legitimate vocation; but not in species; because the vocation of Aaron and the Apostles was immediate, ours is mediate. The immediate and mediate vocation agree as to the thing itself, or the office of teaching; but the mode of vocation is different. 2) Moses was not the High Priest, but a Prince and a signal Prophet; Nor was Aaron called by Moses, but was called immediately by God himself, and was only declared by Moses.

(*) The first six are of the Roman Catholics. The seventh is of the Anabaptists. I see no opposition from the Arminians, unless you refer the fifth here, which is indeed common to all three sects.

II. The Apostles, without the suffrage of the magistrate and the people, appointed Bishops, e.g., Paul appointed Titus as Bishop in Crete, Tit. 1:5. Therefore, today bishops and pastors are to be called without the suffrage of the people. Resp. I distinguish between a church to be planted, or first constituted, and one planted, or constituted. When a church is first to be planted and constituted among infidel nations, the suffrage of the people is not to be awaited, nor is the authority of an infidel magistrate to be regarded. The Apostles sent Bishops and pastors to infidel peoples yet to be converted, without requiring the consent of the hearers. But where the church was planted and constituted, they did not place ministers over the churches without the consent of the people, Acts 1:24, ch. 6:3, 14:23.

III. Whoever are like sheep cannot call a shepherd; But the hearers etc. John 21:17. The major is proven; because the calling of a pastor pertains to the regimen and governance of the church. But just as sheep do not rule, but are ruled; so hearers cannot call a pastor. Resp. 1) Different times must be distinguished. When the members of the church elect a pastor, they are not yet sheep; nor is the one to be elected to the sacred ministry actually a pastor. 2) It is a bad conclusion from irrational sheep to rational ones. For precisely because they are not brute sheep, but rational, they should use reason illuminated by the word of God well, lest they elect a hireling or a wolf for a pastor.

IV. Whoever cannot judge of the doctrine of a pastor, they cannot call a pastor; But the laity etc. Therefore. Resp. 1) By denying the major. Although the laity cannot judge exactly of doctrine, since that belongs to the presbytery; they can nevertheless judge of the external gifts and the life of the person to be elected, and ratify the judgment of the presbytery concerning the doctrine. 2) The prophetic, or exact and solid, judgment of orthodoxy (ὀρθοδοξία) is indeed with the presbytery; but a discerning judgment (δοκιμαστικόν) is not to be denied to the laity. For Paul generally addresses all the Corinthians: "Judge for yourselves what I say," 1 Cor. 10:15.

V. Whatever mode of calling is subject to dissensions and tumults, that is not legitimate; But the mode of calling which belongs to the whole church is etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because it not rarely happens that the presbytery disagrees with the magistrate, and he with the people, when a minister is to be called. Resp. I distinguish between that which happens per se, and that which happens per accidens. Per accidens dissension can arise about the vocation of a minister; yet by good methods those seeds of dissension can be eliminated.

VI. Ecclesiastical power does not belong to the political magistrate; The power of calling ministers of the divine word is ecclesiastical; Therefore. The major is established; because the political magistrate is concerned with civil matters, not with sacred or ecclesiastical ones. Resp. The magistrate is concerned not only with civil matters, but also with external ecclesiastical matters, that is, the external disposition of sacred things. Internal ecclesiastical matters, or the internal and proximate administration of sacred things, is with the presbytery.

VII. The more important part of the church is the common people; Therefore, to them most of all belongs the vocation of ministers. Resp. The common people are the more important part of the church, by reason of multitude; the magistrate, by reason of external governance; the presbytery, by reason of the internal administration of sacred things, and of judgment concerning orthodoxy. Therefore, the right of calling belongs to the whole church, but the exercise of the right ought to be done in due order. You say; The right of calling belongs to the patron. Resp. We here take vocation in a general sense, as it includes election, ordination, and vocation specially understood.

Question VIII. Is a legitimate call necessary for any minister of the church?

The necessity of Vocation. For every minister, teaching publicly and ordinarily in a constituted church, or about to teach, a legitimate call, and today a mediate one, is necessary, not only for the sake of εὐταξίας, or decorum a), but also by reason of divine command b).

Obs. I. The question is not about any teachers whatsoever, but about those who function in the office of teaching in public assemblies of the church; for we freely grant that it is not only licit for the faithful to teach one another privately, to admonish, to recall the erring to the way, but it is also rightly counted among the works of charity.

Obs. II. Our discourse is about a church rightly planted, or constituted, not about a church to be planted or constituted. In gathering and constituting a church, where there are not present those who teach by an ordinary call, nor are there present those who can call, in this extreme case of necessity, where the glory of God and the salvation of one's neighbor are uniquely to be considered, we do not unwillingly concede that every Christian is bound to instill the catechetical milk of the word of justice to the unskilled.

Obs. III. The question is not about an immediate vocation, which is not to be expected in the church today, but about a mediate one.

Proof. a. A legitimate vocation is necessary for those who wish to undertake the office of teaching publicly in the assemblies of the church, for the sake of preserving order, so that all things in the church may be done εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τὰξιν, decently and in order, 1 Cor. 14:40. For the church is not an ἄτακτος congregation, or a confused gathering, but one rightly ordered. For an ecclesiastical hierarchy has been instituted by Christ himself, who gave some as Apostles, some as Prophets, some as Evangelists, some as Pastors and Doctors, for the restoration of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edification of the body of Christ, Eph. 4:11, namely, that there may be in the church those who are obligated at set times to the care of souls and to teaching, to whom all may have recourse who are in need of doctrine and solace, since they possess the power of correcting and reproving secure sinners, of remitting and retaining sins, etc., which roles are everywhere in the scriptures assigned to the called ministers of the church.

Proof. b. 1) From the express command of the Holy Spirit speaking through Paul, Tit. 1:5: "For this reason I left you in Crete, that you should set in order the things that are lacking, and appoint elders in every city as I commanded you." See above, question VI.

2. From the universal axiom of the Holy Spirit, Hebr. 5:4: "And no man takes this honor to himself, but he who is called by God, just as Aaron was."

Obs. I. The Apostle speaks not of fact, but of right.

Obs. II. He speaks not only of the Aaronic priesthood, but also generally of the sacred ministry. For the text is general: "No one takes the honor to himself," namely of the sacred ministry, which is both worthy of honor and laborious, just like the priesthood of Aaron.

You say: He takes something to himself who arrogates to himself that which is not due to him; But to him who is apt to teach, and is of an blameless life, the ecclesiastical office is due; Therefore it cannot rightly be said that he who is apt to teach others, and is of a blameless life, takes to himself the office of teaching, or that honor which is in the office of teaching.

Resp. This dignity is due to the worthy, but in an ordered way, i.e., with the order of vocation being observed. He who does not await this, takes and arrogates to himself that which in this manner is not due to him. For suitability of person and integrity of life are required for the person, but a mission is required for the office. Otherwise, whoever finds political prudence in himself could licitly rush into the senatorial office, and indeed even the royal one. Surely Aaron, indeed Christ himself, most worthy of the office, awaited a vocation; much more therefore should ministers today await a vocation.

3. From apostolic authority, Rom. 10:15: "How shall they preach unless they are sent?" From which apostolic oracle we conclude; For the preaching of the divine word a vocation is necessary; Therefore also for undertaking the ecclesiastical office. The consequence is proven; Preaching is part of the ministry, with which the Apostle so joins a legitimate mission, that from a defect of mission he concludes to an illicit work of the ministry. Observe here the apostolic gradation; Invocation presupposes faith, faith the hearing of the word, hearing the preaching of the gospel, preaching a divine mission; because without this no one will preach lawfully. For the Apostle speaks of a moral impossibility, not a physical one. For physically it is indeed possible for someone to preach without a vocation, but not morally, that is, not rightly, not decorously, not in the manner expressed in the scriptures.

You say: The Apostle 1) is dealing with an immediate vocation to the apostolate, not with a mediate vocation. For there is a twofold mode of appointment; one, which is through mission, the other through the acquisition of those things which Paul requires in a bishop, 1 Tim. 3:2. This latter suffices here, and can be called an internal vocation. 2) The Apostle is dealing with a mission to preach something new, which requires some vocation and external mission, but not of a doctrine already spread in a planted church, for which an internal vocation suffices.

Resp. To 1) An internal vocation is invented in vain (*). For Paul in 1 Tim. 3 is not dealing with vocation, but with the qualities and adjuncts of a bishop already appointed, by which his ability or aptitude is declared. But the aptitude of the subject for the ministry is one thing, and the vocation properly so called is another. The former consists in certain qualities, but it is not the vocation itself, as a divine act, which the aptitude of the subject precedes. Many are fit for the magistracy, yet they do not take up the dignity of a magistrate unless a vocation follows.

To 2) The necessity of a mission is required not because of the newness of the doctrine, but because of the reason of a particular state and order; because the ministry is a state and order constituted by God, in which no one can be, unless the divine will, signified by a mission, is presupposed. For the Apostle does not connect the necessity of a mission with the doctrine, considered under the aspect of newness, but with preaching, prescinding from the quality of the doctrine, whether it be new or old. Add to this, that the Apostles did not preach a doctrine new in essence, Acts 26:22. Paul expressly testifies that he said nothing besides what is contained in the prophets, Acts 28:23. Nor does κηρύσσειν always signify to preach something new. For a Jew is also κηρύσσω, μὴ κλέπτειν (preaching, "do not steal"), Rom. 2:21, which however is most ancient.

4. From the condition of the ministry. The ministers of the church are ambassadors of God, 2 Cor. 5:20. But no one functions in the office of an ambassador unless he is sent by a prince. They are stewards of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. 4:1. A steward can only be appointed by the master of the house. Therefore, without a legitimate vocation no one ought to preach the word of God and dispense the sacraments. For Jehovah detests those who run, but are not sent, Jer. 23:21.

The Antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, Socinians, and Weigelians, who deny that a mediate vocation is necessary for a minister of the church by reason of divine command. Their principal arguments are:

I. Whatever is a good work, for the performance of it a special vocation is not required; But to desire the office of a bishop is a good work, 1 Tim. 3:1. Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between an ordered desire and a disordered rush. To desire the office of a bishop is altogether a good work; but it signifies modestly and decently offering one's service to the church for a legitimate vocation; But to run signifies to thrust oneself into the sacred office without a special vocation. This is called shameful, Jer. 23:12. Add to this, that some good works are special, for the performance of which a special vocation and ordinance of God is required, e.g., to govern the republic well, to educate children honorably, etc., to which the public preaching of the gospel is to be counted.

II. Whatever is a work of charity, that is fitting for all, because works of charity are to be exercised by all; But to teach others is a work of charity; Therefore. The minor is proven from James 5:19. Resp. I distinguish between works of charity common to all, and those proper to certain persons. To teach in public assemblies is indeed a work of charity, but it is proper to certain persons called to a public office; Just as to function as an ambassador is a good work, if it concerns the welfare of the republic; yet nevertheless no one ought to take upon himself the name and role of an ambassador, unless it is imposed upon him by the one who sends. Moreover, any pious Christian can inform his neighbor privately without a special vocation.

III. Whoever are priests before God, they can teach and inform others without a special vocation, for to teach others belongs to priests; All Christians are priests before God, 1 Peter 2:2, Rev. 1:6. Therefore. Resp. 1) By distinguishing between Priests so called by reason of the ecclesiastical office, and by reason of spiritual sacrifices. All Christians are Priests, by reason of spiritual sacrifices, such as are: prayers, praises, alms, mortification of the body; but not all are Priests, by reason of the public ecclesiastical office. For the Priesthood also belongs to women, with respect to spiritual sacrifices;

(*) Namely, denoted by these words of Paul. For as to the matter itself, no one will deny that there is truly an internal legation, or a signification of the divine will about undertaking the office, which is an incitement of the soul to undertake this office willingly, and a bestowal of the necessary gifts both of nature and of grace.

but not by reason of the ecclesiastical office, 1 Tim. 2:12. 2) Christians are not only called Priests, but also Kings before God. If therefore it is licit for Christians, on account of their spiritual priesthood, outside a case of necessity, to perform acts proper to the ecclesiastical priesthood; it follows that it is likewise licit for them, on account of their spiritual kingdom, equally outside a case of necessity, to perform acts proper to the political kingdom. From which a nefarious Anarchy will spring.

IV. If in the primitive church some taught without a special vocation, today Christians can teach publicly without it; The antecedent is true; Therefore also the consequent. The consequence is clear; because the primitive church was most pure, and most orthodox. The antecedent is proven; because the Christians dispersed after the death of Stephen, Acts 4:4, Philip, Acts 8:5, Apollos, Acts 14:4, taught the gospel in various places without a special vocation. Resp. 1) It is not always licit to argue negatively from historical accounts in Holy Scripture. 2) Those dispersed were certainly called. For among them was Philip the evangelist, Acts 21:8. But one cannot be an evangelist without a vocation. Therefore, we have no doubt that Apollos was also legitimately called. For instance; The Fathers of the primitive church, namely ORIGEN, homily II on ch. 18 of Numbers, AMBROSE, in his commentary on ch. IV to the Ephesians, testify that laymen preached the gospel among nations ignorant of the Christian faith. Resp. I distinguish between a church to be constituted, and one constituted. When a Christian man is among gentiles ignorant of the Christian faith, then he can, to the best of his ability, teach others and propagate the doctrine of Christ, urged by charity and necessity; but where the church is constituted, no one should thrust himself into a public office without an ordinary vocation.

V. 1 Cor. 16:15. Concerning those who were of the household of Stephanas, it is said that they ordained themselves to the ministry of the saints. Resp. The Apostle implies that the household of Stephanas did not thrust themselves into the ecclesiastical ministry, which would be against Hebr. 5:4, but that they dedicated themselves by voluntary charity to ministering to the saints in those things which pertain to τὰ βιωτικά (daily life). They ordained themselves to the ministry of hospitality, not of preaching.

VI. Academic students are admitted to give sacred sermons without a special vocation; Therefore an ordinary vocation to the ecclesiastical office is not necessary. Resp. I distinguish between preaching exercises and the solemn office of preaching. The sermons of students are exercises, by which they modestly offer their future service to the church, but they do not arrogate to themselves the solemn office of preaching.

Question IX. What is the ordination of a minister of the church?

Ordination. Ordination is a solemn act by which a suitable person, in the sight of God and the church, is declared to have been examined and legitimately called a), is set apart from profane business, and a certain office to be undertaken in the church is commended to him b), to which he is inaugurated by a Bishop or Presbyter, through χειροθεσίαν (the laying on of hands) and solemn prayers c), and is gravely admonished about rightly performing his office d).

Proof. a. Ordination is nothing other than a public testimony, by which the vocation of a person suitable for the ministry is, in the sight of God and in his name, declared to be legitimate and divine, as CHEMNITZ says, part III, loci, fol. 137. Although therefore ordination does not make the election and vocation, but presupposes it, yet if someone has been legitimately called, that ecclesiastical rite declares and publicly confirms that the vocation which preceded is legitimate. Thus Paul, although he was immediately called, yet Ananias is sent to lay hands on him, so that the church may be certain of his vocation, Acts 9:17. Since, however, hands are to be laid on no one hastily, as Paul warns, 1 Tim. 5:22, the suitability of the subject is to be explored by an examination, which is a diligent inquiry and proof, whether the person whom the church calls is fit for the arduous ecclesiastical office to be committed to him. "Let them first be proved; then let them serve, if they be blameless," says Paul in 1 Tim. 3:10. Examination.

Proof. b. Ordination formally consists in the separation of the called person from profane business, and the destination to the public ecclesiastical office. We learn this from 2 Tim. 2:4: "You therefore must endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. No one engaged in warfare entangles himself with the affairs of this life, that he may please him who enlisted him as a soldier." But if the soldiers of this age are not occupied with commerce, agriculture, or civil crafts, much less is it fitting for the soldiers of Christ to be immersed in civil business. For this reason the Holy Spirit requires in pious ministers ἀφορισμόν, or separation from profane cares, saying: "Now separate to Me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them." Then, after they had fasted and prayed, and laid hands on them, they sent them away, Acts 13:2-3.

Proof. c. That the ministering cause of ordination can be both a Presbyter and a Bishop is clear 1) from 1 Tim. 4:14: "Do not neglect the gift that is in you, which was given to you by prophecy with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." From which we gather: grace was conferred on Timothy by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. Therefore, ordination should not necessarily be done exclusively by a Bishop, but can also be done by presbyters. The consequence is proven: a) The reason for ordaining Timothy can still obtain in the church. b) Presbytery is a collective noun, and indicates a multitude of elders concurring in the laying on of hands; a Bishop, however, is one and a single individual. 2) By divine right, a Bishop and a Presbyter do not differ, except only in their names, and therefore by divine right the power of ordaining belongs to both. We give credence to this our assertion, a) from Acts 20:17, 28, where Paul, having summoned the presbyters, said: "Therefore take heed to yourselves and to all the flock, among which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers (Bishops)." Therefore in the apostolic church the same were Bishops and Presbyters. b) From Phil. 1:1, where Paul and Timothy pray for grace and peace for all the saints, together with the Bishops and Deacons. But they would not have passed over the Presbyters, if in the apostolic age they had been distinct from the Bishops. c) From Tit. 1:5, where Titus is said to have been left in Crete to appoint Presbyters in every town, and it is added in v. 7: "For a bishop must be blameless." Which would cohere less, unless Bishops and Presbyters were the same by divine right. d) The Apostle Peter, in the opinion of the Papists, is the supreme Bishop. But he calls himself a συμπρεσβύτερον (fellow presbyter), 1 Peter 5:1, and addresses the Presbyters: "Shepherd the flock... serving as overseers (ἐπισκοποῦντες), inspecting, or

(as JEROME interprets) superintending." But those whose duty it is to ἐπισκοπεῖν, they are Bishops. By ecclesiastical custom, for the sake of εὐταξίας (good order) and fostering concord, a distinction was introduced between Bishops and Presbyters. JEROME teaches this in his commentary on ch. 1 of the epistle to Titus: "Formerly a Presbyter was the same as a Bishop, and before, by the instigation of the devil, factions or schisms arose in religion, and it was said among the people: 'I am of Paul,' 'I am of Apollos,' 'I am of Cephas,' the churches were governed by the common council of the Presbyters. But after each one thought that those whom he had baptized were his own, not Christ's, it was decreed in the whole world that one of the Presbyters should be placed over all, and the seeds of schism should be removed." Cf. JEROME's letter LXXXV to Evagrius. A Bishop is therefore superior to a presbyter not by divine right, but by ecclesiastical right; which subordination of hierarchical order we do not abolish, but retain. Ordination is done by a bishop through χειροθεσίαν, or the laying on of hands; a) So that it may be a solemn testimony that the person present is suitable, rightly chosen, and legitimately called; b) So that it may be a sign of divine blessing, which the sacred person should expect from God in his office. For it was a custom of old to bless by the laying on of a hand. See Gen. 48:14, Matth. 19:15. c) So that the called minister may be admonished that he is consecrated and, as it were, enslaved to God. For hands were once laid upon victims, Lev. 1:4. d) So that the public prayers for the minister brought into the sight of God and the church may be more ardent.

