I argue I. from the nature of man and his properties. Man consists of two parts, soul and body. The soul is the nobler part of human nature. The soul is an immortal spirit, of which we have the clearest proofs 1) from thought, free will, and preparation for future events, 2) from the desire for perpetual and never-ending happiness, with which men burn by a certain natural instinct. But that which all feel, by which all are incited, and which bids them aspire not to evil, but to good, and to the perfection of their state—that, I say, is to be attributed not to custom, nor to choice, but to the common nature of all, not to natural corruption, but to natural constitution. The whole corruption of nature arose from the fact that the soul turned away from the highest good, and inclined itself to goods that were both false and specious, and not suitable nor sufficient for it. The soul, since it is an immortal spirit, finds no good suitable for it and sufficient to satisfy it, other than one that is spiritual and perpetual. But such is now the perversity of the depraved soul that, although it is desirous of perpetual happiness, it nevertheless seeks and pursues no good but that which is earthly, perishable, and about to perish suddenly, from which there cannot but arise a forever insatiable desire. What is no less worthy of observation: the soul of man is equipped with the faculty of being able to anticipate future things by thought. This faculty remains constant and always exerts its force, even when it must depart from the body. Now let us assume this principle: Everything that is, certainly is for some certain end, and no other than one suitable to itself and its nature. Let us proceed by concluding from the lesser to the greater: If not even the smallest thing is destined for no end, it is utterly unbelievable that the soul, the most noble of all things, or anything in the soul, least of all that which is its proper and principal feature, namely, providence and thought about the future, artfully joined with the highest desire for perpetual life and perfect blessedness, has no end proposed to itself. But that end can be no other than the attainment of that to which this thought and desire are uniquely directed. Therefore, there is to be a future state of the soul, perfectly blessed, to be expected after the final fates. To illustrate this more, let us ask in general: For what purpose was the faculty of foreseeing and thinking about the future given to man? Surely, so that he might consult his own well-being, and, through this foresight, arrive at obtaining the future security of his life, whether for the attainment of a future thing, if it is known to be good, or for its avoidance, if it is judged to be evil. Since this is generally most true, and placed beyond all doubt, what then specifically is to be held as the end, for which that power of the mind, of foreseeing and desiring the future, does not cease to be, but still remains, indeed is more confirmed, at that last moment when one must depart from this life? Surely this, that the dying person, having overcome mortality, may attain sempiternal life.

I argue II. from the excellence of man, by which he alone stands out among all animals. The very first principle of all is: What is self-repugnant, cannot happen at all, and two things, of which one is openly repugnant to the other, cannot both be true. But there would be a manifest repugnance in these things: that man is superior to all brute animals; yet that in that very part, by which he alone is far superior to all, he is of a far worse condition. I do not reason thus: If man is more excellent than other animals, therefore he is not worse. This consequence would not be valid. Why could not both be true, for a different reason, in one way and another? No one is unaware of what most learned men, both ancient and more recent, have disputed about this: in what do brute animals excel men. But indeed, this is the argumentation on which I rely: If man in that very part, and for the same reason, by which he himself is superior to all animals to a one, is to be considered altogether inferior to all, it follows that two things, openly conflicting with each other, must be affirmed. The consequent is absurd; therefore, the antecedent is absurd too. I will complete the argumentation: If there is no salvation for man, no perfection of his state to be expected after death, it follows that man, in the same part and for the same reason by which he alone is more excellent than all brute animals, is far inferior to them all. The latter is false and absurd; Therefore, the former is too. But the excellence and prerogative of man, and indeed the principal one, is undoubtedly reason. Here two things offer themselves for our consideration: The use of reason, and its cultivation.

1) The more rightly a man exercises the use of reason, the more thought and care he applies to whatever things he encounters, to whatever business is to be undertaken. But by so much the more is his occupation cumulatively increased, by so much the more and graver difficulties of labors does he experience, by so much the greater becomes the solicitude for finding means and overcoming impediments, by so much the more dangers, not always to be avoided, does man see, and burdens of evils to be borne, by so much the more are desires and wishes kindled—most just ones, indeed, but for the most part in vain and destined to be without the hoped-for outcome; and yet nowhere in this mortality can he arrive where he ought most of all to strive, namely, at the consummate tranquility of the soul. He must always think: further beyond. He must always apply himself to this, always labor in this, that his condition may take increments day by day: Therefore, he never attains the highest end, always proposed to himself. I will explain a little more distinctly what has been said so generally. The use of reason is seen to be principally threefold: The recollection of things past; The contemplation and consideration of things present, as regards the individual surrounding things to be investigated by judgment; The foresight of things future. As to the first: Recollection is either of pleasant things, or of sad things. In both ways, the perturbations and movements of the soul are renewed, according to this moral axiom: when ideas return, connected with some affection, the same affection returns. If the image of pleasant times enters the mind, pleasure and desire are excited anew, which can never be satisfied. But if of sad times, the wounds of the soul, over which a scar had scarcely formed, reopen. I will speak of the second: The contemplation of those things which are now happening wisely ponders all surrounding things. To what end is that, I ask? To collect the goods of fortune? What will those profit us, unless we use them well, as means to be applied to a nobler end? Nor is it to be denied that a huge heap of faculties and honors brings with it very many and very great disadvantages, it does not lighten, but increases the gravest adversities with which this wearisome life is pressed—care, labor, envy, plots, dangers, fear, loss, and finally the difficulty of rendering an account. It stimulates desire more than it satisfies it, for its thirst is never quenched; the more waters are possessed, the more they are thirsted for. Finally, the greater the joy a man perceives while alive from the abundance of all things, the more bitter pains he will feel when dying, when he will labor with the lack of all things. Nothing is so miserable as to be miserable after having been blessed. To what end, therefore? To live well and blessedly? Rightly indeed, nay, most rightly. But in what way? Why do we devote our efforts to virtue? For what purpose do we strain every nerve in carrying out things successfully? Do we not labor for this reason, that we may

Proof f. Although the light of nature teaches that God is the highest and eternal good, the ultimate end, to the attainment of which the immortal soul ought to aspire, and that there is another life after this one, yet it does not clearly demonstrate in what the formal reason of eternal blessedness consists; for since the vision of God is a supernatural act, it transcends the sphere of natural light. Whence Paul says, in I Corinthians II, 9: "Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God has prepared for them that love him."

You say: I. Eternal blessedness is naturally desirable; Therefore, it is naturally knowable. The antecedent is clear, because all men naturally want to be blessed. The consequence is evident; because natural appetite presupposes natural knowledge. There is no desire for the unknown. I respond. Eternal and supreme blessedness is not naturally desirable with an efficacious appetite, since it transcends the capacity of man left to himself; although we do not deny that men naturally desire, with an inefficacious appetite, under the condition of possibility, a certain perennial blessedness;

but whether that consists in the clear vision of God, the natural man is ignorant.

You say: II. It is established by the light of nature that our blessedness consists in a most perfect operation. But the most perfect operation of our intellect is the vision of God. Therefore, it is established by the light of nature that our blessedness consists in the vision of God. I respond. Although it is established by the light of nature that our blessedness consists in a most perfect operation, it does not become known from the same that the vision of God is possible. Indeed, reason left to itself will rather judge that our blessedness consists in the abstractive knowledge and contemplation of the first being.

Question III. In what does our eternal blessedness formally consist?

The form of eternal blessedness. Our eternal and supreme blessedness consists in the perfect vision and fruition of God. The former is an operation of the intellect; the latter of the will; by the former we possess the highest good, God; by the latter we fully enjoy and rest in the same. The vision of God.

Observation. We take "fruition" here in a stricter sense with AUGUSTINE, who in Book obtain the rewards proposed for virtues? It is so, indeed. But where are they? What and how great are they? How rare and tenuous is the remuneration for the greatest virtue wont to be, among men, of whom scarcely a very few are most equitable estimators and judges of merits! With good men it generally goes ill in this age, with wicked men, well. What I mentioned as the third: It is the part of a wise man to foresee what is to be. From this, fear and hope are born. Fear is the dread of approaching evil, anxiety about a future thing, and often an empty opinion of impending danger. Hope is indeed a pleasant expectation of a future good, but it is for the most part uncertain, fallacious, and joined with a dread of the opposite. From this it is understood how truly SIRACH, ch. XL, 2, numbered the hope of mortals among the various parts of calamity to be sustained through this life.

2) The more study learned men, who are wise beyond the common crowd, have applied to the cultivation of the intellect, the more each of them perceives the vanity of the age, and in a certain way, the vanity of all sciences, at least as far as we perceive their fruit only in this mortality, and especially the perversity of men, with whom it befits him to converse prudently, and indeed both the manifold defect of his own state, and its mutability and inconstancy. Young people alike, and men from the lowest populace, feel much smaller hardships and sorrows than learned and wise men, who are most cultivated in disciplines, studies, and doctrine. The more a man has experienced, so that he has left almost nothing untried, and the more keenly he has acquired judgment, the more certainly will he understand the calamitous condition of the world, and the more will a weariness of so vexatious a life seize him. He who knows well and holily holds the sentence of the divine book of Ecclesiastes will not feel that that book was written with the purpose that this very argument should be brought to light. But the reason why we can receive from the light of reason not a certain knowledge of a better life, but only a probable notion, is this: that 1) the truths known from nature have been greatly obscured by the corruption of the soul, innate in us, 2) not nature, but scripture alone can teach us the true reason of eternal blessedness, the origin of evil and of the common defection of men from God, and especially the reconciliation of man with God, and the way to recover the lost salvation.

X of De Trinitate, ch. 10, writes: "We enjoy things known, in which the will, delighted in them for their own sakes, rests." Hence we indeed use the world, but we enjoy God.

Question IV. What is the beatific vision of God?

The beatific vision of God is an act of the intellect, illumined by the light of glory, by which it knows God clearly and immediately, as He is in Himself.

Observation I. The intuitive knowledge of God is called the beatific vision; "vision" indeed in a metaphorical expression, because we will know God as distinctly and clearly as we know a thing which we see with our eyes; "beatific" however, because it is the formal reason by which we are constituted blessed.

Observation II. Knowledge of a thing is twofold: one is abstractive, the other intuitive. Abstractive is that by which a thing is known mediately, in another, through the species of another thing, e.g., when you know the emperor from a portrait or from the report of others, or fire from smoke; intuitive is when you know an object immediately and through itself, e.g., when you behold a man in person, and know him from his own face. Therefore, abstractive knowledge of God is when we know Him from reflection on creatures under the light of nature, or from reflection on the revealed word under the light of grace. Intuitive knowledge of God is when we know Him through His own essence, as He is in Himself, without the intervention of another object, under the light of glory; and this is reserved for the other life, and is far more perfect than the abstractive. I Corinthians XIII, 12. 1 John III, 2.

Observation III. Although the intuitive knowledge of God is perfect, it is not, however, comprehensive, taking the term strictly, for an adequate knowledge of the thing, in which way God alone is the comprehender of Himself. The blessed will know the whole essence of God, but not totally, and in an infinite manner, but in a manner suitable to their finite nature. The blessed are indeed commonly called comprehenders, not because they know God adequately—for this cannot happen due to the infinity of the divine essence and the narrowness of human minds, since there is no proportion of the finite to the infinite—but they are called comprehenders of the divine essence for this reason, that none of those things which are formally in God is hidden from them, but they know all those things in the highest degree of perfection, as far as the finite intellect, elevated by the light of glory, is capable.

Observation IV. Three things are required for the beatific vision of God: 1) The intellect, as the principle and cause of intellection, with God as the first cause concurring. 2) The light of glory, which is a celestial and supernatural gift, which will show the divine essence intimately present, will most perfectly illuminate and corroborate the intellect of the blessed, and will elevate it to see God clearly. This light of glory is proven (a) from Psalm XXXVI, 9: "In your light we see light." From which words we argue: Whoever are to see in the light of God that objective light itself, God, they will be instructed with the light of glory illuminating and elevating the intellect. But the blessed in the other life, etc. Therefore. You say: The royal psalmist's sermon is about the light of grace, not about the light of glory; namely, in the light of grace we shall see the light, that is, God. I respond: In verse 9, the sacred psalmist enumerates the positive spiritual benefits, whose beginning is given in this life, and whose completion in the future life. In verse 10, he describes the source of these benefits, and rises by a certain gradation to the ultimate of spiritual benefits, which is the vision of the eternal light in the eternal light. (b) Just as in this life no knowledge of God can be had, except by the benefit of the light of nature, or the light of grace; so in the other life there can be no clear and immediate knowledge of God, except by the benefit of the light of glory. (3) The essence of God is required as the object, to which the beatific vision tends, and in which it will terminate.

Observation V. The object of intuitive knowledge is God, and all things that are in Him actually and formally, such as His essence, attributes, divine persons, and their properties. But those things which are in God only eminently or virtually are not known by the force of intuitive knowledge, because they are not in God actually and with respect to their entity. Hence the blessed, by the force of the beatific vision, will not know all creatures, or things done in this life after their departure. For neither these nor those are in God formally, but only virtually and eminently. They will indeed know the will of God, insofar as it is identified with His essence, quite clearly, but since it freely determines itself to creatures, decreeing this or that, they do not see or know those free decrees in God. Hence it is that the angels, although blessed from the clear vision of God, are ignorant of the day of the final judgment, freely determined by God. Matthew XXIV, 36. We do not, however, deny that the blessed, either from a peculiar revelation of God, or from the report of angels and souls who have migrated from this mortal to that immortal life, can know many things that are done on earth; But they do not have these things explored by the force of intuitive knowledge.

That the formal reason of eternal blessedness consists in the intuitive knowledge of God is proven:

(1) From Matthew V, 8: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." In which words the Savior describes eternal blessedness through the vision of God.

(2) From 1 John III, 2: "Beloved, now we are the sons of God, and it does not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." The apostle means to say: We are in this life the sons of God, and we have some similitude with the celestial Father in the kingdom of grace; but it has not yet appeared what we shall be; but we know that, when that glory shall appear, we shall be perfectly like God, we shall have that image and similitude of God which we marred in Adam; but the foundation and cause of the divine image, fully restored, will be the vision of God, by which we shall see Him as He is, i.e., in His essence, without an impressed species representing the divine essence. We argue: Whatever is the apex of our future glory, and the radical cause of the fully restored divine image, in that our eternal blessedness formally consists. But the beatific vision of God, etc. Therefore.

(3) From 1 Corinthians XIII, 12: "For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known." The human intellect, suffused with the light of grace, sees God in this life through the mirror of the divine word in a riddle, i.e., less clearly; But it will see Him far more clearly in eternal life, illumined with the light of glory. The knowledge of God (theognosia) of this age is imperfect; the knowledge of God (theognosia) of the future age will be most perfect, as great as can possibly fall to a rational creature. But that eternal life consists in the knowledge of God, Christ teaches in John XVII, 3.

Question V. Will the blessed in heaven also see God with their bodily eyes?

That the blessed in heaven will see God with their bodily eyes is not indeed apodictically certain a), but it is probable b).

Proof a. 1) Because "to see," from the usage of the holy tongue, sometimes means the same as to know something with the intellect, 1 Corinthians XIII, 12, and therefore can be expounded of mental vision. 2) The angels are said to see the face of God the Father in heaven, who are destitute of bodily eyes, Matthew XVIII, 10. Therefore, just as the vision of the angels is intellectual, so an intellectual vision of God is to be hoped for by the blessed in the future life.

Proof b. 1) Job, sustaining himself with efficacious solace in his most afflicted state, says: "And in my flesh I shall see God: Whom I shall see for myself, and my eyes shall behold, and not another." ch. XIX, 26-27. Job confesses that he will see Christ, not only as man, but also as God, and indeed with bodily eyes. Certainly, no necessity compels us to depart from the proper meaning of the word and to understand it as the tropical eyes of the mind. 2) The bodily eyes of the blessed in the future life will be spiritual (not in respect of substance, but of qualities), 1 Corinthians XV, 44. Therefore, it is probable that the spiritual eye will see God. 3) The finite intellect, by the light of glory, can be elevated to such a degree that it sees the essence of God immediately without an intelligible species; Therefore, by a parallel reason, the bodily eyes, instructed with spiritual powers, can be raised to such a perfection that they clearly behold God. The consequence is evident, because it is equally possible and easy for God to elevate the eyes of the body to see Himself, as it is possible for the same to elevate the finite intellect to intuitively know the infinite essence.

The antithesis is of most of the Pontificals (Roman Catholics), who deny that God can be seen with bodily eyes, whose chief arguments are:

I. No spirit can be seen with bodily eyes. But God is a spirit, and that the purest and most subtle, John IV, 24. Therefore. R. No spirit can be seen with animal bodily eyes, I grant. But it is consistent with truth that the same can be seen with spiritual bodily eyes.

II. God is invisible, 1 Timothy I, 17; VI, 16. "whom no man can see." I respond. God is called invisible with respect to physical vision, not hyperphysical; and so no one can see God in this life with unglorified eyes. God Himself so limits it, Exodus XXXIII, 20. "My face" (the LORD addresses Moses) "you cannot see" (with the eyes of the body): Why? "for no man" (with his eyes) "shall see me, and live" (this life).

III. In whatever sense the angels are said to see the face of God, in the same sense also blessed men are said to behold God. But the angels are said to see God with the eyes of the mind. Therefore, also blessed men. The major premise is established, because the blessed will be like the angels, Matthew XXII, 30. I respond. I distinguish between absolute and respective similitude. In a certain respect we will be like the angels in the future life, but not simply or in every way. It is sufficient that the blessed will see God both with the eyes of the mind and with the eyes of the body, which are spiritual in respect of their qualities, just as the angels behold God in a spiritual manner.

IV. By whatever vision the bodily eye would transcend the sphere of its object, that vision is not to be asserted. But by the vision of the divine essence, the bodily eye, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear, because every sense contains itself within the limits of its object. The minor is clear, because the object of the eyes is a colored and lucid body. I respond. I distinguish between the animal, or unglorified, eye and the spiritual eye. By whatever vision the bodily eye, instructed with spiritual endowments, would exceed the sphere of its object, that vision is not to be asserted; I grant it. But the spiritual eye, seeing God who is a spirit, does not exceed the sphere of its object, which is peculiarly established by God. God can elevate the eyes of the blessed beyond their nature, so that they may see the Godhead itself. He would be impudent who would dare to measure or limit the infinite power of God by physical reasons drawn from the common and ordinary course of nature.

Question VI. What is the fruition of God?

Fruition of God. The fruition of God is an act of the will, by which the blessed in the celestial fatherland most avidly embrace, most sweetly perceive, and are most fully satisfied with God, the highest good.

Proof from Psalm XVII, 15: "As for me, I will behold your face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with your likeness." David opposes his hope, placed in the future vision and fruition of God, to the machinations and boasting of his enemies, whose belly God had filled with corporal goods. For he says two things: 1) that he will see God, 2) that he will be satisfied with the image of God, i.e., that he will perceive solid joys from the sight of the divine majesty. By the "image of God" in this place, some theologians understand the majesty of God, which, by showing itself gloriously, alone can satisfy the appetite. Cf. D. Ioh. ADAM, OSIANDRI coll. System. Part. VI. p. 205.

You say: If eternal blessedness, according to the testimony of sacred scripture, consists in the vision of God, which is an act of the intellect, it does not consist in the fruition of God, which is an act of the will. For it would be in two subjects, when yet one and the same thing is in only one subject. I respond. Formal eternal blessedness is something complex or aggregated, consisting of distinct acts, terminated at the same beatific object (God), and having a certain order both among themselves and toward the same beatific object: Whence it is no wonder that it is in different subjects, or rather, in the powers of one subject, namely, man. For each power attains the beatific object immediately, the intellect by vision, the will by fruition. The root of blessedness is indeed in the intellect, namely, the intuitive knowledge of God; but the fruition of God in the will completes and perfects blessedness. Take away from the clear vision of God its fruition in the will, just as these two can be conceived separately in the mind, certainly the blessedness of the human soul will be greatly mutilated and maimed, according to that saying: "What avails the sight (the vision of God), if the use (the fruition of God in the will) is not granted?" Sacred scripture indeed describes eternal blessedness by the intuitive knowledge of the intellect, but it does not exclude the fruition of the will. For it is a solemn custom of the Hebrews to connote affection with words of knowledge.

Question VII. What perfections of the human soul will indivisibly accompany the beatific vision and fruition of God?

The beatific vision and fruition of God will be indivisibly accompanied by the most ardent love of God a), the most cumulative joy b), the sempiternal celebration of the divine name c), sinlessness (anamartēsia), or immunity from the danger of sinning, and the most constant holiness d).

Proof a. Such is the power of the good, perfectly known by the intellect, and most avidly accepted by the will, that it moves and entices the will to the love of itself, since nothing but what is lovable is apprehended in it. Wherefore, since God is supremely good, clearly known by the intellect, and most sweetly perceived by the will, He cannot but be most ardently loved by the blessed in the celestial fatherland. From which AUGUSTINE describes the fruition of God through the love of God (a posteriori), in book I of On Christian Doctrine, ch. 4: "To enjoy a good is nothing other than to adhere to it by love for its own sake."

Proof b. With the love of God in the celestial fatherland is connected the most cumulative and purest joy; for that which is known as a clear gift, is sweetly tasted, and is intensely loved, that produces solid joy. Therefore, the faithful servants will enter into the joy of their lord, Matthew XXV, 23. There will be "fullness of joy" in the presence of God, Psalm XVI, 11.

Proof c. He who fully enjoys God, the highest good, cannot but sing His praises. Wherefore blessed men, admitted to the intimate vision and embrace of God, will sing day and night without intermission with the holy angels: "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come," Apocalypse IV, 8.

Proof d. Such holiness will adorn the blessed souls as can fall to a creature (namely, finite and dependent). For since they perpetually behold God, and most ardently love Him, so that they cannot cease from His love, they are immune from sin and the danger of sinning, concerning which St. Paul asserts that the triumphant church "will not have spot, or wrinkle," Ephesians V, 27, where he speaks of the stain of sin. And St. John describes the blessed as being clothed "in fine linen, white and clean," Apocalypse XIX, 14, by which is noted the righteousness of the saints, v. 8.

Question VIII. Will God impart His essential blessedness, holiness, and glory to the blessed in heaven?

God does not make the blessed in the celestial fatherland partakers of His essential blessedness, holiness, and glory.

Proof 1) God is essentially blessed, because He is blessed from Himself, through Himself, and in Himself. But the elect are blessed by the glorifying grace of God. God is holy independently, and by essence; The elect are holy dependently and by superadded qualities. Therefore, the most pious Hannah says, 1 Samuel II, 2: "There is none holy as the LORD." The glory of the blessed is finite; but the glory of God is infinite and incommunicable to creatures (except to that one to which God has personally united Himself). "My glory I will not give to another," says the LORD, Isaiah XLII, 8.

2. If the blessed in heaven were partakers of the essential divine glory, they would be gods, and adorable; the consequent is false; Therefore, the antecedent is also false. The falsity of the consequent is most clearly evident from the fact that the blessed cast their crowns before the throne of God, saying: "You are worthy, O Lord, to receive glory," etc. Apocalypse IV, 11, and the angels, to whom the blessed are similar, do not want the cult of adoration to be given to them, Apocalypse XIX, 10.

The antithesis is of the Quakers, asserting that the blessed are partakers of the essential divine blessedness, whose chief arguments are:

I. God will be all in all to the blessed, 1 Corinthians XV, 28. Therefore, the divine blessedness, holiness, and glory will be the blessedness of the elect. I respond. I distinguish between objective and formal blessedness. The former is God, the highest good of the elect. The latter is the fruition of God. Our discourse is not about the former, but about the latter, which is certainly dependent and finite.

II. The dead in heaven are gods; Therefore, they are partakers of the essential divine glory. The antecedent is proven because they are sons of God, John I, 12, born of God, i.e., of the divine essence, John III, 6, partakers of the divine nature, 2 Peter I, 4. I respond. They are sons of God, not by nature, but by adoption; born not from the essence, but by the gracious operation of God. They are partakers of the divine nature, on account of the spiritual, not essential nor personal, union and communion of God with the elect.

SUSPIRIUM

Dou have made us, most HOLY GOD, for YOURSELF, and our heart is restless until it rests in you. You are all in all to it: You are light to the mind, food to the will, the center to the affections. You are delightful to see, sweet to have, gentle to enjoy. It is always pleasing to look upon You, always to love You, always to be delighted in You, and to enjoy You. Wherefore, give yourself to me, and restore me to yourself, that in the celestial fatherland I may see you most clearly, love you most perfectly, and rejoice in you, the highest good, most perfectly. To You be praise and glory for ever and ever!

PART II OF THEOLOGY

CHAPTER I. ON THE SUBJECT OF THEOLOGY, NAMELY ON FALLEN MAN, OR THE SINNER, TO BE LED BACK TO GOD.

Question I. What things are to be considered concerning the fall of man?

CONCERNING THE FALL of man, both the terminus from which and the terminus to which are to be considered. The terminus from which is the state of innocence, or integrity.

Proof. The misery of fallen man cannot be accurately weighed, unless the happiness that preceded it, of which man deprived himself by turning away from God, is exactly pondered. For a privation is known from the opposite habit, and the gravity of an evil is worthily estimated from the good that was lost.

Question II. What was the state of integrity?

The state of integrity was the first, and that most happy, condition of man, created in the image of God.

Question III. What is the image of God?

Definition of the divine image. The image of God is a natural perfection, consisting in an excellent conformity with God's prototype, in wisdom, righteousness, purity, immortality, and majesty, concreated with the first humans, so that they might truly know their creator, piously worship Him, live a holy life, and attain a glorious blessedness.

Homonymy of the Image of God
Observation I. The formal requisites of an image, considered generally, are: 1) Similitude, or correspondence with the exemplar, or prototype; because it is the nature of an image to represent the thing of which it is an image. This, however, cannot happen without similitude. 2) Origin, or procession of the image from the exemplar, because the image is expressed in imitation of the prototype, for the sake of representation (*).

Observation II. A trace is distinguished from an image. An image represents manifestly that of which it is an image; a trace refers obscurely to that of which it is a trace. In all creatures are found traces of divine power, wisdom, and goodness; but in integral man, the image of God shone with a full radiance. Cf. CALOVIUS, Metaphysica Divina, p. 641.

Question IV. How manyfold is the image of God?

The image of God is either substantial or accidental. The former is the eternal Son of God, because He expresses the whole essence of the Father in Himself, being distinct from Him in the mode of subsisting a). The latter is that whose accidental perfections are conformed to the infinite perfections of God, according to the mode of human capacity b).

Proof a. Christ is called by the apostle Paul the image of God, 2 Corinthians IV, 4. The image of the invisible God, Colossians I, 15. The express image of the Father's person, Hebrews I, 3, because He represents the person of the Father, taken concretely, inasmuch as it consists of essence and subsistence. Cf. SEB. SCHMID, Commentary on Hebrews, ch. I, 3.

Proof b. On account of accidental perfections, in some measure corresponding to the infinite perfections of God, man in his primeval state is said to be made in the image of God, Genesis I, 26-27; ch. V, 1. And converted man is renewed to the image of God, Colossians III, 10. Indeed, man, with respect to the dominion which he has not only over brutes, but also over woman, is called in the nominative case the image and glory of God, 1 Corinthians XI, 7. (*)<sup>111</sup>

(*) That is properly called an image in which is seen a correspondence with another, from which it so derives its origin that the properties of the latter appear expressed in the former. Therefore, there are altogether three things which are required for an image, properly and strictly so called: 1) a certain archetype (archētypon), 2) a copy (ektypon), 3) The correspondence of both. Correspondence alone, therefore, is not sufficient, but origin is most necessary, and indeed in such a way that the expressed properties of the archetype (archētypon) are conspicuous. For 1) if it were so, the correspondence cannot but be mutual and reciprocal. For whatever corresponds with another, it is necessary that the other in turn correspond with it. Therefore, if correspondence were sufficient to constitute an image, it would follow that God also would rightly be called the image of man, which is absurd. 2) if it were so, a comparison, or metaphor, indeed refers to a correspondence with that thing from which the metaphor is drawn. But since the origin of the thing compared is by no means derived from that thing, it can only be called an image improperly.

(**) An image, generally speaking, is indeed seen in the correspondence of a certain copy (ektypon) with its archetype (archētypon). Specifically, however, there is either a perfect correspondence, which is equality (isotēs), or an imperfect one, which is similarity (homoiotēs). In every image, properly so named, there must be expressed perfections and properties by which the archetype (archētypon) is discerned from all other things (by definition); but those are either all, in the same way and degree, if it is equality; or only certain ones, and indeed the more important ones, yet in a different way, and also in a lesser degree, as a similarity. The eternal Son of God is the perfectly expressed effigy of the Father, the character of His person (charaktēr tēs hypostaseōs autou), Hebrews I, 3, since all the perfections and properties of God, with not one excepted, are in the Son, in the same way, namely naturally and necessarily, just as in the Father, also in an equal degree, that is, the highest and infinite, so that the Son is equal to the Father (isos Patri), John V, 18. To created man, divine perfections were indeed attributed, but only certain ones, also in a different way, for in God they are natural, or, to speak commonly, essential and necessary; in man they were not so, but accidental and contingent; and in a far lesser degree; for the perfections divinely imparted to man could not but be finite, just as the nature of man itself. Therefore, there was, and is someday to be restored, a similarity (homoiotēs), by no means an equality (isotēs), James III, 9, 1 John III, 2. But a certain image is called perfect or imperfect, not in respect of the copy (ektyseōs), but of the archetype (archetypou), namely, that those things which are in the copy (ektypō) are either all equally, or not all equally, expressed as they appear in the archetype (archetypō), although the copy (ektypon) has all

The accidental image of God is taken in two ways: either generally, improperly (akyrōs) and abusively, for a certain general analogy, or correspondence with God a); or specially, properly (kyriōs), for an excellent and most similar conformity with God the archetype b).

Proof a. The very substance of the human soul expresses certain copies (ektypōmata), or divine things, and refers to the exemplar of divinity. For God is an immaterial spirit, intelligent, acting with free will, invisible, indivisible, non-local, immortal. Which predicates can be affirmed of the human soul in a certain way. But that general correspondence is indeed subjacent to the divine image, properly so called, but does not formally constitute it.

Proof b. The divine image is taken specially and properly when God says, in Genesis I, 26: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." In the source, two words are used, tselem (image) and demut (likeness), not for the purpose of being symbols of distinct things, with "image" denoting the substance of the human soul itself, and "likeness" its accidental perfections (as some Pontificals will have it); but so that the latter may be exegetical of the former, and a most similar, or very similar, image may be designated. We confirm our assertion. 1) Because it is a solemn custom of the Hebrews to join two substantives, either synonyms or of disparate signification, one of which takes the place of an adjective, and has its meaning with emphasis. This form of speaking is called "one through two" (hen dia dyoin). See GLASSIUS, Sacred Philology, book III, tr. 1, can. VI, p. 392. 2) The same is evident from the comparison of the divine decree and its execution. In the decree, v. 26, both words, "image" and "likeness," are joined; But in the execution, v. 27, only "image" is read. From which we infer that the same thing is signified by "image" in the execution as was signified by "image and likeness" in the decree, on account of the harmony of the execution and the decree. 3) The image is comprehended under "likeness," Genesis V, 3; James III, 9. 4) Those two words are joined in an oblique case, Wisdom II, 23: "God created man in incorruption, he made him in the image of his own likeness" (SEB. SCHMIDT: property). 5) As Adam is said to have begotten Seth "in his own image and likeness," Genesis V, 3, so God created Adam in His image and likeness, Genesis I, 26. But there, diverse things are not signified by the two words tselem and demut. 6) What the image of God denotes in renewal, it signifies the same in creation. But in renewal it designates not the substance, but qualities, Colossians III, 10; Ephesians IV, 24. Therefore. Meanwhile, D. VARENIUS has accurately observed in Decad. I Mosaica, p. 120, that demut and tselem correspond materially, but not formally. For tselem is the image expressed according to the exemplar, God. Demut is the likeness, or correspondence between the archetype and the image. Demut is the foundation of the relation; tselem is the terminus of the relation (*).

those properties and perfections which agree with its nature and ends, so that nothing is lacking. This ambiguity, which lies in the word, must be accurately observed and removed, when it is asked: Whether the image of God in man was perfect, or not? To be sure, the sense of the question is either this: Whether all the properties and perfections which are in God were communicated to man, in precisely the same way, and in an equal degree? This we deny. Or this: Whether all the perfections of which man is capable, and which agree with his nature and ends, were attributed to him in a manner corresponding to the divine ones? This is what we affirm.

(*) I indeed acknowledge a certain difference, but I think it is another. These two nouns, tselem and demut, are not joined by "and," but are distinguished by different letters, having the force of particles, ׀ and ׃. The particle ׃ signifies that according to which something else is formed and expressed. In what way, therefore, is one to be discerned from the other? They differ between themselves as archetype (archētypon) and copy (ektypon). demut is the archetype (archētypon) to which something is made similar, which the prefix ׃ indicates. But tselem is the copy (ektypon) in which the likeness of the former is seen expressed. Therefore, this is the sense of the words: Let us make man in that condition which is formed according to our perfections, and refers to our appearance. Add. Daniel X, 16. But in another place, Genesis V, 3, both tselem and demut are understood of the copy (ektypon), and not

Question VI. In how many ways is the accidental image of God, properly so called, taken?

The accidental image of God is taken either partially (merikōs), i.e., inadequately, or wholly (holikōs), i.e., adequately. Partially, it denotes original knowledge and righteousness a). Wholly, it embraces all things which complete the image of God, whether they pertain to the image of God principally or less principally b). Original righteousness.

Proof a. The image of God is described by the apostle Paul through the knowledge of God, Colossians III, 10, and the righteousness and holiness of truth, Ephesians IV, 24. Because the better part of the divine image is original righteousness, by which, according to theological usage, the complex of virtues, both intellectual and moral, concreated in the first man is indicated. It is called "original," both to be distinguished from acquired righteousness, and because the first humans possessed it from their very birth, by way of a concreated habit; and finally, because it was to be transmitted to their posterity through generation, so that they too with their origin might obtain this natural perfection in the state of innocence, just as now, in the state of sin, original sin is propagated, and from that propagation is called original. Cf. D. CALOV. in Systema Theologicum, vol. IV, p. 598.

Proof b. The image of God, taken wholly (holikōs) and adequately, denotes not only original knowledge and righteousness, but also the faculty of ruling over sublunary creatures. Therefore, when man is said to be made in the image of God, it is immediately added that dominion was granted to him, Genesis I, 27. Cf. Sirach XVII, 3-4. Indeed, it also embraces incorruptibility (aphtharsian), or the immortality of the body, Wisdom II, 23.

Question VII. Is the image of God the very substance of the human soul, or a faculty of the rational soul, the intellect or the will?

Negative Thesis. The image and likeness of God, in which the first man is said to have been created, was neither the essence of the human soul itself, nor the intellect, nor the will, but an accidental, and that most intimate and eminent, perfection.

Proof. 1) Because the Son of God alone is the essential image of God, Hebrews I, 3. What is proper to the Son of God alone does not belong to any creature.

2) The image of God was lost through the fall of the first humans, Romans III, 23. But neither the substance of the human soul itself, nor the intellect, nor the will has been lost.

3) The image of God belongs to good men, Genesis I, 31, and upright men, Ecclesiastes VII, 29. But the soul, intellect, and will are common to the pious and the impious.

4) According to the testimony of Paul, the image of God consists in the knowledge of God, Colossians III, 10, and in righteousness and holiness of truth, Ephesians IV, 24. Therefore, it is not the soul itself, but a perfection of the soul; not the intellect itself, and the will, but the light of the intellect, and the rectitude of the will.

5) If the image of God had been the very essence of integral man, he would certainly have been essentially holy and absolutely impeccable; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent.

6) Original sin, which succeeded the image of God, is not the substance of man; Therefore, neither was the image of God the substance of man. For the principle of opposites is the same.

The antithesis is 1) of most of the Pontificals, according to whose opinion the image of God consists primarily in the very substance of the human soul, and secondarily in accidental perfections. 2) Of Flacius and the Flacians, who contend that the image of God was the very substance of the rational soul (although some explain MATTHIAS FLACIUS, a theologian of profound erudition, more benignly, that he was referring not to the essence of man as man, but as he was integral. See D. CALOVIUS, Systema, vol. IV, p. 576). Their principal arguments are:

I. That is the image of God in man which is most noble and excellent in him; But the human soul, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established because the most eminent perfection is designated by the image of God. The minor is clear because the substance of the soul is more excellent than its qualities. I respond. I limit the major premise; Whatever is most noble and excellent in man, as the subject of inherence, that is the image of God. But the soul is not in man as a subject of inherence, since it is an essential part of man. Indeed, the soul of integral man was rather the subject, or seat, in which the image of God shone.

II. Whatever was the source of all right motion and all good action for the first humans, that itself was the image of God. But the human soul itself, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear because the image of God in the first man was the cause of good actions. The minor is clear because the soul makes one operate well or badly; Well, in the state of innocence; badly, in the state of misery. I respond. Whatever was the source, or the proximate and immediate cause of good actions in the first humans, that was the image of God in them; I grant it. But the human soul is the remote and mediate cause, which, through the image of God, rendered man prompt for good actions.

III. Whatever gave integral man his being, that was his form, and thus his substance; But the image of God, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear; because through and on account of the image of God, man was integral and free from blemish. I respond. I distinguish between the absolute and the respective being of man. Man received his absolute being from the substantial form; his respective being, from the accidental form. The image of God was not of the essence of man, considered absolutely, but of the essence of integral man; Just as doctrine is of the essence of a learned man, not absolutely of the essence of man.

IV. The upright nature was the substance of man; The image of God was the upright nature of man. Therefore. I respond. I deny the minor. For the image of God was not the upright nature, but the uprightness of nature.

V. That to which the formal requisites of the divine image correspond, that is the image of God. But to the substance of man, etc. Therefore. The minor is established; because the substance of man 1) has its origin from God, 2) has a similitude and correspondence with God, so as to represent the same. I respond. I distinguish between a general and a special similitude, or correspondence. A general correspondence makes a trace of God; but a special correspondence constitutes an image most similar to God.

VI. Whatever is restored in a reborn man through the renewal of the Holy Spirit, that is the image of God; for we are renewed to the image of God; But the mind itself, etc.; Therefore. The minor is proven from Ephesians IV, 23; "be renewed in the spirit of your mind." I respond. Paul is speaking of the subject of the image of God, not of its constitutive part.

VII. The image of God was either an extrinsic accident, or a substance; But it was not an extrinsic accident, like a garland or a bridle, which lies on the outside (as the Pontificals will have it), because it was a natural, and that an intimate, perfection; Therefore, it was a substance. I respond. The major premise does not consist of immediate members. For between substance and an extrinsic accident, there is a third, namely, an internal quality, or an intrinsic perfection.

VIII. If we say that the image of God consists in original righteousness alone, the reason which God gives, in Genesis IX, v. 6, why no man should be killed with impunity, because he was created in the image of God, and James III, v. 9, why we ought not to curse our neighbor, because he was made in the likeness of God—this reason, I say, would be null where it was a matter of men who are not partakers of regeneration. For if someone were to answer that these things are to be understood of the first origin of man, there would seem to be no consequence; The blood of a man who is shed will be avenged, even of him in whom the image of God is not; because Adam was created in the image of God at the beginning. Certainly, we cannot revere the image of God in him in whom it has been in every part destroyed. To this objection D. DANNHAVER responds in Hodosophia Spirituali, p. 1086. The consequence does not hold, because immunity from inflicted violence (asylia) can be attributed to someone, and reverence out of respect not for a present habit, but a past one, out of respect for the right to restore the thing, out of respect for the holy remnants, such as the light of truth and the seed of good still remaining; Thus the apostle venerates the Jews according to the flesh, even though they had already marred the grace of God, Romans XI, 5. And we today permit immunity (asylian) to the modern Apelles, out of respect for a most ancient family. Likewise, man was made to have the image restored. 2) To Genesis IX, 6, D. SEB. SCHMID responds in his Commentary on Genesis, p. 101. In the image of God here, immortality is intended, since he was created for eternal life; which divine intention remains, notwithstanding temporal death, from which all will be resurrected to judgment, and will not die anymore. 3) To James III, 9, D. CALOV. responds in Biblia Illustrata on this passage, fol. 1443. Man is said to be made in the image of God, not as he now is, but as he was before the fall; to which, however, he is here repaired through Christ, Ephesians IV, 24, Colossians III, 10, 2 Corinthians V, 17.

Question VIII. What is the efficient cause of the image of God?

The triune God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, is both the efficient and the exemplary cause of the image of God.

Proof from Genesis I, 26. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness... v. 27. So God created man in his own image." In these words is indicated 1) a plurality of persons a) by the name Elohim, which is plural both in its termination and in its meaning; b) by the verb na'aseh, which by some interpreters is expounded as "let us make," by others as "we will make." In the latter way, this would be an expression of intention; in the former, of consultation. The latter D. VAREN. prefers in Decad. I Mosaica, p. 115. For what God the Father decreed through the Son and in the Holy Spirit in all eternity, He now said was to be fulfilled; We will make man. c) by the twofold plural pronoun affixed to demut and tselem. From which it is manifest that multiple divine persons are designated by Moses. 2) The unity of the divine essence. This is implied a) by the singular verb wa-yomer ("and he said"), which is constructed with a plural noun, so that we may venerate unity in trinity and trinity in unity; b) by the verb wa-yivra ("and he created"), to indicate the unity of action; c) by the identity of the image. For God (Father, Son, and Holy Spirit with supreme consensus) said: "we will make (or let us make) man in our image, after our likeness," so that the unity of both the archetype and the image might be insinuated. From which it is validly inferred that the triune God is not only the efficient, but also the exemplary cause of the image of God. Let it be far from us, therefore, to state that the image of God in man was expressed according to the exemplar of the angelic nature! For He who made man is the exemplar of the image in man. But He who made man is uniquely Elohim the creator. Therefore, uniquely Elohim the creator is the exemplar of the image in man.

Question IX. Was the first man created according to the exemplar of the human nature of Christ?

The first man was not created according to the likeness of the human nature of Christ, preconceived in the divine mind.

Proof. 1) Because God (Father, Son, and Holy Spirit) said within Himself: "let us make man in our image, after our likeness," Genesis I, 26. Therefore, the first man was created according to the exemplar of God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. AUGUSTINE urges the force of this consequence in his unfinished literal commentary on Genesis, cited by D. CALOV., vol. IV, Systema, p. 583. God the Father, speaking to the Son, does not say: Let us make man in your image, or in my image, but says in the plural, in our image and likeness, from which plurality who would dare to separate the Holy Spirit?

2) The decree concerning the forming of man in the image of God was prior in the divine intellect to the decree concerning the sending of the Son of God in the flesh, to repair the lost image; because the divine decree concerning the incarnation of the Son of God was formed only with respect to the fall, and the redemption from the fall, Matthew IX, 13; Luke XIX, 10; 1 Timothy I, 15; Galatians IV, 4. Therefore, the Son of God, to be incarnated in the posterior decree, cannot be the exemplar of the divine image, to be concreated with man in the prior decree.

3) The image of God consists in the knowledge of God, righteousness, and holiness, Colossians III, 10; Ephesians IV, 24; Therefore, it does not consist in the members or stature of the body.

The antithesis is of Andreas Osiander, who, in a little book published at Königsberg in the year 1550, on the image of God, contended that the image of God, to which man was created, is the face, the stature, and thus the whole substance of the glorified human nature of Christ, as it was in the transfiguration, Matthew XVII, but perfectly now, as He sits at the right hand of God the Father. But because this image did not really exist in the nature of things before the incarnation, he therefore surmises that the Son of God presented Himself to be seen by the fathers of the Old Testament in the idea of His future human nature, which is the most express similitude of the Son, and that Adam was created according to this similitude. His principal arguments are:

I. Whoever is the substantial image of God, according to his likeness Adam was created; But the incarnate Son of God is the substantial image of God; Therefore, Adam was created according to the likeness of the incarnate Son of God. The major premise is proven; because God did not say: let us make man according to our exemplar, but said: let us make man in our image, i.e., who may have the same image that we have. But the image of God is Christ, true God and true man, Colossians I, 15; Hebrews I, 3. Who, since He was not yet in the beginning, God said that He would make man according to the likeness of the face and stature in which Christ presented Himself to be seen by the fathers before the incarnation. I respond. This argument suffers from an enormous false interpretation (pseudermeneia). For 1) it has been shown above that "image" and "likeness" of God signify the same thing materially. 2) The text itself teaches that Adam was created in the image of God and according to the likeness of the triune God. But the Son of God neither is, nor is anywhere in the scriptures said to be, the image of the Holy Trinity; for thus He would be the image of Himself and of the Holy Spirit, which is absurd (atopon); but He is the image of the person of the Father, Hebrews I, 3, on account of His eternal generation from the Father. Therefore, Moses by the image of God does not precisely mean the Son of God. 3) Although the Son of God, both as God and as man, on account of the unity of person, is the image of God (as God, the substantial image of God the Father; as man, the personal image, as GERHARD says in his isagogic disputation, p. 787); yet when Adam was created, the Word (ho logos) was not yet incarnate, nor did the decree concerning the incarnation of the Word (tou logou) precede the divine decree concerning the creation of Adam; since the decree concerning the incarnation of the Word (tou logou) presupposes the fall of man and the liberation from the fall. But it is agreed among all that the exemplar is prior to the image. 4) Concerning the likeness of the face and stature of Christ, according to which Adam was created, not even a syllable is found in the text. 5) Whether by the "image and likeness of God" the copy (to ektypon), the image properly so called, otherwise the likeness, the thing exemplified, or the archetype (to archetypon), or exemplar, is to be understood, is called into question; D. CALOV. responds most simply in Systema, vol. IV, p. 631. The matter certainly comes to the same thing, if the words are explained, "to our image," or "to our exemplar," or, "that he may be our image;" for the sense remains the same. D. VARENIUS, however, teaches, in Decad. I. Mosaica, p. 146, that "likeness" and "image" in the phraseology of scripture always note the copy (ektypon); and so in Genesis I, 26-27, the exemplar is not designated, except by the plural affix. He proves his assertion: 1) because every biblical copy (ektypon) is contradistinguished from the exemplar, and is its expression in the copy (ektypō), and is never attributed to the prototype (prōtotypō), as such. 2) Otherwise, the image would not be in man, but in God, and thus man could neither be created to the image, or in the image of God, nor could he be called the image of God. 3) In God, besides the essence, the copy (ektypon) would be, for the same reason, the exemplar and image of itself. Christ indeed is the image of the Father, nay, the most perfectly and intimately expressing character of the Father; but He is not the image of the Trinity; nor did He create man as a mere image, but as an exemplar and principle; And that very thing which was the image in the first man, was also in the divinity; but it was not there in the way it was in the first man, nor in the same relation, but as substance and exemplar. To these we add the not inelegant exposition of D. SEB. SCHMIDT in his annotations on Genesis, p. 14. God said: Let us make man in our image according to our likeness, that is, in our perfect image, according to the concept and idea of our most perfect intellect. The Apostle calls it truth (alētheian), when in Ephesians IV, 24, he says: "in righteousness and holiness of truth" (en dikaiosynē kai hosiōtēti tēs alētheias), as if it were said in Hebrew; in the true image of our likeness.

II. Paul says expressly, Romans VIII, 29: "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren." I respond. In the cited passage, the image of Christ is considered accidentally. For Paul speaks of conformity with Christ in respect of his varying and successive humiliation and exaltation. But humiliation and exaltation do not constitute the image of God intrinsically, but only extrinsically and with respect to a certain state do they regard it.

III. If man, also in respect of his body, was conformed to God the prototype; it follows that not only the divine essence, but also the human nature of Christ is the exemplar to which Adam was created; Theologians assert the former; Therefore, also the latter. The consequence of the major premise is clear; because God is a Spirit, John IV, 24. But a spirit and a body have no proportion or similitude. I respond. Theologians indeed assert that the secondary subject of the image of God was the body of integral man; but not in respect of its substance, or corporeal mass, but in respect of its qualities, of impassibility and immortality.

Question X. What moved God to adorn the first humans with His image?

The impulsive cause. The most free goodness moved God Himself to perfect man with His image.

Proof. Every good is communicative of itself, and as it were diffusive. Therefore, the better something is, the farther and wider it disperses the rays of its goodness. Thus the sun shines on all, the air embraces and refreshes all, fountains, rivers, and seas are open to all. God, the fount and origin of all good, diffuses the divinities of His goodness into man, as soon as He created him, conferring upon him His own image, an incomparable dowry. For just as a prince gives his own effigy to a minister dear to him in a few things, as a sign of unusual grace; so God, led by a singular affection of love and favor, impressed His own image upon the first man, not by appending it externally, but by inserting it internally.

Question XI. Did God adorn humans of both sexes with His image?

The subject, which? God polished man of both sexes, male and female, with His image.

Proof. 1) from Genesis I, 27. "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God" (I say) "created he him; male and female created he them." Moses here says expressly that the man whom God created in His image was not an individual of one male sex, but male and female. Cf. Genesis V, 2.

2) He who is to be renewed in the image of God was first created in the same. But not only men, but also women ought to be renewed in the image of God, Ephesians IV, 24; Colossians III, 10; Galatians III, 28. Therefore.

3) Just as not only the male, but also the female enjoys the right of discerning the inheritance of eternal life, so the image of God belongs to both. For he who is devoid of true holiness and righteousness, which is the principal part of the image of God, is without a share in the celestial inheritance, 1 Peter III, 7; Hebrews XII, 14.

The antithesis was once of the Encratites, who judged the female sex to be a creature impure in itself; whom some haters of the female sex followed, thinking that Eve was not created in the image of God. They object:

I. Dominion over brutes, which is a notable part of the divine character, was not granted to the woman, as is clear from 1 Corinthians XI, 7. I respond. The apostle does not simply deny dominion over brutes to the female sex, but dominion over her husband. On the contrary, he asserts that in the state of marriage, the prerogative belongs to the husband, on account of his marital dominion over the woman; which indeed he could exercise most temperately over his wife, being placed in the state of innocence.

II. Moses testifies that God breathed into Adam the soul of lives, Genesis II, 7. From which inspiration he obtained the image of God; The same is not said of the woman. I respond. The soul of Eve was either created immediately by God, or was transmitted from Adam, by means of the rib. If it was created, Eve immediately obtained the divine image from God; But if it was transmitted, which not a few think more probable, the divine character, which was in the soul, was at the same time transmitted. For which reason, the image of God was in Eve, not indeed primitive, but yet originated and derived from Adam. From which D. DANNHAVER in Hodosophia Phainomenon V, p. 428, argues; The image of Adam is the image of God. The image of Eve is the image of Adam. Therefore, the image of Eve is the image of God. See 1 Corinthians XI, 7. Thus a copied effigy is no less a true image of the prototype, though not an immediate one.

Question XII. Were the angels also created in the image of God?

The sacred letters neither expressly affirm nor deny that the angels shine with the image of God; yet from them it is not invalidly inferred that they were divinely endowed with the image of God.

Proof. 1) The angels are called Sons of God, Job XXXVIII, 7. Therefore, they bear the image of God. The reason for the consequence is manifest; because every son resembles the father from whom he derives his origin. You say: The angels are called sons of God because God pursues them with a singular love. I respond. If sonship were founded precisely on love, a brother could also be called the son of his brother, but more is required for sonship, namely either generation, or adoption, or creation in the image. Now, the angels are neither begotten of the substance of God, nor adopted by the same, since the foundation of divine adoption is the merit of Christ, Ephesians I, 5, the fruit of which does not redound to the angels. Therefore, they are created in the image of God.

2) For an image in the order of creatures, similitude and dependence on a prototype are required. The angels enjoy both. For they are wise and holy spirits created at the beginning of things, Cf. 2 Samuel XIV, 20; 2 Corinthians XI, 14, and they depend on God the archetype.

3) In the perfect restoration of the image of God, blessed men will be like angels (isangeloi), Matthew XXII, 30; Luke XX, 36. Therefore, the angels shine with the rays of the divine image, if not with greater, then certainly with no lesser ones than blessed men.

The antithesis is of some of the Fathers and Theologians, who deny that the angels were created in the image of God. Their chief argument is that the angels are said to be sent not for dominion, but for ministry, Hebrews I, 14. I respond. 1) The angels are not so much our ministers as God's: They minister to God, but for us: They are not our servants, but fellow servants, Apocalypse XIX, 10, and guardians, Psalm XCI, 11. But a guardian is not always the minister of him whom he has guarded. A certain captain can guard even the last of the peasants. 2) The faculty of ruling brutes is at least an adjunct to the primary part of the divine image, namely holiness and righteousness, of which the angels are not destitute. What then? That not all power of commanding beasts seems to be denied to the angels. We read that they shut the mouths of lions, Daniel VI, 22.

Question XIII. What was the principal seat of the image of God? What was the less principal?

The subject, in which. The principal seat, and as it were the most splendid citadel, in which the image of God shone, was the soul of integral man, and in it the intellect and the appetite, both rational (which is called the will) and sensitive. The less principal seat was the body of the first man, the most convenient domicile for the soul, and its living organ.

Observation. In philosophical terms, this doctrine is proposed thus: The matter in which, or the subject of the image of God is either "that which," or total, or "that by which," or partial. The total subject is the whole man, in respect of both sexes. The partial is either primary or secondary. The primary is the rational soul of man, with its faculties, namely the intellect, the will, and the sensitive appetite. The secondary is the body, informed by the rational soul.

Question XIV. In what did the image of God formally consist?

The form of the image. The image of God consisted in the excellent conformity of the first man with the wisdom, righteousness, purity, immortality, and majesty of God, the archetype a), according to the mode of capacity which is given in an intelligent creature b).

Proof a. The most benign deity imparted to the first humans those perfections which were necessarily required for obtaining the end for whose sake they were created: namely, that they might rightly worship God, lead their lives justly and moderately, and at some time finally attain a glorious blessedness.

Proof b. An absolute and complete conformity of the copy with the archetype is not always required, but a suitable and respective one sometimes suffices, according to the capacity of him who bears the image of the prototype. Therefore, there is a huge difference between the perfections of God and of the first man. For the wisdom and righteousness of God is essential, infinite, eternal, and immutable: The wisdom and righteousness of the first man was accidental, finite, temporal, and mutable.

Question XV. What were the principal perfections with which God endowed the first humans?

Primary formal perfections of the Image of God. The principal perfections constituting the image of God were: the excellent knowledge of the intellect, the perfect holiness and liberty of the will, the sincere purity of the sensitive appetite, and the most sweet concert, as it were, of the affections with the dictate of the intellect and the rule of the will, conformed to the wisdom, holiness, and purity of God, according to the capacity of the first man.

Question XVI. What was the knowledge of the first man?

Knowledge of the intellect. The knowledge of the first man was a light and habitual perfection of the intellect, concreated with integral man, for knowing God, himself, and creatures.

Observation 1. This perfection of the intellect, or wisdom, which shone forth in the first man, was so great that no one after the fall, on this earth, can acquire for himself, whether from the principles of nature or from written revelation, such that Adam left Solomon, whose wisdom is especially celebrated, behind him by a long interval. For in this life, after the fall, even the reborn know only in part, and therefore imperfectly, 1 Corinthians XIII, 12, because they have only the firstfruits of the spirit, Romans VIII, 23. It was, however, finite; because Adam did not know the free and secret decrees of God, nor the thoughts of angels and men, nor all the individuals of every species. From which also the knowledge of the first humans was to be further perfected, both by supernatural revelation and by experience and their own observation; and therefore it does not exclude an ignorance of pure negation, although it was immune from an ignorance of evil disposition.

Observation 2. The knowledge of Adam was indeed excellent and sufficient for the primeval state; But it was not an intuitive knowledge of God. For the clear vision of God is not given on this earth, but is promised to be given in the heavens, 1 Corinthians XIII, 12; 1 John III, 2. Surely, he who knows God intuitively is not turned away by his will from the supreme deity, as Adam was turned away.

Our assertion is proven 1) from the end of the image, which is the glory of God. If man in the state of innocence had neither known nor worshipped God, he would have been an atheist; Which is impious to say.

2) From the renewal of justified men. For we are renewed to knowledge according to the image of him who created us, Colossians III, 10. That knowledge according to the image of the creator to which we are renewed, Adam had it; since renewal is a new repair, or restitution, of the old which was lost.

3) From the excellent specimens of connatural wisdom produced by Adam; such as a) the giving of names (onomatopoeia), or the nomenclature of animals, not only grammatical, devised at will, but also logical, congruent with the nature of the animals and the affections of the beasts, approved by the consent of God, Genesis II, 19-20. From which it is concluded that the first man penetrated and perceived the properties of the animals with the innate perspicacity of his intellect. b) The recognition of Eve, fabricated from the rib of the sleeping Adam, Genesis II, 23. c) The prophetic prediction of the future solidity of the conjugal bond, Genesis II, 24 (*).

4) From the granted dominion over brutes, which the first man could not exercise without notable prudence.

5) From the notions still innate in the minds of men today; which are the remnants of the lost divine image, and testify to his pristine wisdom, no differently than ruins testify to a splendid collapsed house. (**)

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who deny that the first man was endowed with excellent wisdom; who rely on the following arguments.

I. Whoever were ignorant of their nakedness, they were not notably wise. But the first parents, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Genesis III, 7. I respond. They were ignorant of their nakedness not of nature, but of shame. If they had been ignorant of physical nakedness, they would have lacked eyes. But they were ignorant of nakedness considered ethically, as it is shameful and disgraceful: Whence the genital members, in which the lust of the flesh is felt, must be covered after the fall. Since the integral man did not feel this, he needed no covering. Instance: But their eyes were only opened to know their nakedness after eating the forbidden fruit. I respond. The eyes of their mind were opened to know their shameful nakedness experimentally.

(*) Indeed, that these were the words not of Adam, but of God Himself, we learn from Matthew XIX, 5.

(**) Besides these arguments, which are indeed weighty enough, we appeal 6) to the saying of Solomon, Ecclesiastes VII, 29. "God made man upright" (yashar). What this signifies is apparent from the opposite in the same verse, "many inventions" (callida atque astuta consilia). To cunning is opposed wisdom. yashar denotes a wise man. 7) to the divine prohibition, with a reason added, and indeed one which pertained to the end proposed to man, namely, to the continuous and perpetual preservation of life. But to compare ends with means, and to weigh reasons, is a mark of wisdom. Indeed, legislation itself, and the obligation which arises from it, altogether pertains to those who enjoy intellect and liberty, and before they have declined from the norm, also moral perfections suitable to both the intellect and the will.

II. The first parents were ignorant that God was more veracious than the devil; otherwise they would not have given their assent to the latter. I respond. I distinguish between a concreated ignorance and one arising from negligence. Ignorance was not concreated in the first parents, but they owe their fall to negligence, or the omission of a more accurate scrutiny.

III. The first men were ignorant of the power of the tree of life; otherwise they would have eaten of it, and preserved themselves from death. I respond. They were not ignorant of the power of the tree of life: They would have eaten of it for longer, had they not been prevented by an angelic guard.

IV. The first parents were ignorant that they were mortal. I respond. They were ignorant in practice that they were mortal, because they perceived no cause of mortality in themselves; just as a healthy physician does not know disease in himself in practice.

V. The same were ignorant of the mystery of the Trinity and the incarnation; which indeed becomes known only by the light of revelation. I respond. Indeed, Adam also had knowledge of the mystery of the Trinity not only through revelation, but also by the concreation of the image itself; because he knew his creator. But this creator is one in essence, and triune in persons, God. But the mystery of the incarnation presupposes the fall, which it was not for integral man to know determinately.

Question XVII. What was the holiness of integral man?

Holiness of the will The holiness of integral man was a perfection of the will, by which he loved God above all things, and his neighbor as himself, and promptly and freely executed all works consonant with the divine will, which the intellect, illustrated by innate light, dictated were to be done.

Observation I. The perfection of the will, with which the first man was divinely endowed, embraces both a propensity to the good, and the free execution of the good, so as to represent the holy liberty of God, and the free holiness of God.

Observation II. The good to which integral man was inclined is to be estimated from the norm of the innate law, the sum of which is the love of God and of neighbor; which law, as a mirror of the divine will, the intellect of the first man, illumined by the light of the divine image, never failed to behold. Thence, what he knew to be pleasing and approved by the divine will, he dictated was to be done here and now.

Proof 1) from Genesis I, 31. "And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." The most wise architect of this universe, having contemplated all the works of the six days, saw them in the goodness fitting for each. The other creatures enjoyed a natural goodness; man, moreover, excelled in moral goodness; for this is due and proper to him. Imagine in the first man a languor of nature, and an inclination to evil: Would it not follow that God had made something that was not very good, and thus that He Himself is the cause of evil? And if the other creatures were very good, why not man, for whose sake they were created?

2) From Ecclesiastes VII, 29: "God made man upright." He is morally upright who is just and holy. The word yashar is used of God Himself, Deuteronomy XXXII, 4, and therefore implies a rectitude of will conformed to the divine justice and holiness.

3) From the renewal of justified men. For the converted, reborn, and justified sinner, through powers conferred from above, puts on the new man, who after God is created in righteousness and true holiness, Ephesians IV, 24. To put on the new man, who is created after God, in righteousness and true holiness, is to be renewed to the ancient holiness and righteousness, once possessed by man, who was created after God, or in His image.

4) From absurdity. If the first humans did not, with concreated holiness and righteousness, reflect the most holy and just God, they were not created in a most similar image to God; for they were not conformed to God, but deformed.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who deny the concreated perfect holiness of the first man. Whose more important arguments are:

I. Whoever is originally just and holy, he is impeccable. Our first parents were not impeccable. Therefore, they were not originally just and holy. I respond. 1) I distinguish between absolute and limited impeccability. The former is that by which one can in no way sin. The latter is that by which the first man, from his concreated powers, was able not to sin, or to decline sin, and thus is more accurately called non-peccable than impeccable. 2) I distinguish between immutable and mutable holiness. Immutable holiness belongs to God by essence, and by grace to the angels confirmed in good and to blessed men in heaven. But the righteousness of the first man was mutable. Whence I limit the major premise: Whoever is immutably just and holy, he is absolutely and simply impeccable; I grant. But thus the minor is denied.

Instance I. Given the distinction, the image of God is overturned, and is subtracted from the first man. For for every image, a conformity of the copy with the archetype is required. But the holiness of God the archetype is immutable. Therefore, the holiness of the first man also ought to have been immutable, if it was expressed according to the exemplar of divine holiness. I respond. For an image, a conformity of the copy with the archetype is required not absolute and in every way, but respective and suitable, according to the mode of capacity which is given in him who bears the image.

Instance II. If the first man was able, from his concreated powers, to decline sin, he was absolutely impeccable; Theologians assert the former; Therefore, also the latter. The consequence of the major is clear; because in him there is no potentiality for sinning, who can decline sin from concreated powers. I respond. I distinguish between a remote and a proximate potentiality for sinning. There was not in the first parents a proximate potentiality for sinning, or a proclivity to evil; But there was not lacking in them a remote potentiality for sinning, or a non-repugnance.

Instance III. If God created the first man with a remote potentiality for sinning, He created him fallible, and thus is the cause of Adam's fall. I respond. The consequence is denied. For he is called fallible who is prone to falling, and thus takes his denomination from a physical, or proximate, potentiality. From a potentiality of non-repugnance, or a remote one, no denomination is made. e.g., God created the sun, which could be adored by the gentiles. But you would wrongly conclude; Therefore, God made the sun adorable to the gentiles.

II. If the image of God consisted in concreated holiness, man after the fall cannot be said to be created in the image of God; But man after the fall is said to be created in the image of God; Therefore. I respond. We will satisfy this argument below.

Question XVIII. What was the purity of the sensitive appetite in the first man?

Purity of the Appetite. The purity of the sensitive appetite was a perfection concreated in the first man, by which his appetite promptly, and without a struggle, subjected itself to the right judgment of the intellect and the holy command of the will, and gave no place to inordinate affections.

Observation. In the first man there was a most exact harmony, and a wonderful consensus of the superior and inferior powers. For reason obeyed the divine law, the will obeyed reason, the sensitive appetite obeyed the will, the affections obeyed the appetite, and the members of the body obeyed the affections most promptly.

Proof. 1) From the dictate of the intellect and the rule of the will. He who possesses excellent wisdom and holiness so rules his appetite that all affections conspire amicably with the dictate of the intellect and the rule of the will; But integral man possessed excellent wisdom and holiness; Therefore. The major is clear in itself, and is corroborated from Wisdom VII, 30. "Wisdom is not overcome by wickedness."

2) From the removal of the cause of shame. In that adult, wise, and holy man, who covers his genital members with no garments, there is no appetite rebellious to reason and will; But the first humans, etc. Therefore. AUGUSTINE confirms the major premise in book XIV of The Literal Meaning of Genesis, ch. 23. What would they be ashamed of, when they felt no law in their members warring against the law of their mind? There was no movement in the body for which modesty is due. They thought nothing needed to be covered, who felt nothing needed to be restrained. The minor is clear from Genesis II, 25.

3) From absurdity. If the first humans did not, with purity of affection, reflect the most pure and chaste God, they did not bear the image of God; they were not in a state of integrity, nor were they good creatures; indeed, God Himself would be the cause of sin. The latter are irrational and absurd (aloga kai atopa). Therefore, the former is also. The consequence of the major premise is manifest; because a man subject to impure affections is not conformed, but deformed, to the most pure and chaste God; he does not live in a state of innocence, but of misery and corruption; for the struggle of the appetite and reason is from original sin, Romans VII, 23. Nor would God be most holy, if He had instilled a proneness to evil in the first man.

The antithesis is of the Pontificals and Socinians, who attribute to the first humans a concreated rebellion of the sensitive appetite against the judgment of right reason. Whose principal arguments are:

I. In whomever the sensitive appetite dominates reason, in him there is a rebellion of the flesh against reason; But in the first parents, the sensitive appetite dominated reason; Therefore, in them there was a rebellion of the flesh against reason. The major premise is established; because it is the part of reason to command, of the appetite to obey; otherwise a rebellion of the latter against the former arises. The minor is clear; because not only Eve, but also Adam succumbed to the evil desire of eating from the fruit of the forbidden tree. I respond. I distinguish between an appetite inclining itself to sin from within (esôthen), or intrinsically, and one stimulated from without (exôthen), or extrinsically. There was no internal inclination to evil in the sensitive appetite of the first parents, but they were stimulated extrinsically by the devil, to whom, having omitted a more accurate investigation, they succumbed (*).

II. He who has the flesh subject to reason cannot sin; But the first parents sinned; Therefore. I respond. Whoever has the flesh immutably subject to reason cannot sin; I grant. But Adam did not have the flesh immutably subject to reason. Wherefore he was not absolutely impeccable, but non-peccable. But he sinned because he abused his free will.

Instance I. If Adam sinned from a voluntary abuse of free will, the origin of sin can be imputed to God. I respond. God indeed had granted integral man freedom of will for good and evil, but He had instructed him with sufficiently valid powers to decline evil and choose good. Nor was the supernatural help of the Holy Spirit lacking to him.

Instance II. Why did God not confer such a perfection that he would be borne to the good freely, yet immutably; as the angels, confirmed in good, freely indeed serve God, yet adhere to him indivisibly, so that they cannot fall away from him? I respond. It so pleased the most wise God that liberty in either direction should be available to man; in whose will and wisdom we must simply acquiesce. Probable reasons are adduced: (a) that the spontaneous obedience of man might be established, (b) that God might confer rewards on man for obeying freely. Cf. D. CALOV. Systema, vol. IV, p. 707.

III. There was in integral man a sensitive and a rational appetite; But the sensitive appetite desires the sensible good, that which is pleasing to the senses; The rational appetite desires the honest good; But the sensible good and the honest good are often contrary opposites. I respond. The sensible good and the honest good are not formally contraries, but disparates; which, that they may be decently reconciled, the reason of a wise man (such as Adam was in an excellent degree) dictates and commands. To be sure, there was in Adam a sensitive appetite, but not an appetite in disorder (ataxia). There was in him an integral appetite, not vitiated, not rebellious, not deformed, but subject and conformed to reason, suffused with the light of concreated wisdom.

Question XIX. What were the less principal perfections which God granted to the first humans?

Secondary perfections. The less principal perfections, by which the image of God is completed, are the immunity of the body, infected by no stain of sin, from corruptive passions a), its immortality b), and the full power of commanding sublunary creatures, especially beasts c). In which power of commanding, however, the image of God did not principally, let alone solely, consist d).

Proof a. Painful and destructive passions (such as the trouble of labors, pain in childbirth, diseases, exile, etc.) are the punishments of sin, Genesis III, 16 sqq.; Sirach XXXVIII, 15. For which reason, the first man, immune from sin, was also free from bitter passion.

(*) Nor did Eve desire the forbidden fruit before she had begun in her mind to deflect from the word of God and its truth, and had allowed herself to be imposed upon by a fallacious persuasion.

Proof b. 1) God threatened man with death under this condition, if he should sin, Genesis II, 17. Thence through sin death came into the world, Romans V, 12. And death is the wages of sin, Romans VI, 23. Therefore, in the absence of sin from integral man, there was no danger from death. 2) The first man was created "for incorruption" (ep' aphtharsia), Wisdom II, 23. 3) The most efficacious preservative means of perennial life was the tree of life, Genesis II, 9; ch. III, 22.

Proof c. 1) from the formal reason of the divine image, which consists in conformity with the majesty of God, the supreme lord. 2) From the assertion of sacred scripture, Genesis I, 26: "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps upon the earth."

Observation. a) God granted to the first man dominion over sublunary things, extended through the seas and lands, but not through the stars of heaven, except insofar as he turned their influence to his own utility. b) That dominion was not absolute and direct, but respective and useful, which denotes the inhabitation of the world, with the use of its fruit. c) Dominion is taken either radically, for the right and power of commanding, or formally, for actual dominion. In the former sense, it is called a less principal part of the divine image; in the latter sense, it was an extrinsic accident, or an appendix of the image of God.

3) From the act of God, who brought all the animals of the earth to Adam, that he might impose names on them; by which very act Adam was put into possession of that dominion which God had granted him.

Proof d. The image of God is completed neither solely nor principally by dominion. Not solely, because by dominion alone man is not pleasing to God, 1 Corinthians I, 26. If the constitution of the essential divine image were completed by dominion alone, not only poor renewed Christians, but also Christ, in the state of exinanition, would have been destitute of the divine image; on the contrary, the children of this age and the lords of things would be endowed with the divine image. Not principally, because those perfections principally constitute the image of God to which the justified man is renewed in this life, and with which he shone in eternal glory. But he is renewed to the knowledge of God, Colossians III, 10, and true holiness and righteousness, Ephesians IV, 24. And in eternal life, the image of God will consist in the intuitive knowledge of God, 1 John III, 2, and in consummate righteousness, Psalm XVII, 15. Therefore, these are the principal parts of the image of God.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, according to whose opinion the body of integral man was immune neither from painful passions nor from the condition of mortality; on the contrary, the image of God consisted solely and principally in dominion. Who support their opinion with the following arguments:

I. The body of Adam, in the state of integrity, was fleshy and soft, and therefore vulnerable and exposed to bitter passions. I respond. Although the body of Adam was not simply invulnerable, yet, if he had persisted in the state of innocence, it would never have been wounded; for the providence of God, then the excellent wisdom of integral man, would have averted wounds. What then? that in the state of integrity man would have been placed beyond the danger of being wounded. For the beasts were subject to his full dominion, and man did not harm man even with a look.

II. Adam labored, because he tilled the ground, Genesis II, 15. I respond. Adam's labor was sweet and pleasant, not harsh and troublesome.

III. Whoever was dust from the first origin of creation, he was mortal; But Adam, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established, because God Himself gives this cause of mortality, Genesis III, 19: "for dust you are, and to dust you shall return." The minor is clear from Genesis II, 7. I respond. a) The cited words are to be understood of the destitute state of nature, not the instituted one. b) There was in integral man a remote potentiality of dying, not a proximate one. The proximate potentiality of dying in the fallen Adam arose from the obedience rendered to Eve. See Genesis III, 17.

IV. Every earthly and animal body is corruptible; The body of integral Adam was earthly; Therefore. The major premise is established from 1 Corinthians XV, 47. I respond. a) In the cited passage, the image of the fallen Adam is understood, not the integral one. b) The earthly body in that place is not opposed to the immortal, but to the celestial, just as the animal is to the spiritual, and so in the mind of Paul, the earthly and animal is that which is affected by earthly qualities, and needs food and drink; on the contrary, the celestial and spiritual body is that which, adorned with celestial and spiritual qualities, has no need of food and drink, digestion, refreshment, etc. See CALOV. in Biblia Illustrata on this passage, fol. 408.

V. Immortals cannot procreate: Man before the fall could procreate. Therefore. The major is clear from Luke XX, 35-36. I respond. Immortals cannot procreate in a spiritual or glorified body; but the body of Adam was natural.

VI. Christ took away all the punishments of sin; He did not take away death; Therefore, death is not a punishment of sin. I respond. I distinguish between eternal and temporal punishments. Christ took away the eternal punishments; the temporal ones he changed into paternal castigations, and especially death into sleep and the way to eternal life.

On dominion over creatures, the Socinians object:

I. God Himself described the divine image through dominion over creatures, Genesis I, 26. Therefore, the image of God consists solely and principally in dominion. I respond. I distinguish between an inclusive and an exclusive sense. God does not say that the divine image consisted only in dominion over creatures. Certainly, dominion presupposes wisdom. For it is the part of fools to serve, not to command.

II. Nothing is more excellent in God than dominion over all things; Therefore, the image of God principally consisted in that. I respond. I deny the antecedent; because the actual dominion of God began with creatures, but His wisdom and righteousness are eternal.

III. In the other age, our principal glory will be dominion over the devil and hell; Therefore, in this age, before the fall, the principal part of the divine image was dominion. I respond. The image of God before the fall consisted not in dominion over the devil, but over beasts. But the principal glory of a blessed man in the other age will be the beatific vision and fruition of God.

Question XX. Was the image of God a natural perfection of the first man, or a supernatural gift?

The image of God, indeed, did not constitute the nature of the first man by way of an essential part, nor did it emanate from his nature by itself and necessarily, as an inseparable property a); yet it was natural to the first man, because by creation it began to be with the very nature of man; and therefore it was both due to him and most deeply impressed upon him, just as it intimately perfected the nature of integral man for obtaining his end, and could be propagated to posterity by natural generation b).

Observation. Something is called natural 1) constitutively, which constitutes the nature of a thing as a part. Thus the essential parts, body and soul, are called natural to man. 2) Consecutively, which flows essentially from the form, like the faculties of the soul. 3) Principatively, which begins to be simultaneously with nature itself through creation or the institution of nature. 4) Subjectively, which is most deeply impressed upon nature, as its subject. 5) Perfectively, which intimately perfects and adorns nature. 6) Transitively, which is propagated to posterity with nature itself through natural generation.

Proof a. The image of God was not natural to the first man constitutively, nor consecutively; because it was neither a part of man, nor a proper faculty of the human soul; for it would follow that man after the fall would be destitute of some essential part, or some faculty of the soul, which is absurd.

Proof b. 1) Whatever was concreated with the first man, that was natural to him; But the image of God, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the natural things of the first man are to be judged from the first creation of the human creature; just as we call that natural to other animals which was concreated with them. The minor is clear from the divine intention and decree, Genesis I, 26: "Let us make man in our image after our likeness." To which corresponds the execution in v. 27: "So God created man in his own image." Therefore, integral man in the first moment of his existence was endowed with the image of God.

2) From the goodness and moral rectitude suitable to human nature. For God created man very good, Genesis I, 31, and made him upright, Ecclesiastes VII, 29. Whoever is created very good and upright by God, to his nature moral goodness and rectitude is suitable or due. But the first man, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because that perfection is called connatural, or due to nature, which has the same origin as man; on the contrary, that is supernatural which is not in nature from its first origin, but is superadded by God, from a special grace, to supply its imperfection.

3) From the natural end of man. Man was created for God, that he might know Him, celebrate Him when known, and become a partaker of eternal blessedness. BONAVENTURE teaches this in 2, dist. 19, art. 1, Question 1: "It is so true and certain that man was made to participate in the highest blessedness, that no one doubts of it, unless his reason is entirely subverted."

We argue: To whom eternal blessedness was natural, to him also the image of God was natural; But to the first man, etc. Therefore. The major shines with its own light; because he who is destined for an end proportionate to his nature, to him natural means, or natural powers for obtaining that end, are conferred by God; otherwise man would have been worse than the brutes, which are instructed with the necessary means for attaining their end.

4) From natural propagation. Whatever can be propagated to posterity through generation, that is natural. But the image of God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because not supernatural gifts, but natural perfections are propagated to posterity through generation. The minor is proven: Just as Adam after the fall is said to have begotten a son in his own image and likeness, Genesis V, 3, whence all his posterity are called children of wrath by nature, Ephesians II, 3; So, if Adam had persisted in the state of integrity, he would certainly have begotten a son according to the image of God, and all his posterity would have been by nature beloved children of God.

5) By parity. The truth of wisdom and righteousness was connatural to the angels, John VIII, 44. Therefore, also to the first man. Nor can a suitable reason be given why holiness should be natural to the angels, but supernatural to the first man.

6) From the contrary. If original sin after the fall is natural to man, before the fall the image of God was natural to man; The antecedent is true; see Ephesians II, 3. Therefore, also the consequent. The reason for the consequence is; because contraries do not differ in their whole genus.

7) From the remnants of the divine image. The remnants of the divine image are natural. Therefore, the image of God in the first man was also a natural perfection. The consequence is proven; because, when the whole and the part are homogeneous, then the nature of the whole and the part is the same. The antecedent is clear; because the remnants of the divine image are the light of truth and the seed of good, or innate notions and stimuli of virtues, which are natural to man. For the apostle asserts that the gentiles, who do not have the law (written by Moses), do by nature the things of the law, Romans II, 14.

8) That immortality was natural to the first man is proven a) because man was created "for incorruption" (ep' aphtharsia), Wisdom II, 23. Everything concreated is natural. b) By the envy of the devil, death entered the world, Wisdom II, 24. Therefore, it is not a condition of the nature created by God. c) Death is the punishment of sin and destroys nature. Therefore, immortality, opposed to death, was connatural to integral man, or suitable to his nature. d) He who is not to be killed, to his nature immortality is due. But no man, etc. Therefore. The minor is established from Genesis IX, 6: "Whoso sheds man's blood (whether it be beast or man) by man (the legitimate avenger) shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man (God)." The nerve of the collection consists in this: To whose nature immortality, a notable part of the image of God, is due, to him death is not to be inflicted; But to the nature of man, immortality, a notable part of the image of God, is due; Therefore, death is not to be inflicted on man. e) The immortality of the first man could have been preserved by a natural means, namely the eating of the tree of life, Genesis II, 9; ch. III, 22. Therefore, immortality was natural to the first man. f) The soul naturally desires to be united to the body. Therefore, the conjunction of the soul with the body is natural to man; but death, which is the dissolution of the soul and body, is preternatural to man.

The antithesis is of most of the Pontificals, who state that the image of God was a supernatural gift, superadded to supply the connatural imperfection of man; just as a garland or a garment extrinsically adorns a man, or a bridle restrains a horse. But just as, when the garment and bridle are removed, the nature of the man and the horse remains uncorrupted; so they opine that by the fall, when the image of God was removed, the nature of man was not corrupted, but remained integral. Their more important arguments are:

I. Whatever is natural to man is inseparable from him; The righteousness of the first man was not inseparable from him;

Therefore. The major is evident; because, when the natural is removed, nature itself is overturned. I respond. Whatever is constitutively natural to man is inseparable from him, I grant. But the image of God neither constituted the nature of the first man, nor flowed necessarily from his essence; yet it was natural, on account of its natural correspondence, inherence, perfection, and propagation.

Instance I. The constitutive and consecutive natural exhausts the whole latitude of "natural." I respond. Not everything that is natural is a constitutive part or an inseparable property. For there are idiosyncrasies (idiosynkrasiai), or singular temperaments, and those natural; e.g., there are those who can neither bear a cat nor eat cheese. There is a natural affection (storgē) of parents for their children, a natural impulse (hormē), or stimulus to virtue, and this is greater in one, and less in another. From which some men are called naturally brave, naturally just, according to the testimony of ARISTOTLE in Book 6 of the Nicomachean Ethics, ch. 13. There is a natural sagacity of certain dogs.

Instance II. The natural things remained integral, to which the image of God as a supernatural gift was superadded. I respond. The natural things indeed remained, but not integral, not pure. Surely an intellect that is blind and filled with errors is not integral, a perverse will is not integral, an inordinate appetite is not integral or pure.

II. Of what kind the image is now restored, of such kind is the one that was lost. But a supernatural image of God is now restored. Therefore. The consequence of the major is manifest; because from the nature of the restored divine image one must judge of the nature of the concreated image. I respond. I deny the major. For, what image of God was connatural to an integral nature, the same, when restored in a corrupt nature, is rightly called supernatural. For the image of God was concreated with an integral nature, but to a corrupt nature it is superadded by a special grace, purchased by the merit of Christ. In integral man, the image of God shone perfectly; in reborn man, it is repaired imperfectly, with the contagion of original sin remaining.

The image of God with an integral nature was able to be propagated to posterity; but after the fall, it is not derived to posterity through generation.

Instance: The evangelical doctors themselves argue from the restored image of God to the concreated one. For D. GERHARD writes expressly in his isagogic disputation, p. 791: "The formal aspect of the divine image becomes clear from the renewal, by which we are reformed to the image of God." The reason is; because by renewal that is restored which was lost in the first man. Therefore, from the nature of that which is restored to us by renewal, one can judge of the nature of that which we received and lost in Adam. I respond. The evangelical doctors, judging of the nature of the concreated image from the nature of the restored image, are referring to the formal perfections, which constitute the essence of the divine image; But the difference between the natural image in the state of innocence and the supernatural in the state of misery is accidental, arising remotely from sin, and proximately from the merit of Christ. For, since the image of God has the same origin as the integral nature, but original sin is connatural to the corrupt nature, to restrain which, by the power of Christ's merit, the image of God is superadded by the benefit of regeneration and renewal.

III. Whatever was conferred on the first man to restrain the sensitive appetite, that was an extrinsic and supernatural gift; But the image of God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because supernatural gifts are conferred to emend natural things which are inclined to evil. The minor is clear; because the sensitive appetite is prone to evil. I respond. The sensitive appetite of the first man needed no bridle, because it was not ferocious, contumacious, incontinent, and disobedient; but he was upright, well-composed, purified, and most promptly obedient to reason without any struggle, such as the appetite that has a place in the human nature of Christ.

Instance I. The sensitive appetite in the state of integrity was inclined toward sensible good, which often differs immensely from spiritual good. Response; Sensible and spiritual good, with respect to the first man, were indeed disparate, but not contrary, but subordinate.

Instance II. No cause can be given for the defection of the first man, other than the removal of the supernatural gift, which restrained man's appetite like a bridle. Response; The cause of the defection was both the seduction of the devil and the abuse of the co-created free will.

IV. Whatever adorned man in the manner of a crown, which can be easily removed, is not natural to man; But the image of God, etc. E. The major premise is established; because a crown does not pertain to the nature of man; for when it is removed, the nature remains intact. The minor premise is proven from Psalm VIII, 6. You have crowned him with glory and honor. Response; Psalm VIII deals with Christ, which the apostle's citation in Hebrews II, 9 teaches, apart from the context.