Proof d. In the very act of ordination the designated minister is admonished of his fidelity in the committed office, with Paul leading the way, 1 Tim. 4:14: "Do not neglect the gift that is in you, which was given to you by prophecy with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery! Meditate on these things; give yourself entirely to them, that your progress may be evident to all. Take heed to yourself and to the doctrine."

Question X. Are Luther, and the Lutheran ministers, legitimately called and rightly ordained?

Both Luther a), and the Lutheran Ministers b) are legitimately called and rightly ordained.

Proof a. Blessed LUTHER was called to the ecclesiastical office and ordained a Presbyter by his Bishop in A.D. 1507, at the age of 24. Having received the power of teaching the word of God, in A.D. 1508 he was called by JOHANN STÄUPITZ, General of the Augustinians, with the confirmation and consent of FREDERICK the Elector, to the presbytery and the theological professorship in the church and Academy of Wittenberg; in which vocation it was said to him, according to the statutes of the Academy: "It is yours to interpret the divine law and to teach the book of life." His vocation to the presbytery by a letter of the Wittenberg senate is extant in tom. IX, Wittenberg, fol. 103. In the year 1512, on the 18th of October, he was declared a licentiate of theology; on the following day, the 19th of October, he was created a Doctor in the Erfurt convent, where by the consent of the entire Augustinian convent he received the power of propagating the truth of the celestial doctrine by the living voice, and of defending it against any adversaries whatsoever.

Proof b. Whoever are called and ordained by apostolic rite, and faithfully propagate the truth of the celestial doctrine, they enjoy a legitimate vocation, and are true ministers of the church; But the Lutheran ministers attached to the Augsburg Confession etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because the Lutheran ministers are called by χειροτονίαν (collection of suffrages) of the particular churches, with the right of each estate remaining safe, and are ordained by a Bishop, or Superintendent, through the χειροθεσίαν of the presbytery.

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, who maintain that neither LUTHER nor the Lutheran ministers were legitimately called and rightly ordained. Their arguments are;

I. LUTHER was called by God neither mediately nor immediately. Not mediately; because he was not called by the church, nor ordained by a Bishop to reform religion and to oppose the doctrine of the Catholics; nor immediately, or extraordinarily; because he could not confirm an immediate vocation with the seal of miracles. Resp. LUTHER was called mediately to the presbytery, or the ecclesiastical ministry and the theological professorship. But it is the duty of a true minister of the church to teach the word of God correctly, and to shut the mouths of those who contradict, Tit. 1:11. It is the duty of a Professor of Theology to assert the celestial truth and to refute the errors adverse to it. We do not deny, however, that something extraordinary was joined with the ministry of Blessed LUTHER, as far as the opposition to the Papacy is concerned, not indeed on the part of the vocation, which was ordinary and mediate, but on the part of the gifts divinely granted to him. For his heroic spirit in opposing the Papacy indicates the extraordinary and special assistance of God. For instance: To propagate a new doctrine, such as was that of LUTHER, an immediate and extraordinary vocation is required, to be confirmed by the seal of miracles. Resp. a) The doctrine of LUTHER was not new, but renewed, and purged from the leaven of the Papists, long since confirmed by the miracles of Christ and the Apostles. b) John the Baptist did not perform miracles, although his vocation was immediate and extraordinary. c) Not the glory of miracles, but the consensus of doctrine with the divine word is a certain document of divine vocation.

II. The bishop who ordained LUTHER was either a true pastor or a wolf. If he was a true pastor, LUTHER, by seceding from him, became a most shameful apostate. If he was a wolf, LUTHER could not have been inaugurated by him as a true pastor.

Resp. 1) Generally: This argument could be objected to all who, having been ordained by heretics, return to the bosom of the church. But the pontifical laws assert that even those ordained by heretics are truly ordained, and are not to be re-ordained. 2) Specifically: The bishop who ordained LUTHER was, in different respects, a true bishop and a false bishop, or a wolf. He was a true Bishop, inasmuch as in the episcopal office he taught some things consonant with the divine word, baptized, and through the rite of ordination commended the ministry to suitable persons. He was a false Bishop, inasmuch as he corrupted the sincerity of the celestial doctrine with the admixed leaven of human traditions, celebrated the sacrifice of the mass in place of the Lord's supper, etc. Wherefore the essential must be accurately discerned from the accidental, the divine from the human. For instance: LUTHER did not receive from the ordaining Bishop the power to oppose the pontifical church. Resp. LUTHER received from God through the ordaining Bishop the power to oppose all errors of doctrine. Therefore, he obtained the power to oppose the errors of the pontifical church.

III. Whoever are not ordained by a Bishop are not true ministers of the church; But the Lutheran ministers, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear; because LUTHER ordained ministers attached to the Augsburg Confession, who however was not a Bishop, but only a Presbyter. Resp. a) By divine right a Bishop does not differ from a Presbyter, and therefore also by divine right the power of ordaining belongs to a Presbyter. b) Today Lutheran ministers are ordained by a Superintendent, and therefore by a Bishop. For canon law teaches that a Superintendent in name and office is a Bishop, in chap. Cleric. Dist. 21. The word episcopate is derived from this, that he who is made a Bishop, superintends. AUGUSTINE inculcates the same in Book XIX of the City of God, ch. 19: The Greek word is ἐπισκοπεῖν, and from it is derived the word that he who is placed in charge, superintends those over whom he is placed in charge. Bishops, if we wish, we can in Latin call Superintendents. Cf. HULSEMANN, Manuale disp. XII, pag. 524.

Question XI. Is ordination necessary for a called minister?

The necessity of ordination. The necessity of ordination is ordered on account of εὐταξίαν, or decorum a), and a divine precept b), although the number and form of the rituals may vary according to the will of the church c); its necessity is not, however, absolute d).

Proof a. Ordination is necessary on account of εὐταξίαν, or decorum, namely, for the public declaration of the capacity on the part of the person called, his solemn segregation from the business of the world to the ecclesiastical office, as well as his commendation before God and the church.

Proof b. The divine precept clearly implies the imperative; ἀφορίσατε, "separate for me both Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them," Acts 13:2. Therefore, separation in general, by whatever rite it is performed, is of the necessity of a divine precept.

Proof c. That the number and form of rituals may vary according to the will of the church is clear from a comparison of Acts 6:6, ch. 13:3, 1 Tim. 4:14, ch. 5:22. For mention is made of prayer and χειροθεσίας in Acts 6:6; of prayer, χειροθεσίας, and fasting in ch. 13:3; but of χειροθεσίας alone in 1 Tim. 4:14, 5:22. The Papists also add the sacrifice of the mass; but in vain, for besides the sacrifice once performed on the cross, there is none other in the New Testament. See Hebr. 7:27, ch. 10:14. They also anoint priests. But the ceremony of anointing does not descend from the institution or example of the Apostles, but was introduced into the church from a κακοζηλία (perverse imitation) of the Levitical cult, and after several centuries had elapsed since the birth of Christ.

Proof d. Ordination is not simply and absolutely necessary. For without the rite of ordination, in a time of siege, plague, etc., where a supply of an ordaining presbytery cannot be had, a minister legitimately called by the church can perform his ministry, even before he is ordained and consecrated. Meanwhile, outside of such a case, it ought not to be omitted.

Question XII. What is the matter in which, or the subject of, the ecclesiastical ministry?

The subject of the ministry. The subject to whom the ecclesiastical office is committed is not an angel a), but a suitable, capable, and legitimately called man b); by reason of sex, not a female, but a male c); by reason of doctrine, learned, orthodox, and instructed with the gifts of teaching d); by reason of life, blameless e).

Proof. a. Although God, in order to manifest His will, has extraordinarily used the work of angels at times, He has not committed the ordinary ecclesiastical office to them. CHRYSOSTOM gives the reason in his oration on Elijah; because angels, since they are by nature immune from sin, would avenge the sins of the people with sudden thunderbolts. Therefore, consideration was had for our infirmity, and the priesthood was committed to men, who, admonished by their own example of human fragility, use greater gentleness towards the weak in faith and those overtaken by some lapse. From this we acknowledge both the Φιλανθρωπίαν (love for humanity) of God, who has dignified men with so great an honor that He desires to hear His own voice through their mouths and tongues, and the power of God, who opposes the devil not with angels powerful in might, but with wretched men, through whom He attacks the kingdom of Satan and destroys it in the hearts of many.

Proof. b. Suitable and capable men are those who possess a sharp intellect, mature judgment, and strength of body, so that they are not contemptible to others either for dullness of intellect, immaturity of age, or bodily defect; for whom it has been shown above that a divine vocation, and today a mediate one, must be awaited.

Proof. c. Paul, with express words, removes the public and ordinary office of teaching in the church from the female sex, 1 Cor. 14:34: "Let your women keep silent in the churches, for they are not permitted to speak; but they are to be submissive, as the law also says. And if they want to learn something, let them ask their own husbands at home; for it is shameful for women to speak in church." Cf. 1 Tim. 2:12. Here one must accurately distinguish: 1) Between ecclesiastical offices in general, and the office of teaching in particular; 2) Between public, or ecclesiastical, instruction and private, or domestic, instruction. 3) Between the ordinary rule, and an extraordinary case of necessity. In Rom. 16:1, Phoebe is called a δῆακονος, or minister, of the church of Cenchrea, on account of her care for the sick and the poor. Paul calls Priscilla his fellow worker in the Lord, Rom. 16:3, on account of her private and domestic instruction.

Proof. d. A minister of the church ought to be διδακτικόν, apt to teach, 1 Tim. 3:2; ἀντεχόμενον τῷ κατὰ τὴν διδασχὴν πιστῷ λόγῳ, holding fast the faithful word as he has been taught, that he may be able, Tit. 1:9; ὑγιαίνοντα τῇ πίστει, sound in faith, Tit. 2:2.

Proof. e. As to the life of a minister of the church, it is required: 1) In general, that he be ἀνεπιληπτος, blameless, 1 Tim. 3:2, and ἀνέγκλητος, above reproach, Tit. 1:7. A minister is not indeed immune from all sin; but he shows himself to be such that he cannot rightly be accused and convicted of a deliberate and atrocious sin, by which the sacred office is dishonored. 2) In particular, a) with respect to God, let him be ὁσιος, pious and holy, Tit. 1:8. b) Towards himself, σώφρων, sober-minded, moderately and circumspectly doing all things, Tit. 1:7; νηφάλιος, vigilant, as if stationed on a watchtower, and foreseeing imminent evils, 1 Tim. 3:2; μὴ πάροινος, not given to wine, but a hater of drunkenness, v. 3; ἐγκρατής, abstinent from lust and all illicit motions and perturbations of the soul, Tit. 1:8; κόσμιος, well-behaved, doing all things ornately and decently, in his gait and seemly attire, 1 Tim. 3:2; μὴ αὐθάδης, not self-willed or too pleased with himself, Tit. 1:7; μᾶς γυναῖκος ἀνὴρ, not a polygamist, but the husband of one wife, 1 Tim. 3:2. c) With respect to his own, let him be a good head of the household, who rules his own house well, 1 Tim. 3:4-5, and has his children in submission with all reverence, Tit. 1:6. d) With respect to others, let him be just and equitable, not quick-tempered, not a striker, but a stranger to fights, not a maker of shameful gain, not greedy or a lover of money. Finally, let him be hospitable and a lover of good. See 1 Tim. 3:2 ff., Tit. 1:7.

Question XIII. What is the matter about which, or the object of, the ecclesiastical ministry?

Personal object of the ecclesiastical ministry. The object of the ministry is either personal or real. The personal object is the flock of the Lord, or the assembly of those men who hear public teachers, and by their ministry and the dispensation of the sacraments are made partakers.

Proof. 1) From Acts 20:28: "Take heed to yourselves and to all the flock, among which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers, to shepherd the church of God." The assembly of hearers is therefore called the flock of the Lord, committed to the faith and care of the pastors. 2) From 1 Peter 5:2, 3, 4: "Shepherd the flock of God which is among you, serving as overseers, not by compulsion but willingly, not for dishonest gain but eagerly; nor as being lords over those entrusted to you, but being examples to the flock." The government of the ministers of the church is not royal, but pastoral, and requires vigilance and attentive care of the committed flock, so that they treat the hearers not harshly, as servants, but kindly, as little sheep.

Question XIV. What are the duties of the hearers?

Duties of the hearers. The duties of the hearers consist in the reverence which they owe to the ministers, as ambassadors of God a), and in the beneficence by which they bestow upon the sacred preachers the subsidies for living an honorable life b).

Proof a. From 1 Tim. 5:17: "Let the elders who rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in the word and doctrine." The teaching elders are honored when, as ambassadors of God, they are held in high esteem, their word is accepted as the word of God, and their actions in the sacred office are deemed to be directed by the Holy Spirit.

Proof b. 1) Because the laborer is worthy of his wages, Luke 10:7. 2) Those who preach the gospel should live from the gospel, 1 Cor. 9:9. 3) "Let him who is taught the word share in all good things with him who teaches," Gal. 6:6.

The Antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, who maintain that it is not lawful for ministers of the church to accept salaries. They object:

I. "Freely you have received, freely give," Matth. 10:8. Resp. Christ is not speaking of the salaries of teachers, but of not making a profit from miracles, as the context teaches.

II. The Apostles sought their livelihood by the labor of their own hands, which is clear from the example of Paul, who was a σκηνοποιός, a tentmaker, Acts 18:3. Resp. The Apostles were immediately called, and without previous labor were born with such wisdom from the Holy Spirit that they had extemporaneous sermons; Their successors from their tenderest years devote themselves to the study of languages, the instrumental disciplines, and theology itself, not without great expense of funds, promoted to the portion of the church they adorn it with all the nerves of their soul, and cannot have time for other things. What of it? that Paul did not refuse to accept things sent from the Philippians, Phil. 4:18, although by his own counsel he did not accept from the Corinthians.

Question XV. Can a minister of the church, with a good conscience, accept an honorarium offered during confession?

On the confession money. A minister of the church can, with an untroubled conscience, accept an honorarium offered with a good intention by one confessing a). However, wherever the custom of offering and accepting such an honorarium brings with it various disadvantages, it can, with the consent of the church, be abrogated, and the stipends of the ministers of the divine word can be augmented in a more convenient manner b).

Proof. a. 1) In certain churches, the honorarium which is given to the confessor by the penitent after absolution, and is commonly called the confession money (der Beicht-Pfennig), is part of the salary. For since the salary is sometimes meager, it is supplemented by the confession money. But that an honorable stipend is to be provided for the ministers of the divine word, Christ teaches in Luke 10:7, and Paul in 1 Tim. 5:18.

2. He who is instructed in the word may licitly share of his goods with the instructor, in whatever place and time, Gal. 6:6. But the one confessing is instructed by the divine word from the confessor. Therefore, he may also licitly share of his goods with him in the place of confession.

3. In the Old Testament, it was commanded that no one should appear empty before the Priest, Deut. 16:16, 17. Therefore, neither in the New Testament is it illicit to appear before the minister of God with the confessional coin.

4. In the primitive church, ἀγάπαι, or gifts of bread and wine, were brought, from which something was taken for the Holy Supper, and a part was offered in the sacred place to the ministers of the word. Why, therefore, cannot the confession money, as a sign of gratitude, be given and received in the temple?

Proof. b. Wherever rivalries arise among the ministers of the church on account of the confession money, with one colleague being indignant that another has more penitents; if the poorer are deterred from private confession for lack of money; if the sins of the richer are treated more gently on account of larger gifts; the custom of giving the confession money can be abrogated, and the stipends of the pastors, which in many places are meager, can be augmented in another way. Whence it has been piously and prudently provided in Denmark that pastors should not accept any price for absolution from a penitent, as testified by Dr. BROCHMAND, Tom. II, system., p. 1021.

The Antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, who maintain that the confession money cannot be accepted by a confessor with a safe conscience. They object:

I. Whoever sell the spiritual gift of absolution, they commit the crime of Simony; But the Lutheran ministers etc. Therefore. Resp. I deny the minor. Simony is when a price is paid for acquiring a spiritual good; The confession money, however, is not paid for acquiring absolution, which is obtained even by those not paying, but is given out of gratitude.

II. It went badly for Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, that after the cleansing of Naaman the Syrian from leprosy he accepted silver, 2 Kings 5:26; so a sad fate is to be expected by all who accept the confession money. Resp. The servant Gehazi, against the will of his Master, demanded silver; But the ministers of the church, against the will of Christ their Master, do not demand or exact the confession money. See Luke 10:7.

III. Those who accept the confession money give scandal to the penitents, who are persuaded that absolution is sold for that money. Resp. No scandal is to be feared; for the penitents know that they are not buying absolution, but are giving the confession money as a sign of a grateful heart.

IV. The confessional coin gives rise to various disadvantages; For it nourishes rivalries among ministers; the lack of it keeps the poor from confession; conversely, the sins of the rich, who offer a larger honorarium, are not reprov'd. Resp. a) The abuse can be prudently abolished, so that the use may be retained. b) On account of these disadvantages, should they occur anywhere, the confession coin can be abrogated, yet in such a way that the meager stipends of the pastors are augmented by another means.

Question XVI. What is the real object of the ecclesiastical ministry?

Real Object. The real object of the ministry is both the divine mysteries a) and ecclesiastical discipline b).

Proof. a. The divine mysteries are the revealed word of God, and the sacraments, which the ministers of the church offer and dispense. For this reason they are called οἰκονόμοι μυστηρίων Θεοῦ, "stewards of the mysteries of God," 1 Cor. 4:1.

Proof. b. Pastors exercise ecclesiastical discipline in such a way that they employ degrees of admonition, Matth. 18:15, 16, and observe the rules prescribed by St. Paul, 1 Tim. 5:1 ff.

Question XVII. What is the form of the ministry?

Form. The form of the ministry is the due, decent, and public execution of the committed power and office. But there has been committed to the ministers of the church the power and office of publicly teaching a), and of ordinarily dispensing the sacraments b), as well as the power and duty of remitting and retaining sins c).

Obs. Commonly, the power committed to Pastors through vocation and ordination is divided into the power of order and of jurisdiction, a distinction which the Apology of the Augsburg Confession explains, p. 294: "The old partition of power into the power of order and the power of jurisdiction is pleasing to us. A Bishop has the power of order, that is, the ministry of the word and sacraments; he also has the power of jurisdiction, that is, the authority of excommunicating those liable for public crimes, and in turn of absolving them, if, having been converted, they seek absolution. And indeed he does not have a tyrannical power, that is, without a certain law; nor a royal one, that is, above the law; but they have a certain command, a certain word of God, which they ought to teach, and according to which they ought to exercise their jurisdiction." This distinction, however, is not very accurate; because that which is called the power of jurisdiction is not properly judicial on the part of the minister, who does not absolve as a judge, nor does he pass any sentence, but dispenses one passed by a superior. Cf. Dr. SCHERZER, in breviar. Hulfem. chap. XIX, fol. 1506.

Proof. a. No one, unless sent by God, can lawfully preach in public assemblies, Rom. 10:15.

Proof. b. To those who are stewards of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. 4:1, belongs the power of ordinarily dispensing the sacraments.

Proof. c. Christ committed the power of the keys, loosing and binding, to the Apostles, and to all rightly called and ordained ministers of the church, Matth. 16:19, John 20:23.

Question XVIII. How does a minister of the church rightly perform the office of teaching?

A minister of the church rightly performs the office of teaching: a) By accurately investigating, certainly discovering, and perspicuously explaining the genuine sense of the divine word, through legitimate means of interpretation; b) By decently applying the explained word to didactic, elenctic, paedeutic, epanorthotic, and paracletic use (*).<sup>369</sup> Proof. a. The minister of the church is a sacred Hermeneutist, whose task it is: 1) To weigh the signifying force and emphasis of the individual words that are in the original text, and to diligently consider the construction of connected phrases according to the custom of the holy language; 2) From the antecedents and consequents, from the occasion, scope, impulsive cause, and circumstances to investigate and explain the mind of the Holy Spirit speaking through the Prophets and Apostles.

(*) It is also the duty of a faithful Pastor, 3) to have care for the individual sheep entrusted to him, and to always be ready if anyone should need his instruction, correction, or consolation; for salutary truths are to be taught not only δημοσίᾳ (publicly), but also κατ' οἴκου (from house to house), yet with the prudence that is fitting, Acts 20:20. It also befits him 4) to benefit his hearers no less by the example of his life and morals than by the integrity of his doctrine, 1 Tim. 4:12, 16. Tit. 2:7, 8.

Proof. b. From 2 Tim. 3:16: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable πρὸς διδασκαλίαν, for doctrine," by which the dogmas of faith are perspicuously proposed and solidly confirmed; πρὸς ἐλεγχον, "for reproof," by which errors adverse to the doctrine of faith are detected and refuted; πρὸς ἐπανόρθωσιν, "for correction," by which the turpitude of vices and the guilt of punishment is shown, and souls are called away from them and emended; πρὸς παιδείαν, "for instruction," by which the duties of Christians in any state are distinctly taught, and they are excited to perform them by solid arguments suited for persuasion. To these add παράκλησιν, or consolation (**): "For whatever things were written before were written for our learning, that we through the patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope," Rom. 15:4. Therefore, from the fount of scripture, effective solace must be instilled into anxious minds.

Question XIX. How does a minister of the church rightly use the power of dispensing the sacraments?

A minister of the church rightly uses the power of dispensing the sacraments by administering them according to the words of institution a), by conferring them in a timely manner to men in need of the sacraments, yet not unworthy of them b), and by barring the unworthy from the use of the sacraments c).

Proof. a. To the form of the sacrament belongs the word of institution, by which the external symbol is consecrated, or set apart from common use to a sacred use. Hence AUGUSTINE, tract. 80 on John: "Let the word be joined to the element, and it becomes a sacrament."

Proof. b. A pious pastor, mindful of his office, does not suffer, through his own fault, an infant to depart from this life without baptism, or a penitent adult, desirous of the eucharist, without participation in the body and blood of the Lord.

Proof. c. The unworthy are contumacious sinners who know not how to repent. To these the sacraments are not dispensed, lest what is holy be given to the dogs, and pearls be cast before swine. Matth. 7:6.

Question XX. What sort of power of remitting sins has been committed to the ministers of the church?

The ministers of the church have the power of remitting sins, not αὐτοκρατορικὴν, or principal and independent a), but διακονικὴν, or ministerial and delegated b), by which to contrite and penitent sinners they remit all sins not only ἱστορικῶς, or significantly and declaratively, but also effectively and really, yet ὀργανικῶς (instrumentally) c), without any reservation of guilt or punishment d).

Proof. a. God alone, αὐτοκρατορικῶς καὶ αὐτεξουσίως, by a principal, magisterial, and independent power, remits sins. "I, even I, am He who blots out your transgressions for My own sake," says Jehovah, Is. 43:25. Hence AMBROSE on 2 Cor. 12: "To forgive sins and to give the Holy Spirit belongs to God alone, yet meanwhile God in this His magisterial absolution ordinarily uses the ministry of men."

Proof. b. Christ said to Peter: "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven," Matth. 16:19. He said the same also to all the Apostles: "Whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven," John 20:20. The power of remitting sins therefore depends on Christ (not excluding God the Father and the Holy Spirit, because it is a work ad extra) by reason of form, norm, exercise, and efficacy.

(**) Paul seems to have included this within the scope of both διδασκαλία and παιδεία. For all Christian consolation is a confirmation of the afflicted soul and an exhortation to constancy in preserving the true faith, even unto death, amidst whatever crises. Constancy is one of the principal virtues. But all virtues, and all duties, are contained under the genus of παιδεία. The arguments of solace, proper to Christian men, ought to flow from no other source than the fount of salutary doctrine, or the dogmas of faith, which are altogether to be referred to the genus of διδασκαλία.

1) By reason of form; because it is a delegated power, and therefore only of such kind and degree as God has delegated. 2) By reason of norm; since a minister of the church can absolve penitent sinners not according to his own will (which would be to abuse the power), but according to the norm of divine judgment. 3) By reason of exercise, because God in the act of absolution concurs with the ministers, and absolves through them. 4) By reason of efficacy; because a minister can absolve only with a delegated power, and therefore with a force and power subordinated to the principal cause. All of which teaches quite openly that the minister in nature absolves later on this earth than God absolves in heaven. For when a principal and an instrumental cause concur at the same time to the same ἀποτέλεσμα (result), the principal cause, because it elevates the instrumental, is always understood to act prior in nature.

Proof c. 1) The ministers of the church have the keys of heaven, so that whatever they bind and loose on earth, is also bound and loosed in heaven, Matth. 16:16, John 20:23. Therefore, they really bind and loose, and do not merely announce the binding and loosing done in heaven. The reason for the consequent is; because he who receives a key to loose and open, does not signify that it is opened by another, but he himself opens. For a key is not the same as the announcement of an opening, and to loose is not the same as merely to declare a loosing done by another.

2. As is the loosing of sins which is done by God in heaven, such is the loosing which is done by ministers on earth; But the loosing in heaven is real and effective. Therefore, the loosing on earth is also real and effective. The major is clear; because from the real identity of the objects (whatever you loose) and of the subjects (whomever you loose), the real identity of the loosing is also undoubtedly gathered.

3. Ministers loose sins not in their own name, but in God's. Therefore, this loosing is not a bare declaration or a human action, but plainly divine, one in number and undivided, just as the power by which they loose sins is one in number, namely divine. For there is one key of heaven, by which they loose. The minister does not have one key, and God another. Whence, he who hears the absolving ministers, hears Christ himself; But he who hears Christ (absolving) effectively, is not only declaratively absolved; Therefore.

4. Ministers through the word of God really and effectively convert sinners, Luke 1:16, regenerate them, 1 Cor. 4:15, save them, 1 Tim. 4:16. Therefore, they also really and effectively remit sins.

Proof. d. That the ministers of the church remit all sins is clear; 1) from the unlimited universality both of the object: "Whatever you loose on earth," Matth. 18:18, and of the subject: "Whose sins you remit," John 20:23. 2) As far as the merit of Christ extends, so far extends the remission of sins procured by the merit of Christ; But the merit of Christ extends to all sins, without any restriction; Therefore.

Question XXI. What kind of power of retaining sins has been granted to the ministers of the church?

The ministers of the church have the power of retaining sins, not a principal or independent one, but a ministerial and delegated one a), by which they deny the remission of sins to enormous, publicly scandalous, and notorious sinners b), and either only bar them from the use of the Holy Supper c), or, with the consent of the ecclesiastical senate, they really cast them out from the society of the church and by an effective declaration deliver them to Satan d), so that they may perform true repentance and be reconciled to God and the church e).

Proof. a. Christ delegated the right of the binding key to the church, the spiritual mother of the family. He committed the exercise of this right to the Apostles and their successors, Matth. 18:18, John 20:22. Since therefore the power of the binding key is delegated, the ministers of the church can bind impenitent sinners not according to their own will, but according to the norm of divine judgment.

Proof. b. Remission of sins is denied not to sinners who lapse from ignorance or infirmity (for whom a gentle admonition with an exhortation to beware of future lapses suffices), but to the manifest and obstinate, who give scandal to others. Since they are harmful by their example, they are to be rebuked before all, that the rest also may fear, 1 Tim. 5:20.

Proof. c. Binding is the denial of absolution, and is commonly called excommunication, which is usually distinguished into lesser and greater. Lesser excommunication is that by which a publicly scandalous sinner is barred from the use of the Holy Supper; its foundation is the saying of Christ: "Do not give what is holy to the dogs," Matth. 7:6. Greater excommunication is that by which a manifest and obstinate sinner is not only barred from the participation of the sacraments, but is also cut off from the church like a rotten member, and delivered to Satan, until he repents; its foundation is: "If he refuses to listen even to the church, let him be to you like a heathen and a tax collector," Matth. 18:17.

Proof. d. Greater excommunication is not done by the pastor without the consent of the ecclesiastical senate, or the Consistory, which is the representative church. For ecclesiastical censure has certain grades, insinuated by Christ, Matth. 18:15. The first censure is individual, secret, and fraternally gentle. The second is collegial, either chosen by the will of the parties, or according to the order constituted among the colleges. The third is ecclesiastical, and that either before the Consistory, or, if the evil should be epidemic, before a council of several churches. Which ecclesiastical censure is not only declarative, but also effectively binding and enclosing in the fetters of guilt; for that is what it means to bind, Matth. 22:13, a delivering into the power of Satan, 1 Cor. 5:3, 4, 5, an exclusion from the society of the faithful, not the necessary or common society of all men, but the free and proper one, whence contagion or irritation could be feared, 2 Thess. 3:14.

Proof. e. The end of excommunication is not the perdition of the soul, but conversion. For an enormous and notorious sinner is delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, 1 Cor. 5:5. By excommunication the lustful flesh is crucified and mortified, but the soul is led back from sin to repentance and eternal life. Excommunication therefore inflicts not a mortal exclusion, such as was that of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5; not a deprivation of goods, possessions, and dominion; nor capital punishment, since it is a penalty not political, but ecclesiastical; and so it imports a suspension and deprivation of the benefits of the church, and then anxiety of the soul, by which they are agitated by Satan, in whose power they are, and sometimes the affliction of the body.

The Antithesis is 1) of the Socinians, who maintain that the ministers of the church remit sins not really or effectively, but only declaratively.

2. Of Thomas Erastus, a Doctor of Medicine, who denies that enormous and notorious sinners should be barred from the use of the Holy Supper. Their arguments are:

I. God alone remits sins, Isaiah 43:25. Therefore, not the minister of the church. Response: God alone remits sins αυτοκρατορικῶς, with principal and independent power: The minister of the church remits διακονικῶς, or ὀργανικῶς, with subordinate and delegated power.

II. Christ delegated to the Apostles the power of remitting and retaining sins; But that power expired with the Apostles. The reason for this consequence is; because no successors to the Apostles are given. For the Apostles were immediately called, instructed with the privilege of infallibility and the power of teaching in the whole world. Such Apostles are not given today. Response: 1) Certain special axioms, extraordinary privileges, belonged to the Apostles, in respect of which they have no successors; there also belonged to them, generally considered, the power of teaching, dispensing the sacraments, and remitting and retaining sins, in respect of which all faithful ministers of the church are their successors. 2) The church exists today: Therefore, the keys of the kingdom of heaven given to the whole church also exist. The gospel exists: Therefore, also absolution from sins. The sacraments exist: Therefore, also the remission of sins. Timothy could save himself and those who heard him, 1 Timothy 4:16. Therefore, Timothy, who was not an Apostle, could remit sins.

III. Whoever does not possess the gift of infallibility cannot remit sins. Ministers mediately called do not possess the gift of infallibility. Therefore. The major premise is clear; because those to be absolved are sinners whose repentance and faith are certainly established. Response: Apostolic infallibility is not required for the power of absolving, but an ordered knowledge, drawn from the inspired word of God, is sufficient. And although the ministers of the church are not searchers of hearts, yet from external signs they infer the internal repentance of the heart.

IV. Judas the betrayer was admitted by Christ to the supper, even after the crime of betrayal was revealed: Therefore, an enormous and notorious sinner is not to be repelled from the use of the Holy Supper. Response: Christ did not bar Judas from the supper because the betrayal which Judas was plotting was not yet completed. Therefore, no one is barred from the sacred rites on account of a future crime, known only to God, but on account of a crime committed.

Question XXII. What is the end of the ecclesiastical ministry?

The end of the ministry. The ultimate end of the ecclesiastical ministry, on God's part, is the glory of the divine name a), on man's part, the ultimate end is eternal salvation b), the intermediate ends are illumination and conversion c), regeneration d), reconciliation with God e).

Proof a. "Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the growth," 1 Corinthians 3:4. Faithful preachers do not attribute the success of their office to themselves, but to the power of God, by whose grace they are what they are, 1 Corinthians 15:10.

Proof b. From 1 Timothy 4:16. "You will save both yourself and those who hear you."

Proof c. From Acts 26:18. "I am sending you to open their eyes, so that they may turn from darkness to light."

Proof d. From 1 Corinthians 4:15. "In Christ Jesus I became your father through the gospel."

Proof e. The ecclesiastical ministry is the ministry of reconciliation, 2 Corinthians 5:19.

Observation: From these ends, the necessity and utility of the ecclesiastical ministry become clear.

Question XXIII. Can an impious minister teach fruitfully in the church?

It befits a minister of the church to cultivate piety with his whole heart a), and if his impiety is notorious, ecclesiastical censure should be applied to him b). However, his impiety does not detract from the efficacy of the doctrine which he proposes from the word of God c).

Proof a. A Bishop and any prelate of the church ought to be irreprehensible, 1 Timothy 3:2. and ὁσιον, holy, Titus 1:8. and an example to the faithful in speech, in conduct, in love, in spirit, in faith, in purity, 1 Timothy 4:12.

Proof b. He who sins publicly should be rebuked in the presence of all, 1 Timothy 5:20. Wherefore, the notorious impiety of a minister of the church is to be punished, according to the nature of the offenses.

Proof c. 1) The efficacy of doctrine does not depend on the minister, but on the Holy Spirit, who is indivisibly joined with the word of God. Therefore, the divine word is and remains the power of God for salvation to everyone who believes, Romans 1:16, by whomever it may be preached. This AUGUSTINE illustrates with an elegant simile, in book III against Cresconius, ch. 8. It makes no difference to the efficacy of sowing and planting whether it is done with clean or with dirty hands, provided the seed is good, and the earth fertile, and the heat of the sun and the rain from heaven are not lacking. 2) Christ in Matthew 23:3 bids to listen to the scribes and Pharisees sitting on the seat of Moses, whom however he accuses of the gravest crimes. 3) The Augsburg Confession, article VIII, p. 12, says gravely: "The Sacraments and the Word are efficacious because of the institution and commandment of Christ, even if they are administered by evil men."

The Antithesis is of the Donatists, Anabaptists, and Schwenckfeldians, who maintain that a minister of the church who is not himself truly renewed, reborn, and truly just cannot teach other men fruitfully or dispense true sacraments. Their arguments are:

I. Whoever is not himself converted and reborn, cannot convert and regenerate other men; But an impious minister, etc. Therefore. The major premise is evident; because nothing can be in the effect which was not first in the cause, and what one does not have, one cannot give to another. Response: 1) Denying the major premise and arguing by a similar reason; Whoever is deformed cannot paint a beautiful image; But Apelles is deformed. Therefore. 2) By distinguishing between the principal cause and the instrumental cause. The efficacy of doctrine does not depend on the minister of the church as an instrumental cause, but on the Holy Spirit as the principal cause.

II. All false prophets are to be fled; But impious ministers, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established from Matthew 7:16. The minor is proven because false prophets are to be known by their fruits, to which impiety of life pertains. Response: False prophets are doctors professing false doctrine; we are speaking of doctors whose doctrine is true, but whose life is impious. False prophets are to be known by the fruits of their doctrine. But if their doctrine of itself generates desperation, Pharisaism, or Epicureanism, they are to be avoided and deserted.

Question XXIV. Are there different grades of dignity and authority among the ministers of the church?

For the sake of εὐταξία, or good order, as well as the disparity of gifts, it is useful and advisable that there be distinct grades of dignity and authority among the ministers of the church.

Proof 1) God wills that all things in the church be done εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν, decently and in order, 1 Corinthians 14:40. Now, just as in a republic all things are thrown into confusion unless there is one who commands and those who obey, so the body of the ecclesiastical ministry will be disordered unless a disparity of orders and grades of dignity is admitted. 2) There were distinct grades of ministers in the church of the Old Testament, namely the high priest, Exodus 28:29, priests of the second order, Leviticus 21:10, Levites, Numbers 8:6. In the New Testament, ministers of disparate dignity and authority are enumerated. For Christ gave some as Apostles, others as Prophets, others as Evangelists, and others as Pastors and Doctors, Ephesians 4:1.

The Antithesis is of the Puritans in England, and the Anabaptists, who do not admit distinct grades of dignity among the ministers of the church. They object:

I. The assertion of a disparity of dignity among the ministers of the word paves the way for the pontifical tyranny, which the reformed churches have long since abjured. Response: We do not restore pontifical tyranny to the reformed churches, because we assert a) that a prelate of the sacred rites is indeed to be heard by ministers of a lower order, but only as long as he commands nothing contrary to orthodoxy and good morals, Malachi 2:7. b) That the same is subject to the direction and censure of the supreme magistrate, 1 Peter 2:13.

II. Christ expressly disapproves of this ὑπεροχὴν, or eminence, among ministers, Matthew 23:8, Luke 22:25. Response: We, with Christ, disapprove of absolute dominion in the church; yet for the sake of good order (εὐταξίας), we preserve a disparity of grades.

SUSPIRIUM

Dou, O GOD, FATHER of all good order, author of the sacred ministry, I beseech with sincere and most humble prayers, that You preserve your ecclesiastical hierarchy, which You have most wisely instituted for the benefit of mortals, whole and incorrupt against the roaring of the world and of hell! Give to Your ministers who plant and water a most abundant increase. Give also to me, Your weak and lowest minister, a mouth and wisdom! Confer sanctifying gifts! Add a fearless spirit! Grant prosperous successes in my office, so that according to the prescription of Your word I may teach rightly, dispense the sacraments properly, live piously, and from this life, as from an inn, not as from a home, at your command, peacefully depart.

CHAPTER III. ON THE POLITICAL MAGISTRATE

Question I. From where is the political magistrate named?

MAGISTRATE IS NAMED from magister (master) a); political from politia (polity), which he governs b).

Proof a. Magistrate is named from master; because, as COELIUS

RHODIGINUS testifies, Book VII of Ancient Readings, ch. 17, among the Romans he who was Dictator and held supreme power was accustomed to be called master; just as today in a city the consuls are called masters of the citizens, Bürgermeister, Rathsmeister, Stadtmeister, Amtmeister.

Proof b. A magistrate is called political not from political affairs, insofar as they are opposed to ecclesiastical and sacred ones; for these too are under the direction of the magistrate; but from the polity, which, named ἀπὸ τῆς πόλεως, denotes either the republic itself, or the government, or administration of the republic, in which, when it is Christian, there is a church, in respect to which the political magistrate is here considered as a peculiar hierarchical state.