V. Whatever is compared to a garment, that was something supernatural and extrinsic; But the image of God, etc. E. The major premise is clear; because a garment is not of the nature of man. The minor is proven from Sirach chapter XVII, 1, 3. The Lord created man from the earth according to themselves, He clothed them with virtue, and made them according to His own image. Response; 1) The word "clothe" is metaphorical, and often denotes that which is connatural. Thus Job says that he was clothed by God with flesh and skin, chapter X, 11. God is said to clothe the lilies of the field, whose beauty is natural, Matthew V, 30. 2) In the source we read ἐνέδυσεν αὐτοὺς ἰσχύϊν (he clothed them with strength), i.e., God equipped men with strong powers of mind and body for carrying out their tasks.

VI. Whatever man received immediately from God by grace was not natural to him; But the first man received the image of God immediately by grace. Therefore. Response; I distinguish between the general grace of creation and the special grace of regeneration. The first man received the image of God through the general grace of creation, just as he obtained the soul, body, and natural members from God; through the special grace of regeneration and renewal, the image is repaired after the fall.

VII. The origin of justice is not from the principles of nature, but from God; Therefore, justice was not natural to the first man. The reason for the consequence is; because whatever does not flow from the principles of nature, but is received immediately from God, is a supernatural gift. Response; 1) The first man received the rational soul not from the principles of nature, but immediately from God; which part, however, was a natural part of the first man. 2) If you look at the origin of justice, it was certainly a gift of God; but if you consider the natural suitability and intimate inherence, it was a perfection due to an integral nature, and most deeply impressed upon it for obtaining an end proportionate to nature.

VIII. Natural gifts are not lost through actual sin, but supernatural and spiritual ones are; But Adam's sin was actual; Therefore. The major premise is clear; because through sin the gracious indwelling of God is lost, but no natural gift. Response; 1) Even through actual sin, natural gifts can be lost or destroyed. Thus, the vigor of the body and the happiness of memory are lost through drunkenness and fornication. Through homicide, the natural union of the body and soul is dissolved. 2) The offense of Adam is not to be estimated from the equal sins of other men; because it is far more grievous and atrocious than them. For it is not only personal or individual, but also in a certain respect common and universal, a) by reason of imputation; because the sin of Adam, who was the stock and head of the whole human race, was imputed to all men; b) by reason of transgression; because by Adam's sin all the precepts of the decalogue were violated; c) by reason of propagation; because original sin, which flowed from the Adamic offense, was derived to all the posterity of Adam. To this is added that Adam was fortified with such aids that he could have easily avoided sin, since he was troubled by no internal tinder of sin.

IX. The natural image of God is the natural Son of God; The whole man was not the natural Son of God. Therefore. Response; 1) We do not assert that the first man was the natural image of God, but that the divine image was co-created in him, due to or suitable for an integral nature. 2) The natural Son of God is so called for two reasons; a) because He was begotten from eternity from the essence of the Father; in which sense only Christ is the natural Son of God; b) because by connatural wisdom and holiness He reflects the most wise and most holy God; in which sense the first man can be called the natural son of God. Dr. DANNHAVER aptly says in hodom. I. phant. V. pag. 1004: "The first man was not the son of God naturally, that is, substantially (which axiom belongs to the Logos alone); just as he was not the substantial image of God; yet he was the son of God from nature and with nature, to which this dignity was co-created."

X. Whatever body is composed of four elements and qualities contrary to each other, that is by nature mortal; But the body of Adam was so composed, etc. Therefore.

The major premise is established; because a body mixed from elements naturally tends toward destruction on account of the qualities being contrary to each other. Response; 1) Gold is a body mixed from four elements, and yet it is to a certain extent ἀφθαρτον (indestructible). The moon is not without mixture, yet it is above corruption. The body of Christ is composed of four elements, and yet it is not by nature mortal. 2) The nature of a composite is to be judged not only from the condition of the matter, but also a) from the connection, or union, of the form with the matter. That is, the holy soul of Adam, always adhering to God, the fount of life, in the state of integrity, was joined to the body by a bond not soluble, except through sin. BONAVENTURE not badly says, in Lib II. Dist. XIX. artic. III. qu. 1: "Death could not have been in man, unless nature had been disordered." If the disorder of human nature introduced death, the immortality of human nature is due in an ordered way. b) The goodness of the temperament must be considered, which Adam had obtained in its most perfect form; the harmony of qualities amicably conspiring, and not tending toward destruction; and the absence, or defect, of the causes of death, such as hunger, thirst, old age, fatigue of the body, diseases; to which the first man was not at all subject, and therefore was not by nature mortal.

XI. He for whom the tree of life was destined, for the repairing of fallen powers, was not by nature immortal; But for the first man, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established; because fallen powers incline toward destruction; if this is divinely averted by some external means, the immortality divinely conferred is not natural, but supernatural. Response; a) Adam needed the tree of life, not to repair fallen powers, but to preserve his whole ones. b) The powers of Adam were to be preserved by the fruit of the tree of life, because the immortality of Adam was not absolute, but ordered. c) We invert the argument; He whose immortality depends on food and a natural means, is naturally immortal.

XII. Whoever is by nature immortal cannot die; The first man could die. E. Response; Absolute immortality belongs to God; That which flows from the simplicity of nature belongs to angels and human souls; That which depends on the grace of glorification belongs to the blessed; but that which was co-created in the first man was an ordered immortality, because it was to be continued by certain means, and a hypothetical immortality; because the body of the first man would have remained not mortal for as long as he did not sin. Moreover, when we say that the whole man was immortal, we do not deny a remote potential to die; for if he had been immune from this, he would not have died after the fall; but we deny a proximate potential, arising from internal causes of death, namely diseases, the consumption of innate heat and radical moisture, etc. From which some theologians prefer to call the first man non-mortal, rather than immortal. See Dr. SCHERZER. in colleg. Anti-Socin. p. 278. For in the state of innocence man was able not to die, in the state of glory he is not able to die, in the state of misery he is not able not to die.

XIII. Everything generable is corruptible; Adam's body was generable; E. Response; I deny the major. For the soul is also generable, yet it is not corruptible.

XIV. An immortal being does not use food, 1 Cor. 15. Adam used food. E. Response; The immortal in the state of glory, with the belly and food destroyed, does not use food. The first man was not in the state of glory, but in the state of innocence, whose ordered immortality was continued by food.

Question XXI. Was man created in a state of pure naturals?

Whether the state of pure naturals is to be established. The state of pure naturals, in which man may have been created ἑδέτερος (indifferent), indifferent to moral good and evil, without knowledge of the triune God, without desire for eternal life, with the rebellion of the flesh against the spirit, exposed to various calamities, diseases, and death, is a most vain fiction.

Proof; The state of pure naturals, which our adversaries invent, is repugnant 1) to both the intention of God in creating the first man, and the execution of the divine intention. For both the purpose and the execution of God in creating man tended to this, that man should be created with the divine image, consisting in the knowledge of God and holiness of will. But this does not coexist, nor is it compatible with the state of pure naturals. 2) It is repugnant to the divine holiness. For if God had created an appetite repugnant to the spirit, He would be the cause of sin. Or if that rebellion in the state of pure naturals had not been a sin, neither would it be a sin today. 3) It is repugnant to divine justice. For the most just God does not subject an innocent man, who has never sinned, to calamities, diseases, and death. 4) It is repugnant to the excellent goodness and rectitude of the first man; since he was created very good, Gen. I, 31, and upright, Eccles. VII, 30. But if he had been created indifferent to good and evil, without knowledge of the triune God, without desire for eternal life, with the rebellion of the flesh against the spirit, he would not have been very good and upright. 5) It is repugnant to the state of integrity. For original sin is a state without fear of God, without trust in God, with concupiscence. See August. Confess. artic. II. But the state of pure naturals is a state without fear of God, without trust in God, and with concupiscence. Therefore, the state of pure naturals is a state of sin, and thus the whole Adam would have been created with original sin, which is blasphemous against the creator. 6) It is repugnant to the nature of man. For no creature endowed with reason is, or can be, ἐδέτερος (indifferent), or indifferent to moral good and evil, but is either morally good, or morally bad; either pleasing to God, or hateful to Him. 7) It is repugnant to the end for which man exists. Namely, he was created to know and worship the creator, to live a holy life, and to attain eternal beatitude. But if he had been created in the state of pure naturals, he would never have achieved this end.

The Antithesis is of the Scholastics and most of the Pontificians, who assert a state of pure naturals, whose many arguments have been examined. But besides, they argue:

I. That state which has a foundation in reality is not fictitious; But the state of pure naturals, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven: because 1) it is not repugnant to the divine power to create man without excellent wisdom and justice. 2) Because today after the fall certain natural things are pure and intact, for example, the light of truth and the seed of good. Response: 1) In a divided sense, I grant that God could have created man without excellent wisdom and justice, if He had not intended to create man in His image according to His likeness; but assuming that intention, God neither wished nor was able to create man without excellent wisdom and holiness; for the reason that otherwise man would not have borne an image most like God. 2) The light of truth and the seed of good, remaining today in the intellect and will of man, are faint remnants of the divine image. Since these are natural, it was necessary for the image of God in the first man to have been natural. 3) However, the first man could not have been created by God with a struggle between the flesh and the spirit; because that struggle is in itself evil and sinful, and therefore could not have had the most holy God as its author. You say: The rebellion of appetite and reason would not have proceeded from the intention of the author of nature, but would have existed in man apart from his intention, if man had been created in pure naturals; just as a smith who makes a sword from iron is not the cause of the rust on the sword, which arises later from the condition of the material. Response: Thus God would be accused of either imprudence or impotence. Of the former; because He did not foresee such an ἀταξίαν (disorder); of the latter; because He could not remove the same blemish. Both are blasphemous against the creator. The simile brought forth is dissimilar. For the smith does not make the material itself, as God does; nor does he possess such powers as to be able to preserve the sword from rust; nor does rust necessarily follow the material.

II. There were in the whole man natural faculties and supernatural gifts, which can be represented by distinct concepts. For there were in man intellect, will, sensitive appetite, as natural faculties; there were excellent wisdom and original justice, as supernatural gifts. Response: a) There is no question about mental precision; for we grant that natural faculties could be mentally separated from supernatural gifts by the benefit of the intellect, and considered distinctly. But the question remains; whether the first man was created in a state of pure naturals without ignorance of the true God, and with the rebellion of the flesh and the spirit? The sacred letters teach otherwise, namely that the state of the first man was a state of integrity, conspicuous with the splendor of the divine image. 2) The wisdom and justice of the first man were not supernatural, but co-created and due to an integral nature for obtaining the end, namely eternal beatitude, and most deeply impressed upon it.

III. Whatever mystery transcends the grasp of human reason, does not become known to man without supernatural revelation; But the mystery of the Trinity, etc. Therefore. Response: I distinguish between the reason of a sinner after the fall, and the reason of the whole man before the fall. The mystery of the Trinity is above the reason of fallen man; but indeed, before the fall, a remarkable light and perfection was co-created in the first man's intellect, by which, being illuminated, he knew his creator, who is one God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Paul teaches in Col. III, 10 that man was created in this knowledge of the creator.

IV. He in whom free will was co-created for either part, was created ἐδῆτερος (indifferent), or indifferent to good and evil. But in the first man, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because indifference to good and evil is nothing other than free will for either part. Response: He in whom free will was co-created for either part, so that he is equally inclined to evil as to good, was created ἐδῆτερος (indifferent); I grant this. But, although free will was co-created in the first man, yet there was in him no natural propensity, or proximate power to desire evil, but only a remote power, or non-repugnance. For to this end wisdom of intellect, justice of will, and rectitude of sensitive appetite were co-created in him, that he might be prone to freely choose the good, and to do it promptly. Supernatural help of the Holy Spirit was also available to him, illustrating, preserving, and enriching the co-created perfections with the light of supernatural grace. The only thing lacking to him was confirmation, or determination to the good, which brings about the immutability of the co-created justice; which increase God would have most liberally added in the celestial fatherland; if the first-formed humans had run the course of a life of holiness with an unoffending foot.

V. If human nature could not be created by God without original justice, it follows that a dead man cannot be recalled to life by God, unless endowed with justice, yet many have been resuscitated without it. See 1 Kings XVII, 22. 2 Kings IV, 33. Matthew IX, 25. Luke VII, 15. John XI, 43. Response: 1) The reasoning for a nature first instituted is different from that for a destitute one. That nature infected with evil could not be made without violating God's goodness and justice, but this one, because it had willingly enslaved itself to sin, could be resuscitated from the same, not immune to evil. For God, by resuscitating a nature contaminated by sin, does not make evil, but finds it. 2) Those are extraordinary examples, from which nothing certain can be defined. For it is not certain whether those who were recalled to this life were subject to sin and died again, or lived for some time free from sin, like the protoplasts before the fall, and were translated alive into heaven without the intervention of death, like Enoch and Elijah. Cf. Dr. MEISNER in anthropol. decad. I p. 52 & Dr. CALOV. tom. IV. Syst. p. 683.

Question XXII. What supernatural gifts accompanied the image of God?

Although divine grace and the indwelling of the Most Holy Trinity in the first man were not supernatural, but natural a); yet it is not to be denied that other gifts, placed above nature, were given to the first man, especially extraordinary revelation, and what was connected to it b).

Proof a. There are indeed some theologians of great name who think that the grace of God and the indwelling of the Most Holy Trinity were supernatural for the first man. See Dr. GERHARD. disput. isagog. p. 803. Nevertheless, if we consider that 1) the nature of the first man never was, nor could have been, integral without the indwelling and sanctifying divine Spirit, 2) original sin, which succeeded in the place of the divine image after the fall of Adam, brought not only corporal but also spiritual death (which is the privation of the mystical union of the soul with God) to fallen man; we agree with those authors who state that the divine grace and the indwelling of the Most Holy Trinity were not supernatural, but natural for the first man. Compare Dr. J. A. OSIANDER. colleg. theol. part II. pag. 283. Dr. FECHT. in syllogism. controu. disp. XIV. Dr. BREITHAUPT. in thes. cred. p. 28.

Proof b. Adam learned the positive law concerning abstinence from the fruits of the tree of knowledge of good and evil from a supernatural revelation of God, Gen. II, 16. 17. Nor is there any doubt that supernatural powers and gifts were conferred on the first man by the indwelling Holy Spirit for fulfilling the positive law, and for persevering in the state of integrity. For the indwelling of the Holy Spirit brings with it a multitude of many spiritual gifts, Eph. III, 19.

Question XXIII. What corporal and temporal goods accompanied the image of God?

The external corporal and temporal goods in the state of integrity concern chiefly human society and the divinely granted abode. The former was full of love (a), the latter of delight (b).

Proof a. If man had remained in the state of integrity, and the human race had multiplied in it, a most honorable and pleasant friendship would have flourished among men, born from the mutual consent of minds and the communion of goods. For if the faithful in the primitive church were of one heart and one soul, Acts IV, 32; how much more closely would the bond have joined men whole in life and pure from crime? Since all goods were common to them, there were no causes for bringing lawsuits, because all were established as lords of the earth and of the living creatures in Adam. You say: Man would have been lord of man even in the state of integrity, and therefore not all would have been lords; since God is the author of order, not of confusion. 1 Cor. XIV, 33. Response: In the state of integrity, man would have held over man a πατρικὸν (paternal) or fatherly dominion, such as a father has over his children, but not a δεσποτικὸν (despotic) or masterly one, such as a master has over his slaves. One would have been subject to another with a spontaneous and free subjection, not a forced and servile one; since in that state it would have been no less a freedom to obey than to command.

Proof b. The seat and place of habitation for man in the state of integrity was paradise, or a garden situated in Eden between the Tigris and the Euphrates, where the most fertile fields of Babylonia, Mesopotamia, and Armenia are, Gen. II, 14. Paradise, however, was filled with by far the most excellent trees, among which the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil were prominent. The former was like a pharmacy, from which fruits were plucked to preserve the powers of the body; the latter was like a certain altar, at the sight of which man learned to revere God, the supreme lord and lawgiver of all things, continually.

Question XXIV. What was the purpose of the image of God?

The purpose of the Image of God. The absolutely ultimate purpose of the image of God conferred on the first man is the glory of the divine wisdom, goodness, and power a). The relatively ultimate purpose is eternal beatitude b). The intermediate purpose is a holy life, pleasing to God c).

Proof a. Since every soul created by God praises its author, Ps. CL, 6, then in the first place the soul, endowed with the image of God, was a most beautiful temple of the Holy Trinity. A son bearing the image of his father owes him piety; a minister endowed with the effigy of his lord owes him most prompt obedience; a city, decorated with the gilded statue of its king, owes him singular faith; so man, created in the image of God, is bound to acknowledge, love, and venerate God, thrice best, thrice greatest.

Proof b. Every creature endowed with reason tends toward its goal, which is perennial beatitude; and the immortal soul desires to enjoy blessed immortality.

Proof c. Just as the image of God comprised those powers, or perfections of the intellect, will, and sensitive appetite, which were sufficient for living holily, according to the will of the creator; So a holy life was the intermediate end, respecting the ultimate end, which was eternal beatitude, which man, if he had remained in the state of integrity, would not indeed have merited by living holily, since the holy life of an integral man was not undue, but he would have obtained it from the grace of God, who most liberally and beyond merit compensates the pursuit of holiness.

Question XXV. Was the image of God lost through the fall of the first-formed humans?

The loss of the Image of God. The image of God was lost through the sin of Adam both meritoriously and naturally.

Obs. We say that the image of God was lost 1) meritoriously; because the first man by a single sinful act merited that the image of God be removed from him. For God had established from eternity that if man did not fall, He would confirm him in original justice with his posterity, so that afterwards he could not fall at all, just as He confirmed the angels who did not fall. However, the fall having occurred, He decreed to deprive him of original justice, and to leave him in that state with all his posterity, in which he would otherwise have perished without the remedy invented by Himself. And not only meritoriously, but also 2) naturally, inasmuch as by the force of the sin itself, the integrity and harmony of the co-created powers, suitable to human nature, was destroyed in man, and all justice was driven out, no differently than poison destroys and expels the health of the body. These two modes can well stand together; for it is not contradictory for the moral and the natural to concur, just as a suicide naturally and morally loses his life; morally indeed as meritoriously, so that God forsakes him; but naturally, by applying the knife. Compare Dr. HULSEMANN in breu. p. 203. & A. OSIANDER. colleg. theol. I. part. II. p. 298.

Proof: 1) The image of God is to be renewed. Eph. IV, 24. Col. III, 10. Therefore, it was lost. For what has not been lost, there can be no place for its restoration.

2) Those who are destitute of the glory of God, they lack the image of God; The posterity of Adam, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because the image of God was a remarkable glory of God, 2 Cor. III, 18, partly because it originates from the most glorious God, partly because it was communicated to man, created in the image of God, as a glorious reflection of God; from which man is called the image and glory of God, 1 Cor. XI, 7. The minor is clear from Rom. III, 23.

3) Adam, after the fall, begot children in his own image, not in the image of God, Gen. V, 3, so that, as Paul explains, 1 Cor. XV, 22, now in Adam all die. Therefore, Adam lost the image of God.

4) Adam had received the image of God on this condition, that he should persist in it; but that he would lose it again if he violated God's prohibition, Gen. II, 16. 17. Therefore, he lost the image of God meritoriously on account of the transgression and in place of punishment.

5) Just as the apostate angels lost their integrity demeritoriously, by not keeping, or by forsaking, their own principality and blessed state, Jude v. 6, so also Adam, by not keeping what he had, merited that it be taken away from him. This process God observes even today in the economy of grace, that to him who has it is given, and from him who has not (or is no longer willing to have) what he has is taken away by the just judgment of God, Matth. XIII, 12.

6) We are now φύσει (by nature), that is, by natural generation, children of wrath, having our minds obscured by darkness, utterly alienated from the life of God, Eph. II, 3. Therefore, the very nature of Adam was corrupted by the fall, and thus the image of God was naturally lost. For a) nothing that is not natural can be propagated by natural generation. b) As darkness naturally expels light, so the sin of Adam extinguished the light of the image of God.

7) What is born of sinful flesh (by natural generation) is now naturally sinful flesh, John III, 6.

The antithesis is 1) of some Pontificians, who refer the image of God to the very nature of man, but think that the likeness of God denotes accidental perfections. Hence they teach that the likeness of God, but not the divine image, has been lost. 2) Of the Socinians, who assert that the image of God consists in dominion over the other creatures; which, since it was not lost by the fall, they state that the image of God has not been lost either. 3) Of the Arminians, who deny that the image of God was physically lost by the sinful act of Adam (as health is destroyed by poison), but teach that it was lost meritoriously only, because God by a judicial act deprived man of original justice. Their main arguments are:

I. Man after the fall is said to be made in the image of God, Gen. IX, 6. Where God forbids the shedding of human blood, because man was made in the image of God. Cf. James III, 9. Therefore, the image of God was not lost by the fall of Adam. Response: 1) Generally: Man after the fall is said to have been made in the image of God, a) on account of the first creation of man, who was created in the image of God. Therefore, all men received the image of God in Adam as the head and stock of the human race. b) On account of the remaining ruins of the divine image, which are the light of truth and the seed of good, or the principles of reason born with us, both theoretical and practical. c) Because man after the fall is capable of the divine image, to which it is also due by virtue of the divine intention, although in fact it is not in him. d) Because, by virtue of the catholic merit of Christ, the image of God is to be restored in all men, both in this life and in the next, and therefore man has a right to recover the image of God. 2) Specifically: Gen. IX, 6, by the image of God is understood immortality, because man was created for eternal life; which divine intention remains, notwithstanding temporal death, from which all will be resurrected for judgment, and will not die anymore.

II. The man after the fall is called the image and glory of God, 1 Cor. XI, 7, which is the reason why the woman ought to obey the man. Response: The man is called the image and glory of God, i.e., the glorious image of God, on account of the dominion which God holds over all creatures, a certain image of which shines forth in man, to whom dominion belongs not only over beasts, but also over his wife herself.

III. He to whom dominion over beasts belongs after the fall has not been deprived of the image of God because of the fall of the first humans. But to man after the fall belongs, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because dominion over beasts is a significant part of the divine image. The minor is proven from Gen. IX, 2. Response: 1) I distinguish between full dominion and broken or diminished dominion. To man after the fall does not belong full dominion over beasts. For before the fall he could play with lions and leopards as with pet dogs, the sight of which he now flees and dreads after the fall. How often does it happen that man is overcome by beasts, torn apart and devoured? 2) Equal dominion was an adjunct and appendix of the image of God; but the power of dominion is only a less principal part of it.

IV. The fall of Adam was a single act. Therefore, it did not have the force that could deprave the very nature of Adam. Response: I deny the consequence.

The apostate angels overturned their state and corrupted their nature by a single sinful act. A serpent infects the whole nature of a man with poison in one bite. Sight is taken away by one wound inflicted on the eye.

V. Whatever God took away as a just judge was lost not naturally, but only meritoriously. But the primeval image God, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because a judicial privation is moral, not physical. Response: I deny the major. For by gluttony a man physically deprives himself of health. Meanwhile, however, God as a just judge punishes the drunkard by shortening his life.

VI. That whose cause was not physical cannot be called physical and natural. But the cause of the loss of the primeval image was not physical. Therefore. The major is clear in itself; because, as the cause is, so is the effect. The minor is clear; because the cause of the lost image was the fall of Adam, which was a morally evil act. Response: The cause of the loss of the divine image was both physical and moral; moral; when the first-formed, by sinning, incurred the penalty of God, who by a judicial act deprived them of original justice; physical; when the same, by a sinful act, expelled the co-created habit; just as one who takes poison both acts morally against himself and physically expels health.

Question XXVI. What practical use does the doctrine of the image of God confer?

Practical use. The doctrine of the image of God, drawn from the fount of Holy Scripture, pours forth a remarkable use into all parts of theology.

Proof. For from it, solidly perceived, we 1) call to memory the goodness of the creator, who by His most free grace communicated Himself to the first-created man, and wonderfully adorned him as a holy temple, which He was to fill with His gracious presence, with perfections most similar to His wisdom, holiness, purity, immortality, and power. 2) We recognize from this doctrine the abyss of misery into which man has fallen, having lost the image of God through the abuse of free will. For in place of the lost image, a horrible corruption of human nature has succeeded, through which we have been made guilty of divine wrath and eternal damnation. Into the intellect, alas, darkness has migrated in place of light, into the will iniquity in place of holiness, into the appetite depravity in place of rectitude, into the body fragility in place of immortality, into the whole life a heap of various calamities in place of pristine felicity. Remember, O man, from where you have fallen, and do penance, Rev. II, 5. 3) Fixed in amazement, we marvel at the abyss of divine mercy provoked by the merit of Christ. For Jesus, the author of our salvation, both by the fullest fulfillment of the divine law and by His bloody passion and satisfactory death, has merited for us the restoration of the divine image; from which He begins to reform the divine effigy in us through the Holy Spirit in this life, to complete that work of grace in eternal life, in which we shall be made like Him. 1 John III, 2.

SUSPIRIUM

*I*t comes to our memory most frequently, ETERNAL GOD, best and greatest creator of this universe, that You fashioned our first parents after the pattern of your wisdom, and impressed upon them a most brilliant image of Your holiness. Nothing can be said or imagined more splendid than that light of souls, nothing more beautiful than that adornment, nothing more excellent than that open pledge of divine goodness. We bitterly mourn the loss of so excellent a gift, of such incomparable perfection, brought about by the instigation of the devil and the consent of man, and we shudder with our whole heart that the gate of the devil has been introduced into human minds. But to You, SWEETEST JESUS, we give abundant thanks, that by the shedding of your blood you have opened a way for us to recover your effigy. Send, I beseech you, Your SPIRIT into our hearts, who may draw and paint the lines of your image in them, so that by the chaste morals of our life we may never not reflect you, O GOOD JESUS!

CHAPTER II. ON SIN IN GENERAL.

Question I. What is sin?

SIN IS A deviation from the divine law. It is more fully defined: Sin is a deviation from the divine law, binding rational creatures, culpable, and bringing temporal and eternal punishment. This definition is proven from 1 John III, 4, where sin is briefly described by St. John: ἡ ἁμαρτία ἐστὶν ἡ ἀνομία (sin is lawlessness).

Obs. 1) The word ἀνομία (lawlessness) is not translated in one way. It is certain that it is derived from ἄνομος (lawless). This adjective, ἄνομος, is known to sometimes denote him who is without law, or who has no law, from Rom. II, 12 and 1 Cor. IX, 21, but it generally denotes a wicked person who acts contrary to the laws. Whence ἀνομία could indeed be a state outside the law, or without law; Yet in scripture, as Dn. ERASM. SCHMIDIUS also well notes on this passage, it is never found used in that way; but always so that the alpha is ἐναντιωτικόν (adversative), or adversative, by which a certain contrariety is indicated, it is found. The Vulgate translates τὴν ἀνομίαν as "iniquity". But iniquity seems to imply more than sin considered in general. For every man freely confesses himself a sinner, but sometimes blushes to be called iniquitous. There are some who interpret it with one word, "illegality"; but this is neither accepted by the Latins, nor sufficiently clear. Indeed, the noun illex, which PLAUTUS uses, is the same to VALLA as exlex; in which way it agrees with the former meaning of ἄνομος, but not with the latter, which is of this place. Therefore, it is rendered by BEZA, ERASM. SCHMIDIO, and others as "transgression of the law". But this version too is not satisfactory, and restricts it rather to actual sin, than also including original sin. All these things being considered, by Dr. SEB. SCHMIDIO in colleg. bibl. poster. p. 135, it is rendered as "dislegality" or "contra-legality", so as to denote a non-conformity with the law. Moreover, ἀνομία is indeed one word, but virtually it contains two or more. To most theologians, the α in ἀνομία seems to be στερητικόν (privative), or privative, and in their opinion, it denotes privation, as the analogical genus of sin; but the difference is taken from the norm of justice, namely from the law, from which sin deflects. But Dr. JO. ADAM OSIANDER in theol. posit. p. 262 observes that the form of sin consists not in a mere privation, but also in a contrariety opposed to the law. Therefore, he defines sin as a transgression against the law, given and established by God, loc. cit. p. 260. We have described sin as a deviation from the law, by which privation is indeed indicated, but not a mere one, since a certain deviation from the law repugns the law hostilely and stubbornly.

Obs. 2) To the prior definition, which consists of an analogical genus and a difference, we have added a more verbose one, to also express the subject of inherence, which are rational creatures, or intelligent beings, angels and men, to whom the divine law was both inscribed and prescribed, so that their free will might be contained within the limits of moral goodness; and also the consequent, the guilt of fault and punishment. For sin is not only shameful and unbecoming for a rational creature, in which sense it is called culpable; but it also renders sinning creatures liable to temporal as well as eternal punishments.

Question II. From where is "peccatum" (sin) derived?

Etymology. "Peccatum" is said to be from pecco, and this from the Latin noun, pecus. Proof. For to sin (peccare) is to act like cattle (pecudes) without reason. Cf. JUL. CAESAR SCALIGER, 6.31 lat. lingu & BECMANN, orig. lat. lingu p. 818.

Question III. In how many ways is the word "sin" taken?

Homonymy. Sin in a general sense denotes any deflection from a rule; specifically, it designates a deflection from the rule of divine law. Proof. Sin, taken in a general sense, varies according to the variety of the rule from which it deflects. Thus, one is a natural sin, e.g., a monster; another is an artificial one, e.g., a statue incongruously crafted; another is a moral one, which is taken either in an ethical and political sense, or in a theological sense. To politicians, dealing in the civil forum, sin is an action, committed knowingly and willingly, against the natural, civil, and law of nations. They either ignore or think little of original sin and the internal movements of the appetite that precede reason. Theologically, however, any ἀνομία (lawlessness), or dislegality, is called sin, whether that ἀνομία is original or actual, whether it is committed ἄνευ προαίρεσεως (without deliberate choice), out of ignorance and infirmity, or whether it proceeds ἐκ τῆς προαίρεσεως (from deliberate choice), from a deliberate counsel of the mind.

Question IV. In how many ways is sin taken theologically?

Theologically, sin is considered in two ways: 1) abstractly, inasmuch as it denotes the dislegality itself, or discrepancy from the divine law; 2) concretely, inasmuch as it signifies both the dislegality and the act, or habit, to which the dislegality adheres. Proof. Theft comprises two things: a) ἀνομίαν (lawlessness) or discrepancy from the law, b) the extension of the hand, by which something is taken away against the law without the owner's consent.

Question V. What is the cause of sin?

The cause of sin. Of sin, viewed abstractly, there is no physical efficient cause a). But if it is considered concretely, it altogether has a physical efficient cause b). Proof a). A physical efficient cause is that which by a positive action produces a real and positive effect. But sin is a defect, not an effect; it is a privation, not a positive being; and therefore ἡ ἀνομία (the lawlessness) proceeds from no cause that is physically efficient. Proof b). Sin, viewed concretely, is an act or habit to which ἀνομία (lawlessness) adheres; which act or habit, since it is something positive, certainly depends on a physical cause, e.g., the physical cause of that blow by which Abel was killed was Cain.

Question VI. What is the moral cause of sin viewed abstractly?

The moral cause of sin, viewed abstractly, is an intelligent creature, not determined to good, whose free and mutable will deflects from the divine law, and thus willingly fails in acting. Proof. In the moral sphere, an efficient cause is one that does not produce τὴν ἀνομίαν (the lawlessness), or dislegality, since it is a defect, with a real and positive influx, but nevertheless intends it directly or indirectly, so that in view of that intention the ἀνομία is imputed to it, no differently than if it had produced it with a real influx; e.g. If someone commits an action which he knows is conjoined with ἀνομίαν, in the moral sphere he is said to be the cause of the dislegality itself, or of sin, taken abstractly. Others prefer to call it a deficient cause, with AUGUSTINE in book XII of The City of God, c. VI, namely, that if the agent is considered precisely in order to ἀνομίαν, not by reason of any influx, but by reason of some defect in causing, or because it does not act conformably, it is said to be its cause. Indeed, the apostle John expressly says in his Epistle, c. III, 4. He who commits sin (τὴν ἁμαρτίαν), at the same time commits lawlessness (τὴν ἀνομίαν), namely, by this very fact, that he does τὸ ἀνομιον (the lawless thing), which is discrepant from the law. Now, intelligent creatures, angels and men, deflecting from the rule of the divine law, do τὸ ἀνομιον, which they know to be deformed from the divine law. Therefore, ἡ ἀνομία is imputed to them, just as if they had provided a real influx into the dislegality itself; therefore, they are the moral causes of sin, viewed abstractly. Yet the same rational creatures can be called deficient causes of sin, because when they are considered precisely in order to τὴν ἀνομίαν, not because of a positive influx provided into it, but because of a certain defect in acting, or a deviation from the rule, they are denominated the causes of τὴν ἀνομίαν. This is inculcated in the Augsburg Confession, art. XIX. "Concerning the cause of sin, they teach that although God creates and preserves nature, yet the cause of sin is the will of the wicked, namely of the devil and of the impious, which, without God's help, turns itself away from God, as Christ says, John VIII, 44. When he speaks a lie, he speaks from his own."

Question VII. Is God the cause of sin?

God is neither the moral a), nor the physical cause of sin b).

Proof a. The moral cause of sin is that which intends it, so that by reason of an efficacious intention it can be imputed to it; But God in no way intends sin; Therefore. The minor is proven: 1) God is most holy and good by essence, Matthew XIX, 17. Therefore, without compromising His holiness and goodness, He cannot intend evil. 2) God does not will sin; Therefore He does not intend that it be committed. The antecedent is clear from Ps. V, 5, 6, 7. "For you are not a God who approves of impiety, the evil man will not dwell with you; the boastful will not stand before your eyes; You have hated all workers of iniquity." God so detests sin that He in no way approves it, but excludes sinners from the communion of His grace, and pursues them with hatred. But He who so disapproves of sin that He excludes offenders from the communion of His grace and burns with hatred against them, neither directly nor indirectly intends that sin be perpetrated by any creature. 3) God incites, allures, or solicits no one to sin. This St. James teaches most clearly in c. 1, 13. "Let no one, when he is tempted, say, 'I am tempted by God.'" Ο γὰρ θεὸς ἀπειράτος ἐστὶ κακῶν (For God cannot be tempted by evil); whence He Himself also tempts no one. The Apostle uses an argument of great weight; Whoever stands out with such constant and immutable holiness that he does not permit himself to be incited to evil by any temptation, he solicits no one to evil; But God, etc. Therefore. The major is manifest; because every direct temptation to evil, both active and passive, is repugnant to essential and immutable holiness. He to whom all incitement to evil is hateful, neither receives temptation to evil into himself, nor solicits another to evil. 4) Specifically, that God is not the author or cause of the Adamic fall is proven: a) because God had adorned the first man with an image most like Himself, and had inwardly perfected him, Gen. 1, 26, 27, and therefore had not created him prone to sin. b) The causes of the Adamic fall, as Moses relates, were the devil seducing and man freely consenting, Gen. III, 1 ff. c) God had most gravely forbidden sin to the first-formed humans under the threat of punishment. Gen. II, 17. d) God vindicated the committed sin with the greatest punishment. But He whose avenger God is, is not its author. 5) Of sins that have arisen, or have been derived from the first sin to posterity, the cause is not God, but a) the devil, who did not stand in the truth and is the father of lies, John VIII, 44, for whom nothing is prior or more ancient than to blind the minds of men, 2 Cor. IV, 4, to work in the children of unbelief, Eph. II, 2, and to hold them captive, 2 Tim. II, 26.; b) the world lying in wickedness, 1 John V, 19, which whoever loves, in him there is not the love of the Father, 1 John II, 15.; c) the inclination of the will to evil, Rom. III, 12.; the concupiscence of the flesh, by which men are drawn away from good and enticed to evil, James 1, 14.

Proof b. That God is not the physical cause of sin, taken concretely, or of the sinful act and habit, is clearly established; since God, as the universal cause, concurs with all actions of creatures, and therefore also with those actions of men that are evil, but not inasmuch as they are evil; He concurs, I say, with actions as they are unlimited and indifferent physical motions, not as they are determined to a certain object. Hence it happens that God, on account of His general and indeterminate concurrence with the evil actions of men, is not called their physical cause. The reason is; because the determination and specification of acts, and the denomination which depends on them, is not from the universal cause, but from the particular. Therefore, the latter, not the former, is called the cause of the disordered or irregular motion. Thus, the gait of a lame person, insofar as it is motion, depends on the locomotive faculty of the soul, but not insofar as it is a deformed and disordered motion; for this proceeds from another cause supervening from without, a fall, a break, or a collision of the foot. Therefore, not the soul or its locomotive faculty, but the dislocated or bruised foot, is called the physical cause of the lameness. By the same reasoning, when a thief extends his hand to steal the goods of another, that extension of the hand depends both on God, as the universal cause, and on the thief, as the particular cause; on God, as it is an indifferent and indeterminate action; on the thief, inasmuch as it is an action determined to stealing another's goods without the owner's consent. Wherefore, not God, but the thief is denominated the physical cause of that sinful action; for not the former, but the latter, fails in acting.

The antithesis is 1) of the ancient heretics, Simon Magus, the Valentinians, Manicheans, Marcionites, Priscillianists, for whom it was no matter of conscience to call God the cause of sins; 2) of the Socinians, who likewise constitute God the cause of sin. Their more important arguments are:

I. God hardens and blinds men; Therefore God is the cause of sin. The consequence is clear; because hardening and blinding is a great sin. The antecedent is proven from Exod. VII, 3; Rom. IX, 18; Isa. VI, 6. Response: God does not harden men causally or effectively, by putting hardness into the hearts of men, but judicially, permissively, and by desertion. For hardening is a judicial act, by which, on account of antecedent voluntary and avoidable malice, God justly permits a habitually evil man to rush into more grievous crimes, and withdraws His grace from him, and finally delivers him to the power of Satan, by whom he is propelled into ever greater sins, until he finally falls from the right of the celestial inheritance. See KOENIG, theol. positiv. p. 99. Furthermore, it can be said that Pharaoh was hardened by God first ἐκβατικῶς (eventually), or eventually and occasionally; not as if God by His own intention presented an occasion for hardening to Pharaoh, but because Pharaoh, since he was neither immediately taken from life, nor was all his power utterly confounded, from the kindness and long-suffering of God, which he wickedly abused, seized the occasion to harden his own mind. See FRANZ, de interpr. S scriptura qu. 24. & 26. Afterwards, God hardened Pharaoh δικαστικῶς (judicially), or judicially. Instance: God is said to have raised up Pharaoh to demonstrate His power to him. Rom. IX, 17. Therefore, God effectively hardened him by an internal impulse. Response: 1) Not an excitation to hardening, but a preservation of life, in the Hebrew manner, is indicated in that passage. For in Exodus IX, 16 (from which place Paul's words are taken) the word העמדתיך (I have made you stand) is used, i.e., I did not strike you suddenly and cut you off from the earth, but I made you to subsist, that you might most humbly acknowledge my power, and perform serious repentance for your sins, and thus all nations might be invited to the veneration of my name. (*) 2) Pharaoh effectively hardened himself, Exod. VIII, 32.

II. Whoever sends upon men a strong delusion is the cause of sin; for error in matters of faith is no light sin. But God, etc. 2 Thess. II, 11. Therefore. Response by limiting: Whoever causally and with positive influx sends upon men a strong delusion is the cause of sin; I grant it. But the most holy God, on account of men's preceding sins, sends a strong delusion, partly permissively, by permitting effective errors, partly negatively, by withdrawing perfecting and fully illuminating grace.

III. Whoever commands a man to sin is the cause of sin; But God, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven, 1) by the example of Abraham, whom God commanded to kill his own son, Gen. XXII, 2.; 2) by the example of Shimei, whom God ordered to curse his king, 2 Sam. XVI, 10, which is established to be a very great sin from Exod. XXII, 28. Response: I deny the minor. To the first example, we say that God is the author and lord of life; by whose command, he who takes another's life does not sin. But to the latter we respond that that sin was at the same time a punishment, and thus an action with respect to Shimei, a passion with respect to David. The sinful action proceeded from the malevolent mind of Shimei, and at the instigation of the devil; which when God foresaw, He said (it is not in the Hebrew source: He ordered) to Shimei, i.e., He granted the power, that by the curse, which he himself had conceived in his mind by the instinct of the devil, he might afflict the exiled David, so that he might be brought all the more to the acknowledgment and detestation of his own sin. From this was born the very common verse; The action displeased; the passion was pleasing.

(*) That this is so, the entire series of words declares, and especially if we compare Rom. IX, v. 17 with 22. The legate of Christ commemorates the example of Pharaoh with this counsel, to illustrate the general saying, in which he 1) makes mention of the wrath of God, which is nothing other than just vengeance, 2) proclaims all the gentleness of God and the slowness of his wrath, and this indeed is for the very purpose that the sinning man, still preserved and tolerated, may be granted space for deliberation and repentance, so that at length, fearing God, he may return to a good life, 2 Peter III, 9. And that Greek rendering, ἐξήγειρά σε (I have raised you up), denotes the preservation of life, and that indeed which is an indication of tolerance and slowness of wrath, by which God wishes to lead man to repent of his deed. Besides, God is said to harden, in the way that Jeremiah is said to uproot, break down, destroy, utterly overthrow, not by effecting, but by predicting, Jerem. I, 10.

IV. Whoever leads us into temptation is the cause of sin. But God, etc. E. The minor is clear from Matthew VI, 13, where we pray against divine temptations. Response; I distinguish a) between the temptation of trial and of seduction. God leads us effectively into the former, not into the latter. b) God indeed permits men to be led into the temptation of seduction, but He does not impel the enemies of the soul to it.

V. Whoever makes vessels of wrath is the cause of sin. But God, etc. Rom. IX, 22. E. Response; A ψευδερμηνεία (false interpretation) is being committed. For the vessels of wrath were prepared for destruction not by God (since the context does not teach this); but by themselves. For God is said to tolerate the vessels of wrath. Whatever someone tolerates, he neither does it himself, nor does he intend for it to be done by others.

VI. Whoever incites a man to pride is the cause of sin. But God, etc. E. The minor is clear from 2 Sam. XXIV, 1, where God is said to have incited David to number the people. Response; God is said to have moved David to number the people not by an efficacious suggestion, but by a judicial permission, inasmuch as He granted power to Satan, on account of preceding sins, by punishing David with an instigation to sin. For a) 1 Chron. XXI, 1, Satan is said to have instigated David. Namely, God permissively; Satan effectively, and by himself, instigates. b) The verb הסיף (to incite) in Hiphil conveniently admits a permissive signification, which the parallel passage requires. c) If God instigated effectively, David merited not punishment, but praise and rewards, by obeying God.

VII. God ordered the Israelites to despoil the Egyptians, Exod. XI, 2. E. he is the cause of sin. Response; The Israelites, the goods which they took from the Egyptians, did not steal, but the supreme Lord of things had assigned the same as wages for the labors endured for many years. Nor did they experience the former masters as unwilling, but as compliant, with God reconciling, and transferring dominion to them. You say; A borrower, stealing a thing borrowed for a certain use, steals. Response; Unless it is assigned to the possessor by the authority of either the supreme proprietor or the supreme judge.

VIII. God is said to have given the Gentiles over to impurity, Rom. 1, 24. Therefore He intended for the Gentiles to live impurely. Response; God gave the Gentiles over to impurity, not by impelling their minds to impurity, but by a just judgment permitting them to their own desires and delivering them into the power of Satan, who as a most impure spirit instilled in them an ever fouler impurity.

IX. Whoever by his decree delivered the Lord Jesus to Pilate, Herod, the Jews, and the crucifiers, to be mocked and killed by them, is the cause of sin. But God, etc. Acts II, 23; Acts IV, 28. Response; 1) I distinguish between the passion of Christ and the sinful action of the Jews; 2) between permission and approbation. God had indeed decreed that the Lord Jesus should redeem the human race through a most bitter passion and reconcile it to God, but He did not impel the Jews to the most cruel action, or crucifixion. For the passion could have happened in other ways. However, He permitted the foreseen crucifixion, and directed the permitted act to a good end. Therefore the crucifixion, insofar as it was a most monstrous action of the Jews, is to be attributed neither to a divine impulse nor to a decree of approbation, but only to divine permission and direction. But insofar as the crucifixion of Christ is taken passively, as it was a notable part of the passion of Christ, it was certainly pleasing and approved by God.

X. God delivered the wives of David into the hands of Absalom, that he might lie with them, 2 Sam. XII, 11, 12. Therefore He is the author of the illicit intercourse. Response; The incest of Absalom comprises two things; 1) a moral evil, or sin; 2) a troublesome evil, or punishment. God permitted the moral evil, so that Absalom, delivered to the devil, might perpetrate it; but God directed that evil deed into a most grievous punishment for David, which he had merited by his adultery with Bathsheba. This punishment excited a greater penitence in the mind of David, the harsher it was.

XI. God is said to do evil. For He made evil for the day of evil, Prov. XVI, 4. There is no evil in the city, which the Lord has not done. Amos III, 6. Response; I distinguish between the evil of punishment and of fault. God by His governance makes it so that an unhappy day befalls the impious man; and the punishment that is inflicted upon a city immersed in sins is sent by the most just God.

Question VIII. Is God piously and rightly called the cause of sin per accidens?

God is neither piously nor truly called the cause of sin per accidens.

Proof: 1) Because the origin of sin is plainly not to be reduced to God, but to a particular cause deficient in acting, or deviating from the rule of the law. For sin formally is a defect, not an effect. Therefore, it proceeds neither per se nor per accidens from God, who is most perfect in acting. 2) God is the cause per accidens neither of the first sin, nor of subsequent sin. For if the first sin were to be imputed to God, it would be imputed to Him either because He co-created free will in the first man; or because He foresaw the fall of man, and yet did not prevent it. But in neither way is God piously and truly called the cause of sin per accidens; not in the former way; because a cause per accidens takes its denomination from an actual influx, not from a most remote power of sinning granted; not in the latter way; because no one is called the cause of sin per se or per accidens on account of foreseeing it. But God restrained sin with a sufficient moral impediment, by prescribing the law to the protoplasts, and by annexing a most severe threat. But He is bound by no law to oppose sin with a physical and violent impediment (*). Nor is God the cause per accidens of subsequent sin. For that is both original and actual. But God is not the cause per accidens of original sin; because that is propagated through the generation of parents; nor of actual sin; because its cause is the devil and the perverse will of man. 3) The phrase, "God is the cause of sin per accidens," is repugnant to a) divine holiness. For if God were the cause per accidens of injustice, He would do unjust things per accidens. b) It is repugnant to divine wisdom, because a cause per accidens is said to be one which produces an effect apart from its intention, whether this happens through ignorance or through thoughtlessness. But whatever God does, He does by a most wise decree and a provident intention. 4) That phrase is not necessary. For the ancient doctors of the church solidly explained those sayings of scripture which are objected against us, and yet they did not call God the cause of sin per accidens.

The antithesis is of certain Theologians, to whom the phrase: "God is the cause of sin per accidens," does not seem to be disapproved of (**). We will consider their arguments:

(*) For it cannot indeed be done, unless God should wish either to deprive man of all powers and all faculty of acting, so that he cannot even act well (but this would be adverse both to divine goodness and to the moral nature of man); or to perform miracles as often as man should use his faculty of acting badly (and this would be contrary to divine wisdom).

(**) A cause per accidens is indeed wont to be defined in various ways. Either thus; if someone unknowingly and improvidently effects something, while doing something else, by some chance intervening, e.g., when a woodcutter, not looking around, strikes with his axe and kills someone standing behind him. But who would dare to say that God in any matter acts either unknowingly, or negligently and incautiously? Or in this manner; if some accident should adhere either to the efficient cause itself (as, if someone skilled in the art of music should contribute something with his own hand to the construction of a building; thus he is properly and strictly said to be a cause per accidens, which plainly cannot be accommodated to God and the sin of man); or to the effect of a cause, and indeed apart from, nay even against, the will and counsel of this cause (of which sort it is, if a good man should beget a degenerate son; but thus the name of cause is used improperly). Hence some of our Theologians judge, among them the blessed HIER. KROMAIER, in his theol. posit. polem. p. 326, that on account of the improper, and therefore ambiguous, signification of the name, one should abstain from that manner of speaking. But indeed, if we wish to speak accurately, in no way at all can that be called a cause per accidens which they wish to be considered so improperly named. For for every efficient cause, by whatever name it may come, whether efficient per se or per accidens, a certain efficacious operation is required, apt and directed to this very effect, or, as it is commonly said, a causal influx. If therefore some accident is in no way consonant with, but indeed contrary to, a certain efficient cause and its operation; certainly this cause can in no way be referred to that accident, an effect arising from elsewhere. Suppose it happens to a certain machine, skillfully constructed, through the injury of a wicked man, that it is corrupted and destroyed; who, I ask, would

I. Whoever permits sin (***), which he could have prevented, is the cause of sin per accidens. But God, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because permission makes a moral cause.

Response: I deny the major; because the mere permission of some act implies no denomination of cause, unless one is bound to prevent it. But he who does not prevent an act, but permits it, which he was both bound and able to prevent, is the cause per se (in the moral sphere) of that committed act, not per accidens. But what law can bind God to prevent sin? Indeed, the most holy deity had fortified the first man with sufficiently strong aids to avoid the fall. What's more, He had opposed a legal impediment to sin. He was not obligated to oppose a violent restraint, since man had lost the pristine powers, which the image of God comprised, by a voluntary abuse of free will.

II. He who withdraws from sinners the grace by which sin could have been averted is the cause of sin per accidens. But God, etc.; Therefore. The major is clear; because a removing and prohibiting cause is a cause per accidens. Response: 1) I deny the major. For he who withdraws his grace, which someone abuses, is the cause of subsequent sins neither per se nor per accidens. God, as a most just judge, withdraws from offenders that grace which they have shamefully abused. 2) God does not withdraw all converting grace from the sinner. For converting, prevenient, and knocking grace remains for the sinner, through the inherent and written law. Indeed, access to the gospel and the sacraments is also open. 3) If God so withdrew His grace from a sinner that sin would necessarily follow that withdrawal, as the fall of a stone necessarily follows the withdrawal of a column supporting it; He would be the cause of sin per se, not per accidens.

III. Whoever defers the punishment due to sins is the cause of sin per accidens. But God, etc. Therefore. The major is established by the example of a magistrate, who, while he allows sins to run rampant with impunity, nourishes and strengthens them. Response: Whoever defers the punishment due to sins out of negligence and connivance is the think the craftsman himself should be said, by whatever metonymy, to be the cause per accidens of that corruption or destruction, when he himself indeed made that machine with a very good plan, but contributed not the least thing to that accident and its effect? Whatever is not the cause of an accident, is neither the cause of the effect of that which arises from the accident, nor can it be said to be.

(***) This which our adversaries oppose to us is said very ambiguously, and therefore must be explained distinctly. To wit, if someone is said to permit a certain action, it can be understood in four ways. To permit is 1) to give leave to someone in a certain matter, with impunity licit and honest, yet circumscribed by certain limits and cautions (for some laws indeed prescribe a necessary and commanded action, while others permit a useful and licit action, e.g., Genesis IX, 3; 1 Cor. VII, 25; VIII, 8, 9; Rom. XIV, 2, 14, 20); 2) not to care about the action of another, by which one is neither violated nor delighted, and which does not pertain to him at all; so do as you please, it is permitted by me; 3) not to oppose the sinner with moral impediments, laws, reasons, exhortations, promises, threats, as 1 Sam. III, 13; 4) not to impede and prohibit the sinner by violent coercion, although neither power nor authority is lacking, but to tolerate the one acting unjustly, and to defer for a time the punishment denounced against him, Rom. II, 4, 5; 2 Peter III, 9. The first meaning is not of this place, nor the second, nor the third; but the fourth. God permits sin by tolerating, and not violently impeding, and dragging man to good as if with a twisted neck, Ps. LXXXI, 13; Acts XIV, 16, meanwhile, however, bearing it indignantly, which is the force of the word, ὑπερίδων (overlooking), Acts XVII, 30. You might say: If God permitted sin, therefore He wills it? For every permission is a certain action of the free will. Response: He certainly wills; but what does he will, and to what extent? Namely this, that He Himself permits it, and to the extent that He permits it; that is, He does not will that sin be committed, but to tolerate it, until the day appointed for judgment, unless the man repents, and not to apply force to prevent it. Therefore some Theologians have wisely distinguished these two: It is one thing, "God, willing, permits"; another, "permitting, He wills sin." Not the latter is to be thought, as if God permitting willed sin itself, insofar as it is sin; but the former, since God, not unwillingly, nor impotently, but according to His most free will and power, permits and allows man to sin, insofar as this permission is a notable document of the admirable tolerance and gentleness of God.

cause of sin. But God defers punishment with the intention that by His long-suffering man may be invited to repent, Rom. II, 4.

IV. He who nourishes and sustains a sinner is the cause of sin per accidens; But God, etc. Therefore. Response: He who nourishes and sustains a sinner, insofar as he sins, is the cause of moral sin. But God nourishes and preserves man, insofar as he is a creature, to whom sin adheres, the origin of which is to be vindicated to the particular and proximate cause deficient in acting, not to the first and universal cause acting most wisely and perfectly.

V. Whoever orders and directs sins to a good end is the cause of sins per accidens. But God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because we elicit good from evil per accidens. The minor is established by the example of Joseph, whose persecution God directed to a good end. Gen. I, 20. Response: 1) Whoever directs sins, as means destined by himself, to a good end, is the cause of sins per accidens; I grant. But God destined sins not as means leading per se to an end, but because He foresaw that they would certainly happen, He advanced them to a good end. 2) The divine ordering to an end does not make sins, but presupposes them already made.

VI. When with an effect intended per se, another unintended effect is joined, the former is the cause per accidens of the latter unintended effect. But with an effect intended by God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear from the definition of a cause per accidens. The minor is clear; because all human actions depend on God as the first cause, with which sins, not intended by God, cohere. Response: A cause per accidens must be rightly explained. An unintended effect is said to be that which happens apart from the intention due to the ignorance, inadvertence, or impotence of the agent. But God is omniscient, all-wise, and omnipotent, who foresees that sin adheres to the action of the creature which He sustains, and intends to prevent it both by prohibiting and by threatening punishments; yet He does not inhibit the foreseen sin by a violent means, because He is neither going to make an irrational being out of a rational creature, nor is He going to employ extraordinary remedies when the sinner petulantly rejects ordinary remedies.

VII. The cause of a cause is also the cause of the thing caused; But God is the cause of free will, as the cause of sins; E. and He is the cause of the sins themselves. Response: The major is valid for essentially subordinated causes. But free will and sin do not cohere essentially, but the latter is from the abuse of the former. Certainly the angels, confirmed in good, had free will from the first moment of creation, and yet they did not sin.

VIII. If the word of God is the cause of sin per accidens, then God Himself can be the cause of sin per accidens. The antecedent is true, E. and the consequent. The consequence of the major is clear; because the word of God is a concept of the mind of God. But whatever happens to the divine mind, happens to God Himself. The antecedent is proven, because the word of God per accidens is the odor of death unto death, 2 Cor. II, 15. Response: The word of God is the intermediate cause, God is the principal cause. Not everything that is said of the intermediate cause can be affirmed of the principal cause. Nor is the word of God accurately called the cause of sin per accidens, although to the impious it is the odor of death unto death; because the gospel does not kill anyone, but the contempt of it does.

IX. Christ is a stone of stumbling per accidens, Rom. IX, 32. E. He is the cause of sin per accidens. Response: Christ does not actively offend men per accidens, but the Jews took scandal from the preaching and cross of Christ.

Question IX. Who is the sinner?

The subject of sin. The sinner is a rational creature, endowed with free will, and subject to the divine law, deviating from this in doing and omitting a). And he is either a fallen angel b), or a wayfaring man c).

Proof a. Only a rational creature is capable of divine law. Therefore, it alone is capable of sin. The antecedent is established from the fact that the divine law was given and established for those creatures who know the divine law, and whose freedom of will, lest it wander beyond decorum, must be restrained by the reins of laws.

Proof b. Fallen angels are called sinners, 2 Peter II, 4. God did not spare the angels who sinned. But it is not relevant to treat of angelic sin more fully here, since in this part II of theology, man the sinner is to be considered as being brought back to God.

Proof c. There is no man who does not sin, 1 Kings VIII, 46. Namely, all wayfaring men are sinners, both the protoplasts and their posterity, descending from them by carnal generation, so that Christ alone is to be excepted, Heb. VII, 26.

Question X. Does sin also fall upon brute animals?

Sin, properly so called, does not fall upon brute animals, due to a defect of intellect and free will.

Proof. Beasts, just as they are incapable of divine law and holiness, so they are devoid of sin. There are in them semblances of virtues and vices, not true virtues or vices; for they act necessarily by all that is required for acting, without προαίρεσιν (deliberate choice). You say: Beasts are capable of punishment; Therefore also of sins. Response: Punishment is taken either materially and physically, for any painful suffering whatsoever, or morally and formally, for a painful suffering that presupposes fault. In the former, not the latter sense, beasts are said to be afflicted with punishments, e.g., Genesis IX, 5. For properly speaking, punishments are inflicted on those creatures with whom it rested that they should not sin.

Question XI. Is both the soul and the body the seat of sin?

The subject wherein sin resides. The primary seat of sin is the soul, with its faculties, acts, and habits a). The secondary seat is the body b).

Proof a. Just as the image of God principally perfected the soul of the whole man with wisdom and justice; so sin, which succeeded in the place of the divine image, first infected the soul with foolishness and injustice. The faculties of the soul are the intellect and the appetite, both rational (the will) and sensitive. But these faculties chiefly deflect from the divine law: the intellect through ignorance, opinion, and error; the will through the choice of not a true, but an apparent good; the sensitive appetite through a blind impulse toward a good that is indeed pleasant to the senses, but forbidden by divine law.

Proof b. The organic body of man serves the sinning soul in offending. From which Paul distinguishes moral impurity into the defilement of the flesh and of the spirit, 2 Cor. VII, 1. The fornicator sins against his own body, 1 Cor. VI, 18, the members of the impious are instruments of injustice, Rom. VI, 13.

Obs. I. In philosophical terms, this doctrine is proposed in the following manner.

The matter in which, or the subject of sin, are both fallen angels and men. With respect to man, the subject of sin is either total or partial. The total is the whole man, who ultimately receives his denomination from sin. The partial is either primary or secondary. The primary, or πρῶτον δεκτικόν (the first recipient), is the soul, with its powers or faculties; the secondary is the body.

Obs. II. By the material of sin, taken abstractly, theologians generally understand not man, or the soul, but that which is joined with ἀνομία (lawlessness), whether it be an innate quality, an acquired habit, or an act deviating from the law. e.g., In original sin, the subject of ἀνομίας is concupiscence, in theft it is the extension of the hand to another's goods.

Obs. III. The material of sin is either remote or proximate. The remote is the action considered generally, as an indeterminate physical motion; the proximate is the action applied or determined to an object prohibited by divine law, e.g. When a thief extends his hand, the extension of the hand is an indeterminate physical motion; But the extension of the hand to the stolen object is the proximate material of sin. God concurs with the remote material of sin; because He grants only motion in general, and sustains the creature in acting; but He does not determine the motion itself to this species of vice.

Question XII. What is the rule, or norm, from which sin deviates?

The norm of sin. The primary and adequate norm, from which sin deviates, is the divine law, and that natural, or moral, inscribed in the minds of the protoplasts a), but so obliterated by their fall, that meager remnants of it remained after the fall b). And therefore it was repeatedly stated by God through special revelations made to the patriarchs, and finally solemnly promulgated on Mount Sinai, the sum of which is contained in the decalogue, and is explained more clearly throughout the sacred letters c).

Proof a. The natural law commands those things which are honest in themselves, and prohibits those things which are shameful in themselves. Sins are shameful in themselves, unbecoming a rational creature. This natural law obligates all men to obedience, or, if this is absent, to punishment, both because it has as its author God, most wise, best, and most powerful, the creator and lord of all men; and because it commands those things which are suitable for a rational creature, as such, and prohibits those things which are unsuitable for it. The same is called moral law, because it directs the morals of men, and composes them to the nod of the divine will (although moral law, sometimes taken specially, only denotes the law extrinsically promulgated). Moreover, the law of nature, inscribed with the image of God in the protoplasts, could not but have been most known to them. For an excellent knowledge of principles was conferred upon them, and the faculty of applying them to individual actions and the circumstances of actions.

Proof b. By the fall of our first parents, that part of the inherent law of nature was lost which prohibits and convicts of interior sins, namely original sin, first motions, and evil thoughts. Hence it is that today the inscribed law of nature is not an adequate norm for knowing every single sin. Indeed, Paul himself could not know that concupiscence is a sin, except from the written law (which says in express words: You shall not covet Deut. V, 21.), Rom. VII, 7. Wherefore, a careful distinction must be made between a partial and confused knowledge of sins, which is had even after the fall from the inherent law of nature (for the gentiles, who do not have the law (the written law of Moses), do by nature the things of the law; these, although they do not have the law, are a law to themselves; since they show the work of the law written in their hearts); and between a full and distinct knowledge of sins, which must be sought from the divinely prescribed law. Moreover, the inscribed natural law and the prescribed moral law are materially the same, although they differ formally from it. For the former is congenital, the latter is superadded to the congenital law of nature to supply its defect, and to show the guilt of eternal death, which inseparably accompanies sin.

Proof c. CHEMNITZ in L. de leg. Dei p. 20 accurately teaches that God, from the beginning of the world until the flood, and then from Noah until Moses, declared the natural law to the patriarchs. The Decalogue, however, solemnly promulgated on Mount Sinai, exhibits the sum of the law of nature with singular brevity, Exod. XX, succinctly embracing whatever pertains to the love of God and neighbor. Wherefore the Sinaitic law, contained in the decalogue as an epitome of the natural law, and explained more clearly throughout the sacred scripture, is for the present time for us an adequate rule and standard for discerning and judging good and bad works. Paul referred to this, in Rom. III, 20, saying: "Through the law is the knowledge of sin" (both theoretical and practical). For he speaks of that law which is joined with the law of the prophets, v. 21, and is contrasted with the law of faith, v. 27.

Question XIII. Are the positive divine law, and human law, also a norm of sin?

The secondary and particular norm for knowing sins is the positive divine law a) and human law, enacted by a magistrate b), unless the latter contradicts the divine law c).

Proof a. Positive divine law deals with those things which would be neither morally good nor bad works, unless God by His most free will had commanded or prohibited them. Therefore, positive divine law obligates not all men, nor perpetually (*), but only those to whom it is prescribed, and as long as it was in force by the will of God; of which sort was the paradisiacal law about not eating the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, as well as the ceremonial and forensic law of the Old Testament. The obligation of this positive law is founded in the law of nature, which commands that God is to be obeyed in all things; whoever does otherwise, sins.

Proof b. Human law, enacted by a magistrate, obligates mediately, in that it is founded on divine law, which commands that the magistrate is to be obeyed.

Proof c. If human law contradicts divine law, that apostolic saying holds, Acts V, 29: "We ought to obey God rather than men."

Question XIV. Are human actions, by which the moral law of God is violated, evil in themselves? or only

(*) The divine law, which is indeed usually called positive, is rightly divided into common, or, as they mostly say, universal, and particular. The former pertains to all men, the latter not so. The law given in paradise, concerning the forbidden tree, was indeed positive, but it was nevertheless common, by which Adam and Eve were obligated not only as humans, but also as the first humans and the common parents of the entire human race, wherefore their offense is also rightly attributed to their entire posterity.

because God by His free will has prohibited them in His law?

Human actions by which the moral law of God is violated are evil per se; and even if no written law of God existed for avoiding them, they would be by nature shameful, and by no means indifferent.

Proof: 1) The inscribed natural law, and the morally prescribed law, are materially the same. But the natural law prohibits that which is shameful per se. 2) Hatred of God, blasphemy, perjury, impiety towards parents, adultery, etc., are not sins because they are forbidden by written law; but they are prohibited by law because they are adverse to the eternal law, which is in God, namely to the wisdom, holiness, and essential justice of God (*).

The antithesis is of Durandus and other Scholastics, who state that no human acts are evil per se, but are only considered sinful because they have been forbidden by divine law. They object:

I. If the adequate norm of sins is the moral law of God; no human action is evil per se, but only because God by His free will has prohibited it in His law; But the former is most certain; Therefore also the latter. The consequence of the major is proven; because God, constrained by no necessity, bound by no obligation, made His law, but promulgated it by His free will, both by voice and by writing, so that it might be established for men what was morally good, and what was evil. Take away this law, and you will at once posit indifference; for if there is no law, there is no transgression, Rom. IV, 15. Response: 1) It was indeed free for God to prescribe His law to men; but having posited that He willed to make it, or did make it, He could not but make a law that was holy and conformable to His justice. But sin is adverse to divine justice. 2) Even if the written law of God did not exist, the law implanted in nature would still dictate that at least external sins are shameful in themselves, because they are unsuitable for a rational creature as such.

II. Sin is ἀνομία (lawlessness). Therefore, it is opposed not to divine justice, but to the law, established by the free will of God.

Response: Sin is opposed immediately to the law, mediately to divine justice, of which the law is, as it were, an expressed image. The law is the manifesting principle of sin; but the holiness of God is the radical principle of good, to which sin is repugnant.

III. If sins were evil per se; God could have commanded neither the sacrifice of Isaac to Abraham, nor the despoiling of the Egyptians to the Israelites; But He commanded both the latter and the former; E. Response: Human life, and the goods of fortune (as they are commonly called) depend on divine dominion. Therefore, when the supreme lord of life and faculties commands another to take away life or wealth, for grave reasons, neither homicide nor theft is committed.

Question XV. In what does sin formally consist?

The form of sin. Sin formally consists in the privation of conformity with the divine law, which man is obligated to observe.

Proof. Moses describes sin as not remaining in all things which are prescribed in the law, Deut. XXVII, 26. And John as ἀνομίαν (lawlessness), dislegality. Both imply that sin is a privation of conformity with the divine law, to the perfect obedience of which man is obligated by his dependence on the creator. Sin is therefore a defect of moral rectitude, which ought to be present in man, or the absence of the image of God, with which man, by virtue of the divine intention, ought to be adorned. Moreover, sin is indeed a true privation, but not a mere one; because it not only turns man away from the will of God, declared in the law; but also opposes it. Nor is only due rectitude taken away by sin, but also an undue determination to acts prohibited by law is posited, and a disordered disposition of the soul, which is certainly something morally positive.

You say: Not every sin is ἀνομία (lawlessness), or a deviation from the law; but there is also a sin which is a deviation from the gospel, namely ἀπιστία (unbelief), or unbelief in Christ, which the law does not prohibit, because it knows nothing of Christ. Response: 1) I distinguish between the law alone, or considered separately, and illuminated by the light of the gospel. The law alone knows nothing of faith, or ἀπιστία (unbelief) in Christ, but when illuminated by the light of the gospel it prohibits and condemns the same. 2) Unbelief is considered either with respect to its genus, or with respect to a certain object. In the former way, it can and must be referred only to the law; in the latter way, in place of an object, it respects either God as lawgiver, or, according to the gospel, it has Christ the mediator as its object. This respect does not change the genus of unbelief, but only varies the object, so that unbelief, although it is directed directly at Christ, nevertheless strikes against the first precept of the decalogue, which commands to believe in God, in whatever way He is considered, whether as creator and preserver, or as lawgiver, or as redeemer.

(*) Indeed, they are also utterly adverse to human nature, and natural laws are so named because they command actions necessary for the preservation of the nature of men and of human society, and forbid those contrary to it. For since God, in His kindness, willed to create human nature thus, and not otherwise, He could not sanction other laws than those suitable, and therefore necessary, for it. The contrary could not be done, for it would be a manifest contradiction.

Question XVI. Does τὸ ἐκούσιον (the voluntary) enter into the very definition of sin?

τὸ ἐκούσιον (the voluntary) does not enter into the definition of sin considered generally.

Obs. 1. A sin is called voluntary either subjectively, inasmuch as it inheres in the will, or efficiently, as it proceeds from a deliberate will. In the latter way, not every sin is voluntary.

Obs. II. A sin is called voluntary either formally, which is committed by one's own will; or virtually, which was voluntary in the root and stock of the human race, from which it was propagated to posterity; whose will would have been the same as Adam's, if they had lived at the same time with him.

Proof: 1) Because John simply defines sin by ἀνομίαν (lawlessness), not by voluntary ἀνομίαν. 2) Because besides voluntary sins there are also involuntary ones, namely of infirmity and ignorance, about which below. 3) Original sin in the posterity of Adam is not voluntary, but innate in them.

The antithesis is 1) of the Pontificians, 2) of the Socinians, who define sin as a voluntary transgression of the law. They rely on the saying of James, chapter 1, 15:

"Concupiscence, after it has conceived, brings forth sin; but sin, when it is finished, brings forth death." Where the conception of sin denotes the consent of the will. They add the authority of AUGUSTINE, who in L. de v. relig. cap 14 writes: "Sin is so voluntary, that in no way is it sin, unless it be voluntary." Response: Both speak of actual sins, and not all of them, but of those that are proaeretic and actually mortal (*).

Question XVII. What is the end of sin?

The end of sin. Properly speaking, there is no end of sin a); meanwhile, however, the devil, by instigating man to sin, intends the offense of the creator, the misery and ignominy of man, and the increase of his own kingdom b); but man, when sinning, has in view some apparent good c).

Proof a. End and good are materially the same. But so far is the end of sin from being truly good, that it rather calls man away from the end due to him, which is the fruition of the highest good.

Proof b. Just as by the envy of the devil death (the wages of sin) entered into the world, Wisdom II, 24; so the devil, burning with envy towards God and man, and striving to offend God, to destroy man, and to augment his own kingdom, solicits man to sin.

Proof c. The sinner would not defect from God the highest good, and His law, unless the appearance of an apparent good enticed him. For the appetite is not borne towards evil as such, but towards a true or apparent good.

Question XVIII. What is the consequent of sin?

The consequent of sin. The consequent of sin is the guilt of fault and of punishment.

Question XIX. What is fault, and the guilt of fault?

The guilt of fault. Fault is the foulness, or moral deformity resulting from an act that is disform to the law and unbecoming for a rational creature, and adhering to the sinner in the manner of a shameful stain. The guilt of fault is the obligation by which a man, on account of an act disform to the moral law, is held as if bound under sin and a stain, so that by that act the sinner is deemed and denominated detestable.

(*) The rule of opposition must be carefully observed. James, in the cited passage, does not oppose vicious desire to sin, but to voluntary sin, perpetrated with deliberation, and thus already consummated, insofar as it is voluntary, indeed already consummated. But it is an enticement, alluring to the perpetration of sin. E. that desire is the beginning of a continued and consummated sin; E. and it is a sin, and the first degree of a consummated sin, and led to the very last degree.

Obs. I. An act disform to the law, which is called sin, passes; but the fault remains and adheres to the sinner, e.g. On account of an act of adultery, once committed, a man is held so bound under the stain of adultery that by that act he is held and called an abominable adulterer.

Obs. II. Fault differs from punishment. For the former precedes, the latter follows; fault merits punishment, punishment is due to fault, and is, as it were, its wage, Rom. VI, 23; fault proceeds from the will, the will of the sinner abhors punishment; the sinner contracts fault by acting, he sustains punishment by suffering.

The foulness of sin is proven: How foul a stain sin is, is clear to anyone considering how unbecoming it is for a rational creature to deflect from the law inscribed in nature and prescribed in the divine scripture. For that is nothing other than to act, in the manner of beasts, without reason, to disturb the divine order, and with a blind impulse to incur the offense of the supreme judge and avenger. See Ps. XIV, 1, 3. Rom. III, 11 ff. Since, however, there is no man who does not sin, 1 Kings VIII, 46, the whole world is guilty before God, Rom. III, 19.

Question XX. What is punishment and the guilt of punishment?

The guilt of punishment. Divine punishment is a troublesome evil, by which God, the offended judge, vindicates a preceding and not yet remitted fault a), to demonstrate His justice b) and to assert His majesty and the authority of the law from contempt c). The guilt of punishment is the obligation by which a sinner is bound by God, the wrathful judge, to sustain the vengeance for a fault not remitted d).

Proof a. God is the avenger of sins, 1 Thess. IV, 6, who does not absolve the guilty without satisfaction having been made, Exod. XXXIV, 7, because those who do evil are worthy of death, Rom. I, 32.

Proof b. The infliction of punishments is ascribed to the retributive justice of God (ἀνταποδοτική), 2 Thess. 1, 6. "It is just with God to repay with affliction." And to the just judgment of God (τῇ δικαιοκρίσει), it is attributed to render to each according to his works, affliction and anguish to the soul that does evil, Rom. II, 5, 6, 9. On account of this, the condemnation of the impious is called just, Rom. III, 8.

Proof c. The sinner denies to God the due worship; he denies obedience to the divine law. By this atrocious injury he provokes God to inflict punishments, to assert His majesty from contempt, and to keep the authority of His law sound and intact. This the prophet Samuel indicates, gravely addressing King Saul: "You have rejected the word of Jehovah, and Jehovah has rejected you." 1 Sam. XV, 26.

Proof d. The guilt of punishment is proximately founded on the threat annexed to the divine law, Gen. II, 17; Deut. XXVII, 26. Therefore, God cannot, without compromising His truth and justice, leave sin unpunished without satisfaction having been made.

Obs. I. Punishment is described as a troublesome evil, to distinguish it from moral evil. To the latter, the will of a sinning man is prone; the former the sinner undergoes against the inclination of his will. Troublesome evil is also called the evil of passion. Hence punishment is succinctly defined as that which is the evil of passion, inflicted on account of the evil of action. Cf. SAMUEL PUFFENDORFF, de J. N. & G. libr. VIII. c. III. p. 1046.

Obs. II. A careful distinction must be made between punishment (in Greek τιμωρία) and chastisement, or the fatherly affliction of God (*), which in the sacred letters comes under the name of the cross. Punishment is a troublesome evil vindicating a fault not yet remitted, inflicted by a wrathful God as judge. But the affliction of the faithful, although at first sight it seems a troublesome and bitter evil, is not, however, an evil vindicating a fault, nor is it inflicted by God as a wrathful judge, but it is a medicinal evil, sent by a propitious God the Father, by which either faith is tested, or life is amended. This fatherly chastisement is 1) δοκιμασία (testing), or a trial, by which the progress in faith, love, hope, and patience of an innocent man (innocence of cause, not of person, which is in Christ alone) is examined and tested in the school of God, Wisdom III, 5, 6. Of this kind of cross was the temptation of Abraham, the prison of Joseph, the calamity of Job. To this also belongs 2) τὸ μαρτύριον (martyrdom), or a painful suffering, which is inflicted on the faithful by the enemies of celestial truth, on account of the testimony borne to the orthodox religion; 3) παιδεία (discipline), a somewhat harsher discipline, by which the reconciled God chastises the converted sinner, to amend him, and to deter him from relapse. Thus David, king of the Israelites, having obtained forgiveness for adultery, was pressed by more than one calamity divinely sent, so that in the future he might live dedicated not to the flesh, but to God.

(*) Also from judicial chastisement, which is inflicted on a man 1) who is delinquent and wicked, 2) not yet repenting, by God 3) as judge indeed, but 4) still placable and reconcilable, 5) with the intention that the man may admit correction, and since the return to grace is still open to him, he may use this moderate chastisement to avoid eternal perdition. From which definition it is easily known how judicial chastisement differs both from punishment, properly so called, and from fatherly chastisement. The sayings to be cited here are, 1 Corinthians V, 5; XI, 32, where a certain discipline (παιδεία) is expressly called a judicial act of God. This will be the corollary: In this life, since a man is never excluded from the time of grace, there is no punishment, properly and strictly so named; but there is judicial chastisement.

Question XXI. How many kinds of punishment for sin are there?

Division of the punishment for sin. A multiple punishment is inflicted on man by the most just God on account of sin. The punishment for sin can be distinguished 1) into temporal and eternal a); by the former, God vindicates the fault in this life; the latter is inflicted in hell without end; 2) into positive, or of sense, by which the impious man is afflicted with many and great pains, and privative, or of loss, by which, by the just judgment of God, the goods of soul, body, and fortune are taken away from the sinner b); 3) into personal, or private, by which one sinner is coerced, and common, or public, which several, associates in the same crime, suffer c).

Proof a. Miriam, infected with leprosy, Manasseh, cast into prison, the thief, put on the cross, and many others underwent temporal punishment, for whom temporal punishment was a stimulus to repent. But those who neither acknowledge God nor obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, they will suffer punishment, eternal destruction, 2 Thess. I, 8, 9.

Proof b. The host of privative punishments is led by death, the wages of sin, Rom. VI, 23. Death, however, is either spiritual, which is the separation of the soul from the gracious fellowship of God, causing a defect of all spiritual powers; or corporal, which is the separation of the soul departing from the body; or eternal, which is the separation from the beatific vision and fruition of God (*). Spiritual death is followed by corporal and eternal death. For as soon as the soul is separated from the gracious fellowship and influx of God, the body is subject to death on account of sin, Rom. VIII, 10, and the soul is made guilty of eternal death. Moreover, privative punishment is never not joined with positive punishment. Cf. Dr. HULSEMANN in breu enucl. p. 1101.

Proof c. Some punishments are common, some personal. Common punishments, on account of atrocious offenses, are sent upon many, associates in the same crime, and are either universal, which are common to the whole human nature, namely the defect of the divine image, mortality, laborious sweat; or national, which befall a whole nation, of which kind are those grave punishments, λιμός, λοιμός καὶ πόλεμος (famine, plague, and war), by which an entire nation is often infested; or particular, which are inflicted upon a company of the impious, gathered in cities or fields, such as were divinely sent (*) First, I feel that this tripartite division, although it is very common, is by no means accurate. For corporal and spiritual are not opposed to eternal; but these two, either temporal or eternal, are opposites. A bipartite genus must therefore be established, and to the former, two species should be referred. For the temporal is altogether twofold, either what happens to the body, or what happens to the spirit associated with the body. Then, as regards the definition, it seems to me that this definition is metonymical. Properly, corporal death is not so much a separation as a consequent; it is namely the failure of all powers of acting and moving oneself, arising from the separation of the soul, departing from the body. And so spiritual death is the failure of all powers of thinking, willing, acting rightly and in a manner agreeable to the divine will, arising from the separation of man, utterly alienated from God, Ephesians IV, 18. Its perpetual continuation, and extreme misery, without any hope of reconciliation and conjunction with God, is eternal death.

upon Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboiim. Personal, or individual, punishments are either of the mind, or of the body, or of fortune, which God, the hater and avenger of all evil, inflicts on individual sinners according to the nature of their offenses; examples of these are daily obvious to human senses.

Question XXII. Does God punish sins with sins?

Although a certain external punitive aspect is added by God, the offended judge, to some sins on account of preceding offenses; nevertheless, the speech of those who assert that God punishes sins with sins is improper and never to be imitated (*).

Proof: 1) The cause of punishments is the vindictive justice of God, Rom. II, 5, 6; 2) Thess. I, 6. But so far is it from the case that divine justice is the cause of sins, that these are plainly adverse and hateful to divine justice. 2) If God punished sins with sins, He would send sins into the hearts of men; for God is truly said to send punishments; But the former is false; Therefore also the latter.

You say: I. God punished the adultery of David with the rebellion of his son Absalom; Therefore He punished sin with a sin. Response: The rebellion of Absalom against his father David comprises two things: 1) a moral evil, or an act disform to the law, perpetrated by Absalom; 2) a troublesome evil, or a painful passion, which, with God directing, resulted in a punishment for David vindicating the adultery he had committed. God did not concur causally or efficiently with the rebellion of Absalom, which was a morally evil act, but only permitted that sinful act. The passion, however, which David sustained, was not a sin, because it was only a troublesome evil, not a moral one. Namely, the action displeased God, the passion was pleasing, as PROSPER once sang.

You say: II. God punished the contumacious disobedience of Pharaoh with hardening, which was a great sin; E. God punishes sin with a sin. Response: God hardened Pharaoh not by a positive influx, sending hardness into the mind of Pharaoh; for Pharaoh himself is said to have hardened his own heart, Exod VIII, 15, but only by permitting the hardening, and by a just judgment withdrawing the softening grace, which had been stubbornly rejected. Wherefore, not the hardening, but the permission of the hardening and the withdrawal of grace, properly speaking, was the punishment inflicted on Pharaoh by God. But neither the permission nor the withdrawal of grace is a sin. E. God did not punish sin with a sin.

Question XXIII. Can the guilt of fault and of punishment be taken away?

(*) There is indeed no obstacle to our imitating, as long as we interpret it correctly, that manner of speaking, as our ancestors did not hesitate to openly and publicly profess it in the Declar. Form. Conc. art. XI. pag. 820, and a very similar one exists in the sacred letters, Rom. I, 26, 28, and, in the opinion of many, with a coherence of the whole speech that is most congruent, Ezech. XX, 24, 25, 39. Caution is therefore needed, and an accurate interpretation. For the word παρέδωκεν (he gave over) and the Greek one, sometimes obtains judicial power, as is plainly apparent from Isa. XLII, 24; Jerem. XXV, 31; Ezech. XVI, 27; XXI, 29; Matth. XVIII, 34; 2 Pet. II, 4. But a more grievous sin, if other sins have preceded, must be considered in a twofold way, partly as an action contrary to the law, the guilt of which inheres in the man, by no means to be attributed to God; partly as a vengeance for the action, and in two ways indeed. God punishes sins, or rather the man on account of sins, with sins, by permitting the sins of others, which vindicate this man's sin, so that, by what a person sins, by the same he is also punished, which is the punishment of retaliation, in the way that God punishes a thief with a thief, a robber with a robber, the words are from Catech. mai. pag. 464; 2) by inflicting on the sinner himself wounds of the soul and the bites of a disturbed conscience, arising from sins cumulatively committed. For in every voluntary sin there are two things to be accurately discerned, of which one is the present pleasure of the sin, while the sin is being committed (thus there are men of whom this is asserted; παρίδωκαν ἑαυτοὺς, Eph. IV, 19 - they gave themselves over); the other, however, is the burden of the sin, to be felt afterwards, the sin having been perpetrated and consummated (thus indeed God παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς - gave them over, so that He Himself excites the force of sin, as if animated by the law, 1 Corinth. XV, 56; Rom. V, 13, 20, 21; VII, 8, 9, 10, now stimulating, pricking, biting, in men; which anxiety of conscience is indeed more terrible than any torturer).

The guilt of fault and of punishment is inseparable from sin a). It is separated, however, from the person of the sinner, not as he indulges in sins, but insofar as he performs true penitence b), and with sincere faith apprehends the satisfaction of Christ, offered for the human race, and is thus justified by God, the propitious judge c).

Proof a. Sin is per se foul and abominable, Ps. XIV, 3, and subject to the divine curse, Deut. XXVII, 26. Wherefore, just as a committed sin cannot be rendered undone, so it can never be immune from guilt.

Proof b. God relaxes the bond of guilt, by remitting the sin to the repentant sinner, that is, by not imputing it for punishment. To David, confessing his sin, its iniquity was remitted, i.e., he was reputed just and vacant of fault, Ps. XXXII, 5. The celestial king had mercy on the penitent and supplicating servant, and remitted his fault and punishment, Matth. XVIII, 26, 27.

Proof c. God remits sin not absolutely, without any satisfaction; since the vindictive justice of God demands the punishment merited by sins, either from the sinner, or from the sinner's sponsor, Christ, whose satisfactory passion, whoever applies to himself by true faith, is justified, i.e., is absolved from the guilt of fault and of punishment. Paul teaches this, Rom. III, 23, 24, 25: "All have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God: But they are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith, to show his righteousness." From which there is οὐδὲν κατάκριμα (no condemnation) for those who are in Christ Jesus, Rom. VIII, 1.

SUSPIRIUM

To raise my eyes to heaven, and to spread my hands before Your majesty, O most HOLY GOD, I can hardly bear. For as often as I recall my sins, both most numerous in number and greatest in gravity, as often as I measure the contracted guilt by the norm of Your law, as often as I weigh the punishments merited by my sins; so often my soul trembles, my mind is stupefied, my limbs shake. The supreme authority of Your name, which I ought to have revered most holily, I have offended: the law, which You prescribed, I have violated: the commandments, which You gave, I have spurned. Hence shame, hence sorrow and tears. Where shall I turn, oppressed with grief? To what asylum shall I flee? Whom shall I seek, or find as a fount of solace? O celestial mercy, look upon me, a wretch! O piety, spare a great debtor! O clemency, admit one who detests his sins! Do not turn away from me, while I turn to You. I confess that I am guilty of death. But as much as I fear death on account of my sins, so much do I hope for life on account of your merit, O JESUS, life of my life! Expunge, I beseech You, my debts with your blood! Release me from temporal and eternal punishments! Instruct me with spiritual strength, that in the future, being dedicated not to the flesh, not to the devil, but to You, I may live eternally!

CHAPTER III. ON THE FIRST AND ORIGINAL SIN OF MEN.

Question I. How is sin divided?

SIN IS DIVIDED into the first, and that which arose from the first. The first sin is either absolutely the first, or the first in the human race. Absolutely the first is that of the angels, who did not keep their origin; the first in the human race is the fall of the first-formed humans in paradise.

Question II. What is the first sin of men?

The first sin of men. The first sin of men is the transgression of the paradisiacal law, by which the first-formed humans, persuaded by the devil and abusing the liberty of their will, violated the divine prohibition concerning not eating the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and derived upon themselves and their posterity, to be propagated from them by the order of nature, having lost the divine image, great fault, and the guilt of temporal and eternal punishment.

Obs I. In the sacred letters, the first sin is called the transgression of Adam, Rom. V, 14. And the disobedience of one man, through which many were constituted sinners, Rom. V, 19.

Obs. II. By the Scholastics, this first sin is called the originating original sin, and the intimate corruption of human nature which flowed from it is called the originated original sin. But it is to be carefully noted that the primordial sin is really actual and individual, which is ours morally and imputatively; But the sin which flowed from it, and is commonly called original, is habitual, hereditary, and universal, and becomes ours by natural generation.

Question III. What is the cause of the first sin?

The cause of the first sin. The cause of the first sin is not God a), but the devil as persuader b), and man, the transgressor of the divine law, overcome by the persuasion of the devil, and having abused his freedom of will c).

Proof a. 1) God created man upright, Eccl. VII, 29, very good, Gen. I, 31, resplendent with the image of God, Gen. I, 27. 2) He severely forbade the first sin to man, with the threat of a grave penalty, Gen. II, 17. 3) He punished fallen man with the harshest penalties, Gen. III, 16 ff. E. God was in no way the cause of the first sin.

You say: I. If God had measured out to the first man that measure of grace by which he could have avoided all sin, and overcome any temptation whatsoever, he would never have fallen. E. God, by not conferring such great help, seems to have willed the fall of man, which He had foreseen. Response: The image of God, in which man was created, comprised sufficient powers for avoiding sin and conquering any temptation whatsoever. God was bound by no law, no pact, to supply greater help. The most wise creator of nature could have addressed the first man with the most just right: "My grace is sufficient for you."

You say: II. If the first man had received sufficient powers from God to overcome any temptation whatsoever, he would not have succumbed to the diabolical temptation. Response: God had conferred on man sufficient powers to overcome any temptation whatsoever; but He had not determined his will to the good, so that it would immutably adhere to it, but had granted him freedom of will for good and evil; yet in such a way that, by the force of the divine image with which he was endowed, his will was borne prone to good, and to evil he had only a remote power, or a power of non-repugnance. But God had bestowed freedom of will, both that the spontaneous obedience of man might be established, and that the creator might confer rewards on the freely obeying man.

Proof b. The devil is called a murderer from the beginning and the father of lies, John VIII, 44. But he could not be the cause of human slaughter or death, unless he were the cause of the first sin; since men before sin were immortal, but death entered the world through sin. Rom. V, 12. The same is called the father of lies, because by lying he drew men away from the faith and obedience due to God. For he did not compel the protoplasts to sin by a violent means, nor did he, as a physical cause, infuse error into their minds; for both are repugnant to the state of integrity, and exceed the powers of the devil, since he could not slip into the mind and will of Eve and bend or determine it by physical action; but he approached Eve with fraudulent persuasions and enticed her to sin. That most cunning enemy acted in the serpent more as a slanderer or impostor than an orator. 1) The devil tried to persuade the woman that her own nudity and her husband's was something too shameful. 2) Since he could not persuade men, devoid of sin, of shamefulness, he pretended that they did not perceive it due to a defect of knowledge; but that there was a tree in the middle of the garden which would give to those who ate it such knowledge of good and evil. 3) Because God had forbidden men to eat of that tree, he dared to accuse the most holy God of envy, as if He envied them the taste of a most pleasant tree, most suited for producing knowledge. For he said to the woman: "Is this also (from envy) that God has said, you shall not eat of every tree of the garden?", Gen. III, 1. By which slander he laid a trap for Eve, lest she place firm trust in the benevolence of God. 4) He dared to accuse God of a lie, openly contradicting His word: "You shall not surely die," Gen. III, 4. 5) He enticed the woman with the bland promise of a more eminent conformity with God, and of a more excellent knowledge than the protoplasts had received with the image of God. 6) He overcame the wavering Eve with the blandishments of the offered, most delicate fruit.

Proof c. Eve sinned first, not simpler in intellect than Adam, but more pliant in will.

Since she was not omniscient, by simple ignorance she did not know whether the interlocutor hiding under the serpent was a good or a bad angel; for she knew that a natural serpent lacks the faculty of speech. Perhaps she believed that a good angel was speaking from the serpent, and was either softening or completely abrogating the law previously promulgated, which seemed exceedingly rigid. For when the demon contradicted the divine word, saying: "you will not surely die"; he immediately pretended that he was a friend of God, privy to the secrets of God. He therefore added a reason to his assertion: "For God knows that on the day you eat of it (the fruit), your eyes will be opened; and then you will be like God, knowing good and evil"; as if he were arguing: The fruition of a tree which will be followed by a more excellent degree of knowledge and assimilation with the Elohim, its effect will not be death. But the tree of knowledge, etc. Therefore. Moved by this argument, Eve did not believe that the execution of the divine threat, or the obligation to death, was certain to happen; but rather, there hovered in her mind partly the apparent good promised by the demon, namely, the obtaining of a closer and fuller assimilation with God and a notable accession of wisdom through eating the forbidden fruit, and partly the pleasantness of the tree, which she had looked upon with a feeling of delight, and was persuaded that it had not been created by God in vain. And so, conquered by the persuasion of the devil, she sinned by eating, and drew her husband Adam into the society of sin.

Question IV. What instrument did the devil use in seducing the first man?

The instrumental cause. The devil, in seducing the first man, used a real and natural serpent a), corporally possessed by himself b), as an instrument.

Proof a. Moses writes of the serpent in Gen. III, 1: "Now the serpent was more crafty (through the entry of the Devil) than any beast of the field which Jehovah God had made." That this was a real and natural serpent is gathered 1) from its natural cunning, since when compared with the beasts of the field, it is said to have been more crafty than them. Christ Himself does not conceal this serpentine cunning, Matth. X, 16; 2) From the inflicted punishment, which must be borne by the serpent by crawling on the ground and eating dust, Gen. III, 14. (*) | Proof b. That it was not a mere serpent, but one acted upon (ἐνεργούμενον), or

(*) I frankly confess that the opinion of those among our scholars who understand the serpent not as natural and agitated by the devil, but as personated, namely the devil alone, clothed in the form of a serpent, and perhaps a completely unique one, never seen before, has commended itself more to me. I rely on the following primary proving arguments: 1) The entire series of words indicates only one subject, and it is not signified by any distinction that some of the predicates pertain to the serpent, and others to the malignant spirit who may have lurked in it. 2) Eve possessed such great knowledge that she could not have been ignorant that the serpent was a brute animal, void of all reason, and incapable of speech; from which she could not fail to notice the fraud immediately and to abhor that conversation. That the personated serpent, however, was not so suspect to her, saving Eve's knowledge and wisdom, is established from these surrounding circumstances: (α) The woman knew well that many spirits were created by God, and all were good and without experience of vice. (β) It did not escape her that they were adorned with greater perfections than men. (γ) She also knew the office, commanded to the angels, by which they perpetually sang the praises of God and did His commands, and also were always present as companions to man, so that no danger was to be feared from them. (This, however, is by no means suitable for excusing Eve's offense. She ought to have been content with the word of God, utterly immutable and never to be revoked, and to adhere to it wholly and constantly). (δ) Nor did she doubt that it could happen that those spirits might assume some bodily form. Finally, (ε) it is very probable that the defection of the perfidious angels had not occurred before this very action, by which they began to envy the virtue and felicity of men; see the annotations on page 398. She therefore thought it to be a good spirit, from which she expected nothing but what was good and salutary. 3) The serpent, the author and persuader of the first sin of men, is called the devil, Revelation 12:9. 4) The name שָׁחַד with the prefixed article is an indication that this serpent was completely unique, whose characteristic was cunning. It is compared with all kinds of animals, and even with venomous serpents. But a comparison sometimes has the force of a negation, as in John 3:19 and 10; 2 Timothy 3:4. The meaning, therefore, is this: This serpent was cunning and sharp for fraud, of a kind which no animal is, even though it presented the appearance of some animal. 5) It uttered speech, and that insidious and deceitful, entangled also in many ambiguities. 6) A penalty, properly so called, cannot be inflicted on any brute animal. 7) This penalty, if the words are understood properly, is a condition of such a kind that it befits serpents, and indeed all animals that creep on the ground; for they tell a fable who say that serpents previously walked with an erect body and were equipped with feet. 8) This penalty, pronounced upon this personated serpent, is in other places attributed to the evil demon, in translated words, either plainly the same or of the same meaning; specifically (α) "on your belly you shall go," which manner of speaking denotes a most humble state, see Psalm 44:26, add Revelation 12:9. (β) "you shall eat dust," which designates a most sad state, without any recreation, Psalm 72:9; 102:10, add Isaiah 65:25, in which place the prophet foretells certain things about the chief adversary of the sacred assembly in the New Covenant (and that is undoubtedly the devil); and the continuous and perpetual duration of this most miserable condition is predicted by this addition: "all the days of your life." (γ) That saying: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," is nothing other than the first prophecy of Christ, who would destroy the works of the devil, is agreed upon by all who are truly devoted to Christ. Against these so clear arguments, the most learned dissenting men have nothing at hand, except this one opposition; that our interpretation does not agree with the properties of the historical style. But the response will be easy: 1) Even all those who understand a natural serpent, although not alone (for that it was alone is the absurd opinion of the more recent Jews, and also of the Socinians), cannot but admit certain figurative expressions, both metonymic and metaphoric, namely "the seed of the woman," for the man who was generated from the seed; "in the sweat of your face," that is, with difficult, troublesome labor, full of hardships; "you shall eat dust," this cannot be thought to be said otherwise than figuratively (for it is the nature of a serpent, as of any animal that creeps on the ground, not to eat dust, but to lick it, Micah 7:17). Indeed, possessed by the devil, is gathered 1) from the fact that a mere serpent cannot speak. But the paradisiacal serpent used articulate speech. 2) From the seduction of man. A serpent is a good creature of God. But the paradisiacal serpent was the seducer of the first man. 3) From the bruising of the heel; which refers not to a natural, but to an infernal serpent. From which it is concluded that the devil was united with the serpent παραστατικῶς (accidentally), or accidentally.

Question V. What law did the protoplasts violate by their fall?

The first parents by their fall immediately violated the positive law promulgated in paradise, concerning not eating the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil a); mediately and virtually by their disobedience they broke through the barriers of the whole moral law b).

Proof a. To eat of the fruits of a tree is morally neither evil per se; but with the divine prohibition added, it becomes evil on account of the authority of the supreme lord and lawgiver. Now God by a positive law had specifically and expressly forbidden the protoplasts to eat of the fruits of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, Gen. II, 17. Wherefore the first man, by eating of the same tree, immediately violated the positive law of God.

Proof b. The reason for the positive law was δοκιμασία (testing), or a trial of obedience, which, being due to God, the whole moral law requires. But he who does not fear to transgress one precept does not blush to violate the remaining precepts, since they have the same author and the same binding force. Wherefore TERTULLIAN excellently says in L. II cont. Marc. II: "The primordial law, given to Adam and Eve in paradise, is as it were the matrix of all the precepts of God." Namely, the protoplasts by their disobedience violated all and every precept of the decalogue virtually and by consequence: The I precept by diffidence and apostasy; the II by a perverse interpretation of the divine mandate and by transferring the guilt to God; the III by contempt of the divine word; the IV by disobedience and ingratitude towards God, the heavenly father and highest lord, by whom they had been heaped with so many benefits; V. by homicide, as they are the moral cause of the spiritual, corporal, and eternal death of their posterity; VI. by intemperance and the lust of gluttony, by the perfidy of Eve against her husband, by the inordinate love of Adam for his wife; VII. by theft, as they took another's property (a fruit not their own) against the lord's will; VIII. by false testimony and the approval of false testimony; IX. & X. by the wicked concupiscence for divine likeness, for a certain supernatural knowledge, and for the forbidden fruit.

Question VI. In what does the first sin formally consist?

The form of the first sin. The first sin of men formally consists in the turning away from the positive law of God promulgated in paradise, concerning not eating the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

This lawlessness (ἀνομία) involved sinful acts; on the part of the intellect, unbelief (ἀπιστίαν) or incredulity a); on the part of the will, self-love (φιλαυτίαν) and pride b); on the part of the sensitive appetite, the inordinate concupiscence for the forbidden fruit c); from which emerged the external act, forbidden by the paradisiacal law d).

Proof a. When Eve wavered between the word of God: "In whatever day you eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, you shall surely die," Gen. II, 17, and the word of the devil: "You shall not surely die," Gen. III, 4, she turned her mind away from the divine word, derogating faith from it, and turned her soul to the diabolical word, giving her assent to it; which is surely a nefarious unbelief (ἀπιστία), the root of the first sin. For just as faith is the beginning of access to God, Hebr. XI, 1, so infidelity is the beginning of turning away from God, Jo. XVI, 19. Certainly, the devil first solicited man to doubt the truth of the divine word; then he openly contradicted the divine word, to show that it was false; finally, he bent the will of Eve to pride.

whatever they think was inflicted as a penalty on the natural serpent, they cannot but interpret improperly. 2) The historical manner of speaking also demands that different subjects be named distinctly and clearly, of which kind of difference no trace is seen in this place. 3) The style in this narrative is not only historical, but also dogmatic; it is at the same time prophetic, as much concerning the penalty to be undergone by the serpent, as the remedy prepared for the entire human race. But by the custom of sacred speech, and especially of Hebrew, a future event is often foretold in translated words.

Proof b. The devil provoked the will of Eve to affect a more eminent assimilation with God, and to covet a greater height of knowledge than she had obtained from the creator with the divine image. they had walked with a body, and were furnished with feet. 8) This punishment, pronounced upon this impersonated serpent, is in other places attributed to the evil demon, in translated words, or plainly the same, or equivalent ones; specifically (a) you shall go on your belly, which manner of speaking denotes a most humble state, see Ps. XLIV, 26, add. Apoc. XII, 9. (b) you shall eat dust, which designates a most sad state, without any recreation, Ps. LXXII, 9. CII, 10, add. Is. LXV, 25, in which place the prophet foretells certain things about the principal adversary of the sacred assembly in the New Covenant (and he is undoubtedly the devil); and the continuous and perpetual duration of this most miserable condition is predicted by this addition: for the days of your life. (c) That saying: The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, is nothing other than the first prophecy of Christ, who would destroy the works of the devil, as is agreed among all truly devoted to Christ. Against these so clear arguments, the dissenting most learned men have nothing ready, except this one objection; that our interpretation does not agree with the properties of the historical style. But the reply will be easy: 1) Even all those who understand a natural serpent, although not alone (for that he was alone is an absurd opinion of the recent Jews, as well as the Socinians), cannot but admit certain figurative expressions, both metonymical and metaphorical, namely the seed of the woman, for the man who is generated from seed; in the sweat of your face, that is, with difficult, troublesome, and sorrowful labor; you shall eat dust, this cannot be thought of as said otherwise than figuratively (for it is the nature of the serpent, as of any animal that creeps on the ground, not to eat dust, but to lick it, Mich. VII, 17). Indeed, whatever punishment they think was inflicted on the natural serpent, they cannot but interpret it improperly. 2) The historical manner of speaking also demands that different subjects be named distinctly and clearly, which distinction is not seen here. 3) The style in this narration is not only historical, but also dogmatic; it is at the same time prophetic, concerning the punishment to be undergone by the serpent, and the remedy prepared for the entire human race. And by the custom of sacred, and especially Hebrew, speech, future events are often foretold in translated words. For the tempter said: "For God knows that in the day you eat of it (the fruit), your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil," Gen. III, 5. The devil did not persuade man with these words of an equality with the true and supreme God, but of a certain perfection more sublime than the image of God, so that he would know good and evil as certainly and solidly as God knows it, if he ate from the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Nor do we think that men, created in perfect wisdom, were so imprudent as to believe that a creature could become equal to the supreme God. Cf. annot. D. SEB. SCHMID. in Gen. p. 40.

Proof c. "So the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes and desirable to give understanding," Gen. III, 6. The woman looked at the tree of the knowledge of good and evil with the eyes of both her body and her soul, and considered that its fruit was delicate, beautiful, and useful for producing a solid and perfect knowledge of good and evil; by which the woman's appetite was stimulated to taste that fruit, against the law prescribed by the creator.

Proof d. "Therefore she took of its fruit and ate; and she also gave some to her husband with her, who (also) ate." Gen. III, 6. With these words the sin being brought to completion (ἡ ἁμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα), the consummated sin of the first man, which brings forth death (James 1:15), is described by Moses, which act is openly repugnant to the positive divine law, given by God in paradise, Gen. II, 17.

Question VII. Was Adam seduced by the devil no less than Eve?

The subject of the first sin. Adam was not immediately seduced by the devil, as the woman was a). Yet, he was mediately drawn into the same sin by the persuasion of the woman, and thus Adam's fall also traces back to the devil as the first author of sin b).

Proof a. That the devil first approached the woman is taught by the history recounting the fall of the first humans, Gen. III, 1, sqq., and Paul confirms it in 2 Tim. II, 14: "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." The apostle speaks of the order and manner of the seduction. Namely, not Adam first, but Eve was deceived. Eve was immediately seduced by the devil, Adam by the same mediately through the woman. Eve being seduced was the cause of the transgression for Adam, but Adam being seduced was not the author of Eve's prevarication.

Proof b. Adam obeyed Eve, who was deceived by the serpent, and who persuaded him to eat the forbidden fruit, Gen. III, 6. Therefore, Adam was deceived by the serpent through the woman. The consequence is proven 1) from the intention of the devil, who had planned to deceive and to cast down from the state of first felicity not only the woman, but also the man. From this, he is called a liar and a murderer from the beginning, Jo. VIII, 44. 2) Because Eve undoubtedly overcame Adam with the same arguments of persuasion with which she had been overcome by the serpent; although a most tender affection for his wife was added, and the experience which testified that his wife had not died from eating the forbidden fruit.

The antithesis is that of Bellarmine and others, who state that Adam was not properly seduced. Their main arguments are:

I. Paul expressly denies that Adam was deceived or seduced, 1 Tim. II, 14. Resp. Paul does not deny simply (ἀπλῶς) or unqualifiedly that Adam was seduced, but he denies that he was the first to be deceived by the serpent, so as to be the cause of Eve's transgression.

II. The cause of Adam's error was excessive love for his spouse; not the persuasion of the serpent or the woman. For he did not want to sadden his companion, and his only one at that. Resp. I. It is false that Adam was not deceived by Eve's persuasion, but was blinded by his love for her. The judgment of God, pronounced against Adam, teaches otherwise: "Because you have listened to the voice of your wife, Eve," &c. Gen. III, 17. To this is added that the love of the woman, as long as it is subordinated to trust in God, cannot be the cause of a fall.

III. Adam was not properly deceived or seduced, because Eve did not have the intention of deceiving, but of increasing the excellence or felicity of her husband. Resp. 1) Seduction is not estimated from the intention of the seducer, or the seduced, but from the thing itself. Whence, wherever someone is led away from the path of true doctrine and eternal salvation, whether the intention to deceive in the seducer is explicit or not, there is seduction, II John II, 26. 2) A person can be a seducer of himself, 2 Tim. III, 13. James 1, 23, although a man is hardly found who has the intention of deceiving himself. 3) The seduction of Adam, with respect to the seducing cause, does not terminate in Eve, but in the serpent, to whom it principally belongs. Therefore, although in Eve there was no intention of deceiving her husband, there was in the serpent the intention of seducing Adam through Eve, already corrupted by sin, as through a convenient instrument.

Question VIII. What end did the tempting devil intend, and man, the transgressor of the law of Paradise?

The end of the first sin. The devil, by inciting man to the first sin, intended vengeance against God, the judge and avenger of his apostasy (ἀποστασίας) a); but man, by sinning, aspired to the pinnacle of a greater excellence of the image of God b).

Proof a. The angels who did not keep their own origin, but left their proper dwelling, God has reserved in everlasting chains under darkness for the judgment of the great day. See epist. Jude v. 6. From this, the prince of darkness burns with an insatiable desire for vengeance, which, because it is among the impossible things (ἐκ τῶν ἀδυνάτων ἐστὶ) to exact from God himself, he strives to take from man, by corrupting him and turning him away from God, so as to displease the man's father and lord.

Proof b. God in creation had adorned man, the prince of visible creatures, with his image, comprising notable perfections of soul and body; but, when the serpent said: "God knows that, in the day you eat of that fruit, your eyes will be opened; then you will be like God, knowing good and evil," the desire entered man to aspire to a more perfect assimilation with God, and to a more excellent degree of wisdom than that which had been granted to them by the creator.

Question IX. What are the consequences of the Adamic fall?

Consequences of the first sin. The consequences of the Adamic fall are the guilt of the fault and the punishment.

Proof a. The fault, or moral foulness, which resulted from the eating of the forbidden fruit, is to be estimated 1) from the majesty of the lawgiver, offended by the illicit act. The first sinner offended God, the best creator, the wisest lawgiver, the most just judge. 2) From the amplitude, or extension, of the fault. For the stain contracted from the act, deformed from the paradisiacal law, not only adhered to Adam and Eve, but was also sprinkled upon all their posterity, except Christ. 3) From the facility of the prescribed law. The paradisiacal law consisted of a single prohibition concerning one thing, easy to observe, of not eating the fruit of one tree. But since paradise abounded with very many and very wholesome fruits, it was extremely easy to abstain from one tree. It is surely most shameful not to piously keep and observe even a single precept of God. 4) From the protections with which man was fortified against the fall. He was adorned with the divine image, by virtue of which he possessed exceptional wisdom, by which he most accurately discerned good from evil; he excelled in perfect holiness, by which he was inclined to good; but he turned away from evil. 5) From the consideration of the circumstances. For where did Adam sin? In paradise, in which there were no allurements to sin, but very many incitements to worship God. When did he sin? Not long after creation, when man was, as it were, fresh from the hands of God. 6) From the indignity of the falsehood. What is more unworthy of man than to deny assent to the most true word of Jehovah, and to assent to the most deceitful word of the devil? What is more unbecoming than not to live content with a most happy condition, divinely dispensed? What is more detestable than to wish to seize a godlike form, just as Absalom, a son of most profligate impiety, considered the royal dignity to be plunder, into which he strove to rush. 7) From the virtual violation of all the precepts of the entire decalogue, about which see above, question V.

Proof b. Punishment pressed upon the fault as its inseparable companion. The most holy God had threatened man with death if he transgressed the prescribed law, Gen. II, 17. By death was denoted spiritual, corporal, and eternal death. Spiritual death, the root of all evil, is the immediate consequence of the apostasy (τῆς ἀποστασίας) or first sin. For the moment man turned his mind away from the divine law, he deprived himself of the spiritual union with God, who is the life of the soul, and thus deserted by God, he became spiritually dead. This spiritual death brought with it the loss of the divine image, the most profound corruption of the entire human nature, and the defect of free will in spiritual matters. Spiritual death, or that of the soul, is followed by the death of the body, which includes all the diseases and miseries extrinsically surrounding man. To this pertains the harsh and troublesome labor, to be constantly endured by the man, Gen. III, 17, and the painful childbirth of the wife, v. 16. Although the protoplasts did not suffer bodily death at the first moment of the fall, they immediately became debtors of death, since this is the wage of sin, Rom. VI, 23. Eternal death is the perpetual exclusion from the beatific fruition of God, joined with perennial and by far the most bitter torments; which, by the force of the threat annexed to the divine law, would have had to be undergone by Adam and his entire posterity, if Jesus Christ, the redeemer of the human race and the restorer of the lost divine image, had not intervened.

Question X. Is the first sin of Adam truly and justly imputed to his posterity?

On the imputation of the first sin. The first sin of Adam, inasmuch as he is regarded as the common parent, head, stock, and representative of the whole human race, is imputed to all his posterity for guilt and punishment, truly (a) and by the just judgment of God (b).

Proof a. From Rom. V, 12, "Just as through one man sin entered the world, and through sin death; and so death passed upon all men, in whom all sinned." 1) By "one man" in this passage can be understood Adam and Eve, who are called one man, both by reason of economic communion, because by marriage spouses become one flesh, Gen. II, 24; and by reason of communion in sinning, because they were one heart, by the consent of sin, as they should have been by the consent of obedience; yet the apostle primarily refers to Adam, the root, fount, seedbed, and representative of the entire human race, the type of the second Adam, v. 14, the head of Eve, 1 Cor. XI, 3. 2) By "sin" is first understood the fall of Adam, consequently original sin, or habitual and hereditary depravity. 3) Sin entered into the world, i.e., into man, who is a microcosm (μικροκόσμος), or a small world; it entered not by God effecting, compelling, or impelling, but through the voluntary abuse of free will; it entered not by imitation, since it is also attributed to infants, who did not sin in the likeness of Adam's transgression, v. 14, i.e., who were not able to imitate Adam in sinning; but partly through the imputation of the Adamic fall; partly through carnal propagation, if you consider the habitual depravity, which resulted from the fall of Adam. 4) Through sin entered spiritual, corporal, and eternal death. But death passed upon all men (namely, through one man) in whom all sinned. Some interpreters, with ERASMUS, to whom the Socinians and Arminians agree, have rendered the Greek words of Paul: (ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον), reduplicatively or causally: "inasmuch as," "because," "for that all have sinned"; most of whom deny the imputation of the Adamic fall, and the original sin that arose from it. LUTHER indeed also rendered it causally: Dieweil sie alle gesündigt haben (Because they all have sinned), but not without respect to Adam, as the head, or stock; because it cannot be conceived in the mind, how we sinned in Adam, as in a subject, unless sin is said to have been transferred from him to us causally. The Latin and Greek Fathers, except for THEODORET, explain it in a relative or subjective sense, as the Vulgate interpreter also expresses the relative sense. FELBINGER, a Socinian, in his version of the N.T., combines the causal and subjective sense, and renders Paul's words in German: Derhalben wie durch einen einigen Menschen die Sünde ist in die Welt eingegangen, und durch die Sünde der Tod, eben also ist der Tod zu allen Menschen eingegangen, dieweil (oder in welchem) sie alle gesündigt haben (Therefore, as through one single man sin entered into the world, and through sin death, even so death has entered unto all men, because (or in which) they have all sinned). The relative, or subjective, sense, by which (ἐφ' ᾧ) is rendered in Latin, in quo (in whom), seems analogous to the text, and is proven 1) because in the N.T. it is most frequently taken relatively, not however reduplicatively, or causally. See Mark II, 4. Luke V, 25. XI, 22. Rom. VI, 2. Phil. IV, 10. 1 Thess. III, 7. Confer. ERASM. SCHMID. in N.T. on this passage. Only one biblical place seems to favor the dissenters, Phil. III, 12. (ἐφ' ᾧ καὶ κατελήφθην), which words ERAS. SCHMIDIUS explains, "inasmuch as I also have been apprehended by Christ Jesus"; but SEB. SCHMID translates, "in which I also have been apprehended." Considering these things, it is clear that (ἐφ' ᾧ) in the N.T. never signifies, "because," or "for that." 2) The coherence of the text teaches the relative sense. For the apostle connects in verse 12 the propagation of sin, the origin of death, and the amplitude of the first sin, i.e., through Adam sin entered the world; through Adam's sin death passed upon all; in Adam all sinned. 3) This sense is confirmed by the antithesis, in which Christ is opposed to Adam, which likewise has three opposites: Through Christ the grace of God, through grace the gift came into the world, v. 15. Through the obedience of Christ grace passes to all, v. 18. In Christ the just are constituted, as many as are justified v. 19. 4) The apostle uses a not dissimilar phrase, 1 Cor. XV, 22, "In Adam all die." From these premises, we argue: Those who sinned in Adam, to them also the sin of Adam is imputed; But all sinned in Adam, etc. Therefore. The major premise is proven; because no evil men existed when Adam transgressed the command of God, so that they could become participants in the Adamic sin by a personal and formal act; Therefore they were made participants of the same morally, through imputation, according to the estimation or judgment of God.

2. From Rom. V, 19. "Just as through the disobedience of one man many were made sinners; so also through the obedience of one many will be made righteous." Obs. 1) By the disobedience of one man is understood the transgression of Adam, v. 14, which is opposed to the obedience of Christ. 2) Just as the obedience of Christ, so the disobedience of Adam is a single, or personal, act. But no single or personal act, morally good or bad, can be common to many persons, essentially distinct, except through imputation. For to be a single act, and formally common to many, implies a contradiction. 3) By many men are understood all, because all men are indeed many. cf. Dan. XII, 2. Jo. V, 28. We gather from these: 1) Whoever of men differ essentially from Adam, and are nevertheless constituted sinners before the divine tribunal through his disobedience, to them the disobedience of Adam is imputed for guilt; But all men, etc. Therefore. 2) Whoever are constituted sinners in the same way through the disobedience of Adam, as the just are constituted through the obedience of Christ, they are sinners through the disobedience of Adam imputatively; But all men begotten according to the course of nature, etc. Therefore.

3. The punishment of Adam is imputed to his posterity; Therefore also the guilt. The consequence is manifest; because guilt and punishment are related; and therefore the latter has the former as its companion or presupposes it. Surely, one cannot be a partaker of another's punishment, who is free from his guilt. The antecedent is established; because in Adam we were stripped of the image of God, ejected from paradise, subjected to labors, sorrows, diseases, and death.

Proof b. The justice and equity of the imputation of the Adamic fall for guilt and punishment to posterity is clear 1) from the fact that Adam is the common parent of all men, who indeed existed in him virtually or seminally; and also the moral head of the entire human race. It is established, however, that the enormous and very grave crime of a father is imputed to his posterity for guilt and punishment by a most just right; for example, a vassal of some king, committing the crime of high treason, is deprived of the fiefs granted by the king, not only the father himself, but his posterity also are excluded from them. Since, therefore, all men were in Adam, as in their father and stock, not indeed with respect to their individual reason, but with respect to their specific existence, or representation, by a most just right the sin of the common father is imputed to all men who existed in him. Add that Adam was also the moral, or federal, head of the human race; for this reason, that not only was he created morally good, but also the thrice-best God had entered into a pact with him, by virtue of which He had promised him perpetual perfection of soul and body and the felicity of paradise, but under the condition of constant obedience; to disobedience, however, He had appointed the punishment of spiritual, corporal, and eternal death, Gen. II, 17. The test of obedience (δοκιμασία) by divine intention was abstinence from the fruits of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Wherefore, when Adam refused obedience and sinned, his entire posterity, by the most just estimation of God, was judged to have sinned, and thus the concreated perfection and the promised felicity of paradise were lost; conversely, from the transgression of Adam guilt and punishment redounded to Adam's posterity.

2. The image of God and the felicity connected with it was not a personal good, but one common to the whole human species, Gen. V, 1, 2. Therefore, when Adam, the representative of the human species, was deprived by the most just judgment of God of that common good, which he had received for himself no more than for his posterity, on account of his disobedience, all men at once were deprived of the same. For it is most equitable that he who would have received the benefit should also feel the loss.

3. The will of the sinning Adam was interpretively the will of all men, which indeed Adam betrayed and declared by the abuse of his free will. For all and every man, who are, were, and will be, except Christ, if they had lived at the same time as Adam, would have consented to his sin. This is evident a) from the fact that Adam, the parent and head of the human race, easily consented to the transgression of Eve; b) "As is the earthy man (as the natural stock of the whole human species), so are those who are of the earth" (in will and intellect), 1 Cor. XV, 48. But he who consents to a most atrocious sin, by which the highest majesty is offended, is not unjustly deemed guilty of the fault and punishment; Since therefore God foresaw the virtual consent of all men to the first sin, He imputed to all, by a most just judgment, the guilt and punishment which accompanies the fall of Adam.

The antithesis is 1) of the Socinians, who deny that the crime of Adam is imputed to posterity; 2) of the Arminians, some of whom deny the imputation of the first sin; some assert that the cause of imputation is not the just judgment of God, but His free will. Their main arguments are:

I. The imputation of the Adamic transgression cannot be solidly proven from sacred scripture. For 1) in Rom. V, 12, the little words, (ἐφ' ᾧ), cannot be rendered subjectively, "in whom," but must be explained causally, "because." If they were rendered, "in whom," they would refer to "one man," which the intervening words do not permit. Furthermore, the following v. 13 teaches that the apostle's discourse is about actual sin, proper to each man. 2) In Rom. V, 19, by the disobedience of Adam, men are constituted so that sin inheres in them. Therefore the apostle in that place does not deal with the imputation of sin. 3) Men die not because the guilt of sin pertains to all, but because they derive their origin from Adam. Resp. to 1); The relative pronoun does not always immediately join the subject to which it refers, as the Pauline passage, 2 Thess. II, 9, teaches. Sometimes the series of things is to be regarded more than the order of words: The (τὸ ἐφ' ᾧ) is appositely referred to the man (τὸν ἀνθρώπον), about whom the discourse was previously instituted. Besides, the apostle in v. 12 speaks not of a personal sin, but of a common and universal one, because he says that in one man all have sinned, namely morally, because of the imputation of the Adamic fall; in v. 13 he deals with actual sins, inasmuch as they manifest the first sin a posteriori. To 2); By the disobedience of Adam we are constituted sinners before the divine tribunal imputatively, because the guilt resulting from the transgression of Adam is imputed to us; which imputation is the foundation and reason why original sin, which flowed from the first sin, inheres in us. For just as the obedience of Christ is imputed to us for righteousness; so the disobedience of Adam is imputed to us for guilt. To 3): The guilt of punishment precedes the guilt of the fault. God inflicts the punishment of death on no one, unless he is guilty of the fault. God can and usually does help the undeserving with the praise of His clemency; but He cannot punish the non-sinners, without the subversion of justice, says AUGUSTINE in book II of his Opus imperfectum.

II. Whoever did not exist when Adam sinned, the sin of Adam could not descend to them; But posterity, etc. Therefore. R. Whoever did not exist when Adam sinned, neither actually in their own life, nor virtually or seminally in the stock, the sin of Adam could not descend to them; I grant. But the posterity of Adam were in him, as in the root, stock, and fount of the human race, virtually or seminally, when he violated the paradisiacal law. Besides, that the sins of parents can be imputed to their children and posterity, although they do not actually exist with them, is clear from the divine threat, Exod. XX, 5. The avarice of Gehazi was imputed to his seed, i.e., to his posterity, existing seminally in him, 2 Kings V, 27, forever.

III. Those who did not consent to the sin of Adam, to them the sin cannot be morally imputed; But the posterity of Adam, etc. The major premise is evident; because the sin of another can never be imputed to anyone, unless he has a moral connection with him, which consists in command, counsel, consent, etc. The minor premise is clear; because when Adam was living and sinning, his posterity did not live, and therefore they could not consent to his sin. Resp. I distinguish between formal and virtual consent. Whoever consented to the sin of Adam neither formally nor virtually, to them the sin of Adam cannot be imputed; I grant. But posterity consented to the sin of Adam virtually, who, if they had co-existed with the sinning Adam, would have abused the liberty of their will in the same way he did.

For the will of Adam is interpretively the will of posterity.

Instance I. But infants did not sin in the likeness of Adam's transgression, Rom. V, 14. Therefore, the will of Adam is not interpretively the will of infants. Resp. Infants are said by Paul not to have sinned in the likeness of Adam's transgression because they did not sin in their own person by choice; yet they sinned in Adam as their stock and father.

Instance II. Sin can be imputed there, where knowledge of the law has preceded. But in infants, there is no knowledge of the law; Therefore sin cannot be imputed to them. Resp: 1) There are also sins of ignorance, Ps. XIX, 13. 2) Infants die; Therefore the sin of Adam, of which death is the punishment, Gen. II, 17, is imputed to them.

IV. If the sin of Adam is imputed by divine judgment to all who existed in the loins of Adam, then it is also imputed to Christ himself; But not to Christ, etc. Therefore. The consequence of the major premise is evident; because Christ also was in the loins of Adam; for he is called the son of Adam, Luke III, 38. Resp. I distinguish between Adam integral, and Adam sinning. Christ is called the son of Adam, integral, not sinning or fallen; for he was not in the loins of Adam, inasmuch as he had fallen, because he descended from Adam not according to the order of corrupt nature through carnal generation, but in a supernatural way by the miraculous advent of the Holy Spirit, with whose immense gifts he was anointed, so that he was holy, innocent, undefiled, separate from sinners, Hebr. VII, 26. For this reason he is opposed to the sinner Adam, Rom. V, 14, sqq.

V. If the sin of Adam is imputed to his posterity because he is their head, then the sins of Esau are imputed to the Edomites for the same reason; The latter is false; Therefore also the former. The consequence is proven from a parallel; Just as Adam is the head of the Adamites; so Esau is the head of the Edomites. Resp. 1) The reason is dissimilar; for Adam was not only the natural head of his posterity, but also the moral head, because of the pact which God established with Adam, that if he observed the prescribed law, he would propagate his original righteousness and felicity to his posterity; but if he sinned, he would corrupt both himself and his posterity; God did not establish such a covenant with Esau. 2) Also as a natural head, Adam has a dissimilar reason, compared with the other heads of families. From him human nature, specifically considered, is derived; from them descend certain individuals. He received from God goods common to all men; these received personal goods, which terminate in their stock.

VI. If the propagation of guilt is to be derived from the reason of the specific existence of the human race in Adam; then by the force of the same, the penitence of Adam and the remission of his sins will redound to his posterity: The latter is false: Therefore also the antecedent. The reason for the consequence is; because Adam in repenting represented the human race just as he did in sinning. Resp. I deny the consequence of the major. For Adam in repenting did not represent the human race in the same way as in sinning. In sinning, he lost natural goods to be propagated to posterity; in repenting, he received the supernatural grace of God, which is not transferred to posterity.

VII. The sin of another cannot be our sin: The sin of Adam is another's: Therefore. The major premise is established; because the sin of any man proceeds from his own will. Resp. 1) The sin of another cannot be ours formally, yet it can be ours imputatively. 2) There are also involuntary sins. 3) The will of the sinning Adam was interpretively our will.

Question XI. Was the fall of Adam necessary for the manifestation of divine justice and mercy?

The fall of Adam was not necessary for the manifestation of divine justice and mercy.

Proof. 1) Because God has no need of a sinful man, Sir. XV, 12. But sinners would be necessary for Him, if the fall of Adam had been necessary to declare His justice and mercy.

2. The glory of divine goodness and grace was most sufficiently declared in the creation of the world and the formation of man in the image of God; But divine justice shone forth from the punishment pronounced upon the transgressor of the law, and from the casting out of the fallen angels to perpetual torments.

3. It is a malevolent benevolence, if someone wishes another to be miserable, so that he may have mercy on him, AUGUSTINE, Confessions, book III, c. 2. And, conversely, justice will not be just, if someone is said not to have found a guilty person to punish, but to have made one.

You say: If the fall of Adam had not been necessary to manifest the justice and mercy of God, God would never have permitted him to fall. But He did permit him to fall. Therefore. Resp. God did not simply permit the fall of Adam, but He placed a moral impediment to it, namely a law fortified with a most grave threat; He is not obliged to oppose a physical and violent impediment. The declaration of divine justice and mercy indeed followed the permission of the Adamic fall eventually, but not causally. For God does not permit evils for the purpose that goods may come; but when evils occur, He directs them to a good end.

ON ORIGINAL SIN

Question XII. What is original sin?

Definition of original sin. Original sin is the intimate corruption of human nature, deprived of original righteousness by the fall of the first parents, and prone to all evil.

It is more fully defined:

Original sin is the privation of original righteousness, conjoined with an evil inclination, intimately corrupting the whole human nature, derived from the fall of the first parents, and propagated through carnal generation to all men, rendering them unfit for spiritual goods, but inclined to evil, and making them guilty of divine wrath and eternal condemnation.

Obs. I. By an ecclesiastical phrase, not a biblical one, this sin, arisen from the fall of Adam, is called original, and indeed not by reason of the origin of the world or of man, but 1) because it is derived from Adam, the root and beginning of the human race; 2) because it is conjoined with the origin of the descendants of Adam; 3) because it is the origin and fount of actual sins.

Obs. II. In the sacred letters, this inborn depravity is called: 1) "Indwelling sin," Rom. VII, 17, because after the fall it has fixed a firm seat in man, and does not depart until the dwelling of the soul and body is dissolved; 2) The sin which so easily besets us (ἁμαρτία ἐνπεριστατός), Heb. XII, 2; because it surrounds us on all sides, like a long garment, hindering a runner; 3) "The law in the members," Rom. VIII, 23. For as a law rules and moderates an agent; so original sin directs the members of the body to perform evil works; 4) "Evil that is present with me" (τὸ κακὸν παρακείμενον), Rom. XII,

Question XIII. Is original depravity a sin properly so called, propagated to all posterity of Adam by carnal generation?

Original depravity is a sin in the true sense of the name, propagated by carnal generation to all men, born in a natural way from the blood of Adam.

Proof. 1) From Ps. LI, 7. "Behold! I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." Obs. a) The holy psalmist is not speaking of the sin of his parents, committed in active generation; for they were pious and had begotten this son in lawful wedlock; but of his own sin; which is evident from the preceding and following verses. For in v. 5 & 6 he says: "I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me. Against you, you only, have I sinned, and done this evil in your sight." v. 9. "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean." From which it is gathered that he also complains of his own sin in v. 7. b) David speaks without hyperbole (which the Socinians invent here), because neither did the anguish of conscience, which David felt, admit the hyperbolic flourishes of rhetoricians, nor is any necessity imposed on us to depart from the literal sense; since the holy psalmist said nothing more about his iniquity than was necessary to be said. c) David's discourse is not about actual sin, but about original and hereditary sin. For he complains of the iniquity inherent in him from conception, and of the sin passed down to him from his parents. d) From David, by parity of reasoning, we rightly conclude to the entire human race. For such as was the conception and formation of David in his mother's womb, such is the conception and formation of all men. From these presuppositions, we argue: Whoever from the first conception and formation in the mother's womb was polluted by sin, to him sin is congenital. But David and all men naturally born, etc. Therefore.

2. The first motions, or the imaginations of the human heart, testify to original sin; about which Moses says, Gen. VI, 5. "And when the LORD saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Cf. Gen. VIII, 21. "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." Obs. a) (יִצְרָם חַשְׁבֹּת) denotes not only a formed thought, but also the very formation of a thought, Is. XXIX, 5. b) Not only voluntary, but also connate formations of thoughts are designated. For it is said that "every imagination of the thoughts is evil, every day" (מִנְעוּרָיו) from youth, or infancy, and the exclusive particle "only" is added. If "only evil is every imagination of the heart"; neither concupiscence nor the proneness to sin will be excepted. From these arises the argument: Whoever every day, from his infancy, thinks only evil, to him sin is connate; But every man, etc. Therefore.

3. From Gen. V, 3. "Adam begot (a son) in his own likeness, after his own image." Obs. 1) Adam begot a son not as he was integral, but as he was fallen and corrupted by sin. 2) It is notably said: "Adam begot in his own image," not God's. From these we form an enthymeme: The son of Adam, and consequently all sons naturally descending from him, were begotten in the image of a corrupt man; Therefore they themselves are most profoundly corrupt. Consequence proven. As is the one generating, so is the one generated. A leper begets a leper, a gouty man a gouty man. Thus Adam, deprived of the image of God, procreated a son, lacking original righteousness, and infected with the plague of sin.

4. From Jo. III, 6. "Whatever is born of the flesh is flesh." These words indicate the universality of connate corruption. For "flesh" here is not taken physically, but morally, since it is opposed to the Spirit, and concretely denotes corrupt nature, abstractly the corruption of nature. Hence arises the argument: Whoever is born of parents corrupted by sin, to them moral corruption is congenital; But all men, etc. Therefore.

5. From Eph. II, 3. "We were by nature children of wrath, even as others." The apostle joins together universally Jews and Gentiles, and asserts that all are children of wrath, i.e., guilty of fault and punishment, (φύσει), by nature, i.e., from birth. For the word (φύσει) is here taken properly, and is opposed to grace (τῇ χάριτι). For just as in this v. 3 we are said to be children of wrath by nature; so later in v. 8 we are said to be saved by grace. Therefore, (τῇ φύσει) here is the same as "from birth," "from the womb we are subject to divine wrath and punishment," on account of the sin in which we are born; just as in Gal. II, 15 it is written: "We who are Jews by nature (φύσει)," born Jews; which word is opposed to proselytes, who are called Jews not by nature (φύσει), but by choice (θέσει). Thus also the Gentiles are said by nature (τῇ φύσει) to do the things contained in the law, Rom. II, 14. From which we conclude: Whoever from birth are children of wrath on account of sin, to them sin is congenital; But all, both Gentiles and Jews, etc. Therefore.

You say: The apostle writes: "we were." Which past imperfect tense denotes that which has passed, or has ceased to be; But original sin never ceases to be, but always remains, both in the regenerate and the unregenerate; Therefore the apostle is not speaking of original sin. Resp. To the Ephesians already made alive with Christ, the guilt of wrath did not inhere, yet the sin did inhere, which in itself is worthy of wrath and punishment. For the guilt of wrath is separated from the sinning and repenting person in justification, but not from the sin itself (*).

(*) Although we can obtain a distinct, complete, and certain knowledge of this most sad matter in no other way than by the light of sacred scripture; yet all would have been imbued with some notice of it, if they followed experience as their teacher, and right reason as their guide. I have two things to explain:

ONE; That there is a certain hereditary sin is clear from the most evident signs. These are chiefly to be learned from natural principles; I. That human nature is utterly corrupt. For in every man there is a certain natural repugnance against nature, which indeed manifestly declares a great corruption of nature, adversarial to its first constitution. This, as it is illustrated by the consensus of philosophers among the profane nations, not the least of them (whose testimonies are collected and presented by H. GROTIUS, on Luke II, 22, HUETIUS in his demonstr. evang. and in Question Alnet., PFANNER in his syst. Theol. gent. pur., and many others), so it is demonstrated by sufficiently evident experience; nor did CLERICUS dare to deny it, who otherwise thinks falsely on this matter. I argue from a definition to be premised: Corruption is a change of a thing, contrary to its nature, ends, and perfections. But to its perfections belong in the first place excellence and all the prerogatives by which that thing is discerned from other things inferior to it. But man discovers in himself all such things which are entirely contrary to the nature of man, and not only to his own, but also to common nature, and its excellence. Man is an animal, endowed with reason, and also formed for society. Therefore, the nature of man, and that common one indeed, is altogether threefold; one animal, but that the noblest, inasmuch as man is an animal, and indeed the principal one (and the properties of animal nature are two, which man indeed has in common with the other living beings; but in a disparate and far more eminent degree; that we live, that we feel); another moral, insofar as man is considered as an animal partaking of reason; a third social, inasmuch as man is a member of human society, obligated to preserve it, and insufficient to sustain himself outside it, so as to be able to live well and happily. But if we wish to pay attention, we immediately understand that many things in man are 1) contrary to animal nature, and that the noblest, especially these two which are perceived by sense: (a) Vehement motions of the soul, which, unless they are coerced, carry man to such a degree that immoderate desire, indeed, unbridled ferocity more than beastly, makes him worse than all living beings, so that he plunges himself into luxury, into that lust which is called Sodomitical, so that he pollutes his whole self with vices against nature (παρὰ φύσιν), Rom I, 26, so that he becomes plainly without natural affection (ἄστοργος), ibid. v. 31, 2 Tim. III, 3. (b) The misery of life, by which man has been made much inferior to any brute animals, a huge pile of sorrows, diseases both innumerable and most grievous, of which the principal cause is usually passions (παθήματα), vehement motions of the soul; yet the structure of the human body is altogether admirable, incomparable, and much excelling the body of any living creature. These things certainly are adverse to the preeminence and excellence of man, even if we consider only his animal nature as most worthy of contemplation. 2) Contrary to the moral nature of man, namely: (a) A perpetual repugnance against the law, as is in the proverb: We always strive for what is forbidden, and desire what is denied. But God has sanctioned no other laws than good and salutary ones, most consonant with reason, indeed even necessary for the life and felicity of man, as are all natural ones. In the first place, the vehement intention of the mind to eject from the soul the first of all truths, and one clearer than light; that there is a God, is to be noted. (b) The appetite for many things which right reason bids us to shun. Man sees and approves the better, yet follows the worse. (c) Pleasure contrary to honesty,

The antithesis was formerly of the Pelagians, today it is of the Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists, and Weigelians, who either plainly deny original sin, or at least assert that it has been entirely removed in

by which man, being enticed, adapts himself only to what is present, omitting providence and consideration of future events, which he indeed could and should have anticipated by thought; whence at last comes a late change of mind after the deed, which is called penitence. 3) Contrary to the social nature of man; of which kind are: great and pertinacious dissension, enmity and continual vexations, feuds, slaughters, spoils among men, and most of all among those joined by close kinship. There is, as CICERO says, no pestilence so detestable, that does not arise for man from man. Thus indeed is openly broken the bond by which nature has associated men, than which none can be tighter. Complaining of which injury, CICERO, in de officiis L. III. c. 5, fittingly used the similitude, drawn from the conjunction of the members, from which the whole body consists, which, illuminated by divine light, PAUL used, 1 Cor. XII, 14-26. II. That this great corruption of man is a native evil, not an acquired one, it will be sufficient to have brought forth three documents. First: Infants, and indeed all of them to a one, from their earliest age, and thus before they can take an example from others, betray their viciousness, they always strive for what is forbidden, they always desire what is denied. Second: They could not so easily acquire the habit and custom of sinning, unless there were naturally instilled in them, or rather innate, a certain propensity of the soul, inclined to sin. What one undertakes against the grain, so to speak, that is, with nature resisting and repugnant, will be most difficult for him; but conversely, he will pursue nothing more easily than that to which he is by nature prone and inclined. Third: All immediately and willingly follow the examples of vices; but conversely, hardly a few reluctantly allow themselves to be allured and governed by the examples of virtues and by the most salutary precepts. Therefore, not solely, nor principally, by imitation, but by a certain natural instinct, indeed impulse, men sin. ARISTOTLE called it a congenital evil (συγγενές κακόν), although he was unable to explain its true reason and causes. III. That it is necessary that the origin of this corruption, innate in men, was one and common. For the corruption itself is common, without any exception, either of man, or of vice, or of the trouble and misery of man. But the effect testifies of its cause. Therefore, we conclude by necessary reason that a common and same effect proceeds from some one common and same first cause. IV. That God cannot be the cause of this evil. He, namely, the maker of human nature, to whom not only its creation, but also its conservation must be ascribed, if He had corrupted it, and placed it in this state of repugnance, would dissent from Himself; which is openly repugnant both to the goodness and to the wisdom which is in God most perfect and immutable.

THE OTHER: But what kind of sin this is, what its origin was, how great its guilt is, and finally what remedy should be applied to it, is not established from any other source than from divine revelation. Artic. Smalcald. pag 317. Declar. Form. Conc. pag. 639. This argument, drawn a posteriori, I indeed think has the greatest force; If anyone could demonstrate the mode and origin of this depravation from principles of reason, or attain it by any conjecture; it certainly could not have happened that among so many, and so discrepant, sects of philosophers, one or another most wise man would not have been rightly and successfully engaged in investigating this matter. But all philosophers, lacking the light of revelation, and indulging their own genius, have been much deluded. Some of them have feigned a pre-existence of souls (προϋπαρξιν), as if all souls had sinned together, long before each was joined with its body. For whence that common corruption of human nature, in so many and so diverse generations? (Prop I. & III.) Others have established transmigration (μετεμψύχωσιν), or rather re-embodiment (μετενσωμάτωσιν), which opinion is no less absurd, nor less inept, for giving a reason: why this most miserable condition is common. (Prop. III.) Most have fallen into such rashness as to think that there are two eternal principles, neither of which depends on the will of the other, but they are contrary, one good, the other evil. Which perverse opinion, although most ancient, is certainly the most absurd of all, and if it is accurately weighed, it contains in itself a manifest contradiction. The most excellent philosophers all profess that nothing in the whole of philosophy is more difficult than this disputation: on the origin of evil. Therefore, one should not hesitate about the necessity of revelation.

the New Testament. They fight against us with the following arguments.

I. Ezech. XVIII, 20. "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father." From which words they gather; Whoever are sons of Adam, ought not to bear his iniquity; But all the posterity of Adam are his sons; Therefore. Resp. 1) I distinguish between the father of certain individuals, and the father of the whole human race. It is not licit to argue from the former to the latter. For the former had received gifts and privileges to be either preserved or lost for the whole human race; which since he lost by his fall, the loss redounded to the whole human race. Wherefore the sin of Adam is common, or universal; the sins of other fathers are personal, or singular. The prophet's discourse is about these, and so his meaning is; The innocent son will not bear the personal sin of his immediate parent, i.e., he will not suffer the punishment for the singular sin of his impious parent, if he himself cultivates piety. For the prophet is not dealing with guilt to be derived to posterity, but with punishment to be inflicted on them. 2) Granted original sin, we suffer the punishment not so much of Adam's sin, as of our own sin; because original sin propagated to us inheres in us, and thus properly belongs to us.

II. One act cannot produce a habit; The disobedience of the first parents was one act; Therefore it could not produce a sinful habit. The major premise is established; because an acquired habit is obtained by frequent actions. Resp. I distinguish between perfective habits, and vicious, or corruptive ones. A vicious habit can be acquired by one act, and transmitted to posterity, for instance, consumption can arise from one immoderate draft of wine or beer, leprosy from one contact with a leper; which plague is not rarely transmitted to posterity. The fallen angels by one inordinate act fell into a vicious habit. 2) There are also perfective habits acquired by one act, e.g., in a demonstration of the reasoned fact (τῷ διότι), if by one act of demonstration the cause of the conclusion has been known certainly and evidently, the habit of science concerning this conclusion has been acquired.

III. Whatever evil act is not ours, its effect does not redound to us; But the fall of Adam is not, or was not, our act; Therefore its effect, which is original sin, does not redound to us. Resp. Whatever evil act is not ours, neither physically nor morally, its effect could not redound to us; I grant. But the sinful act of Adam is ours, morally and by imputation, because we were all in Adam, the stock, root, and beginning, both natural and moral, of the entire human race.

IV. Infants are innocent, Ps. CVI, 38. The infants of the pious are called holy, 1 Cor. VII, 14. Therefore they are not contaminated by original sin. Resp. 1) Infants are innocent with a comparative, not an absolute, innocence. Comparatively they are innocent because they have committed no sins of choice; but absolutely they are not holy, because they are conceived in sins, Ps. LI, 7, and by nature are children of wrath, Eph. II, 3. 2) The infants of the pious are called holy with an ecclesiastical, or external, holiness; because they are born in the church, and for them the nearest access to the benefits of the church is open; but they are not holy before baptism with the holiness of faith, or internal holiness.

Instance: In baptism sin is taken away; Therefore sin does not inhere in baptized infants. Resp. Sin is taken away in baptism, not so that it is not, but so that it is not imputed. The guilt and dominion of sin are taken away in baptism, not the root of sin.

V. Whoever is ignorant of the law, does not sin; Infants are ignorant of the law; Therefore. The major premise is established; because for sin a presupposed knowledge of the law is required. Resp. Whoever is ignorant of the law, and cannot know it; they do not commit actual and voluntary sins. But original sin is a hectic and naturally congenital depravity, and is a deviation from the inscribed law, although infants are ignorant of the prescribed law.

VI. Whatever is natural to man, is not a sin properly so called; Original sin is natural to man; Therefore. The major premise shines by its own light; because natural things are not morally base. Resp. 1) Whatever is natural to man in the state of instituted nature, that is not a sin properly so called; I grant. But original sin is natural to man in the state of destitute nature. 2) Things that are constitutively and consecutively natural are not base; but those that are subjectively, transitively, and corruptively natural can be morally or physically base. Hereditary disease is natural, and yet physically base.

VII. If original sin is propagated by generation, marriages must be condemned; But these are not to be condemned; Therefore original sin is not propagated by generation. The consequence of the major premise is proven; because marriages will be impure, if original sin is propagated to children born of a legitimate bed. Resp. I distinguish between marriages considered in themselves, inasmuch as they are divinely ordained; and considered accidentally, inasmuch as a vice adheres to natural generation. The vices of nature do not take away the benefits of God.

Question XIV. What is the efficient cause of original sin?

The efficient cause of Original Sin. The remote efficient cause of original sin is the first human beings; whose fall, since it was imputed to the whole human race, moral foulness could not but be derived through carnal generation to all posterity a). But the proximate cause of this connate stain is our parents, from whose impure blood the original spot has passed to our soul b).

Proof a. "Through one man sin entered the world, and through sin death, and so death passed upon all men, in whom all sinned," Rom. V, 12. We have examined these words of the apostle above. Here we only observe that the imputation of Adam's fall, by which he deprived not only himself but also his posterity of original righteousness, is the foundation of the propagation of original sin through carnal generation. For the apostle, about to teach that through Adam sin entered the world, i.e., all men, or was propagated, gives this reason for the most widely propagated sin: "because in Adam all sinned." But all sinned in Adam not physically; for they did not yet exist when Adam sinned; therefore morally, or by imputation. Namely, the fall of Adam was adjudicated to the whole human race by the most just estimation of God, so that on account of the first sin Adam and his posterity were reputed sinners before the divine tribunal, i.e., devoid of original righteousness, and prone to all evil. Hence it happens that the defect of concreated righteousness and the proclivity to evil accompanies the generation of all men who descend from Adam by the natural way. Nor does God prevent extraordinarily, and by a miracle, the propagation of this stain, and its accompaniment with the generation of the rational creature, which, by first transgressing the divine law, abused its freedom of will. Conf. HULSEM. breviar. enucleat. p. 286.

Proof b. "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" Job. XIV, 4. Job speaks not of the external uncleanness of the body, but of the internal of the soul, on account of which we are rendered subject to the judgment of God, v. 3; nor is his discourse about actual uncleanness, but about habitual and universal, as that which, proceeding from an impure birth, inheres intimately in the soul. Thus everyone follows the seeds of his own nature. A black crow does not beget a white dove, nor a fierce lion a gentle lamb, nor a man polluted with congenital sin produce a holy son.

Question XV. Who is infected with original sin?

The subject of Original Sin. All men descending from Adam by natural generation are infected with original sin.

Obs. The original stain has been sprinkled on all and every man to whom natural birth from Adam has occurred. Therefore Christ was contaminated by neither original nor actual stain; because he was begotten not by the ordinary way of nature, but conceived by the supernatural and miraculous advent (ἐπελευσιν) of the Holy Spirit, and thus was holy, innocent, undefiled, and separate from sinners. Hebr. VII, 26.

Proof. 1) From Jo. III, 5, 6. "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God; that which is born of the flesh is flesh." The Savior urges the universal necessity of regeneration because of the universal corruption of the human race, and confirms that all men who would enter the kingdom of God are unworthy of regeneration, because all men born of flesh from flesh, i.e., begotten of parents polluted by sin, and are defiled with the contagion of corrupt flesh.

2. "All men have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God," Rom. III, 23. With which words the apostle describes original sin by the privation of the divine image. For the defect of that glory which man had received in creation is designated by him, just as if he concluded a posteriori: Whoever sins, they are destitute of concreated righteousness; But all men sin. Therefore, all are destitute of concreated righteousness.

You say: Enoch and Elijah were free from original sin, otherwise they would not have been taken up alive into heaven, into which nothing unclean enters, Apocal. XXI, 27. Resp. Enoch and Elijah were by nature children of wrath and thus subject to original sin, Eph. II, 3, but by grace they were regenerated and reputed just.

Question XVI. Was the Blessed Mary, the Mother of God, conceived without original sin?

The Blessed Virgin Mary was not conceived without original sin.

Proof. 1) Because original sin was diffused into all men, begotten by natural way from the blood of Adam. See preced. question.

2. A conception immune from sin belongs to Christ alone, Luke 1, 35. If the Blessed Mary had been free from sin, why was the mass of blood, from which the body of Christ was to be constructed, sanctified by the miraculous advent of the Holy Spirit? But since this was done by the most profound counsel of God, we gather that Christ alone among men enjoyed the privilege of sinlessness (τῆς ἀναμαρτησίας). He alone is said to be "separate from sinners," Hebr. VII, 26.

3. Actual sins (although venial) of St. Mary are recorded in the sacred code: Carelessness in guarding Jesus, lest he be lost, Luke II, 43; meddlesomeness (πολυπραγμοσύνη), truly reprehended by Christ at the wedding in Cana, Jo. II, 3, 4; an inopportune interruption of Jesus while preaching, Matth. XII, 46, Mark III, 31. But actual sins testify of original sin, just as the fruit of the root, the offspring of the mother, the streams of the fount.

The antithesis is of the Franciscans, Scotists, and Jesuits among the Pontificians, who opine that St. Mary was conceived without the contagion of Adam, and have bound themselves by the faith of an oath to defend this opinion. On the contrary, the Thomists and Dominicans state that B. Mary was indeed conceived in original stain, but was afterwards so sanctified that she was immune from sins. Most of the arguments of the Franciscans are futile, the following seem worthy of review:

I. Mary is called "full of grace" and "blessed among women," Luke I, 28. From which words they gather: Whatever woman is full of grace and blessed among women, she is free from sin; But Mary, etc. Therefore. Resp. 1) Mary is called passively graced (κεχαριτωμένη), i.e., having obtained grace. But the faithful are also graced (κεχαριτωμένοι), i.e., having obtained grace, Eph. I, 6. Jael is called blessed (Εὐλογημένη) or praised above women, Judg. V, 24. Therefore, the sinlessness (ἀναμαρτησία) of Mary cannot be concluded from the words of the angel. 2) By the grace which Mary obtained is denoted the singular and most eminent privilege of maternity, that by divine condescension she would be the future mother of the Messiah.

II. Mary is "all fair without a spot," Cant. IV, 7. Therefore, her conception is immaculate. Resp. The spouse all fair, without a spot, is the triumphant church, which has no spot or wrinkle, as Paul testifies, Ephes. V, 27.

III. Mary is called a "closed gate," Ezech. XLIV, 2. Therefore, to the devil instigating to sin, access to the soul of Mary was not open. Resp. Ezechiel speaks of the gate of the temple; yet the ancient doctors considered that the perpetual virginity of Mary, not her absolute impeccability, was typically adumbrated by the prophet. See D. SCHERZERI Anti-Bellarm. p. 675.

IV. Eve was a type of Mary; But Eve was formed without original sin; Therefore Mary also was conceived without original sin. Resp. 1) S. scripture nowhere asserts that Eve is a type of Mary. 2) Not all things that are in the type are predicated of the antitype. For Eve was formed in a state of integrity, Mary in a state of corruption. 3) By the same reasoning, we conclude: David was a type of Christ; David was born of a sinful mother; Therefore Christ also.

V. If Christ was born of a sinful mother, he himself was contaminated with original stain; The latter is false; Therefore also the former. The consequence of the major premise is proven; because a sinful mother begets a sinful son. For who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Job. XIV, 4. Resp. I deny the consequence. For a sinful mother begets a sinful son, unless the extraordinary and miraculous grace of the Holy Spirit intervenes, preventing the concomitance of original sin with the generation of the mother and the production of the offspring.

Instance: But the drops of Mary's blood, from which the body of Christ was formed, were infected with the poison of sin; Therefore Christ was conceived and born from impure blood. Resp. The drops of Mary's blood, from which the body of Christ was formed, considered with respect to their designated being (esse respectivum), inasmuch as they were divinely deputed for the conception of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), were separated from the poison of sin by the miraculous advent of the Holy Spirit. From which Christ is called "separate from sinners," Hebr. VII, 26.

Question XVII. Does original sin reside in the soul of man, or in the body?

The subject in which O.S. is The primary seat of original sin is the soul with its faculties a); the secondary seat is the body with its members b).

Proof a. Just as the soul was the first recipient (πρῶτον δεκτικόν), or primary seat of concreated wisdom and holiness; so original sin, which succeeded in its place, proximately and immediately infected the soul, and its faculties, so that the intellect is darkened to knowing spiritual goods, the will inclines to evils, the sensitive appetite, having shaken off the rule of reason, is carried headlong into the lusts of the flesh.

Proof b. The body indeed in itself seems a brute thing, not capable of sin; but inasmuch as it is under the dominion of the soul, contaminated by sin, it is called the secondary subject of original sin; because the faculties of the soul use the members of the body, as organs, in sin. For which reason S. Paul gravely exhorts, Rom. VI, 12. "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that you should obey it in its lusts, neither yield your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin."

Question XVIII. In what does original sin formally consist?

The formal aspect of O.S. Original sin formally consists in the privation of original righteousness, which ought to be in man a), and in carnal concupiscence, or the inclination to evil b).

Obs. I. Privation is divided into simple, and composite. Simple privation is the absence of a thing, which ought to be present by nature, in a capable subject, e.g., blindness in a man. Composite privation is that which is conjoined with an act, or an evil habit. Surely blindness and evil vision differ, deafness and perverse hearing, the lack of sound in a lyre and a harsh sound, ignorance of simple negation and an evil disposition. We state that original sin is indeed a privation, but not a mere or simple one, but one conjoined with an evil habit.

Obs. II. Positive is taken either in a metaphysical sense, or in an ethical, or moral sense. The positive said in a metaphysical sense is distinguished into entitative and modificative. An entitative positive is being itself, and that either uncreated, or created, either substance, or accident. A modificative positive is given in the modes of being, e.g., in transcendental goodness, truth, duration, the presence of being. In an ethical, or moral sense, a positive is an inclination or determination leading, instigating, and effectively disposing to evil. It is called by Theologians evil concupiscence, inordinate disposition, corrupt habit, a habit turned towards evil.

Obs. III. D. CHEMNITIUS in his theological loci, on original sin, fol. m. 225, shows that AUGUSTINE defined original sin by concupiscence; ANSELM, by the lack of original righteousness, which ought to be present; but HUGH taught that original sin is ignorance in the mind, concupiscence in the flesh; The Sententiaries afterwards fought among themselves about those definitions, which was truer and better; SCOTUS with his followers embraced Anselm's definition; others fought for Augustine's definition so as to reject Anselm's; but BONAVENTURE prudently judged that both definitions were true, and that one of them included the other. The Augsburg Confession art. II does not depart from this last opinion: "The churches among us teach, that after the fall of Adam all men, propagated according to nature, are born with sin, that is, without the fear of God, without trust in God, and with concupiscence." This doctrine of the Augsburg Confession is explained and confirmed in the apology, p. 55. "We have rightly expressed both in the description of original sin, namely those defects, not being able to believe God, not being able to fear and love God; Also having concupiscence, which seeks carnal things against the word of God, that is, which seeks not only the pleasures of the body, but also carnal wisdom and justice, and trusts in these goods, contemning God." And not only the ancients, but also the more recent, if there are any more sensible ones, teach at the same time that these things are truly original sin, namely the defects just mentioned, and concupiscence. For so says THOMAS: "Original sin has the privation of original justice, and with this an inordinate disposition of the parts of the soul, whence it is not a pure privation, but a certain corrupt habit." And BONAVENTURE: "When it is asked, what is original sin, it is rightly answered, that it is immoderate concupiscence; it is also rightly answered, that it is the lack of due justice; and in one of these answers the other is included." HUGH thought the same, when he says:

"original sin is ignorance in the mind and concupiscence in the flesh."

Obs. IV. The word "concupiscence," when it is distinguished from that to which it is contrary, is ambiguous; for it denotes either the natural power of concupiscence, or a superadded evil inclination. Between that and this there is a great difference. For the natural appetite of man, or the appetitive power of the soul, which is conceived as the subject or material of original sin, is one thing; and evil original concupiscence, which corrupts that power, and formally constitutes original sin, is another. For that is from God, this is not; that is a positive being strictly taken and created, this is not; that is indifferent, this is determinate; that is a natural and concreated power, this is a superadded and introduced quality; that perfects human nature, this destroys and contaminates it.

Proof a. 1) All sin is lawlessness (ἀνομία), 1 Jo. III, 4, i.e., a defect of moral rectitude, which we are obliged to have by the law. Therefore also original sin. 2) Paul defines original sin by the lack of the glory of God, Rom. III, 23, designating the defect of that glory with which man was adorned by God in creation; whence we gather that the privation of the divine image, which we all lack after the fall, is noted. For the image of God was glory, granted to man by God in creation, and we are all destitute of it, after we suffered the loss of original righteousness in Adam.

Proof b. 1) Because original sin in the intellect is not only an ignorance of simple negation, but also of an evil disposition, or a horrendous error; since the unregenerate gentiles not only did not know the true God, but also "changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things," Rom. III, 23. Indeed, there is also found in the intellect of the unregenerate man, besides ignorance of spiritual things, a certain connate proneness to make rash and false judgments about them. For spiritual things are foolishness to the unregenerate man, 1 Cor. II, 14, i.e., he judges that the mysteries of faith are absurd and impossible. But that propensity for rash judgments about matters of faith implies more than the privation of knowledge.

2. Original sin in the will of man is not only a lack of original righteousness, but also an inclination and determination to evil. For this reason man, constituted outside the state of grace, is called a "servant of sin," Rom. VI, 13, and sin is said to "reign in his mortal body, that he should obey it in the lusts thereof," v. 12, because, since he cannot of himself do those things which are holy, he is carried to the contrary, to those things which are evil, just as if he ought to act so, or his will were bent by the command of a superior. Hence, besides the lack of divine love, there is in the will of man hatred and enmity against God, security and contempt of spiritual things, self-love (φιλαυτία), care for the world, and trust fixed in creatures.

3. O.S. in the sensitive appetite is not only a privation of the obedience due to the superior faculties, but also the rebellion of the flesh against the spirit, Gal. V, 17, a bestial inclination, the stupidity of an ass, the pride of a peacock, the avarice of a wolf, the cunning of a fox, the ferocity of a lion.

4. O.S., according to the testimony of S. scripture, approaches the analogy of an operative and difficult-to-move habit. For it is called "easily besetting" (ἐνπερίστατον), most tenaciously inherent, surrounding on all sides, and pressing from every direction, Hebr. XII, 1. It is said to inhabit and to work, Rom. VII, 17. Surely no privation operates positively, as O.S. does. For connate concupiscence, which we call the formal positive of O.S., produces actual sin by an abstractive act, as "drawing away" (ἐξέλκουσα); an alluring act, as "enticing" (δεδεαζουσα); a confirmatory act, as "conceiving" (συλλαβοῦσα), James 1, 14. Therefore it is a positive habit, and not a mere privation; since that which cannot positively draw away a man, entice him, conceive and bring forth actual sin, or bring it into act.

The antithesis is 1) of some Scholastics and mostly of the Pontificians, 2) of the Arminians, who state that original sin is a mere privation of original righteousness, which ought to be present. Their principal arguments are:

I. Every positive is good, and either uncreated, or created. But O.S. is neither good, nor uncreated, nor created. Therefore O.S. is not something positive. The major premise is established; because every positive is a being, and therefore good, and either uncreated, like God; or created, like a creature, whose efficient cause is God. Resp. I distinguish between a metaphysical and a moral positive. A metaphysical positive, and that an entitative one, is a good being, and either the creator, or a creature. But a moral positive is neither the creator, nor always a creature, e.g., the inclination to evil is something positive, yet it itself was not created by God; because God made man upright and very good, without any evil inclination. The temptation to evil is something positive, yet it does not derive its origin from God, but from original concupiscence, Jac. 1, 14. The determination to evil is something positive, yet it does not proceed from God; because God is the universal cause determining no one to evil.

II. If there is some positive in creatures which does not depend on God, there will be a being which was not made by God; The consequent is false; Therefore also the antecedent. The falsity of the consequent appears from Jo. 1, 3. "All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." Resp. 1) Not every positive is a being, since there is also a modificative positive, e.g., in presence, duration, etc. And if you call the determination to evil a modificative positive, you will not have deviated from the truth. 2) It is not absurd that there be some positive not produced by God, if it is morally evil. Who would dare to assert that evil concupiscence, and its fecundity and impregnation, Jac. I, 14, evil thoughts, the inordinate disposition of the soul, the rebellion of the sensitive appetite against right reason, the determination of physical motion to evil, and its conjunction with viciousness proceed from God? Would not God be constituted the cause of sin by such an assertion? 3) In Jo. I, 3, the discourse is properly about natural beings, produced in the first six days, not however about moral good or evil. Confer. D. HULSEMANN. brev. enucl. p. 273. seqq.

III. All lawlessness (ἀνομία) is a privation: Original sin is lawlessness (ἀνομία); Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between simple and composite privation. Original sin is indeed a privation, but not a mere or simple one, but a composite one, and conjoined with an evil habit, or a perverse concupiscence, an inclination and determination to evil.

IV. Evil concupiscence, or the inclination and determination to evil, pertains to the material, not to the formal, of original sin. Namely, original sin, taken concretely, denominatively, and materially, includes concupiscence, proclivity, and determination to evil; but if it is taken abstractly and formally, it is only the privation of original justice, which ought to be present. Resp. This is as if you wished to describe a harsh sound by the absence of a pleasant sound, an error by the defect of true science, a rebellion by the privation of obedience; which descriptions would be inadequate and by no means sufficient. For a harsh sound implies more than the absence of a pleasant sound, an error more than the defect of true science, a rebellion more than the privation of obedience, namely, the position of a contrary act or habit. By a parallel reason, original sin is less adequately defined by the lack of original justice, which ought to be present, because in the place of the lost divine image has succeeded a habitual inclination to internal and external acts, forbidden by the divine law, which we commonly call original concupiscence. This pertains to the formal aspect of original sin; because it enters into its definition, and in the nominative case is predicated of it; For original sin, as defined by HUGH, is "ignorance in the mind and concupiscence in the flesh."

V. Whoever asserts that original sin is an accident, a quality, and a habit, they must confess that original sin is a being produced by God; But the evangelical doctors, etc. Therefore. The consequence of the major premise is proven; because a habit is a quality, a quality is an accident, an accident is a being produced by God. Resp. The evangelical doctors assert that original sin is a habit, a quality, and an accident, not in metaphysical precision (ἀκριβείᾳ), but in a moral, and broader, sense. For original sin is called an accident, a quality, and a habit analogically; because it inheres in the vitiated soul in the manner of an accident. In the manner of a quality, it is the principle of an evil action; in the manner of a habit, it renders man prompt and ready for sinning.

Question XIX. Is original sin the substance of man?

Whether O.S. is the substance of man. Original sin is not the substance of man itself, but is a depravity devoid of the due good, and prone to the undue evil, like a hereditary and abominable disease, most deeply inherent in the substance of man.

Proof. 1) The sacred writings openly distinguish the original stain from the very substance of man. Paul in Rom. VII, 21 calls original sin "the evil that is present." In v. 17 he says: "Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." In Hebr. XII, 1 it is called "the sin which doth so easily beset us." But, whatever is present to man, dwells in him, and besets him, that is not the very substance of man.

2. All sin is lawlessness (ἀνομία), 1 Jo. III, 4. Therefore also original sin. But lawlessness (ἀνομία) is a deviation from the law, and thus a privation. Who in his right mind would dare to call the substance of man a privation?

3. The adverse opinion is repugnant to many articles of faith, and indeed a) to the article of creation. For God not only created human nature before the fall; but also the same after the fall is the work and creature of God. "Your hands have made me and fashioned me," says Job, ch. X, 8. Conf. Ps. CXXXIX, 13. Eccl. XII, 7. But God is not the creator or author of original sin; since that is the work of the devil. b) To the article of incarnation. For the son of God in the personal union assumed our human nature, but without sin, Hebr. IV, 15, c. VII, 26. c) To the article of renewal. For God cleanses and sanctifies man from sin, 1 Cor. VI, 11. But that which is sanctified is one thing, and that which is taken away by sanctification is another. d) To the article of resurrection. For Christ will resurrect our same nature from the dead, and will adorn it with great glory; but God will not resurrect original sin in the elect, nor will He ever adorn it with celestial glory, or save it, but in that blessed resurrection it will be plainly abolished. See solid. declarat. Form. concord. pag. 647. sqq.

The antithesis is 1) of the Manicheans, who established that there are two co-eternal principles, good and evil; from the evil principle a bad substance was produced, from the good a good one; and that man consists of these substances; and on the last day the bad substance will be separated from the good. 2) of Matthias Flacius, Illyricus, Professor first at Wittenberg, then at Jena, little versed in philosophy, otherwise a most learned theologian, who in the heat of a disputation with Victorinus Strigelius held at Weimar in the year 1561, imprudently asserted that original sin is the substance of man. But he distinguished between formal and material substance; by the former he understood the image of God in the first parents, by the latter man himself consisting of soul and body. Therefore he said the formal substance was corrupted, and in its place original sin had succeeded; but the material remained, although greatly vitiated. Furthermore, he distinguished between man considered physically and theologically. If man is considered in philosophy, his substance is body and soul; but in theology it is taught that original sin is of the essence of corrupt man, he asserted. From which it is evident that Flacius did not so absolutely teach that original sin is the very substance of man, but that theologically it is called the essence of corrupt man. His cruder disciples, having progressed further, did not hesitate to affirm that O.S. is the very substance of man. Conf. D. JOANN. MUSAEI praelect. in Form. Concord. p. 45. The principal arguments of the Flacians are the following:

I. Whatever sin is of the essence of corrupt man, is not badly called his substance; But original sin, etc. Therefore. Resp. I deny the major and distinguish between an absolute and a respective essential. Whatever is of the essence of man, insofar as he is corrupt, cannot absolutely be called the substance of man. The reason is; because whatever is asserted of a certain state of man, is not simply affirmed of him, e.g., doctrine is of the essence of a learned man, insofar as he is a learned man; yet this is not his substance.

II. If O.S. were not a substance, it could not corrupt the whole substance of man; But O.S. has corrupted the whole substance of man; Therefore. Conseq. of maj. proven. because an accident does not have the power to corrupt the whole substance. Resp. 1) I distinguish between the physical and theological corruption of man. By physical corruption a natural body is resolved into the parts of which it consists; but in a theological sense the nature of man is said to be corrupted by O.S. not absolutely and simply, but in relation to spiritual objects, pious motions and acts concerning spiritual things; because by the first sin of men the human intellect was blinded, so that it does not understand the things of the Spirit; the will was rendered inept for choosing spiritual good, and prone to evil; the sensitive appetite was made rebellious to the superior faculties, and inclined to seize the apparent good that is pleasing to the senses. 2) Corruption theologically speaking is subjective, not terminative. It is subjective; because it is a horrendous depravation of the subject, remaining in its substance; but it is not terminative; because it did not so destroy human nature that it ceased to be what it was before. Therefore we easily respond to the objection taken from the ecclesiastical song: Durch Adams Fall ist ganz verderbt menschlich Natur und Wesen (Through Adam's fall is wholly corrupted human nature and being). The nature of man is corrupted subjectively, not terminatively. See IOANN. MUSAEUS l. c. pag. 62.

III. Whatever in the sacred writings is described with words denoting the human substance itself, that is the substance of man; But original sin, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven, because it is called "flesh," Jo. III, 6, "the old man," Rom. VI, 6, Col. III, 9, "the body of sin," Rom. VI. Resp. I distinguish between the description of original sin, taken abstractly, and concretely. When O.S. is taken formally and abstractly, it is defined by lawlessness (ἀνομίαν), 1 Jo. III, 4. But when it is taken concretely, it connotes that subject in which it most deeply inheres. Thus it is called "flesh"; which word denotes both the substance of man, and the vice adhering to it. It is called "the old man," not physically by reason of its substance, but ethically and theologically, by reason of its qualities. For "the old man" concretely designates the nature of man, corrupted by O.S.; abstractly it notes the corruption instilled in human nature. "The body of sin" does not signify the corporeal substance of man, but the mass of sin. For just as a flock, a people, a legion are called bodies; so original sin is called a body, because it diffuses itself into various actual sins and expresses itself in various operations, just as if there existed a certain body, consisting and composed of diverse members, Col. III, 4.

IV. Whatever is an accident, can be present and absent without the destruction of the subject; But original sin cannot be present without the destruction of the subject. Therefore. The major is evident from the definition of an accident. The minor is clear, because 1) by original sin the spiritual powers of the soul once concreated are corrupted; 2) because O.S. is not absent before the man himself perishes. Resp. I distinguish between a predicable and a predicamental accident. The former is said of its subject contingently, and is opposed to the essence; the latter is in another as in a subject, and is opposed to the substance. O.S. is called by some theologians an accident not predicable, but predicamental; because it is not an external, easily movable accident, but an internal and difficultly movable one. Besides, O.S. is called an accident not univocally, but analogically, because it is in fallen man in the manner of a vicious habit, and renders him ready and prompt for sinning.

V. Whatever fights with the law of God, is sin, 1 Jo. III, 4; But the whole unregenerate man, etc. Therefore. Resp. Whatever formally and in itself fights with the law of God, is sin; I grant. But the whole man does not formally and in himself, as he is man, fight with the law of God, but insofar as he is corrupted by sin, and thus accidentally fights with the law of God. Namely, man is the subject of lawlessness (τῆς ἀνομίας), not lawlessness (ἀνομία) itself.

VI. If original sin is not the substance of man, Christ cannot be called sin; But Christ is called sin; Therefore. Conseq. of major proven; because Christ by putting on human nature, put on sin, 2 Cor. V, 21. Resp. I deny the conseq. of the major; because Christ put on human nature by personal union, without inherent sin; but he transferred our sins to himself imputatively.

VII. D. LUTHER called original sin the sin of nature, the sin of the person, substantial or essential sin; Therefore, according to the judgment of this eminent doctor of the church, original sin pertains to the very essence of man. Resp. The locutions of Luther are to be understood not simply (ἀπλῶς), or absolutely, but comparatively (συγκριτικῶς), with respect to actual sins. Namely, the Blessed Luther used those forms of speaking to show the difference between original and actual sin; and he called original sin the sin of nature, of the person, essential, not as if it were the essential constitutive or consecutive of human nature, but because 1) it has the same origin with the nature, essence, and person of man, and is thus congenital (σὺμφυτον), or connate to it; just as for him who is blind from birth, blindness is called natural; 2) because it inheres intimately in human nature, has infected the whole of it, and is thus subjectively natural; 3) because it is transitively natural, because it is propagated from man to posterity by natural generation.