Question II. In how many ways is the name magistrate taken?

The name magistrate is taken in two ways: a) abstractly, for the power and authority itself, which they possess to whom the government is committed; b) concretely, for the persons who are instructed with the power of commanding.

Proof a. From Romans 13:1. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," ἐξουσίαις ὑπερεχούσαις.

Proof b. Christ calls magistrates taken concretely "those who have authority," ἐξουσιάζοντας, Luke 22:25.

Question III. What is the political magistrate, taken abstractly?

Definition of the magistrate. The political magistrate, taken abstractly, is a public office, ordained by God, in which a certain person, legitimately called and instructed with power concerning civil and sacred things, makes laws in the republic, exercises judgments, and punishes transgressors, and defends it against external enemies, for the propagation of the glory of God, and for promoting the temporal and eternal salvation of the subjects.

Question IV. What is the political magistrate, taken concretely?

The political magistrate, taken concretely, is a person, or a multitude of persons, divinely called, and instructed with power concerning civil and sacred things, for making laws and exercising judgments, for punishing transgressors and defending the republic from external enemies, so that God may be glorified, the church with the republic may flourish peacefully, and the temporal and eternal salvation of the subjects may be promoted.

Question V. What is the efficient cause of the magistrate?

Efficient Cause. The principal efficient cause of the magistrate, regarded both abstractly a) and concretely b), is the triune God c), who commits the office of magistrate to certain persons, either immediately d) or mediately e).

Proof a. 1) The magistrate, regarded in the abstract, with respect to the office, or with respect to the legislative, judicial, and vindictory power, is immediately from God. Paul teaches this in Romans 13:1. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; For there is no power except from God; but the powers that be are ordained by God." From which we argue: Whatever power is not except from God, that is immediately ordained by God; But political power, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear: Whatever is not except from God, that is said to be immediately from God, with the exclusion of every other concurrent and socially acting cause; in the same way as if one were to say: The Apostles were not constituted except by God or Christ, it would be easily understood that they themselves were constituted immediately by Christ. 2) Jehoshaphat said to the judges: "Take care and act; for you do not exercise the judgment of man, but of God," 2 Chronicles 19:6. From which we infer: Whoever exercises the judgment not of man, but of God, their judicial power is immediately from God; But the magistrate, etc. Therefore. 3) Of the same opinion is the Augsburg Confession, art. XVI. "Concerning civil affairs, they teach that legitimate civil ordinances are good works of God." And lest anyone should attribute the mode of institution to the mediation of human ingenuity, the Apology explains the mode to Art. VIII, p. 156. "As this nature of things, and these movements of the stars are truly an ordinance of God and are preserved by God; so legitimate polities are truly an ordinance of God, and are retained and defended by God against the devil." From which we argue: With the same causality that God produced nature and the movements of the stars, with that He also ordained polities; But with immediate causality, etc. Therefore.

Proof b. The magistrate, regarded in the concrete, is also from God. For thus says the uncreated and hypostatic wisdom, or the Son of God: "By me kings reign, and rulers decree justice; By me princes rule, and all judges of the earth are magnates," Proverbs 8:15-16. If kings reign by uncreated wisdom, they do not reign by men, as distinct from uncreated wisdom. From Romans 13:4-5. "The magistrate is the minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath on him who does evil. Therefore it is necessary to be subject, not only because of wrath, but also for conscience' sake." Every minister of God, to whom one must be subject for conscience' sake, is elected and called to his office by God; But the civil magistrate, etc. Therefore.

Proof c. The triune God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—instituted and ordained the magistrate; for the institution of the magistrate is a work ad extra, originating from divine authority, power, goodness, and wisdom, and therefore common to all three persons of the Godhead.

Proof d. Immediately, and with no arbitrary human works intervening, God committed the office of magistrate to Moses, Exodus 3:10, to Joshua, Numbers 27:18, to Saul, 1 Samuel 9:15, to David, 1 Samuel 16:12. You say: David was called to rule mediately, through the intervening work of Samuel. Response: God had immediately commanded Samuel that he should anoint David, and no other, as king, 1 Samuel 16:12. Therefore, his call to the office of magistrate was immediate.

Proof e. Today God commits the office of magistrate to certain persons mediately, that is, with the intervention of human counsels and voluntary work. This is clear: 1) because all powers are from God, Romans 13:2. But today they are not ordained divinely and immediately: Therefore, mediately. 2) From 1 Peter 2:13-14. "Be subject to every human creature (or elected by men as an instrumental cause) for the Lord's sake (who constitutes through men), whether to the king, or to governors." 3) Christ acknowledged that even Pilate's power was certainly mediately from God, saying: "You would have no power against me at all, unless it had been given you from above," John 19:11. 4) To Nebuchadnezzar God had given the kingdom and power and dominion and majesty of heaven mediately, as Daniel testifies, ch. 2:37.

Question VI. By what means and ways do men attain the office of magistrate?

Means to the office of magistrate. Today, capable persons, under the guidance of God, legitimately come to the office of magistrate either by election a), or by succession b), or by just occupation c).

Observation: We are not speaking at present of the illicit ways and means by which some seize power, such as: violent occupation through illegitimate war and tyrannical oppression of others, fraudulent invasion through schemes and solicitation of minds, and acquisition through bribery, that is, by money and gifts.

Proof a. The magistracy is obtained by election when those to whom the power of electing belongs, either by law or by custom, designate the magistrate. Thus the elders of Gilead elected and appointed Jephthah as their leader, Judges 11:5. To this pertains the election of inferior magistrates by superiors.

Proof b. The office of magistrate is obtained by succession when children by hereditary right from their parents, or kinsmen from their agnates, receive the rule. Thus Solomon succeeded David by hereditary right, Rehoboam Solomon, Abijam Rehoboam.

Proof c. The magistracy is obtained by legitimate occupation when enemies conquered in a just war are subjected to the victor, by whom they are preserved. For it is of natural law that whatever is captured from enemies is subjected to the dominion of the victor.

The Antithesis is 1) of the Anabaptists and Weigelians, who deny that the magistrate is ordained by God; 2) of some Papists, who deny that the magistrate, considered abstractly, has an immediate origin from God. They rely on the following arguments:

I. Whatever originates from the violent and tyrannical oppression of men cannot be established by God; But monarchical rule, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear: because that which is from an evil principle cannot be from God. The minor is proven: because monarchical rule originates from Nimrod, who is said to have been a mighty hunter before the Lord, Genesis 10:9, which phrase implies Nimrod's tyrannical rule over the men of his time, which he exercised with no reverence for God's presence. Response: 1) The Assyrian empire indeed began with Nimrod, but not the magistracy as such absolutely; for God had committed the right of the sword to it long before Nimrod, Genesis 9:6. 2) A distinction is made between the lawful power of ruling, and the illicit manner of acquiring rule. The former is from God, the latter from Nimrod, who first occupied the magistracy by violent and tyrannical oppression of men. Indeed, the power is one thing, the acquisition and usurpation of power another. The power itself is always from God, Romans 13:1ff., but the illegitimate acquisition and usurpation of power is tyranny, which is considered, 1) as it is a sin of fault, 2) as it is a sin of punishment. In the former way, it is not from God, since He does not will evil, Psalm 5:5. In the latter way, it is from God, not as its author, but as an angry judge, Amos 3:6. This was acknowledged by AUGUSTINE, in Book

V of The City of God, chapter 21: "He who gave the empire to the Christian Constantine, also gave it to the apostate Julian."

II. The magistrate is called κτίσις ἀνθρωπίνῃ, or a human ordinance, 1 Peter 2:13. Therefore, it is not from God. Response: The magistrate is indeed called a κτίσις ἀνθρωπίνῃ, but one to whom obedience is due for the Lord's sake. It is therefore a human ordinance, because of the instrumental cause; it is also a divine ordinance, because of the principal cause; because God has sanctioned the magistrate through men, so that men may sustain this office and rule over men.

III. If the devil is the prince of the world, and gives the kingdoms of the world to whomever he wishes, secular rule cannot be from God; The antecedent is true. See John 12:31; 16:11; Matthew 4:8. Response: The devil is called the prince of the world and of all the kingdoms in the world, not according to truth, by reason of creation, preservation, governance, and legitimate possession, but according to opinion, a) on the part of the devil, by reason of both false boasting and unjust usurpation, b) on the part of men, both on account of perverse imagination and by reason of vicious and inordinate subjection.

IV. A tyrant is not from God; Some magistrate is a tyrant; Therefore. Response: 1) A distinction is made between a tyrant by title and by practice. A tyrant by title does not even deserve the name of magistrate. 2) A tyrant, insofar as he is a tyrant, or insofar as he abuses his power for cruelty, his own advantage, and other vices, is not from God. Meanwhile, however, the tyrant, by reason of the legislative, judicial, and punitive power which he received through election, succession, or legitimate occupation, is from God. A distinction must therefore be made between the power and the abuse of power.

V. The people of Israel, by demanding a King, provoked God to anger, 1 Samuel 8:7. Therefore, not all magistrates are appointed by God. Response: God did not simply and absolutely disapprove of the Israelites having or seeking a magistrate, but that they wished to change the form of government instituted by God Himself, by their own will, and indeed out of a wicked imitation (κακοζηλία) of the Gentiles. See v. 5 & 20.

VI. That certain Kings and Princes were not appointed by God, God Himself testifies, Hosea 8:4. "They have made kings, but not through me; they have made princes, and I did not know them." Response: The cited words according to the Hebrew text should be rendered thus; "They made a King, but not from me; they made Princes, and I did not know (approve)." The Prophet rebukes the people's diffidence, because out of a preposterous fear of dangers they chose the kings of the Gentiles as their guardians and patrons, without consulting God whether this pleased Him. For at one time they implored the help and aid of the Assyrians, at another of the Egyptians. From which it is not licit to infer that the magistracy is not an ordinance of God.

Question VII. Can a Christian in the New Testament, with a clear conscience, perform the office of a magistrate?

The magistracy is a state pleasing and approved by God, even in the New Testament, whose office a Christian can administer with an unsullied conscience.

Proof 1) The magistracy is an ordinance of God, Romans 13:1, which the gospel does not abolish, but confirms. 2) It is the will of God Himself that we be subject to human ordinances even in the New Testament, 1 Peter 2:13, Romans 13:1. 3) Christ Himself approves of the magistracy in the New Testament, when He commands to "give to Caesar what is Caesar's," Matthew 22:21, and He Himself pays the tribute, Matthew 17:27. 4) Many pious and faithful men in the New Testament performed the office of magistrate; Joseph of Arimathea, though he was a friend of Christ, awaiting the kingdom of God, nevertheless held the office of a senator, Mark 15:43. Christ, praising the faith of the royal official, John 4:46, did not order him to lay down the magistracy. CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, both THEODOSIUSES, MARCIAN, CHARLEMAGNE, and others flourished with the praise of piety.

The Antithesis is of the Anabaptists and Weigelians, whose opinion is that the office of a magistrate is unbecoming for a Christian in the New Testament. Their main arguments are:

I. Whatever conflicts with Christian liberty cannot please God; But the office of a magistrate, etc.; Therefore. Response: A distinction is made between spiritual liberty and political liberty or license. Christians are free with spiritual liberty from sin, John 8:34, which internal liberty of the soul by no means removes the external subjection due to the magistrate, but rather establishes it, 1 Peter 2:16.

II. A gentile office is unbecoming for a Christian; The office of a magistrate is a gentile office. Therefore. The minor is proven from Matthew 20:25. "You know that the rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them; it shall not be so among you." Response: In that passage, Christ denies political rule to the Apostles and ministers of the church, but not to all Christians.

III. In the state of innocence, there was no magistrate; Therefore, neither should there be one in the state of grace. The consequence is proven; because in the state of grace we are renewed in knowledge according to the same image of God with which man was endowed in the state of innocence. Response: 1) If in the state of innocence a multitude of men had been propagated, it would not have been without order and government, although that government would not have been δεσποτικόν, or masterly, but πατρικές, paternal, and the subjection not servile, but filial. 2) We are indeed renewed in the state of grace to the image of God, but our renewal is imperfect, because of the remnants of sin; on account of which infirmity God, even in the state of grace, willed to rule Christian man, and to keep him in decent order through the magistrate.

Question VIII. Which persons are to be chosen to undertake the office of magistrate?

Matter. Persons who are suitable according to the requirements prescribed in the divine word are to be chosen for the office of magistrate.

Obs. I. We are speaking of that state of the republic in which the nobles, or the people, have free votes to elect a magistrate, and not of that state in which a Prince succeeds by hereditary right.

Obs. II. The requirements of a good magistrate are divided into primary and secondary. The primary are the internal goods of the soul, or the virtues worthy of a magistrate, such as: a) piety towards God, b) justice and clemency towards citizens and subjects, c) temperance and chastity towards himself, moderation in the care of the body, and other courtly display, greatness of mind, and constancy tempered by reason in either fortune. The secondary are the external goods of the body and fortune, such as:

PART IV . CHAPTER III .

lineage, age, appearance, riches. Which political writers treat more broadly; we follow the guidance of scripture.

Proof 1) Jethro teaches Moses what sort of magistrates should be chosen, Exodus 18:21. "You shall look for able men from all the people, who fear God, who are men of truth, and who hate unjust gain; and you shall place such men over them to be rulers of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and of tens, to judge the people at all times." 2) Moses sets forth the requirements of a good magistrate, Deuteronomy 1:13. "Choose for yourselves wise, understanding, and experienced men from your tribes, and I will appoint them as your heads." 3) God Himself requires in a King, Deuteronomy 17:15, a) that he be a native, not a foreigner, b) not confident or proud in a multitude of horses, c) not a womanizer or lustful, d) not φιλάργυρος, or a lover of money, e) that he be a cultivator of the divine law, f) not a proud despiser of citizens, but gentle, clement, and easy of access.

Question IX. In what does the office of a magistrate formally consist?

Form. The office of a magistrate formally consists in the due and decent execution of the power divinely granted. And there has been granted to the magistrate a) a συμβουλευτική, consultative power, b) a νομοθετική, legislative power, c) a δικαστική, judicial power, d) a κολαστική, punitive power.

Proof a. God has granted to the magistrate the power of consulting well for the republic, and of solicitously providing for all things, so that, as much as possible, the poverty and calamity of the subjects may be relieved, and they themselves may be protected against external force. For the magistrate is an eye to the blind, a foot to the lame, a father to the poor, Job 29:15-16.

Proof b. Legislative power belongs to the magistrate, because it is his to decree justice, Proverbs 8:15. He decrees justice through law, since it is an obligatory decree, made by the Prince, for the salvation of the whole community.

Proof c. That judicial power belongs to the magistrate is clear a) from the name. Kings are called judges of the earth, Isaiah 48:11ff. b) God expressly commanded: Deuteronomy 16:18. "You shall appoint judges and officers in all your towns that the Lord your God is giving you, according to your tribes, and they shall judge the people with righteous judgment."

Proof d. The power of avenging injuries and punishing transgressors of the laws has been granted to the magistrate. To this end, the magistrate is armed with a sword not metaphorical (like the ecclesiastical ministry), but properly so called, and that both judicial, with which he can strike the wicked even unto death, or inflict capital punishment, and military, with which he can repel the unjust force of enemies from the republic, and can protect religion, liberty, and property. We prove that the judicial sword belongs to the magistrate 1) from Genesis 9:6. "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man (a legitimate avenger) shall his blood be shed." The legitimate avenger is the magistrate; for he does not bear the sword in vain; for he is the minister of God, an avenger for wrath, to him who does evil, Romans 13:4. 2) From Exodus 21:12. "Whoever strikes a man so that he dies shall surely be put to death." 3) From Matthew 26:52. "All who take the sword (by private rashness) must perish by the sword." We learn that the military sword belongs to the magistrate from both the Old and the New Testament. In the Old Testament, the right of war was sanctioned, a) by divine command, Numbers 31:2, Joshua 1:6, and elsewhere throughout, b) by laws of war prescribed by God, Numbers 10:9, Deuteronomy 20:19, c) by splendid victories granted by God, Exodus 17:11, Judges 3:10, Proverbs 21:31. Whence also holy men, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, Hezekiah, Jehoshaphat, lawfully waged wars. In the New Testament, war is nowhere prohibited. For 1) John, when seriously asked by the soldiers what they should do to escape the wrath of God, did not order them to leave the military (which they absolutely should have done, if that had been the Lord's will), but said to them: "Do not extort money from anyone by threats or by false accusation, and be content with your wages," Luke 3:14. John, another Elijah, and a great reformer of the church, would certainly have simply condemned the military state, if it could not consist with the attainment of salvation; but he exhorted not against the substance of war; for he does not say: cast away your arms, desert the military, etc., but against the vicious circumstances accidentally connected with war, namely, violence, fraud, and rapine. 2) Christ, Matthew 8:9-10, and Luke 10:1ff., praise the faith of soldiers, and declare them pleasing to God, notwithstanding their military state.

Therefore, neither Christ nor the Apostles forbade war in the New Testament.

Obs. A distinction is made 1) between a just and an unjust war. The former is that which is undertaken for urgent and most grave causes; the latter is that which is waged for trivial and vain causes (for vain glory, expansion of territory, fulfillment of lust, etc.). 2) Between a defensive and an offensive war. The former is always lawful, because defense is of natural right; the latter is not to be waged, unless prompted by extreme necessity, a) when atrocious injuries are to be avenged, b) when goods unjustly taken are to be recovered (*). 3) Between the use and the abuse of arms. The former consists in this, that an honorable peace may be restored; the latter rages without end. 4) Between the substance of war itself, and its vicious accidents, such as: frauds, rapines, fornications, adulteries, etc. We speak of a just war, of a necessary defensive and offensive war, of the right use of arms, and of the substance of war itself.

The Antithesis is of the Anabaptists, Weigelians, and Socinians, who deny that judicial and vindictory power belongs to the magistrate. They attack judicial power with the following arguments:

I. Christ prohibits human judgments, Matthew 7:1, saying: "Judge not." Response: Christ prohibits private and rash judgments, not public and necessary ones. Cf. Matthew 5:22.

Instance I. "Love covers all offenses," Proverbs 10:12. Therefore, no judgments are necessary. Response: Love covers lighter offenses, not more atrocious ones connected with the scandal of others, which cannot be tolerated without harming public honor and tranquility.

Instance II. "God will judge fornicators and adulterers," Hebrews 13:4. Therefore, they are not to be judged by the magistrate. Response: God will judge fornicators and adulterers as the supreme and independent judge; the magistrate judges the same as a ministerial and subordinate judge. For he is the minister of God, an avenger for wrath to him who does evil, Romans 13:4.

II. Whoever would leave his cloak also to one who is about to sue him at law and take his tunic, it is not for him to contend before a human tribunal; But a true Christian, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because otherwise one could contend before a judge to retain his tunic. The minor is proven from Matthew 5:40. Response: The words of Christ are to be taken not ἀπλῶς, absolutely, but συγκριτικῶς, comparatively, so that the sense is: If anyone wishes to contend with you more harshly in court, to satisfy his own petulance and lust, and, you being injured by an unjust sentence of the magistrate, takes away your tunic, then do not return evil for evil, but be more ready to moderately endure an injury than to avenge it or inflict one on another. It is better to suffer injury than to inflict it.