Question XX. What are the effects of original sin?

Effects of O.S. The effects, or consequences, of original sin are; internal and external actual sins a), the defect of free will in spiritual matters, and its infirmity in natural matters b), the privation of grace and the wrath of God opposed to this c), temporal death, and the diseases and various sorrows of this life that precede it d), and finally eternal condemnation e).

Proof a. The royal prophet, pleading from the most merciful God for the remission of the sins which he had committed, indicates that the fount of these is original sin by groaning, Ps. LI, 7. "Behold! I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." The apostle agrees, complaining, Rom. VII, 17. "Now then it is no more I that do it (evil), but sin that dwelleth in me." Therefore all the first and involuntary motions of evil concupiscence, as well as all external sins, are the evil fruits of original sin as the root.

Proof b. From 1 Cor. II, 14. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." The apostle teaches that such a darkness has been induced upon the human intellect by original sin, that it can neither apprehend purely spiritual things, unless divinely illuminated, nor can it rightly represent them to the will, which in itself is a blind power. Hence it happens that the intellect makes rash and false judgments about the mysteries of faith, while the will is turned away from spiritual goods, and turned towards temporal, fleeting, and carnal goods.

Proof c. From Eph. II, 3. "We were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." The unconverted and unregenerate man exists in a state of wrath, from his birth. Therefore, on account of congenital sin, he is both devoid of grace and subject to the wrath of God.

Proof d. Whatever comes under the name of death, God threatened to sinful man. Gen. II, 17. Therefore, the guilt of spiritual, corporal, and eternal death followed original sin. The forerunners of temporal death are diseases, and the various sorrows of this life as its companions, which God, the hater and avenger of sin, pronounced upon Eve, seduced by the serpent, and upon the fallen Adam, Gen. III, 16, 17.

Proof e. "By the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation" (εἰς κατάκριμα), Rom. V, 18. The first sin of Adam, from which original sin is derived, is the meritorious cause of the universal condemnation of men, which, however, the reborn escape, embracing the satisfaction of the surety Christ by true faith.

Question XXI. What are the affections, or properties, of original sin?

Affections of O.S. The affections of original sin are: propagability a), and a pertinacious adhesion extending to the end of life b).

Proof a. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." He who is born of parents infected with original contagion, is a partaker of the same plague, and therefore in need of regeneration, if he is to enter the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom.

You say: Regenerate parents do not propagate original sin; because they have been washed from it. 1 Cor. VI, 11. Resp. As a learned father begets an unlearned son; so a regenerate man generates an unregenerate one, because he still carries the old nature among the sons of this age, not from that by which he was promoted into newness among the sons of God, as AUGUSTINE says in book II of De peccatorum meritis et remissione, chap. 9.

Proof b. Original sin is the sin which so easily besets us (ἁμαρτία ἐνπερίστατος), Heb. XII, 1. It is called "besetting"; because it adheres to us most tenaciously, surrounds us on all sides and embraces us like a garment, which hinders a runner; which the regenerate never fully put off or cast off, although aided by the Holy Spirit they resist its motions, and diminish its powers by exercises of piety, and to this extent are said to put it off.

Question XXII. Is the evil concupiscence in justified and renewed men a sin in the true sense of the name?

The evil original concupiscence, together with the first inordinate motions by which it expresses itself, is truly and properly called sin.

Obs. The question is not about natural and indifferent concupiscence; such as the appetite for food, drink, sleep; nor about spiritual concupiscence, desiring a supernatural good, which is proper to the regenerate, who with David desire to see God, Ps. XLII, 1; but about evil concupiscence, which is either original or actual. Actual concupiscence is either mortal, which is joined with consent, delight, and pursuit of that thing to which the flesh stimulates us, or venial, which notes the first motions of the soul soliciting us to sins, which we repress by the Holy Spirit, lest they break forth into an external act (*). Original concupiscence is the habitual inclination to evil, expressing itself in inordinate motions. The question is, whether original concupiscence, depraving the intellect, will, and sensitive appetite, together with the first inordinate motions in justified and renewed men, is truly and properly considered and called sin? To which question we respond affirmatively.

Proof. 1) All lawlessness (ἀνομία), or dislegality, is a sin properly so called; But all evil concupiscence is lawlessness (ἀνομία): Therefore. The minor is proven from the assertion of the apostle, Rom. VII, 7. "I had not known sin, but by the law." For "I had not known concupiscence (to be sin), unless the law had said: you shall not covet," Exod. XX, 17. By which divine interdiction all evil concupiscence, both original and actual, is prohibited.

You say: By the divine precept is prohibited not involuntary concupiscence, but deliberate and voluntary; which is evident 1) from the Hebrew word (תַּחַמֵּד), which word does not signify to have concupiscence, which is a vice of our nature, but merely to desire and long for. 2) This precept is not given to brutes, nor to children, but to an intelligent creature, using reason and free will, which alone is capable of law, and alone can fulfill or transgress the law. But involuntary motions are no more human acts, or in the power of man, than they are in the power of a lion, a dog, a horse. Therefore, just as a lion cannot be commanded not to be angry; a dog, not to snarl; a horse, not to neigh; so neither can a man, not to feel the first motions of concupiscence, and he who would punish them would be a tyrant. Resp. 1) By the divine precept all illicit concupiscence is forbidden, since it is limited by no restriction. But when Paul says that he had not known concupiscence to be sin, unless the law had said: "you shall not covet"; he refers especially to indeliberate and involuntary concupiscence; which he could not know to be sin, except from the decalogue law; but that voluntary desires are sins, the sounder gentiles acknowledged from the unwritten natural law. 2) Even if it cannot be proven from (תַּחַמֵּד), that involuntary concupiscence is prohibited, yet it can be shown from the words, (לֹא תַחַמֵּד) you shall not make yourself to covet. 3) There is a huge difference between man, to whom a law is prescribed, and a beast, to which no law is given; although after the fall man cannot perfectly keep the law. What? Is not even in a beast its immense ferocity coerced without tyranny; so that, mindful of the blows, it unlearns its ferocity.

2. Paul calls the concupiscence remaining in the regenerate sin more than once, Rom. VII, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 17, 20, 23, 25. Conf. Rom. VI, 6, 12, 13, 14. Rom. VIII, 5, 10.

You say: Concupiscence is called sin by metonymy; because it is the cause of sin, if it is obeyed. Resp. Concupiscence is properly and formally called sin, since no necessity compels us to depart from the proper signification of the word, especially because ch. VII of Romans is the proper seat of this doctrine. Surely holy scripture does not speak tropically on articles of faith in their proper seat, or at least it indicates and declares the trope. Besides, if concupiscence is the cause of sin, it is itself certainly sin. For this reason Paul calls concupiscence something not good, but evil, Rom. VII, 19. But everything morally evil is sin.

3. The effects of evil concupiscence are: to render the regenerate man partly carnal, to sell him under sin, to work evil, to fight against the law of the mind, and to make man a captive under the law of sin, and thus most miserable before the face of God, Rom. VII, 14, 20, 23, 24; to lust against the spirit, Gal. V, 17; to deserve eternal damnation, Rom. II, 13.

(*) It is the part of a renewed man, not only to repress the allurements of sinning, but also to suppress them, lest they dominate within, so that he may turn from them with the greatest sorrow, and take pains to excite holy thoughts and motions of the soul. An unrighteous man, not yet born again, but yet prudent and sagacious, restrains and represses unjust desire, fighting back not against the inward motions of the soul, in which he himself perpetually indulges, in which he takes great delight, and awaits the opportunity of place and time, to sin with impunity, and to fulfill his lust; but only against the external action, lest his viciousness should come out into the public, and be a spectacle to the people, and therefore he studies partly concealment, partly simulation and dissimulation, for civil reasons, lest any man should find out, partly excuse, or altogether defense, so that he may be allowed to exercise his unjust action colored with a species of right.

You say: Paul in Rom. VII does not speak of himself as a regenerate man, but puts on and sustains the person of an unregenerate man constituted under the law, not yet endowed with the spirit of Christ; which is proven from this, that to the carnal man described in Rom. VII, 14, are vindicated those predicates which can be attributed to no regenerate man, much less to the most illuminated Paul. For he is said to be a) "sold under sin," v. 14. But the regenerate man is "freed from sin," Rom. VI, 18. b) "Captivated by the law of sin," from which the regenerate man is likewise freed, Rom. VIII, 2. c) "With the flesh serving the law of sin," v. 25. But the regenerate is a "servant of righteousness," Rom. VI, 18. d) He is said to do what he does not want, and not to do what he wants, v. 20. But the regenerate has the Holy Spirit and with him the liberty of acting, 2 Cor. III, 17. Resp. A) Generally. In the seventh chapter to the Romans from verse 14 to the end, Paul immediately, and consequently every regenerate man, is understood; which is proven 1) because the apostle likewise speaks of himself in the present tense: "I will, I hate, I do, I consent, I give thanks." He expresses his state under Pharisaism and the law with words designating the past tense in v. 9. "For I was alive without the law once," i.e., without a true understanding of the law. 2) The man described in this passage wills good, v. 18, and does not work evil, v. 15. But the unregenerate does not will spiritual good; because he is dead in sins, Eph. II, 1, and is a corrupt tree bringing forth evil fruit, Matth. VII, 17. 3) The man designated there consents to and serves the divine law, v. 23, 25. The unregenerate cannot be subject to the law, Rom. VIII, 7. 4) The man delineated by the apostle consents to the law according to the inward man, v. 22. The inward man is the renewed man. Conf. 2 Cor. IV, 10. Eph. IV, 24. Col. III, 9. 5) There is in the man described here a struggle of the flesh and the spirit, v. 23, 25. But the struggle of the flesh and the spirit occurs in the renewed man, in whom the Holy Spirit dwells, Gal. V, 17. 6) The man who is introduced in this place gives thanks to God through our Lord Jesus Christ for the initiated liberation from sin; although this liberation has not yet reached its completion in this life, v. 25. But the man freed from sin, and on that account giving thanks to God through Christ, is truly regenerate, constituted not under the law, but under the grace of Christ.

Resp. B) Specifically to a): Paul says that he is carnal not entirely, but in part; not simply and absolutely, but with a certain respect and comparatively; inasmuch as he had the oldness of the flesh, and by this was hindered from perfectly fulfilling the law, which is spiritual and requires spiritual and perfect obedience. Likewise he also says that he is "sold under sin," not as if he were sold to the full service of predominating sin, like king Ahab; 1 Kings XXI, 20, but because of the force, effort, and feeling of original concupiscence; because he felt the impulses and goads of concupiscence, which against his will, snatched away from the good, tried to enslave him to sin, although they could not produce that effect; because aided by the Holy Spirit he repressed these impulses and goads of concupiscence, which was affecting dominion, and shook off the yoke. To b): I distinguish between voluntary and involuntary captivity. The unregenerate of their own accord hand themselves over to be bound by the chains of sin; but the regenerate groans and complains that, bound by the chains of innate evil concupiscence, like a captive Samson, he is snatched away to do what he does not want with a joyful mind. To c): The apostle serves the law of God with his illuminated mind; but he serves the law of sin with his flesh, i.e., inasmuch as he is infected with the stain of inherent sin, not with a spontaneous servitude, but an involuntary one. To d): I distinguish between freedom from the dominion, and from the sense of sin. Although the renewed man is freed from the dominion of sin, he is not however immune from the sense and root of sin. Hence it is that although the regenerate want to do good eagerly and expeditiously, yet with concupiscence growing strong, they are not able to perfect it.

4. There is in the regenerate not only a concupiscence that conceives (συλλαβοῦσα), i.e., joined with the deliberate consent of the will, but also one that draws away and entices (ἐξέλκουσα καὶ δελεάζουσα), although consent does not follow, Jac. I, 14. Wherefore also the first inordinate motions are sins, since they are the cause of external sin. But the cause of sin is either the sinning person, or a sin, begetting other offenses from itself.

5. That the concupiscence which remains in the regenerate after baptism is truly sin, AUGUSTINE demonstrates in tract XLI on John, from Rom. VI, 12. The apostle says: "Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that you should obey it in its desires, neither yield your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin." He does not say: "let it not be"; but: "let it not reign." As long as you live, it is necessary for sin to be in your members, at least let its reign be taken away, lest what it commands be done.

The antithesis is of the Pontificians, who deny that concupiscence remaining in the regenerate after baptism, with the very first, or involuntary, motions, is a sin in the true sense of the name; whose main arguments are:

I. Concupiscence is distinguished from sin, as a cause from its effect, as S. James testifies, Ep. c. 1, 15. Therefore, concupiscence is not a sin properly so called. Resp. I distinguish between the sin that begets, and the sin that is begotten. Concupiscence is indeed not the begotten sin, i.e., consummated in act and deed, yet it is the begetting sin, i.e., original. Just as it is not licit to conclude: A father generates a man; Therefore the father is not a man; so it is wrong to gather: Concupiscence begets sin; Therefore concupiscence is not sin, since the contrary is true, namely that the mother and the offspring are of the same nature.

II. Whatever is not in our power, God does not oblige us to it by His precept; To avoid the first motions of concupiscence is not in our power; Therefore God does not oblige us to avoid the first motions of concupiscence. The major premise is established; because everyone who commands impossible things is unjust. The minor premise is clear; because after the fall of the first man, the inordinate motions do not depend on the deliberation of man, but flow spontaneously from original concupiscence. Resp. I deny the major. To the proof we say that everyone who commands impossible things, which are simply and in every state impossible, is unjust. But he who commands impossible things, the performance of which has been made impossible by the fault of the delinquent, is not unjust. Thus that king in Matth. XVIII, 24 demands from the debtor servant ten thousand talents, which he was not able to pay. God most justly demands from the drunkards, who by their own fault have lost their memory, the light of faith, the faculty of praying devoutly, vigilance, faith, the ardor of prayers. If only that is forbidden by divine law which is in our power, original sin will be prohibited by no precept, and thus will not be a sin properly so called.

III. Sin is taken away by baptism; Therefore in the baptized and regenerate there is no remaining sin. The antecedent is evident from Eph. V, 26, where we are said to be sanctified and cleansed by the washing of water by the word. Resp. Sin is taken away in baptism, not so that it is not, but so that it does not harm, or is not imputed. The guilt and dominion of concupiscence are taken away in baptism, not concupiscence itself.

Instance: If inordinate concupiscence, remaining after baptism, is a sin in the true sense of the name, it certainly induces guilt, because guilt is inseparable from sin. Resp. Guilt is taken away not from the sin, but from the sinning and repenting person, through justifying grace.

IV. God either hates the remaining sin, or does not hate it; If the latter, it is not sin; If the former, it has not been remitted. Resp. God hates sin, because it is lawlessness (ἀνομία); but He does not always hate the sinning person, because of the merit of Christ, apprehended by true faith; Just as a father hates the vices in his son, but does not hate the son himself.

V. If in a justified man there remained concupiscence which is truly considered and called sin, there would certainly be something damnable in him; But there is nothing damnable in a justified man; Therefore. The consequence of the major premise is evident; because every sin, in itself and by its nature, is mortal and damnable. The antecedent is clear from Rom. VIII, 1. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." Resp. Condemnation is one thing, the condemnable another. The former is the act of the condemning judge. Conf. Rom. V, 16. 1 Tim. V, 12. The latter is the fault of the man transgressing the law, which in itself deserves condemnation. The apostle does not say, "nothing condemnable," but "no condemnation" is in the regenerate. Although in them there is concupiscence, in its nature damnable; yet they undergo no condemnation, as Christ frees His regenerate and elect from the guilt of sin, so that it loses the power of condemning them, and by His Spirit, blunting and restraining sin, lest it should dominate. And so sin, after regeneration, is like wasps which, having lost their sting, cannot sting, even though they make much noise.

VI. Christ so sanctifies and cleanses the church, that He might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, Eph. V, 26. If the church is so sanctified and cleansed by baptism that it is glorious and splendid, without spot or wrinkle, it is free from all sin after baptism. Resp. Christ sanctifies and cleanses the church in this world by baptism, partly by justifying it, partly by renewing it. By justifying grace the church receives the perfect remission of sins. Renewal is not perfected in this life, but is begun, and is continued from day to day. But the presentation or exhibition of the church without spot and wrinkle will take place not in this, but in the future life; namely in the marriage of the age to come, Apoc. XIX, 7, 8, which interpretation AUGUSTINE confirms in book I of his Retractations, ch. 7. "Since the whole church says: 'Forgive us our debts,' it is certainly not here without spot and wrinkle, or anything of the sort; yet from what it receives here, it is led to that glory, where this is not, and to perfection." Confer. D. CALOV. bibl. illustr. on this passage, fol. 724.

Question XXIII. What happens to original sin?

Accidents of O.S. It happens to original sin, that in some men it reigns, in others it does not reign a). It reigns in those who promptly obey its incitements; it does not reign in those who place an obstacle to its evil motions and suggestions b).

Proof a. "Let not sin reign in your mortal body, that you should obey it in its concupiscences." Rom. VI, 12. The apostle does not say: "let it not be"; because during this life it cannot be extirpated; but "let it not reign," as if to say, resist sin, dwelling in your mortal body, lest it exercise its power and obtain supreme dominion. Wherefore do not obey its inordinate motions, soliciting you to great sins, but repress and restrain them.

Proof b. "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for you are not under the law, but under grace." Rom. VI, 14. Whoever have been reborn by the grace of the Holy Spirit, justified and renewed, they are neither under the coercion of the law; because they obey the divine will with a joyful and free spirit; nor do they do the commands of original sin; for they conquer its incitements by faith, so that it cannot reign, although it may at times affect dominion.

Obs. Moreover, reigning sins are also usually called actual sins repeated by frequent actions, which are not diminished by the unregenerate, but are more often committed, grow strong, flourish, and stimulate to other sins; non-reigning sins are said to be those whose beginnings the regenerate resist, lest they break forth and be consummated in an external work.

Question XXIV. What practical use does the doctrine of original sin provide?

It provides a paedeutical use, for deploring the most profound corruption and extreme misery of men after the fall, and for seeking Christ, the physician of souls, with the most flagrant desire a); a paracetical use, for acknowledging the ineffable mercy of God, who prepared a salutary remedy for this lethal evil for us in baptism and regeneration b); an epanorthotic use, for suppressing the desires of the flesh remaining after baptism c).

Proof a. LUTHER gravely says in part III, Smalcald articles, artic. 1. "We must confess, as Paul affirms in Rom. V, that sin originated from one man Adam, and entered into the world, through whose disobedience all men were made sinners, subject to death and the devil." This is called original, hereditary, principal, and capital sin.

Proof b. "But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost," Tit. III, 4. Through original sin we were made children of wrath; through baptism we are made children of grace. By the former we were deformed; by this we are renewed. By that is the entrance to death; by this the gate to life is opened.

Proof c. Let us be solicitously careful, not to loosen the reins to the desires of the flesh. "For if we live after the flesh, we shall die; but if we through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, we shall live," Rom. XII, 13.

SUSPIRIUM

I humbly acknowledge, O most MERCIFUL GOD! the plague connate in me, the hereditary evil, the most foul leprosy of the soul. I deplore the misery contracted by the fall of the first parents, and I seek Your mercy, O SWEETEST JESUS. You are the chief physician of my soul, You are the assertor and vindicator of my salvation. You prepared the medicine for my lethal disease in baptism, You have conferred it upon me prepared. You washed away the congenital sin, taking from it the power to condemn, and blunting its impulses and goads, lest they should overthrow me. For so great a benefit I give You immortal thanks, and I pray most ardently, that You would furnish me, languishing and infirm, with spiritual strength, that I may restrain, repress, and crush the incitements of the flesh, which solicit my soul to sinning.

CHAPTER IV. ON ACTUAL SINS.

Question I. What is actual sin?

ACTUAL SIN IS the deviation of a human act from the rule of the divine law. It is more fully defined: Actual sin is the deviation of a human act, committed or omitted, from the rule of the divine law, inferring the guilt of the fault and the punishment.

Proof. Sin in general is defined by lawlessness (ἀνομία), or deviation from the law, 1 Jo. III, 4. This lawlessness (ἀνομία) is either original or actual. Therefore actual sin differs from original in this very thing, that the former is a second act, the latter is a habit inclining and soliciting to evil. Yet actual sin can also be defined as an action, or the omission of an action, fighting against the eternal law of God; just as AUGUSTINE in book 22 against Faustus, c. 22, described sin: "that it is a deed, or a word, or a desire against the law of God." For thus the material of sin, which is the action committed or omitted, is put in the place of the genus, and the formal constituent, which is lawlessness (ἀνομία), or contra-legality, in the place of the difference. But the formal consequent of actual sin is the guilt of the fault and punishment.

Question II. Whence is actual sin so called?

Etymology. Actual sin is so called from the act, forbidden by divine law, and that committed or omitted.

Proof. Actual sin has obtained its name from the sinful act; because actual sin in the posterity of Adam proceeds from original sin, as a second act comes from a habit, a stream flows from a fount, a fruit is born from a tree. For original sin is an evil tree, bearing evil fruits, Matth. VII, 17. Although actual sin, by the force of the word, is that sin which is perfected by some act, or by doing: yet from the usage of the word, those are also called actual sins, which are done by not doing. For just as some laws are passed about things to be done, others about things to be omitted; so sins, opposed to the laws, are committed, some by doing what is forbidden by the law, others by not doing, or omitting an act, prescribed by the law.

Question III. In how many ways is actual sin taken?

Actual sin is taken either more loosely and more generally, for all inordinate motions or acts, proceeding from original sin, whether they are conjoined with previous deliberation, or, without the consultation of the intellect, and the choice of the will, they creep upon men unwillingly a); or more strictly and more specially, for actions, perpetrated by the deliberate counsel of the mind, and the determined malice of the will b).

Proof a. Original sin acts like a cause, constituted in perpetual motion, whose effects are actual sins. For it is not idle, but operative, and of the greatest activity, which like a poisoned fount pours forth its similar waters, effusing itself into every kind of actual sin, which are either indeliberate internal vicious motions, or consulted acts of choice. Indeliberate acts, or first motions, also fall upon infants. For "every imagination of the human heart is only evil every day, from infancy." Gen. VI, 13, c. VIII, 21.

Proof b. When it is said of the regenerate, that they do not commit sin, 1 Jo. III, 9, likewise, that infants not yet born are said to have done neither good nor evil, Rom. IX, 11, actual sins, strictly speaking, are understood, which are done from choice and deliberate counsel.

Question IV. How are actual sins designated in the sacred writings?

Synonyms of A.S. Actual sins in the sacred writings are called iniquitous works, dead works, unfruitful works of darkness, works of the flesh, actions of the old man, actions of the flesh, works of impiety.

Proof. S. Peter calls actual sins "lawless deeds" (ἔργα ἄνομα), 2 ep. c. II, 8, because they disagree with the norm of the divine law. S. Paul calls them "dead works," Hebr. VI, 1. Namely because they are the effects of men who are spiritually dead, they turn man away from God, the author of life, and finally they bring forth eternal death. He also calls them "unfruitful works of darkness," Eph. V, 11. They are "unfruitful works"; because they bring no emolument, but much detriment to the sinners. They are "works of darkness"; because they are mostly perpetrated in hidden and dark places, at the persuasion of the prince of darkness, by those whose mind is filled with the darkness of ignorance and malice, whom they finally cast headlong into eternal darkness. He calls them "works of the flesh," Gal. V, 19, because the flesh, or carnal concupiscence, tempts and entices man to them, Jacob. 1, 14. He calls them "deeds of the old man," Col. III, 9, because they proceed from the corrupt nature derived from Adam to his posterity. He calls them "deeds of the flesh," Rom. VIII, 13, or of a nature depraved by original sin; because they are both inflamed by the senses of the flesh, and are carried out by the ministry of the corporeal members, and finally are directed to that which is pleasing and pleasant to the body. S. Jude names them "ungodly deeds" (ἔργα ἄσεβειας), ep. v. 15, because by them the majesty of God the lord, lawgiver, and supreme judge, is violated.

Question V. What is the efficient cause of actual sins?

Efficient cause of A.S. The efficient cause of actual sins is the sinning man.

Proof. Because the sinning man is the physical cause of that act, to which lawlessness (ἄνομία), or dislegality adheres, because he produces it by a real influx, lawlessness (ἄνομία) itself, or the deviation from the law, does not indeed have an efficient cause, but a deficient one; yet it is reduced to the particular cause, deviating from the divine law, which is its moral cause. For when it produces an effect, with which it knows lawlessness (ἄνομίαν) to be conjoined; it intends lawlessness (ἄνομίαν) itself, if not directly, at least indirectly, so that lawlessness (ἄνομία) is imputed to it, as an effect, just as if it really influenced it. For example, Cain is the efficient cause of fratricide; whose material is the act of striking, but the disorder (ἁταξία) or inordination adjacent to it, is the formal aspect of the sin. The act of striking is from Cain, or the physical cause, really influencing; and the illegality, or inordination, adjacent to the striking, is from Cain as the moral cause, to whom it is imputed by the most just right.

Question VI. What are the causes that impel or in any way induce man to actual sin?

Internally, evil concupiscence, dwelling in the flesh, solicits man to a sinful act a); externally, the devil b), and the world, or men c), and things existing in the world d), impel or incite.

Proof a. The generation of sin (ἁμαρτιγένειαν), or the origin of actual sin, S. James shows us in c. 1, 14, 15. "Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." According to the interpretation of D. CHEMNITIUS, part III, L. de discrim. P. mortal. & venial. p. 109, the following grades are indicated by S. James, by which one ascends to a sin of choice consummated in an external work. 1) The apostle names "his own lust" (ἰδία ἐπιθυμία), which is original concupiscence; 2) "being tempted" (τὸ πειράζειν), of that concupiscence, when it begins to solicit us with thoughts; 3) "being enticed" (τὸ δελεάζειν), which are inviting allurements. For just as little birds and fishes are enticed by allurements; so the allurements of original concupiscence invite; 4) "being drawn away" (τὸ ἐξέλκειν), when the will is snatched crosswise by the fires of evil affections to obedience. And even a regenerate man can come to this point. For Paul in Rom. VII, 23, grieves and complains that he is sometimes thus captivated; because however he remains in Christ, and fights back, there is nothing of damnation in him, Rom. VIII, 1; 5) "to conceive" (τὸ συλλαμβάνειν), which is the evil purpose, or machination to evil. And when malice progresses this far, repentance and faith have already been cast out; 6) "to bring forth" (τὸ τίκτειν), when the work itself follows, by the perpetration of which sin generates death. This origin of actual sins and gradual progress D. GERHARDUS explains concisely in disp. isag. p. 927. The Apostle James commemorates five grades of interior sins. The first is "lust" (ἐπιθυμία), evil concupiscence, habitually inherent, which is original sin itself, the tinder of which still remains in the regenerate even after baptism. The second is the "tempting" (τὸ πειράζειν) of that concupiscence, when namely the flesh objects evil thoughts to us; when the tinder as it were emits certain sparks. The third is "enticing" (τὸ δελεάζειν), when various allurements are objected, by which we are solicited to choose evil against the judgment of the mind renewed by the spirit, and thus that "enticing" (δελεάζειν) is like a fan, by which the sparks of the tinder are excited. The fourth is "drawing away" (ἐξέλκειν), when the will is as it were captivated, and reduced to servitude, so that it begins to consent to the evil allurements. The fifth is "to conceive" (τὸ συλλαμβάνειν), when a deliberate purpose is added, and the means are sought to put it into act. All these pertain to interior sins, from which arises "the bringing forth" (τὸ τίκτειν), the external work itself, by the perpetration of which sin generates death. For the rest, there is no doubt that also actual sins, more often repeated, are not rarely the causes of subsequent sins, partly inasmuch as they incline to similar sinful acts, partly inasmuch as they cast out grace, which being taken away, men rush into graver sins (*).

Proof b. The devil is the cause of human sin; because he "works effectively in the children of disobedience," Eph. II, 2, "blinds the minds of the unbelievers, lest the light of the gospel should shine unto them," 2 Cor. IV, 4, "troubles the fantasy of Saul," 1 Sam. XVI, 25, "incites David to number the people," 1 Chron. XXI, 1, "fills the heart of Ananias to tell a lie," Acts V, 3, "persuades Judas with arguments, taken from utility, to betray Christ," Jo. XIII, 2, from which the devil is called "the tempter" (ὁ πειράζων), Matth. IV, 3. But the devil tempts by calling away from good, and by instigating to evil. Yet he does not necessitate, or determine the human will to an illicit act, but consults, and suggests evil thoughts; which impostor the regenerate can resist, so that he flees from them, Jac. IV, 17.

c. It is proven. Men, who come under the name of the world, apply stimuli to other men to act badly, by persuading and inviting them with their own example. Wives lured Solomon to idolatry, 1 Kings 11:4. Jeroboam by his example made Israel to sin, 1 Kings 15:26.

d. It is proven. The things of the world, encountering the senses, objectively move the will and the sensitive appetite to sin. A precious spoil moved Achan to theft, Joshua 7:21. The bared feet of Bathsheba moved David, 2 Samuel 11:26.

Question VII. Upon whom does actual sin fall?

Actual sin falls upon all men a), even the reborn b), and infants c).

(*) James expressly puts "being drawn away" (τὸ ἐξέλκεσθαι) before "being enticed" (τὸ δελεάζεσθαι). But what he had said before, "to be tempted" (πειράζεσθαι), is not different from these two, but is this very thing, "is drawn away and enticed" (ἐξέλκεται καὶ δελεάζεται), both of which "concupiscence having conceived" (ἡ ἐπιθυμία συλλαβοῦσα) follows in turn. For to tempt is nothing other than to instigate someone, and to allure. Therefore, the first grade of every consummated sin is the allurement to act evilly, the first motion of the soul, the first thought that enters the mind, which if someone feels with detestation, and immediately casts out of his soul, he is "one who is drawn away" (ἐξολκόμενος). The second is delight, if a man feeling it consents, and, giving place to this allurement, perceives pleasure from it; then he is "one who is enticed" (δελεαζόμενος), which word is derived from the noun, δέλεαρ, bait, as if baited; just as PLATO divinely (as CICERO says, de senect. c. 13.) calls pleasure the "bait of evils," because by it men are caught, as fish by a hook. This contributes much to illuminating and rightly understanding the meaning of the words, Eccl. IX, 12. The third grade is the deliberation of that thing, of seeking means from all sides, and of awaiting, indeed also of seizing any occasion, and opportunity both of place and of time. Thus indeed is "concupiscence having conceived" (ἡ ἐπιθυμία συλλαβοῦσα). The fourth is the external action begun and continued, by which reason desire "brings forth sin" (τίκτει τὴν ἁμαρτίαν), viewed in its whole scope. The fifth and final is the consummation of the action in every part, and with all surrounding things, and thus is "sin when it is finished" (ἁμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα).

a. It is proven. From the testimony of Solomon, 2 Kings 8:46. "There is no man who does not sin."

b. It is proven. 1) From the proclivity to sin, from which the reborn are not immune. For, as St. James testifies, "we all stumble often," James 3:2. The apostle addresses his spiritual brethren, v. 1, and he exhorts them from untimely censure of others. As a reason, he adduces the infirmity and proclivity of all to sin. The man of God does not except himself; because the mortal condition does not permit a man to be pure from every stain, as LACTANTIUS says, book VI of the Institutes, ch. 13. 2) From the daily prayer for the forgiveness of sins. The reborn must pray daily: "Forgive us our debts," Matthew 6:12. 3) From the example of the most holy Paul, who complains of himself, Romans 7:19: "For I do not do the good I want, but the evil I do not want is what I do." He who does not do the good he wants, but does the evil he does not want, commits an actual sin, but an involuntary one.

c. It is proven. 1) From the nature of original sin, which is never idle, but always active, like a bad root, bringing forth its rotten fruits. Therefore, although proactive actual sins do not always germinate from original sin, nevertheless, disordered first motions spring forth without choice, anticipating reason, inasmuch as they are inseparable from original sin. Whence we conclude: Infants are capable of original sin which is always active; Therefore, they are capable of actual sins. 2) From divine testimony, Genesis 8:21. "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." By the imagination of the heart are designated the disordered motions, both first and second, that issue from the heart, Matthew 15:19, through which innate malice expresses itself, from the first breath of life to the last moment of life. 3) That the sin congenital to infants erupts into actual sins is testified by the meridian of truth. For we learn by experience that little one-year-olds strike their mothers, bite them, and envy their twin sibling a copious supply of milk; it is established that a boy by nature is drawn to evil, apprehends good things with the greatest difficulty, evil things most easily, holds on to good things most arduously, evil things most firmly, thinks, speaks, and does good things with the utmost weariness and sleepiness, evil things with the utmost pleasure and joy; finally, that a man left to himself never becomes virtuous, but always most wicked; that he is educated to piety with immense labor, with the inculcation of precepts, with the detestation of vices and sins, with the most frequent exhortations, and finally with promises and blows, and that the same person, if you wish to have him vicious, devoted to sins and wicked, no labor, no instruction is needed, he turns out that way on his own. Add to this, that even uncomposed gestures are sins. See DANNHAVER in hodos phænom IV. p. 357.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians and Anabaptists, who assert that a reborn man can rise to such a perfection that he is without any sin; the same, together with the Pontificians, maintain that infants are not capable of actual sins. Their more important arguments are:

I. Whosoever neither sins nor can sin, actual sins do not fall upon them; But the reborn, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from 1 John 3:9. "No one born of God makes a practice of sinning, for God's seed abides in him, and he cannot keep on sinning because he has been born of God." Resp. John speaks 1) of the reborn man considered in a reduplicative sense, insofar as he is reborn, or exists in a state of regeneration. 2) Of the seed of the divine word, insofar as it is preserved vigorous in the soul and is translated into living practice; for it certainly restrains and holds man back from sins by commanding, forbidding, promising, and threatening. 3) Of proactive sins, mortal and devastating to the conscience, not of involuntary, venial sins, creeping in through ignorance or infirmity of nature, against the will. Therefore, John wants to teach, according to the interpretation of the blessed HUNNIUS, that rebirth and the intention to sin are so opposed that they necessarily remove and destroy each other, and can by no means exist in the same man at the same time. Therefore, he who is born of God, insofar as he is reborn, and as long as he remains reborn, certainly does not commit sin; that is, a sin against conscience, and proceeding from a deliberate purpose and counsel of the mind. Indeed, he cannot sin, in the way explained, so that he simultaneously sins against conscience and nevertheless remains reborn. Rather, as soon as he sins knowingly and willingly on purpose, he immediately ceases to be reborn, that is, he loses the gift of rebirth, faith, and the grace of God, the seed of the word having been suffocated, and the Holy Spirit having been cast out. For that the reborn can fall again from the grace of God through mortal, or reigning, sins is evident from Ezekiel chapter 18, 1 Corinthians 9, Romans 11, and many other places.

II. A good tree cannot bear bad fruit, Matthew 7:18. But a reborn man is a good tree, Psalm 1:3. Therefore. Resp. 1) A perfectly good tree cannot bear bad fruit; But the reborn are imperfectly good; and therefore they can sin venially. 2) A good tree cannot bear bad fruit; but it can become sterile, rotten, and finally diseased, and when it has become such, it can be cut down. "It cannot produce bad fruit," says JEROME on that passage of Matthew, "as long as it perseveres in the pursuit of goodness"; and conversely, a bad tree can become good. TERTULLIAN in his book, On the Soul: "A bad tree will not yield good fruit if it is not grafted, and a good one will yield bad fruit if it is not cultivated." Cf. CALOVIUS in bibl. illustrat. John 3:9. fol. 1632.

III. God is able to keep the reborn from falling and to present them blameless before the presence of his glory with great joy, Epistle of Jude v. 24. Therefore, the reborn, aided by the power of God, can lead their lives so circumspectly that they never fall or sin. Resp. God can, if he wishes, by his absolute omnipotence, preserve the reborn immune from voluntary and involuntary, mortal and venial lapse; but by his ordained power, he can and will keep them immune from malicious and deadly lapse, if, following the guidance of the divine word, supported by the grace of the Holy Spirit, they place an obstacle to inordinate motions and mortify the deeds of the flesh, Romans 8:13, and crucify it, Galatians 5:24.

IV. Whoever does neither good nor evil, actual sin does not fall upon them; But infants, etc. Romans 9:11. Therefore. Resp. Whoever does evil neither by choice nor from the infirmity of nature, which is prone to evil, actual sin does not fall upon them; I grant it. But although infants do not sin from a deliberate purpose of the mind, they nevertheless sin from the infirmity of nature on account of indwelling original sin, from which vicious first motions are not absent. Instance: Infants do not even know evil, Deuteronomy 1:39. Therefore, they do no evil. Resp. The conclusion should have been inferred thus: Therefore, they do no evil knowingly and willingly; which we grant.

V. Those upon whom knowledge of the law does not fall, no actual sin falls upon them; But upon infants, it does not fall, etc.

Therefore. The major is clear; because sin is a deviation from a known law. Resp. I distinguish between the prescribed law and the inscribed law. Although infants are ignorant of the prescribed law, they nevertheless deviate from the inscribed law, which is naturally known.

VI. Infants are innocent; Therefore, actual sins do not fall upon them. The antecedent is established from Psalm 106:38. Resp. Infants are innocent not absolutely, but comparatively. 1) They are innocent before the court of the land, not of heaven. 2) They are innocent because they are immune from proactive sins, which are joined with the full use of reason and the pre-election of the will; but they are not devoid of involuntary sins.

Division of Actual Sin

Question VIII. How are actual sins divided?

Actual sins are divided: 1) by reason of the cause, into voluntary and involuntary; 2) by reason of the total subject, or the person sinning, into mortal and venial; into another's and our own; 3) by reason of the partial subject, into sins of the heart, of the mouth, and of deed; 4) by reason of the act, into sins of commission and omission; 5) by reason of the object, into sins against God, against the neighbor, and against the sinner himself; 6) by reason of the effect, into crying and non-crying; 7) by reason of the attendant circumstances, into more grave and lighter, hidden and manifest, dead and living, remaining and remitted, joined with hardening and separated from it, remissible and irremissible.

Question IX. What is voluntary sin?

Voluntary Sin. Voluntary sin is an act disagreeing with the divine law, committed or omitted by a man knowingly and willingly.

It is more fully defined: Voluntary sin is an act by which a man transgresses the divine law against the dictate of his conscience with a deliberate purpose of the will.

Obs. I. Voluntary sin here is not called so subjectively, because it inheres in the will; but effectively, because it proceeds from a deliberate will, spontaneously determining itself to a sinful act.

Obs. II. Voluntary sin is committed 1) by a man knowing that the act which he commits is contrary to the divine law. Now, the knowledge dictating that an act is conformed to or deformed from the divine law is commonly called conscience. 2) By a man willing, in such a way that its cause is a full and deliberate will, which, with prior deliberation of the intellect, intends to perform an effect prohibited by the divine law. Now, intention in morals is divided into full and semi-full. The former is that by which the will, after the matter has been sufficiently weighed beforehand, and not carried away by the vehemence of passions, is brought to a certain act, and strives to perform it effectively, for example, when Judas intends the betrayal of Christ. The latter is where sufficient deliberation was not present, or reason was shaken by a storm of passions, for example, when David, offended by Nabal, thinks of bringing death upon him and his household, 1 Samuel 25:13. We call the full intention of the will, which the Greeks call προαίρεσιν (prohairesin, choice), a deliberate purpose of the will.

Obs. III. Voluntary sin is also called proactive, or pre-elective; a sin against conscience; a sin committed with a high hand, Numbers 15:30. King David calls voluntary sins "presumptuous sins," Psalm 19:14.

Question X. In how many ways is voluntary sin considered?

Voluntary sin is considered both in order to the conscience and in order to the purpose of the will.

Question XI. How manyfold is sin committed against conscience?

Sin against conscience is fourfold. For it is committed, either against a right conscience, when a man in acting or omitting does not follow, but contemns the dictate of conscience which agrees with the divine law a); or against an erroneous conscience, when a man in acting or omitting deviates from the dictate of a conscience imbued with error b); or against a probable conscience, when someone sins against the dictate of the intellect, which for probable causes persuades that something should be done or omitted here and now c); or against a doubtful conscience, when someone does or omits that about which he doubts whether it should be done or omitted d).

a. It is proven. He who sins against the dictate of a right conscience, sins most gravely; for it is like an internal herald, proposing the law of God and of nature to man, and showing what is certainly and indubitably consonant with it, and what is dissonant. From which sin, perpetrated against a right conscience, follows remorse, anguish, desperation. Cain, Ahithophel, Judas the traitor, and many others felt this remorse of conscience.

b. It is proven. He who follows an erroneous conscience in a matter that is shameful in itself and prohibited by laws, whether he acts according to or against his conscience, he sins. For example, if a Persian of old had been persuaded that the sun was a god to be adored; he, by adoring the sun, sinned; because he venerated with religious worship that which is not the true God; by not adoring, he also sinned; because he acted against the dictate of his conscience, and thus, as far as was in him, he willed to act against the law of God, who gave us conscience as a guide for acting; hence the darkness of error must be dispelled either by the natural light of right reason, or by the supernatural light of the divinely revealed word. But he who follows an erroneous conscience in an indifferent matter, neither commanded nor prohibited by laws, he sins who acts against it; he does not sin who acts according to it. For example, at the beginning of the New Testament, some Christians thought that it was not lawful to eat things sacrificed to idols, that is, meats offered to an idol, although an idol is nothing in the world (by reason of the divinity and divine power which the pagans ascribed to it). These would have sinned by eating against their conscience, although erroneous; by not eating, they would not have sinned, because they would have followed their conscience as their polestar. See 1 Corinthians 8:7. So today, he who holds that it is illicit for a Christian to be a soldier, sins by being a soldier; he does not sin when he abstains from being a soldier.

c. It is proven. He sins against a probable conscience who neglects the safer way. For example, a physician sins who, in driving out a desperate disease, employs a desperate medicine. For although it may happen that the sick person recovers with the same applied; it is nevertheless not safe. For it may happen that by that violent medication the life of the sick person is extinguished.

d. It is proven. He sins against a doubtful conscience who embraces either part of the contradiction, whichever it may be. For example, if a man, addicted to the Augsburg Confession, were an attendant of a pontifical prince, and were in doubt whether it were licit for him to accompany the prince to the pontifical mass, or illicit? He would sin both by accompanying and by not accompanying. Because 1) whatever is not of faith (i.e., whatever is undertaken with a fluctuating mind) is sin, Romans 14:23. 2) Because he wills some evil. For since in either object he perceives some malice, whichever he undertakes, he will have inclined to evil. Therefore, the matter must always be settled either by one's own prudence or by the counsel of other wiser persons, lest he remain longer in doubt and suspense of mind.

Question XII. How manyfold is voluntary sin by reason of the purpose of sinning?

Voluntary sin, viewed in order to the purpose of the will, is twofold. For one is that which is committed from mere malice and a fully free will (a); another is that which is committed from a will inclined by force, fear, and surrounding dangers (b).

a. It is proven. Just as every moral action is either unwilling, which is either extorted by force or undertaken from ignorance; or spontaneous, which is performed from certain knowledge and an internal inclination of the appetite, or mixed, which occurs from fear of an imminent greater evil, and would never happen if that graver evil could be escaped by another lawful way (for example, a mixed action is if someone, in imminent danger of shipwreck, throws his goods into the sea so that he himself may escape safely, having averted the shipwreck; or, if someone, encountering robbers on the road, for the sake of saving his life, gives or promises a sum of money not without his own loss; which action, being mixed, is neither simply spontaneous, because a man would not gird himself for it unless the danger of a greater evil were imminent; nor is it simply unwilling, because it is joined with the knowledge of all circumstances, and could also have been omitted, if he had chosen to undergo a greater evil. A mixed action is, however, more spontaneous than unwilling 1) by reason of the principle, which is the knowledge of the circumstances and the pre-election of the will, 2) by reason of the end, which is the avoidance of a graver evil and the preservation of a greater good, whether true or apparent): So in theological matters, one sin is simply involuntary, another is respectively voluntary, which is perpetrated from fear of an instant graver evil, outside of which case it would never be committed. This distinction is illustrated by examples. The betrayal of Judas, by which the Lord Jesus was delivered into the hands of his enemies, was a simply voluntary sin, committed from mere malice and a fully free will. For he was not compelled to that nefarious deed by any fear of dangers, but was enticed by prior consultation and an internal inclination of the will, by which he was drawn to profit.

b. It is proven. Peter sinned by denying Jesus three times. This sin was not simply voluntary, because Peter did not deny Jesus from mere malice and a fully free will; nor was it simply involuntary, because it was not committed by Peter unknowingly and unwillingly; but it was voluntary in a certain respect, and from a certain perspective; because Peter, in imminent danger, wished to provide for his own life by the denial of Christ. And yet, the sin of Peter should not be extenuated with certain Romanists, among whom are MALDONATUS and CORNELIUS A LAPIDE. For 1) Peter could have avoided this danger in another way, by not entering the high priest's praetorium. 2) Peter impiously preferred the preservation of his own life to the confession of Christ, thinking that the loss of life was a greater evil, and the denial of Christ was a lesser evil. 3) He accumulated sins by lying, by swearing falsely, by calling a curse upon himself. Let us hear the judgment of St. JEROME on the fall of Peter, which can be read in DANNHAVER, in hodos p. 859. "I know that certain men, piously affected towards the apostle Peter, have so interpreted this passage as to say that Peter did not deny God, but a man, and the sense is: I do not know the man, because I know God. How frivolous this is, the prudent reader understands. Thus they defend the apostle, so as to make God guilty of a lie. For if he did not deny, then the Lord lied, who had said: 'because this night, before the rooster crows, you will deny me three times,' not a man. Therefore, the enormous sin of Peter remains, that of a lion before the battle, a deer in the battle, that of a most firm column, trembling at the impulse of a single breeze. It was an incredible lie, to have said that he did not know the Lord, when there was hardly anyone who did not know Jesus by sight, famous for so many miracles. Why did he come into the palace if he did not know him? The confirmation by an oath was more enormous. The highest wickedness was the cursing of himself, by which he, having prayed evil for himself, bound himself with curses, perhaps using the old formula: 'May God do so to me and more also!'"

Question XIII. Does voluntary sin also fall upon the reborn?

Voluntary sin indeed does not fall upon the reborn, insofar as they are and remain reborn a); yet it falls upon them, insofar as they, overcome by depraved concupiscence, fall from the state of grace b).

a. It is proven. 1 John 3:9. "No one who is born of God commits sin, because His seed remains in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."

b. It is proven. There are examples of the reborn who have fallen into proactive sins: David, Judas, Peter, and others. Therefore, the king-prophet prays most humbly: "Do not take your Holy Spirit from me," Psalm 51:13. He who asks that the Holy Spirit not be taken from him, without doubt acknowledges Him as taken away, or fears Him as capable of being lost.

Question XIV. What is involuntary sin?

Involuntary sin is an act, disagreeing with the divine law, not proceeding from certain knowledge, nor from a deliberate purpose of the will.

Question XV. How is involuntary sin divided?

Involuntary sin is divided into the sin of ignorance and of infirmity.

Question XVI. What is the sin of ignorance?

The sin of ignorance is an act, disagreeing with the divine law, whose cause is an ignorance that is not affected or supine, but invincible in itself and in its cause, joined with serious repentance.

Obs. I. It is one thing when someone sins in ignorance, and another when he sins through ignorance. He sins in ignorance who, at the very moment he sins, is ignorant of what he is doing, like a drunkard or an angry person; yet that ignorance itself is not the cause of the sinful act, but something else that induced that ignorance, namely drunkenness or anger. But he sins through ignorance when the cause of the evil action is ignorance, inasmuch as it excludes knowledge, which would otherwise have been an impediment to the act of sinning. For ignorance is a removing, impeding cause.

Obs. II. The cause of involuntary sin is invincible ignorance, which cannot be dispelled or overcome by applying due diligence, for example, if someone were splitting wood in a forest with an axe, and struck and killed a man hiding among the shady thickets, he would not be a voluntary homicide. But vincible ignorance, which can be overcome and removed by applying diligence, does not make a sin involuntary; for it proves the man's negligence or malice, and is therefore supine or affected. For the rest, sometimes ignorance seems to be invincible, which nevertheless, if you look at the cause, is vincible, for example, if someone willingly loaded himself with wine or beer, and killed a man while drunk, his ignorance seems to be invincible, but in reality it is vincible, for he could have abstained from the drink, too intemperately consumed.

Obs. III. One kind of ignorance precedes the act of the will, another accompanies it, another follows it. Antecedent ignorance is the cause for a man to will something that he would not will if he knew. Such ignorance is when someone is ignorant of those things which he could not know in this or that matter, nor was he bound to know, and it coincides with invincible ignorance; for example, when someone in battle, intending to kill an enemy, kills his brother, whom he neither knew nor could have known to be present in that battle. Concomitant ignorance is said to occur when someone, being ignorant, does something which, however, if he knew, he would still wish to do; for example, if someone, intending to shoot a beast, kills an enemy whom he would have otherwise wished to kill if he had known. Consequent ignorance is that of which someone is the cause to himself through his will, and it is either affected or supine. Affected ignorance is when a man, on purpose, does not want to know something, so that he may be able to sin more freely; for example, when an impious man does not want to know that God is a most just avenger of wicked deeds. Supine ignorance is when someone through negligence is ignorant of that which he could have known. Thus the Jews are said to have killed the author of life, Christ, through ignorance, Acts 3:17, which ignorance, contracted through negligence, was therefore supine. Involuntary sin is not caused by 1) concomitant ignorance; for those things which are not followed by any sorrow are held to be voluntary. 2) Affected ignorance, just as it is absolutely voluntary, so it does not make a sin involuntary. 3) Supine ignorance, contracted through negligence, diminishes the voluntariness in a way, although it does not make the action entirely involuntary. Wherefore, the sin of ignorance is properly that whose cause is antecedent ignorance, and that which is invincible in itself and in its cause.

Question XVII. What is the sin of infirmity?

The sin of infirmity is an act, conflicting with the divine law, committed both from the depraved concupiscence which is always active, suddenly creeping in without the full consent of the will, and from the vehemence of passions and precipitation.

Obs. I. To the sins of infirmity belong 1) sudden inordinate motions, which from innate concupiscence, always active, as if from a necessity of nature, proceed without the full consent of the will; and therefore by some authors are referred to original sin itself. See CHEMNITZ, loc. p. 257. Rightly, however, they are also called actual sins, because they are secondary acts opposing the divine law. As observed by D. KROMAYER in his theologia positivo- polemica, some distinguish between the first and second motions of concupiscence, and subdivide the former again into first-first and second-first, without a doubt following JEROME, who calls the first motions προπάθειαν (propatheian, a pre-passion); for example, the suggestion, sense, and first-first motion was when this perverse thought crept up on Achan; what if I were to make this golden tongue my own? To which was added delight, or semi-full consent, from which is the second-first motion; It would be useful for me for this golden tongue to become mine. Finally, full consent supervened, the second motion; I will make this tongue mine. Full consent makes the sin. 2) It is also called a sin of infirmity when, through the vehemence of passions, the judgment of reason is disturbed, and a man is carried away to do something, without the consent of the intellect and will, by the sole impulse of the sensitive appetite, as when someone does something out of vehement anger, excessive love, and fear, for example, when the apostle Peter, kindled with vehement anger, cuts off Malcho's right ear, John 18:10; the disciples, struck with fear, abandon Jesus and flee, Matthew 26:56. (*)

(*) Indeed, the distinction between sins of malice and sins of infirmity is as widely known as it is necessary for all to know; but the true definition is not equally well known and understood by all. For the most part, they define it thus: Sins of malice are those which are performed by one who knows and wills, with pleasure, purpose, and deliberation; sins of infirmity, on the contrary, are those which are effected out of ignorance, or out of haste of mind, or, as they commonly like to say, out of precipitation. But to me this definition seems neither clear nor adequate and sufficient. 1) Not clear; for an explanation and determination was needed as to what kind of ignorance should be understood, since it is twofold: one which can be overcome, another which they call invincible; what also is haste of mind, or precipitation, since a certain kind is wont to be present in even the gravest offenses, often already perpetrated, especially where a very bad habit of the most vehement motions of the mind has made the man so utterly powerless that he cannot contain himself. 2) Not adequate and sufficient. This indeed is most true; every sin which is perpetrated by one who knowingly and willingly with pleasure is certainly a sin of malice. But not every sin of malice is perpetrated by one who knows, against conscience, and with deliberation. For (α) there is a certain malicious ignorance, 2 Peter 3:5, Luke 12:48, to which ought to be referred the malicious interpretation of law and statute, and the false opinion of a just cause, Luke 23:34, John 16:2, Acts 3:17, 1 Timothy 1:13ff. (β) Right and complete deliberation can never be in any offense; but it would be so, if someone, before he offended, had weighed the reasons not only on one side but all the reasons on both sides; by which method it could never happen that the reasons on both sides would be seen as if placed in equilibrium; the reasons on the good side could not but have much more weight and moment, through the force of truth, far greater than any error. (γ) All deliberation is also sometimes absent from a man in the most grievous of all sins, if someone has acquired the habit and custom of acting badly, to the point where he is not even conscious himself of his own action. Nor does an impious man always have space for deliberation, though he is perpetually prone, ready, and precipitate to act badly. Although a particular purpose, and as is commonly said, an actual one, may not be present, at least as regards this action, the occasion being

Question XVIII. What is mortal sin?

Mortal Sin. Mortal, or deadly, sin is that which is imputed to the sinner in the second act for death.

Question XIX. How will you more specifically define mortal sin, with respect to the reborn who succumb to the flesh?

Mortal sin is that by which the reborn, overcome by the flesh, and thus not remaining in the state of regeneration, transgress the divine law against the dictate of conscience, with a deliberate purpose of the will, and by that very act lose saving faith, cast out the grace of the Holy Spirit, and cast themselves into a state of wrath, death, and condemnation.

Question XX. What is venial sin?

Venial sin is that which, although it is worthy of death, is nevertheless not imputed to the sinner for death.

It is more fully defined: Venial sin is every involuntary sin in the reborn, which neither casts out the indwelling grace of the Holy Spirit, nor extinguishes faith, but at the same moment it is committed, has pardon joined to it by an inseparable bond.

Obs. 1. The distinction of sin into mortal and venial is not derived from the merit of the sin; for every sin, in itself and by its nature, is damnable in merit in the legal forum; but 1) from the different condition of the subject, or the person sinning. For venial sin is in the reborn; mortal sin is in those who either have never been regenerated, or, overcome by the predominant flesh, have fallen from the state of grace. 2) From the estimation of God according to the gospel; because God, the reconciled and gracious presented faster than thought; yet there is always in the mind a general purpose, or, as it is said, a habitual one: "What I will, that I will do." The principle of acting in a wicked man is always his own will, opposed to the divine will. Suppose, therefore, that in this action he was constrained by the straits of time and was bereft of counsel, and thus undertook it hastily; the question is; whether he would have managed his affair better, or much worse, if he had been permitted to meditate on it long before, and not to institute the matter without counsel and deliberation? Jeremiah 9:5.

It will not be difficult to explain the sins of each kind with an accurate definition. To be sure, infirmity is a certain failure of strength. For whatever is infirm, that certainly has some strength, although weakened and diminished, certainly not yet perfect. Therefore, in a moral sense, infirmity is a certain defect of the strength for acting well, since the effect does not always correspond to the will and effort, Romans 7:18. But where there are strengths for acting well, there is spiritual life. For a man, even if he is most infirm, must nevertheless be alive. But that life is a saving trust placed in Christ, Galatians 2:20. In a man born again and renewed, but not yet perfect, there is 1) a continual sorrow over his innate viciousness and its motions, which he himself, feeling but not consenting, daily experiences, 2) a continual study of amendment and of making daily progress, with the foresight and care of avoiding every occasion for sinning.

Confectary: In an impious man, not yet renewed, since he indeed lacks all spiritual life, Ephesians 2:1, and is not able to do anything good, "nothing but evil continually" Genesis 6:5, in him therefore there is absolutely no, nor can there be any, sin of infirmity.

Malice (which name indeed is of a certain virtue, if we wish to speak Latin, but by usage, which we follow, it extends more widely) is the perversity of a soul, alienated from God, and not yet reconciled to God, referring all things to its own will. Hence 1) there is in him no sorrow for sins, no detestation of them, except by reason of certain temporal and earthly effects, because self-love, which alone he obeys, warns him that he has harmed himself; 2) no study of repenting, and of conducting his affairs more cautiously in the future, except for civil reasons, Jeremiah 8:6. "He himself is always wax, to be bent to vice, harsh to his monitors."

Confectary: In recognizing sins of malice, not only this or that action ought to be considered, but also the entire disposition and viciousness of the soul. Therefore, whatever a man who is not reconciled to God does, whether knowingly or unknowingly, whether thoughtfully, so that the wickedness was meditated on long before, or hastily, and agitated by vehement motions of the mind, all that is malice.

father, does not impute the sins of infirmity and ignorance to the reborn for guilt and punishment. 3) From the outcome. Mortal sin casts the sinner headlong into a state of wrath, death, and condemnation, so that, if he dies in that state without repentance, he is altogether condemned; but venial sin, because it has undivided pardon as its companion, can consist with the grace of God and saving faith.

Obs. II. The distinction of mortal and venial sin does not in all respects coincide with the distinction of sin into voluntary and involuntary. For sins are called voluntary and involuntary by reason of the cause; mortal and venial by reason of the subject, the divine estimation, and the outcome. In the unregenerate, every sin, whether it was voluntary or involuntary, is mortal, or actively deadly; for "he who does not believe the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God remains on him," John 3:3, 6. But for the reborn who succumb to the flesh, those sins are deadly which are done with the full intention of the will; but those which are committed either from ignorance or from infirmity of the flesh, those a propitious God deigns with pardon.

Obs. III. The distinction of sin into mortal and venial is most well-founded in the sacred letters, and long since received in the church. For, according to St. Paul; "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who do not walk according to the flesh but according to the Spirit," Romans 8:1. also v. 13. "If you live according to the flesh, you will die; but if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live." The sense of which apostolic statements is; As long as the reborn, by the power of the Holy Spirit, suppress and mortify the inordinate motions of the flesh, so long will those vicious motions not actually condemn them, but will be venial sins. But if the reborn obey the irritations of the flesh, so that it predominates, they will be cast into a state of death and condemnation, and their sins will be actively deadly (*). TERTULLIAN, in his book On Purity, uses the same distinction, saying:

(*) Indeed, I do not doubt that the firmest and clearest testimony on this matter exists in 1 John 5:16. "There are sins that lead to death, and sins that do not lead to death." This is more correctly and plainly said than the common terms mortal or venial. For what is usually called venial is said more than ambiguously, and can be understood in three ways: Either what is worthy of pardon; or for which we have already obtained pardon; or for which we are able to obtain pardon. The second interpretation is true; the first is entirely false; the third does not belong to this passage. For as to the second, venial sins are sins of infirmity, namely those which fall upon men born again, as long as they are and remain such. But as to the first, no sin is venial; and as to the third, all are venial, as long as a man is among the living and a partaker of the calling of grace, if you depart from one, the sin against the Holy Spirit, about which we must discourse hereafter. But sin "not unto death" is named that which is not so imputed to the sinner as to truly make him guilty of damnation, although it could do so by merit, if the satisfaction of Christ did not intercede, which is attributed to the man who trusts wholly in Christ. Thus also the opposition is most rightly and most clearly established. For pardon is not so openly opposed to death. But to die, and not to die, these are truly opposites. However, this is in dispute; What is "sin unto death"? I do not think that one sin is signified by that name, as it pleases those to interpret for whom JOHN seems to speak of no other than the sin against the Holy Spirit, in whose number the blessed Author also professes his own name below, at question 47. What then? Surely one genus, in which many and various sins are contained. The arguments drawn 1) from the distinction and opposition are clear to me; for "sin unto death" is distinguished from all that which is not unto death, which, although it is likewise designated by the number of unity, no one denies that it is not to be understood of some singular sin, but is spoken generally. Blessed LUTHER first translates v. 16 in German thus: eine Sunde (a sin); but then in the following verse thus: etliche Sunde (some sins). 2) From the general definition in v. 17. "All unrighteousness is sin." To which the adjoined division must be so adequate that not some offense is distinguished from the universal genus, but one genus from another. 3) From the different condition of the subjects. For the impious and wicked men are not opposed to other impious men; but two genera of men are distinguished, in one of which are all those born again, in the other all those contrary to them, v. 18, 19. It is necessary, therefore, that two genera of sins also be distinguished, in each of which are numbered all

"Some sins are capital or mortal, some of daily incursion." AUGUSTINE, in book XI of The City of God, calls mortal sins crimes that lay waste the conscience.

Question XXI. Are some sins venial by their nature?

No sins are so light that they are worthy of pardon through themselves; but all sins, by their nature, in the legal forum, are mortal, or worthy of death and eternal damnation.

1. It is proven. Because every sin in itself and by its nature is ἀνομία (lawlessness), 1 John 3:4. Therefore, every sin in itself and by its nature is joined with an offense to God and the guilt of eternal damnation. The consequence is proven; because, as the divine law obligates to perfect obedience under the threat of eternal damnation, so its transgression, even in the smallest things, offends God and brings upon the transgressor the wrath of God and eternal damnation.

2. It is proven. Deuteronomy 27:26, Galatians 3:10, it is expressly said: "Cursed is everyone who does not abide by all things written in the book of the law." But he who commits a venial sin does not abide by all things written in the book of the law; Therefore, he is cursed by the law on account of that sin.

3. It is proven. "The wages of every sin is death," Romans 6:23. Therefore, death is the wages even of venial sin.

4. It is proven. "For whoever keeps the whole law but fails in one point has become guilty of all of it," James 2:10. Therefore, he who commits a sin of infirmity is guilty of all the divine precepts. But if a sin attracts the guilt of wrath and damnation, on account of the violation of the whole divine law, it is certainly not venial in itself, but mortal.

5. It is proven. "Whoever relaxes one of the least of these commandments... will be called least in the kingdom of God," Matthew 5:19. He who commits a venial sin relaxes one of the least of God's commandments. Therefore, he will be least, i.e., nothing, in the kingdom of heaven. For in heaven, in the opinion of AUGUSTINE, there will be nothing but what is great.

6. It is proven. For every idle word an account will be required on the day of judgment, Matthew 12:36-37. Therefore, even a venial sin, to which the idle word is referred by the Pontificians, offends the celestial judge.

The antithesis is 1) that of the Pontificians, asserting that some sins are so light that they merit pardon through themselves. 2) that of the Socinians and Arminians, extenuating sins of infirmity, as if no account is taken of them in the kingdom of Christ. Their principal arguments are:

I. A sin is called venial because it is worthy of pardon. Resp. A sin is called venial, not because it is worthy of pardon through itself, but because God, out of mercy, on account of the satisfaction and intercession of Christ, deigns it with pardon. Wherefore it is called venial not through itself, but through something extrinsic, and from an accidental outcome.

II. There are some sins which neither bring death to the soul, nor are they worthy of eternal punishment through themselves; Therefore, there are some sins which are venial through themselves. Resp. The antecedent, which is two-membered, is ambiguous as to the first member, and false as to the second. For, in the first member, death of the soul can be taken either for eternal damnation, or for the loss or privation of grace. If death of the soul is taken in the former way, the antecedent is false; since he is called cursed who has not remained in all things that are written in the book of the law; but the curse of the law imports eternal death. But if in the latter way, it is indeed true that there are sins which do not actually bring death to the soul; but it is denied that there are sins which are not of such a nature in themselves that they merit death of the soul and are able to bring it. For the fact that God does not withdraw his grace from the sinner on account of all sins is not from the nature and condition of the sins, but from the mercy of God and the merit of Christ.

III. Consummated sin brings forth death, but not concupiscence that tempts, draws away, and entices, James 1:15. Therefore, tempting concupiscence is a sin that is venial through itself. Resp. Sin, consummated in an external work, and committed with destined malice, brings forth death in act; but concupiscence merits death, and can bring it the sins which are contained in the whole genus. Therefore, "sin not unto death" is the universal genus of sins of infirmity, which are committed by men born again. On the contrary, what is called "unto death" is the universal genus of sins of malice, which are perpetrated by men not born of God.

forth, unless it is remitted by the grace of God on account of the satisfaction and intercession of Christ.

IV. Christ in Matthew 5:22 does not assign the punishment of hell to anger against a brother, nor to uncomposed gestures, but only to manifest insult. Therefore, anger and uncomposed gestures are sins that are venial through themselves. Resp. Rash anger towards a brother is not a venial sin, but because it is a work of the flesh, it is deadly in act, as Paul teaches, Galatians 5:10. Wherefore, by the names of judgment, council, and hell, eternal damnation is noted, and at the same time certain degrees of damnation are designated, which are recounted according to the custom of the Judaic polity.

V. If all sins were mortal through themselves, all sins would be equal; But the consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The falsity of the consequent is clear from the fact that some sins are like a gnat, some like a camel, Matthew 23:24; some are like a speck, some like beams, Luke 24. Therefore, some are venial through themselves. Resp. Sins are unequal on account of gradual guilt, and greater or lesser malice, not on account of their own dignity, from which they merit pardon through themselves.

VI. Sins are venial either through themselves and by their nature, or by accident and eventually; Not by accident and eventually; because thus even sins that are actively deadly would be venial, because it happens that even they are eventually condoned for the repentant; Therefore, they are venial through themselves and by their nature. Resp. There is a third option. Sins of infirmity are venial not through themselves; for thus even in the unregenerate they would be venial; nor only eventually; but on account of the gracious estimation of God, who does not impute them to those who believe in Christ, but condones them.

Question XXII. What are the causes for which involuntary sin is not imputed to the reborn for guilt and punishment in the second act?

The causes of remission, or non-imputation, are; the mercy of God a), the satisfaction and intercession of Christ b), the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit c), the daily repentance of the reborn d).

a. It is proven. "As a father shows compassion to his children, so the Lord shows compassion to those who fear him." Psalm 103:13. But just as a father condones the blemishes of his sons; so God grants pardon to his reborn sons who sin from ignorance or infirmity of the flesh. Therefore, he looks kindly upon the wretched, the one afflicted in spirit, and the one who trembles at the word of God, Isaiah 66:2.

b. It is proven. "My little children, I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin. But if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. And he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 John 2:1-2. Thus John attributes the pardon of sins to the propitiation and intercession of Christ. "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who do not walk according to the flesh but according to the Spirit," Romans 8:1.

c. It is proven. The Holy Spirit, dwelling in the reborn, represses the efforts of the flesh, lest it obtain dominion, and suggests good thoughts and pious desires. From this it happens that the law does not have the power of accusing and condemning the reborn. Paul teaches this in Galatians 5:16, 17, 18. "But I say, walk by the Spirit, and you will not gratify the desires of the flesh. For the desires of the flesh are against the Spirit, and the desires of the Spirit are against the flesh, for these are opposed to each other, to keep you from doing the things you want to do. But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law."

d. It is proven. Those sins are venial in the reborn which in the non-reborn are equally mortal; because the reborn acknowledge the filth of sins adhering to them, they grieve seriously over them, they ask that they be covered by the merit of Christ, as by a shadow of grace, and through the Spirit they resist the concupiscence of the flesh. "If by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live," Romans 8:13.

Question XXIII. What are the effects of voluntary and mortal sin?

The effects of voluntary and mortal sin are; the loss of divine grace and the indwelling Spirit a), the shipwreck of faith and the bite of conscience b), eternal death, unless serious repentance is undertaken c).

a. It is proven. The words of B. LUTHER in the Smalcald Articles, p. 328, are most worthy of mention. "It should be known that if the saints, who still feel original sin and daily repent of it and struggle with it, should moreover fall into manifest sins, like David into adultery, homicide, and blasphemy, they cast out faith and the Holy Spirit, and at that time faith and the Holy Spirit are absent from them. For the Holy Spirit does not allow sin to dominate, to grow strong and to obtain victory, and to be consummated, but represses and coerces it, so that it cannot do what it wants. But if it does what it wants, certainly the Holy Spirit and faith are lost, nor are they present at the same time. For so says John, 1 Epistle 3:9: 'Whoever is born of God does not sin, and cannot sin.'

b. It is proven. "Hold on to faith and a good conscience, which some have rejected and have made a shipwreck of their faith," 1 Timothy 1:19. Faith and a good conscience are joined by the apostle. For once this anchor is lost, the ship of faith is broken. "That faith, which receives the remission of sins in a terrified heart that is fleeing sin, does not remain in those who obey their lusts, nor does it exist with mortal sin," as the Apology of the A.C. teaches, p. 96.

c. It is proven. "Do not be deceived; neither the sexually immoral, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor men who practice homosexuality, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Corinthians 6:9-10. Those who indulge in mortal sins preclude for themselves access to the kingdom of glory.

Question XXIV. What is our sin? What is another's?

Our Sin and Another's Sin. Our sin is a vicious act, produced by our real influence a); another's sin, imputed to us, is an illicit act, to the production of which we concur not indeed with real influence, but with efficacious intention, so that it can justly be imputed to us b).

a. It is proven. Sin, which is formally ours, is perpetrated not only by our persuasion or exhortation, but also by our own powers, and thus by our real influence.

b. It is proven. He who commands, counsels, consents, connives, does not prevent, does not reveal, and is thus a moral cause of another's sin, concurs in it with efficacious intention. The verses on the moral cause are well known:

"Command, counsel, consent, flattery, recourse, Participating, silent, not preventing, not revealing."

Paul gravely warns: "Do not take part in the sins of others," 1 Timothy 5:22. The apostle implies that the sins of others can become ours, by participation and imputation.

Question XXV. What are the sins of the heart, mouth, and deed?

Sins of the heart, mouth, and deed. Sins of the heart are depraved thoughts and desires, which are fostered within the bosom of the human soul a); sins of the mouth are evil words and gestures, which are expressed by the mouth b); sins of deed are acts which are perpetrated by the external effort of the members against the law of God.

a. It is proven. Christ joins sins of deed, mouth, and heart, Matthew 5:21-22. "You have heard that it was said to those of old, 'You shall not murder; and whoever murders will be liable to judgment.' But I say to you that everyone who is angry with his brother will be liable to judgment; whoever insults his brother, 'Raca,' will be liable to the council; and whoever says, 'You fool!' will be liable to the hell of fire." The Pharisees considered only those sins to be deadly which are consummated by an external deed; but Jesus, the vindicator of salvation, teaches that even sins of the heart (e.g., hatred of a neighbor) and of the mouth (if one says: 'Raca,' or: 'fool,') attract the guilt of fault and punishment.

Question XXVI. What are the sins of commission and omission?

Sins of commission and omission. Sins of commission are positive acts by which the negative precepts of God are violated. Sins of omission are suspensions of acts prescribed by the affirmative precepts of God.

a. It is proven. The apostle James inculcates this distinction, in his epistle ch. 4:16-17. "As it is, you boast in your arrogance. All such boasting is evil. So whoever knows the right thing to do and fails to do it, for him it is sin." Evil boasting is a sin of commission; not doing good is a sin of omission.

Obs. Although in a sin of omission there is generally some positive illicit act, either an interior one of the will, as: to will to omit what is commanded; or an exterior one, as: an operation by which one is impeded from that which he is bound to do; yet such a positive act is not always or necessarily required, but the very not doing of what is commanded is a sin.

Question XXVII. What sins are committed against God, the neighbor, and the sinner himself?

Sins against God, neighbor, and oneself. Sins against God are those which immediately and directly injure God himself a). Sins against a neighbor are those which immediately respect and offend a neighbor b). Sins against the sinner himself are those which are directly brought against the person of the sinner himself c).

a. It is proven. Those sins which are committed against the first table of the Decalogue immediately injure God, e.g., idolatry, blasphemy, perjury, magic, contempt of the divine word. The priest Eli proposed the distinction of sins against God and neighbor for his sons' consideration, 1 Samuel 2:25. "If someone sins against a man, God will mediate for him, but if a man sins against the Lord, who can intercede for him?"

b. It is proven. One who transgresses the precepts of the second table of the Decalogue sins partly against himself, partly against his neighbor, by striking him, killing him, defrauding him, slandering him, etc.

c. It is proven. Through fornication, drunkenness, suicide, etc., a man sins against himself. In a peculiar way, the fornicator is said to sin against his own body, 1 Corinthians 6:13, because he abuses his own body, and converts it into the material of illicit pleasure. That which a drunkard abuses is outside his own body, but a suicide destroys his own body.

Question XXVIII. What are crying sins, and what are non-crying, or sins of tolerance?

Crying and Non-crying Sins. Crying sins are vicious acts which, even when men are silent or conniving, provoke God to vengeance a). Non-crying sins are said to be those which God in his long-suffering tolerates, and either defers the punishment, or, if they have been committed by the reborn, remits b).

a. It is proven. Crying sin, as scripture testifies, was: 1) Fratricide, committed by Cain, Genesis 4:10. "The voice of your brother's blood is crying to me." 2) The sins of the Sodomites, Genesis 18:20. "Because the outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah is great and their sin is very grave." 3) The oppression of the Israelites in Egypt, Exodus 3:9. "I have heard their cry." Add to this the oppression of widows and orphans. Exodus 22:22. 4) The denial of wages to be paid to workers, James 5:4. Whence the verses were born:

"The voice of blood cries to heaven, and of the Sodomites,

The voice of the oppressed, wages withheld from labors."

These four sins are called crying, not exclusively, as if there were not more, but because they are individually recounted in the sacred letters. For the rest, there is no doubt that enormous sins, by which the same measure of iniquity is filled, cry to heaven and demand vengeance, e.g., blasphemy, parricide, adultery, robberies, etc.

b. It is proven. God is said to have overlooked the ignorance of the Gentiles until the advent of the Messiah, Acts 17:30. God tolerated the polygamy of the fathers under the old covenant, and remitted it to them as they continued in daily repentance.

Question XXIX. What sin is considered more grave? What is lighter?

Sins are called more grave and lighter on account of the greater and lesser guilt or adhering filthiness.

It is proven. The sins of Jerusalem are reputed to be graver than the offenses of Samaria and Sodom, Ezekiel 16:47, which God himself brings to her mind, saying: "You have corrupted yourself more than all of them in your ways." The citizens of Jerusalem had gone on more perverse ways than the Samaritans or the Sodomites, those famous architects of crimes.

Obs. One sin is graver than another: 1) By reason of the efficient cause, or the person sinning. A Christian sins more gravely than a Gentile, binding himself to the same crime. 2) By reason of the impelling cause. He sins more gravely who commits adultery with his neighbor's wife for the sake of fulfilling his lust, than he who steals, compelled by hunger. 3) By reason of the object. He offends more gravely who kills his father than he who kills an enemy. 4) By reason of the norm. He sins more gravely who violates the first table of the Decalogue than he who violates the second. 5) By reason of the effect. The more damages a sin brings, the graver it is considered.

Question XXX. What is a hidden sin?
What is a manifest one?

Hidden and Manifest Sin. A hidden sin is that which is either unknown to the sinner himself, or which is known only to the sinner and to a few others who wish to keep it suppressed a). A manifest sin is that which has become known to many, and if it is joined with the offense of others, it is called a scandal b).

a. It is proven. "Who can discern his errors? Declare me innocent from hidden faults (which either were not known to the intellect, or have been buried in oblivion)!" Psalm 19:13.

b. It is proven. 1 Timothy 5:24. "The sins of some people are conspicuous."

Question XXXI. What is scandal?

Scandal. Scandal is a manifest sin, which provides an occasion of sinning to those to whom it becomes known. It is commonly distinguished into scandal given, or active, and scandal taken, or passive. The former is a manifest sin, which offers an occasion of sinning to others a); the latter is a saying or deed of another, not evil in itself, by which others are offended, or from which they take an occasion of sinning b).

Obs. Scandal taken, since it is not a sin, is improperly so called, insofar as, beyond the intention of the person acting or speaking, another is accidentally offended by the same.

a. It is proven. Scandals are offered to others in faith and in life. In faith, either by doctors of the church, or by the magistrate, or by private individuals. By doctors of the church, scandals are given in faith when they disseminate false dogmas, separate themselves from the church, boast of miracles, attack the articles of faith with the arms of false philosophy, collude with heretics, and are ambiguous in publishing a confession of faith. By the magistrate, scandals are given in faith when he has little regard for religion, neglects the care for the salvation of the souls of his subjects, and does not take pains to ensure that orthodox and pious ministers are called. By private individuals, scandals are given in faith when they are tepid in the care of religion, invite a neighbor to heresy, hand over their children to be educated by heretics, give their daughters in marriage to heretics, and themselves read with pleasure books consigned by heretics, and recommend them to others. In life and morals, a scandal is offered by doctors of the church when they themselves do not shine before others with piety of life, nor do they reprove the vices of their hearers with the severity that is proper. By the magistrate, a scandal of this kind is offered when he himself indulges in manifest sins, and does not punish the crimes of his subjects with just zeal. By private individuals, when fathers and mothers of families do not imbue their children with honest morals, nor do they lead their household by integrity of life.

b. It is proven. Distorted minds seize an occasion for sinning from words and deeds that are not evil. For example, the Jews were offended by Christ's doctrine and his humble state, and from there they took occasion to slander and crucify Christ.

Question XXXII. What is a dead sin?
What is a living one?

Dead and Living Sin. A dead sin is one whose gravity is not acknowledged by the person in whom it inheres, nor is its power to irritate and torment felt. A living sin is one that exerts its powers, and rages in the sinning man, so that it both irritates the desire to strive for a thing forbidden by law, and terrifies and torments the conscience.

It is proven. From Romans 7:8-9. "Apart from the law, sin was dead. I was once alive apart from the law, but when the commandment came, sin came alive." That is to say: Without the law, accurately considered, sin is dead, not as to the thing itself, but as to the perception of it, i.e., its foulness is not acknowledged, nor is the stimulus, by which it incites the desire to strive for the forbidden and pricks the conscience, felt. But, with the meditation of the law kindling, sin, like a dog awakened from sleep, revives and exercises greater powers, both by kindling a more vehement desire to do that which is prohibited by the law, and by biting and tormenting the conscience.

Question XXXIII. What is a remaining sin? What is a remitted one?

Remaining and Remitted Sin. A remaining sin is that which presses down the sinner with its weight, guilt, perception, and dominion. A remitted sin is one from whose guilt and dominion a reborn man has been freed through the justifying and renewing grace of God.

It is proven. From John 9:41. "Jesus said to them, 'If you were blind, you would have no guilt.' But now that you say, 'We see,' your guilt remains." The sense is: If you acknowledged that you were blind, you would receive the light of my gospel for the illumination of your souls, so that by believing you might obtain the remission of sins. But because you say, "we see," i.e., we abound in the knowledge of celestial things; you spurn my doctrine. Therefore your sin persists, inheres, accuses, and dominates.

Question XXXIV. What is sin joined with hardening? What is that which is separated from it?

Hardening. Sin joined with hardening is a most atrocious sin, by which the polluted mind of man remains averted from the word of God and blind, the will, confirmed in evil, resists the Holy Spirit, the appetite indulges in beastly pleasures, and thus the sinner, with difficulty or plainly incorrigible, brings upon himself temporal and eternal punishments. Sin without hardening is the sin of a corrigible and curable man.

Question XXXV. What is the cause of hardening?

The cause of hardening is not God a); but partly the devil, who sows evil from evil, blinding the mind and filling the heart with malice b); partly man, who repels the ordinary means of salvation and enslaves himself by continuous study and exercise of sinning c).

a. It is proven. God is the hater and avenger of sin, Psalm 5:5, who, to soften the soul of the sinner, now uses the hammer of the law, now the rain of the gospel; but the sinner, scorning the voice of God, obeys the suggestions of the devil and the enticements of the world. You say: God himself says: "I will harden Pharaoh's heart." Exodus 7:3. Resp. God hardens the sinner, not positively or effectively, by putting hardness into the heart; but 1) occasionally and eventually, when, like a most benign father, he tolerates the sinner with his long-suffering, defers punishment, and heaps benefits upon him, so that the man may return to a better frame of mind. On the contrary, that man, noticing that he is not punished in the flagrant sin, abuses the long-suffering, and from the benefits conferred takes occasion to fall into security and the custom of sinning. 2) Judicially, when on account of a preceding voluntary and avoidable malice, God, the most just judge, permits the man, a contemner of all means of salvation, to rush into graver wicked deeds, and withdraws his grace from him, and finally hands him over to the power of Satan, by whom he is propelled into ever greater sins, until he finally forfeits the right of the celestial inheritance.

b. It is proven. The devil blinds the minds of the unbelievers, 2 Corinthians 4:4, fills the heart with malice, Acts 5:3, works in the sons of disobedience, Ephesians 2:2.

c. It is proven. In Matthew 13:15, Christ says: "For this people's heart has grown dull, and with their ears they can barely hear, and their eyes they have closed, lest they should see with their eyes and hear with their ears and understand with their heart and turn, and I would heal them." He who closes the eyes of his mind to the light of the gospel, and hardens his ears to hearing the voice of God, hardens himself.

Question XXXVI. How manyfold is hardness of heart?

Hardness of heart is twofold, original and actual. The former is drawn from birth from parents infected with sin a); the latter is acquired by the continued study of sinning b).

a. It is proven. Of original hardness of heart God says, Ezekiel 36:26. "I will remove the heart of stone from your flesh." A heart of stone lies in the midst of our flesh, naturally inept to receive any spiritual good.

b. It is proven. "Pharaoh continued to sin, and he hardened his heart," Exodus 9:34, i.e., by the assiduous study of sinning he contracted hardness for himself.

Question XXXVII. What sin is remissible? What is irremissible?

A remissible sin is that which, just as it does not by its nature exclude repentance, so also it can and is accustomed to be remitted. An irremissible sin is that which through itself, and insofar as it is such, is joined with final impenitence, and thus is never remitted. It is commonly called the sin against the Holy Spirit.

Question XXXVIII. What is the sin against the Holy Spirit?

Sin against the Holy Spirit. The sin against the Holy Spirit is the malicious denial, hostile impugning, horrendous blaspheming of the divine truth that has been evidently acknowledged and approved in the conscience, and the obstinate and finally persevering rejection of all the means of salvation (*). | Obs. The sin against the Holy Spirit here is not taken in a general sense, by which

(*) Let us begin from principles, of which the first seven are hermeneutical, the rest dogmatic. And the former indeed are drawn from the clearest sayings, by which this argument is chiefly expounded, Matthew 12:31-32, Mark 3:28-29, with v. 30 added, Luke 12:10-12, Hebrews 6:4-6, 10:29. To which this should be added, Acts 7:51 & 57. But that saying in 1 John 5:16 does not pertain to this, I think I have already declared sufficiently.

1. To sin against the Holy Spirit is openly called βλασφημεῖν (to blaspheme), in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and ἰνυβρίζειν (to treat with insolence), Hebrews 10:29.

2. It is distinguished from all other βλασφημία (blasphemy), Matthew 12:31, Mark 3:28, and specifically from the injury by which one afflicts Christ, about the true definition of which will be disputed below.

3. A certain reason for it is explained in Mark 3:30, where it denotes a certain operation of the Holy Spirit, add v. 22. It is therefore a μετωνυμία (metonymy) of the cause for the effect, as often elsewhere, e.g., Acts 10:47, cf. with v. 45. But there can be several reasons for one thing, which, being entirely equal or similar to that reason indicated in words that are quite clear, will be able to effect an equal or similar consequence. (See a little after, princ. 5.)

4. Accused of this sin are not only men previously enlightened and renewed, now perfidious and falling away, Hebrews 6:4, 6; 10:29, but also the impious, and those not yet illuminated in a saving way, Mark 3:22 & 30, cf. with 1 Corinthians 2:8.

5. Where this sin is discussed, mention is also made of the gifts and effects of saving grace, and indeed of the means of grace, not only the ordinary, Hebrews 6:5, but also the extraordinary and abundant, in the same verse, cf. with chapter 2:4, Mark 3:22-30, 16:20. (vid. princ. 3.)

6. This one sin it is, and no other, which cannot be remitted, Matthew 12:31 and in parallel places.

7. The reason for the denied remission is expressly placed in this; that it can never happen that anyone guilty of this sin should truly repent, Hebrews 6:4, 6. This must be held fast in the first place.

8. The Holy Spirit has the divine nature in common and altogether the same with the Father and the Son, and as regards his person itself, he is indeed distinct from those two, but yet in such a way that he is equally equal to both. Therefore, neither in the nature of the Holy Spirit, nor in his person, is there anything singular and exceptional, for which reason the sin against the Holy Spirit should be thought to be either some singular thing, distinct from all others, or plainly graver than that which is committed either against the Father or against the Son.

9. The gifts and means of illuminating, renewing, blessing grace, and whatever pertains to the application of salvation, are in a singular way assigned to the Holy Spirit, John 5:6, 8, 1 Corinthians 12:3-4, just as the acquisition of our salvation is specifically and properly attributed to Christ, and the eternal decrees concerning the salvation to be imparted to us are ascribed to the Father.

10. The grace of God calling to salvation, always serious and efficacious, as also the acquisition of salvation, procured by the merits of Christ, pertains equally to all and every man, nor is there any sin for which Christ has not made satisfaction.

11. Grace is never not greater and more powerful than any sin, even the most grave and greatest of all.

12. The acquisition of recovered salvation profits no one without its right application.

13. The order of salvation so requires that, in this application and perception of salvation, μετάνοια (metanoia, a saving change of mind) should precede the remission of sins.

14. This change cannot be effected otherwise than by the means of grace being applied, and indeed rightly used. These being so rejected and repudiated that a man with the greatest obstinacy of mind will not even hear, let alone meditate and know, it cannot happen that the man should ever repent with a saving change of mind. Therefore, that which makes repentance impossible, the same makes the remission of sin equally impossible. (princ. 13.).

every sin is against the Holy Spirit; but in a special sense, for that most grave sin which is committed not so much against the person of the Holy Spirit as against his office, which he exercises through the ministry of the word in converting the souls of men. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is considered not ἐσιωδῶς, essentially, nor ὑποτακτικῶς, personally; but ἐνεργητικῶς, effectively, by reason of his office and spiritual operation, inasmuch as the Holy Spirit through the doctrine of the gospel reveals the will of God, illuminates minds, converts hearts, convinces consciences, and testifies to the truth of the divine word. Those who maliciously and perseveringly resist this operation of the Holy Spirit are said to sin against the Holy Spirit.

Question XXXIX. What is noted by the divine truth that is denied and impugned in this sin?

By the divine truth which is said to be denied, here is understood the divine doctrine, which is by far the most true, and indeed secondarily the legal doctrine a), primarily the evangelical doctrine b).

a. It is proven. If anyone were petulantly to proclaim, impugn, and blaspheme the very doctrine of the divine law, evidently acknowledged and approved in his conscience, as false and diabolical, he would certainly sin against the Holy Spirit; because the law is also an instrument of the Holy Spirit, by which he leads us to repentance, Romans 7:7. You say: I. The law is objectively contrasted with the sin against the Holy Spirit, Hebrews 10:28. Resp. The law in that passage is not considered as it is the divine truth, which the apostates deny, but as it is the norm of morals, from which sinners deviate in acting. You say: II. The sin against the Holy Spirit is commonly defined as the denial not of legal, but of evangelical truth. Resp. The sin against the Holy Spirit is defined by the denial of evangelical truth not exclusively, but comparatively and pre-eminently, so that a nobler and more sublime object may be expressed, but the law is not entirely excluded. For the rest, you may observe that the Mosaic law can be considered in a twofold way: 1) insofar as it is the norm of moral actions; 2) insofar as it is the word of God, or divine doctrine and celestial truth. In the former way, he sins against the law who transgresses and violates it; in the latter way, he sins who denies that the Mosaic law is the word of God, or a celestial truth. On account of vicious morals or a perverse life, no one is called a sinner

15. Continuation and permanence is not a certain moral action, but is a duration joined to an action, and therefore in itself is neither to be held as a fault, nor to be considered a praise. It becomes either bad or good, from the nature of the action to which it is joined. Therefore, perseverance in good is good, permanence in evil is always bad.

Corollaries to be drawn from these principles:

1. The sin against the Holy Spirit, insofar as it is such, cannot but be something entirely singular, different from all others (by princ. 2 & 6).

2. It is not against the divine nature of the Holy Spirit, nor against his person (by princ. 8); but it is committed against his gifts and effects, or the means of grace (by princ. 3, 5, 9).

3. It is therefore nothing other than a malicious and stubborn resistance against all the means of grace, both ordinary and extraordinary and abundant (by princ. 5); whether they have ever been known and perceived, or never (by princ. 4); especially, if that resistance is joined with contumely, by which the whole soul is turned away from the truth, and is an adversary to it (by princ. 1).

4. The reason why this sin can never be remitted is not situated in the gravity of this offense, although it is the most grave of all (by princ. 11); nor in the fact that the grace of God and the merit of Christ do not pertain to this sin (by princ. 10); but it is wholly placed in the very nature of this sin, which is entirely singular and proper, since in this one alone μετάνοια (metanoia), and the right application of salvation recovered through Christ, cannot happen (by princ. 7, 12, 13, 14).

5. The perpetual obstinacy of the soul even to the end of life, or, as is customary to say, final impenitence, is not the very nature of this sin, but a consequent and adjoined something (by princ. 15), since this sin is of such a kind that all the means of grace are repudiated, whether ordinary or extraordinary and abundant (by the definition in confectary 3); but without these means, no μετάνοια (metanoia) can ever happen (by princ. 14): Therefore, the perpetual obstinacy of the soul will then be necessary.

against the Holy Spirit, although a perverse life and turpitude of morals may accompany the sin against the Holy Spirit; but those who petulantly proclaim, impugn, blaspheme, and pertinaciously reject the very doctrine of the divine law, evidently acknowledged and approved in their conscience, sin against the Holy Spirit, because they maliciously resist the Holy Spirit operating through the ministry of the law.

b. It is proven. That those who sin against the Holy Spirit principally and most especially offend against the doctrine of the gospel is proven: 1) from Matthew 12:24, 31 and Mark 3:22-29, where the sin against the Holy Spirit is considered by profession. Namely, the Pharisees sinned against the Holy Spirit by blaspheming the redeemer of the world, and asserting that he cast out demons and performed miracles by the help of the devil; although they were better taught concerning the divine power of Christ, and were convicted in their conscience. Therefore, they committed the sin against the Holy Spirit by rejecting the marrow or kernel of the gospel. Wherefore the apostle also teaches that sinners against the Holy Spirit trample underfoot the Son of God and the blood of the covenant. "consider the blood of the covenant a common thing," Hebrews 10:29. But the Son of God and the blood of the covenant are announced and offered to us through the word of the gospel. 2) Sinners against the Holy Spirit are said to have "tasted the good word of God," Hebrews 6:5. But the good word of God is the gospel, sweeter than honey. For it is the good news, Luke 2:10, the word of peace, Ephesians 2:17, the word of our reconciliation with God, 2 Corinthians 5:19. The divine law, although it is good in itself, as a good rule of life, proceeding from the best author; eventually, however, it is not good for sinful man, because it denounces to him the wrath of God and the curse, Romans 4:15, Deuteronomy 27:26. 3) The sin against the Holy Spirit is described by παράπτωσιν (paraptōsin, falling away), apostasy, or defection from the faith, by which enlightened men, having tasted the good word of God and the powers of the age to come, and having fallen away, have crucified again the Son of God and exposed him to public disgrace, Hebrews 6:5-6. But faith has respect to the gospel, and apostasy from faith in Christ is distinctly known from the gospel. You say: Every sin is prohibited by the divine law. Therefore, also the sin against the Holy Spirit. Resp. The sin against the Holy Spirit is considered in two ways; 1) generally, insofar as it is a sin, and thus it is prohibited by the law; 2) specifically, insofar as it is the sin against the Holy Spirit, and thus it is the voluntary and pertinacious denial of the evangelical truth.

Question XL. What are the formal requisites of the sin against the Holy Spirit?

The formal requisites of the sin against the Holy Spirit are: the completely free and malicious denial of the celestial truth which has been luculently known and approved in the conscience a); the hostile impugning of the maliciously denied truth b); the voluntary blaspheming of the hostilely impugned truth c); the pertinacious rejection of all the means of salvation d).

a. It is proven. That a luculent knowledge and approbation of the divine truth is required for the sin against the Holy Spirit is clear from Hebrews 10:26, where those who sin against the Holy Spirit are said to sin voluntarily, "after they have received the knowledge of the truth," i.e., after they have been convicted in their conscience of the truth of the gospel. The same is gathered from Hebrews 6:4-6, where it is asserted of sinners against the Holy Spirit that 1) they were "enlightened," i.e., illustrated with the knowledge of the Christian doctrine; 2) they "tasted the heavenly gift," that is, they perceived by saving faith how sweet Christ is, the author of the remission of sins and of eternal life; 3) they were made "partakers of the Holy Spirit," as of a seal, pledge, and earnest of eternal salvation; 4) they "tasted the good word of God," in that they perceived the sweetness of the gospel with an experimental and affective knowledge (for taste in biblical style denotes not a light or slight, but an abundant perception joined with an affection of love and joy); 5) they "tasted the powers of the age to come," by feeling and experiencing a foretaste of the most efficacious joys of eternal life. Therefore, a full knowledge of the celestial truth for the state of this life is graphically depicted in those words, most worthy of remembrance. From which we gather that Paul, by persecuting the divine truth, did not sin against the Holy Spirit; because he did this in ignorance, as he testifies of himself, 1 Timothy 1:13. 2) That a completely free denial of the celestial truth, not extorted by fear of dangers, is required for the sin against the Holy Spirit is clear from Hebrews 10:26. "For if we go on sinning deliberately after receiving the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins." Sinners against the Holy Spirit are said to sin ἐκουσίως (hekousiōs), i.e., freely, voluntarily, maliciously, with a high hand, through contempt of the divine majesty, from mere pride. But those who sin against the Spirit sin by τῷ παραπίπτειν (tō paraptiptein), falling away from the illumination and taste, or experimental knowledge, of the heavenly gift, Hebrews 6:6, and from the received knowledge of the truth, Hebrews 10:26. But he who falls away from the illumination and received knowledge of the truth, denies the known divine truth which he has from the grace of illumination. We gather from this that Peter, by denying Christ, did not sin against the Holy Spirit, because he sinned not with a fully free will, but one inclined by fear of punishment. In the primitive church, when most grievous persecutions arose, not a few, overcome by the force of tortures or compelled by the dread of dangers, defected from the doctrine of the gospel; who sinned against the Son of man indeed, but not against the Holy Spirit.

b. It is proven. That a hostile opposition to the evangelical truth is required for the consummation of the sin against the Holy Spirit is clear from the description of those who sin against the Holy Spirit. For they "crucify the Son of God on their own account," i.e., they go about extinguishing the gospel of Christ, Hebrews 6:4, "they trample underfoot," i.e., they treat most contemptuously. By which words is indicated a hostile impugning, by which is opposed either the whole doctrine of faith, or one or another fundamental article of faith; the impugning of which will also undermine the other connected articles of faith, if not directly and primarily, at least obliquely, secondarily, and by consequence; because, with one article of faith denied, the evangelical doctrine no longer remains whole. For the rest, the opposition to the Christian doctrine is either immediate, by which someone by himself strives to suppress the celestial truth either by mouth, or by pen, or by arms; or mediate, by which the enemies of the evangelical truth ask, or command, or persuade others to overthrow it. Nor is the hostile impugning always to be estimated from the effect. For many lack the strength, who do not lack the will to suppress the truth.

c. It is proven. That voluntary blasphemy is required to fill the measure of the sin against the Holy Spirit is clear from the fact that Christ expressly calls this sin the "blasphemy of the Spirit," Matthew 12:31, namely objectively; because the Holy Spirit is provoked by it. Whence also in v. 32 it is expressed by λόγον κατὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ἁγίου (logon kata tou pneumatos hagiou), or, "a word against the Holy Spirit," and is distinctly called "blasphemy against the Holy Spirit," Mark 3:29. Paul calls it an "outrage to the Spirit of grace," Hebrews 10:29. For sinners against the Holy Spirit τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς χάριτος ἐνυβρίζουσι (to pneuma tēs charitos enybrizousi), "outrage the Spirit of grace." The Spirit of grace is outraged by them who argue that the doctrine of the Holy Spirit is false, or who attribute the miracles performed by the power of the Holy Spirit to confirm the doctrine to an unclean spirit, with the Pharisees, Mark 3. But we do not understand here blasphemy proceeding from ignorance, but proactive blasphemy, which is done by one who knows and wills. Wherefore Paul is to be excepted from this sin, who, in ignorance, blasphemed the Son of God, 1 Timothy 1:13. Observe that some do not vomit forth blasphemies with their mouth, but yet they hold and carry them in their heart, which are most known to God who knows the heart.

d. It is proven. That an obstinate rejection of all the means of salvation is required for the complete nature of the sin against the Holy Spirit is established from the fact that apostates consider the "blood of the covenant, by which they were sanctified, a common thing," Hebrews 10:29. But the blood of the covenant is the blood of the Son of God, shed on the altar of the cross, by which the covenant of grace was sanctioned, and from which the sacraments, offering and sealing the means of the covenant of grace, have their efficacy. This blood of the covenant the apostates consider to be common, i.e., profane, impure, destitute of sanctifying power, and thus together with the word of the gospel they morosely reject the sacraments, the organs and seals of the covenant, and they spurn the counsel of God against themselves, Luke 7:30.

Question XLI. Are those essential requisites to be taken conjunctively when a judgment is to be formed about the sin against the Holy Spirit?

He who is to form a judgment about the sin against the Holy Spirit should accurately consider the συνδρομήν (syndromēn), or confluence, of the essential requisites, by which the measure of this most atrocious sin is filled.

It is proven. The requisites recounted above are of the formal nature of the sin against the Holy Spirit, therefore if one is absent, the sin against the Holy Spirit has not been committed. This is shown by examples. Peter truly and certainly had known the celestial truth about Christ, whom he nevertheless denied. But that denial of the truth, certainly known, does not complete the sin against the Holy Spirit, because Peter denied Christ not with a full and deliberate will, but one struck by fear of death, and therefore not with destined malice; nor did he blaspheme the gospel, oppose it, and pertinaciously repudiate all the means of salvation. Paul indeed rabidly persecuted the divine truth and its pious confessors, Acts 9:1. Moreover, he blasphemed both it and them, and impelled others to blaspheme, 1 Timothy 1:13, Acts 26:10-13. And yet he had not sinned against the Holy Spirit. For a) he had not acknowledged the divine truth about Christ, nor was he convicted of its truth and certainty: Hence, neither before his illumination could he fall away from Christ and deny him. For falling away requires a starting point, and the denial of Christ demands a preceding acknowledgment and affirmation of him, at least in the conscience. b) Nor did he obstinately reject all the means of salvation. For he admitted the word of Christ, and received baptism from Ananias, Acts 9:5, 18, and therefore he obtained mercy, 1 Timothy 1:16.

Question XLII. Who then commits the sin against the Holy Spirit?

The sin against the Holy Spirit is committed not by infants, but by adults a), not those destitute of the knowledge of the divinely revealed word, but the enlightened, and those convicted of the certainty of the celestial truth in their own conscience b), yet who have fallen from the study and love of the truth into a hostile hatred of it c).

a. It is proven. 1) Proactive or voluntary actual sins do not fall upon infants, because they are destitute of the full use of reason: But the sin against the Holy Spirit is a voluntary actual sin, Hebrews 10:26. Therefore. 2) Infants neither deny, nor blaspheme, nor impugn the gospel of Christ, nor do they pertinaciously reject it itself with the sacraments. Therefore, they do not sin against the Holy Spirit.

b. It is proven. For sinners against the Holy Spirit are called ΦΩΤΙΣΘΕΝΤΕΣ (phōtisthentes), enlightened, Hebrews 6:4, whether that illumination was pedagogical, and of the letter only, or spiritual, joined with a γεύσει (geusei, taste) of celestial things, says DANNHAVER in hodos phānom XI. p. 1419. The Pharisees in their infancy had been admitted into the covenant of divine grace through circumcision, and were therefore truly regenerate; in their adult age, however, having cast off the grace of regeneration through lethal wicked deeds, and retaining only an external knowledge of the celestial truth (which truly was in them, as Nicodemus testifies, John 3:2, and as the disciples of the Pharisees also testify, Matthew 22:16), they committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, of which Christ pronounced them guilty, Matthew 12:32. To this is added that Stephen in his debate so convicted his adversaries that they could not resist the wisdom and the Spirit with which he spoke, Acts 6:9-10. Therefore, those most wicked scoundrels had come to a knowledge of the divine truth, which they had heard sufficiently from the mouth of Stephen, and yet they continued to resist the Holy Spirit, Acts 7:52. And they were cut to the heart, gnashing their teeth, v. 54, and stoning Stephen, v. 59. Although it can be truly said of these enemies of Stephen that they polluted themselves with the crime against the Holy Spirit, yet this must be noted, that not promiscuously did all and every individual among them commit this sin. For Paul also consented to the death of Stephen, Acts 5:58, who yet was not stained by this crime. Cf. D. FEURBORN's dissertation de peccato in Spirit. S. c. VIII. p. 62. The doubt remains: Whether men who were never reborn commit this most atrocious sin? e.g., Pharaoh, who scorned the acknowledged divine truth. D. MEISNER affirms this in anthropol decad. I. disp. X. de P. in Sp. S. p. 316. GERHARD, HUTTER, BALDWIN, HULSEMAN, DORSCHAEUS and other theologians deny it. For the apostle describes sinners against the Holy Spirit as those who were not only enlightened, but also tasted the heavenly gift, were made partakers of the Holy Spirit, and tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the age to come, Hebrews 6:4-6, which predicates apply only to the reborn.

c. It is proven. The reborn, remaining in a state of grace, commit no voluntary sin, 1 John 3:9. But if they allow themselves to be conquered by the flesh, they certainly fall from the state of regeneration, they fall away from the study and love of the truth, and they love darkness more than light, John 3:19.

Question XLIII. What are the causes that move a man to sin against the Holy Spirit?

The moving causes to that enormous sin are: the devil, blinding the mind and filling the heart with malice a), the flesh, or the corrupt nature of man, obtaining dominion b), the habitual malice of the will, contracted by frequent illicit acts c).

a. It is proven. The devil blinds the senses of the unbelievers, lest the light of the gospel should shine upon them, Ephesians 2:2, and fills the heart of the sinner to tell a lie, Acts 5:3. This capital enemy of the human race blinds the eyes of the mind, lest those sinning against the Holy Spirit should perceive the clearest light of the gospel, he turns the will away from the divine truth, so that they send a message of dismissal to it, heap reproaches upon it, and declare war on it.

b. It is proven. For if the reborn by the power of the Holy Spirit were to mortify the deeds of the flesh, they would continually live in a state of grace, Romans 8:13. But if they obey the suggestions of the flesh, by which they are solicited to ambition, avarice, the desire for earthly wisdom, it can happen that they hold the office of the Holy Spirit in contempt, and entirely repudiate the offered aids of grace and salvation.

c. It is proven. Men do not rush suddenly into the sin against the Holy Spirit, but when, like the Pharisees, they are full of hypocrisy and iniquity, Matthew 23:2.

Question XLIV. What attendant circumstances accompany the sin against the Holy Spirit?

The attendant circumstances, on the part of the man sinning against the Holy Spirit, are: extreme hardening a), and final impenitence b). On the part of the sin against the Holy Spirit itself, its individual and inseparable companion is irremissibility c).

a. It is proven. Here is understood chiefly doctrinal hardening, although moral hardening is joined with it. It is an act of the will, incurably evil, pertinaciously rejecting the doctrine of the gospel and all the means of salvation. This doctrinal hardening can be seen in the Jews who stoned Stephen, whom that martyr of Christ gravely addresses, Acts 7:51. "You stiff-necked people, uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit." Those who morosely resist the Holy Spirit operating, illuminating, and converting through the ministry of the word and sacraments, they stubbornly repudiate the offered aids of grace.

b. It is proven. Although many proactive sins have final impenitence as their companion, it is nevertheless separable from them, and it only happens by accident that persevering impenitence accompanies them; but the sin against the Holy Spirit, through itself and by its nature, obstructs or blocks the way to repentance, and therefore final impenitence is inseparable from it. The apostle teaches this, Hebrews 6:4-6. "For it is impossible, in the case of those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, and have shared in the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come, and then have fallen away, to restore them again to repentance, since they are crucifying once again the Son of God to their own harm and holding him up to contempt." The mind of the apostle is: Those sinning against the Holy Spirit pollute themselves with a most grave crime; which indeed, by the force of its atrocious nature, precludes a return to repentance, and renders them incapable of the ordinary renewal to contrition and faith. For those apostates, falling away from the Christian faith, cast away all the principles and means of grace and salvation; because a) they "crucify again the Son of God to their own harm and holding him up to contempt," having a most wicked intention in mind to extinguish Christ and faith in Christ, as if Christ were not the Son of God, not the author of our salvation, but a seducer, as the Jews once blasphemed the Savior hanging on the cross, and thus the doctrine about him is a mere fable or an impious invention. But they do this "to their own harm," i.e., to their own perdition, so that Christ cannot profit them. b) They "outrage the Spirit of grace," who offers his grace and wishes to confer or seal what is offered, by denying that there is truth in his testimony. c) They repel the means of grace; because they sin voluntarily "after receiving the knowledge of the truth," Hebrews 10:26, and they fall away from the taste of the good word of God, Hebrews 6:5, i.e., they deny the gospel, of which they had a sweet taste, just as they consider the blood of the covenant, which is exhibited to us in the sacrament of the supper and offered to be drunk, to be common, or profane and impure. But for those who petulantly spurn all the principles and ordinary means of salvation to their own perdition, a return to repentance is not open. For although by the absolute power and extraordinary grace of the Holy Spirit, the stubbornness of those apostates can without doubt be overcome and conquered, yet nowhere in Holy Scripture is that absolute and irresistible converting grace promised.

c. It is proven. That irremissibility is a perpetual and inseparable adjunct of the sin against the Holy Spirit is taught by Christ in Matthew 12:31-32. "Every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven people... And whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven, but whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come." In Christ's words, not only τὸ γινόμενον (to ginomenon), the act of remission, is denied, but also τὸ δυνατόν (to dynaton), or the potential for condonation, is removed. Imagine that only the act is noted, the sense will be: all other sins will be equally remitted; which is false. Therefore, Christ speaks of the potentiality, that the sin against the Holy Spirit cannot be remitted, neither in this age, nor in the future, i.e., forever, as is explained in Mark 3:29. For the rest, D. GERHARD states in disputat. isagog. p. 941, that if the sin against the Holy Spirit is considered before final impenitence, by the absolute power of God those who commit this sin can be converted and obtain remission of sins, although according to the ordinary mode of acting divinely instituted, they cannot be converted.

Question XLV. Does final impenitence enter into the essential constitution of the sin against the Holy Spirit?

If by final impenitence is understood the pertinacious and obdurate purpose of the will to reject all means of grace, then it is indeed of the essence of the sin against the Holy Spirit a); But if final impenitence denotes a persevering duration, it is not an essential requisite of that most atrocious sin, but a common, and indeed inseparable, adjunct b).

a. It is proven. Because the sinner against the Holy Spirit directly, and with pertinacious malice, opposes himself to the divinely ordained means of conversion, God, by a most just judgment, withdraws His indwelling grace from him, and gives him over to a reprobate mind. Therefore, being left to himself, he retains and confirms the deliberate purpose of blaspheming and persecuting the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. For which reason it is not badly asserted that final impenitence is of the formal concept of the sin against the Holy Spirit.

b. It is proven. 1) Christ pronounced the Pharisees, while still on their earthly journey, guilty of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, Matthew 12:24. Therefore, permanence in this sin is not its formal requisite, since it is considered by Christ to be consummated in this age before departure from it. 2) Christ would not have spoken distributively, that the blasphemy of the Spirit would not be remitted either in this age or in the future one, unless he had presupposed that even in this age before death it is, or can be, consummated. 3) This sin is not to be estimated from final impenitence, which is common to the rest of sins, but from its quiddity and formal nature, which is comprised in the aforementioned requisites. You say: The gate of grace is closed to no sinner before the end of life. Resp. However much the gate of grace may lie open to sinners against the Holy Spirit as long as they live, according to the antecedent will of God, they themselves maliciously cut off for themselves access to the gate of grace, and are therefore reprobated by the consequent will of God, and fall from grace.

Question XLVI. Why is the sin against the Holy Spirit irremissible?

The sin against the Holy Spirit is irremissible not because of a defect of divine grace a), nor because of a defect of the satisfaction of Christ b), nor because of a defect of the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit c), but because of the malicious rejection of all the means of grace d), and because of final impenitence e).

a. It is proven. The mercy of God is universal, and therefore a defect of it is not the cause of the irremissibility of the sin against the Holy Spirit. For "the grace of God has appeared for all people," Titus 2:11. Therefore, it has shone even upon those sinning against the Holy Spirit.

b. It is proven. The satisfaction and merit of Christ is also universal. For Christ "gave himself as a ransom for all," 1 Timothy 2:6. Therefore, also for sinners against the Holy Spirit, who indeed "trample underfoot the Son of God, and consider the blood of the covenant by which they were sanctified a common thing," Hebrews 10:29. From which we conclude: For those who were sanctified by the blood of Christ, the blood of Christ was shed. But sinners against the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore.

c. It is proven. But the effects of the applying grace of the Holy Spirit are conspicuous in those great apostates. For they were "enlightened by the Holy Spirit," Hebrews 6:4.

d. It is proven. For this reason are those sinning against the Holy Spirit worthy of punishment, that they "trample underfoot the Son of God, and consider the blood of the covenant by which they were sanctified a common thing, and blaspheme the Spirit of grace," Hebrews 10:29. As a disease curable in itself becomes absolutely incurable when the sick person tramples on the medicine; so every sin by its own nature is irremissible, but through supernatural grace is remissible, by what they call an obdiential potency; but when the offered remission itself is spurned, it becomes simply ἀνίατον διὰ μοχθηρίας (aniaton dia mochthērias), incurable through malice, and irremissible; because so great a contumacy cannot be overcome by free will, whose power here is none, or by an ordinary means, which is rejected; an extraordinary one is owed to no man. Cf. DANNHAVER in hodos. phænom. XI. p. 1420.

e. It is proven. That sin which no repentance follows, God deigns with no pardon; for "an impenitent heart stores up wrath for itself," Romans 2:6. Therefore.

The antithesis is 1) that of the Pontificians, asserting that the sin against the Holy Spirit is irremissible ordinarily, but not absolutely. 2) that of the Socinians, maintaining that the sin against the Holy Spirit is irremissible, unless serious repentance is undertaken, or unless God supplies most efficacious remedies for converting them; who also deny that any voluntary sin, and therefore also the blasphemy of the Spirit, has a sacrifice. Their arguments are.

1. He who wills the death of no sinner, does not will the death of the sinner against the Holy Spirit, but wills that he be converted and live. But God, etc. Ezekiel 18:23. Resp. God by his antecedent will wills the death of no sinner, but that he be converted through the ordinary means of grace and live; But since the sinner against the Holy Spirit maliciously and perseveringly repudiates the divinely ordained means of grace even to the end of his life, he himself blocks for himself the way to repentance. Therefore, God, the most just judge, wills by his consequent and judicial will that the finally impenitent should perish eternally. Instance: God can supply extraordinary and more powerful remedies to convert such a sinner. Resp. God has neither promised extraordinary remedies and superabundant grace, nor does he owe them to any mortal. Not what God can do, but what, with Holy Scripture as our guide, he wills to do, must be attended to.

2. If the sin against the Holy Spirit were simply irremissible on account of final impenitence, God would not invite apostates to repentance; But he invites them through the voice of nature, of conscience, and of scripture. Therefore. Resp. God, by inviting apostates to repentance, clearly shows that the cause of irremissibility is not to be attributed to denied grace, but to the pertinacious malice of incurable men, whom God does not in vain entice to repentance, but so that his gratuitous mercy may be acknowledged and celebrated, just as the contumacious sinner is rendered ἀναπολόγητος (anapologētos, without excuse).

3. The sin against the Holy Spirit is irremissible, because for it "there no longer remains a sacrifice," Hebrews 10:26. Resp. The apostle speaks of the sacrifice of Christ, insofar as it is applicable, or insofar as it can be applied by faith, so that the sense of the apostolic statement is: For those who sin voluntarily after having known the truth, by trampling Christ underfoot, by considering the blood shed on the altar of the cross and offered in the sacrament of the supper to be profane, and by stubbornly blaspheming the Spirit of grace, the author of conversion, the sacrifice of Christ can no longer be apprehended by faith for salvation. For those who are ὑπεναντίοι (hypenantioi), or enemies of grace, are not capable of repentance or of faith. See CALOV's bibl. illustrat. on this passage, p. 1336.

4. Whatever sin has a price of redemption can be remitted; But the sin against the Holy Spirit, in the mind of the evangelical doctors, has a price of redemption. Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between a price paid, and one accepted. For for the remission of sin, two things are required; 1) The price of redemption, by which remission was acquired; 2) Faith, by which the price of redemption is accepted. But the sinner against the Holy Spirit neither has nor can have faith; because he opposes himself directly and with full will to the means of grace by which faith is kindled. Therefore, by his own fault he is powerless to accept the price of redemption.

Question XLVII. Should one pray for the sinner against the Holy Spirit?

If someone has known certainly and evidently that a man is sinning against the Holy Spirit, let him send no prayers to heaven for his salvation a). But since it is difficult to pronounce concerning a man still alive that he has sinned against the Holy Spirit, it is safest to pray for apostates and blasphemers conditionally, with the hypothesis added or understood: if they can be converted, if they are curable or corrigible b).

a. It is proven. St. JOHN says gravely in his first epistle, ch. 5:16. "If anyone sees his brother committing a sin not leading to death, he shall ask, and God will give him life—to those who commit sins that do not lead to death. There is a sin that leads to death; I do not say that one should pray for that." Obs. By a sin unto death the apostle understands the sin against the Holy Spirit, which is distinguished from other sins by Christ himself, Matthew 12:31. The remaining sins, whether they be venial or mortal, indeed merit the eternal punishment of death, or are even imputed for death in the second act; yet the punishment of death can be averted through repentance; But the sin against the Holy Spirit certainly and infallibly leads the sinner to death on account of the pertinacious repulsion of the office of the Holy Spirit and final impenitence. 2) Not without reason did the apostle premise these words "If anyone sees," by which he indicates not so much the external sight, which happens with bodily eyes, as the cognition of the intellect and the judgment of discretion. But if anyone possesses such perspicacity of intellect as to see that a sinner is not bringing upon himself an inevitable punishment of death by his sins, let him pray to God for his salvation. But if he has clearly known that the offense of the sinning brother is so atrocious that it rejects all medicine and attracts the indeclinable punishment of eternal death, let him abstain from untimely and ungrateful prayers to God. For it would be just as if someone were to pray that God should save a man without Christ, without the grace of the Holy Spirit, without repentance and faith, without the word and sacraments (*).

b. It is proven. 1) St. Paul advises in 1 Timothy 2:1 that we pour out prayers for all men. 2) Moses prayed for Pharaoh, Exodus 9:33. Christ for his crucifiers, Luke 23:24. Stephen for his stoners, Acts 7:60. Wherefore we also pray for apostates, not insofar as they are sinners against the Holy Spirit, but insofar as they are still on their earthly journey, concerning whom we doubt whether all the formal requisites of the sin against the

(*) This statement touches not only those who sin against the Holy Spirit, but all who are not yet born again, who oppose God with voluntary sins. See the notes on page 548. But what is said, that they should be judged unworthy of intercession, should not be understood entirely and simply, but in a certain way, consistent with the context, namely that we are not permitted to pray to God for them in the same way and order as it is proper to pray for men already reconciled to God and renewed, that God may propitiously grant them eternal life, v. 11, 12, 13, 16. For before that can happen, a true change of mind must be sought and obtained by prayers, without which no hope of eternal life remains, John 3:36. Every just prayer, pleasing and acceptable to God, ought to be suitable to the order divinely established. But it is consonant with this order that we first pour out most ardent prayers for the new generation of man, for the remission of sins, and for the renewal of the whole life, then for preservation, and finally for eternal salvation to be conferred upon the man. Therefore, the thing itself must be distinguished, which is always one and the same, from its mode, which can be various and multiple. It is fitting for us to pray for all men to a one, 1 Timothy 2:1-2, with the reasons added, v. 4, 5, 6. But the mode ought to be suitable for each, and therefore diverse, according to the diverse condition of men, both internal and external. We have a passage adjacent to this in John 17:9, in which place Christ does not speak of converting grace, but of preserving and eternally blessing grace, v. 11, 24. But of this, wicked men, not yet returned to God, are certainly not capable, as long as they are and remain such. Nor did Christ pray for his friends, John 16:26-27. How so? Surely not in that manner, and in that order, in which he poured out prayers for his enemies, those most flagitious of mortals, who still were in need of a conversion of soul and remission of sins, Luke 23:34.

Holy Spirit apply, and according to the judgment of charity we hope for better things concerning our neighbor, 1 Corinthians 12:5.

Question XLVIII. What sin is opposed in a special way to the sin against the Holy Spirit?

Sin against the Son of Man. In a special way, the sin against the Son of Man is contrasted with the sin against the Holy Spirit, which is a grave sin by which the evangelical doctrine concerning Christ is either blasphemed and opposed when not yet evidently known, or, though already known, is denied without blasphemy, spurred by the dread of dangers.

It is proven. From Matthew 12:31-32. "Every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven people, but the blasphemy of the Spirit will not be forgiven people. And whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man, it will be forgiven him; but whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit, it will not be forgiven him, either in this age or in the future."

Obs. 1) By the Son of Man is understood Christ, considered not by reason of the natures of which he consists, but by reason of his prophetic office, by which he himself proposed the evangelical doctrine in the days of his flesh, and today commands it to be expounded by his ministers.

Obs. 2) A word is said against the Son of Man when his evangelical doctrine is either blasphemed and opposed by those in ignorance, or is denied, without blasphemy, by a will not completely free, but inclined by fear, e.g., Paul blasphemed and opposed the evangelical doctrine of Christ in ignorance, 1 Timothy 1:13. Peter denied Christ, spurred by fear of punishment, but without blasphemy and hostile impugning. Each sinned against the Son of Man (*).

Obs. 3) The attendant quality of this sin is remissibility; because one who sins against the Son of Man does not oppose the doctrine of Christ with pertinacious malice, but, having fallen, rises again, prevented and raised by the grace of God, and admits better information. Therefore, although by accident this sin is sometimes not remitted, it is not impossible that it should be condoned. But the sin against the Holy Spirit is in actuality not remitted, nor is it possible that it be remitted.

Question XLIX. What fruits will you gather from a solid consideration of actual sins?

A solid consideration of actual sins brings much weight to undertaking serious repentance a), and to distinguishing the state of grace and regeneration from the state of wrath and death b).

(*) The rule of distinction and opposition leads us to believe 1) that the doctrine about Christ is not to be understood in this place, for that pertains to the grace of the Holy Spirit, by which he indeed effects in us the use, or application, of recovered salvation; its denial, opposition, and contemptuous rejection with the greatest obstinacy of soul, is therefore the sin against the Holy Spirit, of which was said above, on page 556: 2) but that which is the property of Christ, insofar as he is the Christ, the Reconciler of God and men, is signified: 3) and not merely something of those things which are proper to Christ, but all those things by which he himself is distinguished from the other two persons in the one divinity; for it is said not restrictively, but generally and without any exception, "a sin against the Son of Man." But it is certain, 4) that the property of Christ is that grace which pertains to the acquisition of our salvation, procured by the merits of Christ. Nor is it less certain, 5) that the first and principal thing was that he alone should function in the role of the high Priest. Therefore, 1) the prophetic office of Christ is to be considered neither uniquely nor principally, but his entire threefold office, but especially the priestly one, if one sins against the Son of Man. Therefore, 2) this sin is properly committed first by him who destroys the saving trust, whether his own or that of others, to be placed in Christ the one sponsor, as is plainly written in 1 Corinthians 8:11-12; then by him who denies that Christ is that great Prophet and common Teacher of men, divinely sent, Acts 3:22-23; finally by him who refuses to venerate the royal dignity of Christ and to obey his power, Psalm 2:6, 11-12, Luke 19:27. But it can happen that he who has so sinned, provided he still uses the means of grace, may at length repent, and therefore a return to grace may be open to him. Nor indeed is it to be denied that these two sins, against Christ and against the Holy Spirit, are sometimes joined, namely when to the former is added contempt for the means of grace, with the resistance of an obstinate soul. For thus both sins, both that against the Son of Man and this against the Holy Spirit, are commemorated in Hebrews 10:29.

a. It is proven. He who feels the diseases of his soul anxiously flees to Christ the physician; he who acknowledges his misery seeks divine mercy. David, confounded by the foulness of his sins, implored this, Psalm 51:1-4. "Have mercy on me, O God, according to your steadfast love! According to your abundant mercy blot out my transgressions! Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin! For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me. Against you, you only, have I sinned, and done what is evil in your sight."

b. It is proven. We enjoy tranquility of conscience when we have it explored that we live in a state of grace and are beloved children of God. The reborn fall from this blessed state when they succumb to the flesh and contaminate themselves with proactive sins. These are lethal and deadly; for they cannot consist with living faith, with the grace of the Holy Spirit inhabiting our hearts, with tranquility of conscience. Wherefore, let us daily examine our conscience, frequently considering whether we foster in our soul the προαίρεσιν (prohairesin), or purpose of sinning. Let us exterminate this, and not allow original sin to reign in our mortal body! Romans 6:12. For this, obtaining dominion, begets proactive sin.

Question L. How are those to be treated who are touched by no care for their sins?

For the conversion of those secure men, one must pray assiduously a); the sleeping conscience must be awakened with serious exhortations taken from the divine word b); the temporal calamities, companions of sins, must be placed before their eyes c); they are to be warned that the curriculum of this life is short, but the torments, by which the finally impenitent will be tortured, are perennial d).

a. It is proven. He who is about to undertake the work of converting secure sinners should implore the success of so great a work from God with pious prayers. Thus Samuel prayed for the salvation of Saul, 1 Samuel 15:35. Paul for the Ephesians, Ephesians 1:15. And that we should do the same, he seriously advised, 1 Timothy 2:1-2.

b. It is proven. Sirach, about to arouse a sleeping conscience, says; "Flee from sin as from the face of a serpent; for if you approach, it will bite you. The teeth of a lion are its teeth, taking away the souls of men. Like a two-edged sword is all iniquity; there is no healing for its wound," ch. 21:2-3.

c. It is proven. Sin is the evil root, whose fruits are calamities of every kind, Deuteronomy 28:16.

d. It is proven. The life of a sinner is short, but the punishments of sin are eternal. Wherefore, let the sinner repent in time, lest he perish eternally.

Question LI. How are those to be raised up who have gravely fallen and are near to desperation?

Upon afflicted sinners who are struggling with desperation, there must be impressed: the mercy of God the Father, who benignly looks upon and receives contrite sinners a), the universal merit of Christ b), the help of the Holy Spirit c).

a. It is proven. God the Father invites the greatest sinners to repentance, and does not reject the repentant, but receives them most benignly. "Return, faithless Israel, declares the Lord! For I will not cause my angry face to fall on you; for I am merciful, declares the Lord, I will not keep anger forever. Only acknowledge your iniquity, that you have transgressed against the Lord your God!" Jeremiah 3:12-13.

b. It is proven. Very sweet are the words of St. John in his epistle, ch. 2:1-2. "My little children, I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin. But if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Christ the righteous. And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

c. It is proven. The sinner who does not entirely succumb to desperation, but struggles with it, is not destitute of the help of the present Holy Spirit. For "the Spirit helps us in our weaknesses. For we do not know what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groanings too deep for words," Romans 8:26.

SUSPIRIUM

I have sinned, O most JUST GOD, I have sinned before Your face most often and most gravely. Woe to my life, if you should examine it according to the rigor of your law! Nothing torments my soul so much as that I have so often offended You, my most bountiful benefactor, the supreme lawgiver, the omniscient judge! Avert, I beseech You, the wrath and punishment due to my sins, and turn again Your fatherly affection to me, unworthy as I am! Benignly look upon the ransom of blood, shed for me on the altar of the cross by your most BELOVED SON, JESUS CHRIST, and on account of this price of redemption, expunge my great debts from the book of Your accounts! For the rest, I desire Your most HOLY SPIRIT as the ruler of my life! May He preserve me from the poison of sin: may He fortify me from falling; may He lead and strengthen me, that I may run along the unoffending path of sincere piety!

CHAPTER V.
ON THE DEFECT OF FREE WILL IN SPIRITUAL MATTERS, AND ITS INFIRMITY IN NATURAL MATTERS.

Question I. What do you understand by the defect of free will in spiritual matters?

THE DEFECT of free will in spiritual matters is the common impotence, arisen from original sin, of unregenerate men to know and choose spiritual good in a saving way, and thus to fulfill the divine law and to conceive saving faith in Christ.

Obs. Spiritual good is the triune God, and divine things which are salutary to sinful man, knowable from the light of supernatural revelation.

Question II. What is free will?

Definition of free will. Free will is the active faculty of the will, by which, concerning an actable object, with all the requisites for acting being posited, it relates itself indifferently, both as to the species and as to the exercise of the act.

Obs. I. Arbitrium (will/judgment) is said from arbitrari (to judge/decide). But arbitrari is taken either in a common sense, and signifies to judge, to pass judgment or sentence, and thus is referred to the intellect; or in a forensic sense, and is the same as to will and decree something seriously; in which sense it is referred to the will.

Obs. II. The word libertas (liberty) sustains various significations: a) it notes exemption from the obligation of law. Thus God alone is absolutely without law, although he is a law unto himself; a king is free from the laws which he himself makes, unless he voluntarily submits himself to them. b) Liberty from coercion, which is immunity from external violence, inflicted upon a suffering subject against its inclination, is otherwise called spontaneity, and is common to man with the brutes. c) Liberty from internal necessity, which is proper to agents endowed with intellect and will; God, angels, and men (*).

(*) Internal necessity is of one kind indeed natural, from the laws of motion in that thing which is without reason and consciousness; but another kind moral, from the necessary connection of the intellect with the will in that which enjoys the use of reason and is conscious of its own actions. And this indeed is either good or evil. Good: if anyone, with the intellect illuminated, rightly perceiving, cannot but will what is good, since he truly and wisely recognizes and judges the matter, with no ignorance and no error intervening. Evil: if anyone, with the intellect darkened, following false and rash reasoning, cannot but will what is evil, inasmuch as he falsely and imprudently thinks and judges in that manner. This is contrary to liberty; that is not, but rather true liberty, which surely differs greatly from wandering lust and unbridled license, being closely joined with it; just as in God there is

By this very thing, man is distinguished from creatures devoid of reason, which necessarily and by the instinct of nature they act uniformly, for instance, the Sun necessarily shines, fire heats, a famished wolf devours a lamb of which it gets hold. Liberty is distinguished from necessity into liberty of contrariety and of contradiction. Liberty of contrariety is that which is concerned either with different objects, or with different acts of one object, for example, it was free for Jacob to marry Leah or Rachel; it was free for him to speak with Rachel, to walk, to jest. It is also called liberty of specification, since by it a man is immune from determination to a specific act or object. Liberty of contradiction is that which is concerned with one and the same object between contradictory terms; to will and not to will, to act and not to act, for example, it is free for a student of philosophy to love and not to love philosophy, to practice and not to practice it. It is also called liberty of exercise, because after the will has determined itself to one or the other part of the contradiction, it nevertheless remains free in its exercise.

4. It denotes liberty from the guilt, dominion, sense, and root of sin. Liberty from the guilt of sin is that by which sins are not imputed to a penitent man for culpability and punishment; this, converted sinners obtain through the grace of justification. Liberty from the dominion of sin is when the flesh is subject to the spirit, and the servitude of sin is dissolved; this, the justified obtain by the benefit of renewal. Liberty from the sense and root of sin is that by which the stimulus and tinder of sin are taken away from renewed men through the dissolution of the soul and body.

5. It designates liberty from misery, by which the blessed, triumphing in heaven, are not only freed from the sense and root of sin, but also entirely liberated from the chastisements that follow sin. For they are not subject to diseases, death, or any calamity.

Observation III. The liberty of man is divided into the liberty of nature, of grace, and of glory. The liberty of nature is immunity from coercion and internal necessity with respect to natural and civil matters subject to reason. To which Paul's words refer, 1 COR VII, 37: "He who stands firm in his heart, being under no necessity but having his own will under control, and has determined this in his heart, to keep her as his virgin, does well." The liberty of grace is that by which the reborn are freed from the guilt and dominion of sin, about which the apostle says, Rom. VI, 18: "Having been set free from sin, you have become slaves of righteousness." The liberty of glory is immunity from the sense and root of sin, and from all misery; about which mention is made, Rom. VIII, 21: "The creation itself will be set free from its bondage to corruption and obtain the freedom of the glory of the children of God."

Observation IV. Necessity and servitude are opposed to liberty. For repugnant to liberty is 1) absolute necessity and necessity of the consequent, by which something, due to the indissoluble connection of cause with effect, cannot be otherwise; in which way water necessarily moistens. However, hypothetical necessity and necessity of the consequence can stand with liberty, by which something, on account of the act of existing or an extrinsic condition, cannot be otherwise. Thus, it is necessary for a man to be learned if he strives to act as a professor of philosophy.

2. Liberty conflicts with the external necessity of coercion, which is the determination of a nature to one thing, besides or against its will, made by a violent external principle. Authors are accustomed to distinguish between the elicited and the commanded acts of the will. The will, as to its elicited acts, cannot be coerced. Elicited acts are those which are immediately exercised by the will, e.g., to will, to love, to choose. Opposed to these are commanded acts, which are indeed perfected by the command of the will, but through the medium of another faculty, e.g., to speak, to walk, to write. A man cannot be coerced to the elicited acts of the will for the reason that coercion is from an external principle, while volition is from an internal principle. For which reason, to will something coercively implies a contradiction in the adjunct. A man can be coerced to commanded acts, but then he does not act according to free will, but beside or against his will. Thus, a man can be carried off somewhere by force, but that this violent indeed the highest moral necessity, never anything except good, yes, rather the best, in determining and acting; yet nonetheless the highest liberty, circumscribed by no limits, restrained by no boundaries, impeded by no hindrances. See the note on page 435.

abduction be from the will of him who is carried off, cannot happen. For if it is voluntary, it ceases to be violent.

3. Liberty is repugnant to the internal necessity of immutability, which is the determination of an acting subject to one thing, proceeding from an internal principle that relates immutably to the effect. But whatever is determined to one thing is not free. Thus, an action is called free which so proceeds from an agent that it was in the power of the agent to act and not to act, to do this and to do that. However, the necessity of obligation can consist with liberty, which is a directive determination of the will to embrace the good and flee the evil, according to the norm of a superior's command. Thus angels and men are determined by the norm of divine law, subjects by the laws of a prince, who nevertheless possess free will. For a moral, or legal, determination does not captivate the liberty of the will, nor does it necessitate irresistibly. The divine law indeed determines intelligent creatures by persuading and commanding those things which are according to the will of the Deity, and by prohibiting and dissuading those which are contrary; ordinarily, however, not by coercing or, as it were, applying force. Nothing indeed happens against the absolute and most powerful will of the Deity, but many things, and many more, happen besides, than according to the Deity's nod, says DANNHAVER, in hodos. phænom III. p. 312.

4. A foul and disgraceful servitude is repugnant to liberty, not a decent and honorable one. Honorable servitude consists both in the duty of living piously and in the ministry rendered to God. Thus, reborn men are called slaves of righteousness, Rom. VI, 18, for the reason that they willingly cultivate righteousness according to the prescription of the divine law. The same are said to serve God, Rom. VI, 22, because they consecrate themselves wholly to divine worship. On the contrary, disgraceful servitude is the captivity of the will, by which through sin the will of man is so bound and captivated that it serves only sin, John VIII, 34. This servitude is opposed to liberty from the necessity of immutability. (coming: Evil. Who, with a blinded intellect, having followed a false and rash reason, cannot but will evil in the way that he falsely and imprudently opines and judges. This is contrary to liberty; that is not so, but is artfully coupled with true liberty, which indeed differs much from vague lust and untamed license; just as in God there is indeed the highest moral necessity of never decreeing or doing anything but good, indeed the best, but nevertheless the highest liberty, circumscribed by no limits, ever to be restrained by no impediments. see note on page 435.)

Question III. In how many ways is free will taken?

In what ways is Free Will taken? Free will is here taken chiefly in two ways; materially for the subject of liberty, which is the will a); formally for the powers of the will, with which it is equipped to be able to act and not to act, to do this and to do that b).

Proof a. The will is the proximate and immediate subject of liberty, for the reason that the latter is an attribute, power, and perfection of the former. Hence it is that the will and liberty are also distinguished by words, and it is not said, "liberty is the will," or the contrary, but "liberty is of the will," or "in the will," and "the will has liberty," or "is endowed with liberty." Wherefore the ἡ οὐσία (hē ousia - the essence), or essence, of the will cannot be called free will for any other reason than in a material and subjective sense. In which sense, indeed, the said free will is inseparable from man, because the will enters into the essence of man.

Proof b. 1) The ἡ ἐνέργεια (hē energeia - the powers of acting), or powers of acting, are the reason which constitutes the will as a power for operating and not operating, for operating this and operating that. Therefore, the powers of acting and not acting are liberty formally considered. This, however, is to be understood of the powers insofar as they are in the will. Consequently, the matter comes to the same thing, whether I conclude about the powers, or about the essence of the will, taken with its connoted powers. For the will has itself in the manner of a principle which operates; but the powers of acting have themselves in the manner of a principle by means of which the will operates.

2. It is asked: Whether the will of man, after its spiritual powers were lost through the fall, is still indifferent to good and evil, or whether it has lost this indifference? The former cannot be said, since scripture everywhere teaches that after the fall men are slaves of sin, and that the natural man understands nothing of the things of the Spirit, but is dead to all good things. Therefore, the latter remains, from which it further flows that, with the powers of acting and not acting having been lost, the indifference to good and evil, which is the formal reason of free will, is removed. Cf. D. MUSÆUS prælect. in Form. Concord p. 93.

Observation. Besides the two principal significations of free will explained, there are also two less principal significations among the Fathers of the primitive church; inasmuch as they 1) sometimes by freedom of the will understand liberty from coercion, which is also called interior liberty and spontaneity; which, however, does not complete the formal reason of free will, unless we wish to concede that even brutes are free agents, since they do many things of their own accord and with no one compelling them. 2) Sometimes the same Fathers by the name of free will designate ἱκανότης (hikanotēs - capacity), or the capacity and passive power, of admitting and receiving the grace of the Holy Spirit; since man is not, like a stone, a log, a beast, or a devil, utterly incapable of converting grace. Here, however, a proper distinction must be made between natural passive power and obediencial passive power. The former can be actualized by the powers of nature, the latter only by the special and gracious concurrence of God. Paul speaks of natural passive power, Rom. VIII, 7; "The mind of the flesh is enmity against God. For it does not subject itself to the law of God, nor indeed can it." Furthermore, that passive power does not constitute the form of free will; since the latter is formally an active power of the will, because it is occupied in acting and effectively produces its own acts.

Question IV. Is the term "free will" found in scripture?

Whether the term of Free Will exists in scripture? The term "free will" does not indeed exist διαρρήδην (diarrhēdēn - explicitly), explicitly, in so many letters and syllables in sacred scripture; it is found in it, however, as to the thing and as to equivalent terms.

Proof. Among the Hebrews, the word which means "he chose" is customary, and so according to them free will is the faculty of choosing one thing over another, according to the dictate of reason. Cf. Deut. XXX, 19. & Josh. XXIV, 15. In the N.T. it is called ἐκέσιον (hekousion - voluntary), spontaneous or voluntary, Philem. v. 14, which is opposed to the external necessity of coercion; ἐξουσία περὶ τὸ ἴδια θελήματος (exousia peri to idia thelēmatos - power of one's own will), the power of one's own will, 1 Cor. VII, 37, by which is understood the free faculty of choosing, both from the necessity of immutability and from law and obligation; προαίρεσις (proairesis - election), election, which is free will considered in its second act, 2 Cor. IX, 7; ἐλευθερία (eleutheria - liberty), liberty, 2 Cor. III, 17, where the liberty of grace is understood. Outside of Holy Scripture, it is called by Greek authors αὐτεξούσιον (autexousion - of one's own authority), and αὐτεξουσιότης (autexousiotes - self-determination), which term in this infirmity of nature is rather arrogant, in the judgment of D. CHEMNITIUS; since it is more fitting for God than for men or angels. For properly, that is called αὐτεξούσιον (autexousion), which is τὸ αὐτοδέσποτον (to autodesponton - self-ruling), καὶ αὐτοκρατορικὸν (kai autokratorikon - autocratic), which is subject to no one's command, but is of its own right and power, and which can be prohibited or impeded by no one. IRENAEUS, book IV, c. 71, calls free will the power of election. JUSTIN uses three terms: the first is αὐτεξούσιον (autexousion), which is of its own right and power; the second, ἐλευθέρᾳ προαίρεσις (eleuthera proairesis - free election), free election; the third, τὸ ἐφ' ἡμῖν (to eph' hēmin - that which is in our power), that which is in our power. AUGUSTINE calls it the power of the will, book III de libero arbitrio, c. 3. See D. CHEMNIT. LL. theol. part. I. fol. 180. I gather from these denominations that free will, formally, is not the will itself, but its active power.

Question V. Which nature has free will?

The subject of free will. An intelligent nature has free will, and indeed the infinite, or divine, nature in the most excellent and most perfect way a); the finite, or angelic and human, nature in a more imperfect way b). But a nature destitute of intellect is devoid of free will c).

Proof a. Although God wills and loves Himself necessarily, because He is the first, highest, and most perfect good, He nevertheless wills creatures freely, so that He can also not will them. For He does not need the company of creatures, because He is αὐταρκέστατος (autarkestatos - most self-sufficient). Therefore, God is said to do all that He wills, Ps. CXV, 3, to work all things according to the counsel of His will, Eph. I, 11, and to distribute His gifts as He wills, 1 Cor. XII, 11. God is free not only from all misery and sin, but also from the law and obligation of any other. God is also subject or subjectible to no coercion, not even in the smallest part; and since He acknowledges no superior cause by which He can be determined, He operates indeterminately, so that He can act, now producing this effect, now that one.

Proof b. The will of the elect angels is indeed no longer indifferent to good and evil; it is, however, indifferent with respect to created goods, so that whatever of them it wills, it can also not will, or will another in place of one, unless a created good must necessarily be sought on account of the will of God. The apex of angelic liberty is that whatever God commands, the holy angels perform with the highest delight, and whatever God has left free, they will and will not, and exercise, without necessity and coercion. We will now consider the liberty of human will according to different objects and distinct degrees.

Proof c. A nature lacking intellect does not possess freedom of will, since it is determined to one thing. This is evident from the fact that: 1) beasts act in the same way, e.g., bees always make honey in the same way, all sheep flee the wolf in a like manner, all spiders weave their webs in the same fashion. 2) All things required for acting being present, they cannot not act. A famished dog, with food present and all impediment removed, cannot not devour it. Just as a certain shadow of reason, so also of liberty, is noticed in brutes, when in the fields they stand, lie down, proceed at their pleasure, now plucking this herb, now that; yet these acts of beasts are more correctly called spontaneous than free.

Question VI. What is the proper and adequate seat of free will?

The proper seat of Free Will. The proper and adequate seat of free will is the will a). To the exercise of freedom of will, however, the intellect concurs antecedently and preparatorily (παρασκευαστικῶς) b).

Observation. Some authors state that free will has its seat in both the intellect and the will. Hence, as CHEMNITIUS cites in loc. cit. fol. 181, ORIGEN, book III, περὶ ἀρχῶν (On First Principles), says it is a faculty of reason for discerning good and evil, and of the will for choosing either. AUGUSTINE says it is a faculty of reason and will. THOMAS says it is an elective power, which is indeed mixed from intelligence and appetite, but inclines more to appetite. Part I-II, q. 38, art. 3.

Proof a. Because 1) free will is called by St. Paul the "power of one's own will" 1 Cor. VII, 37. 2) The Fathers, in the Council of Orange, Canon XIII, call it the free will of the will, to show that liberty formally belongs to the will. 3) Free will, in the judgment of IRENAEUS, is the power of election, or the faculty of choosing; but election is an action of the will. 4. The intellect is free neither as to the species of the act, nor as to the exercise of the act. It is not free as to the exercise of the act, because a) for a power to determine itself to act, it is necessary that this happen either by an impulse of nature, or by a free appetition of the act. But free powers, as such, do not act from an impulse of nature; Therefore, they act by free inclination and voluntarily. But something is called voluntary in two ways: elicited and commanded. In the former way, the acts of the intellect are not voluntary, that is, that it itself should will them; for the intellect is not an appetitive faculty, nor does it elicit any willing from itself. In the latter way, indeed, they are voluntary, not because of the liberty of the intellect, but of the will, by which the intellect is moved and excited to act. b) An object being posited, and the requisites being present, the intellect can no more not know the thing, than an open eye in broad daylight can not see its object. Nor is the intellect free as to the species of the act, that is, whether to assent to a thing or dissent, when it considers or knows it. For that thing is either perspicuous and evident (and then the intellect necessarily assents, if it is true, or necessarily dissents, if it is false); or it is obscure (and then it elicits neither act, because the object is not presented to the intellect, just as we do not see when light is absent); or finally, the thing is probable in either direction (and then again it neither assents nor dissents, unless perhaps the will moves it to embrace one side or the other). From which it is clear that the intellect is not free per se and immediately.

Proof b. The intellect concurs in the act according to free will antecedently and preparatorily (παρασκευαστικῶς), as a condition without which the will cannot exert and exercise its liberty. The will is indeed a blind power, which is not given for knowing. Wherefore it is necessary that, if it wishes to choose a certain object, this be shown to it by the intellect, as the knowing and fore-shining faculty. But if the will acts with a blind impulse, without the intellect, then it is not properly called free will. Therefore, certain antecedent acts are prerequisite for free will: 1) The cognition of the object, and if there are several objects, a prudent comparison and adjudication of them. For the will is not borne toward an unknown thing, because there is no desire for the unknown. 2) The proposition, or presentation, of the known object; by which, when the intellect has known the object, it then proposes it to the will either for choosing or for neglecting. 3) The commendation or dissuasion of the proposed object. For if the human intellect judges a certain thing to be suitable for a man, it then persuades and commends it to the will; but if it deems it unsuitable, it dissuades. These three acts of the intellect are finally followed by election, which is the proper act of free will, when the human will chooses that which was judged suitable for man by the intellect, and is uniquely borne and tends toward it with all its effort. There are those who state that the root of liberty is in the intellect. If by "root" they mean the antecedent condition, without which there is no free election, they agree with us. But if by the root of liberty they mean the cause of free election, they err. For when the will chooses the good proposed and commended by the intellect, it does this from its own liberty, not from the determination of the intellect. For it not rarely happens in practice that the intellect proposes and persuades better things, while the will follows worse things (*).

You say: The intellect is indifferent in its acts and in proposing objects. Whence it is commonly said that the indifference of the will is from the indifference of the intellect.

Response: Distinguish between objective and formal indifference. The intellect is said to be indifferent not formally, but objectively, inasmuch as it shows to the will that a thing is indifferent, or that both this and that object can be freely chosen.

Question VII. In what does free will formally consist?

The form of free will. The form of free will, considered in its first act, is the indifference of the will to either of two opposites, insofar as it is opposed to determination to one thing, and denotes the faculty of choosing and not choosing, or of choosing one thing over another, and of determining itself to one or the other.

Proof. In the opinion of some authors, the formal reason of free will consists in liberty from coercion, or spontaneity, by which a man desires and performs something of his own accord, without any coercion. But in truth, although immunity from coercion, which is also called interior liberty, always and in every state accompanies the will, and is thus natural to it, it does not, however, complete the form of free will; because it is common to man with brutes, which do many things voluntarily without any coercion, and are not therefore considered to possess free will. The indifference of the will to either of

(*) Just as in natural things nothing can ever happen without a cause, so in moral things nothing happens without a reason, either true or false. You say: 1) A man often sins much without counsel, himself not knowing what he does and why, since vehement motions of the soul preoccupy the mind. Response: It is indeed so; but his will then has either decreed nothing, or, having long been hardened by the habit of sinning, was led by a considered reason before he precipitated himself into that habit. In a vicious habit, differently than in an act, one must look not to present thoughts, but to preceding and long-past ones. You say: 2) What is said in the proverb is most true: "I see and approve of better things, I follow worse things." Therefore the will decrees and acts not only without reason, but even against it. I affirm this indeed, but I also limit it: against some reason, not all reason. When the intellect judges, it always weighs, compares, and considers the reasons on both sides, although it may not proceed correctly in this comparison and estimation. Therefore, there are several reasons conjoined, of which some are indeed true, others false, which however commend themselves to the man with a certain appearance of truth, so that he thinks the specious good should be preferred to the truly good, and what seems greater to the lesser, which he falsely opines to be less. Of so many and so diverse reasons, the last is that which determines the will to act. Therefore, no decree of the will can be made without some error and preconceived opinion. This is a certain false reason. Therefore, the will decrees against a true reason, indeed, but it follows a false and specious reason as if it were true.

two opposites, however, accurately expresses the liberty of the will, provided it is skillfully explained. For by it is not universally designated a) indifference to good and evil; because in this special manner of signifying, neither God, nor angels, nor blessed men enjoy free will; but indifference to different objects, distinct acts, or the election and rejection of one object. Nor b) by indifference of the will to either of two opposites is understood a mathematical and equal indifference on both sides, which would involve powers for performing either with equal ease. For such powers and such indifference to either act, or to the exercise of an act and its suspension, fall upon man either never or rarely. In the state of innocence, the first-formed man had a will for good and evil, yet in such a way that he had a propensity, or proximate power, for good, and only a remote power for evil. Reborn men have a free will, and through the grace of the Holy Spirit, they can work well in spiritual things; they can also do the opposite through the infirmity of the flesh still inherent in them; but they perpetrate evil more easily than good, Rom. VII, 15. Wherefore, indifference is to be taken in opposition to the determination of the faculty to one thing, so that a faculty is called indifferent to both which is not determined to one, but can do both, although it may do one more easily than the other. c) Indifference, or indeterminacy, is understood both as to the species and as to the exercise of the act, so that the will can choose one object and repudiate another, which is the liberty of specification; or it can choose and repudiate one object, which is the liberty of exercise. d) The indifference of the will is understood as conjoined with the power of determining itself to one side or the other, otherwise the will would always fluctuate in indifference, without application to a certain act and a determinate object. But the power, created by God, of applying itself to one side or the other is available to it.

Question VIII. What is free will considered in its second act?

Free will considered in its second act is the free election of the will, by which it desires or rejects one proposed thing, or out of several things embraces one and repudiates the rest, according to the judgment of reason.

Proof. The proper act of free will is ἐλευθέρᾳ προαίρεσις (eleuthera proairesis - free election), as JUSTIN MARTYR says, a free election, by which it is described or declared in the sacred letters, Deut. XXX, 19; Josh. XXIV, 15; 2 Cor. IX, 7.

Question IX. Is the will in choosing determined by the last practical judgment of reason?

The last practical judgment of reason indeed represents and commends a certain object to the will, but it does not so command the will that it necessarily embraces it, and therefore it is not determined by it to choose a certain object.

Observation. The practical intellect, or practical reason, is said to be that which is concerned with τὰ πρακτὰ (ta praktà - things to be done), things to be done, and deliberates whether something should be done or not. Its last judgment, however, is the judging conclusion about what should be undertaken. It is usually expressed in these words: "This now, all things considered, is to be chosen or done."

Proof. 1) Because the will, as a free power, all prerequisites being posited, can act and not act, choose and not choose. But the judgment of practical reason pertains to the prerequisites of election. Therefore, that being posited, the will can choose and not choose, and so is not determined by it to choose (*).

2. When the intellect shows that two goods are equal, the will freely chooses this one or that one, predetermined by no command of the intellect.

(*) It is necessary, however, that there always be some reason why the will chooses one out of several. For the will is entirely concerned with the appetite of good and the aversion of evil, whether it truly be so, or whether it seems to be so. Therefore, a man wills or does not will, because he thinks this to be good or evil, greater or lesser; nor can he not will in the way that he thinks it to be. To think is a judgment of the intellect. Therefore, some operation of the intellect always determines the will. Liberty, however, is opposed not to reason and the internal determination of the mind, but to an impediment, by which a man is prevented from acting in a manner convenient to reason, and indeed to reason rightly known and sufficiently pondered. See what we have noted on page 435.

3. The will in choosing one object over another often does not follow the last practical judgment of reason, but neglects it, especially if it is carried away sideways by the affections. This is clear a) from the sacred letters. For the Gentiles, with their conscience protesting (the last judgment of practical reason), nevertheless acted badly, Rom. I, 32. Sinners against the Holy Spirit, after sufficient acknowledgment and approbation of the truth, and thus against their conscience, sin ἑκουσίως (hekousiōs - freely), freely, Hebr. VI, 4; c. X, 26. (**). b) From experience, by which Ovid's Medea, in book VII of the Metamorphoses, confesses about herself: "But a new force draws me unwillingly, and desire persuades one thing, the mind another; I see and approve of better things, I follow worse."

You say: The will cannot will something without a judgment of reason; Therefore, if the judgment is determined, it itself will also be determined; But the last practical judgment is altogether determined.

Response: A persuading judgment belongs to the intellect, but not a command. The intellect judges what is eligible, but it remains in the will's discretion to obey or resist the judging intellect. Reason, as BERNARD says, is given to the will to instruct it, not to destroy it. It would destroy it, however, if it imposed any necessity, so that it could not move itself according to its own discretion. And the commentator on DAMASCENUS in the book de O. F. c. 26 writes: "Of our actions, the intellect is at least the directive principle, but the will is the imperative and primarily effective one."

Question X. With what is free will concerned?

The object of Free Will. Free will is concerned with every doable object, proposed to the will by the intellect, whether it be present or future, which the will desires under the aspect of good, even if it is not always a true good, but only an apparent one.

Proof. Because free will is an active power of the will, its object must be doable, i.e., what can be obtained by the active power of the will, whether natural or supernatural. Whatever is simply impossible is not πρακτὸν (prakton - doable), or doable. But about impossible things we neither deliberate, nor do we form a decree of election. Furthermore, every doable thing is either present or future. Free will is of both present and future things. It is of future things, because we consult about them. But of those things about which there is consultation, of them there is free election. It is of present things, because those things about which we previously deliberated, we choose in the present. But nothing is chosen by the will unless under the aspect of good, whether it be a true good or an apparent one. But since an apparent good is in itself evil, a certain object of free will, materially considered, is evil. In which sense, not only good things, but also evil things, fall under free election.

Question XI. How are the objects of free will distinguished?

The distinction of the objects of Free Will.

The objects of free will are distinguished according to two hemispheres, of which one is lower, the other is upper. The lower comprises physical, ethical, political, economic, artificial, pedagogical, and divine things and actions, insofar as they can be known from the light of reason and produced by the powers of nature, aided by the general concurrence of God a). The upper in its scope comprehends merely spiritual things and actions, which, being placed above the grasp of reason left to itself, are known from the light of supernatural revelation and are performed by the special grace of the Holy Spirit b).

Proof a. The objects of the human will are known either from the light of reason or from the light of supernatural revelation. From the light of reason are known 1) physical things and actions, which concern the natural body as such, e.g., eating, drinking, walking; 2) ethical, which pertain to the regulation of human morals, e.g., cultivating temperance, modesty, etc.; 3) political, which pertain to the state of the city, e.g., paying tribute, holding the office of a magistrate; 4) economic, which are occupied in ruling a family, e.g., marrying a wife, honestly educating children; 5) artificial, which depend on art, e.g., painting, sewing shoes; 6) pedagogical, or external sacred things, which indeed are externally concerned with a sacred object, but are in themselves indifferent, and by reason of their outcome are now good, now bad, e.g., frequenting the temple with one's feet, receiving the word with one's external ears. They are called pedagogical because they ought to lead a man as if by the hand to a further inquiry into sacred things. 7) Divine, insofar as they are knowable from nature, e.g., from the sight of creatures to gather the existence, goodness, and omnipotence of God.

(**) Also, a practical judgment is either true or false. The conscience, if it is right, indeed commands what should be done or omitted, congruently with the divine law. But another preconceived opinion from another intervenes, which advocates for unjust desire and serves to excuse, or plainly defend, sin. But to practical judgment should be referred not only the truths which a right conscience teaches a man, but also the errors contrary to them, false judgments, counsels of the flesh, of which if any is the last, this determines the will to act badly, against a right conscience indeed, but not against the last judgment of the practical intellect.

Proof b. Merely spiritual things and actions are known from supernatural illumination and are performed by the gracious influx of the Holy Spirit, e.g., conversion, regeneration, renewal, etc. These merely spiritual actions are proposed in the law and the gospel.

Question XII. According to how many states is free will to be considered?

The consideration of Free Will according to a fourfold state. Free will is to be considered according to a fourfold state: a) of innocence before the fall; b) of misery after the fall; c) of grace after conversion; d) of glory in eternal beatitude.

Proof a. In the state of innocence, before the fall, the first-formed humans were free not from the law or obligation toward God, since every creature is obligated to worship the creator, but 1) from coercion, or external necessity; 2) from the internal necessity of immutability, because they were not yet determined to good, but their will was indifferent to good and evil, yet in such a way that they had a proximate power for good, and a most remote power for evil. 3) They possessed the liberty of righteousness. They were indeed immune from the guilt, dominion, and sense of sin, and from all misery of body and soul. Therefore, they freely and readily chose the good, to embrace which and to avoid evil they were equipped with sufficient powers through the image of God.

Proof b. In the state of misery, after the fall, corrupt sinful man has freedom of will, insofar as 1) materially it denotes τὴν οὐσίαν (tēn ousian - the essence), or the essence of the will. For just as by the fall he did not lose his rational soul, so he did not suffer the loss of the faculties of the soul considered essentially. 2) After the fall, he has an obediential passive power for receiving the grace of the Holy Spirit. For he is neither a log nor a devil, who is minimally capable of divine grace. 3) He is free from coercion, because this interior liberty always and in every state accompanies the will. 4) He has external liberty for good that is naturally knowable, but is destitute of free will for choosing merely spiritual good.

Proof c. In the state of grace, after conversion, reborn man is free 1) from coercion, 2) from the necessity of immutability, because after conversion his will is no longer determined to evil, as it was before conversion; but he can freely choose spiritual good through the grace of the indwelling and assisting Holy Spirit, and he can also choose evil through the remnants of the flesh still inherent in him. He therefore enjoys the liberty of righteousness, because he has obtained liberty from the guilt of sin in justification, and from the dominion of sin in renewal (*).<sup>139</sup>

Proof d. In the state of glory, blessed man is free not only from coercion, nor only from guilt and dominion, but also from every sense (sensus) of sin, as well as from all misery of body and soul. This liberty will be far more perfect than that of man before the fall. For he was able not to sin, but the blessed are not able to sin.

Question XIII. Does unregenerate man before conversion have freedom of will to choose merely spiritual good,

(*) He is also freed from the guilt and dominion of sin, as the blessed Author taught above, Question 2, obs. II, although this liberty, or rather liberation, cannot be signified by the name of free will. For the rest, our ancestors in the Formula of Concord and its Solid Declaration, article II, p. 675, accurately made a distinction between a free will, which after the common defection of men from God is to be ascribed to no one, and a freed will, which the newly born and renewed men, by the benefit of Christ, enjoy, just as Christ himself pronounced, John VIII, 36.

Before the conversion of an unregenerate man, his intellect is filled with such thick darkness that he does not truly know and approve supernatural good a). His will, subject to the servitude of sin, is impotent to choose spiritual good b). Therefore, unconverted man is destitute of all natural preparatory (παρασκευαστική) power for his own conversion c).

Observation. Free will is here not taken materially, for τῇ οὐσίᾳ (tē ousia - the essence), or the essence of the human will, which together with the intellect pertains to the essence of man, and is undoubtedly in man even after the fall, before he is regenerated; but formally, for τῇ ἐνεργείᾳ (tē energeia - the powers of the will), for the powers of the will, with which it is equipped to be able to act and not to act, to do this and to do that. The Solid Declaration of the Formula of Concord teaches this on p. 655: "This is the true and only state of the controversy: What the intellect and will of a man not yet reborn can accomplish, in conversion and regeneration itself, from its own powers remaining after the fall; namely when the word of God is preached and the grace of God is offered to us. Here it is questioned whether man can apply himself to apprehend this grace, embrace it, and assent to the word of God."

Proof a. 1) From the blindness of the human intellect in merely spiritual things, from 1 Cor. II, 14: "The natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them, because they are spiritually discerned." From which we argue: He who does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, nor can know them, his intellect is utterly blind in merely spiritual things. The major is evident; because where there is some spiritual light, there is also the faculty of knowing the things of the Spirit of God; indeed, the faculty of knowing the things of the Spirit of God consists in spiritual light, and so it implies a contradiction to have some powers of perceiving the things of the Spirit of God, and yet not be able to know spiritual things. The minor is clear from the cited passage of Paul; for the things of the Spirit of God are to be discerned spiritually, i.e., by the light of grace, which the Holy Spirit kindles through the word. But the natural man is so because he is not illuminated by the Holy Spirit. Which exposition is clear from verse 10, where the apostle says: "the Holy Spirit has revealed to us."

2. From the nature and condition of spiritual things, which far exceed the natural light of reason, so that they are called mysteries hidden for ages, Eph. III, 9; Coloss. I, 26, and kept secret for long ages, Rom. XVI, 25. We conclude: Whatever things by their nature far exceed the grasp of human reason, concerning them the intellect of unregenerate man has no spiritual powers whatsoever. But the things of the Spirit of God by their nature far exceed the grasp of human reason; Therefore.

3. From the origin of saving knowledge, which indeed is attributed entirely to the grace of God, John VI, 65: "No one can come to me unless it has been given to him by my Father," i.e., no one can believe in me unless it has been given to him by the Father. The argument is this: That which befalls no one unless it is given to him by God does not fall under the powers of natural man; But saving knowledge of spiritual things, etc.; Therefore. The major is clear: For what falls under the powers of natural human reason can naturally befall a man, and there is no need for it to be given to him supernaturally by God.

Proof b. 1) From the spiritual death of unregenerate man. For unregenerate man is said to be dead in sins, Eph. II, 1; Col. II, 13. The argument in form will be this: He who is spiritually dead, his will is destitute of spiritual powers for exercising pious acts concerning spiritual goods. But unregenerate man, etc.; Therefore. The Formula of Concord confirms the major on p. 658: "Just as a man who is corporally dead cannot by his own powers prepare or accommodate himself to receive eternal life, so a man spiritually dead in sins cannot by his own powers prepare, apply, or turn himself to obtain spiritual and celestial righteousness and life, unless he is freed from the death of sin and vivified by the Son of God."

2. From the foul and disgraceful servitude of unregenerate man. About which Christ says in John VIII, 34: "Everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin." Paul supports this in Rom. VI, 16, 17, 18: "Do you not know that if you present yourselves to anyone as obedient slaves, you are slaves of the one whom you obey, either of sin, which leads to death, or of obedience, which leads to righteousness? But thanks be to God, that you who were once slaves of sin have become obedient from the heart to the standard of teaching to which you were committed. And, having been set free from sin, have become slaves of righteousness." Cf. 2 Peter II, 19. We argue: Whosoever's will is subject to the servitude of sin, he does not possess freedom of will for performing spiritual acts; But the will of unregenerate man, etc.; Therefore. The major is established, because the servitude of sin is opposed by Paul to the liberty of grace, and in Peter's style, he is a slave who is conquered and captured by another. But he who is conquered and captured by sin does not freely follow spiritual and celestial righteousness.

3. The impotence of the unregenerate will is established from the oracle of the Savior in John XV, 5: "Apart from me you can do nothing." Those who without Christ, the celestial life, can bear no spiritual fruit, are unfit for every good spiritual work. But all men existing outside the state of regeneration, etc.; Therefore.

You say: Without the help of Christ, unregenerate man does not bear spiritual fruit, which, however, he produces from himself, aided by the grace of Christ. Response: The words of Christ are to be expounded not privatively, but negatively; not conjunctively, but exclusively, so that the beginning, progress, and completion of spiritual operation are denied to human powers and vindicated entirely to the grace of Christ.

Proof c. That man cannot by his own powers prepare himself for his conversion is easily gathered from the blindness of the intellect and the impotence of the will in the unregenerate, and this has already been proven by the preceding arguments. We add only two arguments which lucidly prove the natural ineptitude for beginning and promoting conversion. 1) Paul denies to men the aptitude for thinking a spiritual good, 2 Cor. III, 5: "We are not sufficient of ourselves to think anything as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God." Whoever can think no good from themselves, but owe all and singular good thoughts to divine grace, they cannot by their own powers either begin or promote their conversion.

You say: The cited words are not to be understood of the powers of the will concerning spiritual things, but of the ministry of the gospel. Response: Although the apostle speaks principally of the ministry of the word, it is permissible to conclude from the greater to the lesser from the apostle's statement: If reborn ministers of God are not sufficient of themselves to effect or say anything, but even to think it, and hence are in need of an aptitude to be received from God, much less will men not yet reborn be sufficient of themselves in the work of conversion to think, or say, or do a spiritual good.

2. The same Apostle in Rom. VIII, 7 says: "Φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς ἐχθρὰ εἰς θεόν." (Phronēma tēs sarkos echthra eis theon - The mind of the flesh is enmity against God). "The mind of the flesh is enmity against God, for it does not subject itself to the law of God, nor indeed can it." The φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς (phronēma tēs sarkos) is not only the prudence and meditation of a blinded intellect, but also the care and desire of a perverse will. "Flesh" denotes the corruption congenital to man after the fall, opposed to the spirit. Of this mind of the flesh it is said that it is enmity toward God, by which is designated rebellion, contrariety, resistance, because the corrupt flesh neither subjects itself to the law of God, nor can it subject itself by natural powers. From which we argue: The man whose intellect and will in their thoughts and desires oppose God who is beginning conversion, resist His law, and cannot obey it by natural powers, that man cannot prepare himself for his conversion: But the intellect and will of unregenerate man, etc.; Therefore.

The antithesis was formerly of 1) the Pelagians, who were not afraid to affirm that man without the Holy Spirit can convert himself to God by his own powers. 2) The Semi-Pelagians, or Massilians (so called from Cassian, a presbyter of Marseilles), who attributed the beginning of conversion now to free will, now to the Holy Spirit, according to the different condition of different subjects. 3) To these are added most of the Scholastics and Papists, in whose opinion free will was indeed weakened by the fall, but not lost. 4) The Socinians state that neither was original sin introduced by the fall of the first parents, nor was free will in spiritual things lost, whom the Arminians follow. Their arguments are:

I. Whoever by their doctrine go about transforming man into a brute, or plainly into a log, their doctrine does not deserve approbation. But the Protestant doctors do, etc.; Therefore. The minor is clear, because the Protestants teach: 1) that free will was lost through the fall, although by this very thing man is distinguished from beasts, that they act uniformly, while man is indifferent to different objects and their acts; 2) the same teach that man brings not even a passive power to his own conversion; by which he is assimilated to a log, which has neither active nor passive power to bend itself. Response: This argument is easily refuted, provided the doctrine of the Protestants is rightly explained. For 1) they do not deny that after the fall there is freedom of will in man, if this is taken materially, to denote τὴν οὐσίαν (tēn ousian - the essence), the essence of the human will; but the same take free will formally for τῇ ἐνεργείᾳ (tē energeia - the powers of choosing or acting), or the powers of choosing or acting (to avoid which equivocation some authors call them the powers of free will). Nor do they simply and universally deny to the will all powers of choosing merely spiritual things. 2) They do not deny that there is in the unregenerate a remote and obediential passive power of receiving the grace of conversion, but they only teach that unregenerate man lacks a natural and proximate passive power for receiving the supernatural influx of the Holy Spirit; by which he is distinguished both from a brute and from a log.

II. God orders and commands that we convert, Zech. I, 3; Joel II, 12; Jer. III, 1. These precepts will be vain and void if man does not have the power to convert himself. Response: 1) From precept to fact, from "ought" to "can" is not a valid consequence. Christ commanded the dead daughter of Jairus; "Arise!" Mark V, 41, who could not arise by her own powers. So also unregenerate man is dead in sins, Eph. II, 1. 2) The divine precepts are not given in vain; but considered legally, they do not indeed show the measure of our powers, but a) they indicate the right of God, demanding back those powers which He conferred on the first man; b) they prescribe the norm of our duty; c) they require from us a passive obedience, i.e., non-repugnance; d) they convict us of our infirmity; e) pedagogically they lead us to Christ, Gal. III, 24. Considered evangelically, insofar as they have divine grace conjoined, they are effective and persuasive, as efficacious means by which the powers of converting are offered and conferred on those who do not morosely and pertinaciously resist.

III. He who commands things that surpass the powers of the will is a tyrant; God is not a tyrant; Therefore. Response: He who commands things that simply and always surpass the powers of men is a tyrant. But God does not do this; but 1) He had bestowed upon the first parents the powers of perfectly worshipping God. By His right, God demands that which man lost by his malice. 2) God precedes with His grace the one who is impotent by nature, so that he may become potent by grace. 3) Man, preceded by divine grace, can with contumacious malice not resist, can not place a malicious obstacle to the Holy Spirit, can admit the divinely ordained means, so that the Holy Spirit through the divine word may kindle saving faith in him.

IV. Whoever are ordered to awake from sleep, they arise by their own powers; But unregenerate men, etc., Eph. V, 14; Therefore. The major is established, because one who is sleeping, when awakened, rises by his own powers. Response: The unregenerate are awakened and arise from dead works not by their own power, but by the power of this potent and efficacious word, Hebr. IV, 12. For this precept, legally considered, does not express the measure of our powers, but the norm of our debt; evangelically considered, it is an efficacious means of awakening one dead in sins and illuminating one who is blind, provided he does not morosely resist, but allows himself to be illuminated.

V. The divine command of conversion is not beyond us, Deut. XXX, 11. Therefore, it can be performed by the powers of our will. Response: The cited words according to the Hebrew source are thus: "This commandment that I command you today is not too wonderful for you, neither is it far off." Paul repeats this precept, Rom. X, 6, 7, 8, and adds: "This is the word of faith that we proclaim." Wherefore, by the divine precept given by Moses to the people of Israel, is understood not precisely the word of the law, but also the word of the gospel, as Paul teaches. This word is fulfilled not by one's own powers, but by the efficacy of the divine promise, by which saving faith is kindled.

VI. To whoever does not have free will of the will, neither punishments nor rewards should be established; According to the opinion of the Protestants, unregenerate man, etc.; Therefore. The major is proved; because he is afflicted with punishments in whose power it was to decline what he committed; he is honored with rewards who willingly performed what he ought. Response: Distinguish between things of the upper and lower hemisphere. In things of the lower hemisphere, concerning this life, man after the fall has free will, and so with respect to them, temporal punishment and reward are established for man. In things of the upper hemisphere, man is indeed destitute of the powers of free will; yet it is within his power not to resist the means of conversion divinely offered. He is punished if he maliciously resists; he is not punished if he does not oppose the offered means.