III. Whatever is counted among the defects of the church, that should be removed; The exercise of political judgments is counted among the defects of the church; Therefore. The minor is proven from 1 Corinthians 6:7. "It is already a defect among you that you have lawsuits with one another. Why not rather suffer wrong?" Response: The Apostle in that place does not reject the judgment of the magistrate, nor does he mean that it is plainly illicit for Christians to contend with an adversary before the magistrate; but he reprehends in the Corinthians only the immoderate lust for contention, because they too frequently contended with others before a pagan magistrate over the slightest cause, from which a stain was cast upon the church and Christians, and many were deterred from embracing the Christian religion.

IV. Christ says in Matthew 5:39. "Do not resist an evil person." Response: Christ in these words rejects not the public office of the magistrate, but private revenge.

They attack the punitive power, by which the wicked are punished with death, with the following arguments:

(*) Every offense is a certain injury inflicted on another. Therefore, an offensive war, if we wish to speak accurately, can never be just. But a war declared under urgent necessity is always a just defense of oneself. For he who has been provoked by an injury from another, and therefore thinks of avenging and repelling the injury, and of preventing more serious evils, does not offend that one, but defends himself. Therefore, the war which is called defensive is altogether twofold; either opposed to an enemy unjustly declaring, indeed already beginning war; or justly declared and begun against one who is violating rights; and this is what the blessed Author wished to signify by the name of a necessary offensive war.

PART IV . CHAPTER III .

I. Whoever kills, sins against the fifth commandment; A pious magistrate does not sin against the fifth commandment. Therefore. Response; Whoever, as a private person, kills with malice aforethought, sins against the fifth commandment. But the magistrate is not a private person, nor does he kill a man with malice aforethought, but he is divinely armed with the sword for vengeance, Romans 13:4.

II. Whatever conflicts with Christian charity is not to be tolerated in the Christian church; Capital punishments conflict with Christian charity; Therefore. The major is established; because even enemies are to be loved, Matthew 5:44. Response; 1) To punish criminals is also a work of charity; for a putrid member must be cut off, lest the sound part be drawn in. 2) Enemies are to be loved as men, not as robbers or criminals.

III. Whatever conflicts with the new covenant is to be abrogated; Capital punishments, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from John 1:17. "The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ." Response; A distinction is made between the name of grace taken theologically and politically. Theologically, it denotes the gratuitous favor of God, who for Christ's sake, apprehended by true faith, remits our sins, so that they are not imputed for eternal condemnation. This grace befalls even malefactors who are punished with death, provided they perform true repentance. Politically, grace denotes the pardon of offenses, so that they are not imputed for temporal punishment. In the former sense, it is called a covenant of grace, not in the latter.

IV. Whoever is not to be deprived of eternal life is not to be punished with death; But a Christian man, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear; because it conflicts most with Christian charity to deprive a man of eternal life. Nor is the major obscure, since for a man who undergoes the penalty of death, the time for repentance is cut short. For true repentance must be declared by good works. See Matthew 3:8; James 2:18. Response; We deny the minor. To the proof, we say that repentance can be declared by good works, either internal or external. Although a malefactor who is afflicted with capital punishment cannot always declare his repentance before the end of his life by external good works, he can nevertheless express it by internal good works, by love of God and neighbor, by patience and hope, by obedience towards the magistrate, by pious prayers, by an internal purpose of amending his life, if a longer one were to be his.

V. If Christ did not condemn a criminal man, neither should a Christian magistrate condemn him; The antecedent is true; see John 8:11. Therefore, also the consequent. Response; A distinction is made between the political office of the magistrate and the spiritual office of Christ. Our Savior in the days of his flesh did not wish to perform the office of a political judge; hence he wished neither to decide civil cases nor to condemn anyone to temporal punishment; but he had come into the world as a Prophet, to teach the gospel, as a Priest, to expiate sins, as a spiritual King, to erect the kingdom of grace.

They go about undermining the power of waging war with the following arguments;

I. Whoever sheds human blood, sins gravely; A magistrate waging war, etc. Therefore. The major is proven from Genesis 9:6. Response; Whoever sheds human blood either in a private murder or in an unjust war, sins gravely; I grant it. But we are speaking of a just war, and a public execution.

II. Whoever is angry with his brother is liable to divine judgment; Whoever wages war is angry with his brother. Therefore. The major is clear from Matthew 5:22. Response; A distinction is made between rash anger and just indignation. Whoever is angry with his brother εἰκῇ, rashly, is liable to divine judgment. But whoever repels from the borders of the fatherland an enemy who dares to undermine either the liberty of the citizens or religion, he burns with just indignation.

III. The weapons of Christians are spiritual; Therefore, they should abstain from carnal weapons. The antecedent is clear from 2 Corinthians 10:4. Response; Christians draw spiritual weapons against spiritual enemies, Satan, the world, and the flesh; the same draw carnal weapons against carnal enemies who ravage the bowels of the fatherland.

IV. Those whose duty it is to love their enemies, it is not for them to wage wars; But it is the duty of Christians to love their enemies, Matthew 5:44. Therefore. Response; Christ in that passage instructs private individuals in love, he does not disarm the magistrate. We love our private enemies, because private revenge is forbidden; the magistrate repels an external enemy, who attacks the republic with manifest force, with the sword divinely granted. We ought to love our enemies as ourselves, not above ourselves.

V. Those who are one body should not wage wars; But Christians, etc. 1 Corinthians 12:12. Therefore. Response: The enemies of the fatherland, who try to destroy either the liberty of the citizens or religion, are not true members of the mystical body, or the church, because they do not have true faith, which works through love, fixed in their hearts, even though they may profess the doctrine of faith with their mouth.

VI. In the times of the Messiah, a most desired peace will flourish; For the wolves will dwell with the lambs, Isaiah 11:6. Response: In that passage is understood the spiritual peace and public society of faith, by which converted Jews and Gentiles will coalesce into one mystical body.

VII. David could not build the Lord's temple, because he was a warrior and shed human blood, yet he had waged none but the Lord's wars, 1 Chronicles 29:3. How then will they dare to stain their hands with blood, who ought to be the holy temple of God? Response: 1) David also was a holy temple of God, and yet by divine command he lawfully waged wars. 2) He could not build the Lord's temple, a) because he was hindered by a chain of wars; b) because wars were little suited to the type, since the founder of the temple had to bear the type of the peaceful Messiah.

VIII. War is the aggregate of all evils; Therefore, it is to be fled. The antecedent is clear; because war is accompanied by rapine, debauchery, adultery, homicide. Response: These pertain to the abuse of war and its vicious accidents, not to the genuine use of arms and the substance of a just war itself.

Question X. What is the two-fold object with which the magistrate is concerned?

Object. The object in the direction of which the magistrate is occupied is either real or personal.

The real object. The real object is civil and sacred things, with which the magistrate is concerned not equally, but in a different manner.

The magistrate is occupied with sacred things; by solicitously observing and exercising those things which are to be believed and done for the salvation of all men a); by directing the church and the Christian religion with external governance b); but not claiming for himself the internal governance of sacred things, but leaving it to the ministers of the church c); and by using the counsel of sincere doctors of the church in the external governance of sacred things d).

Proof a. From Psalm 2:10-12. "Now therefore, O kings, be wise! be warned, O rulers of the earth! Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling! Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and you perish in the way." The magistrate is bound, for his own sake, to know the true God, to venerate Christ with a kiss of faith, love, and subjection, and to serve the Lord in fear.

Proof b. The magistrate directs the church by external governance: a) Generally, by opening the gate to the Lord, Psalm 24:7, i.e., by positively cooperating in the introduction, constitution, and conservation of the true divine worship, so that under his rule they may lead a quiet life in all not only honesty but also piety, 1 Timothy 2:2. b) Specifically, 1) by appointing suitable ministers for the church. For the call of sacred ministers of the church also pertains to the magistrate, both by reason of his person, because he is a member of the church and indeed the principal one, and by reason of his office, because he is the nurse of the church and the guardian of both tables of the decalogue, divinely constituted; let him beware, however, lest, excluding the presbytery and the people, he impose pastors on unwilling listeners. 2) By erecting temples and schools; for these serve for the exercise of divine worship in public assemblies. 3) By providing for the honest sustenance of doctors in the church and schools who perform a public function. For Kings are the nurses of the church, Isaiah 49:23, who should from time to time consider that the Lord has so ordained, that those who proclaim the gospel (since they cannot practice manual arts) should live from the gospel, 1 Corinthians 9:14. 4) By instituting orders among the ministers of the church, after the example of David, 1 Chronicles 24. 5) By suspending from office or removing flagitious ministers of the church; just as Solomon removed Abiathar, the high priest, substituting Zadok in his place, 1 Kings 2:27. 6) By making ecclesiastical laws concerning the external exercise of divine worship and εὐσχημοσύνην καὶ τάξιν (decency and order), after the example of David, who promulgated a law concerning the bringing back of the ark, 1 Chronicles 13:5, and concerning the offices of the Levites, ch. 22:6; of Jehoshaphat, who proclaimed a fast, 2 Chronicles 20:3. 7) By lawfully dispensing ecclesiastical goods. But king Asa brought into the temple what his father had sanctified, 1 Kings 15:15. Hezekiah, appointing a salary for the priests, erected a sacred treasury in the temple, 2 Chronicles 31:11. 8) By instituting visitations and councils, after the example of the pious Kings in the Old Testament; Jehoshaphat, 2 Kings 16:7; Hezekiah, ch. 29:4. 9) By reforming religion contaminated by heresy, superstition, and idolatry, and indeed by inquiring into and punishing heretics and seducers, after the example of Jehu, 2 Kings 10:19, and of CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, according to EUSEBIUS, Book I of the Life of Constantine, chapter 11, and also by abolishing idolatrous worship, after the example of Asa, 1 Kings 15:12, of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chronicles 17:7, and of the Christian Emperors.

PART IV . CHAPTER III .

Proof c. The internal economy and governance of sacred things, consisting in the doctrine of the word, absolution from sins, and the legitimate administration of the sacraments, is proper to the ministers of the church. The magistrate cannot claim this for himself without sacrilege: when Uzziah, otherwise pious, arrogated this to himself, entering the temple of the Lord to burn incense on the altar of incense, he was severely punished with leprosy breaking out on his forehead. See 2 Chronicles 26:16ff.

Proof d. The magistrate ought, in sacred matters themselves which are subject to his ecclesiastical power, to use the counsel of sincere doctors and pastors of the church, according to the divine command, Deuteronomy 17:18, Joshua 1:7, and the examples of praised Kings, David, 1 Chronicles 16; Asa, 1 Chronicles 14; Jehoshaphat, chapter 17; Hezekiah, chapter 29; Josiah, chapter 34. For this purpose in our churches, Kings and Princes have established an ecclesiastical senate, or Consistory, consisting of persons not only political but also ecclesiastical.

The Antithesis is of the Papists, who deny that the care of religion belongs to the magistrate. Their chief argument is:

Whoever attributes the care of religion to the magistrate, they introduce a confusion of the ecclesiastical and political office; But the Protestant doctors, etc. Therefore. Response: A distinction is made between the external governance of religion and the internal economy of sacred things (which distinction is gathered from the words of CONSTANTINE, according to EUSEBIUS, Book IV of the Life of Constantine, ch. 24, who said: "You are Bishops within the church, I am a Bishop outside the church, or temple, appointed by God"). The magistrate is here the minister of the church. Others distinguish between ecclesiastical power and power that is formally spiritual. Ecclesiastical power consists in the external care and disposition of sacred things; this belongs to the magistrate; But power that is formally spiritual, which produces the salvation of the soul by public office, and proximately on the part of the living instrumental cause, is proper to ordained pastors alone.

Question XI. Does architectonic power to act and operate through ministers in sacred as well as in secular matters belong to the magistrate?

The political magistrate does not have architectonic power concerning sacred things equally and indifferently, as concerning civil things.

Obs. Architectonic power is said to be that which, by one habit and one faculty, influences through mediate causes of the same kind and order as itself, into an effect common to the principle quod (that which) and quo (by which). For thus architectonic power is described by ARISTOTLE, Book I of the Magna Moralia, last chapter. Just as an architect, although he has under him the builder of the house, and this one in turn other ministers and masons, carpenters, ironworkers, etc., who influence more closely the structure itself; yet the architect also influences, because he prescribes the manner in all these things.

Proof 1) The political magistrate does not influence through mediate causes of the same kind and order as himself, into an effect common to the principle quod and quo. Therefore, he does not have architectonic power concerning sacred things as he does concerning civil things. The antecedent is proven: because the power of the magistrate is not formally spiritual; nor are the ministers of the same order and kind as the political magistrate; nor, finally, is salvation an effect common to the ministers of the church, as the principle quo, and to the magistrate, as the principle quod. 2) If architectonic power in sacred things belongs to the magistrate, it will follow that, a) through the ministers of the church, he efficiently influences the conversion, regeneration, justification, sanctification, and glorification of Christians; b) it is permissible for the magistrate to preach the word, administer the sacraments, hear confession, absolve penitents, just as it is permissible for an architect, if he wishes to lend a hand, to do everything that is the work of builders and craftsmen; c) the supreme priesthood on earth is subordinate to the magistrate, and therefore Kings are pastors of the church, and presbyters are sheep. By which hypothesis, Caesaropapism is most strongly confirmed.

The Antithesis is of Pareus, Vedelius, and others, who maintain that architectonic power concerning sacred things belongs to the magistrate just as it does concerning civil things. Their main arguments are:

I. Legislative power concerning sacred things is either in the presbytery or in the political magistrate. It is not in the presbytery, because its role is to receive laws, not to give them. Therefore, it is in the political magistrate; and whoever gives laws enjoys architectonic power. Response: To give laws concerning internal sacred matters is neither in the power of the presbytery nor of the political magistrate, but of God, the supreme legislator. It is indeed the magistrate's role to make laws concerning the external order of divine worship, concerning ceremonies and rites, yet not absolutely, but with the presbytery called into council.

II. If both ecclesiastical and political power are subordinate to the majesty of Kings, then architectonic power concerning sacred things, no less than concerning political things, will be in the hands of kings: The antecedent is true; Therefore, also the consequent. The reason for the consequence is: because the architectonic power of Kings concerning political matters is manifest. Therefore, if sacred matters are subject to the majesty of kings in the same way that civil matters are subject to it, he undoubtedly excels with architectonic power concerning sacred matters. The minor is proven from Romans 13:1; 1 Peter 2:13. Response: Political and ecclesiastical power are subordinate to the majesty of Kings, but in a different manner, not, however, in an equal degree. For civil power is subordinate to the majesty of kings simply, but ecclesiastical power only in a certain respect, and by reason of the external exercise of religion.

Question XII. How is the magistrate concerned with civil matters?

Concerning civil matters, the supreme magistrate can exercise his consultative, legislative, judicial, and punitive power at his pleasure a), provided he commands or disposes nothing that is repugnant to natural and divine law b).

Proof a. The magistrate can dispose of civil matters according to his own will, because he is free from positive, merely civil human laws, unless he has bound himself by an oath and promised that he will sacredly observe the fundamental laws of the republic. We speak of the supreme magistrate, whose majesty on earth recognizes no superior. It is his role not to receive laws from men, but to give them to them.

Proof b. The supreme magistrate is not free from natural and divine law, but rather, both by reason of the subject matter and by the will of God as the supreme Lord, he is bound, indeed proximately to obedience, but failing obedience, to punishment, if not in this life, certainly after this, to be endured, unless serious repentance has intervened.

Question XIII. What is the personal object of the magistrate?

Personal Object. The personal object is all persons subject to the power and rule of the magistrate, and they are commonly called subjects, or citizens, of whom some are laity, or seculars a), others are clerics, or ecclesiastics b).

Obs. The distinction of subjects into laity and clerics is indeed ecclesiastical, but not biblical. For Peter in his 1st epistle, 5:3, calls the church κλήρος. For God the Father gave the nations to the Messiah as an inheritance, Psalm 2:8. However, it was customary already in the primitive church to call ministers clerics, because they received τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας, the lot of the ministry. ISIDORE, in book VII of etymologies, ch. 2, thinks that clerics and clerics were so called because Matthias was chosen by lot, whom we read was the first ordained by the Apostles. Cf. D. GERHARD, book on the ministry of the church, D. 38.

Proof a. The laity, who are contained within the sphere of the republic, willingly admit that they are subjects; because under the rule and protection of the magistrate they can lead a tranquil and quiet life in all piety and honesty, 1 Timothy 2:2.

PART IV . CHAPTER III .

Proof b. That clerics, insofar as they are regarded as members of the republic, are subject to the power and rule of the civil magistrate, both as to their persons and as to their goods, is proven: a) Generally: Whoever are members and parts of the republic, they must be referred either to the order of magistrates or to that of subjects; Now, clerics neither hold nor ought to hold civil magistracy: Therefore, in this respect, in which they are members of the republic, they ought to be referred to the order of subjects. b) Specifically: 1) From the Old Testament: Moses was placed over Aaron as God, Exodus 4:16, and corrected him when he had fallen into sin, Exodus 32:21. Solomon and Hezekiah gave law to the Priests and Levites, 1 Chronicles 29:15. Therefore, the Priests of the Old Testament were subject to the power of the political magistrate. 2) From the New Testament: a) Paul expressly says, Romans 13:1, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers." We argue: Every human soul that is contained in the republic, let it be subject to the higher power; But a clerical soul is a human soul, which is contained in the republic; Therefore. b) Christ, the supreme Bishop, both in personal and in real matters, rendered obedience to the civil magistrate; Therefore, ministers ought to render the same. The first part of the assumption is confirmed from John 19:11, where Christ says to Pilate: "You would have no power over me at all, unless it had been given to you from above." The latter part is proven from Matthew 17:27, where Christ pays the tax for himself and for Peter, adding the reason, lest he should give scandal. c) Paul in Acts 25:10 appealed from the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem and the tribunal of Festus to Caesar: "I am standing before Caesar's tribunal, where I ought to be judged." We infer: To whose tribunal someone appeals, to his power he submits himself; Paul appeals to the tribunal of Caesar; Therefore.

Obs. I. The ministers of the church are considered either with respect to the political bond, by which they are bound to the republic; or with respect to their office in formally spiritual actions, e.g., in the doctrine of the word, absolution from sins, and the administration of the sacraments. They are subject to the civil magistrate in the former respect, not in the latter.

Obs. II. A distinction is made between the supreme civil magistrate and the inferior one. The prelates of the church are subject to the supreme political magistrate, not always to the inferior one. For the supreme magistrate has appointed Superintendents over the Pastors, and has instituted ecclesiastical Consistories, in which both ecclesiastical and political persons preside, to whom jurisdiction over the clergy has been attributed in a certain order and manner.