VII. If man can receive the offered means by the powers of nature, he certainly has free will in spiritual things; The antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent. The major is proved because the offered means are spiritual goods. If man can receive them by natural powers, it is validly concluded that free will remains in spiritual things after the fall. Response: The offering of the means pertains to the prevenient grace of God, by which the natural passive incapacity innate in all is taken away, so that man is capable of a passive reception of the means; from which it is wrongly concluded in favor of free will, which, by common opinion, is an active power of the will. To this is added that man, preceded by grace, indeed applies the means of conversion externally, but does not effect the interior conversion by his own powers; just as a sick person indeed receives the medicine offered by a physician, yet does not have his own powers of healing himself.

VIII. Sirach c. XV, 14, 15, attributes freedom of will to man, saying: "God in the beginning made man, and left him in the hand of his own counsel; If you will, you shall keep the commandments." Response: 1) The book of Sirach is outside the canon, and so dogmas of faith cannot be proved from it. 2) Sirach speaks of man before the fall in his created nature; after the fall, unregenerate man is a slave of sin.

IX. Moses, Deut. XXX, 19, and Joshua, c. XXIV, 15, grant the Israelites a choice, or free election. Therefore, they attribute free will to them. Response: Moses and Joshua speak with the Israelites as with reborn men. But the question is about unregenerate man; whether he can choose a merely spiritual object by natural powers and act concerning it.

X. God did not deny to Cain the fratricide, but rather commanded him dominion over sin, Gen. IV, 7. Therefore, He grants free will in spiritual things to every most grievous sinner. Response: 1) It is wrongly concluded from a precept to a power. 2) Distinguish between internal, or more subtle, sins, and external, or crasser ones. Fratricide is an external and crass sin, from which even heathens can abstain.

XI. Whatever will is the cause of the knowledge of the doctrine of Christ, that will is the cause of faith; The human will, etc.; Therefore. The major is proved, because knowledge of the doctrine of Christ is part of faith. The minor is clear from John VII, 16, 17: "If anyone's will is to do the Father's will, he will know of the doctrine, whether it is from God or whether I speak on my own." Response: Christ is not speaking generally of the evangelical or legal will of the Father, but specifically of the divine will which urges the scrutiny and meditation of the scriptures, so that the sense is; If anyone wills to do the Father's will, that is, according to His precept to search the scriptures of the old testament with attention, he will know of that doctrine which I have delivered with my mouth, whether it is from God or not. But this does nothing to establish the free will of unregenerate man in spiritual things.

XII. Sin is either necessary or voluntary. If it is necessary, it is inevitable, and therefore not sin. If it is voluntary, it can be avoided, and therefore man has free will in morals, since he can sin and not sin. Response: The opposition of necessary and voluntary sin is not accurate, but sin is distinguished into voluntary and involuntary. From voluntary, an inference to the negation of necessary cannot be made, since in different respects one and the same action can be both voluntary and necessary. Voluntary, by reason of the interior motion and delight, as to the species; necessary, by reason of the external object and determination, as to the genus.

Question XIV. Do men, after the fall, have free will to choose things of the lower hemisphere?

The will of men, both regenerate and unregenerate, after the fall, possesses powers for choosing different things subject to reason, or for embracing one over another a), although those powers are languid and infirm b).

Proof a. 1) From the apostolic testimony, Rom. II, 14: "For when Gentiles, who do not have the law, by nature do what the law requires." The Gentiles, who were ignorant of the prescribed law of Moses, led by nature, performed acts somewhat conformable to the moral law. Therefore, as the Augsburg

Confession testifies, article XVIII: "our churches teach concerning free will that the human will has some liberty to work civil righteousness and to choose things subject to reason."

2. Sound reason demonstrates this freedom of will in natural, civil, and artificial actions. For if man does not have freedom of will in natural things, he will not be the principal cause of his actions; he will deliberate with himself or with others in vain; for his actions he will be neither praised, nor reprehended, nor punished. To punish a sinner who could not have acted otherwise is not consonant with equity.

3. It is proved by examples. It was open for Lot to depart from Abraham to the right or to the left, Gen. XIII, 9. Paul was able to take a sister with him, and to abstain from her, 1 Cor. IX, 5. It was in Solomon's power to ask from God riches or wisdom, 1 Kings III, 5.

Proof b. By internal and external impediments, free will in things subject to reason is broken and weakened. The internal impediments are: 1) the blindness of the intellect, erring in deliberations; 2) the languor of the will in pursuing good, and the proclivity to embrace evil; 3) the vehemence of the affections, often so great that it carries the will away with it like a torrent and disturbs the judgment of reason. The external impediments are: 1) the craftiness of the devil, leading man away from the love of good; 2) the blandishments and terrors of the world; 3) the limiting direction of God, subverting counsels and diminishing or cutting off the faculty of acting.

Question XV. What use does the doctrine of the defect of the will in spiritual matters confer upon us?

Practical uses. It confers upon us a) a paraenetic use, that with a submissive spirit we may acknowledge the infirmity of our powers, use the means of grace decently, and pray assiduously b); a paracletic use, that, contemplating with ourselves the greatness of divine grace, we may lift up our spirit with the hope of salvation.

Proof a. We labor under αδυναμία (adynamia - infirmity of powers), or infirmity of powers, concerning spiritual things, so that without Christ we can do nothing and bear no fruit; just as a branch cut from the vine has not even the power to bear fruit. Therefore, there is nothing to glory in, because nothing is ours. Let us meanwhile use the means of salvation sedulously, and with assiduous prayers implore the help of the Holy Spirit.

Proof b. Who could express in words the greatness of divine grace? For the most merciful God precedes the unwilling, that he may will; He follows the willing, that he may not will in vain; He precedes, that we may be healed; He follows, that being healed we may be strengthened; He precedes, that we may be called; He follows, that we may be glorified; He precedes, that we may live piously; He follows, that we may always remain with Him; As AUGUSTINE speaks in his book de nat. et grat., c. 32.

SUSPIRIUM

Without You, SWEETEST JESUS, I am worth nothing, I know nothing. Without You I think nothing good, desire nothing salutary, undertake nothing pious, accomplish nothing fruitful. Strengthen, I ask, me who am languishing, correct me who am erring, support me who am vacillating, lead me as I go from this valley of tears into the celestial paradise.

PART III OF THEOLOGY

SECTION I. ON THE PRINCIPLES OF SALVATION.

CHAPTER I. ON THE UNIVERSAL BENEVOLENCE OF GOD TOWARD FALLEN MEN, AS THE FIRST PRINCIPLE OF SALVATION.

Question I. What are the principles of salvation?

THE PRINCIPLES OF salvation are the acts of divine grace upon which the external salvation of men depends.

Proof. Just as divine grace is the internal impelling cause which moved God to bless the sinner, so it is the same fount and source from which the beginning, progress, and completion of our salvation flows. The Apostle implies this, Eph. II, 8, saying: "By grace you have been saved through faith." Wherefore, every act of divine grace occupied with the procurement of our salvation is called a principle of salvation.

Question II. How many are the principles of salvation?

Principles of salvation. The principles of salvation are three. The first is the benevolence of God the Father toward fallen man to be raised up and blessed. The second is the fraternal redemption of Christ from sin and its penalties. The third is the gracious and efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit through certain means, by which the salvation procured by Christ is offered and conferred.

Proof. The Savior Himself indicates these three principles of salvation in John III, 16: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life." God the Father, by loving the world and giving His Son as mediator, showed Himself benevolent. The Son was given that He might vindicate the world, i.e., the entire human race inhabiting this globe, from destruction, and thus be its redeemer. The means of enjoying the redemption of Christ is true faith, fixed in the merit of Christ, which the Holy Spirit kindles by a gracious and efficacious operation through the word and sacraments; for He is called the Spirit of faith, 2 Cor. IV, 13.

Question III. How manyfold is the benevolence of God toward fallen men?

The benevolence of God toward fallen men is twofold; general, or universal, and special. The former embraces all men constituted in misery, and to them it ordains and offers valid means of salvation; the latter resolves to grant eternal salvation to sinners who embrace the offered means of salvation.

Question IV. What is the universal benevolence of God?

The universal benevolence of God. The universal benevolence of God is an act of divine grace by which God, having regarded the common misery of fallen men, was moved not only to seriously will the salvation of all of them, but also to give Christ as a mediator for procuring it, and likewise to destine efficacious means, with the intention that all men should use them, conceive from them true faith in Christ, and through Him obtain and enjoy eternal salvation, to the praise of divine goodness.

Observation I. The benevolence of God is here not regarded in its first act, insofar as it is an essential attribute of God, but in its second act, as it denotes the full and efficacious intention of succoring miserable sinners, and the destination of means for raising up and saving men fallen into sin.

Observation II. The benevolence of God is expressed in the sacred letters by equivalent words, which, however, are distinguished by peculiar connotations. For it is called a) the grace of God, insofar as it is opposed to all debt and all merit of works. And so the grace of God here denotes the gratuitous favor of God, or the benevolence of the eternal Deity, provoked by no merits; about which the Apostle in Eph. II, 8 says: "For by grace you have been saved through faith. And this is not your own doing; it is the gift of God, not a result of works, so that no one may boast." b) The mercy of God, insofar as God regards the common misery of men corrupted by sins, and wills to avert it. c) Χρηστότης καὶ φιλάνθρωπία (chrēstotēs kai philanthrōpia - kindness and love of men), kindness and love of men. Paul uses these words in Titus III, 4: "But when the goodness and loving kindness of God our Savior appeared." Χρηστός (chrēstos) is said of one who is useful to another. Χρηστότης (chrēstotēs), therefore, or kindness, is the benevolent propensity of God to promote the benefits of men. Φιλάνθρωπία (philanthrōpia), however, or love of men, comprises the act of benevolence together with its object, which is men. It is of love to impart good to another. And φιλάνθρωπία (philanthrōpia) is the will of God, prone to communicate good to miserable men. By theologians, it is commonly called the antecedent will of God.

Question V. How manyfold is the will of God occupied with the business of salvation?

The Antecedent and Consequent Will of God. The will of God in itself is one and simple; but insofar as it is terminated at external objects, especially fallen men, and, according to their different state and consideration, expresses itself in distinct acts, it is distinguished in our way of understanding into antecedent and consequent. The antecedent will is that by which God wills the salvation of all fallen and miserable men, and to obtain this He gave Christ as a mediator, and ordained those means by which the salvation procured by Christ and the powers of believing are offered to all men, with the serious intention of conferring them. The consequent will is that by which God elected to eternal life from the fallen human race those whom He foresaw would use the ordinary means and would persevere in faith in Christ to the end of their life; on the other hand, He reprobated from the human race those whom He foresaw would pertinaciously reject the ordinary means and would remain in unbelief to their last breath.

Observation. The will of God is called antecedent and consequent; Not 1) by reason of time, as if the antecedent will precedes the consequent in time; for as God is without time, so He does not have one will which anticipates another in time. 2) Nor from the side of the divine will itself, as if there were in God two wills really distinct. For the divine will is the very essence of God, conceived with a connoted object, in the manner of an act of willing. 3) But the will of God is called antecedent and consequent from the order of our reason, which distinguishes different acts of willing in God according to the different consideration of the objects, and considers one act before another; so that it is noted, at least, that the antecedent will precedes the consequent in the order of divine reason. For it is prior, in our way of understanding, for God to will salvation and to procure the means of salvation for men, than for Him to will to actually confer eternal salvation on those who will finally believe in Christ, or to adjudge eternal damnation to those who are finally impenitent.

This distinction is proved 1) because it is supported by a certain foundation. For (a) the antecedent will of God is directed toward miserable man, insofar as he is miserable, with no account taken of his obedience and faith, or of his inobedience and unbelief; but the consequent will is concerned with miserable man insofar as he is either obedient and faithful, or inobedient and faithless, and so it follows the consideration of obedience and inobedience. (b) By His antecedent will, God destines and offers the means of salvation to all men; by His consequent will, He elects to eternal life those who accept the destined and offered means, but reprobates those who pertinaciously repudiate the ordained means. (c) The antecedent will of God is universal, because it exists with a simple respect, by which the beneficent will of God relates equally to all; the consequent will is particular, because it exists with a determined respect, as the same will relates to men who in the act itself either follow or neglect that order (τάξις) of means.

2. This distinction is necessary, on account of the wonderful temperament of divine mercy and justice, to be reconciled with each other. For there exist in the sacred letters sayings which show the mercy of God prone to all sinners, 1 Tim. II, 4; 2 Peter III, 9. There exist others which note the justice of God and exclude from the inheritance of salvation those who oppose the divine order, John III, 18; Mark XVI, 16. Finally, there exist biblical dicta in which both the mercy and the justice of God are proclaimed, Matth. XXIII, 37. Christ, by His antecedent will, as much as was in Him, willed to gather the children of Israel as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings; but by His consequent will, because they were unwilling to be gathered,

3. This distinction is insinuated by the parables of Christ. For the celestial king invited many men to the wedding of his son by his antecedent will; the few who appeared and were properly dressed, he received lavishly at the royal table; those who refused to come and were destitute of a wedding garment, he rejected and destroyed by his consequent will. Matth. XXII, 1. Compare Luke XIV, 16.

4. This distinction was approved by venerable antiquity. For CHRYSOSTOM distinguishes between the first and second will of God, homil. I on the epistle to the Eph. I. ANSELM, in chap. VI on Matth., distinguishes between the will of mercy and of justice. DAMASCENUS, Book II de O. F., chap. XXIX, teaches that God antecedently (προηγουμένως - proëgoumenōs) wills all to be saved and to attain His kingdom; for He did not form us for punishment, but that He might make us partakers of His goodness, as He is good; but He wills sinners to be punished, as He is just. Therefore, the first is called the preceding will and good pleasure, existing from Him (God); but the second will is the consequent will and permission existing from our cause. To which the words of TERTULLIAN, in his book de resurrectione carnis, refer: "God is most good from Himself, but just from us."

The antithesis is of Maccovius and other Reformed theologians, who impugn the distinction of the antecedent and consequent will of God with the following arguments:

1. Whatever will is eternal cannot be distinguished into antecedent and consequent. But the will of God is eternal. Therefore. The major is established, because in eternity there is no before or after. Response: The will of God is distinguished into antecedent and consequent not from the side of the divine will, but from the side of the willed objects, considered in different ways. For the will of God is not a produced act, but the very essence of God, conceived with a connoted object in the manner of an act of willing; which, as it is terminated at some prior or posterior reason in the object of willing, is conceived by us as a prior or posterior, antecedent or consequent will, not by reason of time, but by reason of order according to our way of conceiving.

2. Two contradictory wills do not exist in God: The antecedent and consequent will, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because in God a) all things are ταὐτό (tauto - one and the same), one and the same, and b) if there were two contradictory wills in God, one would subvert or expunge the other. The minor is proved, because God is said by His antecedent will to have mercy on all, and by His consequent will not to have mercy on all, which imply a contradiction. Response: I deny the minor. For contradictory things are said of the same thing, insofar as it is the same, or insofar as it is considered in the same respect. But the antecedent and consequent will of God are concerned with man considered in different ways. For the antecedent will of God is concerned with man insofar as he is man, with no account taken of circumstances in this object; but the consequent will of God is concerned with man considered with certain circumstances, as he is either faithful or faithless. Wherefore, the antecedent and consequent will of God are not opposed to each other contrarily or contradictorily, but are subordinated. The latter is contained materially in the former, and, the condition being posited, passes into it. Which I show thus: By His antecedent will, God wills that all men be saved, if they finally believe. But those who rightly use the ordinary means of salvation are those who finally believe. Therefore, the antecedent will of God is not subverted, rescinded, or expunged by the consequent will, but rather, the condition being fulfilled, it passes into the same.

3. Whatever will is inefficacious is not to be attributed to God; But the antecedent will is inefficacious; Therefore. The major is clear, because we have a religious scruple about attributing weak wishes and an inefficacious desire to God. The minor is clear, because the will of God does not attain its intended end. Response: I deny the minor. For a will is called inefficacious either in the order of attaining the end, or in the order of the intention through certain means. Although the antecedent will of God is not always efficacious in the former way, because it does not achieve its intended effect in all men, it is nevertheless efficacious as a full and serious intention and destination of the most efficacious means. Indeed, a medicine is not rarely most efficacious which, being refused or trodden underfoot, is frustrated of its desired event. Wherefore, ἀνεκβατον (anekbaton - lacking event), lacking event, is one thing; ἀνεέργητον (anenergēton - destitute of efficacy), destitute of efficacy, is another.

4. No one can resist the divine will, Rom. IX, 19. Many resist the antecedent will. Therefore, the antecedent will is not the divine will. Response: No one can resist the absolute divine will acting through its absolute power. But the will of God in the economy, or dispensation of salvation, is not absolute, but ordained, and so is to be fulfilled according to the τάξιν (taxin - order), or order of means, divinely destined. Not a few men spurn this order against themselves, Luke VII, 30, and in this way they resist the divine will, not through a greater power, but through impotence, or defect, namely through the blindness of the intellect and the perversity of their own will.

5. Whoever is wise does not suspend the end of his will on a condition which he foreknows will not be fulfilled; But God is most wise; Therefore. The major is established, because a wise man does nothing in vain, but for a certain end, which he can attain through valid means. Response: 1) Denying the major. For a good prince is not to be defrauded of the glory of wisdom, although in establishing just laws he foresees in his mind that they will not be kept by all citizens. 2) The condition which God has predefined, "if they finally believe," is not impossible, because it is fulfilled by many; it can also be fulfilled by the rest, provided they admit, and do not morosely repudiate, the means destined for obtaining the end. 3) Although in not a few God does not attain the proper, or special, end, He nevertheless always attains the common, or general, end, which is the glory of divine goodness. Stubbornly contumacious sinners deprive themselves of the proper end, or eternal salvation, by their own fault. (*)

(*) Of one thing or action, there can be several ends, one indeed the highest and principal, but perhaps many lower ones. God willed to offer saving grace even to those whom He foresaw would refuse it, with this plan, that none of them should have a just excuse for himself, but all should be ἀναπολόγητοι (anapologetoi - without excuse), John XV, 22. The argumentation ad hominem will indeed be very valuable, and that of two kinds. One, which is drawn from that opinion in which those who dissent in this cause agree with us: The natural knowledge of God, and the law of nature, is implanted and innate in the souls of all

Question VI. By which inadequate acts is the universal benevolence of God accomplished?

The acts of the universal benevolence of God. The universal benevolence of God is accomplished by four inadequate acts; of which the first is the compassion for the entire human race, circumvented and corrupted by the fraud of the devil a); the second act is the divine intention of procuring salvation for all men fallen into sin b); the third is the liberal donation of Christ the mediator, by which satisfaction may be made to the injured divine justice c); the fourth is the destination of means by which both the eternal salvation procured by the satisfaction of Christ and the powers of believing are offered to all men, so that they may be able to accept the satisfaction of Christ for salvation and apply it to themselves d).

Proof a. "For God has consigned all to disobedience, that he may have mercy on all," Rom. XI, 32. God convicts all men of congenital ἀπιστία (apistia - unbelief), or unbelief, and has demonstrated with invincible arguments that all men whatsoever, created from the blood of Adam and begotten by natural way, are guilty of eternal death and worthy of perennial punishments, if He were to deal with them according to the rigor of justice. But the placable God, using a tempering of justice toward the miserable fallen, has had mercy on all by granting pardon for crimes to all, so that divine mercy might be diffused as widely as human misery extends.

Proof b. Divine mercy is desirous of the salvation of all mortals; for God most merciful wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of truth, 1 Tim. 2:4. He wills that the wicked convert from his way and live, Ezek. 18:23, ch. 33:11.

Proof c. Because in God there is not only grace and mercy, but also justice, grace moves God to decree salvation for men not in any way whatever, but insofar as this could be done with his justice preserved immutable. But vindictive justice moves God to exact satisfaction for sins, or, when this is lacking, to punish sins with eternal death. Therefore, since the sinner was unequal to providing satisfaction for himself and for others (For a brother will not redeem a man by redeeming; he will not give God his expiation. For the redemption of their soul is more precious, so that he should cease forever, Ps. 49:8); mercy moved God to provide for men, to whom he wished to offer remission of sins and eternal life, from another's satisfaction, which Christ, the eternal Son of God, willingly provided, who gave himself ἀντίλυτρον (antilytron / ransom), a price of redemption for all, 1 Tim. 2:6. Therefore it is to be attributed to the universal benevolence of God that God gave to the whole fallen human race the mediator Christ, who would fulfill the law for sinners and pay the vicarious punishments of transgressions. The Savior himself preaches this divine φιланθρωπία (philanthropia / love of mankind), John 3:16: "So God loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son." And Paul, Rom. 5:8: "God commends his love toward us, that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us." John praises the same, 1 ep. 4:9-10: "In this the love of God toward us was manifested, that God sent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. In this is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his only-begotten Son as a propitiation for our sins."

Proof d. The satisfaction of the mediator Christ would not benefit us unless means were divinely supplied to us by which we might make it our own, or apply it to ourselves. Those means are both word and sacraments, by which salvation is offered to all through the satisfaction of Christ obtained; and true faith, by which the men, although God foreknew that very many would not live conveniently to nature and congruently. Why then was that natural faculty granted to all? Surely for this reason, that wicked men should have nothing by which to excuse their ignorance and obstinacy of mind. Rom. I, 20; II, 15. The other, with which we press our adversaries, is taken from the false opinion which they indeed assume as true. They say that saving grace is indeed offered to all mortals, but not to all with the same efficacy, and those who dispute subtly profess this, that God calls all, and indeed each one, but not with the same and equal benevolence. Let us ask them, therefore, with what mind God does this? With what plan does He call them, in whatever way it may be? when He Himself well knows that they will not accept even this call. This would surely be to act in vain, and what God would do, He would do with a will not efficacious.

satisfaction of Christ is accepted and applied to salvation. God denies these means to no man absolutely and simply. For God φιλόανθρωπος (philanthropos / loving mankind) commanded the gospel to be preached to every creature, Mark 16:15. And Christ, about to be carried up into heaven, thus instructed his disciples: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Indeed God also offers faith to all, Acts 17:31.

Question VII. Of whom does God will to have mercy?

The object of benevolence. God does not will to have mercy on fallen angels a), but he wills to have mercy on all and individual men corrupted by sins; whom by divine judgment God shows himself to seriously will to rescue from the abyss of misery and lead through certain means to eternal beatitude b).

Proof a. 1) Because God did not spare angels who sinned, 2 Pet. 2:4. God the most just judge eternally punishes the horrible apostasy of angels by the withdrawal of all grace. This is what holy Jude clearly teaches in his epistle v. 6: "God has reserved angels who did not retain their origin, but left their proper dwelling, for the judgment of the great day in perpetual chains under darkness." 2) Since no mediator was divinely given to fallen angels, they cannot be freed from punishments with divine justice preserved. Therefore the Apostle says in Heb. 2:16: "Nowhere did the Son of God take up angels, but the seed of Abraham." 3) Sacred Scripture has not expressed the cause why the devil is reputed unmerciful by divine judgment; however, the ancient fathers gave probable and analogous reasons of faith for the rigorous divine judgment on fallen angels, which D. GERHARD collected in his Commentary on 2 Pet. 2, p. 205. Namely, all divine grace was denied to the devil because a) he spontaneously, with no one instigating, defected from God, and was the seducer of seduced man, with direct hatred toward the creator. b) Although the remaining fallen angels were also seduced by their leader and standard-bearer the devil; yet all sinned by most free προαίρεσις (proairesis / choice); but the posterity of Adam fell into the guilt of sin by the necessity of being born. c) Unless God had had mercy on us, the whole human race would have perished by the sin of one man; yet not all perished by the sin of one angel, but each of them contracted misery by his own sin.

Proof b. The mercy of God embraces all sinful men, not insofar as, or because they are sinners; for God, unwilling iniquity, hates those who work iniquity, Ps. 5:5. But insofar as they are miserable, corrupted by sins and dead in them, destitute of their own powers to restore themselves to a state of grace. Therefore, with the common misery of men being present to the divine intellect, he has had mercy on all, and seriously intends to procure the liberation and salvation of all through certain means. For indeed 1) the assertor and vindicator of salvation himself, Jesus, preaches the universal φιλοκοσμία (philokosmia / love of the world) of God, John 3:16: "So God loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that everyone who believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life." In this golden compendium of the gospel the lover, the object of love, the mode and end are proposed for our consideration. The lover is God the Father (yet not excluding the second and third person of the divinity: For Christ also loved us, Eph. 5:25, Gal. 2:20, and through the Holy Spirit the love of God is poured out in our hearts, Rom. 5:5). But love is attributed by special reason to God the Father; for just as he is the source of divinity; so also he is the source of φιланθρωπία (philanthropia / love of mankind) toward men. The object of love is the world, by which are understood all sinful men, not insofar as they are sinners, but insofar as they are in need of commiseration. This exposition is confirmed a) from v. 18, where the world, or men signified by the world, are divided into two classes, believers and non-believers; and it is added; so that those from the world who believe may have eternal life; but others from the world who do not believe are condemned. b) The word "world," taken in a special sense, denotes wicked men, e.g. "the world cannot receive the Spirit of truth," John 14:17; "the whole world lies in wickedness," 1 John 5:19. Taken in a general sense it designates both pious and wicked men, as in this place, but never and nowhere in all of Sacred Scripture does it signify only the elect. c) That world is understood to which the gospel about Christ is to be preached, Matt. 28:19. But that world is the whole human race, Mark 16:15. The mode of love is suggested by the particle οὕτως (houtos / so), "so," so as to designate most ardent and intense love, of which the most illustrious argument and incomparable pledge is the only-begotten Son of God, given to the world as mediator and satisfier. The end of love is that all men, applying the satisfaction of Christ to themselves by true faith, may be immune from eternal condemnation, but partakers of eternal life. We argue; Whatever love embraces all men dwelling in this world is universal in reason of object. But the most ardent love of God the Father, by which he was moved to give to the world his only-begotten Son as mediator, so that all men applying his satisfaction to themselves by true faith might have eternal life, embraces all men dwelling in this world. Therefore (*).

2) The Apostle Paul expressly says in 1 Tim. 2:4: "God wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of truth." We observe in this classical saying (a) the antecedent will of God concerning miserable men to be saved, (b) the object of this will: all men, by whom are understood not men of every kind, but individual men constituted in a state of misery, and therefore in need of salvation and salvable (not yet actually condemned). This exposition is clear from the συναφεία (synapheia / context) of the text; because (α) the word "all" primarily signifies individuals of kinds; secondarily kinds of individuals. But the analogue stands for the more principal signification as long as the coherence of the text does not compel us to recede from it. (β) This exposition is confirmed from what precedes and follows. For God wills those men to be saved for whom he commanded prayer to be made. But God commanded prayer to be made for all and individual men, even those who are later condemned. Therefore he wills all and individual men, even those who are later condemned, to be saved. The truth of the major and minor is evident from what precedes, and from what follows we gather thus; For which men Christ gave himself ἀντίλυτρον (antilytron / ransom), or price of redemption, God wills those to be saved. But Christ gave himself ἀντίλυτρον for all men. Therefore (**).

3) The universality of divine grace is proved from Rom. 11:32: "God has concluded all men in unbelief, that he might have mercy on all." Obs. a) God concluded all men in unbelief not αἰτιωδῶς (aitiodos / causally), causally, or effectively, by sending or pouring unbelief into the minds of men; but δικαστικῶς (dikastikos / judicially), judicially, and declaratively, by convincing all men of innate unbelief, and declaring that all unconverted and unregenerate men are destitute of saving faith, and therefore guilty of eternal death. b) Since all were destitute of natural powers for emerging from unbelief, God took occasion from that impotence and misery to have mercy on all. Whence the argument; Those whom God convicted of innate unbelief and declared to be guilty of eternal death, he has had mercy on them; But all men, etc. Therefore.

4) Paul commends the universality of divine grace in Acts 17:30-31: "The times of ignorance God overlooked, but now commands all men everywhere to repent; because he has appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by the man whom he has destined, offering faith to all, after he raised him from the dead." Obs. a) The times of ignorance are called the times of the O.T. compared to the light of the gospel, most widely diffused by the ministry of the apostles in the N.T. b) Ὑπεριδεῖν (hyperidein / to overlook) denotes the longsuffering of God, to whom, although there were abundant causes for destroying sinners, yet he did not do this, but awaited the times of the N.T. under which the gospel was to be preached to all, if even then they would repent of their ignorance. c) Most openly the universal grace of God is commended by this Pauline saying; since according to the testimony of the Apostle, God invites all men, living in all intervals of places, to repentance, and is ready to give faith to all through ordained means. From which an argument can be formed: Those men to whom God commands to repent and offers faith, he wills their salvation. But to all men living everywhere, etc. Therefore.

(*) Besides these arguments, surely most firm, no less firm strength of proof lies in the very close bond by which these words are coupled with what was said before, v. 14-15. Namely, Moses by God's command and authority had set forth the bronze serpent, the image of Christ, in the sight of all, so that everyone (כָּל [kol / all], and then יִשְׂרָאֵל [ish / man], Num. 21:8-9) provided he would look upon it, might become safe. Therefore also κόσμος (kosmos / world) designates not only the whole human race, but also individuals from every race, and therefore it is expressly said, v. 15, πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων (pas ho pisteuon / everyone who believes), everyone, provided he wishes to look to Christ and receive the salvation offered to him.

(**) The name πάντες (pantes / all), if nothing is added that restrains the force of the word, extends so widely as to denote individuals, we learn from an illustrious example, Rom. 14, in which place the divine man 1) πάντας (pantas / all), v. 10, then v. 12 expressly interprets ἕκαστος (hekastos / each one), 2) from the saying cited v. 11 in which the Prophet speaks about all, he offers this consequence, which pertains to individuals.

5) The same Apostle clearly testifies concerning the universality of the saving grace of God, Tit. 2:11: "The saving grace of God has appeared to all men." The apostle teaches by these words that the saving grace of God is obvious to all, equally exposed to all. For just as the natural sun shines on all men; so the grace of God has appeared to all, and wills to illuminate all, provided they do not maliciously close the eyes of their mind.

6) The universality of divine grace is also evident from the clear statement of the Apostle Peter, 2 Epist. 3:9: "God is longsuffering toward us, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to repentance." By these words of St. Peter divine longsuffering is represented, which extends even to the reprobate. Rom. 2:4. The Apostle enunciates the reason for μακροθυμία (makrothymia / longsuffering), that is, divine longsuffering, both negatively and affirmatively. The negative enunciation is: God does not will any to perish; which admits no exception or exclusion. The affirmative is: God wills all to return to repentance. This proposition is universal in reason of object, and therefore not to be restricted to kinds of individuals, or to the predestined alone. For God calls and exhorts all men to repentance, Luke 24:47, Acts 17:30, just as he demonstrates his μακροθυμία (makrothymia / longsuffering) toward all, deferring still the day of judgment, concerning which v. 10, which the συναφεία (synapheia / context) of the text teaches extends even to the very scoffers who say: "Where is the promise of his coming?" From these we gather: Toward which men God is longsuffering, and whom he does not will to perish, but to convert to repentance, the saving grace of God embraces them; But God is longsuffering toward all men, and wills none to perish, but all to convert to repentance; Therefore the saving grace of God embraces all men.

You say: St. Peter speaks only of the elect; because he says: "God is longsuffering toward us." Response: By those words the apostle does not regard the condition of men different from faith or unbelief, but the condition of misery after the fall, common to all men. Among whom Peter numbers himself, according to that of Paul, Rom. 3:23: "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." God confirms his universal benevolence with an oath, Ezek. 33:11: "As I live, says Adonai Jehovah, if I desire the death of the wicked, but rather that the wicked convert from his way and live." Obs. a) Most benign God declares by this oath his disposition toward all men, most inclined at all times. For no convertible wicked person should be excepted here whom God does not except; and as long as the wicked person, constituted in the way, is capable of salvation, God does not will his death, but life. b) The discourse is about eternal death, which the penitent can avoid through the grace of God; but temporal death is not avoidable even for the penitent. By the same reasoning the discourse is about life not temporal; which indeed he often extends into many years who does not convert; but about eternal life, as which is the end of conversion, Acts 11:18. c) The willing here denotes not only εὐαρέσθεια (euarestēia / good pleasure), or delight, but also εὐδοκία (eudokia / good will), or serious and effective good pleasure; by which God wills the end, or the life of the sinner, through a valid means, namely repentance. With these things presupposed we gather: Whoever seriously intends the conversion and eternal life of all the wicked, his benevolence toward the fallen human race is universal; But God, etc. Therefore (*).

(*) If we wish to distribute the proving sayings into various classes, there are altogether TEN kinds of them. In the FIRST are those places of Scripture in which the benevolence of God toward the world, without any exception, indeed toward the whole world, is preached, John 3:16, 1 John 2:2. In the SECOND are numbered those statements which openly testify that God wills to make all men saved, 1 Tim. 2:4, Tit. 2:11. To this class should be referred those which are of such a kind as to signify an indefinite proposition, which is accustomed to be said, as which has the same value as universal, such as are: Matt. 18:11, 1 Tim. 1:15. In the THIRD we see those places in which it is plainly written that this benign will of God pertains to individuals, 2 Pet. 3:9, Ezek. 18:32, 33:11. The little word πᾶς (pas / every) obtains the same force: for when that, used in the singular number, is not applied to the human race, but to one man, it cannot but signify each one, or individuals, e.g. Col. 1:28. In the FOURTH stand enunciations by which argumentation concerning the common grace of God equally prepared for all men is made from the common and equal misery of all. That conclusion rests on this principle: Where there is equal reason, there is also equal consequence. But God, led by compassion, willed to procure the recovery of human salvation. Compassion regards nothing except misery. The most miserable natural condition of men is surely the same and equal of all and individuals, without any difference, Rom. 3:23. Therefore divine mercy equally regards all and individual men. Sayings of this kind are chiefly four: Matt. 18:11, Luke 19:10, Rom. 11:32, and most plainly and most openly, Rom. 5:18-19-20, where we see the clearest testimony, that the benevolence of God, by which he has had mercy on men, extends equally as widely in reason of men who have sinned as their calamity; but as much wider with respect to sins, v. 15-16. In the FIFTH are contained those sayings which do not allow us to doubt that the merits of Christ pertain to all mortals, 1 Tim. 2:5-6, and so indeed that among all are specially and chiefly named those trusting in Christ, whose salvation especially is obtained at such great price (namely by reason of acceptance and fruit) 1 Tim. 4:10. The Legate of Christ does not speak of the providence of God and preservation of temporal life, as the adversaries wrongly persuade themselves, thinking that divine providence, both general and special, is signified by these words: Falsely. We affirm indeed that God the Father is sometimes called σωτήρ (soter / savior); e.g. 1 Tim. 2:3-4, Tit. 3:4 compared with v. 6. But we deny that he is so named by reason of providence and preservation. For indeed 1) This name σωτήρ (soter / savior) does not denote preserver, but liberator, who rescues someone from misery. 2) Everywhere this word is referred to that grace which has been excellently declared in Christ, which has consulted for recovering lost salvation, not only temporal, but also eternal, which is excellently called χάρις ἡ σωτήριος (charis he sotarios / saving grace), at Tit. 2:11, 3:4-7. Therefore, wherever the Father is called σωτήρ (soter / savior), by that name is indicated his decree concerning eternal salvation, and all things necessary both for acquiring and applying it, as plainly appears from the places cited, 1 Tim. 2:3-4, Tit. 3:4-6. 3) In this very place, in explaining which we are engaged, there are three arguments, clearer than light. (α) Paul before spoke of eternal life, v. 8. (β) He uses this assertion: πιστὸς ὁ λόγος καὶ πάσης ἀποδοχῆς ἄξιος (pistos ho logos kai pases apodoches axios / faithful is the saying and worthy of all acceptance), v. 9, which manner of speaking is not accustomed to be used of other things than of causes pertaining to eternal salvation, restored by the benefit of Christ, see ch. 1:15, 3:1 compared with the preceding 2:15, 2 Tim. 2:11-12, add v. 10, Tit. 3:7-8. (γ) He discusses that matter on account of which he himself had suffered the gravest vexations, v. 10. But that which brought such great inconveniences to him, which also sustained his spirit with the greatest consolation, was nothing other than saving confidence, placed in Christ as surety and God reconciled, relying on which he himself expected eternal beatitude, 2 Tim. 1:12. The SIXTH kind constitutes words of Scripture whose sense is this: it can happen that those for whose sake Christ underwent death may undergo eternal destruction, Rom. 14:15, 1 Cor. 8:11. In the SEVENTH are those which make us more certain that even damned men are Christ's own, and that they perfidiously deny him, their Lord and Liberator, Matt. 23:37, John 1:11, 2 Pet. 2:1. But the reason of dominion, which is to be ascribed to Christ alone, is contained in the price which he alone paid for all, and therefore by right of purchase he made us bound and devoted to himself, 2 Cor. 5:15, 2 Pet. 2:1. Statements of this kind are to be observed so much more sacredly, the more confidently the adversaries attack us with this opposition: that Christ never called the worst of mortals, adjudicated to damnation, his sheep. It is sufficient that he confessed them to be his own. But the reason why he held them unworthy of the name of his sheep lies in this: that the similitude which is drawn from sheep designates mutual love, both of Christ toward men, and of men in turn toward Christ, to whom those are obedient, John 10:4-5, 12, 14, 26-27. The EIGHTH kind presents for our consideration sayings of this sort, which clearly teach us that the means of applying grace are offered to men contumacious to the very end, and to these indeed no less than to those Doubts against the universality of divine grace can be formed as follows:

I. Those whom God wills to save by the will of good pleasure are saved; But not all who obey the will of God, Acts 17:31 (πᾶσιν [pasin / to all], i.e. to individuals, which is evident from the coherence of words; whomever God is sometime going to judge, to the same he is also prepared to give saving faith), Rom. 10:16, add 18-19, Heb. 4:2 (καθάπερ [kathaper / just as], equally, as to those. Therefore the distinction of calling grace, which the Reformed, and those who stand with the parties of JANSENIUS, have devised, that one is efficacious, another not so, is of no value). We add this argumentation: God in the business of our salvation deals with us in no other way than through certain means (which the Reformed, and Jansenists and Predeterminarians themselves profess). These means of salvation, in reason of men to a single one of all, are either the same or diverse. But no other medium is commended to us than word and Sacraments, but word none other than written, announced congruently to Scripture, and perceived by the ears, Rom. 10:14, 17. Therefore the same means are employed. The word which the elect hear is likewise proposed to be heard by the damned. This word has its own efficacy in itself, namely the power of divine truth, always one and the same, Jer. 23:29, 1 Pet. 1:23 & 25, Heb. 4:12 (whoever dares to deny this, he would need to be imbued with fanatical opinions). Let us complete the argumentation: If the same are the means of salvation, if they are always efficacious per se, if the same is perpetually the power of truth, always of one and the same: it follows that grace itself also is always the same, and efficacious in the same mode, and nothing more is required than attention of mind and right use of means, as far as it pertains to men. From the NINTH kind are those which indicate the severity of punishment, on account of neglect and contempt of grace, ungratefully offered. This is done in five ways: 1) by admonishing each one of mortals about avoiding this supreme injury, 2 Cor. 6:1, Heb. 4:1, 12:15; 2) by reproaching despisers with the injustice of their resistance, Gen. 6:3, Is. 63:10, Luke 7:30, Acts 7:51; 3) by tolerating them with gentleness and indeed slowness, and that indeed most richly, Rom. 2:4, 9:22, and that entirely with this mind, that each one of them might have space for coming to their senses, 2 Pet. 3:9; 4) by denying them every excuse, John 15:22, since God has done nothing remaining which pertained to recalling them from error, Prov. 1:25, Is. 5:4-5; 5) by announcing to them most just punishments, Prov. 1:24, 26, Matt. 11:20ff, 23:37, Luke 13:5-6-7-8, Acts 13:46. The TENTH kind finally contains in its compass those sayings by which our duties toward other men, whatever they are, and even toward the most wicked and obstinate, are made from the saving grace of God and merits of Christ, as moral consequences to be drawn from dogmatic principles. First we argue in this way: As great as are our duties by which we are bound to others, so great cannot but be the amplitude of principles and foundations on which they rest, namely the grace of God and merits of Christ. If those are altogether so great as to pertain to all and individuals; these equally great, it is necessary. 2) Of what kind our duties ought to be, to be performed for others, of such kind also certainly are their foundations and principles, namely the benevolence of God and benefits of Christ; But those always ought to be serious and efficacious; Therefore the offering of saving grace and merits of Christ is always serious and efficacious. With these things premised, I will set forth these three principal ones: 1) prayer for the salvation of all men, 1 Tim. 2:1-2. The foundation of this duty is the grace of God and merit of Christ, v. 4-5. But who, and what kind were those for whose salvation the Apostle demanded prayers to be poured out? Even Kings and Princes, of whom not even one at that time was devoted to Christ. 2) σκάνδαλον (skandalon / stumbling block) to be given to no one, 2 Cor. 6:3, and indeed because God reconciled the whole world to himself, ch. 5:19-20, where both graces are preached, both of acquisition and of application. But those to whom we can harm with σκάνδαλον (skandalon / stumbling block) are not only good men, but also wicked, alien from church society, Rom. 14:15, 1 Cor. 8:11, 13, 10:32 & 33. 3) Love toward enemies, since indeed our obligation to cultivating this virtue arises from the propitious will of God toward any men, and from communion of divine benefits not only in the kingdom of nature, Matt. 5:45ff, but also in the kingdom of grace. So namely Peter, in the prior ep. ch. 1:7, willed common love toward all men, however most hostile to us, no less than special love, by which we are commanded to embrace elect companions of faith, to flow from the source of saving confidence, placed in Christ, v. 2 up to 6 & v. 8.

are saved; Therefore God does not will all to be saved by serious will of good pleasure. The major is proved; because man, being powerless, cannot resist the will of omnipotent God, Rom. 9:19. Response: Those whom God wills to save absolutely through his absolute power are necessarily made safe. The reason; because powerless man cannot impede the will and absolute power of God. But God wills man, fallen into sin, to be saved under a certain τάξει (taxei / order), or order of means through ordained power; to which man resists, neglecting the established order. Therefore it is not permitted to judge concerning the efficacy of the divine will from the outcome. Surely God wills perfect observance of the decalogue, which nevertheless is not provided to him by men.

II. Whoever has mercy on whom he wills to have mercy, and hardens whom he wills to harden, his mercy is not universal, but particular, not conditioned or ordained, but absolute; But God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear per se. The minor is proved from Rom. 9:18. Response: a) The Apostle does not speak there of general or universal mercy of God, but special, by which he justifies believers in Christ, as is seen from v. 30, and therefore he does not deal with the antecedent will of God, but consequent. b) The mercy of God is indeed free, but not absolute. It is free from the necessity of obligation, both because no right obliges God to commiseration of the fallen human race; and because the economy of salvation, to be obtained through faith in Christ, depends on the most free will of God; which however is most conformable to equity and justice. c) God hardens whom he wills, not effectively by sending hardness, but judicially, because God in punishment of preceding sins permits the wicked to be hardened, withdraws grace so often repudiated, abandons the refractory sinner, and hands him over to Satan and his own desires.

III. Whoever loved Jacob and pursued Esau with hatred, before they had done anything good or evil, he does not will the salvation of all men; But God, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because whom God hates without regard to sin, he absolutely reprobates from eternal salvation. The minor is evident from Rom. 9:11-12-13: "When the children were not yet born, nor had done anything good or evil, that what is according to God's election might remain; not from works but from him who calls, it was said to her; because the greater will serve the lesser.

As it is written: Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated." Response: Both the literal sense and typical accommodation of this apostolic oracle must be weighed. (I) For rightly understanding the literal sense it will help much to compare the sayings of the O.T. which the Apostle regards. When v. 12 he says: "The greater will serve the lesser," he regards Gen. 25:23: "Jehovah said: Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples will be separated from your bowels; but people will prevail over people; and the greater will serve the lesser." From which words it is evident that the Apostle speaks 1) not of the individual persons of Esau and Jacob, but of whole nations arising from them, which insofar as they were then considered to be in their loins, are said to be in Rebecca's womb; and dominion is promised to the lesser people, or who was going to derive origin from Jacob, Rebecca's son born lesser, over the greater people to be procreated from the blood of Esau, Rebecca's son born greater and firstborn. This the outcome itself also proved; since Esau never served Jacob, but rather Jacob venerated Esau with singular submission, see Gen. 33:3; but the Idumeans, referring their origin to Esau, served the Jews, posterity of Jacob; for David had reduced them to servitude, 2 Sam. 8:14. Therefore God preferred the posterity of Jacob to the posterity of Esau in conferring temporal benefits. This the Apostle further confirms from Mal. 1:2-3: "I loved Jacob, but Esau I hated." Where 2) the discourse is not of positive hatred, by which someone is despised, rejected and opposed, but comparative, by which someone is loved less. For the word "hatred," in the style familiar to Scripture, sometimes denotes postponement or lesser love, as Gen. 29:30-31, Deut. 21:15, Luke 14:16 compared with Matt. 10:37, John 12:35. Certainly Esau was not simply rejected by God with positive hatred, since it is established that he was not left destitute of all blessing. For by faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning future things, as the Apostle says, Heb. 11:20. Concerning which see Gen. 27:39-40-41. 3) The love of God is one thing saving, by which eternal salvation is conferred; another thing generally called beneficent, by which temporal benefits are conferred. When God says: "I loved Jacob, but Esau I hated," the discourse is not of God's saving love, as if all the posterity of Jacob were elected to eternal life, on the contrary, all the posterity of Esau eternally reprobated; but of beneficent love, so that the sense is: I loved Jacob more, by conferring on him and his posterity greater benefits, and by granting to him possession of the land of Canaan, flowing with milk and honey, along with the prerogative of dominion; but I loved Esau and his posterity less, to whom only the deserts of Seir fall for habitation; who also at the appointed time will serve the posterity of Jacob. Indeed the Lord also adds, Mal. 1:3: "I made his mountains a desolation, and his inheritance for the dragons of the desert," i.e. the mountainous region of the Idumeans will remain devastated by Nebuchadnezzar, leading the inhabitants into captivity; but it will be given by my benefit to the posterity of Jacob to return to the land of Canaan and enjoy the supreme fertility of the region. (II.) Now follows the typical accommodation. Just as God preferred the posterity of Jacob to the posterity of Esau in temporal benefits, giving to the posterity of Jacob dominion over the posterity of Esau, and that neither in view of the condition of birth, nor in view of good works done by them, so that the purpose of God, which is according to election (the Apostle understands election to the prerogative of empire), might remain firm not from works, but from him who calls (the caller is God, who was calling Jacob to the prerogative of dominion through his decree and promise); So in spiritual benefits God, according to his good pleasure, prefers gentiles to Jews, giving to gentiles, embracing Christ by faith, not to Jews, most averse to faith in Christ, the righteousness of Christ, having no regard to birth and carnal origin, or works of the law. For this alone the Apostle intends throughout chapter IX to the Romans, to defend and against contradictors defend this doctrine, that the gentiles have obtained righteousness, not pursuing righteousness from works; but the Jews have not obtained righteousness, pursuing it from works of the law. See v. 30-31. Whence it follows that the gentiles are ascribed to God's peculiar people, whom he justifies from grace on account of Christ, apprehended by true faith; but the Jews are rejected from the fellowship of the church and prerogatives in which they formerly rejoiced. See v. 4-5.

You say: Esau in Heb. 12:17 is called profane and reprobate, who found no place of repentance, although he sought it with tears. Therefore God pursued Esau not only with comparative hatred, but also positive, or hatred of enmity. Response: 1) Esau is called profane on account of contempt and sale of the birthright. 2) The same is said to be reprobated not from eternal salvation, but from privileges and temporal benefits which the right of birthright accompanies; such as are priesthood and kingdom, as well as the promise concerning Christ, to be born from the seed of him who was going to have the right of birthright among the patriarchs. 3) The Apostle does not speak of Esau's repentance, but of his father Isaac. For Esau hoped he could move his father Isaac by his tears so that he might repent of the blessing conferred on Jacob, but he could by no means obtain this from his father. Blessed LUTHER conjectures in his Commentary on Gen. ch. 25 & 33; that Esau repented and was saved through faith in the Messiah. For he returned to grace with his brother Jacob, returning from Mesopotamia, Gen. 33, by whom he was undoubtedly admonished fraternally about cultivating piety, especially concerning the burial of their parent, Gen. 25:29. 4) Grant that Esau was eternally reprobated, yet he was not rejected by absolute hatred without regard to unbelief.

IV. In which men God willed to show wrath, he does not will to have mercy on them. But God willed to show his wrath in certain men, Rom. 9:21. Therefore. Response: God willed to show wrath and make known his power in certain men by consequent will and secondary intention, on account of malicious rejection of offered means of grace; which vessels of wrath prepared for destruction by their own malice God endured for a long time with much gentleness by primary intention, to invite them to repentance, Rom. 2:4.

V. God makes vessels of wrath from some men, Rom. 9:22. Therefore he does not will the salvation of all. Response: The words of the Apostle are: "What if, when God wills to demonstrate wrath and make known his power, he endured with much longsuffering vessels of wrath, prepared for destruction, and that he might make known the riches of his glory on vessels of mercy, which he prepared for glory." From which words it is clear that God indeed prepared vessels of mercy for glory; but vessels of wrath are not said to be prepared by God, but endured by God with much longsuffering. Therefore hardened men were made vessels of wrath, prepared for destruction, not by God, but by themselves, and by their own malice and voluntary perversity; because they spurn the counsel of God against themselves, Luke 7:30.

Instance; God is compared with a potter, who has absolute power to make from the same mass vessels, one indeed for honor, another for dishonor, Rom. 9:21. Therefore God by absolute power created some men for eternal glory, some for eternal ignominy. Response; 1) A simile is not to be extended beyond the scope of the author. The Apostle had said v. 18: "God has mercy on whom he wills; and whom he wills, he hardens." Some antagonist could object: "Why does he still find fault? For who has resisted his will?" Although the Apostle could have dissolved this objection by direct response and said that God in the business of justification does not act by absolute power, to which no one can resist, but ordained, through certain means of converting and justifying men, which ordinary means many rebel; yet it pleased Paul to respond α) indirectly, by rebuke, restraining the audacity of men speaking against God: "But indeed, O man, who are you who answer back to God? Will the thing formed say to him who formed it: Why did you make me thus?" as if to say: Is it right for the creature to expostulate with the creator and exact reasons for his deeds from him? β) He responds directly, partly by showing that God has free power to harden certain men, partly by teaching that God has cause for justly accusing the hardened. He shows God's power by comparing him v. 21 with a potter: "For if indeed the potter has power over clay, to make from the same mass vessels, one indeed for honor, another for dishonor; why should not God have the freest power from the fallen human race to justify some indeed, who submitting themselves to the divine will and order believe in Christ, or pronounce them to be vessels prepared for the glory of divine grace; but others, who pertinaciously resisting the divine will and order do not believe, to harden and declare them to be vessels prepared for dishonor by their own malice?" Observe that the potter is compared with God in reason of free power; he differs from him in that a) the potter uses absolute power, God in the business of salvation uses ordained power; b) that the potter effectively and by positive influx fashions a vessel for dishonor, but God hardens judicially, by permitting hardening, by abandoning the stubbornly contumacious, and by declaring the hardened to be vessels of wrath, made for ignominy by their own fault. Furthermore the Apostle teaches that God has cause for justly accusing the hardened, v. 22, in that he endures vessels of wrath, prepared for destruction, with much long-suffering; by this benign toleration about to invite hardened sinners to repentance, Rom. 2:4, 2 Pet. 3:9. Therefore God accuses hardened sinners of persevering disobedience, by which they have merited eternal punishments, by most just right.

VI. Whoever wills the salvation of all and individual men, he also wills the salvation of men actually damned; God does not will the salvation of men actually damned; Therefore he does not will the salvation of all and individual men. The major is evident; because under all and individual men the damned are also comprehended. Response; God wills the salvation of all men, namely capable of salvation, who constituted in the way can be converted. Those actually damned have already received the final sentence, and therefore are not capable of salvation.

VII. If God wills to save all men, he wills the salvation of all men either absolutely or conditionally. If he wills the salvation of all men absolutely, all are saved; because an absolute effect depends on the absolute will of God. If conditionally; God either only exacts that condition, or wills to effect it. If he only exacts that condition; it will be impossible for man, laboring under defect of free will in spiritual matters. If he wills to effect it; he effects it either absolutely or conditionally. If absolutely; all will believe and be saved. If conditionally; the question will return, and either there will be a process into infinity, in conditions of conditions, or finally he willed the ultimate condition absolutely, which being posited all the antecedents also must be posited necessarily, because all depend on each other. Response; God wills to save all conditionally, under the condition of faith; which condition God not only exacts, but also wills to effect the same not absolutely, but under another condition; if they do not resist the Holy Spirit voluntarily (voluntary resistance is said, or free, in opposition to natural). Moreover God wills this other condition also, namely; that they not resist the Holy Spirit voluntarily; but not likewise conditionally, as the former, but absolutely and without condition; and therefore we must stop here, nor is there a process into infinity in conditions of conditions. Nor is there a simply necessary connection between those conditions, so that one being posited, it is necessary for the other to be posited. For indeed with means of grace for effecting repentance or faith being posited, it is not simply necessary that repentance and faith be posited, since the word of God is often preached even to those who do not repent and believe.

Question VIII. Of what kind is the mercy and benevolence of God toward sinners?

The quality of divine benevolence. The mercy of God toward miserable sinners is a) gratuitous and liberal b), sincere and serious c), efficacious d), equal e), not absolute, but tempered by justice f), ordained g), and conditional.

Proof a. On those whom God has concluded under sin and unbelief, He has mercy, Gal. III, 22; Rom. XI, 32. Therefore, His mercy is provoked by no merits. The misery of the sinner does not move God causally, but only provides the occasion, and presents to God a miserable object, toward which He ought not, but can, exercise His φιλανθρωπίαν (philanthrōpian). For in man there is absolutely no impelling cause. See, if you please, D. HULSEMANN'S breviar. enucl. p. 351. Just as, therefore, the mercy of God toward miserable men is gratuitous, so it is also liberal, because with Christ He gives us all things that are necessary for salvation. Paul asserts this liberality of divine mercy, Rom. VIII, 32; "He who did not spare his own Son but gave him up for us all, how will he not also with him graciously give us all things?"

Proof b. The benevolence of God toward the human race, fallen into sin, is not feigned or painted, but serious and sincere; because in the procurement of human salvation, the will of the sign with the will of the divine good pleasure, the precept and the promise with the divine intention, conspire most amicably. He acts the hypocrite who utters one thing with his mouth and another in his heart; which it is a crime to think of God. Indeed, a lucid testimony of the most sincere divine will concerning the blessing of miserable sinners is the oath of God, Ezek. XXXIII, 11; "As I live, declares the Lord GOD, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live." Therefore, God swears, so that if we do not believe God when He promises, we may at least believe Him when He swears for our salvation, says HIERONYMUS tom. II. epist. XLVI.

Proof c. The universal benevolence of God is not an empty wish, not a sterile velleity, not an idle complacency, by which someone does not desire to effect or obtain a thing which pleases him and which he loves in itself, and so does not want to use the means leading to this end; but it is an efficacious will, by which God seriously intends also to effect and to obtain through sufficient and efficacious means the salvation of men, which He most ardently loves. Paul commends this efficacious grace of God, Rom. II, 4; "Or do you despise the riches of God's kindness? Do you not know that God's kindness is meant to lead you to repentance?" Thence an argument is born: Whatever kindness is so copious as to lead a sinner, turned away from God, to repentance, is not an idle complacency, but an efficacious intention of leading the sinner back to the way of salvation; But the divine kindness, etc.; Therefore.

Proof d. Just as in Adam all were created in the image of God, and in him all have sinned, so also the condition and misery of all men in the eternal foreknowledge of God was entirely the same; and therefore, He has embraced all men as sinners, as His equally miserable creatures, with an equal benevolence and equal mercy. Paul teaches this in Romans 3:22-23; "There is no distinction, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." However, we readily grant that the accidental degrees of manifesting this grace are different, about which we will speak below.

Proof e. Although the first compassion of God, by which He pitied the human race fallen into sin, as well as the ordaining of a mediator and the procuring of the means of salvation, is absolute, yet the merciful will of God to confer upon miserable men the remission of sins and eternal salvation is not absolute, but respective and tempered with justice. For it respects the satisfaction of Christ, by which divine justice was satisfied. See above, question 6, proof c.

Proof f. The salvific benevolence of God is ordinate, for the reason that God, by His most high counsel, established a certain τάξιν (order) or arrangement of means, which He respects in blessing sinners. Those means are the word of God and the sacraments, by which God seriously intends to call sinners to the kingdom of grace, to convert, regenerate, justify, and save them. By this ordinate will, God wills not only that all men be saved, but also that all men come to the knowledge of the truth. 1 Timothy 2:4.

Proof g. The divine will of conferring salvation upon sinners is also called conditioned, because it belongs to the antecedent will, if they believe; to the consequent will, who believe. It is called a conditioned will from the condition that follows the antecedent will and precedes the consequent will, according to the judgment of DANNHAVER, in Hodosophia Phanomenon VIII, p. 539. It is called conditioned not as if God only wills the end and not the means, or wills the end under a condition that He Himself, by mere good pleasure, does not will to be fulfilled for many; but inasmuch as God, willing men to be saved, does not will them to be saved without satisfaction or any condition to be fulfilled, but to be led to salvation under the condition of certain means.

Question IX. Does God will to give salvific faith to all men?

God wills to confer salvific faith upon all men through ordinary means. Proof 1) From the clear assertion of St. Paul, Acts 17:31: "God has appointed a day on which he will judge the world in righteousness by the man whom he has destined, offering faith to all." The phrase τὸ παρέχειν πίστιν (to offer faith) denotes both the offering of the powers to believe and the conferral of faith itself, provided that the means of regeneration are not maliciously rejected. For τὸ παρέχειν (to offer/provide) generally signifies not only some external offering, but also a real conferral. Thus God is said παρέχειν πάντα πλουσίως (to give all things abundantly), 1 Timothy 6:17. Compare Luke 18:5, Acts 22:2. We argue: Whoever offers faith to all men to be presented before the tribunal of Christ, wills to confer faith upon all men. But God does, etc. Therefore.

2. From the indivisible connection of obtaining the end and the means by which the end is attained. Thus Paul connects the divine will of saving all men and of conferring salvific faith on all. "God wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth," 1 Timothy 2:4. He who wills all men to come to the knowledge of the truth, so that they may be saved, wills to gift all men with salvific faith. But God does, etc. E. The major is proven; because the knowledge of the truth is faith, and this is the gift of God, Ephesians 2:8.

3. From God's intention to convert all sinners. "God does not will that any should perish, but that all should be converted to repentance," 2 Peter 3:9. He who wills all to return to repentance, wills to grant faith to all, which is the principal part of repentance.

4. From the satisfaction of Christ, applicable to all. To whichever men God has destined Christ as mediator, to them He wills to impart faith. But to all men, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because by destining a mediator, God willed that men, having fallen into sin, should apprehend His satisfaction and merit by true faith and apply it to themselves for salvation. Since, however, sinners are destitute of the natural powers to believe, without a doubt God will give faith by grace to those to whom He gave the mediator, so that they may be able to apply His merit to themselves. Paul teaches this, Romans 8:32: "God did not spare his own son, but delivered him up for us all; how will he not also with him χαρίσεται (graciously give) us all things?" With these words the apostle indicates that Christ was both delivered to death for us all and given to us all. From which he further concludes that God, just as He will give all things necessary for salvation, will also give salvific faith to all men for apprehending Christ, the greatest gift.

5. To whom, by the divine will, the gospel is to be preached and the sacraments are to be dispensed, to them God seriously intends to confer salvific faith. But to all men, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the word of God is ῥῆμα τῆς πίστεως (the word of faith), Romans 10:8, and the seed of regeneration, 1 Peter 1:23. Likewise, baptism is the washing of regeneration and renewal, Titus 3:5. The minor is evident from Mark 14:15, Matthew 28:19.

The following objections seem to oppose our assertion.

I. To whomever God, with an efficacious will, wills to give faith, they believe. But not all men believe. Therefore, God, with an efficacious will, does not will to give faith to all. Response. To whom God wills to give faith by an absolute will, through an absolute and irresistible power, they necessarily believe; I grant this. But God wills to gift men with faith through an ordinate power and the ordinary means of grace instituted by Himself, which many reject or stubbornly resist.

II. If many men do not believe because they reject the means of grace or resist them, faith will depend on the free will of man. The consequent is false, because faith is the gift of God. Therefore. The consequence of the major is manifest, because men can reject the means of grace at their own discretion. Response. The defect or lack of faith is one thing, faith itself is another. The defect of faith is remotely from the defect of the powers of free will in spiritual matters, proximately from the malicious resistance of man, which, besides daily experience, the Holy Scripture teaches, Acts 7:51, Matthew 23:37, and elsewhere throughout. Faith itself, however, is the gift of God and efficiently depends entirely on God, and in no way on the natural powers of man. However, the production of faith presupposes the external use of the means of grace, which pertains to pedagogical actions, concerning which man after the fall has some powers of free will, although they are weak.

III. Whoever believes because they externally use the ordinary means for kindling faith, they cooperate efficiently with their own powers for the production of their faith. But an unregenerate man does not cooperate efficiently for the production of his faith. Therefore, unregenerate men do not believe because they externally use the ordinary means for kindling faith. The major is proven; because in this way the external use of the means, which is in man's power, is held to be a cause of generating faith. Response. The external use of the means of grace is not an efficient cause of faith, but only a condition, presupposed on the part of the subject to be converted, which influences the production of faith no more efficiently than he who places water on a fire to be heated influences the heating, or he who removes the shutters to illuminate a room influences the illumination. Nor is that external use a condition that always has a salutary event, since even reprobate men hear the word of God, who nevertheless impede its force and efficacy with the thorns of the pleasures and cares of this world, or, being offended by persecutions, fall away, and prefer the glory of this world to heavenly things. See the parable of Christ about the fourfold part of the field, Matthew 13:4ff., and compare with D. HÜLSEMAN's Breviarium enucleatum, p. 335.

IV. If men do not believe because they resist the Holy Spirit who is about to kindle faith, no unregenerate men can be gifted with faith. The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven from Romans 8:7: "The mind of the flesh is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can it be." But in all unregenerate men there is the mind of the flesh. Response. A distinction is made between natural and malicious resistance. The Holy Spirit breaks and restrains the former through prevenient grace; the latter is lesser in some men, and greater and more ferocious in others, which often prevents true faith from being kindled in the heart of an unregenerate man.

Objection I. All resistance that opposes the means of grace is malicious. Response. Malicious resistance is used here in a special sense, that which proceeds from spontaneously contracted malice, whereas natural resistance flows from the connate corruption of nature itself.

Objection II. Although malicious resistance is in the power of man, non-malicious resistance is nevertheless due to divine grace. Response. Just as malicious resistance opposes either the external use of the means or the internal grace of conversion, so also non-malicious resistance denotes either the negation of resistance opposed to the external use of the means, or the negation of the same opposed to the internal grace of conversion. The former is subject to the powers of the will, the latter is due to divine grace, which takes away the heart of stone. Compare D. MUSAEUS in his dissertation De aeterno electionis decreto §. 281.

Objection III. God by His omnipotence can remove all malicious resistance; since He does not do so, He Himself is the cause that many persevere in unbelief and do not cease to oppose the Holy Spirit. Response. If God wished to kindle faith by an absolute and irresistible power, He could certainly remove all contumacy. But since it has pleased Him to deal with us as with men, not as with brutes or stones, He has therefore ordained means through which He wills to work faith in the hearts of men. Whoever neglects these is not converted, nor is he imbued with true faith. Yet the blame is not therefore to be attributed to the most holy God, that men remain devoid of faith because He does not remove the malicious resistance which is an impediment to the generation of faith; for the reason that he who can remove an impediment and does not remove it, is not immediately the cause of the impeded effect, but he is to be considered the cause only then, if he is also bound to prevent or to remove the impediment. But by what right is God held obliged to take away malicious resistance from those who obstinately resist the means of grace, or to infuse faith into those who morosely resist?

V. True faith in Christ seems to be so proper to the elect alone that God, by mere good pleasure, does not will to confer faith upon the reprobate. "As many as were ordained to eternal life believed," Acts 13:48. Response. The believers in that passage are not called προωρισμένοι (predestined), nor προτεταγμένοι (preordained), but τεταγμένοι (ordained). This word indicates a divine order, because God does not act by absolute grace in the business of salvation, but has prescribed a certain τάξις (order) of means. Those who do not exclude but admit this order—namely by hearing the word, not closing their ears and hearts to it, not resisting the Holy Spirit who wills to operate through it—they are the τεταγμένοι (ordained). Nor indeed do we assert that they are τεταγμένοι (ordained) by themselves, but rather this is fitting for divine grace operating through the word, by which alone we are rendered τεταγμένοι καὶ ἔυθετοι εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ (ordained and fit for the kingdom of God), as Luke says in chapter 9:62, as long as we leave a place for it and do not repudiate but observe the τάξις (order) of the divine means, which pertains to pedagogical acts and is thus not denied to be in our powers. And so the τεταγμένοι (ordained) are distinguished from the ἀτάκτοις (disorderly) or refractory, who reject the word of God and judge themselves unworthy of eternal life. Acts 13:46.

Objection: Christ says plainly: "You do not believe, because you are not of my sheep," John 10:26. Therefore, non-election, or reprobation, is the cause of unbelief, not the latter of the former. Response: The particle ὅτι (because) here is not αἰτιολογική (causal), but συλλογιστική (syllogistic) or ratiocinative, by which the antecedent is inferred from the consequent, through an a posteriori demonstration. For in the order of nature, it is prior that we conceive faith from hearing the voice of the shepherd Christ, than that we are spiritual sheep, since we, who are wolves by nature, only become tame by hearing the voice of the shepherd and are, as it were, transformed into the sheep of Christ.

VI. He who willed to hide the mysteries of faith and salvation from the wise of this world, does not will to give faith efficaciously to each individual to whom the word is preached. But God etc. Therefore. The major is evident, because the light of faith cannot be kindled in those from whom the mysteries of faith and salvation remain hidden. The minor is proven from Matthew 11:25: "I thank you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that you have hidden these things from the wise and understanding and revealed them to little children; yes, Father, for such was your gracious will." Response. The sermon of Christ in that passage is about ministerial gifts, conferred by the heavenly Father upon his disciples, but denied to the scribes and Pharisees, not about the hiding of the mysteries of faith necessary to be known for salvation. For that for which Christ gave thanks to the heavenly Father, and which he attributed to the Father's εὐδοκίαν (good pleasure), was not that He does not will to work faith in all through His grace, but that He employed νηπίους (infants), that is, simple, unlearned, and lowly men, for the arduous task of teaching, and revealed to them what was necessary for them to carry out the office of teaching; and on the contrary, He hid those things from the wise and understanding, that is, from the scribes and Pharisees, who, puffed up with wisdom, wanted to be the teachers of others. For Christ had first sent the twelve disciples, unlearned fishermen and common men, to whom He had added another seventy disciples, likewise ignorant of letters, who, when they had returned, said with joy, "Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name," Luke 10:21. At that very hour Christ rejoiced in the Spirit and said, "I thank you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that you have hidden such things from the wise and understanding and revealed them to little children. Yes, Father, for such was your gracious will." This good pleasure of God the Father is not absolute, but respective; for the heavenly Father had respect to the pride of the Pharisees, who rejected the counsel of God against themselves, Luke 7:30.

Question X. What salutary use does the doctrine of the universal grace of God confer upon us?

Practical use. The doctrine of the universal benevolence of God most effectively raises up and consoles the sinner tempted concerning his own election and salvation a), and it moves us to give immortal thanks to our propitious God, because He deigned to embrace us, most miserable sinners, with His mercy b).

Proof a. The sinner, terrified by the magnitude of his own crimes, can salutarly apply to himself the universal promise of divine grace and lift up his soul struggling with desperation, by concluding in the following manner: God wills to embrace all sinners with His grace, He wills all to be saved. Therefore, He also deigns to show His mercy to me, a miserable man, He also wills me to be saved. From this he further concludes: If God wills me to be saved by unmerited grace, I will not lose heart, but I will place a strong trust in His mercy. If grace were particular, the sinner could not conclude thus, since it does not follow: God wills some to be saved; therefore, He also wills me to be saved.

Proof b. We celebrate the universal grace of God with the sacred psalmist, from Psalm 57:10-11: "I will give thanks to you, O Lord, among the peoples; I will sing praises to you among the nations. For your mercy is great, up to the heavens, and your truth, up to the skies." The heaven extends most widely and with its circuit surrounds all men; the mercy of God extends more widely and comprehends all sinners. This they justly and deservedly acknowledge with a grateful heart and fully praise with their mouth God who forgives all iniquity, Psalm 103:3.

Question XI. How are those to be treated who abuse the amplitude of divine grace for carnal security?

It must be seriously impressed upon them that the universal grace of God invites us not to the licentiousness or security of the flesh, but to repentance a); and that God is not only a merciful father, but also a just avenger of wicked deeds b).

Proof a. St. Paul gravely says: "Or do you despise the riches of his goodness, forbearance, and patience? Do you not know that God's kindness is meant to lead you to repentance? But because of your hard and impenitent heart you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and of God's righteous judgment," Romans 2:4-5. And Titus 2:11: "For the grace of God has appeared, bringing salvation for all people, training us to renounce ungodliness and worldly passions, and to live sober, upright, and godly lives in the present age."

Proof b. "Do not say, 'God's mercy is great, he will forgive the multitude of my sins'; for mercy and wrath are with him, and his fury rests on sinners," says Sirach, chapter 5:6.

SUSPIRIUM

This one thing supports and consoles my ailing soul, struggling with various temptations concerning my election and salvation: that Your grace,  most MERCIFUL FATHER, extends even to the greatest and foulest sinners, for whom Your SON, the universal redeemer of the human race, did not hesitate to pour out His most precious blood and to undergo a most bitter death. I do not draw a veil over my crimes; I do not deny that they are both very many in number and most heavy in weight. But if You should wish to deal with me according to the rigor of justice, it is all over for my salvation. But I, as a suppliant, implore Your clemency,  my GOD, and I ask for pardon of my crimes, for the sake of the wounds of CHRIST. Do not withdraw Your grace from me,  most gentle FATHER; may the bowels of Your mercy be open, I pray, to me, who detest my sins. With the cords of Your kindness and love, draw me to sincere repentance; make me a possessor and tenacious holder of true and living faith. As long as this spirit remains in me, I will both esteem most highly and most joyfully proclaim the inexhaustible riches of Your goodness.

CHAPTER II.
ON THE
SPECIAL BENEVOLENCE OF GOD AND THE PREDESTINATION OF THOSE WHO FINALLY BELIEVE UNTO ETERNAL LIFE.

Question I. What is predestination?

REDESTINATION IS THE eternal decree of God concerning the conferral of eternal salvation upon all and single men whom God foresaw would finally believe in Christ. It is more fully defined: Predestination is an act of the consequent divine will, by which God, moved by gratuitous mercy, on account of the merit of Christ to be apprehended by persevering faith, from the fallen human race separated out and ordained to the attainment of eternal salvation, unto the praise of His glorious grace, those and only those individual men whom He foresaw would finally believe in Christ.

Observation I. The decree of God is generally defined as an act of the divine will, by which, with most wise counsel and most free authority, He has determined concerning those things that happen, or ought to happen, for His glory. See D. CALOV, in Systema, vol. III, p. 885. Therefore, it is the same whether predestination is described by the decree of God or by an act of the divine will. Moreover, this is an act of the consequent divine will, because it follows upon faith foreseen in man, as being prior in order, according to our way of conceiving. From this it follows that predestination, just like the consequent will itself, is not universal with respect to its object, but particular.

Observation II. Predestination, derived from the word praedestino, is called, as it were, a certain prior destination, because it is an eternal destination that precedes all time. The Greeks call it προορισμός, from προορίζειν, which signifies to ordain and establish both the end and the means leading to the end; for ὅρος denotes the end and limit. Ὅριζεν, however, is often the same as to decree, to determine in the mind, and to ordain. Therefore, predestination is an act by which something is pre-decreed or pre-ordained. The particle prae (before) in the word praedestinatio denotes the priority of time that intervenes between the decree of predestination and the men who are said to be predestined. And so προορισμός, or divine predestination, is the destination of men to obtain eternal salvation through divinely ordained means, before they themselves existed.

Question II. By what other names is predestination called?

Synonyms of predestination. Predestination is also called election; these two words agree materially and with respect to the subject a), but they differ in their mode of signifying, or with respect to the formal signification of predestination b). It is also called inscription in the book of life, which is said of God ἀνθρωποπαθῶς (in a human manner), but is to be understood θεοπρεπῶς (in a manner befitting God), in a more eminent way, suitable for the omniscient God c).

Proof a. Predestination and election agree with respect to the subject, in that there is no one predestined to eternal salvation who is not elected to it, nor anyone elected who is not predestined.

Proof b. Predestination and election differ with respect to their formal signification. Election in its formal concept refers to the objects to be chosen, whereas predestination refers to the end and the order of the means that lead to the end of election, that is, eternal life. For the particle prae in the word praedestinatio denotes the priority and eternity of the divine ordination; but the particle e in the word electionis connotes the common mass of men from which the separation of certain men is made, and so divine election is the segregation of certain men from the common mass of corruption and their adoption into the inheritance of eternal salvation (*).

Observe, furthermore, that προορισμός, or predestination, taken most strictly, (**)

1) presupposes πρόγνωσιν (foreknowledge) of certain persons who finally believe, Romans 8:29. "Whom he foreknew, he also predestined"; 2) it formally denotes the ordination to eternal life of those men who, according to divine foreknowledge, accept and constantly observe the means of grace, Acts 13:48. Election, however, 1) presupposes the love of God, Ephesians 1:6. 2) it formally denotes the segregation from the common mass of perdition of those men whom He foresaw would perseveringly believe in Christ. "You are not of the world, but I have

(*) But beware of the false distinction that the followers of SOCINUS invent, when they distinguish in such a way as to say that predestination is an eternal decree of God, but only a general one, by which God willed to gift with blessedness all who would at some time truly and constantly believe; while election, they say, is a particular destination made in time of each individual man, whom God only now sees dying and persevering in unfeigned trust. The principle of this error is that they deny to God the eternal foreknowledge of future contingent events. Paul expressly professes concerning individual men, "whom he foreknew," Romans 8:29. Compare with John 6:64. Therefore, election itself is said to have been made πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου (before the foundation of the world), Ephesians 1:4.

(**) Namely, this name is usually employed 1) either generally, concerning the eternal salvation of all capable of it, whether they be men or angels, who indeed, never going to sin, needed no Sponsor and Reconciler, just as Paul himself said, ἐκλεκτοὺς ἀγγέλους (elect angels), 1 Timothy 5:21; or specifically, concerning the salvation of men, procured by the merits of Christ and rightly applied, which signification is entirely that of this passage. 2) Now, in this more special notion, this word is used broadly, concerning all the decrees of God pertaining to the whole business of human salvation to be recovered through Christ, and its acquisition as well as its application and acceptance; and strictly, concerning that decree which pertains to the few elect to be imparted with eternal salvation, which latter signification has always been more usual and is still perpetual today. And so, in the broader scope of the name, eight acts of the divine will are comprehended, which the declaration of the Formula of Concord presents to us enumerated in their proper order, art. XI, p. 802. About this, indeed, the blessed author himself will explain more fully hereafter, in question... But I think that question should have been placed before this one; for before we explain the synonyms, it is necessary that we survey the various significations of the name, and define which is of this passage, removing all ambiguity. which is seen especially by the Apostle in 2 Timothy 2:19, is clear from all the circumstances, and so it is called the book of life, because those who are to live eternally by a certain divine lot are recorded in it, as in a catalog of the living, whose names are written in heaven, Luke 10:20. Moreover, since what is understood here is not natural life, but spiritual, and that is twofold, of grace and of glory, therefore some authors distinguish the book of life into the book of grace and of glory. In the book of grace are inscribed all the faithful; in the book of glory, all those who persevere in faith, and thus are certainly to be saved. Concerning which distinction, the judgment of D. BAYER in his Compendium Theologiae, p. 673, deserves to be noted: "The inscription in the book of life is twofold, insofar as men are inscribed by God either precisely in the number of the faithful, or in the number of those who are certainly to be saved. The former coincides with the decree concerning the regeneration, justification, and adoption of men as sons; the latter coincides with the act of election or predestination. Although it must be confessed that when the term 'inscription in the book of life' is used absolutely, not so much the former as the latter act is understood."

chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hates you," John 15:19.

Proof c. Paul makes mention of the book of life, Philippians 4:3, "Whose names are in the book of life," and John, Revelation 3:5, "He who overcomes will be clothed in white garments, and I will not blot his name out of the book of life." It is also called the Lamb's book of life, Revelation 13:8. Inscription in the book of life is mentioned in Revelation 17:8 and 22:19. To be sure, by ἀνθρωποπάθεια (speaking in a human way) and a certain συγκατάβασις (condescension), according to the likeness of human acts by which the names of certain persons are inscribed in a catalog of citizens, family members, or soldiers; so God has inserted into the catalog of those to be saved those whom, out of mere grace, on account of the merit of Christ to be apprehended by persevering faith, and thus foreseen, He chose before the foundations of the world were laid. For just as the book, attributed to God in general, denotes God's foreknowledge and providence, by which He knows, disposes, and governs the origin, life, actions, and end of life of all men, so the book of life in particular is nothing other than the singular knowledge of those to be saved and, according to their πρόγνωσιν (foreknowledge), their election, 2 Timothy 2:19. This book of life is compared by D. DANNAVER in Hodosophia Phenomenon, p. 542, with a testamentary book, and it is explained by the same that it is the certain, accurate, and living knowledge of God of His own; that is, the knowledge (a) προγνωστική (prognostic), the science of vision, by which God from all eternity saw as in a mirror who from the corrupt mass would be His, and who the devil's; and this is 1) eternal, Ephesians 1:4; 2) intimate and καρδιογνωστική (heart-knowing); for the judgment of who are true and living members of the church can be none other than from the internal renewal of the heart. Now this knowledge belongs to God alone; 3) Most singular, namely a knowledge κατ' ὄνομα (by name), John 10:3, Exodus 33:17, Isaiah 43:2; 4) Infallible and immutable. And because words of knowledge connote affection, therefore it is 5) loving. "He who loves God is known by him," and therefore rejoices in His reciprocal love, 1 Corinthians 8:3. And that love expresses itself in six hundred other ways, but especially in friendly remembrance, paternal compassion, gracious approval, and finally, salvation. For just as He will one day say to the reprobate, "I never knew you," so to the elect, "I have known you," and at the same time He will lead them triumphant into glory. (b) προοριστική (predestining), elective. For from accurate foreknowledge, love, and special care flows a certain election and segregation;

Question III. In how many ways is the word 'election' taken?

The word 'election' is taken a) generally for a temporal election to the church and to some office to be performed in it; b) specifically for the eternal election to glory and eternal life. It is in this latter signification that it is taken here.

Proof a. Moses speaks of the temporal election, which is made through a calling to the church, in Deuteronomy 7:6: "The Lord your God has chosen you to be a people for his treasured possession." The treasured people of God is the assembly of men, called by God and segregated from the infidels, to whom He has communicated the means of grace and salvation for obtaining righteousness and eternal life; this treasured people of God is commonly called the church. Hence it is that those who perform a public function in the church are called elect in a special way. Thus Christ addresses his disciples: "Did I not choose you, the twelve?" John 6:70, where the Savior's speech is about the election to the apostolate.

Proof b. The Apostle deals with eternal election in Ephesians 1:4: "He chose us in Christ before the foundations of the world were laid," i.e., from eternity. From which we gather that the Apostle here indicates the eternal decree of God concerning the imparting of eternal salvation to those who will finally believe; concerning which eternal decree of election St. Paul also deals in 2 Thessalonians 2:13: "But we ought always to give thanks to God for you, brothers beloved by the Lord, because God chose you from the beginning for salvation through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth." That the Apostle is speaking here of the election to eternal salvation is clear from the fact that 1) he asserts that God chose us "from the beginning," i.e., from eternity, as this manner of speaking is used in 1 John 2:13, Micah 5:1. 2) Because the election made "from the beginning" is distinguished from the calling in time, v. 14. 3) God is said to have chosen us "for salvation," which word, when used absolutely, denotes eternal blessedness.

Question IV. In how many ways is the word 'predestination' taken?

The word 'predestination' is taken differently in an ecclesiastical sense and in a biblical sense. Some fathers and doctors of the church ἀκῶρως (improperly), abusively and more loosely than is right, have taken the word predestination for the divine decree, both concerning the salvation of believing men and the condemnation of unbelievers a). In the biblical sense, however, the word predestination is always taken in a good sense, so that it denotes the divine decree concerning the salvation of fallen men b).

Proof a). AUGUSTINE in The City of God, book XV, chapter I, divides the human race into two societies, one of which is predestined to reign eternally with God, the other to undergo eternal punishment with the devil. Compare PROSPER in Response XIV to the chapters of the Gauls; FULGENTIUS, book II to Monimus, chapter XIV. But that expression is improper because 1) it is not conformed to Holy Scripture, in which προορισμός, in Latin praedestinatio, is always taken in a good sense. 2) It is unbecoming of the most holy God. For predestination, besides the end which it respects, also includes an order of means. But the most holy God has destined no one to the means of reprobation, which are the rejection of the divine word and final unbelief. 3) It is absurd. For predestination respects an end to be obtained through efficacious means. But eternal death, accurately speaking, is not the end of man, although it can be called the final state of impenitent men. For an end by its nature is good and desirable; but who, of sound mind, would judge eternal death to be good and desirable? AUGUSTINE aptly says in Hypognosticon, book VI: "God only foreknows evil things, He does not predestine them; but good things He both foreknows and predestines."

You might say: Προορισμός, or predestination, seems to be taken in a bad sense in Acts 4:27-28: "For truly in this city there were gathered together against your holy Son Jesus, whom you anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, along with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, to do whatever your hand and your plan προώρισε (predestined) to take place."

Response. The passage does not describe the reprobation of the impious, but the decree of the passion and death of Christ, which is the external impulsive cause of our election to eternal life. Indeed, with evil counsel and nefarious audacity, the Jews and Gentiles killed Christ; but God, although He permitted it to happen, directed it to a good and salutary end for the whole human race.

Proof b). That προορισμόν, or predestination, in the sacred writings is always taken in a better sense and denotes the divine decree concerning the salvation of men who have fallen into sin, is clear from the apostolic statement in Romans 8:30: "And those whom God predestined he also called; and those whom he called he also justified; and those whom he justified he also glorified." The same is evident from Ephesians 1:5: "God προώρισε (predestined) us for adoption as sons through Jesus Christ."

Question V. In how many senses is predestination, taken in a good sense, explained by orthodox theologians?

Predestination, taken in a good sense according to the guidance of Holy Scripture, insofar as it is the decree of God concerning the salvation of sinful men, is explained by orthodox theologians in a threefold sense: a) a general or broader sense, insofar as it embraces the entire economy of salvation, or the whole apparatus of the means of salvation; b) a special or stricter sense, as it signifies the ordination of the faithful to salvation, combined with πρόθεσις (purpose) and πρόγνωσις (foreknowledge); c) a most special and strictest sense, in which προορισμός, or predestination, is distinguished from πρόθεσις and πρόγνωσις, and denotes the eternal, determinate decree of God, applied to certain individual men, whom God chose from the common mass of corruption unto eternal life, because He distinctly foresaw that they would finally believe in Christ.

Proof a). To understand the decree of predestination insofar as, taken in a broader sense, it denotes the entire economy of salvation, or the whole ordination of those to be saved unto salvation, including all the causes and all the means of salvation, the order of the divine acts must be diligently observed, as they follow one another in the sign of reason, according to divine revelation. This order of divine decrees is presented for our consideration in the Solid Declaration of the Formula of Concord, p. 802: God, in His counsel and purpose, decreed:

I. That the human race should be truly redeemed and reconciled with God through Christ, who, by His innocence and most perfect obedience, His most bitter passion and death, merited for us a righteousness that avails before Him, and eternal life.

II. That the merit of Christ and His benefits should be offered, exhibited, and distributed to us through the Word and Sacraments.

III. He also decreed that He, by His Holy Spirit, through the Word proclaimed, perceived by hearing, and commended to memory, wills to be efficacious in us, and to bend our hearts to perform true repentance, and to preserve us in true faith.

IV. It is His eternal purpose that all who truly repent and embrace Christ with true faith, He wills to justify, receive into grace, and adopt as sons and heirs of eternal life.

V. And that He wills to sanctify in true charity those justified by faith, as the Apostle testifies in Ephesians 1:4.

VI. He proposed in His eternal counsel that He would also defend the justified in their manifold and various infirmity against the devil, the world, and the flesh, and would lead and govern them in His ways; and if they should fall, He would place His hand beneath them, so that in the cross and temptations they might receive solid consolation and be preserved for life.

VII. It is His eternal decree that He wills to promote, confirm, and preserve unto the very end that good work which He has begun in them; provided they constantly lean on His Word as on a staff, implore His help with ardent prayers, persevere in the grace of God, and faithfully and well employ the gifts received.

VIII. He also decreed in His eternal counsel that those whom He has elected, called, and justified, He wills to save in the other, eternal life, and to adorn with eternal glory.

And indeed, God in that counsel, purpose, and ordination of His, not only procured the salvation of His own in general, but also graciously foreknew all and single persons of the elect (who are to be saved through Christ), chose them for salvation, and decreed that in this manner (which we have now recounted) He would make them partakers of eternal salvation by His grace, gifts, and efficacy, help them, promote their salvation, and confirm and preserve them. All these things, according to Scripture, are comprehended in the article of predestination and the eternal divine election to adoption as sons and to eternal life.

Definition of predestination taken broadly. From what has been set forth from the Formula of Concord, predestination taken in a broader sense can be defined as the eternal divine decree by which God, out of His immense mercy, for all men whom He foresaw from eternity would fall into sin, resolved to give His Son as a mediator and to offer Him to be embraced through universal preaching; also to confer faith through the Word and Sacraments upon all who would not be resistant; to justify all believers; and to renew those who continue to use the means of grace; to preserve faith in them even to the end of life; and finally, to save those who ultimately believe.

Observation. Some Fathers and Theologians have not hesitated to assert that faith in Christ is an effect of election, and that predestination constitutes the end and ordains the means, and that we have believed because we were elect. They take the words predestination and election in this broader sense, for the whole ordination of those to be saved unto salvation; which, as it embraces all the principles and means of salvation, so it includes the eternal purpose of God concerning faith in Christ, to be effected through the word and sacraments in all who will not obstinately and stubbornly resist. See D. MUSAEUS's dissertation De aeterno praedestinationis decreto, p. 206.

Proof b. Predestination taken in a stricter sense embraces both πρόθεσιν (purpose), i.e., the general and indeterminate divine decree of imparting eternal salvation to all sinful men who will finally believe in Christ, and πρόγνωσιν (foreknowledge), i.e., the foreknowledge of certain persons, or human individuals, who will retain true faith in Christ even to the last breath of life. In this stricter sense, persevering faith in Christ enters predestination not as a meritorious cause, on account of which God chooses us, but as an instrumental one, which apprehends the electing grace of God and the merit of Christ, as AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS says in his treatise De providentia & praedestinatione, fol. 826. From this, some Theologians have also called faith in Christ a part of the predestinarian order. Compare D. GERHARD's Disputationes isagogicae, p. 723, and D. MEISNER's Anthropologia, decade II, p. 153. D. DANNHAVER, Hodosophia Phanomenon, VII, p. 578.

Proof c. Predestination taken in the strictest sense, as it is the eternal decree of God applied to certain human individuals (Abraham, Peter, etc.), presupposes, as prior in order, πρόθεσιν (purpose), or the indeterminate decree of saving men who will finally believe, and πρόγνωσιν (foreknowledge), or the foreknowledge of faith in Christ, and so faith is not a part of it, but a less principal impulsive reason, which God the elector most graciously regarded. Election indeed precedes faith with respect to its actual existence, but according to its known being, faith precedes election in the sign of reason. See D. MUSAEUS's dissertation De aeterna praedestinatione, D. p. 209.

Question VI. What is the cause of election, taken in the most special sense?

Cause of election. The efficient cause of election, taken in the strictest sense, is the triune God a), the Father b), the Son c), and the Holy Spirit d).

Observation. An efficient cause is twofold: 1) Formally in being, which produces a real effect, really distinct from itself. Such a cause is, for example, the human intellect when it produces an act of understanding, which is not only real, but also really produced by its cause, namely the intellect. 2) Virtually in being, which does not indeed produce an effect really distinct from itself, but is conceived by us as a cause; and if that of which it is called the cause had a true cause, this cause, virtually such, would be sufficient. It is otherwise called the reason of being a priori. Now when we assert that God is the efficient cause of predestination, it is not to be understood as an efficient cause formally in being, because God does not produce the decree of predestination as something really distinct from Himself (for every decree of God is τὸ αὐτό (one and the same) with the most simple divine essence); but it is to be understood as a cause virtually in being, because God is conceived as an efficient cause, and if the decree of predestination had, or could have, a true cause, God would be its efficient cause. Compare D. MUSAEUS in his dissertation De aeterna praedestinationis decreto, § 22, and D. BECHMANN in Institutiones Theologicae, p. 443. D. BAYER in Compendium Theologiae, p. 647.

Proof a. Since election is not a personal action, such as begetting, being begotten, and proceeding, but is essential and undivided, it therefore belongs to all and single of the three persons of the deity, namely the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; just as justification and glorification, which are put into execution by the decree of election, belong to all three persons. Moreover, election is indeed an immanent act of the divine will, yet respecting an object posited outside of God; and therefore, just as in the other divine acts ad extra (outward), so also in the act of election, the order is to be observed in distinguishing the divine persons, so that God the Father is said to have chosen us through the Son, in the Holy Spirit. And yet the three persons of the deity are not associate causes of predestination, nor is Christ an instrumental cause of election, for if we were to assert this, the ὁμοουσία (consubstantiality) of the divine persons would be undermined.

Proof b. St. Paul proclaims the benevolence of God the Father in electing us to eternal life in Ephesians 1:3-4: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in Christ with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places, even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world." Election is attributed to God the Father, the fount of all blessing, but the other divine persons are not excluded, for just as their essence is one, so also the acts of will are equally common to all. However, in this passage, there is a particular respect of the one who elects to the one in whom He elects.

Proof c. Christ addresses His disciples in John 15:19: "If you were of the world, the world would love its own; but because you are not of the world, but I chose you out of the world, therefore the world hates you." Christ's speech is about the election of the apostles not simply to the apostolate, but insofar as this is conjoined with the election to eternal life. For all Christians who perseveringly believe in Christ are chosen from the world, which lies entirely in the evil one, 1 John 5:19. The world, however, is the multitude of those men who, devoted to the flesh and the vanities of the world, burn with mortal hatred for the worshipers of piety and vex them. But Christ says that he chose the apostles and their imitators from the world, i.e., he separated them from the filth of impious men and destined them for the possession of the heavenly inheritance.

Proof d. From 2 Thessalonians 2:13: "But we ought always to give thanks to God for you, brothers beloved by the Lord, because God chose you from the beginning for salvation through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth." The Apostle testifies that God the Father chose them ἐν ἁγιασμῷ πνεύματος (in the sanctification of the Spirit), by which is not understood the holiness inherent in the reborn, since that, being maimed and mutilated, cannot withstand the censorious judgment of God, but the active sanctification of the divine Spirit, by which miserable sinners are called to the heavenly kingdom, illuminated, converted, and regenerated, so that they may be gifted with faith in Christ, in which, persisting, they are elected by an eternal and immutable divine decree to heavenly glory.

You say I: The glorification, or salvation of faithful men, which corresponds to predestination, has a true cause. Therefore, the decree of predestination also has a true and formally existing cause, since the cause of the execution and of the decree is the same. Response. I deny the consequence. For the glorification, or salvation of the faithful, occurs outside of God, where a true and formally existing cause has its place. But the decree of predestination is in God Himself, not differing in reality from the divine essence. Moreover, the impulsive cause of the execution and of the decree is the same, although the efficient cause, not really distinct from the decree, produces in the execution an effect really distinct from itself.

You say II: Predestination is an action ad intra (inward). But actions ad intra are divided, that is, not common to all three persons of the divinity. This is evident from the eternal generation of the λόγος (Word).

Response. Predestination is indeed a divine action, internal and immanent, but it is not an action ad intra, but ad extra (outward), because it tends toward an object posited outside of God, namely the miserable sinner believing in Christ. Add to this that personal actions ad intra are indeed divided, but not essential actions ad intra. See KOENIG's Theologia Positiva, p. 41, 420.

You say III: The Son of God is the meritorious and impulsive cause of predestination; hence we are said to be chosen "in Christ," i.e., on account of Christ, Ephesians 1:4. Therefore, He is not the efficient cause of predestination, since these causes are distinguished from each other. Response. The Son of God can be regarded in two ways: 1) As He is one God with the Father and the Holy Spirit; 2) Insofar as in time He assumed human nature and in it made satisfaction for men. In this latter way, the Son of God is the meritorious and external impulsive cause of eternal salvation and of the election to salvation. In the former way, He is, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, the efficient cause of predestination, and indeed one cause. For the will of the three persons is one, and by one act of will the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit have elected to eternal salvation as many as are saved in time.

Question VII. What is the impulsive cause of election?

Internal impulsive cause of election. The impulsive cause of the election of fallen and reconciled men to eternal life is partly internal, partly external. The internal impulsive cause of election is εὐδοκία (good pleasure), benevolence, or the grace of God, provoked by no merits of men.

Proof. That God was moved to our predestination by εὐδοκία, or benevolence disposed toward men, Paul teaches in Ephesians 1:5-6: "God predestined us for adoption as sons through Jesus Christ for himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of his glorious grace, with which he has blessed us in the Beloved." In these words, the Apostle teaches, 1) that we have been predestined by God to eternal glory, κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ (according to the good pleasure of his will), which εὐδοκία is the benevolence of God, or His gratuitous and most free favor. The divine εὐδοκία can be considered in two ways: a) generally, b) specifically. The good pleasure of God, regarded generally, pertains to the antecedent will of God, and is the fount and origin of all the means of salvation, through which the merciful God, from eternity, willed that an entrance to eternal life should be open to men who had fallen and were subject to eternal death on account of sin, under this condition: if they rightly use the means ordained for obtaining salvation, namely the word and sacraments, and if they perseveringly believe in Christ by His grace, by which He wills to work and preserve faith in them through those means. In this general sense, the εὐδοκία, or benevolence of God, is the impulsive cause of forming the eternal decree concerning the salvation of sinful men who will finally believe in Christ. The εὐδοκία, or divine good pleasure, taken specifically, as it pertains to the consequent will of God, is not so much the cause of predestination as predestination itself, since the eternal predestination of those to be saved to eternal life and the good pleasure of God, by which He willed from eternity certainly to gift with heavenly life those who would perseveringly believe in Christ, do not differ from each other. 2) The Apostle asserts that we have been predestined by God for adoption as sons through Jesus Christ, understanding a consummated and glorious adoption, which implies κληρονομίαν (inheritance), or the inheritance of eternal life, which we obtain not through the pursuit of good works, but through faith in Christ, John 1:12. 3) St. Paul shows that God predestined us to the praise of His glorious grace, which praise of the glorious grace of God is the ultimate end of election. But if our election was made solely for the praise of the glorious grace of God, it was certainly not made on account of the merits of our works; otherwise, even men zealous in good works would have something to glory in. 4) He also teaches that God has made us pleasing to Himself in the Beloved, i.e., Christ. So far is it from being the case that we are pleasing to God by the condition of our nature, that we are children of wrath, and therefore hated, Ephesians 2:3. Wherefore, that we have been loved by God and elected to eternal life is to be referred entirely not to our works, but to the grace of God founded on the merit of Christ. 5) The Apostle insists that God chose us so that we might be holy and blameless, v. 4. Therefore, we were not chosen because we were holy. 6) The doctor of the Gentiles opposes electing grace diametrically to the merits of works, Romans 11:6: "So too at the present time there is a remnant, chosen by grace. But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace." From which we learn that God was moved to choose certain men from the common mass of perdition not by their foreseen works, but by His own unmerited and gratuitous grace. "It is not grace in any way if it is not gratuitous in every way," as AUGUSTINE elegantly says somewhere.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, and of certain Papists, asserting that our election was made in view of good works; whose stronger arguments are:

I. Whoever is said to be a vessel for God's honor because he cleanses himself from sins, is elected on account of the pursuit of good works. But a reborn man, etc. E. The major is established, because a vessel for God's honor is an elect man, who, since he becomes a vessel for honor through cleansing from sins, is certainly elected on account of the pursuit of good works. The minor is proven from 2 Timothy 2:21. Response. The Apostle's words are: "If anyone cleanses himself from these, he will be a vessel for honor." He does not say: "he will become," as if cleansing from sins were the cause of election, but the Apostle only indicates by what external sign an elect person becomes known.

II. He who reprobates unbelieving men on account of evil works, predestines reborn men to salvation on account of good works. But God, etc. E. The major is evident, because the principle of opposites is opposite. Response. I deny the major. The principle of opposites is opposite if both are equally perfect. But good works are imperfectly good, while evil works are perfectly evil. Whence it is not licit to conclude from the latter to the former.

III. For whom the kingdom of heaven is prepared because they fed the hungry, gave drink to the thirsty, etc., they are chosen on account of the pursuit of good works. But for reborn men, etc. E. The minor is proven from Matthew 25:34-35: "the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry and you gave me something to eat," where the reason for the election to the kingdom of glory is given as beneficence by the causal particle γάρ (for). Response. The particle γάρ in the cited passage is not αἰτιολογική (causal), but συλλογιστική (ratiocinative), by which is gathered not the effect from the cause, but the cause from the effect, or from the consequent, by an a posteriori demonstration, just as if I were to conclude: "There must be a fire in this house, for smoke is rising from it." Moreover, that the kingdom is not prepared on account of good works is clear, because in the cited passage it is called an inheritance (κληρονομία), which one obtains without merit.

IV. Whoever strives to make their calling and election sure through good works, their election depends on good works. But men to be saved, etc., 2 Peter 1:10. The major is established, because that by which something is made firm, depends on it, if not in its coming to be or its being, at least in its being preserved. Response. 1) The words of the text are: "strive to make your calling and election sure." The addition, "through good works," is not in the authentic text. 2) Although good works can be understood, the Apostle nevertheless does not assert that men to be saved are chosen on account of good works, but only says that election is made firm through works, namely with respect to being known a posteriori. For truly good works are τεκμήρια (proofs) and firm marks, by which the elect are validly distinguished from the reprobate.

V. "God chose us, that we should be holy and blameless before him in love," Ephesians 1:4. E. God, in making the decree of election, had respect to the pursuit of true piety. Response. The Apostle does not say: "God chose us, since we were holy and blameless," but "he chose us, that we might be holy and unblameable." Therefore, we were not elected by God on account of inherent holiness as an impulsive cause, but the holy obedience to be rendered to God and the pursuit of sincere piety is, with respect to the divine intention, an end, and with respect to its execution, an effect of election, by which faithful men declare and testify their memory of a grateful heart toward God the elector.

Question VIII. What is the external impulsive cause of election?

External impulsive cause of election. The external impulsive cause of election is the merit of Christ, to be apprehended by true and persevering faith, foreseen from eternity by the omniscient and placable God.

Observation. The sense of our assertion is: God chose certain men from the common assembly of lost men for eternal life, not on account of their own merits, nor out of absolute grace that excludes all respect to an impulsive reason outside of God; but in the eternal decree of election He uniquely looked to the most full and most sufficient merit of His own Son, by which He was also moved to choose certain sinners—namely, those and only those individuals—for eternal life, whom He foresaw from eternity in the light of His omniscience would embrace the merit of Christ by true faith, and would persevere in that faith even to the last breath of life. And so, the merit of Christ is the external impulsive cause of election, not insofar as it is regarded only with respect to its acquisition (for thus it pertains to all men), but also with respect to its final application, which is made through persevering faith; in which respect the merit of Christ profits only the reborn.

The assertion is proven 1) from Ephesians 1:3-4, 5, 6, 7: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in Christ with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places, even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and blameless before him in love. He predestined us for adoption as sons through Jesus Christ for himself, according to the good pleasure of his will... In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." This is a classic passage of Scripture, or the proper seat of the doctrine concerning the election of men to eternal life. Wherefore, from this apostolic oracle we draw the following arguments.

We argue a): Whoever have been elected by God to eternal glory on account of Christ the mediator, to their election God was moved and impelled by the merit of Christ. But the reborn, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because on account of whose merit a certain decree is formed, he must be, by the force of that merit, the impulsive cause. For a meritorious cause is that which, under the aspect of merit or demerit, moves and impels the efficient cause to give a reward or inflict a penalty. The minor is clear; because Paul says that we have been elected by God "in Christ," i.e., "on account of Christ." For the Greek particle ἐν frequently in the sacred writings has the same value as "on account of," as in Matthew 6:7, where the talk is of the Gentiles: "they think that they will be heard ἐν πολυλογίᾳ αὐτῶν (on account of their many words)." Acts 7:29: "Moses fled ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ (on account of this word)," namely when one of the quarreling Israelites, between whom he had gone to make peace, said: "Do you want to kill me, as you did the Egyptian yesterday?" Ephesians 3:13: "I ask that you not lose heart ἐν θλίψεσί με (on account of my afflictions)." What is more, the Apostle himself renders the particle ἐν by διὰ (through/on account of) in verse 5.

You say I: The words of Paul can be explained: We were chosen in Christ as our head. Response. The word "head" denotes both order with respect to the members and causality. If "head" is taken causally, we are truly said to be elected in Christ as the head, foundation, and impulsive cause of election. But if it is taken only ordinally, that is, that Christ was chosen first in the sign of divine reason, and we were predestined later, that exposition is inconvenient because Christ was never in the common mass of perdition, and therefore was never segregated and chosen from it.

You say II: The words of the Apostle can be explained: We were chosen so that we might be in Christ, so that it denotes a final cause, not an impulsive one. Response. If the Apostle had said: We were chosen εἰς τὸν Χριστὸν (unto Christ), that exposition would be congruent with the text. But he says: we were chosen "in Christ," as in a mediator, whose merit impelled God to choose certain men.

You say III: The Greek particle ἐν, although it is put for διὰ (through), denotes the efficient cause of election, so that the sense is: God the Father chose us through Christ, His co-eternal Son, and so Christ is considered not as mediator, but as God. Response. The electing God is openly distinguished from Christ, in whom, as in a foundation, the election was made, and in the whole context the Apostle speaks of Christ not only as God, but as the θεάνθρωπος (God-man) and mediator, in whom we have redemption through his blood, v. 7.

You say IV: The sense of the Apostle is: God chose us to be holy and blameless in Him. Response. This interpretation does violence to the text, by taking something away from it that is necessary to complete the sense. For in the Pauline text the pronoun ἡμᾶς (us) is found, placed twice, and with an intervening mark of distinction it is construed once with the verb ἐξελέξατο (he chose) and again with the verb εἶναι (to be), in this manner: ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς ἐν αὐτῷ πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἁγίους (He chose us in him before the foundation of the world, to be us holy). But according to the interpretation just reviewed, the mark of distinction would have to be removed, just as if the pronoun ἡμᾶς were only placed once, and with the words transposed it would have to be read thus: ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς εἶναι ἐν αὐτῷ ἁγίους (He chose us to be holy in him).

You say V: God chose us in Christ, namely, to be adopted. Response. This exposition, beyond necessity, adds something to the text. When these things are accurately weighed, it is manifest that only our explanation, which we have given above, is conformed to the context and expresses the genuine mind of the Apostle. What is more, the Helvetian Confession, chapter X, the Anhalt Confession, chapter XL, and not a few doctors of the reformed church, whom Dn. D. HOLTZFUSIUS commemorates and praises in his dissertation De praedestinatione, p. 133ff., approve our interpretation with their vote.

We argue b): Whoever is the meritorious cause of spiritual blessing is the meritorious cause of eternal election. But Christ is, etc. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places, in Christ; καθὼς (just as) He chose us in him." The emphatic particle καθὼς (just as), indicates, according to the Apostle, that God blesses us in Christ in the same way that He chose us in the same. But God blesses us in Christ as the fount and meritorious cause of blessing, Genesis 12:3, 18:18, 22:18; Acts 4:12; Galatians 3:13-14. Therefore, He chose us in Christ as the fount and meritorious cause of election to eternal salvation.

You say: Christ is indeed the meritorious cause of election, but not the impulsive cause. Response. A meritorious cause is comprehended under the genus of an impulsive cause, as a species. For every meritorious cause is impulsive, although not every impulsive cause is meritorious. The latter is defined as a cause that, under the aspect of merit, impels the efficient cause to give a reward. Therefore, every meritorious cause is essentially impulsive.

We argue c): Whomever God has predestined for adoption as sons through Jesus Christ for himself, He has chosen them in view of the merit of Christ. But reborn men, etc. Therefore. The major is proven because predestination to a consummate υιοθεσίαν (sonship), which is given in heaven, is election to eternal life, since that consummate and glorious υιοθεσία includes or implies the heavenly inheritance.

We argue d): Whoever is the impulsive cause on account of which God loves us, is the impulsive cause on account of which God has chosen us for eternal life. But Christ, etc. The major is proven because love internally impelled God to choose certain men, so that no one is chosen who is not loved. But God did not love certain men absolutely, without a view to Christ. The minor is evident from verse 6: "to the praise of his glorious grace, with which he made us pleasing (to himself) in the Beloved." Sinners would have perished, had they not been rendered pleasing to God. No creature could make them pleasing to God, because no creature could erase sin, from which all enmity results. Wherefore, lest miserable sinners should perish, God by His glorious benevolence made them friends from enemies, and pleasing to Himself, by sending His most beloved Son in the flesh, in whom, through whom, and on account of whom sinners are loved.

We argue e); He in whom we have the remission of sins is the fundamental cause of our election. But in Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because God chose sinners not as they are hated, but as they are reconciled and rendered pleasing to God. The decree of election therefore presupposes, in the sign of reason, the divine decree concerning the justification of man. The minor is evident from v. 7: "In whom (Christ) we have redemption through his blood, the remission of sins according to the riches of his grace."

Proof 2) From the conformity of the decree and its execution. Whatever is the impulsive cause on account of which God in time confers salvation on certain men, that is the impulsive cause on account of which God from eternity chose certain men for salvation. But the merit of Christ is the impulsive cause on account of which God in time confers salvation on certain men. Therefore, the merit of Christ is the impulsive cause on account of which God chose certain men for eternal life. The major rests on the universal canon: The impulsive causes of the decree are the same as the impulsive causes of the execution of the decree. The truth of this is evident 1) from the induction of examples. When a magistrate adorns his citizens with rewards, a master his servants, a parent his children, a teacher his disciples, an emperor his soldiers—some on account of diligence shown in their duty, but others he affects with penalties on account of their offenses—it is easily gathered that diligence and offenses, as they were the impelling causes for distributing rewards and penalties, so also they were the impelling causes for decreeing rewards and penalties. Because the crying sins of Sodom were the cause why God destroyed it, Genesis 18:20, we conclude, not without reason, that God decreed to destroy it on account of those sins. 2) That the impulsive causes of the decree and its execution are the same is proven a priori, both from the nature of the impulsive cause itself and from the nature of voluntary actions. From the nature of the impulsive cause; for this is the nature and character of an impulsive cause, by which one is moved to the exercise of some external act, that it moves the will or appetite of the efficient cause to will or desire that which the efficient cause executes by an external act. The same is also perceived from the nature of voluntary actions. For just as he who acts, also wills to act, and it is at least by nature prior to will to act than to act, so also by what cause one is moved to act, by the same he is moved to will to act, and it is at least by nature prior to be moved by some cause to will to act, than to be moved by some cause to act. The minor is confirmed by the sacred letters, which teach that "there is salvation in no one else" than in Christ, Acts 4:12. "If while we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, now that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life," Romans 5:10. "God has not destined us for wrath, but to obtain salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us so that whether we are awake or asleep we might live with him," 1 Thessalonians 5:9-10. "Christ, although he was a son, learned obedience through what he suffered. And being made perfect, he became the source of eternal salvation for all who obey him," Hebrews 5:8-9.

Proof 3) From the foreknowledge of God. The election was made κατὰ πρόγνωσιν (according to foreknowledge), Romans 8:29, 11:2; 1 Peter 1:2. But the object of that foreknowledge, according to which the election was made, is Christ with His most holy merit, whence in 1 Peter 1:19 we are said to have been redeemed with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, "foreknown (προεγνωσμένου) indeed before the foundation of the world." From these arises the argument; Whatever election was made κατὰ πρόγνωσιν (according to foreknowledge), or according to the foreseeing of Christ to be apprehended by true faith, was not made out of an absolute good pleasure without a view to Christ. But the election of fallen men to eternal glory, etc. Therefore. The major is evident, because that decree is called absolute which is conceived without respect to an external impulsive cause.

Proof 4) From the condition of election. Election is a work of immense love and mercy. But God is not only merciful, but also just, and as His mercy moves Him to will grace for us, so His justice, offended by our sins, moved Him to will punishment for sinners. It was necessary, therefore, for the merit of Christ to intervene, by which satisfaction might be made to offended justice, which, joined with divine mercy, together with it constitutes the complete reason for willing, by which God, according to our way of understanding, is moved, so that, His immutable justice being saved, He wills sinners to be saved. For "we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son," Romans 5:10.

The antithesis is 1) that of the Socinians, who plainly deny the satisfaction of Christ; 2) that of certain Papists and Reformed, who posit an absolute decree of election. For not all doctors of the reformed church exclude the respect of the merit of Christ from the eternal decree of predestination, as Dn. D. HOLZFUS, Professor at Frankfurt, prolixly shows in his dissertation De praedestinatione, p. 133ff. (*) The following arguments are objected to us:

I. Whoever were chosen out of mere grace were not chosen on account of the merit of Christ. But the faithful, etc. Therefore. The major is evident, because mere grace is opposed to all merit. The minor is proven from Ephesians 1:5: "God predestined us, according to the good pleasure of his will." Response. Mere grace is opposed to the merits of our works, not to the merit of Christ. For the Apostle says, v. 6: ἐχαρίτωσεν ἡμᾶς ἐν τῷ ἡγαπημένῳ (he made us pleasing to himself in the Beloved), Christ. Therefore, the Apostle understands an ordinate good pleasure, not an absolute one.

Objection: But the Apostle asserts that the electing grace of God is simply absolute and free, saying, Romans 9:18: "God has mercy on whom he wills, and whom he wills, he hardens." Response. Chapter 9 of the epistle to the Romans deals πρῶτως (primarily) and firstly with the justification of the sinner through faith in Christ; ἐπομένως (consequently), however, and by a ready consequence, the Apostle's words can be applied to the eternal decree of election. For in whatever way God justifies sinners in time, in the same way He decreed to justify them. This being established, we say that the justifying and electing grace of God is indeed free, but not simply absolute. It is free from the necessity of obligation, both because no law obliged God to have compassion on the fallen human race (for it was in God's power to receive fallen man into grace, or to punish him without hope of pardon), and because the economy of salvation, to be obtained through faith in Christ, depends on the most free will of God. It is not simply absolute, because it is founded on the merit of Christ and is bound to a certain τῶξιν (order) of means, to which God Himself most freely bound Himself. "Grace was given to us in Christ before the ages began," says the Apostle, 2 Timothy 1:9.

II. If we were chosen on account of the merit of Christ, the election would be universal. The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. Response. A distinction is made between the merit of Christ regarded with respect to its acquisition, and considered with respect to its application, or insofar as it is apprehended by persevering faith. In the former way, the merit of Christ is indeed universal, but the application is not made by all.

III. Whatever was performed in time cannot be the meritorious or impulsive cause of an eternal decree. But the merit of Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because nothing can exercise the function of a cause unless it exists, and every cause is prior to its effect. But the merit of Christ did not exist from eternity. Therefore, it could not have been the cause of an eternal decree. Response. A distinction is made between the merit of Christ foreseen, and actually performed, or fulfilled in the work itself. Regarded in the former way, it is the cause of eternal election; considered in the latter way, it is the meritorious cause of salvation to be exhibited and conferred upon us. Moreover, that not every cause is prior to its effect with respect to real existence is evident from the final cause. Hence the end is called first not with respect to existence, but only with respect to intention; with respect to existence, however, and in execution, it is last. An impulsive cause exercises the function of a cause not according to its real being, like a physical efficient cause, but according to its objective being, and as known by the intellect of the principal agent. Hence it is that the merit of Christ profited the fathers of the Old Testament for salvation, because it was foreknown by God from eternity, although at that time it had not been actually performed. Indeed, even the sins of the unbelievers are by common consent the cause of the eternal decree of reprobation, because they are the object of divine omniscience and through it were objectively exhibited to the divine will from eternity under the aspect of evil, although they were committed in time.

(*) Those who are more moderate than the rest indeed admit that blessed men were chosen on account of Christ. But they speak ambiguously, as they are wont, and think much differently than our own, who think rightly. To be sure, as their opinion holds, the merits of Christ pertain to election as something consequent, in this manner; that God first took counsel concerning the election of a certain few, and then decided to send Christ for their sake, and thus, on account of this Reconciler of peace, who would make full satisfaction for them alone, He decreed to impart eternal blessedness to those elect. But in our opinion, the merit of Christ is the cause of election as an antecedent, namely that God, from the universal multitude of all and single men, for whom an equally infinite price was to be paid by the common sponsor of all, selected those whom He foresaw would place a constant and unfeigned trust in Christ.

IV. Whoever was himself predestined is not the impulsive cause of our election. But Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because he who is predestined is indeed the object of eternal election, but not its impulsive cause. The minor is evident from 1 Peter 1:20. Response. In the cited passage, Christ is said to be προεγνωσμένου (foreknown), not προωρισμένου (predestined). He is said to be foreknown because our election was made κατὰ πρόγνωσιν (according to foreknowledge) of the mediator Christ, who, strictly speaking, was not elected, because election is of a man subject to eternal death on account of sin, destined out of mere mercy to eternal life. But Christ was never subject to eternal damnation on account of sin.

V. Whatever is a means of execution, or of actual salvation, is not the impulsive cause of the eternal decree of predestination. But the merit of Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is proven because the means of salvation are distinguished from the causes and principles of salvation. And whatever is only a means of execution cannot be the cause of an eternal decree, since that is an immediate act of the divine will. The minor is clear because the merit of Christ is commonly called the means by which divine justice was satisfied, so that eternal salvation could be conferred upon us. Response. A means of salvation, strictly taken, is an organ offering or receiving salvation. The offering means are the word of God and the sacraments; the receiving means is faith in Christ. The merit of Christ cannot be counted among these, because it is the principal impulsive cause of salvation. But if "means" is taken broadly, so that in its scope it also embraces the meritorious cause, the major premise of the argument is false, because the meritorious cause of salvation is the impulsive cause that moved God both to decree and to give salvation, on account of the perpetual harmony of the decree and its execution.

VI. Whatever is an independent, immobile, and immutable principle has no impulsive cause. The divine will is an independent, immobile, and immutable principle. Therefore. The major is established; because whatever has a cause depends on it; whatever is impelled, is moved and changed. The minor is evident; because the will of God in reality is the independent, immobile, and immutable essence of God itself. Response. A distinction is made between a cause that causes formally and one that causes virtually. The former is a true and real cause actually influencing the effect; the latter is a certain a priori reason, which in our way of conceiving behaves in the manner of a cause. We do not assert that the merit of Christ is the impulsive cause of the eternal decree of predestination properly so-called and formally causing, which moves and impels the will of God to elicit the act of the decree of election. For it is agreed among all that the decrees of God are not acts really distinct from the divine will and elicited by it, but are the very will of God conceived in the manner of an act with connoted objects, about which it is concerned, and consequently no cause of them, properly so-called, can be given. But we say that the merit of Christ is a cause of election less properly so-called, and virtually causing, which is only an a priori reason, and in our way of conceiving behaves like an impulsive cause, in view of which the divine will, without any true and real motion of itself, and without an elicited act, wills and decrees our salvation, no differently than if it were its properly so-called impulsive cause; just as it would also be a properly so-called impulsive cause if a divine decree of this sort recognized or admitted such a cause. See D. MUSAEUS, dissertation De aeterna praedestinationis decreto, D. 7, p. 3.

Question IX. Was the election of fallen men to eternal life made in view of faith?

The election of men, corrupted by sin, to eternal life was made by the most merciful God in view of faith in Christ a), persevering to the end of life b).

Observation. Our theologians, in explaining the eternal decree of predestination, as far as the matter itself is concerned, conspire most amicably, teaching with great consensus that God, to whom even future things are objectively present, foresaw from eternity by the infinite light of His intellect the faith of certain men who had fallen into sin, and in view of their foreknown faith in Christ, elected them to eternal salvation. They differ in their way of speaking and in the use of technical terms.

Our theologians agree 1) that faith, foreseen from eternity, is, in our way of conceiving, prior to the decree of election, and thus relates to it as the reason in view of which we were elected. For thus the Book of Concord teaches concerning eternal predestination in the Declaration, p. 812: "In this there is no doubt that God, most certainly and most exactly, foresaw before the time of the world, and also knows today, who from the number of those who are called will believe or not believe; likewise, who of the converted will persevere, and who after a fall will return, but who, having become hardened, would perish." And in the Epitome, p. 619: "The eternal election of God the Father is to be sought in Christ. For He, in His eternal and divine counsel, decreed that He wills to save no one except those who acknowledge His Son Jesus Christ and truly believe in him."

They agree 2) that foreseen faith enters the decree of election, not as a quality or an act, nor by reason of any proper goodness, dignity, or perfection, but solely and entirely by reason of the object, to which it is directed and which it apprehends and applies to us, namely the merit of Christ. D. AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS excellently says, in his treatise De providentia & praedestinatione, vol. I of his works, fol. 826: "Faith enters the mystery of election, not insofar as it is weighed in its own dignity, merit, or condition, as a certain quality, habit, or virtue, but only insofar as it relates to Christ, as the one rock and foundation of eternal election."

They agree 3) that we were not elected on account of faith, but through faith. D. BALTHASAR MEISNER says no less aptly than truly, in Anthropologia, decade II, disputation XIV, p. 159: "We are chosen not unto faith as an end, not on account of faith as a merit, but through faith as a means, or in faith as a part of the predestinarian order."

Our theologians differ in their way of speaking and in the use of technical terms. Some have not been afraid to call faith in Christ a cause of the decree of election. Thus spoke the Wurttemberg theologians in the Colloquy of Montbéliard, p. 518: "Faith in Christ is not of nature, or of our human powers, but is the work of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, when faith is said to be the cause of election, it in no way savors of the dogma of the Pelagians, who attributed to the powers of nature what the Holy Spirit alone can perform." The Formula of Concord, Declaration, p. 821, seems to contradict the Colloquy of Montbéliard at first glance: "It is false, and it conflicts with the word of God, when it is taught that not only the mercy of God and the unique most holy merit of Christ, but also something in us is the cause of divine election, on account of which God has predestined us to eternal life." But the mind of the Formula of Concord is that, apart from the mercy of God and the merit of Christ apprehended by faith, there is no cause on man's part for election, which by its merit, dignity, or value moved God to elect us from eternity to eternal life.

These things being well considered, D. AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS, in his treatise De providentia & praedestinatione, fol. 826, says: "Faith enters the mystery of election, not as a meritorious cause, on account of which God chooses us, but as an instrumental one." But when someone objected to this most consummate theologian that the eternal decree of election is an immanent, immediate, and inorganic act of the divine will, proceeding from the will of God without the intervention of any instrument, D. AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS responded on the same page, fol. 676: "Faith is not an instrument by which election itself is apprehended, but by which the electing grace of God and the merit of Christ, on which the election of salvation is founded, are apprehended; just as in justification, faith is not said to apprehend justification itself, but the justifying grace of God, procured by the merit of Christ."

Others, therefore, to cut off all opportunity for caviling, have preferred to call faith a condition of election, or a condition required on the part of the object to be chosen, or a part of the predestinarian order, among whom is D. MEISNER in Anthropologia, decade II, disputation XIV, p. 153: "When faith is called a cause of election, you should not understand a principal, impelling, and meritorious cause, but only an instrumental one, and indeed not of the whole decree, but rather of a part, namely the merit of Christ, which faith apprehends. Since it is a cause of a part of the decree, hence in popular speech it is called the cause of the decree itself. It is more fitting, however, to call faith either a condition of election, lest it be imagined to be absolute, or a part of the predestinarian order, which God from eternity regarded no less than the death of Christ." Indeed, D. DANNHAVER in Hodosophia Phanomenon, VII, p. 576, calls faith a testamentary condition, to which the testator and elector God has respect.

But D. MUSAEUS observed in his dissertation De aeterno praedestinationis decreto, D. 65ff., p. 47, that these ways of speaking do not lucidly express the respect or relationship of faith to the decree of election itself. To be sure, the term 'condition' is general, and it indeed insinuates the necessity of faith on the part of the man being chosen, but whether faith is necessary in itself, as a habit or an act, or rather by reason of the object which it apprehends, and how it relates to the decree of election itself, is not signified by it. Likewise, to be a 'part of the predestinarian order' is something common to faith with other things included in the predestinarian order, nor can it be understood from the force of the words whether faith is included in it only as a means of execution, or also as a cause or reason of the decree, and that a principal or less principal one. Those who have called faith in Christ an instrumental cause of the decree of election did not so much respect the relationship that faith bears precisely to the decree of election, as the relationship that it bears to the apprehending of the merit of Christ, in view of which we are elected.

All these things being weighed, D. MUSAEUS decided that faith, considered in order to the decree of predestination itself, should be called a cause, or a less principal impulsive reason of the decree of election. The words of D. MUSAEUS are in § 70, p. 50: "Therefore, only the term 'less principal cause' or 'impulsive reason' expresses the relationship of faith to the decree of election congruously, exactly, and without impropriety, and it declares that 1) faith relates to the decree of election as a reason for decreeing, or as a reason in view of which the will of God determined itself to choose these rather than those; and yet 2) it does not so relate to it by any proper dignity, goodness, price, or value of its own, but by the goodness, dignity, price, or value of another principal cause or impulsive reason, which is none other than the merit of Christ, which it apprehends and applies to us. For in this consists the nature and concept of a less principal cause or impulsive reason, that it relates to the will of the agent as a reason for willing, not by its own proper goodness, dignity, price, or value (which belongs solely to a principal impulsive cause), but by the goodness, dignity, price, or value of another principal cause or impulsive reason."

Following D. MUSAEUS κατὰ πόδα (step by step) are D. SCHERZER in Systema Theologicum, locus XVIII, p. 488sq., D. FRIDER. BECHMANN in Institutio Theologica, p. 953, D. CHRISTOPH. FRANCK in Exercitationes Anti-Wendelin, exerc. II, p. 85, D. BAYER in Compendium Theologiae, p. 153. Nor does D. BALTHASAR MEISNER dissent in substance, in Anthropologia, decade II, disputation XIV, p. 153, saying: "It seems most fitting not to consider faith separately, as a peculiar cause of election distinct from the merit of Christ, but jointly together with the apprehended merit itself, so that both coupled together constitute one impelling cause of election. For neither merit without application, nor faith by itself, moved God to elect, but both conjoined in foreknowledge, that is, the merit of Christ apprehended by faith, or faith apprehending the merit of Christ." Therefore, in D. MEISNER's judgment, the relationship of faith to election is such as a cause or impulsive reason has to that of which it is said to be the cause; yet not insofar as it is considered separately or absolutely in itself, but insofar as it is considered from the side of the merit of Christ, so that they are not like two associate or partial causes, but as subordinate causes, and in the manner of a principal and an instrumental cause (which, just as in the genus of efficient cause they produce the effect with one influx, though they are otherwise distinguished among themselves, so in the genus of impulsive cause they move the will of the agent to decree with, as it were, one impulse), the merit of Christ and faith relate to the decree of election. See D. BAYER's Compendium Theologiae, p. 958. Moreover, it should not be passed over in silence that D. CALOV solicitously observed that faith in Christ contributes no proper dignity or activity to the decree of election, but here behaves only passively, in Systema Theologicum, vol. X, p. 632. Yet the same author concedes that faith moves God not κυρίως (properly), but ὀργανικῶς (instrumentally), since misery itself is commonly said to have moved God, the father of mercies, to receive us into grace, justification, and election, which is a προκαταρκτική (preliminary) cause. Why then should this not rather be said of faith—or of the merit of Christ apprehended by faith—which in a more eminent way are a προκαταρκτική (preliminary) cause in this most holy matter? loc. cit., p. 655. D. WILHELM LYSER also teaches that faith behaves passively in the mystery of election, in Systema Theologicum, p. 761, saying: "Faith here is not considered as a quality, but as a passive means of receiving Christ." D. FECHTIUS agrees, who in Sylloge controversiarum recentiorum, disputation XIX, says: "Faith is a passive instrument for apprehending electing grace, analogous to a physical cause." Nor does D. DANNHAVER seem to disagree in Hodosophia Phenomenon, VII, p. 576: "Faith here is not a work, or a merit, but the foreseen hand of a beggar." Whence nothing glorious in the least is left to faith, which receives, not gives or acquires. Whence also God saw no active dignity in man, no good that was not from Himself. "Faith, although it is not a cause of the decree, is nevertheless a receptive instrument of salvation, foreseen in the decree." He does not, in the meantime, deny that faith is a reason for the predestinarian decree; for it is not because God decreed to elect Paul that he believed, but because Paul constantly believed and did not resist the means of salvation, he was elected by God to eternal life. Let us also hear D. HOLTZFUS, a theologian from Frankfurt, devoted to the reformed religion, in his dissertation De predestinatione, p. 142, discoursing in the following manner: "The Evangelicals agree 1) that faith enters the decree of election and constitutes a part of the divine τάξεως (order); for as God saves no one in time without faith, so also He decreed to save no one without faith. 2) That faith is a necessary means, or condition, for obtaining salvation. 3) That faith is required of us, as our duty to be performed by us. 4) That this faith, however, is not from us, but its principle is the grace of God. 5) That this faith is not the act of mercenaries, but the act or organ of beggars." From these things it becomes clear that the authors speak in diverse ways about faith in Christ, insofar as it enters the mystery of election, but agree concerning the matter itself. Wherefore, finally, we add the judgment of D. MUSAEUS, which is found in his lectures on the Formula of Concord, p. 372: "Whatever it may be, and by whatever name faith may be designated, will matter little to the issue. For we will raise a dispute with no one on this matter, provided this remains for us: that God from eternity chose only those whom He foresaw would finally believe in Christ; whether He chose them not absolutely, but in view of the merit of Christ to be apprehended by faith, or in view of faith in Christ which they would have in time by His grace; whether, moreover, faith be called a cause, or a condition, or an instrument, will be all the same to us."

Proof a) From 2 Thessalonians 2:13: "God chose you from the beginning for salvation through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth."

Observation. a) God chose us ἀπ' ἀρχῆς (from the beginning), i.e., from eternity, Ephesians 1:4. b) "In sanctification of the Spirit," i.e., through the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit, by which faith is kindled and conferred. c) "In belief of the truth," which is of course held in the evangelical truth and rests upon it, and is therefore true, solid, and salvific faith. From these we argue: Whoever were chosen from the beginning for salvation in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth, were not themselves chosen absolutely, but with respect to a faith that would exist in time. But sinners who do not spurn the means of grace were chosen from the beginning, etc. Therefore.

2. From James 2:5: "Has not God chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith?" St. Apostle teaches that not all men have been elected to eternal life, not the wealthy of this age who trust in earthly riches, not certain men absolutely, regarded without the application of the merit of Christ, but those rich in faith, who indeed apprehend the riches of divine grace and the merit of Christ by faith. From which it is gathered that even a weak faith is objectively opulent, because it embraces Christ, the highest good, just as the tender hand of an infant holds even the most precious pearl.

3. Whoever were chosen "in Christ," were predestined to eternal life through faith resting on the merit of Christ. But sinners, prevented by divine mercy, were chosen in Christ, Ephesians 1:4. Therefore. The major is established, because where Christ is seen in the business of conferring salvation upon us, there our faith must be present, which embraces Christ; since without faith Christ does not actually profit a sinful man.

4. "We were chosen according to the foreknowledge of God," 1 Peter 1:2; Romans 8:29. Therefore, we were chosen according to the foreknowledge of faith, which would embrace Christ. The consequence is proven, because the object of foreknowledge could have been nothing other than faith in Christ, as the means ordained for righteousness and salvation. For God in the eternal decree of election did not look to our works, our dignity, the use of our free will, but only to the merit of Christ. But because that is applied to no one, nor profits without faith, hence the eyes of the Lord are said to look for faith, Jeremiah 5:3. For in substance these phrases do not differ: "we were chosen through the merit of Christ, to be apprehended by faith," and "we were chosen through faith, which would apprehend the merit of Christ." For when we are said to be chosen in view of the merit of Christ, to be apprehended by faith, the merit of Christ behaves in the manner of that which is signified in the nominative case, while faith is signified in an oblique case. But when I say that we were chosen in view of faith in Christ, then faith is signified in the nominative case, while the merit of Christ is connoted in an oblique case, in the manner of an object. If you look at the matter itself, therefore, no difference intervenes. For both are a cause of election. The merit of Christ is the meritorious cause, and therefore the principal impulsive cause. Faith in Christ is the instrumental cause of election, and so the less principal impulsive cause. The former, by the force of its own dignity and value, the latter, by the force of the apprehended merit of Christ, moves God to choose miserable sinners.

5. Whoever are not pleasing to God without faith were not chosen without a view of faith. But men fallen into sin, etc. Therefore. The major is proven, because election is an outstanding argument of special grace, love, and divine good pleasure. Compare Romans 11:5; Ephesians 1:5-6. The minor is proven from Hebrews 11:6: "Without faith it is impossible to please God." 1 Corinthians 1:21: "It pleased God through the folly of what was preached to save those who believe."

You say: We are not pleasing to God without the pursuit of good works, Luke 6:46; 1 Thessalonians 1:3, and yet we were not chosen through works. Therefore, although we are not pleasing to God without faith, it does not follow that we were chosen through faith.

Response. We are pleasing to God through faith, as a means apprehending Christ, who is the singularly most beloved Son of God, in whom, through whom, and on account of whom, God loves us and chooses us for eternal life. The pursuit of good works, however, is not a means of apprehending Christ, but is the fruit of the Spirit in a believing man. Therefore, we were chosen so that we might be holy and blameless, but we were not chosen so that we might be in Christ through faith; but because, according to divine foreknowledge, we are through faith—kindled by the Holy Spirit through the gospel—in Christ, therefore God has loved us in Christ our mediator and redeemer, and having so loved us, has chosen us for eternal life. Ephesians 1:4-7.

6. The elect in the scriptures are described: a) as being μένοντες πιστεύειν (those who will believe) in Christ, 1 Timothy 1:16; John 17:20. Therefore, God from the assembly of sinners chose only those whom He foresaw would believe in Christ. b) As being sons of God predestined εἰς υἰοθεσίαν (unto adoption) (consummate and glorious), Ephesians 1:5. But without faith no one is a son of God, John 1:12. Therefore, without a view of faith no one is predestined εἰς υἰοθεσίαν.

7. Our assertion is proven from the harmony, or conformity, of the eternal decree of election and its execution. By that which, as a cause or less principal impulsive reason, God saves us in time, by that same, as a cause or less principal reason, He decreed from eternity to confer salvation upon us in time. But faith in Christ is that by which, as a cause or less principal impulsive reason, God saves us in time. Therefore. The major is established, because the execution of salvation in time is a mirror of the eternal decree. For the temporal mode of saving cannot be other than that which is defined in the eternal decree of God; otherwise, the constancy, immutability, and wisdom of God would waver. The minor is proven from those places of scripture where we are said to be justified by faith, from faith, through faith. Romans 3:28; Habakkuk 2:4; Ephesians 2:8; Hebrews 10:38. Where a certain causality is ascribed to faith in the order of our salvation, and that not of an efficient or principal impulsive cause, but of an instrumental and less principal impulsive cause, that is, that God, who saves, is moved to will to save through faith, not indeed regarded by reason of its own dignity (for we are not said to be saved on account of faith), but insofar as it apprehends the merit of Christ, so that in view of it, God wills to save and does save.

Proof b. By the name of faith, which we call the moving reason of election, is not understood πρόσκαιρος (temporary) faith, which fails in time of temptation or is extinguished by sins against conscience, but persevering faith, which the Apostle calls μέχρι τέλους βεβαίαν (firm to the end), Hebrews 3:6. Moreover, persevering faith is called not only that which never fails, but also that which is kindled again in a man's heart before the end of life and lasts to the end, even if a man has fallen from it for a time. That God, in the eternal decree of election, had respect not to temporary faith, but to persevering faith, is clear 1) from the apostolic chain, Romans 8:29-30: "Those whom God predestined, them he also glorified." But God does not glorify those who believe for a time and later cast off their faith; therefore, He did not predestine them to eternal life. 2) The crown of righteousness is decreed for those who keep the faith, 2 Timothy 4:8. 3) "He who endures to the end will be saved," Matthew 10:22, 24:13. And to the man faithful unto death will be given the crown of life, Revelation 2:10.

The antithesis is 1) that of certain Scholastics and Papists; 2) that of certain doctors of the Reformed, who deny that we were chosen in view of persevering faith in Christ. Whose stronger arguments are:

I. Whatever action of God is immanent, immediate, and inorganic, is not done through faith as a means or instrument. But election is an immanent, immediate, and inorganic action of God. Therefore. The major is established; because an immanent and inorganic action is not done through an instrument, nor does it admit an instrumental cause. The minor is clear in itself; because election is performed within the very bosom of the deity, without the intervention of any instrument. Response. Evangelical theologians do not teach that faith is an instrument of the decree of election itself, by which election is performed or apprehended; but they assert that God, in choosing certain men, had respect to their persevering faith as an ὄργανον ληπτικόν (receptive organ), or receptive instrument, by which both the merit of Christ, on account of which we are chosen, and the electing grace of God to eternal life are received or apprehended; just as faith is commonly called the instrumental cause of justification, not as if it were an instrument by which the act of justification itself is apprehended, but because it behaves in the manner of an instrument by which that on account of which we are justified, namely the merit of Christ, is apprehended and applied to us. But in order to the decree of election itself, faith in Christ behaves in the manner of a cause, or a less principal impulsive reason.

Objection: A receptive instrument cannot be an impulsive cause, since its force is not so great that it can move the acting cause; but the acting cause is moved in view of a meritorious cause. Response. A distinction must be made between a principal impulsive cause and a less principal one. A meritorious cause is a principal impulsive cause, which by its own goodness, dignity, and value moves the agent. But a receptive organ can be a less principal impulsive cause. For example, a chest, which is indeed made of the vilest material but contains a most precious diamond, can move a man to esteem and love it, not through itself or its own dignity, but on account of the most noble gem it contains. Thus faith in Christ moves God to choose, not through itself, not by its own force or value, but by the force of the merit of Christ which it embraces.

II. An effect of election cannot be the reason moving God to make the decree of election. Faith in Christ is an effect of election. Therefore. The major is clear; because the reason moving God to choose is, in the order of nature, prior to election itself; but an effect is posterior. The minor is proven; 1) from Acts 13:48: "And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed." By which words it is indicated that the ordination to eternal life, or election, is the cause of faith. 2) From John 10:26: "You do not believe, because you are not my sheep."

Response. a) Generally: Faith, actually existing in the heart of man, is an effect of regeneration, not of election, although it is a consequent of the latter. For election was made from eternity, while actual faith is given in time. b) Specifically to 1): The passage in Acts 13:48 does not deal with eternal predestination, but with a disposition in time. See above, chapter I, Question IX, observation V. But suppose the cited passage is to be understood of the eternal decree of predestination; by what law of consequence will it be deduced from it that election is the cause of faith? The causal particle "because" or "for" is not in the text. For it is not said: "certain ones believed, because they were ordained to eternal life," but: "as many as were ordained to eternal life believed." Luke's proposition is therefore not reduplicative, or designative of a cause, but specificative of a subject, so that the sense is: those men believed whom God had foreseen would observe the order of salvation, and in view of that had destined them for eternal salvation. To 2); The particle "because" in John 10:26 does not express a cause, but notes the reason of an a posteriori consequence, just as it is taken in Luke 7:47: "Her many sins have been forgiven, because she loved much."

Objection: LUTHER himself, in his preface to the epistle to the Romans, prefixed to our German Bibles, asserts that faith in Christ flows from election. Therefore faith in Christ, according to LUTHER, is an effect of election, and thus not its impulsive reason. Response. LUTHER in that passage speaks of election in a broader signification, by which it denotes the entire economy of salvation, or the whole ordination of those to be saved unto salvation, embracing all the causes and means of salvation, in which sense it is also taken in the Formula of Concord, Declaration, p. 82. If it is taken in this broader signification, there is no doubt that faith is rightly called its effect. We, however, use the name of election in its strictest signification, by which it notes the divine decree concerning the imparting of eternal salvation to men who will finally believe, in view of the merit of Christ and of foreseen faith in Christ.

III. Whatever is a gift of God, depending efficiently on God alone and in no way coming to us from our own powers, cannot be a cause or impulsive reason for the divine will to decree eternal salvation for us. But faith in Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, since the acting cause is moved to love and choose one over another, not by that gift which is from the acting cause itself, but by a gift or quality proceeding from the person loved, or existing in them. Response. 1) It is not contradictory for something to be a gift of the lover and at the same time a motive for love. Canticles 4:9: Christ, the heavenly bridegroom, professes of his bride's necklace and eyes (namely, his own gifts) that his soul was captivated by those eyes and that necklace. Christ himself is the gift of the Father who loves us, John 3:16, by whom, however, the Father is moved to embrace us with love, Ephesians 1:6. 2) Faith in Christ, notwithstanding that it is a gift of God, is the cause why in time God justifies and saves us; why could it not also, from eternity, have been the cause why he chose us for salvation?

IV. In whom God found nothing that could move him to love and elect them, God predestined them to eternal salvation by an absolute decree, without view of any motive existing in them. But in men fallen into sin, God found nothing, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven, because he chose men dead in sins, inept for every good work, guilty of eternal death. But in such men God found nothing that could move him to love and election. Response. 1) To the major: In whom there was nothing, neither by nature nor by supernatural grace, that could move God to love and election, their election was made by an absolute decree; I grant it. But although in those whom God chose there was nothing by nature, there was nevertheless something by grace (not indeed in act, but in potency, as that which would in reality and act one day exist in them, just as sin was also only in potency in them), namely, faith in Christ, which by the power of the apprehended merit of Christ moved God to love and election. For God made us pleasing to himself in the Beloved, Ephesians 1:6. 2) To the minor: God chose men dead in sins, inept for every good work, and guilty of eternal death; not insofar as they were still such in the divine foreknowledge when they were chosen (for men dead in sins are hateful to God), but insofar as in the divine foreknowledge they are redeemed by Christ, regenerated by the power of the Holy Spirit, gifted with faith in Christ, and thus, with all offenses forgiven, rendered accepted by God in his beloved Son.

V. Whatever did not exist from eternity, in view of it the eternal decree of God concerning the choosing of certain men was not formed. But faith in Christ, etc. Therefore. Response. Whatever did not exist from eternity, neither as to its real being, nor as to its known being, or as an object in the divine mind, in view of it the eternal decree of election was not formed by God; I grant it. But although faith in Christ did not exist from eternity according to its real being, it was nevertheless from eternity according to its known being, or objectively in the divine mind, to which even future things are most present. For faith, as a less principal impulsive reason of election, exercises its function not according to its real being, but according to its objective being and as known by the divine intellect; for it moves the will of God not through itself, but by the power of the apprehended merit of Christ.

Others briefly distinguish between actual faith and foreseen faith. Actual faith is conferred in time by the grace of the Holy Spirit, but foreseen faith is from eternity, in the infinite light of the divine intellect.

VI. Faith is the instrumental cause, both of salvation which occurs in time, and of election to salvation which was made from eternity. We are said to be saved not on account of faith, but through faith. Therefore, faith is not the impulsive cause of election. Response. Faith is called an instrumental and impulsive cause of salvation, and likewise of election, in different respects. It is an instrumental cause insofar as it apprehends and applies to us the merit of Christ, on account of which we are saved in time and were elected from eternity. It is, however, a moving reason, or an impulsive cause, if it is considered in order to the decree of election itself, or to the very act of the divine will by which he decreed to save us. We were not, however, elected on account of faith, as a meritorious or principal impulsive cause, but through faith, as a less principal impulsive cause, or in view of faith, or from foreseen faith.

You say: Certain theologians have refused to call faith an impulsive cause of election. Thus says D. B. MEISNER in Anthropologia, decade II, disp. XIV, p. 153: "When faith is called a cause of election, you should not understand a principal, impelling, or meritorious cause." Compare D. HUTTER in F.C. p. 1103; D. AEGID. HUNN. in treatise De providentia & praedestinatione, p. 678. Response. Those authors by impulsive cause understand meritorious, or a principal impulsive cause. And indeed the term "impulsive cause," taken so nakedly and without addition, stands, by usage of speech, for its more famous signification, and denotes that which by its own merit, or its own certain goodness, dignity, and perfection, moves the efficient cause to act. Since this is not fitting for faith, we too are scrupulous to call it so absolutely and simply the impulsive cause of election. But where, with the distinction of impulsive cause into principal and less principal having been employed, it has been established that for a less principal cause, its own certain merit is not required in the same way as for a meritorious one, not its own certain goodness or dignity, but it is sufficient that by the force of another's merit, goodness, or dignity, it behaves as a reason in view of which the will of the agent determines itself to act, for example, the will of God determines itself, or determined itself from eternity, to decree our salvation; so far are our theologians from denying, or that they do deny, that faith is a less principal impulsive cause of the decree of election, that they all attribute the very thing denoted by the term "less principal cause" to faith in Christ, however much they may state it in different and various words. For with great agreement they teach that faith, besides being an instrument for apprehending the merit of Christ, also enters into the decree of election itself, so that God looks upon it and takes account of it in decreeing our salvation, not on account of any dignity or merit of its own, but on account of the apprehended merit of Christ. Compare D. MUSAEUS in dissertation De praedestinatione, § 62, 63.

VII. If God chose sinners in view of faith, He certainly also chose them in view of inherent holiness or good works. But God did not choose sinners in view of inherent holiness, but so that they might be holy. Therefore, He also chose them not in view of foreseen faith, but so that they might believe. The consequence of the major is proven; because faith and holiness of life are connected by an indivisible bond. In whatever way, therefore, faith enters the decree of election, in the same way holiness of life relates to it. The consequent is evident, because we were chosen not because we are holy, but that we might be holy and blameless, Ephesians 1:4. Response. Not everything that is conjoined always acts conjunctly, or in the same way. Justifying faith, the pursuit of good works, and peace of conscience are conjoined; yet faith alone is the means by which the justifying grace of God, founded on the merit of Christ, is accepted. Whence it is wrong to argue; Just as God justifies us that we may walk in newness of life, so He justifies us that we may believe.

Objection: But faith is a part of inherent holiness. It is therefore rightly concluded: God chose us that we might be holy; therefore, He chose us that we might believe. Response. Faith is considered in a twofold way. In one way, as it is a quality inherent in us and a Christian virtue, and the mother of the other virtues; in another, insofar as it is an organ for apprehending the merit of Christ, and as it is regarded from the side of what is apprehended or to be apprehended by it. But can it not be that faith, which is a part of holiness, besides manifesting itself in us for the sanctimony of life, is also an organ for apprehending the merit of Christ, and in this view an impulsive reason for election? Does not something similar happen in justification, namely that faith, which is a part of holiness, is also an organ for apprehending the merit of Christ, and from the side of what is apprehended by it, an impulsive reason for justification? Compare D. MUSAEUS, loc. cit., § 320. (*).

VIII. If foreseen faith in Christ impelled God to our election made from eternity, the same likewise impelled God to our calling made in time. But the consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven; because just as God chose us from eternity, so He called us in time, as the Apostle testifies, 2 Timothy 1:9. The falsity of the consequent is manifest, because we were called so that we might believe, not because we believe.

Response. I deny the consequence, because the calling is universal and common to both the reprobate and the elect, whereas election is particular. The former pertains to the antecedent will of God, which the condition of faith follows; the latter pertains to the consequent will of God, which presupposes the condition of faith.

IX. If election depends on foreseen faith, it follows that we chose God first. But the consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is clear; because if God, before He chose us, foresaw that we would believe, and therefore chose us, He would surely have chosen us because in His foreknowledge we were adhering to Him, and had already chosen Him before; for he who adheres to God, having neglected Satan, has chosen Him. Response. 1) We do not posit a dependence of election on any cause, because dependence requires a formally causing cause. 2) I deny the consequence of the major. For it does not follow that we chose God because in His foreknowledge we were adhering to Him. For the sense is; God foresaw that we would adhere to Him. But from this it does not follow that we chose God first, but only this; that God, before He chose us, saw that we would choose Him, i.e., that we would adhere to Him rather than to Satan, or believe in Him, and that not from our own powers, but through divine grace. For He chose us not by reason of a faith actually existing, but of one still future and foreseen for salvation.

<sup>147</sup> (*) Moral holiness, or, as it is usually called, inherent, which must be carefully distinguished from the imputed holiness and righteousness of Christ, entirely follows justification. For before Christ becomes ἁγιασμός (sanctification) for us, it is necessary that the same become δικαιοσύνην (righteousness) for us, 1 Corinthians 1:30. But we are declared just in the divine forum in no other way than by reason of one trust, correctly placed in the meritorious Christ, and in him alone. This salutary and singular trust, therefore, placed entirely in Christ, is nothing other than the instrument by which we embrace the highest benefit of God, grace and salvation, procured by the merits of Christ. Therefore, it precedes, just as δικαιοσύνην (righteousness) attributed to us, so also ἁγιασμόν (sanctification). Whatever precedes a thing is not to be numbered among the parts that constitute it and pertain to its nature. Therefore, that salutary trust is not a certain part of holiness of life, and thus not a virtue; but it is the cause and principle from which all virtue proceeds, as PETER testifies in his latter letter, chapter 1, v. 5. I add this; Virtue, strictly and properly so called, and regarded generally (to which is contrary vitiosity, the common name for all vices), is the habit and firm alacrity of a mind disposed to perform all that is consonant with the divine laws, which are discerned from the Gospel. But salutary trust, to be placed in Christ the sponsor, must be referred entirely to the Gospel, which indeed announces and offers to us the benefits to be conferred on us on account of Christ, and to be received in their proper order, not to the law, which demands duties to be done by us; whereas general trust, or faith to be had in God, is one of the principal duties commanded by the law. And yet, right-thinking theologians, like the Blessed Man, when they consider that singular and salutary trust, to be placed solely in the meritorious Christ, is to be numbered in some way among the parts of holiness, and thus among the virtues, they wish the name of inherent holiness to extend more broadly, so that in its compass it contains the entire condition of a soul born anew, and reconciled to God and renewed, and speaking no less broadly and generally, by the name of virtue they signify the disposition and alacrity of the soul to holily observe all that, whether to be received, or to be done or omitted, whatever it may be and insofar as it is conformable to the divine will, whether evangelical or legal.

X. If foreseen faith in Christ is the cause of election, the object of election will be a justified man. But the consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven, because he who believes in Christ is justified. The falsity of the consequent is evident, because justification occurs in time. Response. I deny the consequence of the major. For just as foreseen faith denotes a faith that will one day exist, so it implies a future justification, not one really present. From which it follows that the object of eternal election was a man not actually believing, but who would believe, and thus by grace not yet restored and justified, but who would one day be restored and justified.

XI. Whatever election is gratuitous was not made according to the foreknowledge of our faith. But our election to eternal life, etc. Therefore. The major is proven, because the gratuitous benefits of God exclude every condition that is from us. The minor is established from Romans 11:5-6. Response. That which is gratuitous excludes our merits, not the τάξις (order) divinely established. Faith here is not a work or merit, but a receptive instrument of the merit of Christ and, as it were, the foreseen hand of a beggar, which does not give, does not acquire by laboring, but receives from the mercy of a giving God. Nor is faith itself from man, but from the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit.

XII. If God first intends the salvation of men before He decreed to gift them with faith, the decree of election concerning the salvation of certain men is absolute with respect to faith. But the antecedent is true. Therefore, so is the consequent. The consequence of the major is proven, because, it being posited that the decree of election is respective, it is necessary for faith to be prior to the decree of election in the sign of divine reason. The antecedent is evident, because faith is the means, eternal life its end, 1 Peter 1:9. But no wise person first decrees to give the means, then to give the end. The thought of the end is always prior to the thought of the means. The end is first in intention, although it may be last in execution.

Response. A distinction is made between the antecedent and consequent will of God. By His antecedent will, God indeed first intends the salvation of men before He thought of the means of salvation (in our way of conceiving). Since this will of God is universal and conditioned, by it God willed to save all men under the condition of persevering faith. But by His consequent will, God willed to confer eternal salvation determinately, categorically, and simply upon certain particular persons, whose constant faith in Christ He foreknew from eternity. By this consequent will, by which God elected us to eternal salvation, foreseen faith in Christ is prior in our way of understanding.

Question X. What is the directing, or norming, principle according to which election was made?

The directing, or norming, principle according to which election was divinely instituted is either the first and mediate, or the proximate and immediate. The first norming principle is πρόθεσις (purpose), or the divine proposal, by which God from eternity willed that all fallen men should be saved, whoever would perseveringly believe in Christ a). The proximate norming principle is πρόγνωσις (foreknowledge), or the divine prescience, by which God from eternity foresaw which men in the individual would in time finally believe in Christ b).

Proof a. St. Paul teaches in Ephesians 1:11 that we are προορισθέντες κατὰ πρόθεσιν (predestined according to the purpose) of God. He says the same in 2 Timothy 1:9: "God saved us and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given to us in Christ Jesus before the ages began." And Romans 8:28: "We know that for those who love God all things work together for good, (for those, namely) who are called according to his purpose. For those whom he foreknew, he also predestined."

Observation 1. That πρόθεσις (purpose), or the purpose of God, is taken by some Theologians in a stricter signification and is referred to the consequent will of God. Thus says D. KOENIG in Theologia Positiva, p. 115: "The first norming principle is πρόθεσις, which here is not taken for the purpose of the first pity, nor for the purpose of universal mercy, which pertains to the antecedent will of God, indeed is the very antecedent will of God itself; but most strictly and most specially concerning the purpose of saving those who are to persevere in Jesus Christ even to the end of life, John 3:16, which itself is none other than an act of the consequent will." D. QUENSTEDT uses the same words in Systema Theologicum, part III, chap. II, fol. 17. Yet the same author, on fol. 42 of the same passage, takes the purpose of God in a broader signification, saying: "ἡ πρόθεσις (the purpose), or the purpose of God, respects and ordains the means of salvation 1) to be acquired, Christ the redeemer, 2) to be offered and dispensed, the word and sacraments, 3) to be received, faith in Christ, whose end is the salvation of souls, 1 Peter 3:9. According to this purpose of God, predestination was made, which approves foreseen faith and applies the promised salvation to believers." The same is asserted by D. HULSEMANN in Breviarium enucleatum, p. 975: "Πρόθεσις is the εὐδοκία (good pleasure) of God, by which He, having foreseen the first fall of all, by His antecedent will decreed to save all men whatsoever, 1 Timothy 2:4, and indeed if they should finally believe in Christ. And this was the first of all the decrees in the business of predestination, which includes a) the foreseen and permitted sin of created man, b) the redeemer from this sin, Christ, c) the calling, and d) the offered grace of believing." This purpose of saving is universal and of the antecedent will, whereas predestination is particular and of the consequent will. Compare D. DANNHAVER, Hodosophia Phanomenon, VII, p. 574, and D. SEBAST. SCHMID, in Aphorisms of Theology, p. 292.

Observation 2. Πρόθεσις (purpose), or the purpose of God, is not predestination itself, but, as it were, a rule and normative principle. For we are said to be predestined κατὰ πρόθεσιν (according to purpose), Ephesians 1:11.

Observation 3. Πρόθεσις is the first directing principle of election, not immediate, but mediate. For the reason that it concurs in election by means of προγνώσει (foreknowledge), or the foreseeing of individuals who will finally believe.

Proof b. That προγνώσει (foreknowledge), or the divine prescience, is the proximate and immediate norming principle of election is clear from Romans 8:29: οὓς προέγνω, καὶ προώρισε (those whom he foreknew, he also predestined) (to be in Christ Jesus through faith, according to v. 1). The same is established from 1 Peter 1:2, where we are said to be chosen κατὰ προγνώσειν (according to the foreknowledge) of God the Father. The reason is that if you were to remove the eye of prescience, the election would be blind. By προγνώσειν, however, is understood not a general and indefinite prescience, which extends to both good and evil things, but a most singular one, and determined to certain objects, which is a knowledge κατ' ὄνομα (by name), John 10:3. For Christ calls his sheep κατ' ὄνομα (by name), that is, he knows individually and distinctly the names of the particular persons who will finally believe in Christ. "Rejoice," says Christ, "that your names are written in heaven," Luke X, 20. And Paul says, 2 Tim. II, 19: "The firm foundation of God stands, having this seal: the Lord knows who are his, and let everyone who names the name of Christ depart from iniquity". By the firm foundation, the Apostle notes the irrevocable purpose or counsel of God for saving men through faith in Christ, the seal of which, as it pertains to us, concerning the gracious will of God toward us, by which each of the faithful is sealed by the Holy Spirit, is προγνώσειν (foreknowledge), by which He specifically knows and embraces His own with His grace, that is, each individual believing in Christ.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who deny that the decree of electing men, made before the ages, concerns certain individuals by name, asserting on the contrary that election is a general decree, and regards in general all those who believe and obey God who calls them to salvation. They urge especially that the sayings of Holy Scripture which deal with election are general, not conceived of certain individuals. Thus Paul says in general, that God "has chosen us". Eph. I, 4. Generally, the kingdom is said to be prepared from eternity for all who have fed Christ, Matth. XXV, 34. Response: Because God chose certain individuals by name, the Apostle could therefore truly say that God "has chosen us," for to this pronoun the Apostle includes himself as an individual. Nor could the kingdom have been destined by an omniscient God generally for all who would feed Christ, in such a way that He did not know determinately who they were by name. For God knows (even from eternity, Acts XV, 18) who are His, 2 Tim. II, 19, whose names He has written in the book of life of the Lamb, Rev. XIII, 8. We gather from these things that predestination, with respect to its object, is individual. Cf. Dr. W. LYSERUS in System. theol. p. 758.

Question XI: In what does election formally consist?

Election formally consists a) in the eternal segregation of certain individuals, according to the foreknowledge of final faith in Christ, from the common mass of lost men; and b) their ordination to eternal salvation according to the purpose of God.

Obs. The form of the eternal decree concerning the salvation of certain men, according to Dr. SCHERZER in System theol. loc. XVIII p. 518, consists in the συνδρομὴ προθέσεως, προγνώσεως & προορισμοῦ (concurrence of purpose, foreknowledge, and predestination), in the concurrence or conflux of the divine purpose, prescience, and predestination. For thus the Apostle says: "To those who love God all things work together for good; to those, I say, who are called according to his purpose (πρόθεσιν); for whom he foreknew (προέγνωσε), he also predestined (προώρισε), to be conformed to the image of his son". Rom. VIII, 28, ff. From which emerges such a

Predestinatory Syllogism:

- Everyone who will perseveringly believe in Christ until the end of life will certainly be saved, and is therefore elect and inscribed in the book of life.

- But this one, that one, this other one, Abraham, Peter, Paul, etc., will perseveringly believe in Christ until the end of life.

- Therefore this one, a that one, this other one, Abraham, Peter, Paul, etc., will certainly be saved, and are therefore elect and inscribed in the book of life.

The major proposition is the πρόθεσις (purpose), or divine purpose concerning the salvation of sinful men who will finally believe in Christ. The minor is formed by πρόγνωσις (foreknowledge), by which God from eternity foresaw which individuals would finally believe in time. From which follows the conclusion, which contains the προορισμόν (predestination), or election itself formally, by which God from eternity decreed to save this one, that one, this other one, certainly and infallibly at the appointed time. There are not, indeed, with respect to the reality, dianoetic acts succeeding one another in order in God, because of the supreme simplicity and immutability of God; but that we conceive of signs of the divine reason, presenting a certain order according to divine revelation, is a weakness of our conception.

Proof a. That the segregation of certain individual men from the common company of sinners is a formal act of election is clear from the words of Christ, John XV, 19: "I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hates you". By "the world" is designated the entire unregenerate human race, and therefore contaminated by sin, indulging in the pleasures of the flesh, and liable to divine wrath and eternal damnation. Rom. III, 19. Christ therefore says: "I have chosen you out of the world," that is, I have separated you from the world, which lies wholly in wickedness, as if in a leaven, 1 John V, 19. I have set you apart from the common mass of perdition, and have set you aside for myself as a peculiar people. Observe that by the eternal decree of election, a segregation of those who will finally believe was made from the common mass, not an external and real one, such as will happen in time, Matth. XXV, 32, but an internal and mental one, and that an honorable one, by which God in His decree preferred believers to unbelievers. For in every election, by an act of the mind and will, the better is preferred to the worse.

Proof b. Since election, which happens through determination to an end, is situated between a starting point and a destination, the other formal act of election is the eternal ordination or destination of men who will embrace Christ with constant faith to eternal life. For God "chose us from the beginning for salvation". 2 Thess. II, 13. This ordination to eternal salvation is made κατὰ πρόθεσιν (according to purpose), according to the divine purpose, which is explained by Christ in lucid words, John, VI, 40: "This is the will of him who sent me, that everyone who sees the Son and believes in him should have eternal life". From which believers are also called τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον (ordained), that is, destined by a certain order to eternal life, Acts XIII, 48.

Question XII: Is the eternal decree of election, therefore, to be established as absolute, or conditioned?

The eternal decree of election is not absolute, but ordered a) and respective; b) nor is it conditioned, but categorical and simple c).

Proof a. That the decree of election is not absolute, but ordered, or determined by a certain order of means, is clear from the fact that we are said to be elect according to the purpose of God, by which He ordained the means of acquiring, offering, and receiving salvation. Concerning which Paul says in 1 Cor. I, 21: "It pleased God through the foolishness of preaching to save those who believe".

Proof b. That the decree of predestination is respective is clear; because God, when He predestined some from among fallen men, and indeed these rather than those, to eternal life, had respect to something outside Himself, as to an external impulsive cause, namely the merit of Christ, to be apprehended by persevering faith. This we have demonstrated above in Q. 8 & 9.

Proof c. The decree of predestination, insofar as, taken precisely and most strictly, it denotes the eternal decree of imparting eternal salvation to those who will finally believe, in view of the merit of Christ and the foreknown faith in certain individuals, is not conditioned with a condition concerning the future, but is categorical and simple, as Dr. SEBASTIAN SCHMID says in colleg. bibl. posteriori pag. 235. For God simply and categorically decreed to save this, that, and the other man, because He certainly foresaw his persevering faith in Christ. Dr. MUSAEUS shows this clearly in dissert. de decreto elect. p. 273: "Although we say the decree of election was made in view of foreseen faith, we by no means say it was conditioned, or made under the condition of faith, but if it is called absolute in opposition to conditioned, we intrepidly state that the decree of election is absolute, or unconditioned, nor do we deny it to be absolute in any other sense than that in which absolute is said to exclude the respect of an impulsive cause outside of God, or an external one". "A decree is not immediately conditioned which is made in view of some impulsive cause; but if it is made in view of an impulsive cause already constituted in act, or distinctly foreknown as future, then it is absolute or unconditioned". "God willed by His immense goodness to grant salvation to all under the condition of faith in Christ, which was a conditioned will, but not a conditioned decree of election". "Because, however, God from eternity had it known and perceived that not all would by his grace believe in Christ, but some would, and He distinctly knew those who would believe, He willed to bestow salvation on these whom He foresaw would believe, in view of faith in Christ indeed, or in view of the merit of Christ to be apprehended by faith, yet absolutely, that is, without condition; and this will of His is finally the decree of election, and that unconditioned, or absolute, if absolute is said in opposition to a conditioned decree; but yet not absolute, if absolute is said to exclude the respect of an external impulsive cause", with which Dr. BREITHAUPT agrees in instit. p. 315: "When the decree of predestination is said not to be absolute, it is not on that account to be established as conditioned". "For the meaning is not that God from eternity chose this or that person to salvation, if he were to believe in Christ and depart hence in true faith; but because he was going to believe and persevere; so that faith, viewed before the act of predestination, is in the will of God indeed a condition, under which He desires the salvation of all; but in the decree itself it does not have the nature of a condition under which election was made, but rather as a reason by which God was moved to elect". "Therefore, it is not to be denied that the decree is absolute, in relation to the conditioned, but this is so that the respect of a reason a priori, outside of God, as a part in the predestinatory order, namely of faith in Christ foreseen from eternity, or what amounts to the same thing, of the merit of Christ apprehended by faith, is not excluded". "Nor is the decree to be confused with the antecedent will of God, which, that it does not exclude a condition but rather orders it, we affirm from the word of God (cf. Rom. XI, 23)".

Question XIII: Who are the elect in Christ unto eternal life?

The elect by God in Christ the redeemer are miserable sinful men, not all promiscuously, however they may be constituted a), but those whom God from eternity distinctly foresaw would finally believe in Christ b).

Obs. I. The material object of election are sinful men, considered in the sign of divine reason, or in the foreknowledge of God, as miserable and salvable, and therefore in need of a redeemer: The formal object, or the aspect under which they are predestined, is final faith in Christ, foreseen from eternity by an omniscient God; and therefore the adequate object of predestination are sinful men, but not promiscuously or indifferently all, but those whom God from eternity foresaw would finally believe in Christ.

Obs. II. Some authors distinguish between the specific and the adequate object of predestination. The specific object of election is not Christ himself, not the angels, not man to be created, nor created and constituted in a state of integrity before the fall, but considered in a state of misery after the fall. The ὅλικόν (whole) and adequate object, according to the universal reason of the divine intuition, is the sinner redeemed by Christ, called, illuminated, converted, reborn and endowed with faith, justified and sanctified, whom God from eternity intuited as one who would not reject the first or common grace offered to all who are called, nor the succeeding greater degrees of grace, but would believe through the offered grace, and would persevere in that grace. Cf. Dr. HULSEMANN brev. cap. XV. p. m. 1020. 1024. And JOANN. ADAM. OSIANDER'S colleg. theol. System. parte VI. P. 107. 108. seq.

Proof a. I). Κατ' ἄρσιν (By removal): a) Christ was not elected to glory from the common mass of corruption, of which he was never a part, on account of his miraculous conception by the Holy Spirit, Luke I, 35. We are dealing here with the election of sinful men. But Christ was never in a state of sin, on account of the complete holiness of his entire life, Heb. VII, 26. We are dealing with the election of sinners in Christ, Eph. I, 4. But you would absurdly say that Christ was elected in Christ.

b) Neither good nor evil angels enter the circle of the elect in Christ. The evil ones were reputed by divine judgment as unpitiable, and therefore unsalvable. God did not spare the angels who sinned, says St. Peter in his 2nd Epistle, II, 4. The good angels, however, were never in a state of misery and sin, which is the starting point from which election was made. But where the starting point of predestination, namely misery, has no place, there neither does predestination itself. Election strictly speaking was made in Christ, who is the redeemer and mediator of men, 1 Tim. II, 5, not of angels, Heb. II, 16.

c) The object of election is not man to be created, or creatable, since election presupposes the existence of the object in the sign of divine reason, about which God is to dispose something. Whom God willed to save and glorify, him He first willed to exist. No father thinks of elevating his children to a dignity before begetting them.

d) Man created, and constituted in a state of integrity before the fall, is not the object of election. For the elect are vessels of mercy, Rom. IX, 23. Mercy presupposes misery. But the integral man was not miserable. Man was elected in Christ, Eph. I, 4. But Christ came to save and to seek that which was lost, Luke XIX, 10. The integral man had not perished. Therefore Christ did not come to seek and save the integral man, but the one corrupted by sins.

Proof a. II). Κατὰ θέσιν (By position), or positively: a) From the same existing clay, or mass of corruption, common to the elect and the reprobate (the company of fallen men), God prepared vessels of mercy for eternal glory. Rom. IX, 21. E. He chose fallen men.

b) God made those who were dead in sins sit together in heavenly places. Eph. II, 6.

c) We were elected in Christ. But Christ is the redeemer of sinners. 1 John II, 2.

d) Election includes the remission of sins. For we are said to be chosen, that the glory of God's grace may be praised, in which He made us pleasing (to Himself) in the Beloved, in whom we have redemption through His blood, the remission of sins. Eph. I, 7. E. sinful men are the elect.

Proof b. The object of election is indeed fallen men; but not inasmuch as they are and remain fallen, or sinners, for thus no one is elect or beloved, but all are hated; but inasmuch as they are redeemed by Christ, regenerated by the power of the Holy Spirit, endowed with faith in Christ, and will persevere in this faith to the end of life. Whence the elect are called μέλλοντες πιστεῦειν (those who will believe) in Christ unto eternal life, 1 Tim. I, 16; John XVII, 20. God chose the poor of this world, rich in faith, James II, 5. And whoever are chosen in Christ, Eph. I, 4, they are grafted into Christ as members through faith, on account of the perpetual and indissoluble connection of Christ and faith in the business of salvation. Therefore THEOPHYLACT on Eph. I says: "He chose us through him, that is, through faith in him". But that God chose for heavenly glory not all who would believe, but only those who would persevere in faith until the last breath of life, we have proven in the preceding Qu. IX, proof b.

The antithesis is of certain Pontificians, Scholastics, and other Doctors, in whose opinion the object of election is also Christ, the angels, and man constituted in the state of integrity. There are also those who contend that the decree of creation in the sign of divine reason is posterior to election, that is, God first conceived man as electable, before creatable. Their more important arguments are:

1. Christ himself is said to be predestined, Rom. I, 4. Response: Christ is not said in that place to be προορισθείς (predestined), but ὁρισθεῖς (declared, demonstrated, manifested), so that the sense is; Christ was declared and manifested to be the true and natural Son of God by the most divine resurrection from the dead; since He himself resurrected his own flesh. John X, 17.

3. Christ is called a stone chosen by God, 1 Pet. 2, 4. E. he is not the cause of our election. Response: 1) By a Hebrew phrase, "chosen" means outstanding and excellent; 2) Christ is said to be a stone chosen by God, because He was divinely ordained and constituted as the foundation of the church, of faith, of salvation, and of our election to salvation.