Obs. III. Clerics are exempt from personal burdens, lest their authority be diminished and the administration of their office be impeded. Consecrated church goods, which Clerics enjoy, are immune from real burdens, but not their own property, even if granted to Clerics by the benefit and privilege of pious Princes.

The Antithesis is of the Papists, who deny that the Clergy are subject to civil power and jurisdiction; who support their opinion with the following arguments:

I. It is absurd that the sheep should presume to judge its shepherd; Now, the Clerics are shepherds; the Prince and magistrate are sheep; Therefore. Response: The magistrate is a sheep and a shepherd in different respects. In spiritual matters, the magistrate is a sheep, but in political matters, he is a shepherd, Psalm 78:71-72; Isaiah 44:28. Therefore, just as in spiritual matters the magistrate ought to obey the pastors, because in respect to them he is a sheep; so in political matters the ministers of the church ought to obey the magistrate, because in respect to him they are sheep.

II. Over that which is consecrated to God, the princes of this age have no right; The Clerics are consecrated to God; Therefore. Response: Clerics, by reason of their office, are consecrated to God; by reason of their person, they remain parts of the republic and possess earthly goods, in respect of which they remain subject to earthly Princes.

III. The flesh is subject to the spirit, not the other way around; Therefore, the secular power is subject to the spiritual, not the other way around. Response: I deny the consequence; because neither is ecclesiastical power merely spiritual; for it has much of the flesh; nor is secular power merely carnal; for it has much of the spirit.

IV. Christian princes are sons of the church, and doctors are pastors; Therefore, the former are inferior and subject to the latter. Response: 1) The name of father does not exempt from the power of some order; since even a natural, private father ought to be subject to his son who is a consul. 2) Are magistrates also called fathers; are they therefore exempt from ecclesiastical power? Princes are called sons of the church, which implies submission to the religion and dogmas of the church, not privation of power. Solomon showed reverence to his mother, but he was superior in majesty and jurisdiction.

V. The lands of the Hierophants were exempted by Pharaoh from taxes; Therefore, the sustenance and lands of sacred men are exempt from the payment of taxes. Genesis 47:22. Response: The lands of the priests were not their own, but assigned to them by Pharaoh out of liberality to sustain their life (*); And therefore they could not be burdened with the trouble of taxes. For by divine, natural, and international law, the laborer is worthy of his wages, Matthew 10:10.

Question XIV. For what end has the magistrate been sanctioned by God?

End. The ultimate and principal end of the magistrate is the glory of God a); the intermediate and less principal end is the public good b).

Proof a. Since the political magistrate is a divine ordinance, Romans 13:1, he rightly and deservedly looks to the glory of God in his whole government, and the citizens obey the magistrate διὰ τὸν Κύριον, for the Lord's sake, 1 Peter 2:13.

Proof b. The civil magistrate is ordained for the public good, and that of four kinds: 1) ecclesiastical, for Kings are the nurses of the church, and Bishops outside the temple; 2) civil, while he protects the interests of the citizens, and repels external enemies from the borders of the fatherland; 3) moral, insofar as he prescribes honest laws, by which the subjects are kept in their duty, so that they may lead a tranquil life in piety and honesty, 1 Timothy 2:2. 4) natural, by which Rulers provide for the subjects concerning provisions and other necessities, like Pharaoh, Genesis 41:34.

Question XV. What are the duties of subjects?

Duties of subjects. The duties of subjects are: a) to obey the magistrate in all things that are not repugnant to the divine word and natural law; b) to revere the magistrate; c) to pay taxes; d) to offer prayers for the safety of the magistrate.

Proof a. From Romans 13:1. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; for there is no power except from God," v. 5. "Therefore one must be in subjection, not only to avoid wrath but also for the sake of conscience." The commands of the magistrate which are contrary to the word of God and to the moral law are excepted. For we must obey God rather than men, Acts 5:29.

Proof b. From Romans 13:7. "Render... to whom respect is owed, respect; to whom honor is owed, honor."

Proof c. From Romans 13:7. "Render... to whom tax is owed, tax; to whom revenue is owed, revenue."

Proof d. From 1 Timothy 2:1-2. "First of all, then, I urge that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings be made for all people, for kings and all who are in high positions, that we may lead a peaceful and quiet life, godly and dignified in every way."

(*) It is indeed very doubtful and uncertain whether that which is said about the Priests should be thought to apply to them. Not to touch upon more, let this one thing suffice: the name כֹּהֵן has a wider meaning, it generally denotes a minister, whether one who officiates in sacred things, or one who is a counselor to the Prince. Many, therefore, and not without proof, interpret it of the ministers of the court.

SUSPIRIUM

Protect, O IMMORTAL GOD, KING of Kings, LORD of Lords, all Magistrates, by Your authority promoted to that height of dignity, that they may be able to give laws to the citizens! Protect our King, that he may long consult for us! Protect our Lord, that he may most clemently protect us! Protect the common Father of all, that he may most benignly cherish all! Inspire him with salutary counsels, grant prosperous successes to his counsels, confirm, increase, advance the successes, that they may be stable and perpetual! Supported by Your grace, may he rule piously! May he rule happily! And while he does this, may he make us, his citizens, pious, just, and happy! O blessed is our King with obedient citizens! O blessed are the citizens with a King best in virtue, greatest in power! The source of which blessedness, we eternally venerate you, most HOLY DEITY.

CHAPTER IV.
ON THE ECONOMIC STATE, AND SPECIFICALLY
MARITAL, PATERNAL,
AND MASTERFUL STATE.

Question I. What is the economic state?

THE ECONOMIC STATE is a society of men constituting one house, or family, and is divided into the marital, paternal, and masterful society.

Question II. What is marriage?

Definition of marriage. Marriage is the indissoluble union of one man and one woman, according to divine institution, made by the mutual consent of both, for the generation of offspring and for mutual help in life.

Obs. I. Marriage (coniugium) is named from the common yoke (commune iugum), by which husband and wife are yoked together.

Obs. II. It is also called matrimony (matrimonium), from the end of marriage, or the generation of offspring, through which a woman becomes a mother (mater); Also nuptials (connubium), from the rite of the bride, who, when being led into the house, was covered by the groom's veil, as if by a cloud (nubes).

Obs. III. Marriage is taken a) abstractly, in itself and its nature, as it is the individual society of one man and one woman, without regard to whether it is the union of this man, this woman; b) concretely and in particular, as it is contracted between certain specific persons, this man, this woman. Furthermore, matrimony can be considered, 1) as it is initiated, through betrothal, a) as it is consummated, through nuptials and carnal union.

Obs. IV. Marriage is defined by union, which here denotes not only the transient act by which a male and female are joined, but also the permanent state, or marital society, in which husband and wife remain joined by an inseparable covenant.

Question III. What is the principal efficient cause of marriage?

Principal efficient cause. The first and highest efficient cause of matrimony is the one-in-three God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit a), who indeed instituted marriage abstractly, and considered generally in its nature, immediately b). To marriage considered concretely and in particular, God concurs sometimes effectively c), sometimes permissively d).

Proof a. From Genesis 1: אלהים , the triune God, created"; for both creation and the institution of matrimony is a divine action ad extra, common to all three persons of the Godhead, "man male and female, and blessed them, saying: 'Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the earth.'"

Proof b. That God instituted marriage, considered abstractly and in its nature, immediately, is clearly established: because God 1) created the spouses, Genesis 1:27. 2) formed the woman to provide help to the man, Genesis 2:18. 3) joined the first parents, Genesis 2:22ff. 4) promulgated matrimonial laws, e.g., concerning the constancy of the marital bond, Genesis 2:24. "A man shall leave his father and his mother and hold fast to his wife, and they shall become one flesh" (those words indeed Adam, as a prophet illumined by the prophetic spirit, and truly θεόπνευστος, spoke, yet they are attributed to God Himself, Matthew 19:5, because God with supreme authority spoke those words through Adam); also laws concerning the degrees of consanguinity impeding marriage, Leviticus 18:7, concerning the penalty for adultery, Leviticus 20:10. 5) blessed the spouses, Genesis 1:28. Therefore, marriage is a state immediately sanctioned by God.

Proof c. To the marriage of pious spouses, God concurs with a general and a special influence; With a general influence, because all actions of men, and therefore also the contract of matrimony, depend on God as the first cause; With a special influence, insofar as His gracious providence ordains and disposes which woman ought to marry which man, by bending and moving their hearts to mutual consent. Thus He gives Rebecca as a wife to Isaac, Genesis 24:2.

Proof d. To the illicit marriage of the impious, God does not concur with a special influence, because God does not approve of an illegitimate marriage, but detests it; He permits it, however. For example, Esau took two wives, against his parents' wishes, Genesis 26:34, which marriage God did not approve, but only permitted.

Question IV. What are the secondary and subordinate causes of marriage?

Subordinate causes. The secondary and subordinate causes of contracting marriage are the spouses themselves a), and their parents, in whose power they are, consenting to the marriage b).

Obs. I. Just as he who is to be girded is considered as girded; so here spouses are called those who are yet to contract matrimony between themselves.

Obs. II. The male and female to be joined by the nuptial covenant are considered in two ways; 1) as contracting; 2) as the object about which the contract is made. In the latter way, they pertain to the matter, in the former sense, to the efficient cause of marriage. Their causality, insofar as they are regarded in the genus of efficient cause, is the mutual consent of the contracting parties, which, joined with the consent of the parents, constitutes the adequate and complete cause of marriage.

Proof a. That the consent of the contracting persons is required for a legitimate marriage is gathered 1) from the character and nature of matrimony. For contracting a most close and voluntary society of life, the consent of the contracting parties is required. Marriage is a most close and voluntary society of life; Therefore. The minor is clear from Genesis 2:24. 2) From the first institution of marriage. God, bringing Eve to Adam, does not violently force her upon him, but inwardly kindles his heart towards Eve with a flame of chaste love, so that he freely chooses her as his spouse, and exultantly exclaims: "This at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh." She shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man, Genesis 2:23. 3) From approved examples. When the father and brother of Rebecca were treating with Eleazar, the agent of Abraham, who was seeking her as a wife for Isaac, they said: "Let us call the girl and ask her," Genesis 24:57. Cf. Tobit 7:8. 4) From the consequence of disadvantages. Marriages which are arranged against the will of the contracting persons bring with them many disadvantages. What one does not love, one easily despises; and it is a sad marriage to which a male or female is forced to enter.

Proof b. That the antecedent consent of parents, using sound reason and not laboring under foul avarice or moroseness towards their children, where it can be had, or at least the subsequent consent, is required for the legitimate and firm matrimony of their children, not only for propriety but also out of necessity, is proven; 1) From the fourth commandment, and its explanation which the Apostle gives, Colossians 3:20. "Children, obey your parents in everything." If children ought to obey their parents in all lawful things, it follows that they ought also to obey them in contracting matrimony, so that they do not contract matrimony without their will. 2) From the divine command, by which they are ordered to give their children in marriage, Jeremiah 29:6. "Take wives for your sons, and give your daughters in marriage, that they may bear sons and daughters"; and Deuteronomy 7:3. "You shall not give your daughter to a son of any of the Gentiles, nor shall you take a daughter of a Gentile for your son." To this pertains the divine command about freely giving in marriage a deflowered daughter, Exodus 22:16-17. "If a man seduces a virgin who is not betrothed, and lies with her, he shall give the bride-price for her and make her his wife. If her father utterly refuses to give her to him, he shall pay money equal to the bride-price for virgins." 3) From the collection of examples, and the perpetual practice among the people of God. Hagar took a wife for her son Ishmael, Genesis 21:21. Abraham sends Eleazar to arrange a marriage for his son, Genesis 24:3. Bethuel betroths his daughter Rebecca to Isaac, v. 51. Isaac sends Jacob to Mesopotamia to take a wife from the daughters of Laban, Genesis 28:1, and Laban gave his daughter to Jacob, chapter 29:19. Samson said to his parents: "I saw a woman in Timnah, of the daughters of the Philistines, so get her for me as my wife," Judges 14:2. 4) From natural law. Any offspring that is not of its own right, but in the power of its parents, cannot contract matrimony without the consent of the parents: But unemancipated offspring, etc. Therefore. 5) From the resulting absurdities. From marriages contracted without the consent of parents, a) the authority of the parents is undermined, b) an heir is born to an unwilling father, c) divine, natural, and civil law is violated.

The Antithesis is of the Papists, who maintain that a marriage can be ratified and valid, even if the consent of the parents is not added. They object:

I. If Esau could take two wives without the consent of his parents, it follows that today a marriage is valid without the consent of the parents: The antecedent is true. See Genesis 26:34. Therefore, also the consequent. Response: 1) The example of Esau, a profane and obstinate man, since it is contrary to divine law, proves nothing. 2) Isaac could have impeded or invalidated Esau's marriage by his dissent; yet he tolerated it out of paternal indulgence, although he did not approve of it.

II. Jacob took one wife with his parents' consent, but afterwards he took several more, with his parents being completely unaware, Genesis 29:30; 30:4, 9. Response: 1) Jacob's marriage cannot be a norm which pious spouses may safely follow, for Jacob was a polygamist, and was deceived by Laban. 2) When he allowed two handmaids to be joined to him, he had long since been emancipated from his father's power.

III. Tobias, in a foreign land, took a wife while his parents were ignorant. Response: Tobias, at the angel's persuasion, took the daughter of Raguel; both were certain of the subsequent consent of the parents. See Tobit 6:17.

IV. That without which a marriage is perfect is not necessarily required for its perfection: Now, without the consent of the parents, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven: Because, with the consent of the parents lacking, there is still 1) the matter of marriage, or sociable persons, 2) the form, i.e., the consent of the contracting persons, 3) the end, i.e., the procreation of offspring. Response: The form of marriage consists in the indissoluble bond of the spouses, arising from a legitimate, full, and sufficient consent. But the consent of those who are not yet of their own right is not legitimate, full, and sufficient, unless the consent of those in whose power they are is added.

V. The marriage of slaves, against the will of their masters, is firm and ratified: Therefore, much more will the marriage of sons, against the will of their parents, be ratified. Response: I deny the consequence: because the relationship of a father to his children is very different from the relationship of a master to his slave. A father's right over his children is much greater and more sacred than a master's over his slaves, unless they are property, for whom it is certainly not permissible to take a wife without the knowledge and against the will of their masters. Through the marriage of a slave, where the master's consent is lacking, an heir is not born to the unwilling master; but this happens in the marriage of children contracted without the consent of their parents, by which an heir is begotten to an unwilling father or grandfather.

VI. Whatever can place an impediment to an honorable matrimony is not necessarily required for entering into the conjugal covenant: But the consent of parents, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven: because it can easily happen that parents morosely deny their consent, moved by no serious cause, or they may disagree among themselves. Response: 1) If parents, out of moroseness or avarice, are unwilling to consent, the children should first refer the matter to the nearest agnates, to persuade the father not to abuse his paternal power. If they achieve nothing, the matter should be signified to the ministers of the church, and if the father does not yield to their admonition, the matter is to be referred to the Consistory, which can consent in place of the parents. a) If the parents disagree among themselves, the father prevails, both because paternal power is more with the father, and because he possesses a more solid judgment.

Question V. What sort of consent ought there to be from the persons contracting marriage?

Consent. The consent of the persons contracting marriage ought to be a) true and pure from error, b) free, c) just, d) manifested by external significant words, or other signs and acts, by which are constituted and declared the betrothals, which are a mutual promise of future nuptials.

Proof a. True consent is, as it were, the soul of the conjugal contract, and therefore ought to be pure from error. However, error, which is repugnant to full consent, is not of the same kind; for there is error of person, of fortune, of quality, and of status. Error of person is when someone thinks he is contracting with that person whom he conceived in his mind, when however out of error he contracts with another, or when another is joined to him in place of her with whom he had contracted; by which error of person, the marriage can be impeded, unless it is ratified by subsequent consent. Thus Jacob had contracted with Rachel, but to him, when the time for lying together had come, Leah was brought in place of Rachel. Error of fortune is said to be when someone thinks he is marrying a wealthy woman, whom he afterwards discovers to be poor; by which error the marriage is not impeded, since riches do not pertain to its substance. Error of quality is either an error of simple quality, or an error of substantial quality. An error of simple quality does not concern the substance and end of matrimony, e.g., when someone thinks he is going to marry a well-mannered and beautiful woman, when however she is morose, quarrelsome, a drunkard. However, neither does an error of simple quality impede the marriage. An error of substantial quality is one that is made concerning a quality which pertains to the substance or end of matrimony, for example: When someone thinks he is marrying a virgin, whom however he discovers to have been lain with and to be pregnant; or when he thinks he is marrying one who is able for the procreation of offspring, when however he discovers that she is utterly unable; by which error the marriage is impeded. Error of status is when a free man, or a freeborn man, thinks he is marrying a free woman, and he marries a slave; or when a freeborn woman marries a slave, whom she thought to be freeborn; by which error, formerly, when slaves were property, the consent became void, but today a different judgment is to be made concerning hired servants, who are considered freeborn, since they were born of freeborn parents. Wherefore, to avoid errors, integrity of judgment is required; but a man who is deeply drunk, a fool, and perpetually insane is destitute of sound and incorrupt judgment, and therefore cannot truly consent to matrimony.

Proof b. Consent on both sides ought to be free. For consent extorted by force or fear is in reality not consent, because it is not an elicited act of the will. A distinction must be made here between a just and a vain fear. The former arises from the threat of those things which a prudent man rightly abhors; the latter arises from trivial causes. Betrothals are dissolved by a just fear, not by a vain one.

Proof c. A just consent ought to be mutual, born of promise and re-promise, joined with the consent of those in whose power either both contracting parties, or one of them, is.

Proof d. Although it formally consists in the internal acts of the will, and denotes the will of two or more, equally terminated to the same thing; yet it must be confessed that internal acts alone, without external declaration, are not sufficient for contracting marriage, so that the betrothals may be valid and ratified.

Question VI. How are betrothals distinguished?

Division of betrothals. Betrothals are distinguished; a) Into betrothals de praesenti (for the present), and de futuro (for the future). The former are made by words of the present; the latter are made by words of the future; b) Into pure betrothals, which are absolute, and conditioned. The former are made without express mention of any condition; the latter are made under a certain condition.

Proof a. If a suitor conceives his promise in these words: "I will take you as my wife," he contracts a betrothal de futuro; but if he says: "I take you as my wife," he contracts a betrothal de praesenti. It should be carefully observed here that properly, those are called betrothals which are made by words of the future; but a promise of matrimony by words of the present constitutes the matrimony itself, and therefore betrothals de praesenti are not distinct from matrimony.

Proof b. That betrothals are to be distinguished into absolute and conditioned, we learn from scripture. For Rebecca was betrothed to Isaac absolutely and without an annexed condition. See Genesis 24. But Rachel was betrothed to Jacob under the condition of seven years of service, Genesis 29. From absolute betrothals, so effective an obligation arises that one of the contracting parties, at the petition of the other party, can be compelled to consummate the matrimony. Betrothals contracted under a condition do not have effect for the present, but are suspended until the added conditions are fulfilled. But the annexed conditions are some honorable, some base, some impossible. Concerning which, see GERHARD, in the section on marriage, § 132.

Question VII. Does the sacerdotal blessing also pertain to the efficient cause of marriage?

Priestly Blessing. The solemn blessing, or joining, which is done by a Priest according to the customary rite, pertains not to the contracting a), but to the consummating of a Christian marriage b).

Proof a. We have clearly shown that marriage is contracted by mutual and just consent.

Proof b. The Sacerdotal blessing is required for the consummation of a Christian marriage; a) So that the legitimate marriage of the contracting parties may be publicly known; b) So that the contracting parties may be admonished about the holy and indissoluble bond of matrimony, about the divine blessing, about conjugal duties, about the tolerance of hardships; c) So that the new spouses may be commended to God, the author of marriage, through solemn prayers.

Question VIII. What is the matter of marriage?

Matter. The matter, or Subject, of marriage are the persons who are joined in marriage a), two in number, one male and one female b), able to obtain the ends of marriage c), and constituted outside the prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity d).

Proof a. The persons sociable in marriage, insofar as they are regarded as consenting and contracting matrimony, are the secondary efficient causes of matrimony; but insofar as they are considered as parts and members of the marital society, they are the matter of marriage.

Proof b. 1) From the primary divine institution. For God created only two humans, and joined only two into one flesh, Genesis 2:24. We argue: Marriage according to the divine institution is the union of two people, a male and a female, into one flesh; But simultaneous polygamy is not the union of two, but of several into one flesh. Therefore, polygamy is not a marriage contracted according to the divine institution. (*)

You say: Moses, in the Hebrew text, did not expressly place the word expressing the dual number. Response: That makes no difference, because at that time there existed no more humans than two. But that marriage ought to consist of only two persons is clear; 2) From the repetition of the primeval institution made by Christ, Matthew 19:4-5. "Have you not read that he who created them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, 'Therefore a man shall leave his father and his mother and hold fast to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh'?" Observe: 1) If God had wanted one man to have several wives, He would have made not just one, but several females. 2) God said: a man shall hold fast to his wife, not to his wives. 3) Christ expressly used the word expressing the dual number. For He said: "and the two shall become one flesh." You say: In fornication, two become one flesh, even if the fornicator is joined with another woman, 1 Corinthians 6:16. Therefore, even if someone has several wives, it still remains that two are one flesh, because with each one he becomes one flesh. Response: 1) He who adheres to a prostitute becomes one flesh with her, not legitimately, but de facto. 2) He who adheres to a prostitute does not become one flesh with her under the hypothesis of enduring unity in a legitimate marriage; but under the act of breaking the first bond and removing the unity with his legitimate wife. Therefore, by the very fact that someone becomes one flesh with a prostitute, he ceases to be one flesh with his legitimate spouse; for he commits adultery, which is directly opposed to marriage. 3) From the apostolic instruction: "(To avoid) fornications, let each man have his own wife; and let each woman have her own husband. The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does; And likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does," 1 Corinthians 7:2, 4. From these, a twofold argument arises. a) Where each woman does not have her own husband, there is not a legitimate marriage pleasing to God; But in polygamy, she does not have, etc.; Therefore. b) The authority which has already been transferred to the wife, and belongs to her by right, and is her own, the husband cannot grant to another and make common; But the authority over the husband's body has already been transferred to the wife through marriage, etc.; Therefore. 4) From the custom of the primitive church. The Christian world from its first cradles had no polygamist, but Christians constantly observed the primeval monogamous law, which the Savior renewed.

(*) This argumentation, though in itself quite valid, is much illustrated by the contemplation of the excellent counsel with which God instituted matrimony. This was surely not only the propagation of men, but also their multiplication with the occupation of the whole earth, וַיִּרְבּוּ וַיִּמְלְאוּ אֶת-הָאָרֶץ, Genesis 1:18. But for multiplying the human race, more women, in human ingenuity, seem never to have been able to contribute more, indeed never to have been more necessary, than at that time when the paucity of men was greatest. Therefore, God certainly in the perfection of the origin of things would have created more women to be associated with one man, if polygamy, or rather polygyny (polyandry is utterly contrary to reason), which is called simultaneous, had ever been agreeable to His holy decree. Therefore, the supreme wisdom of God indicated that the union of one husband with one wife was sufficient for this purpose, both for propagation and for multiplication, indeed that it would be more fitting; but that for preserving the bond of love and society, which befits spouses, polygyny would be more of a hindrance than a help.

Proof c. Marriage is a means of generating offspring, Genesis 1:28, and a remedy for extinguishing lust, 1 Corinthians 7:9. We argue: Those who are naturally unfit for procreating children and for extinguishing the flames of passion for the other contracting party, they are also naturally unfit for matrimony; But the impubescent, eunuchs, the impotent, the frigid, etc., are naturally unfit, etc. Therefore.

Proof d. From Leviticus 18:7. "Any man shall not approach any of his close relatives to uncover nakedness; I (for I am) the LORD." (*) Here we are forbidden to join in marriage a person near in flesh, namely on account of the modesty and reverence founded in the nearness of flesh resulting from generation or nuptials. But which degrees of consanguinity or affinity are prohibited, we are taught in that passage.

The Antithesis is 1) of the Muhammedans and Chinese, whose polygamy is well-known. 2) Of the Anabaptists, some of whom were pleased with polygamy. 3) Of the Socinians, who dream that polygamy was indeed prohibited in the New, but not in the Old Testament. 4) Of Bernardino Ochino, the masked Sincerus de Warenberg, M. John Lyser, and others, who fervently contend that (*) Care must be taken to understand this general rule, according to which the special cases, although long and much controverted, are to be known and adjudicated with no trouble. שאר בשר man's flesh here, as elsewhere, denotes him who is to be considered as one flesh with him. But two or more people are said to be one flesh for a fourfold reason: 1) those from whose flesh a person has derived his origin, namely, Parents and Ancestors, 2) those who have originated from his flesh, children and descendants, 3) those with whom he has one and a common origin, these are brothers and sisters, Genesis 37:27. 4) those who have united in one flesh by the closest bond of marriage, Genesis 2:24. שאר בשר of your flesh, is he who is as one flesh with him who is one flesh with you. Examples clarify the matter, proposed individually in this chapter XVIII of Leviticus. Namely: 1. Your Parents and Ancestors are your flesh (no. 1.): Their spouses, v. 8, or their brothers and sisters, v. 12, 13, 14, are their flesh (no. 4 & 3): Therefore, they are the flesh of your flesh. 2. Children, begotten of you, are your flesh (no. 2.): Their spouses, v. 15, are their flesh (no. 4.): Therefore, they are the flesh of your flesh. 3. Your brothers and your sisters are your flesh (no. 3.): Your brother's wife, and your sister's husband, v. 16, and also the offspring of your brother or sister, are your brother's and your sister's flesh (no. 4 & 2.): Therefore, they are the flesh of your flesh. 4. Your wife or your husband is your flesh (no. 4.): Their offspring, born of another marriage, whether stepson or stepdaughter, v. 17, are their flesh (no. 1.): Therefore, they are the flesh of your flesh.

polygamy is lawful even in the New Testament. Their (*) main arguments are:

I. Whoever imitates the patriarchs and pious kings of the Old Testament, they do not sin; But polygamists, etc. Therefore. Response: The polygamy of the patriarchs was tolerated by God as a flaw and a sin of infirmity, arising both from ignorance of the genuine sense of the primeval divine institution, that only two and not more should be in one flesh, and from zeal to hasten the birth of the Messiah. Instance; If the polygamy of the patriarchs was a sin, the patriarchs died in mortal sin; since they are not said in Holy Scripture to have done penance for polygamy. Response: A distinction is made between a sin that is mortal in act, and a venial one. The polygamy of the patriarchs was a sin not mortal in act, but venial, which God did not impute for condemnation in the second act; because with eyes of mercy He looked upon their general repentance, heroic faith, and ardent desire for the Messiah.

II. About whatever matter God has sanctioned a law, that He approves; About polygamy, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the law is a mirror of the divine will. The minor is proven; because God sanctioned a law 1) concerning the hated and the beloved wife, and the children of both; which of them should enjoy the right of the firstborn, Deuteronomy 21:15. Response: I deny the major; because God makes a law not only concerning those things which He approves, but also concerning those which He permits and tolerates, like divorce, Matthew 19:7-8. See also Exodus 22:16. In that place, therefore, Deuteronomy 21:15, it deals with a human act, and indeed an illegitimate one, or one committed against the divine rule (which God tolerated for a time), not with divine right or the approving will of God. See Exodus 22:16. 2) God gave a law concerning raising up seed for a brother, when his widow is left without offspring, Deuteronomy 25. Response: God speaks of a widow; therefore of successive polygamy, not of simultaneous. A celibate brother seems to be understood. But if you should urge that a married brother is to be understood, we respond that God in this law had regard for the polygamy hitherto tolerated by Him, and directed it to some good end in a certain case, namely for the inheritance, or possession of the Jews, lest it be divided.

This, however, does not help the defenders of polygamy; for it is incumbent upon them first of all to prove that polygamy is not prohibited and is consonant with the first institution of matrimony.

III. By that through which man achieves the intention of God, namely the multiplication of the human race, that is not prohibited, but lawful; But by polygamy, etc. Therefore. Response: God does not intend the multiplication of the human race contrary to the primeval institution of marriage, to which polygamy is opposed.

IV. What God has proposed as a sin neither through law nor through inflicted penalties, that is not a sin; But polygamy, etc. Therefore. Response: The minor is denied. For when God promulgated the primeval institution of marriage, that a male and a female should be one flesh, by this very act He made a law that matrimony should not be contracted otherwise.

V. Whoever gave the wives of Saul into the bosom of David approved of polygamy; But God, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the wives who are given into our bosom are given to us in matrimony. The minor is clear from 2 Samuel 12:8. Response: To give into the bosom of another is taken either generally or specially. In a general sense, something is said to be given into the bosom of another which is committed to his power. Cf. 1 Kings 1:20; Psalm 35:13. Specially, it is given into the bosom what is handed over in matrimony. When the wives of Saul are said to have been given into the bosom of David, they are said to have been given not in the special sense, but in the general one. For he could not lawfully take them in matrimony, because Saul was David's father-in-law, and therefore the wives of Saul, among whom was Michal, the mother of David's spouse, could not be given to him in matrimony. Suppose matrimony is to be understood; it does not follow, however, that God approved that deed. For the word נתן often denotes only permission and tolerance. See Genesis 20:6; Numbers 21:23; Judges 11:9.

VI. Whatever is forbidden only to a Bishop is not prohibited to other men; Polygamy, etc. 1 Timothy 3:2. Therefore. Response: A bishop is said to be the husband of one wife, not in an exclusive sense, as if he alone ought to be monogamous, but in an inclusive sense (*).

Question IX. Is it lawful for ministers of the church to enter into matrimony?

Matrimony of ministers of the church. It is lawful for ministers of the church to enter into matrimony, and to live in it.

Obs. I. The question is not; whether all who are constituted in the ecclesiastical office ought to be married? For ministers of the church who, being endowed with the gift of continence, live holy and chaste lives in celibacy are not censured by us, since the celibate, not being greatly distracted by the cares of this age, can expeditiously perform the ecclesiastical office, 1 Corinthians 7:1.

Obs. II. The question is not; whether the celibate life is good and useful, especially in time of persecution? but; whether it is necessary?

Proof a. 1) The Apostles conceded matrimony to the Clerics, or ministers of the church. Therefore, it is not forbidden to them, nor can it be forbidden to them by ecclesiastical constitution. The antecedent is proven from 1 Timothy 3:2. "A bishop must be above reproach, the husband of one wife." Where by "wife" is not understood the church, whose spouse is not the minister, but Christ himself; but a wife, in her own house bearing children to be brought up honestly, v. 4. Cf. Titus 1:5-6. The reason for the consequence is; because it is not fitting for the church to make laws or to constitute anything against the doctrine of the apostles.

2. The Apostles thought it lawful for themselves to marry, some of whom lived in marriage. Therefore, it is wrongly forbidden to the ministers of the church. The antecedent is proven from 1 Corinthians 9:5. "Do we not have the right to take along a believing wife?" As do the other Apostles and the brothers of the Lord and Cephas.

3. Marriage is honorable in all, Hebrews 13:4. Therefore, it cannot be reprehended in Clerics, much less forbidden to them.

4. Those who do not possess the gift of continence are ordered by the Apostle to contract marriage; But many ministers of the church, etc. Therefore. The major is proven from 1 Corinthians 7:2. "(To avoid) fornications, let each man have his own wife." The minor is clear, Matthew 19:11. "Not everyone can receive this word, but only those to whom it is given."

The Antithesis is of the Papists, who deny that it is lawful for ministers of the church to take wives. They object;

1. Everyone who is by right ἐγκρατής, or continent, should abstain from the embraces of a wife. Every Bishop is by right ἐγκρατής, or continent, Titus 1:8. Therefore. Response: Εγκράτεια, or continence, denotes temperance in food, drink, and venereal matters, and it also belongs to men living in marriage. For there exists, besides virginal and celibate chastity, also conjugal chastity.

2. "No one serving as a soldier gets entangled in civilian affairs," 2 Timothy 2:4. Every Cleric serves as a soldier for God. Therefore. Response: 1) The cited passage speaks in general of a soldier, with whom every Christian fighting under the banner of Christ is compared. 2) A distinction is made between a moderate and an immoderate care for secular things. The Apostle does not prohibit a moderate care for secular things; otherwise, no Bishop could preside well over his own house, contrary to 1 Timothy 3:4, but he prohibits the immoderate and excessive solicitude, by which one ἐμπλέκεται, is entangled and immersed in the affairs of this life, so that he cannot raise his mind to the love of God and divine things. Such an immoderate care of this age is unbecoming for a soldier of Christ.

III. Those whose duty it is to pray always, it is their duty to abstain from marriage; But it is the duty of Clerics to pray always; Therefore. The major is proven from 1

(*) The explainers of this saying dissent and disagree much among themselves. Those who, like the blessed Author, interpret it of simultaneous polygyny, are most obstructed by this, that in chapter 5:9, Paul ordered Timothy to observe the same manner with respect to a widow woman; but indeed all well-mannered nations have abhorred simultaneous polyandry. Others understand it of successive polygamy, which opinion the Doctors of the Greek church embrace with all suffrages, but not with suitable proof, since they think it not worthy enough for a Bishop to think of repeated nuptials. To me, indeed, those seem to think most correctly who believe that Paul wished to prevent this, that anyone should be appointed Bishop who was separated from his wife by divorce. For although that was not unjust, yet the suspicion will hardly ever be removed, something always sticks.

Corinthians 7:5, where the Apostle advises that pious men, on account of prayers, should abstain from conjugal use. The minor is proven; because Clerics ought to pour out prayers for the church, for the magistrate, for the salvation of their hearers, 1 Timothy 2:2. Response; 1) It is the duty of all Christians to pray without ceasing, 1 Thessalonians 5:17. Therefore, if this argument concludes validly, it is the duty of all Christians to abstain from marriage. 2) A distinction is made between common or daily prayers, and solemn or public prayers. The Apostle in that passage advises abstaining from conjugal use at the time of solemn prayers, which are offered on account of a public calamity or some most grave danger. This counsel (for it is not a precept) is given to all, not only to the ministers of the church. The reason for the advice is not the pollution of prayers by conjugal use, but greater quiet and freedom from temporal things, so that the whole mind may be turned to God and implore his help to alleviate the public necessity.

IV. Whatever is not good, from that Clerics should abstain; To touch a woman is not good, 1 Corinthians 7:1. Therefore. Response; A distinction is made between a moral good and a useful good (*). When Paul in that passage says: "It is good for a man not to touch a woman," he means a useful good in a state of persecution, which he who has no wife or children can more easily endure; he does not, however, mean a moral good, to which sin is opposed.

V. Those ministers of the church are praised by Christ who have castrated themselves for the sake of the kingdom of heaven; Married ministers of the church have not castrated themselves for the sake of the kingdom of heaven; Therefore. The major is clear from Matthew 19:12. Response; 1) Not only celibacy is praised by Christ, but also marriage, as a state ordained by God, vv. 5-6. Wherefore, both the celibate and the married are pleasing to God. 2) Those have castrated themselves for the sake of the kingdom of God who, being endowed with a special gift of continence, with a free and firm purpose, abstain from marriage, so that they may more expeditiously be able to devote themselves to the church, which is the kingdom of God, to be propagated. But from this, a general rule is not to be established, according to which all Clerics are to be barred from marriage, since not all are continent, and it is better to marry than to burn.

VI. Ecclesiastical duties are impeded by marriage; For marriage impedes a) the ardor of prayer, because it depresses the soul to earthly things; b) the efficacy of preaching; for how will he effectively exhort widows and virgins, who is perpetually occupied with children? c) the care of the poor; because the married provide only for their own children; d) the dispensation of the Sacraments; because between laypeople and married Clerics there is no distinction. Response; a) The impediments that are alleged are fictitious. For the Priests of the Old Testament were also married, and yet they poured out prayers, took care of the poor, and dispensed the sacraments. b) The distinction between laity and Clerics consists not in marriage and celibacy, but in a different office.

Question X. What is consanguinity, the closer degrees of which impede marriage?

Consanguinity. Consanguinity is the bond of persons descending from the same stock, contracted by carnal propagation, of which there are distinct lines and diverse degrees.

Question XI. What is a line? What is a degree?

Line. A line is a series of persons descending from one another, containing degrees and distinguishing numbers; It is divided into a direct line and a collateral or transverse line. The direct line is between persons, one of whom descends from the other, and it is called now ascending, now descending. In the ascending, progress is made from the begotten to the begetters, in the descending from the begetters to the begotten. The collateral is between persons placed on the side, who, not being generated from one another, yet concur in one stock; It is divided into equal, which is between persons equally distant from the common stock, and unequal, which is between related persons, one of whom is nearer, the other more remote from the common stock. Degree is the distance of one person from another, made by generation.

(*) Every good cannot but be useful, nor can any moral good exist without use or fruit. But one utility is greater, another less, according to the variety of surrounding circumstances, and especially of times.

Question XII. By what method are degrees numbered?

Computation of degrees. The method of numbering degrees is either according to civil law or according to canon law. The single and perpetual rule of civil law is: As many as there are generations, so many are the degrees a). But of canon law there are three rules. The first rule for the direct line is this: As many as there are persons (in the series of generation), so many are the degrees, one being subtracted b). The second rule for the equal collateral line is this: By as many degrees as the persons are distant from the common stock, by so many degrees they are distant from each other c). The third rule for the unequal collateral line is this: In an unequal transverse line, the persons are distant from each other by as many degrees as that one is distant who is more remote from the stock d).

Proof a. According to civil law, the method of computation in the direct line is brief and accurate, in which it agrees with canon law; but in the collateral line, the computation of canon law is more accurate, because civil law in the transverse line places the second degree without a first. The well-known verses are worthy of being noted here:

"Through the direct line both laws agree,
/ But through the transverse the legal laws surpass."

This is illustrated by an example:

Terah;
Abraham, Nahor.
Isaac, Bethuel.
Jacob, Rebecca.

According to civil law, Rebecca is distant from Terah by the third degree, but Jacob and Rebecca are distant by the sixth degree.

Proof b. According to canon law, in the direct line, the degrees are numbered according to the persons considered not simply, but with respect to generation. For assuming a stock, as many persons are added to it by generation, so many are the degrees. The rule of civil law means the same; as many as there are generations, so many are the degrees. You say: It is like a monster that in the canonical computation the common stock is subtracted, without which the generations cannot be. Response: In the numbering of degrees, the common stock is subtracted, because a degree is the distance of one person from another. But the second person first begins to be distant, and therefore also makes the first degree. Wherefore, between the first two persons, there is the first and only one degree.

Proof c. According to canon law, Jacob and Rebecca differ by the third degree, because in the numbering of degrees, the persons are not to be considered among themselves and by themselves (as is done in the civil computation), but in order to the common stock, in which the kinship is founded.

Proof d. According to the canonical computation, Rebecca and Abraham are distant by the third degree in the unequal collateral line. The reason is: because it cannot happen that any person is closer to his kinsman than to his stock; which would happen, however, unless the denomination were made from the more remote one.

Question XIII. What is affinity and what are its kinds and degrees?

Affinity. Affinity is the connection of different kinships arising from nuptials, by which the blood relatives of the husband become the affines of the wife, and the blood relatives of the wife become the affines of the husband. The kinds of affinity are three: Affinity of the first kind is that which is contracted through one person joined by carnal union; of the second kind, that which is through two persons, by as many nuptials; of the third kind, that which is contracted through three persons and as many nuptials a). The degrees in affinity, in themselves and properly, are none b); but only quasi-degrees, about which there is a rule; In whatever degree of kinship the blood relatives are joined to the husband, in that degree they are joined to his wife, and vice versa c).

Proof a. My brother-in-law, i.e., my sister's husband, is my affine in the first kind. But if my brother-in-law, after my sister's death, marries another wife, she becomes my affine in the second kind. And if the second wife of my brother-in-law, upon the death of this husband (who had joined my sister to himself in first nuptials), marries another, he will become my affine in the third kind.

Proof b. One of the affines does not descend from the other; Therefore, in affinity, properly speaking, there are no degrees.

Proof c. Husband and wife become one flesh through nuptials; Therefore, those who are the husband's blood relatives also become the wife's quasi-blood relatives, i.e., affines; and those who are the wife's blood relatives also become the husband's affines, or quasi-blood relatives. Wherefore, the computation of degrees in the tree of affinity is no different from that of consanguinity. He who is joined to the husband in the first degree of consanguinity is the wife's affine in the first degree of affinity, and vice versa.

Question XIV. Which degrees of consanguinity are prohibited and impede nuptials?

Prohibited degrees of consanguinity. Among blood relatives in the direct line, marriages are prohibited to infinity by divine and natural law a). In the equal collateral line, both by divine and natural law, marriages are prohibited in the first degree b). By positive ecclesiastical law, they are also prohibited in the second degree c). In the unequal collateral line, marriages are prohibited in the second degree by divine and natural law d). But by ecclesiastical law, they are also prohibited in the third degree; and even in the fourth degree, if one person is distant from the common stock by only one degree e).

Proof a. In the direct line, blood relatives are related as parents and children, although not all are parents from whom children immediately descend. But that marriage cannot exist between parents and children is taught both by divine law, Leviticus 18:7, and by natural law, which dictates that children owe filial reverence to parents, which expires between children and parents if marriage is contracted between them. Indeed, the very instinct of nature also abhors such a union. Whence among all gentiles such nuptials were always held as illicit. From which we infer that Adam, if he were recalled to this life, could not marry any female from his posterity.

Proof b. That marriage between brothers and sisters is prohibited by divine law is clear from Leviticus 18:9. This same degree is also prohibited by natural law. For children are something of their parents and part of their flesh, and therefore just as they are one flesh with their parents adequately, so they are one flesh among themselves, though not immediately, but mediately. Hence, nations, by the guidance of the light of nature, have abstained from such a union.

Proof c. Marriage between cousins is not prohibited by divine law; because between them, the unity of flesh in one begetter is not found, except remotely. However, the church prohibits this degree, so that men may be more restrained from marriages prohibited by divine and natural law.

Proof d. The second degree of consanguinity is prohibited by divine law, Leviticus 18:12, chapter 20:19, and by natural law; because such persons are flesh with the common stock, although inadequately. That prohibition, moreover, is valid not only with respect to the persons expressly named, but also others equally distant.

Proof e. When one of the persons to be joined is immediately under the stock, paternal respect impedes the marriage. For that person, just as he is one flesh with a brother or sister on account of one parent, so he is in the place of a father or mother to the descendants of a brother or sister.

Question XV. Which degrees of affinity are prohibited and impede nuptials?

Prohibited degrees of affinity. In whatever degree of consanguinity nuptials are prohibited, in that same degree of affinity they are considered prohibited. Therefore, they are prohibited in the direct line of affinity simply and to infinity, a) in the equal collateral line, affines in the first degree are barred from nuptials. b) In the unequal collateral line, marriages of affines in the second degree are prohibited.

Proof a. God through Moses in Leviticus 18:18 seriously prohibited marriage with a stepmother, v. 15, with a daughter-in-law, v. 17, with a stepdaughter. In the remaining degrees of the direct line, the same interdiction is valid, on account of the respect of parenthood.

Proof b. In Leviticus 18:16, marriage with a deceased brother's widow is prohibited. Therefore, also marriage with a deceased sister's husband is interdicted, due to the identity of the foundation, lest anyone approach any person near in flesh.

The Antithesis is of the Papists, who deny that the degrees of consanguinity are prohibited by natural law. Their chief argument is: Natural law is indispensable; The law concerning the degrees of consanguinity impeding marriage is not indispensable; Therefore, it is not a natural law. The minor is proven; because God in the beginning of the world gave a dispensation concerning the marriage of the sons and daughters of Adam, who were brothers and sisters. Response: 1) Just as not only Adam, but also his sons had received the divine command concerning the multiplication of the human race; so, to obey this command, they could not marry other women than their own sisters, on account of the extreme case of necessity, which ceasing, the divine dispensation or permission also ceased. 2) The degrees of consanguinity are unequal, and unequally against the law of nature. As many as are in the ascending and descending line, they pertain most closely to the law of nature, but the rest remotely. 3) The law of nature is indispensable with respect to the first principles and the conclusions closer to the first principles; but in the more remote conclusions, on account of certain circumstances, there is no doubt that God can dispense (*).

Question XVI. In what does the formal nature of marriage consist?

The form or formal nature of marriage consists in the conjugal bond, which is the mutual obligation of husband and wife to fidelity and conjugal duties (*).

Prob. The form of a thing is that which, when posited, the thing itself is posited, and when removed, the thing itself is removed: Now, when the mutual obligation of husband and wife to fidelity and conjugal duties is posited, marriage is posited, and when it is removed, marriage is removed: Therefore, that mutual obligation is the form of marriage.

You say: 1) Consent makes the marriage: Therefore, consent is its form. Resp. When the form ceases, the thing whose form it is ceases: But when consent ceases, marriage does not cease. For it often happens that spouses no longer consent to mutual cohabitation and wish to be separated, and yet the marriage is not dissolved. Therefore, consent pertains to the efficient cause of matrimony, whose causality it is.

You say: 2) Carnal copulation consummates the marriage: Therefore, it is its form. Resp. Carnal copulation is a consequent of matrimony. The conjugal bond, however, is the form, since it endures even when carnal copulation ceases.

Question XVII. Is the conjugal bond indissoluble?

The conjugal bond of a husband and wife, as long as they are living a), is in itself indissoluble, both on account of mutual consent b), and especially on account of divine institution c). Accidentally, however, and on account of a supervening fault, a divorce sometimes occurs, which is the separation of living spouses, proceeding from the dissolution of a legitimate and valid marriage, with respect to the conjugal bond. The just causes for divorce are adultery d) and malicious desertion e).

Obs. I. Divorce (divortium) is named from diverting (divertendo), because through divorce the spouses divert, that is, they go in different directions.

Obs. II. A distinction must be made between repudiation (repudium) and divorce (divortium). Repudiation is a general name, (*) Natural laws command those actions which are necessary for the preservation of human nature and society, and for the attainment of ends, and forbid the contrary. In these, therefore, God never left mankind without law. Those things, however, which pertain to fuller wisdom, to the highest dignity of man, to the well-constituted order of human society, are established and determined by revealed laws (which they commonly call positive laws). But those things which are moral and common, or universal, by which all men are always bound, and of which the knowledge is clear, come down from Noah, and by ancient and continuous tradition have been passed on to all nations. As to this same law, a certain unique reason can be given why, on account of his legislative power, the Legislator alone is said to have the right to dispense with it, so that, besides him, no one else may claim that right or make use of it.

(*) In an incredible and utterly unheard-of manner, the Illustrious Count ZINZENDORF and his followers present this, as if it were a most salutary and momentous dogma: That Christ should properly be called the husband of the wife, who begets offspring, and the male partner merely performs the role of a procurator. With this most pernicious and detestable error, several others are artfully connected, which have been abundantly refuted by the most eminent and deservedly distinguished Theologians, of whom it will be sufficient to have mentioned one. To wit, for this very reason they say that Christ is God the Father; but the first person of the Holy Trinity is to be regarded as a Grandfather, or, if you prefer, a Father-in-law. Thus they have most openly departed from the three ecumenical creeds; so much so that they cannot be said to be truly devoted to the Augsburg Confession, in which those foundations are laid beforehand.

and denotes the dismissal of both a betrothed and a wife; but divorce is a special name, and signifies only the dismissal of a wife.

Obs. III. God has never released anyone from a law. But those things which pertain to greater utility, to the notable excellence of men, to the well-established order of the whole of human society, are determined by revealed laws (which they commonly call positive), but also by moral and common, or universal ones, by which all men are always obligated, and the knowledge of which, from the age of Noah, has been passed down by ancient and continuous tradition to all nations. As to laws of this kind, there can be a certain singular reason for which the Legislator may use his power of dispensing, as it is said, for which no other reason is to be adduced.

Obs. III. A distinction is made between divorce properly and improperly so called. Divorce, properly speaking, is the separation of living spouses, proceeding from the dissolution of a legitimate and valid marriage with respect to the conjugal bond. For which reason a) TERTULLIAN improperly calls death the divorce of the soul and body. Death causes the dissolution of matrimony, but not a divorce. b) The separation of spouses with respect to bed and board, on account of more serious enmities, is improperly called divorce, since it is only a suspension of the acts of cohabitation and conjugal duty, with the conjugal bond remaining intact, so that neither spouse can enter another marriage. c) The separation of persons whose nuptials are prohibited on account of close degrees of consanguinity, or where an error of person or the impotence of one of the spouses has occurred, is not properly a divorce, but only a declaration of nullity, because the marriage was not rightly contracted, nor was it ratified, valid, and legitimate.

Obs. IV. A distinction is made between active and passive divorce. The former is when the injured and innocent person initiates the divorce, or voluntarily departs in separation from the living spouse. The latter is when the injured and innocent person suffers the divorce unwillingly, and is deserted by the spouse with whom they wished to cohabit longer. The sole cause of active divorce is adultery; the cause of passive divorce is malicious desertion.

Prob. a. That the conjugal bond is dissolved by death is established from Romans VII, 2, 3. The law has dominion over a man for as long as he lives; for the woman who is under a husband is bound by law to her living husband; but if her husband dies, she is released from the law of her husband. Therefore, while her husband lives, she is called an adulteress if she becomes the wife of another man; but if her husband is dead, she is free from the law, so that she is not an adulteress, even if she has become (the wife) of another man. From this apostolic statement we learn that successive polygamy, by which one proceeds to a second marriage, is licit.

Prob. b. The marriage was contracted through mutual consent concerning a fellowship of life to be continued perpetually and throughout all of life; which contract is to be kept holy and inviolate for the procreation of offspring and for mutual aid in life.

Prob. c. Matrimony is indissoluble, not only on account of the mutual consent of the spouses; for if it had been contracted by consent alone, it could be dissolved by the mutual dissent of both; but chiefly on account of the authority and institution of God, who said: "A man shall leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be one flesh", Gen. II, 24. "Therefore what God has joined together, let no man separate", Matth. XIX, 6.

Prob. d. 1) From the sentence of Christ, which is found in Matthew V, 32. "Whoever divorces his wife for any reason except sexual immorality makes her commit adultery, and whoever marries a divorced woman commits adultery." And Matthew XIX, 9. "Whoever divorces his wife, except for fornication, and marries another, commits adultery; and whoever marries her who is divorced commits adultery." Where, by the force of the exceptive proposition, two things are said: 1) He who repudiates a non-adulterous wife and marries another, commits adultery. 2) He who repudiates an adulterous wife and marries another, does not commit adultery. Therefore, according to the sentence of Christ, the bond of matrimony between the living is dissolved by adultery, so that the injured party may justly repudiate the injuring party. 2) By the nature of marriage, adultery in itself and directly opposes the unity of the flesh, and therefore also the substance of marriage, through which two become one flesh (not many into many fleshes): Gen. II, 24. For he who cleaves to a prostitute, also becomes one flesh with the prostitute. 1 Cor. VI, 16, and therefore is no longer one flesh with the spouse. Where, however, a distinction must be made between a just cause for divorce and a necessary or obligatory one. For why could not the injured party, by the example of the Deity, be reconciled to the injuring party, and this one be received back into the bosom of grace? says DANNHAVER, in theol. conscient. p. 808.

Prob. e. That malicious desertion frees the innocent party from the bond is proven 1) from the testimony of the Apostle, 1 Cor. VII, 15. "But if the unbeliever separates, let him separate. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases", so that it is not lawful for him to marry another, or for her to be married to another; but, he or she is free from the bond and the obligation to conjugal fellowship with the deserter. 2) From the nature of divorce. Whatever immediately injures conjugal fidelity itself and the use of the marriage bed, dissolves the conjugal bond, and therefore by right itself opens the doors to a second marriage for the innocent party; But malicious and incorrigible desertion does so, Therefore... 3) From absurdity. Unless the power of a new marriage is granted to the deserted person, he will be deprived of his right without any fault of his own, and will be exposed to perpetual burnings, to the danger of fornication and pollution, which is repugnant to equity and divine law. For "to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife", 1 Cor. VII, 2.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who state: 1) That a true and properly called divorce has no place among the faithful of the new testament; 2) That there are many causes for an improperly called divorce, or separation as to bed and board.

Their main arguments are: I. Whatever is the indissoluble union of one male and one female, its bond cannot be divided; But marriage is etc. Therefore.

Resp. Marriage is a union, in itself indissoluble by the force of divine institution, but it is accidentally dissoluble, through adultery and malicious desertion.

Instance I. Adultery alone is a cause for divorce, as Christ teaches, Matth. XIX, 9. Resp. Adultery alone is the cause of active divorce; malicious desertion is the cause of passive divorce.

Instance II. Persistent denial of the conjugal debt is also a cause for divorce. Therefore, there are more causes than adultery and malicious desertion. Resp. Persistent denial of the conjugal debt is equivalent to malicious desertion; because the spouse immediately injures conjugal fidelity and the use of the marriage bed and exposes the injured person to the danger of fornication.

II. Whatever marriage is rightly contracted and consummated, cannot be dissolved without the mark of adultery; But the marriage of the faithful etc. Therefore.

The minor premise is proven from Mark X, 11. "Whoever divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery." Resp. The words of Christ are not to be understood absolutely, but restrictively; because the restriction or limitation is most openly expressed in Matth. XIX, 9. "Whoever divorces his wife, who has not broken the bond of marriage by fornication, commits adultery."

Question XVIII. What is the purpose of marriage?

The ultimate purpose of marriage is the glory of God a). The intermediate purpose is either proper or accessory. The proper purpose, which began immediately with marriage itself, is both the procreation of offspring, from which arises the propagation of the family, and the preservation of the church and the state b), and also mutual aid in life c). The accessory purpose is a remedy against wandering lusts d).

Prob. a. Just as the ultimate purpose of all God's ordinances is the glory of God, so too is it for the ordinance of marriage. To this pertains the general admonition of the Apostle, 1 Cor. X, 31. "Do all things to the glory of God."

Prob. b. That the proper purpose of matrimony is the procreation of offspring, the author of marriage himself indicates, Gen. I, 28. "Be fruitful and multiply." By reason of this purpose, marriage is the seminary of the church and the state.

Prob. c. That a mutual aid in life is also a purpose of marriage is clear from Gen. II, 18. "It is not good for man to be alone; Let us make him a helper."

Prob. d. A remedy against wandering lusts is an accessory purpose, which was added to marriage only by accident, namely in the state after the fall, about which the Apostle says, 1 Cor. VIII, 2. "Because of fornications (to be avoided) let every man have his own wife; and let every woman have her own husband."

Question XIX. What are the duties of spouses?

The common duties of spouses are; to join their souls, bodies, and resources a). The duties of the husband are; to love his wife b), to govern her c), to support her d), and to protect her e). The proper duties of the wife are; to revere her husband, to obey him, and to do him good f).

Prob. a. By divine ordinance, there exists between spouses a communion of souls, bodies, and resources, about which see 1 Cor. VII, 3. Eph. V, 28. ff.

Prob. b. Wives are one flesh with their husbands, and therefore are to be sincerely loved. Eph. V, 28.

Prob. c. Because the husband is the head of the wife, he should govern her in spiritual and temporal matters. Eph. V, 23.

Prob. d. The husband should nourish and cherish his wife as his own flesh, Eph. V, 29.

Prob. e. The woman is the weaker vessel both in body and in spirit, 1 Petr. III, 7, and therefore relies on the protection of her husband.

Prob. f. See the duties of wives described in Eph. V, 22, 1 Petr. III, 1.

Question XX. What is the paternal society?

The paternal society is the natural union of parents with children, divinely instituted for the education of offspring and the welfare of the whole family.

Question XXI. What are the duties of parents and children?

The duties of parents consist in the provision of food and clothing a), and in an honorable education b). The duties of children consist in love, honor, and obedience c).

Prob. a. It is the duty of parents to take care of their children, 1 Tim. V, 8, and to give them good gifts. Matth. VII, 11.

Prob. b. Children are to be brought up in the discipline and instruction of the Lord, Eph. VI, 4.

Prob. c. The duties of children are known from the Fourth Commandment of the Decalogue.

Question XXII. What is the master-servant society?

The master-servant society is the legitimate union of masters and servants, divinely instituted for mutual benefit.

Question XXIII. What are the duties of masters and servants?

It is the duty of masters to rule their servants, to supply them with necessary sustenance, and to pay the promised wage: It is the duty of servants to honor their masters, to obey them, and to serve faithfully.

Prob. The duties of masters and servants are graphically described by Paul, Col. III, 22. ff. c. IV, 1. Conf. Eph, VI, 5.

SUSPIRIUM.

To GOD the unbegotten FATHER, to GOD the only-begotten SON, to GOD the HOLY SPIRIT proceeding from both, be praise and eternal glory for our wellbeing, for the strength of our bodies, for the gifts of our minds, for the happy success of our labors!