4. Paul makes mention of τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν ἀγγέλων (the elect angels), 1 Tim. V, 21. Therefore angels were also elected not in view of the merit of Christ, because he is not the redeemer of angels; therefore by an absolute decree. Response: 1) The election of angels is not spoken of in that stricter sense in which the election of men, who have fallen into sin and misery, is taken; since it has respect to the merit of Christ and the faith to be fixed in him. 2) The election of angels was not absolute, excluding every foreseen condition, to be fulfilled freely on the part of the angels, but certainly. For just as God in time conferred beatitude on those angels who offered him constant obedience; so God in the eternal decree concerning the election of certain angels to glory benevolently regarded that persevering obedience, not as a meritorious cause; for that obedience was due to the creator and was temporary, and thus had no force of merit with God; but as a non-meritorious condition, which God most liberally compensated beyond what was deserved.

Question XIV: Did God elect all men whatsoever to eternal life?

God did not elect all men promiscuously to eternal life, without any respect to faith in Christ.

Proof. 1. The very word "election" implies particularity. For to elect, when used of persons, signifies to segregate some from a common and promiscuous group. Hence Christ says: "I have chosen you out of the world," John XV, 19.

2. The distinct voice of Christ is: "Many are called, but few are chosen," Matth. XX, 16; c. XXII, 14. It is futile here to distinguish between ἐκλεκτός (elect, as a noun) and ἐκλελεγμένος (chosen, as a participle). For nowhere in the sacred code do we read that few are indeed ἐκλεκτοί (elect), but all are ἐκλελεγμένοι (chosen). For there is no difference between those two. On account of the ἐκλεκτοῦς (elect, noun), whom he ἐξελέξατο (chose, verb), and therefore only ἐκλελεγμένους (chosen, participle), God shortened the days, Mark XIII, 20. For whoever is chosen verbally, is also chosen participially. But every elect person (nominal) is chosen verbally; Therefore.

3. St. Paul clearly testifies that God chose not many wise according to the flesh, not many powerful, not many noble, but the foolish things of the world, 1 Cor. 1, 26, 27, 28.

4. Men were chosen for salvation in the sanctification of the Spirit and belief in the truth, 2 Thess. II, 13. But faith is not of all, 2 Thess. III, 2. Therefore not all men are elect, but only a few, namely those who according to the foreknowledge of God were reborn by the Holy Spirit and endowed with true faith in Christ.

The antithesis was of SAMUEL HUBER, a Bernese from Switzerland, a Wittenberg Theologian, who after the writing of the F.C. in the year 1593, tried to defend a universal election (in the most proper sense), or of all men whatsoever. His principal arguments were:

I. That whose causes are all universal, is itself universal. But all the causes of election are universal; namely the benevolence of God the Father, the merit of the Son, and the call of the Holy Spirit. Therefore election is universal.

Response: That whose causes, both principal and instrumental or less principal, are all universal, is itself universal, I grant. But the instrumental, or less principal cause, namely faith in Christ, is not of all, 2 Thess. III, 2. Instance: Faith is posterior to election. E. it is not a cause. Response: Faith is posterior to predestination with respect to existence, yet it is prior with respect to divine foreknowledge. For God first knew that these or those would finally believe, then in view of this final faith He predestined them to salvation.

II. Of whomever the election is in Christ, their election is universal; But of miserable sinners, etc. E. The major is established; because Christ is the catholic redeemer. The minor is clear from Eph. I, 4. Response; Christ enters the decree of election not absolutely without the application of men, but with respect to the final application, which is made by man apprehending the merit of Christ.

III. Whomever God willed to be holy and blameless, those He chose, Eph. I, 4. But He willed all men to be holy and blameless. E. Response; I deny the major, because the election of men was not made according to the antecedent will of God, by which He wills all men to be holy; but according to the consequent will of God, which follows the πρόγνωσιν (foreknowledge) of the obedience of men, and therefore is concerned with man, inasmuch as he is foreseen as faithful, or obedient. But not all men obey God who demands the pursuit of holiness from all. Therefore not all are elect. Moreover, we argue in a not dissimilar way; Whomever men God willed to be holy and blameless, those He justified; But He willed all men, etc. Therefore.

IV. If God did not elect all men to eternal salvation, He passed over some by an absolute decree; But God passed over no men absolutely. E. He elected all men to eternal salvation. The consequence of the major is evident; because whom God does not elect to salvation, him He passes over in the decree of election. Response; I distinguish between an absolute and an ordered decree. God established this order, that all men through the means of grace should conceive faith in Christ, and retain it until the end of life; those who do not submit themselves to this order, God passes over not absolutely, but on account of their petulant rejection of the means of grace, and final unbelief (*).

Question XV: Can the elect fall into mortal sins, cast off the grace of the Holy Spirit, and completely lose faith in Christ?

Loss of faith. The elect, by obeying the desires of the flesh, can fall into deliberate and deadly sins, cast off the grace of the Holy Spirit, and totally lose saving faith, not indeed until the end of life, but for a time.

Obs. I. The question is not about the fall of the regenerate, who we have shown above sometimes rush into deadly sins, but about the fall of the elect. There is indeed a certain distinction between the regenerate and the elect (**). The regenerate, properly, are those who by the grace of the Holy Spirit have been endowed with true faith in Christ; of whom, however, not a few believe only for a time, extinguishing the received faith by final impenitence. The elect are those who, themselves also being regenerated by the Holy Spirit, fall away from faith for a time, having lapsed into voluntary sins, but they do not finally persist in them, but having fallen they rise again, and truly repent. The regenerate are therefore judged by present faith; The elect by final faith. And therefore not all the regenerate are elect; nor are all the elect always and at all times regenerate. For there are regenerate who on account of final impenitence are reprobated; there are also elect who on account of deliberate sins, in which they indulge, are sometimes not in a state of regeneration.

Obs. II. I distinguish between a total and a final loss of faith. The former is that by which saving faith is entirely lost, so that from a son of grace he becomes a son of wrath; The latter is that by which a man, succumbing to the flesh, deprives himself of true faith, and never recovers it, but departs from this life in unbelief.

We prove the assertion 1) indirectly from the lesser to the greater, taking an argument from the fall of the first-formed humans, who shone with co-created justice, and (*) HUBER erred especially in this, that he himself confused these two things, which must be carefully distinguished; saving grace, both of acquisition and of application, which is both common to all men and is to be offered equally to each one of them (which we constantly maintain against the Reformed), and election to salvation.

(**) This, namely, is the principle of the error in which the Reformed are involved, that they indeed deny temporary faith to be true, and think no one is truly believing and a pupil of efficacious grace, except an elect man, serving their own υποθέσει (hypothesis) of particular grace, and of an absolute, as they barbarously say, decree.

nevertheless fell into a most grievous sin, contracted the offense of God, and broke the bond of gracious union with God. For God had gravely threatened death to the disobedient, Gen. II, 17. Where by the name of death is understood not only corporal death, but also spiritual, which consists in the dissolution of the union with God.

You say: I. Primeval justice could be lost, but evangelical justice is not amissible, which has the promise of stability. Response: Man constituted in the state of integrity was firmer in retaining justice, and was fortified with greater aids against sin, than a regenerated and elect man after the fall. In the former there was excellent wisdom of intellect, perfect holiness of will, and remarkable purity of sensitive appetite; but the latter is partly carnal, sold under sin, who does not recognize what he does; for he does not do what he wills, but what he hates, that he does, Rom. VII, 15, 16.

You say: II. The example of the protoplasts is alien to the purpose, because they never lost faith in Christ, which is the question here, in the state of integrity; for the integral man did not need a mediator. Response: The question here being debated is not only about the loss of justifying faith, but also about the casting off of divine grace, which the protoplasts poured out by their disobedience just as the regenerate and elect after the fall cast it off by deliberate sins.

Proof 2) Directly, and indeed with examples from both the Old and the New Testament. From the Old Testament, we will bring forth only two examples:

a) That of Aaron, whom the Psalmist calls the holy one of the Lord in Ps. CVI, 16. By the casting of the golden calf, he committed two evils: One, that the Israelites should perpetrate the crime of idolatry in reality and deed, which they had only conceived in mind and thought; The other, that what they seemed about to do by a private error, they should do by public authority, when they received the idol from the high priest, around which they might revel. Exception: The sin of Aaron was not deliberate, because he yielded to the clamors of the tumultuous people against his will, and was forced by the insane populace to form the calf. Response: It is a matter of conscience for us to extenuate the great sin of Aaron. For thus Moses says of him in Deut. IX, 20: "Jehovah was very angry with Aaron to destroy him; but I prayed also for Aaron at that time". It was the duty of the high priest to undergo a thousand deaths rather than to assent to the impious desire of the tumultuous people, and to approve a profane worship with his authority.

b) That of King David, whose adultery and homicide are established from 2 Sam. XI, 3, 15. But Paul teaches that adulterers and murderers contract for themselves the guilt of eternal death, Gal. V, 19; 1 Cor. VI, 9. You say: King David did not sin with full will, but from the weakness of the flesh. He committed adultery from boiling concupiscence, which clouded his mind; but the homicide from fear of the infamy that would redound to him. But that he did not completely lose the grace of God is gathered from the fact that God, moved by mercy, sends the prophet Nathan to him, by whose brief admonition he is recalled to do penance. Add that in Ps. LI, 11, he does not pray: "Restore to me your Holy Spirit which has been taken away"; but: "Take not your holy Spirit from me," which is an indication that the Holy Spirit had not been expelled from his heart. Response: If such excuses were of any avail, it would be easy for any enormous sinner to cloak his misdeeds. For who is so ferociously wicked as to want to sin with the fullest choice of mind and freedom of will? For a man is tempted by his own concupiscence, when he is drawn away and enticed. Then concupiscence, after it has conceived, brings forth sin; but sin, when it is finished, brings forth death, James I, 14, 15. David polluted himself with adultery; every adulterer God will judge, Heb. XIII, 4. To adultery he added homicide; every murderer does not have eternal life abiding in him, 1 John III, 15. He sinned securely, doing no penance for ten whole months, and hence was held a Son of death in the judgment of God, 2 Sam. XII, 5. Therefore he completely cast off the indwelling grace of God, although he did not lose the grace of God externally assisting, knocking and exciting, by which he was recalled to the way by the prophet Nathan. David prayed against the removal of the Holy Spirit in Ps. LI not while he still clung impenitently to his sins, but when he repented at the hearing of the prophetic sermon.

From the New Testament, we likewise adduce two examples:

a) One is that of the Apostle Peter, who by denying Christ made a total shipwreck of faith, Matth. XXVI, 70. For he who truly believes in Christ, confesses him, 2 Cor. I, 13. Peter not only did not confess Christ, but moreover even denied him. E. he did not then have true faith. True faith receives Christ, John I, 12; denial repudiates Christ. Therefore true faith does not consist with denial in one heart. True faith overcomes the world, 1 John V, 4. But Peter was overcome by a servant girl. Therefore Peter did not then truly believe. No one who devotes himself to curses and perjures himself has justifying faith in any way. Peter, by denying Christ, devoted himself to curses and perjured himself. E. Where there is need of conversion, there aversion has preceded. Peter had need of conversion, as Christ testifies: "You, when you have turned again, strengthen your brothers," Luke XXII, 32. E. You except I: Peter did not sin ἐκούσιως (willingly), with destined malice, but struck by fear of imminent danger he denied Christ, to save his life. Wherefore his sin was not deliberate or deadly, but involuntary, by which faith is not extinguished. Response: Although Peter at first did not sin with destined malice, with the horror of death shaking his breast, and the struggle between the Spirit and the flesh still lasting; yet when this ceased, and the flesh gained the victory, he sinned ἐκούσιως (willingly), or voluntarily. For he allowed himself to be overcome by the flesh, and denied Christ three times; which progression and perseverance of Peter in denying Christ argues his deliberate choice. Which is also evident from this, that he thought the lesser of two evils should be chosen, namely, he preferred to deny Christ than to expose himself to the dangers of life; by which he sinned gravely. For Christ said to his disciples: "Whoever wants to come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and (so) follow me". "For whoever wants to save his soul will lose it," Mark VIII, 34, 35. You except II: Christ prayed for Peter, that his faith might not fail, Luke XXII, 32. Response: I distinguish between a final and a total defection of faith. Peter was preserved from a final defection of faith by the prayers of Christ, lest after the denial he should fall into despair, but that he might repent, and receive back saving faith, and retain it to the end of his life, and thus become a partaker of eternal salvation. You except III: Peter denied Christ with his mouth, but not with his heart. Response: If this is posited, Peter would be guilty of a most foul lie.

b) The other example is that of the incestuous Corinthian, who is mentioned in 1 Cor. V, 1, ff. His enormous crime could not consist with true faith. For it was nefarious, detestable in the judgment of saner gentiles, and notorious, because not secretly, but openly, and with the church aware, he abused his stepmother for a most shameful lust. St. Paul, by the power conferred by Christ, delivered him to Satan, not that he might be reprobated or damned, but that his Spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Therefore he was not of the number of the reprobate, or of those to be damned, but of the elect and of those to be saved. For he did not remain impenitent or unbelieving until the end of his life, but he repented, and recovered his faith. From which the Apostle, upon his return to the way, pardoned the abominable deed in the sight of Christ. 2 Cor. II, 10.

Proof 3) By the clearest sayings of scripture, of which for the sake of brevity we will cite only two. The first we take from 1 Tim. I, 18-19: "This charge I entrust to you, Timothy my son, in accordance with the prophecies previously made about you, that by them you may wage the good warfare; holding faith and a good conscience, which some have rejected and have made shipwreck of their faith". We have no doubt that Timothy was predestined from eternity to celestial glory. For he was appointed to the office of teaching by prophecy, or a special revelation of the Holy Spirit, Paul's true son in the faith, and a possessor of sincere faith. Cf. 1 Tim. I, 2; 2 Tim. I, 5. Paul admonished him to wage the good warfare, manfully fighting against the devil, the world, and the flesh, that he might gain a glorious victory. But the Apostle shows that this spiritual warfare cannot be legitimately accomplished, unless faith in Christ is kept holily and chastely, since it is the shield divinely ordained to extinguish the fiery darts of the devil. Ephesians VI, 16. Furthermore, he teaches that faith cannot be kept, unless a good conscience is preserved, and one abstains from voluntary sins, by which the serenity of conscience is clouded; which doctrine he confirms by proposing the examples of those who made shipwreck of their faith, by casting away a good conscience through deliberate sins. From which this argument flows: Whoever is solicitously admonished of his duty, with the fear of the opposite defection, can defect totally: A certain elect man (Timothy) is solicitously admonished, etc. Therefore. The latter we take from the Apocalypse of John, c. III, 11, where the Son of God addresses the Bishop of Philadelphia: "Hold fast what you have, so that no one may take your crown".

The sense is; continue to keep your faith whole, and a good conscience, lest the crown of glory, destined for you, be taken away. We gather from these that the elect can lose faith. For why would Christ admonish; "hold what you have," if no loss of faith were to be feared? Why would he place before their eyes the danger of the crown being taken away, if it were destined absolutely without respect to persevering faith?

Proof 4) From the daily prayers of the pious: "Lead us not into temptation!" Matth. VI, 13. By which all the faithful, and therefore also the elect, testify both to the atrocity of the enemies with whom they must contend, and to the infirmity of their own powers, that if forsaken by God and permitted to themselves, they can succumb to enemies soliciting them to the most grievous sins, and be snatched headlong into unbelief and despair. To these daily prayers must be added the prayer of David: "Take not your holy spirit from me!" Ps. LI, 11. A prayer for the Spirit not to be taken away argues the possibility of its removal.

The antithesis is of the Anabaptists, whose doctrine that grace is totally inamissible the Augsburg Confession condemned in article XII, in these words: "They (our churches) condemn the Anabaptists, who deny that those once justified can lose the Holy Spirit". Their more important arguments are:

I. Whoever are elected to celestial glory, in view of persevering faith in Christ, their faith does not fail; But regenerated men, as the Evangelicals themselves teach, are elected in view of persevering faith; Therefore. Response; I distinguish between continuous, or unceasing, perseverance, and non-continuous, or interrupted, perseverance. The former belongs to men who never sin from destined malice, but only from infirmity, which, on account of the imperfection of renewal and the remnants of the old man, happens to wayfarers in this mortality rarely, if ever. The latter is broken for a time by deliberate sins, but is restored through serious penitence, and endures to the end of life. In the article of election, perseverance of faith enduring to the end of life is understood, whether it be continuous or non-continuous.

II. No one can snatch Christ's sheep from his hand; The truly faithful are Christ's sheep; Therefore. The major is clear from John X, 28. Response; No one can snatch Christ's sheep from Christ's hand, as long as they hear the voice of Christ the shepherd and follow him. But if the sheep cease to hear the voice of Christ the shepherd and to follow him, Christ himself casts them from his hand, and ceases to offer the protection he previously gave them. And hence, unless they allow themselves to be recalled from error, they finally fall prey to the infernal wolf; which is certainly not to be snatched from Christ's hand. (*)

III. The elect never lose or totally cast away justifying faith; because they are like trees that are planted by rivers of water, which always bear fruit, and never wither, Ps. 1, 3. If therefore the elect always bear the fruits of justice, the tree of faith never withers. Response; Trees planted by rivers of water preserve their fertility and leaves as long as they draw moisture and nourishment from the rivers to which they are planted; but when, having suffered damage or violence, they are prevented from doing so, they gradually wither and die. Thus the faithful produce timely fruits and retain the beauty of justice as long as they draw sap from the streams of grace in the word and

(*) This translation, which is drawn from sheep, designates the mutual love by which both Christ embraces men devoted to him, and they in turn embrace Christ, John X, 14. Nor does he judge those worthy of the name of sheep who are endowed with true faith for a time, but those who, persevering, are obedient to his word, and follow him until they enter into eternal life by the benefit of Christ, from the possession of which they will never fall, nor will any force be able to snatch them, now blessed, from the hand of Christ. For the order of the words teaches us this, that their meaning should be understood not of the condition of the elect in this mortality, but of their perpetual, and never to be interrupted, beatitude in eternal life. Those, on the contrary, who have departed from this life in such a way that, being damned, they have undergone eternal perdition, are said to be separated from the hand of God, Ps. LXXXVIII, 6. Meanwhile, the elect, while they sojourn here, if at any time they have lapsed into a voluntary sin and made a shipwreck of faith, they themselves have indeed disjoined themselves from the hand of Christ, but they have not yet been deserted and cast off by Christ, but are led back from error to the way as if by an extended hand.

sacraments. But if, indulging in vices, they despise the word and sacraments, they lose the life of grace and die spiritually. The sacred psalmist himself insinuates this limitation, Ps. 1, 2-3: "Blessed is the man who meditates on the law of God day and night; for he will be like a tree planted by rivers of water".

IV. Whoever live under the evangelical covenant, to them God imparts the gift of perseverance, so that they never depart from him; But the elect, etc.; Therefore. The major is proven from Jer. XXXII, 40: "I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me". Response: The covenant of God with men is not absolute, but ordered, or conditioned. The divine promise in that passage: "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me," includes the tacit condition of the operation of grace not being impeded by the voluntary and free resistance of men. For in putting His fear in our hearts, God does not act irresistibly, but resistibly, and with the freedom to resist left intact. Hence it is that none are excluded from the participation of the goods promised in the covenant, except those who voluntarily resist God, who deprive themselves of the same goods by their own fault. Cf. Ezek. XI, 20, 21.

V. Of whomever the fall is not total, casting off the grace of God, when they fall, God does not cast them off, but supports them with his hand; But the just who fall, etc., Psalm XXXVII, 24. Therefore. Response: I distinguish between an external fall, or of fortune, and an internal one, or of the soul. The whole of Psalm XXXVII speaks of the external falls of the pious and the impious, of the prosperity of the former, and the unhappiness of the latter, and so the cited passage does not hit the mark.

VI. Whoever is always with God, having been apprehended by the divine hand, cannot fall from the grace of God; But the elect, etc. E. The major is established; because to be always with God and to fall from divine grace are opposites, which cannot stand together. The minor is clear from Ps. LXXIII, 23. Response: The apprehension and sustenance which is by the divine hand is neither irresistible nor indeclinable; because God permits him who maliciously deserts Him to fall.

VII. Whoever cannot be seduced, cannot lose faith; But the elect cannot be seduced.

E. The major is established; because the loss of faith is from the seduction of the devil, the world, and the flesh. The minor is proven from Matth. XXIV, 24: "False Christs and false prophets will arise, and will show great signs and wonders, so as to lead into error, if possible, even the elect". Response: I distinguish between absolute and hypothetical impossibility. It is impossible for the elect to be seduced with an impossibility that is not absolute, or causal, proceeding from an irresistible operation of divine grace, but with a hypothetical impossibility, based on the hypothesis of election, made according to the foreknowledge of persevering faith. Since, however, perseverance is either continuous or non-continuous, the elect can be seduced totally for a time, but not finally, on account of the infallibility of divine prescience.

VIII. Nothing can separate the faithful from the love of God. Rom. VIII, 38. Response: 1) No external creature can separate the faithful from the love of God; but indwelling sin, which is not a creature, if it is permitted to dominate, tears them away from God. 2) Nothing is so powerful that it can by itself and by its own force separate the faithful from the charity of God. For in all things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us, Rom. VIII, 37; provided that we are willing to use the powers granted by him, and the prepared help of the Holy Spirit. But things which are in themselves invalid for separating them can separate the faithful from the love of God, if they are wanting to themselves, and, casting away their weapons, voluntarily surrender to the enemy; just as Samson, defiling the vow of a Nazirite, was captured by his own fault and his own betrayal, when he could not be captured by the force and strength of his enemies, Judg. XV & XVI.

IX. Those who believe in Christ have in themselves food that endures to eternal life. John VI, 27. Response: Spiritual food by itself and by its nature endures to eternal life, although by the fault of the one eating it may happen that, just as it was eaten by him through faith, so by unbelief, as if by a kind of vomit, it is cast out again.

X. The gifts of God are ἀμεταμέλητα (irrevocable), i.e., immutable, Rom. XI, 29. Faith is a gift of God; E. Faith is immutable, and therefore cannot perish. Response: Some gifts God gives by an absolute will, which are simply immutable; some He gives by an ordered will, which has respect to a certain order of means, to be duly observed. God gives faith by an ordered will and wills that it be preserved through ordinary means; he who neglects these, makes a shipwreck of faith by his own fault.

XI. Believers have been sealed by the Holy Spirit, Eph. I, 13. E. they remain constant in faith. Response; Believers are and remain sealed by the Holy Spirit as long as they follow his leading. But if they struggle against the rule of the Holy Spirit, they are deprived of the sealing of the Holy Spirit, and lose faith.

Question XVI: Is the election of those finally believing in Christ immutable?

The divine election of men who finally believe in Christ is immutable and irrevocable, so that from an elect person a reprobate cannot be made.

Obs. I. We use the name of election here in the strictest sense, as it denotes the divine decree of saving those sinners whose persevering faith in Christ was foreseen from eternity by God; HUBER usurps the name of election in a general sense, in which it coincides with the call to the church. Some Tübingen Theologians use the word "election" not in a general sense, nor even in the strictest, but in a stricter and middle sense, so as to denote the ordination of all believers, whether they believe until the end of life or for a time, to eternal salvation; in which sense every believer is elect, and if faith is extinguished by mortal sins, from an elect he becomes a reprobate. Compare Dr. JO. ADAM OSIANDER colleg. theol. system. parte VI. p. 110.

Obs. II. Election is called immutable not with an absolute, intrinsic, and causal immutability, but a hypothetical, extrinsic, and non-causal one. For we do not assert that election is immutable on account of an absolute decree, by which God chose certain sinners to eternal life, however they may be, only because it so pleased God; nor on account of any predetermining decree, by which the will of the elect men is so determined to perseverance in faith that they can never lose it through deliberate sins, nor ever recede from the state of grace; but we state that election is immutable on account of the supposition of an ordered decree, and the infallibility of divine prescience.

Proof. 1. All the elect obtain the inheritance to which they were predestined.

Matth. XXV, 34; James II, 5. Therefore no elect become reprobate.

2. Whoever cannot be seduced (finally), cannot perish. But the elect, etc., Matth. XXIV, 24. Therefore.

3. For those who perish, no inheritance is reserved in heaven. But for all those who are elect according to the foreknowledge of God, an inheritance is reserved in heaven. 1 Pet. 1, 2, 4. Therefore none of them perishes.

4. Those who cannot be snatched from the hands of Christ (finally), cannot perish eternally. But the elect, etc. John X, 28. Therefore.

5. All inscribed in the book of life are to be delivered, Dan. XII, 1. E. none of them can perish.

6. All whom God predestined, He glorifies, Rom. VIII, 29, 30. E. no one predestined is reprobated.

7. If the elect could perish, the foreknowledge of God, according to which He chose, Rom. VIII, 29, would be fallible, which is impious to say.

The antithesis is of the Socinians and Arminians, in whose opinion from the elect, reprobate can be made. Their principal arguments are:

I. Of whomever the election is not immutable, they can be expunged from the book of life; But of those finally believing in Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is proven, because the book of life is a catalog of the elect; whoever is expunged from it becomes a reprobate. The minor is clear from the example of Moses, who in Exod. XXXII, 32 asked of God that He would blot him from the book of life, if He would not otherwise spare the Israelites. Response; Moses did not simply wish to be expunged from the book of life, nor did he think that one once inscribed could be expunged, but by a reason sought from an impossibility he tried to obtain pardon for his brothers the Israelites. Namely Moses, from a certain great security of divine familiarity, after he had adduced one or two compelling reasons, not to excuse his people, but to obtain pardon for them, v. 11 seq., now, having discovered the foulness of the matter, thinking he should use a final and by far the strongest reason in a second intercession, means to say: "Lord, either forgive them this trespass, or blot me from your book!" "I ask for one of the two with my prayers, intending to bring a friendly force upon you! The latter you will never do; because it is impossible for one once inscribed and held for elect to be expunged; therefore do the former, as it is possible and easy for you to do". You say: God responds categorically: "Whoever has sinned, I will blot him from my book." Response: I distinguish between a negative and a privative deletion. A negative deletion from the book of life is the same as non-inscription in the book of life; which exegesis is had in Ps. LXIX, 28: "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the just". Wherefore the sense is: the stubborn and finally sinning I will not inscribe in the catalog of the elect; cf. Dr. PFEIFFER in dub. vex. p. 385. The same can be responded to Rev. III, 5 and c. XXII, 19. Some authors distinguish between inscription in the book of grace, which refers to the antecedent will of God, and inscription in the book of glory, which pertains to the consequent will of God. The former is deletable, the latter is indeletable.

II. Of whomever the election is not immutable, they can become reprobate, under the condition of neglected spiritual crucifixion; But the elect, etc. Therefore. The minor is established from the example of Paul, who in 1 Cor. IX, 27 says of himself: "I subdue my body and make it a slave, lest perhaps, after preaching to others, I myself should become a castaway". Response: Of whomever the election is not absolutely immutable, they can become reprobate, under the condition of neglected spiritual crucifixion; I grant; it is, however, immutable from the hypothesis of election having been made, according to the foreknowledge of persevering faith (*).<sup>151</sup> But faith does not persevere in a man in whom the flesh predominates. Wherefore the Apostle puts this under the yoke, lest, faith having been extinguished by the dominion of the flesh, he should fall into the judgment of eternal reprobation. You say: Therefore from the elect can be made reprobate. I respond in the words of Dr. B. MEISNER: "The elect are considered either with respect to themselves, and thus they can finally fall; or with respect to the foreseen and decreed preservation of God, and thus they cannot be seduced". See anthropol. decad. II. disp. XIV. p. 230. Cf.

Disp. DANNHAVER. de hypopiasmo Paullino 0.33. The Apostle could not indeed have become a reprobate in a composite sense, if he was elect; yet he could have in a divided sense, if he were considered separately in his own conditions, because if he had known himself to be absolutely elect, he would have in vain guarded against reprobation.

Question XVI: Is a regenerated man certain of his election to eternal life?

A regenerated man in the midst of the course of his life is certain of his election conditionally a); but at the end of his life, the same man rejoices in the absolute certainty of his predestination b).

Proof a. The regenerated are certain of their present faith: a) "Test yourselves, whether you are in the faith? prove yourselves; Or do you not know yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you? unless you are reprobates," 2 Cor. XIII, 5. They are certain b) that God the Father will grant perseverance in faith. "I am persuaded, that he who began a good work in you, will complete it until the day of Jesus Christ," Phil. 1, 6. They are certain c) of the intercession of Christ. "I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail," says the Savior, Luke XXII, 32. Christ prayed not only for Peter, or the rest of the disciples, but also for those who will believe through their word, John XVII, 20. They are certain d) of the sealing of the Holy Spirit. "Having believed, you were sealed with the holy Spirit of promise," Eph. I, 13. "He testifies with our spirit, that we are children of God," Rom. VIII, 16. From this the regenerated person validly concludes: I am certain of my present faith, of the preserving grace of God the Father, of the intercession of Christ, of the sealing and internal testimony of the Holy Spirit; Therefore I am most persuaded that my name is written in heaven. Luke X, 20. Which certainty of election in the midst of the course of life is not absolute, but ordered and conditioned. For if Paul disciplined his body for this reason, lest he become a reprobate, 1 Cor. IX, 27, he was not absolutely certain of his own election. Why does Christ so gravely admonish the Bishop of Philadelphia: "Hold what you have, that no one may take your crown"? Apoc. III, 11. And Paul: "The firm foundation of God stands, having this seal; the Lord knows who are his, and let everyone who names the name of Christ depart from iniquity!" 2 Tim. II, 19. These warnings indicate that the certainty of election in this course of life is conditioned.

(*) Election indeed is in no way mutable; for it was made because God certainly foresaw that it would be that a dying man would truly and constantly trust in Christ. And that eternal decree of God, although it is certainly consistent with the order of salvation, is nevertheless not hypothetical, as the Author himself most rightly professed in question XII. A man, if he should ever fall away from faith and die, is not in the number of the elect. If he should change his mind, and thus, having returned to his former state, should remain to the very end of mortality, he is and remains elect. Meanwhile, as long as he lives, he is also ἀδόκιμος (of unproven faith), i.e., of unproven faith, but not yet eternally reprobated.

Proof b. At the end of life, the condition having been placed in act, the regenerated man is absolutely certain both of his present faith and of his election, so that he dares to say intrepidly with Paul: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," 2 Tim. IV, 7.

Question XVII: What is the end of election?

The end of election. The proximate end of election is eternal salvation, to be conferred on the elect in time a); The ultimate end of election is the glory of divine goodness b).

Proof a. From Matth. XXV, 34, where the faithful are said to be about to enter into the inheritance of the kingdom, prepared for them from the beginning of the world.

Proof b. From Eph. I, 5, 6, where we are said to be chosen by God, that the glory of His grace might be praised.

ON REPROBATION

Question I: What is opposed to election unto eternal salvation?

REPROBATION IS IMMEDIATELY opposed to election. Proof. Just as between believers and unbelievers, between sheep and goats, between the children of God and of the devil, between the elect and the reprobate there is no middle or third option; so election and reprobation are immediately opposed.

Question II: What is reprobation?

Definition of reprobation. Reprobation is the eternal decree of God to condemn all and every sinner, whose final rejection of the merit of Christ was foreseen from eternity.

It is more fully defined; Reprobation is an act of the consequent will of God, by which God, out of His vindictive justice, adjudicated to eternal condemnation all and every contumacious sinner, whom He foresaw would finally cast off the offered grace of vocation and justification, and depart from this life without faith in Christ, for the perennial glory of His justice.

Obs. 1. Reprobation in Greek is called ἀποδοκιμασία (disapproval), which word is ἄγραφα (unwritten), or is not found in so many syllables in the sacred letters. The word ἀδόκιμος (reprobate) is used, 1 Cor. IX, 27; 2 Cor. XIII, 5; Hebr. VI, 8. To reprobate signifies to reject that which is deemed unworthy and wicked.

Obs. II. Ἀποδοκιμασία, or reprobation, is taken, a) most generally for the rejection of any useless thing, Jer. VI, 30; Hebr. VI, 8.; b) specially for the rejection from grace, Rom. XI, 1.; c) most specially for the rejection from eternal glory, in which sense it is taken here.

Obs. III. Reprobation in the epistle of Jude v. 4 is called προγραφὴ εἰς τὸ κρίμα (a writing before unto judgment), or a writing made before (from eternity) unto judgment. "Certain men have crept in, (who were of old prescribed for this judgment) ungodly men, who change the grace of our God into lasciviousness and deny the only ruler God and our Lord, Jesus Christ". The Apostle implies that false teachers, asserting that the grace of God can well consist with the most filthy lust, and denying the divinity of Christ, have been inscribed in the book of death or the catalog of the damned. Observe that some authors doubt whether the book of death is rightly attributed to God. But indeed, just as when the book of life is attributed to God, nothing else is implied than that God has a most exact knowledge of all the elect, to whom He will certainly confer eternal life, as if He has them consigned in a book; so in the same sense the book of death can be attributed to God, since by it nothing else is signified than the most exact notice which God has of all those whom He has decided to consign to eternal death in view of their final unbelief. Among the ancients GREGORY NAZIANZEN names βιβλὸν τῶν ζώων καὶ βιβλὸν νεκρῶν (a book of the living, and a book of the perishing). Cf. Dr. DANNHAVER hodos phenom. VII p. 583.

Question III: Who reprobates men?

The cause of reprobation. The triune God, the most just judge of men, and the avenger of wickedness and of spurned grace.

Proof. God indeed by His antecedent will willed the salvation of all, under the condition of persevering faith in Christ; but since He foresaw that this condition would not be fulfilled by all, He decreed to eternally reprobate the contumacious contemners of divine grace, procured by the merit of Christ and offered in the gospel. To which the words of Christ refer, John III, 17, 18: "God did not send (by antecedent will) His Son into the world to judge the world, but that the world might be saved through him". "He who believes in him is not judged; but he who does not believe is already judged (by the eternal decree of the consequent will), because he does not believe in the name of the only-begotten Son of God".

Question IV: What is the internal impulsive cause of reprobation, or that within God?

The internal impulsive cause of reprobation. The internal impulsive cause is the vindictive justice of God, by which the most just God not only did not elect, or inscribe with the just in the book of life, sinners who are stubbornly impious and finally impenitent; but also decreed to consign them to eternal torments.

Proof. For just as the condemnation of evil-doing men, which happens in time, is called just, Rom. II, 5, so it must be acknowledged that, since God from eternity decreed to damn very many sinners, the reason for decreeing was punitive justice, on account of the necessary agreement of the decree and its execution.

Question V: What is the external impulsive cause of reprobation?

The external impulsive cause of reprobation. The external impulsive cause of reprobation are all the sins of men a), inasmuch as they are conjoined with persevering unbelief, or the final repudiation of the merit of Christ b).

Proof a. The impulsive cause of reprobation are all sins: 1) original sin. For the wages of every sin is death, Rom. VI, 23. But the fault of origin is truly a sin, damning and bringing even now eternal death to those who are not reborn through baptism and the Holy Spirit, as the Augsburg Confession, article II, testifies. E. Original sin is a cause of reprobation. 2) Actual sins, especially deliberate sins, by which the grace of the Holy Spirit is cast off, and true faith is extinguished. That a man falls into the judgment of reprobation on account of such sins, Paul teaches in Gal. V, 19, 20, 21: "The works of the flesh are manifest, which are: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, wantonness, idolatry, magic, enmity, contentions, jealousies, angers, quarrels, dissensions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and things like these; about which I forewarn you, as I also forewarned you, that those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God". Whatever excludes a man from the inheritance of eternal life, that is an impulsive cause of eternal reprobation; But deliberate sins, or the works of the flesh, etc.: Therefore.

Proof b. Although any sin is an external, or meritorious, impulsive cause of reprobation; it is, however, only a remote and mediate one; but the proximate and immediate cause of the same is the final repudiation of the merit of Christ, or impenitence and unbelief enduring until the end of life. For the remaining sins, if faith in Christ intervenes, can be abolished, with respect to their guilt, so that men are not damned on account of them, since οὐδὲν κατάκριμα (there is no condemnation) for those who are in Christ Jesus, Rom. VIII, 1; Acts X, 43. But given ἀπιστία (unbelief), or final unbelief, damnation follows with inevitable necessity, as Christ teaches, Mark XVI, 16: "He who does not believe will be condemned," and John III, 36: "He who does not believe the Son will not see life; but the wrath of God remains on him".

Obs. Dr. MENZER in defens. II part convers. Pruten. p. 80 distinguishes between a meritorious cause and an organic cause, not applying but rejecting the grace of God. It is natural that sins merit damnation, and thus also unbelief, as a sin against the first precept, merits death; and in this sense it is true that not only unbelief, but also the other sins are a cause of damnation, namely a meritorious one. But when unbelief is directly opposed to faith, as to an organic cause, or an applying instrument, then, just as a man is justified by faith alone, and by no other organ apprehending the remission of sins in the promise of the gospel; so he is damned only by unbelief, not applying, or repelling, the promise of the gospel, Mark XVI, 16. Dr. DANNHAVER teaches things similar to these in hodos: "Man himself is the architect of his own fortune, and his foreseen final unbelief in a sound sense alone damns (not excluding, meanwhile, other sins from the merit of damnation); just as a sick man dies not immediately from the fault of a lethal disease, but from the rejection of medicine".

Question VI: What is the directing, or norming, principle of reprobation?

The first and mediate norming principle of reprobation is the πρόθεσις (purpose), or general divine purpose of condemning sinners who are finally impenitent and unbelieving a). The proximate directing principle is the πρόγνωσις (foreknowledge), or foreseeing of final unbelief in certain individuals b).

Proof a. The purpose, or general decree of God, shines forth from the words of Christ: "He who does not believe, will be condemned," Mark XVI, 16.

Proof b. Just as the regenerate were chosen κατὰ πρόγνωσιν (according to the foreknowledge) of final faith in Christ, 1 Pet. I, 2; so the unregenerate were reprobated according to the prescience of persevering unbelief, by which the satisfaction of Christ is stubbornly rejected.

Question VII: In what does reprobation formally consist?

The form of reprobation. Reprobation formally consists in the exclusion from the inheritance of eternal salvation, and the adjudication to eternal punishment, according to the purpose and prescience of God. Our assertion is proven a posteriori, and indeed from the process of the final judgment. For Christ the celestial judge says to those on his left (the reprobate): "Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!" Matth. XXV, 41. Those who depart eternally from Christ are excluded from the kingdom of glory, and those who will go into eternal fire will have been consigned to eternal punishment. Wherefore, just as Christ will execute the judgment of condemnation on the last day; so He decreed from eternity to judge contumacious sinners, on account of the συμφωνίαν (agreement) of the decree and its execution.

Obs. For the sake of easier doctrine and cognition, our weak intellect conceives and forms the following reprobatory syllogism:

- Whichever sinners will reject the merit of Christ with final unbelief, they are to be excluded from the inheritance of eternal salvation and consigned to eternal punishment.

- But this one, that one, this other one, Cain, Judas, etc., will reject the merit of Christ with final unbelief.

- Therefore this one, that one, this other one, Cain, Judas, etc., are to be excluded from the inheritance of eternal salvation and consigned to eternal punishment.

The major proposition is the πρόθεσις (purpose) itself, or the divine purpose of condemning impenitent sinners who reject the merit of Christ until the end of life. The minor is formed by the πρόγνωσις (foreknowledge), or divine prescience, by which God from eternity foresaw which men as individuals would stubbornly repudiate the satisfaction of Christ. The conclusion exhibits the τὴν ἀποδοκιμασίαν (reprobation), or the eternal decree of reprobation.

Question VIII: Who are the men eternally reprobated?

The subject of reprobation. The men rejected from eternal glory to eternal ignominy are contumacious, impenitent sinners, and those who repudiate the merit of Christ up to the last breath of life.

Proof. For in impenitent sinners there is found the impulsive reason for eternal reprobation, namely, the final repudiation of the merit of Christ, by which they bring the wrath of God upon themselves, John III, 36, and are called vessels of wrath, i.e., men who have accumulated and, as it were, collected for themselves the wrath of God for the day of judgment, not by light and ordinary sins, but by atrocious sins and their crimes, and thus by the abuse of the riches of divine goodness and patience. These vessels of wrath are said to be fitted for destruction, in Greek κατηρτισμένα (prepared, perfected, and consummated), and therefore ripe for destruction, because by their own fault, obstinacy, and voluntary hardening in sins, and by perseverance and final impenitence in them, they have made themselves worthy of eternal ruin. In which sense the word καταρτίζειν, καταρτίζεσθαι, and κατηρτισμένος is taken. Luke VI, 40; 1 Cor. 1, 10; Eph. IV, 12; 2 Tim. III, 17. See Dr. HOLTZFUSSEN dissertat. praekest. p. 155.

Question IX: What is the end of reprobation?

The end of reprobation. The end of reprobation is the punishment of sinners a), and the glory of God's vindictive justice b).

Proof a. For to this end the impious, on account of foreseen final impenitence, have been destined by the decree of reprobation to punishment, that this may be inflicted on them in time. "The reprobate will go away into eternal punishment," says Christ, Matth. XXV, 46.

Proof b. Paul teaches in Rom. IX, 22: "What if God, willing to show his wrath and to make his power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath prepared for destruction". Namely, God foresaw that impious men by their own fault would prepare themselves for destruction; therefore He decreed to reject them, having abused divine longsuffering, to show His wrath, i.e., His vindictive justice.

Question X: Is the decree of reprobation immutable?

The decree of reprobation is irrevocable, immutable, with an immutability that is not absolute, but hypothetical.

Proof. Those who have been rejected from the participation of eternal salvation, in view of foreseen final infidelity, just as they could have believed finally in Christ through the grace of vocation and regeneration; so they could have not been reprobated, but saved. But when, as finally impenitent, they were foreseen and thus reprobated; just as they cannot be at the same time finally unfaithful and not finally unfaithful; so when they have been reprobated, by a hypothetical necessity they cannot be non-reprobated.

Question XI: Can the reprobate be in a state of regeneration?

The reprobate can for a time be in a state of the truly regenerate.

Proof. From Luke VIII, 13: "Those on the rock are they who, when they hear, receive the word with joy; but they have no root, who for a time believe, but in time of temptation fall away". Those who believe for a time, are for a time in a state of regeneration. Perseverance does not enter into the essence of faith, but accompanies it.

Question XII: Did God, by an absolute decree, without respect to sins and unbelief, adjudge certain men to eternal damnation?

God excluded no man from the inheritance of eternal life by an absolute and most freely preconceived hatred, without any respect to an impulsive cause, and decreed to consign him to eternal ruin, but sins themselves, conjoined with final unbelief, moved God to reprobate from eternal glory men who are stubbornly impious.

Obs. BELLARMINE, a patron of the absolute decree, in lib. II. de gratia & libero arbitrio, cap. XVI, distinguishes between the negative and the affirmative, or positive, act of reprobation. The former is that by which God, according to His most free good pleasure, does not will to have mercy on certain ones, nor to save them; it is otherwise called the decree of preterition; the latter is that by which God has decided to afflict with eternal punishments contumacious sinners, whom He foresaw would perseveringly spurn the offered grace of vocation, regeneration, and justification; it is also called the decree of predamnation. BELLARMINE therefore states, and all who agree with him, that the decree of predamnation altogether presupposes sin in man, since in the most just God there cannot be a will to punish except sinners, nor can the destination to, or infliction of, punishment be just without fault. See Gen. XVIII, 25. It is therefore to be proven by us against Bellarmine and his followers, that God by an eternal decree of preterition excluded no man absolutely and without respect to fault, foreseen in man, from grace and glory.

Proof. 1. Because, speaking accurately, the negative and positive act of reprobation is really one act, and they do not differ, except only in name. This is clear a) from examples. Pharaoh and Judas by the very same act by which they were passed over and not elected, were predamned. b) It is clear from the opposite. Thus, as election is predestination to salvation; so preterition is predamnation. Since therefore the decree of preterition and of predamnation is one and the same, different causes cannot be assigned to it.

2. It is the same thing, whether God destines a man to damnation, or does that from which damnation necessarily follows. Whomever God does not elect, whether he is said to be omitted or reprobated, is always excluded from the grace of God. Certain damnation follows this exclusion, because without the grace of God there is no salvation. From which we gather that there is one cause of preterition and of predamnation.

3. God does not pass over, or desert a man, unless he is first deserted by him; Therefore God deserts no man by an absolute decree. The consequence is evident; because whoever passes someone over, because he has been deserted by him, does not pass him over from an absolute will, or mere good pleasure, but, moved by a grave cause, excludes him from his favor. The antecedent is confirmed from very many sayings of scripture, 1 Sam. XV, 23: "Because you have rejected the word of Jehovah, therefore he has rejected you". Ps. LXXXI, 11, 12: "My people did not obey my voice, and Israel did not submit to me. Therefore I let them go in the hardness of their heart, that they should walk in their own counsels". 1 Chron. XXVIII, 9: "If you forsake him, he will abandon you forever". Hos. IV, 6: "Because you have rejected knowledge, I will also reject you".

4. The decree of preterition, which is imagined, is repugnant to the grace of God, the merit of Christ, and the universal call. He who has mercy on all, excludes none absolutely from his mercy; But God, etc. Rom. XI, 32. E. For whom Christ died out of incomparable love, those He did not pass over in electing without a most grave cause; But for all, etc. 2 Cor. V, 14. E. To whom the gospel is to be preached, him God did not pass over by an absolute decree. But to every rational creature, etc. Mark XVI, 15. Therefore.

The more important arguments of BELLARMINE are (*):

I. Whoever loved Jacob, and pursued Esau with hatred, before they had done anything good or evil; he passed Esau over by an absolute decree; But God, etc. Rom. IX, 11,12,13. Therefore. Response: We have satisfied this argument in the preceding chapter, question VII, objection III.

II. Whoever has mercy on whom he wills to have mercy, and hardens whom he wills to harden, he excludes the man whom he hardens from his grace by an absolute will; But God, etc. Rom. IX, 18. Response: See the same chapter, objection II.

III. God is compared to a potter, who has absolute power, to make from the same mass of vessels, one indeed for honor, but another for dishonor, Rom. IX, 21. Therefore God by absolute power created some men for eternal glory, some for eternal dishonor. Response: See the same place, objection V.

IV. God raised up Pharaoh, a hardened man, that in him he might show his power. Rom. IX, 17. Therefore God by an absolute decree created him for hardening and perdition. Response: The words of Paul are taken from Exod. IX, 15, 16, where God addresses Pharaoh through Moses thus: "For this reason קָמַתִּיךָ דַּתִּי (I have made you stand), that I may show you my power, and that my name may be declared in all the earth". Obs. a) God does not say: "I created you"; but: "I have made you stand," i.e., I have preserved you, and as if placed under a blow, you already failing, I have ἐξήγειρα (raised up) you. Thus the word ἐγείρω (to raise), in the signification of raising from sickness, is read in James V, 15: "The prayer of faith will save the one who is sick, καὶ ἐγερῇ αὐτὸν ὁ κύριος

(and the Lord will raise him up)". b) God does not say: "I have raised you up, or made you stand, that I might harden you," but "that in you I might show my power, and that my name might be declared in all the earth," as if to say, that all men together with you may acknowledge my power, humble themselves before it, and do penance for their sins, and thus celebrate my name. If God had reprobated Pharaoh by an absolute decree to eternal ruin, he would certainly not have shown him his power for this end, that he might be humbled before it and do penance. Cf. Dr. SEB. SCHMID colleg. bibl. prius p. 350.

V. If God reprobated men on account of sins, He would certainly reprobate all men; The consequent is false; E. and the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven; because all men are sinners, Rom. III, 23. Response: God reprobates impious men on account of sins, inasmuch as they are conjoined with final ἀπιστία (unbelief). But not all men are unfaithful until the end of life. E. God does not reprobate all. Instance: But all fallen men are by nature unbelieving. For God has concluded all in unbelief, Rom. XI, 32. E. all men are reprobated. Response: I distinguish between innate and adventitious unbelief. Not on account of the former, but on account of the latter, God rejected certain men from eternal salvation.

VI. God made the impious for the day of evil for his own sake. Prov. XVI, 4. Therefore by an absolute will he reprobated him. Response: In the Hebrew source the cited words flow thus: "Jehovah has made all things to correspond to himself; even the evil, for the day of evil". Namely, God made all things so that they might correspond to each other, and observe a harmonic order, and thus, according to the reason of the most just decree, the permission of the evil of fault corresponds to the infliction of the evil of punishment. From which is gathered not an absolute, but a respective decree.

Question XIII: What use does the doctrine of predestination and reprobation confer on us?

Practical use. The doctrine of predestination and reprobation, consonant with Holy Scripture, allures us to the love of God, the divine word, and the sacraments a),

(*) This is the common opinion of the Reformed, although some have been accustomed to express it differently, and those among the Roman Catholics who are addicted to the party of JANSEN are close to them. And they have been accustomed to fight with these arguments.

but calls us away from the desires of the flesh
b). It also consoles the elect in all adversities c).

Proof a. From the decree of predestination we know the immense goodness of God towards us, who was occupied with our salvation when we did not yet exist, and ordained those means, from which it was given to us to conceive constant faith in Christ through the grace of the Holy Spirit. Let our soul therefore burn with the love of God, assiduously meditate on the divine word, and strengthen and sustain itself by the use of the sacraments.

Proof b. The elect with Paul subdue their body, and make it a slave, to make it testify that they are not of the number of the reprobate. 1 Cor. IX, 27.

Proof c. The elect are a care and concern to Christ, the shepherd and bishop of faithful souls. Not even the infernal wolf will snatch these sheep from the hands of that great shepherd.

SUSPIRIUM

As often as,  SWEETEST JESUS, I do not so much scrutinize as marvel at the sublime mystery of predestination, so often fix the eyes of my mind on your wounds, from which predestination shines forth. You by your shed blood reconciled GOD to me, offended by my sins, that he might embrace me with a fatherly love. I embrace you therefore, the rock and foundation of election. To You I adhere and lean with true and sincere faith, never to be torn away from You. For I, a wretch, having fallen into very many sins, have been raised up by You, elected by You, saved by You. This is what I humbly pray, my JESUS, that You would strengthen my faith, fixed on your merit, sustain it when it struggles, and crown it when it triumphs, that I may be Yours in the kingdom of grace, Yours in the kingdom of glory!

CHAPTER III.
ON THE
FRATERNAL REDEMPTION OF CHRIST, AS THE OTHER
PRINCIPLE OF SALVATION.
PART I.
ON THE NAMES, NATURES, AND PERSON OF CHRIST.

Question I: Who is the redeemer of the human race?

HE REDEEMER OF the human race is Jesus Christ.

Question II: Who is Jesus Christ?

Jesus Christ is true God, begotten from the substance of the Father from eternity, and true man, born of the Virgin Mary in the fullness of time, the only redeemer of the whole human race, which had fallen into sin.

Question III: Why is our redeemer called Jesus (*)?

Jesus, that is, Savior, he was called by the angel; because he was to save his people from their sins.

(*) The blessed GERHARD, in loc. Theol. T. I. loc. IV. c. 8. §. 25. seqq., aptly divided the names of Christ, if you consider the grammatical usage of the words, into proper and figurative, to which the typical ones are closely related. But if you consider the matter itself, they are to be distributed into three genera. For since a name is a sign by which a certain thing is discerned from others, and there is no doubt that there are altogether three properties of our Liberator, by which he alone can be distinguished from all others, namely 1) one person, which consists of two natures, 2) a twofold state, 3) a threefold office: it follows that the division of the names which are attributed to Christ cannot but be tripartite. I will enumerate each one, and since the narrowness of space prohibits me from explaining them with the dignity the matter deserves, I will briefly run through them in the proper order.

I. The names of the PERSON are some indeed general, which express both natures: 1) Immanuel, which we understand to be the same as θεάνθρωπος (God-man). For a) this name was given to Christ alone, not to the Father, nor to the Holy Spirit. It is necessary therefore that there be some reason that is completely singular and proper to Christ; b) The signification of this name indicates a most close conjunction of God with men alone, and with no other created things, not even the angels themselves. Therefore it is also necessary that some singular excellence of the human race be signified. But no way can be thought of, by which Christ, and he alone, could be called God with men, and with them alone, associated, unless it be the conjunction of the divine with the human nature, and such a conjunction as is suitable neither to the Father nor to the Holy Spirit, but to Christ alone, and also pertains to men alone. Therefore Immanuel denotes that divine person who assumed human nature, for which reason Christ is not ashamed to call us his brothers, but not the angels, Heb. II, 11, 14, 16. E. this name has the same force as θεάνθρωπος (God-man). E. that name, θεάνθρωπος, is not merely ecclesiastical, nor fashioned by the ingenuity of men. 2) Mediator, 1 Tim. II, 5, which, although it denotes the office of Christ, at the same time indicates the subject, since he himself fulfilled the parts of a μεσίτης (mediator) according to both natures, the human indeed, by performing and enduring; the divine, by attributing an infinite price to his actions and sufferings of evils, Acts XX, 28; Heb. IX, 12. 3) Most beautiful of men, Ps. XLV, 3, where in the sources there exists a mixed and composite form of Kal and Pual, by which reason a duplex nature is designated, one by which he is beautiful, the other by which he is made beautiful. Others, however, are special, which note one or the other nature.

α) The names of the divine nature. Of these, some are suitable for Christ as God, by which he is indeed discerned from all created things, which, however, he has in common with the Father and the Holy Spirit; others are of such a kind that they are so proper to Christ, inasmuch as he is the eternal Son of God, generated from the Father, that by them he is distinguished not only from the entire universe of created things, but also from the Father and the Holy Spirit. A). The proper names of God are these: 1) יהוה (YHWH) and indeed in the nominative case (as Theologians say), Ex. III, 14. The same one is called יהוה who a little before, v. 2, had been called מלאך יהוה (the angel of YHWH). Ps. CII, 26, which saying is to be understood of Christ, the Legate of Christ makes us more certain of this, Heb. I, 10-12, add v. 8. Isa. XLV, 24, 25, cf. with Rom. XIV, 10, 11. Thus indeed the Apostle expressly interprets that saying of Christ. With that also agrees this, Rev. I, 8: ὁ ὢν, καὶ ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος (the one who is, and who was, and who is to come), which is rendered as the name יהוה itself. For ה is a note of the future, ἐρχόμενος is an indication of the participle, which denotes presence, and ה is the past. And so יהוה signifies immutable nature, that God is always the same. 2) יהוה צבאות (YHWH of hosts), Isa. VI, 3, add v. 8, 9, 10 & John XII, 41. 3) יהוה אלוהים (YHWH God), Ex. III, 2, 4, 6. 4) אלהי ישראל (God of Israel) or, what is altogether the same, אלהי אברהם אלהי יצחק אלהי יעקב (God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob) ibid. cf. Luke I, 16, 17; for he is so called who used John as a forerunner, but he is without doubt Christ, add v. 43, 76. 5) יהוה צדקנו (YHWH our righteousness), Jerem. XXIII, 6. 6) Various names, which certainly befit the one God, we see cumulatively augmented and closely joined, Isa. IX, 6. 7) θεός (God), even ὁ Θεός (the God), which is valid as an argument ἐκ τοῦ ἄρθρου (from the article), despite the rule, although false, which SOCINUS devised. Heb. 1, 8 & 9, than which there can be no more evident testimony. Col. II, 2, where the doubled little word, καὶ, is an indication that this name Θεός pertains equally to both, to Christ as much as to the Father. John 1, 1; XX, 28; Acts XX, 28. But most notable is the fivefold addition, for each one demonstrates the highest divinity. Thus indeed Christ is called α) Θεὸς ὁ ἀληθινός (the true God), 1 John V, 20. β) ὁ μέγας Θεός (the great God), Tit. II, 13. γ) ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων, Θεὸς εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας (who is over all, God blessed forever), Rom. IX, 5. Whatever the Arians or Photinians, with whom the school of SOCINUS agrees, dare to say against this, this is certainly clearer than light, that this very description and praise is attributed to Christ. He is said to be ἐπὶ πάντων (over all), even in his most humble state, nay even before he was clothed in flesh, John III, 31. The same is proclaimed, ὁ εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας (the one blessed forever), and indeed no less than the Father, also with cumulative words, to designate the highest degree of veneration, Rev. V, 13. δ) ὁ Θεὸς τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν (the God of the holy prophets), Rev. XXII, 6, that this indeed pertains to Christ is lucidly apparent from v. 16. ε) ὁ Θεὸς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ (the God of Israel), Luke 1, 16, 17. 8) Κύριος (Lord), which Greek name, inasmuch as it signifies the highest divinity, undoubtedly corresponds to the Hebrew, אדני (Adonai) & יהוה (YHWH), but in a certain way it should be referred to the glorious state of the human nature, as will be plainly apparent from what I shall bring forth hereafter. B). The names of the Son of God are chiefly these: 1) בן (Son), Isa. IX, 5, in which place by distinct words and expressions the different natures in Christ are foretold, with PAUL as interpreter, Gal. IV, 4: so ἀπέστειλεν ὁ Θεὸς τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ (God sent his Son) is בן נתן לנו (a son is given to us); γενόμενον ἐκ γυναικός (born of a woman) is ילד ילד לנו (a child is born to us). 2) צמח יהוה (branch of YHWH), Isa. IV, 2; Zach.

III, 8; VI, 12. We rely on this argumentation: In what sense Christ is called  $\text{נֶחֱמֵץ}$  (branch of David), which pertains to his human nature, namely the Son of David, in the same sense he is called  $\text{נֶחֱמֵץ יְהוּדָה}$ , as far as the divine nature, since he is the Son of God. 3)  $\text{ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ}$  (Son of God), and indeed  $\text{ὁ μονογενής}$  (the only-begotten). (see notes on page 308). 4)  $\text{λόγος}$  (Word), who was  $\text{πρὸς τὸν Θεόν}$  (with God), and indeed before  $\text{σὰρξ ἐγένετο}$  (he became flesh), John 1, 2 & 14.

β) The names of the human nature; of which some indeed generally regard the thing itself, others, however, specifically pertain to various surrounding circumstances. A) The general ones are: 1)  $\text{זרע הָאִשָּׁה}$  (seed of the woman), Gen. III, 15. For that this illustrious prophecy is nothing other than the proto-gospel about Christ is abundantly established both from this place itself and from the entire series of words, and also from parallel places. 2)  $\text{ἄνθρωπος}$  (man), 1 Tim. II, 5. and also 3) what is much more common and more significantly said,  $\text{ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου}$  (the Son of Man). We must now inquire into the true and sufficient reason for this name. I certainly do not deny, if you say that it designates a) the truth of the human nature in Christ, b) its origin from the seed of his mother, c) his most ardent love for the human race, d) the excellence and preeminence, for which reason he alone above others is called  $\text{ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου}$ , Ps. XLV, 3. But you will also grant me this: that all other reasons are not sufficient, unless you add e) the state of misery, namely that Christ, as long as he was on earth, experienced all the infirmities of human nature, and indeed in the place of all men. That this is the principal reason for this name, I will confirm with clear arguments: a) The use of this name; namely, it is used frequently before the glorious change of Christ, from that time never (if you except a few places, Acts VII, 56, where this reason underlies it, because Christ presented himself to be seen by Stephen in human form, and likewise Rev. I, 13; XIV, 14). And so Christ, after he himself sat down at the right hand of the Father, is nowhere called the Son of man, everywhere he is adorned with splendid titles, which are suitable for his highest dignity, of which kind are: Lord, King of Kings. What then? Did he cease to be a true man, born of a virgin? Was his love for men diminished, or completely extinguished? Was anything detracted from the excellence of the human nature which he enjoys? Nothing less, indeed. You see therefore that all those reasons are not suitable enough, but this is the principal one: that that name was most rightly accommodated to the state of humility, in which Christ endured not only human nature, but also universal and vicarious calamity. For every name, the more suitable it is to someone's state, the more apt it is. b) By the conjunction of this name with various descriptions, which are documents of the most humble condition, e.g., Matth. VIII, 20; Luke XVIII, 31, 32, 33. c) By another name, very similar to this, since not the humanity of Christ itself, but his humility is indicated by the name of the days of his flesh, Hebr. V, 7. d) By prophecies, and of both kinds, partly literal (among which that most lucid prophecy stands out, Ps. VIII, in which both states of Christ are predicted, and in such a way that distinct names are also used; son of man, as far as the most miserable condition, v. 5, then Lord, which pertains to the most glorious state, v. 6 & 10, add Phil. II, 9, 11); partly typical (for there are certain typical names, in the way that Ezekiel is called by the same name almost as many times as Christ is called in the sacred monuments. This is for the very reason that that divine prophet lived a much more sorrowful life and one full of miseries than any other; and all learned in Hebrew know that the custom of the holy language has it that miserable men, and those of the lowest census, are named  $\text{בְּנֵי אָדָם}$  (sons of Adam), to whom are opposed  $\text{בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים}$  (sons of God), noble and fortunate, as Ps. XLIX, 2). Corollary: E. this name, son of man, pertains not so much to the human nature of Christ, as rather to his calamitous state. B. The special ones are 1) of race:  $\text{σπέρμα τοῦ Ἀβραάμ}$  (seed of Abraham), Gal. III, 16. 2) of tribe:  $\text{ὁ λέων ὁ ὢν ἐκ τῆς φυλῆς Ἰουδᾶ}$  (the Lion who is of the tribe of Judah), which name is partly of the glorious state, inasmuch as he is called the lion who gained the victory, partly of the nation, since he is said to have arisen from the tribe of Judah. 3) of family:  $\text{נֶחֱמֵץ}$  (branch of David), Jerem. XXIII, 5;  $\text{ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Δαβὶδ}$  (the Son of David), Matth. XV, 22; XXII, 42;  $\text{ἡ ῥίζα Δαβὶδ}$  (the root of David), Rev. V, 5, cf. with Isa. XI, 1. 4) of place of upbringing:  $\text{Ναζωραῖος}$  (Nazarene), Matth. II, 23.

II. Names of STATE. a) General, which pertains to both conditions, is  $\text{ἀμνὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ}$  (Lamb of God), John I, 29. And so more often. The principal reason why Christ is compared with a lamb lies in this, that he offered himself as a victim to God. For the origin of this name is to be sought from the type of the lambs, which in the age of the O.T. were destined for sacrifice, and especially for a holocaust, and which had to be whole, without any blemish and spot; but especially from the type of the paschal lamb, 1 Cor. V, 7. That John also had respect to this lamb is apparent from this: that this word came from his mouth not, as very learned men think, near the feast day of atonement, but with Passover approaching. Compare, please, John I, 29 with v. 35, 43 & II, 1, 12, 13. To perceive the sense and use of this name more deeply, two principles and as many corollaries will be effective. Princip. 1. The sacrifice, performed by Christ, regards indeed his calamitous state, as far as the action itself is concerned, but at the same time the office, entrusted to Christ, as far as its force and dignity. Confect. 1. ἀμνὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ (Lamb of God) is a name of both state and office. Therefore he is called a lamb, because he was slain and sacrificed (this pertains to the state of misery). He is so called with this significant addition: the lamb of God, inasmuch as he was destined by God for sacrifice, and approved by God (which certainly must be attributed to the office of Christ). Princip. 2. The victim which Christ immolated, if you consider the action of the one sacrificing itself, was consummated at the time when Christ breathed out his soul, Hebr. VII, 27; IX, 28; John XIX, 30; its saving effect, however, always continues and remains perpetual for all eternity, Hebr. IX, 12; X, 14. Confect. 2. E. this name, ἀμνὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, must be referred in different ways to both states of Christ; formally indeed, so to speak, to the humble state, but indeed effectively to the eminent state, Rev. V, 6, 9, 12, 13. b) Special are partly of the calamitous state, as υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (Son of Man), about which was said a little before; partly of the glorious state; 1) δεσπότης (master), by right of purchase, 2 Pet. II, 1. 2) λέων ὁ νικῶν (the conquering lion), Rev. V, 5. 3) κύριος (Lord). This name, however, to be considered in different ways, sometimes pertains to the divine nature of Christ, sometimes to the state of highest dignity, to which he ascended according to the human nature. I will set forth some hermeneutical laws. It is a name of the divine nature in Christ, when a) it is attributed to Christ before his human nature was adorned with celestial glory, e.g., Luke II, 11; Matth. XVI, 22, with which that confession is to be compared, v. 16: ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος (the Son of the living God), nay even before he himself, the human nature having been assumed, ἐκένωσεν (emptied himself), 1 Cor. XV, 47. b) when it is joined with certain most certain indications of the divine nature, as Matth. XXI, 3; Mark II, 28; IX, 24; Luke V, 8; XVII, 5, 6. Then indeed it is a sign of the glorious state, in which his human nature is placed, a) when it is so asserted of Christ alone, that he is thereby discerned from the Father, 1 Cor. VIII, 6. b) when Christ is said to have been made κύριος (Lord), Acts II, 36. c) when that is numbered among the effects of death and recovered life, Rom. XIV, 9. d) when mention is made of the exaltation, as it is commonly said, Ps. CX, 1; Phil. II, 9, 11.

III. Names of OFFICE. These likewise are A) General, which contain in their scope the entire threefold function which Christ fulfilled, such as: 1) משיח (Messiah), in Greek χριστός (Christ), John I, 42. 2) מלאך הברית (Angel of the Covenant) or מלאך יהוה (Angel of YHWH), to which that is related, ἀπόστολος (apostle), Hebr. III, 1, add John X, 36; Isa. XLVIII, 16. 3) גואל (Redeemer), Job XIX, 25. 4) Jesus, which name by reason of its usage indeed denotes the subject, as in this statement, 1 John V, 1: ὅτι Ἰησοῦς ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστός (that Jesus is the Christ), i.e., that Jesus of Nazareth, and no other, is the true Christ; but by reason of its signification it pertains to the office, and its universal parts, since there is none of them which does not contribute something to imparting salvation to us. 5) Σωτήρ (Savior), which in reality is the same as Jesus, with the celestial messenger as interpreter, Matth. I, 21. 6) ποιμήν (shepherd). This is apt for all three of Christ's functions: α) for the sacerdotal, since he himself underwent death for the sheep, to be bought with his blood, John X, 11. β) for the Prophetic, because the sheep hear his voice, ibid. v. 3, 27, and for that reason Christ is called ὁ ἀρχιποιμήν (the chief shepherd), 1 Pet. V, 4; for the pastors of the N.T. church are teachers, not Priests, properly so called, much less rulers, ibid. v. 3. γ) for the Royal, inasmuch as he himself defends his sheep from all danger, and bids them aspire to eternal salvation, John X, 28, add Ps. LXXVIII, 71, 72. B) Special, which are of the office a) Sacerdotal, 1) ἱερεὺς (priest), Hebr. V, 6; VII, 17, 21. 2) ἀρχιερεὺς (high priest), and indeed with chiefly a fourfold addition: α) μέγας (great), namely in view of the high Priest of the O.T., who, although he

This is derived from the root שׁוּׁ, which in Kal is less used, but in Hiphil is most frequently employed; whence its origin is, and thus Ἰησοῦς is Savior. The Hebrew word is also read in Nehem. XII, 10, and descends from the Hebrew root. This Latin word seems to some to have been introduced into Latin from the times of Tertullian; but BORRICHIOUS has observed that the same was already flourishing in the century of Trajan. See CELLARIUS latinit. restit. p. 89. To the Greeks he is called σωτήρ (savior), which word is rendered by some Latin authors as servator (preserver); but less fully. For he preserves, who ensures that salvation is not lost; he saves, who gives salvation. GROTIUS explains it by sospitator (deliverer), because Jesus is the author of all prosperity. The angel gives the reason for the denomination, Matth. I, 21: "He will save his people from their sins". The angel expressed the starting point of salvation, which is sin, the origin of all evil. Christ therefore saves us from the wrath of God, from the accusation and curse of the law, from the judgment of condemnation, from temporal and eternal punishment. For all these things descend from sin, as from a head. The destination is the grace of God, justice, life, and eternal salvation. Dan. IX, 24.

Obs. II. The name Savior can also be attributed to God the Father and the Holy Spirit, if you consider the efficacy and act of saving. For God the Father saves us, inasmuch as He sends the Son and on account of His merit remits sins, and at some time actually bestows salvation; the Holy Spirit is said to save us by regeneration, by kindling in us saving faith, by which the merit of Christ is applied to us. And in this way also the Son of God himself is said to save us; because salvation, as an act ad extra, is common to all three persons of the deity.

But when Christ is called Savior, this is done in a peculiar way, namely, by reason of merit, because Christ alone is the meritorious cause of our salvation. Whence the name Jesus imports a respect not in any way to the act of saving, but to the merit of Christ, through which we obtain salvation, and Christ is the savior, inasmuch as He saves His people through His merit and satisfaction.

Obs. III. Jesus is a Savior not typical, corporal, and imperfect, such as were Joshua and Hosea (to whom the name was related); but proper, spiritual, and perfect, because He saves from sin, the source of all evil. He saves by merit and efficacy; He saves inchoatively in this life, and consummatively in the future life. Jesus is therefore the fount of salvation, Isa. XII, 3, the horn of salvation, Luke I, 69, the author of eternal salvation, Hebr. V, 9, in whom alone our salvation is sought and found, Acts IV, 12, since He alone is our Goel, or our redeemer by right of blood.

Obs. IV. Christ is the Savior of all men, by reason of merit and acquisition; because by His passion and death He merited salvation for all; but He is the Savior only of believers by reason of fruit and application; because they alone are made partakers of salvation through faith. You say: Christ is called saved, Zach. IX, 9. E. He is not the author of salvation. Response: Christ is called Saved not meritoriously, but efficiently, because by His own divine power He was liberated from the injuries with which He was afflicted, and the troubles with which He was pressed in His bloody passion.

Question IV: Of what value should the name of Jesus be held?

The name of Jesus should be to us most sweet a), most holy b), and most eminent c).

Proof a. The name of Jesus is compared by the Holy Spirit to poured out oil, Cant. 1, was the highest, and excelled the other Priests in dignity, was nevertheless far inferior to Christ. Hebr. IV, 14. β) κατὰ τὴν τάξιν τοῦ Μελχισεδέκ (according to the order of Melchizedek), Hebr. V, 10. γ) εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (forever), Hebr. VII, 21, add 23 & 25. δ) ὃς ἐκάθισεν ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θρόνου (who sat down at the right hand of the throne), Hebr. VIII, 1. 3) יהוה צדקנו (YHWH our righteousness), Jerem. XXXIII, 16, cf. with Rom. IV, 6; 2 Cor. V, 21. 4) ἱλασμός (propitiation), and also πάσχα (Passover), which pertains to the first part of the Sacerdotal numbers, 1 Cor. V, 7. 5) παράκλητος (advocate), As far as the second, 1 John II, 1. b) Prophetic: 1) προφήτης (prophet), as also προφήτης μέγας (a great prophet), Luke VII, 16; John VI, 14. 2) διδάσκαλος (teacher), John III, 2; Mark XIV, 14. 3) ἐπίσκοπος (overseer), 1 Pet. II, 25. c) Royal: מלך (king) or מושל (ruler), ὁ βασιλεὺς (the king), and indeed with a fourfold excellence: α) Eternal King, Mich. V, 2. β) King of justice, and γ) King of peace, Hebr. VII, 2, add Isa. IX, 6, and the opinion of those pleases me, who interpret the name שָׁלֵם in Gen. XLIX, 10 in such a way that it means reconciler of peace. δ) King of Kings, Rev. XVII, 14; XIX, 16.

3. In that it breathes forth wonderful sweetnesses.

Proof b. Most holy is the name of Jesus; because by divine decree it was imposed by an angel before conception, Luke 1, 31, before birth, Matth. I, 21, before circumcision, Luke II, 21.

Proof c. Most eminent is the name of Jesus; because this name the angels adored, the demons trembled, men assume for salvation, as HILARY says in Ps. LI. Therefore at the pronunciation of the name of Jesus we bend our knees, mindful of the apostolic precept, Phil. II, 10: "At the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth". Indeed, we also uncover our heads at the mention of the name of Jesus; which baring of the head is a ceremony, freely assumed by the church, which it befits the genuine sons of the church to observe. It was placed in the Christian liberty of the church that they should exhibit an external cult of adoration at the mention of one, or several, of this or that, nay even of all the divine names. But the name of Jesus was chosen, either as an epitome of the revelations and benefits of the whole Holy Trinity, which being pronounced and honored, the devotion is not directed precisely to Christ, but to the universal fount of our salvation; or as a character of profession, by which they would go about separated both from the Jews, who confessed some Christ, but did not want Jesus of Nazareth to be the Christ, and from the Arians, who acknowledged God the Father, but denied Jesus to be God. Cf. DANNHAVER hodos. phenom. VIII. p. 602.

It can be objected: Whatever law prohibits the worship of images, prohibits the worship of the name of Jesus. But the divine law, etc. Exod. XX, 4. E. The major is proven: because names are images of concepts, concepts are images of things. Response: I deny the major, because the name of Jesus here is not considered as the determined object of worship, which is God alone; nor as the object of respective worship, in the way that the Pontificists worship images; but only as a memorial sign, which being pronounced or heard, we are carried to the acknowledgment and worship of the person himself.

Question V: Why is our redeemer called Christ?

Christ. Our redeemer is called Christ, that is, anointed; because he was anointed by the Holy Spirit as our king, priest, and prophet.

Proof. Χριστός (Christ) is said from χρίω (I anoint), and therefore denotes the anointed one, and corresponds to the Hebrew name משיח (Messiah). "We have found the Messiah," which is, if you interpret it, the Christ, says Andrew, John I, 42. But our redeemer is called Christ, or the anointed one, on account of the office which he performs, royal, sacerdotal, and prophetic. Just as in the Old Testament, kings and priests, Exod. XXIX, 7; 1 Sam. XVI, 13, and Elisha among the prophets, 1 Kings XIX, 16, were infused with holy oil at the inauguration of their office; so our redeemer was anointed with the Holy Spirit and with power, Acts X, 38, that he might be our king, priest, and prophet. Yet that there is a great difference between the anointing of the kings, priests, and prophets of the Old Testament and the anointing of our Savior, the royal prophet teaches, Ps. XLV, 7: "God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows". The fellows, or companions of Christ, in a general sense, are said to be all the faithful who are partakers both of the spiritual anointing and of the Christian name; in a special sense his fellows are the priests, kings, and prophets, both on account of the typical prefiguration of the threefold office of Christ, and on account of the internal collation of gifts for the offices; Christ is far superior and more eminent than all these. The kings, priests, and prophets of the Old Testament were anointed by men, as Saul and David by Samuel; but our Savior was anointed by God himself, Ps. XLV, 7. The kings, priests, and prophets were anointed with external oil; Christ with internal, namely the Holy Spirit. Whence Isa. LXI, 1, the Messiah himself says: "The Spirit is upon me, because God has anointed me". The kings, priests, and prophets were anointed in adult age; Christ in his mother's womb. The anointing of the kings, priests, and prophets externally signified finite ministering gifts, which the Holy Spirit conferred internally; but Christ immediately receives from God infinite and immense gifts, since God did not give him the Spirit by measure, John III, 34. AUGUSTINE excellently teaches the prerogative of the anointing of our redeemer in tract. in Io. III, 34: "Christ was singularly anointed, especially anointed, whence all Christians are anointed; for all the saints are his participants, but he is singularly the holy of holies, singularly the Christ, singularly the anointed".

Obs. When our Savior is called Christ, or the anointed, the anointer is the divinity, the anointed is the humanity, the oil is the Holy Spirit; whence the profession of Christ is the confession of the whole trinity, as BASIL the Great says.

Question VI: In what respect is the person of our redeemer considered here?

The person of our redeemer is considered here not as ἄσαρκος (unenfleshed), or such as he was from eternity before the incarnation; but as ἐνσαρκος (enfleshed), or such as he began to be in the fullness of time, by the assumption of our human nature into his divine hypostasis.

Proof. We have known the person of the Son of God as ἄσαρκος (unenfleshed), or such as he was from eternity before the assumed flesh, above in part I of the theology, p. 327 sqq.; but here, where we are dealing in the economy of divine grace, the person of our redeemer is to be considered as he is ἐνσαρκος (enfleshed), or inasmuch as God was manifested in the flesh, 1 Tim. III, 16, because Christ our redeemer is so according to both natures, divine and human; for God acquired the church through his own blood, Acts XX, 28.

Question VII: What and how many are the natures of our redeemer?

There are two, divine and human; He has the divine communicated from the Father by eternal generation, according to which He is true God; He assumed in time the human, produced from the blood of the virgin Mary, through the miraculous ἐπέλευσιν (coming upon), or operation, of the Holy Spirit, according to which He is true man, (*).<sup>154</sup>

Proof. Because Christ is a man from the Fathers indeed according to the flesh, but at the same time God over all, blessed forever, Rom. IX, 5. He is God manifested in the flesh, 1 Tim. III, 16. He is that man who is the Lord God, 2 Sam. VII, 19. Therefore the same one, who was made of the seed of David, is said to be the Son of God, Rom. 1, 3. That same one, who is born of Mary, is said to be the Son of the highest, Luke 1, 32, 35. The same one, who is the word of God, and God, is said to have become flesh, John 1, 14. Therefore Christ is a σύνθετος (composite) person, or composite, in which the divine nature is joined with the human.

Question VIII: In how many ways are the two natures considered in the one person of Christ?

The two natures of Christ are considered 1) absolutely and in themselves, 2) relatively and in union.

Question IX: By what arguments is the true and eternal divinity of our redeemer proven?

The true and eternal divinity of our redeemer is proven by most solid arguments drawn from the divine names, from the attributes proper only to the true God, from the personal and essential acts of God, from the religious worship due only to God, from the accurate collation of sayings of the scripture of the O. & N. T..

Obs. We have weighed the arguments by which the divinity of Christ is proven in P. I. of theology, from p. 305 seqq..

Question X: By what arguments is the truth of the human nature of Christ demonstrated?

That Christ is a true man is demonstrated a) from human names, b) from the essential parts of a man, c) from the attributes proper to a true man, d) from human operations, e) from the genealogy of Christ the man.

Proof a. Christ calls himself a man: "You seek to kill me, a man who have told you the truth," John VIII, 40. "There is one mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ," says Paul, 1 Tim. II, 5. Christ is called the son of man eighty-two times in the sacred code.

Proof b. A true man consists of an organic body and an intelligent soul. But Christ consists of a body, John II, 21, of flesh, blood, and bones, Hebr. II, 14; Luke XXIV, 39. He has a soul which He laid down for His sheep, John X, 15, which was sorrowful even to death, Matth. XXVI, 38. He has an intelligent soul, according to which He progressed in wisdom, Luke II, 52, and endowed with a will, John V, 21; Matth. XXVI, 39.

(*) As to the person of Christ, this whole doctrine consists of three parts: 1) that Christ is true man, ὁμοούσιος (of the same substance) with us, 2) that the same is true and highest God, ὁμοούσιος (of the same substance) with the Father, 3) that both natures constitute one person, and in such a way that not the divine nature subsists in the human, but the latter in the former. All these truths are comprehended in one statement in John 1, 14: a) ὁ λόγος (the Word) b) σὰρξ (flesh) c) ἐγένετο (became), and it is not said of the human nature, λόγος ἐγένετο (the Word became), but this is assigned to the divine: σὰρξ ἐγένετο (he became flesh), so that we may understand that it is the divine person who assumed the human nature into his hypostasis.

Proof c. He who hungers, thirsts, sleeps, is sad, weeps, is troubled, is a true man. But Christ hungered, Matth. IV, 2, thirsted, John XIX, 28, slept, Matth. VIII, 24, was sad, Matth. XXVI, 37, wept, Luke XIX, 41, was troubled, John XI, 33. Therefore Christ is a true man. Observe that the affections already mentioned were pure and undefiled in Christ. For as limpid water is moved in a crystal glass, yet is not made turbid; so the affections of Christ were moved without the stain of sin.

Proof d. A true man speaks and asks, disputes from the Holy Scripture, teaches, etc. But Christ spoke and asked, Luke II, 46, 48, disputed with Satan from the Holy Scripture, Matth. IV, 1 ff., taught in the temple, Matth. XXVI, 55.

Proof e. The genealogy of Christ, with respect to the ascending line, Luke III, 23, and with respect to the descending line, Matth. I, 1, lucidly shows that Christ is a true man.

Question XI: Did Christ also assume human infirmities?

Christ assumed natural infirmities, common to all men constituted in a natural state a); but not personal ones, proceeding from particular causes, much less did He take on morally vicious defects b).

Proof a. The natural common infirmities of men are those which are in all men after the fall, e.g., to hunger, to thirst, to be fatigued, to be cold, to be hot, to grieve, to be indignant, to be troubled, to weep; which, since they are blameless, Christ, as Holy Scripture testifies, assumed, not by coercion, but freely, not for himself, but for us, not in perpetuity, but for a time, namely in the state of exinanition, but He did not retain them in the state of exaltation.

Proof b. Personal infirmities are those which proceed from particular causes, and either from a defect of the δυνάμειος πλαστικῆς (formative power), or formative virtue in the begetter, as phthisis, arthritis, etc., or from a particular fault, namely from excessive gluttony, venery, or other excesses, as fever, gout, dropsy, etc., or they draw their origin from a peculiar nemesis or divine judgment, as the diseases of the family of Joab, 2 Sam. III, 29, etc. These are very far from the most holy humanity of Christ, since it was neither expedient for the human race that they be assumed, and it would have derogated from the dignity of the nature, as LOMBARD thinks in book III of the sentences, dist. XV. Moreover, Christ the man could not be convicted of morally vicious infirmities even by his enemies, John VIII, 46.

Question XII: By what individual properties, as by certain prerogatives, does the human nature of Christ stand out?

Certain individual properties belong to the human nature of Christ, by which it excels other men as if by some ὑπεροχαῖς (preeminences) or prerogatives: of which kind of prerogatives are a) ἀνυπόστασία (lack of its own subsistence), compensated by the divine hypostasis of the son of God, as by one far more eminent; b) inherent ἀναμαρτησία (sinlessness), by which Christ is devoid of all his own sin, both original and actual; c) a singular excellence of soul and body.

Proof a. If the human nature of Christ had retained its own subsistence, there would have been two persons in Christ, and therefore two mediators, contrary to 1 Tim. II, 5. The reason is; because a person is formally constituted in its being by subsistence, ultimately completed, and therefore from the unity of subsistence the unity of person is to be estimated. It is therefore necessary that one of the natures from these which coalesce into one person should lack its own proper subsistence; and since the divine nature, which is really the same as its subsistence, cannot lack it; it is clear that the lack of proper subsistence must be attributed to the human nature. You say: I. Every substance subsists by itself; The human nature of Christ is a substance; Therefore. Response: Subsistence is taken either generally, and is explained by independence from a subject of inherence; or specially, and is expounded by a reason of subsisting that is incommunicable, or ultimately completed. In the former sense, subsistence denotes the formal reason of a substance, in the latter sense, supposituality. You say: II. If the human nature of Christ lacks its own subsistence, it will be more imperfect than our ἀνθυποστάτω (self-subsisting) nature, or that subsisting by itself. Response: The perfection of a thing is to be estimated from its essence, not from its subsistence. Add that the lack of its own personality in the human nature of Christ has been supplied by the subsistence of the Logos. Therefore the human nature of Christ is ἀνυπόστατος (non-subsistent), if it is considered precisely and according to itself, because it does not have its own subsistence in act; but when the same is considered in union with the divine nature, the same is rightly called ἐνυπόστατος (subsistent within), that is, subsisting in the Logos.

Proof b. Christ was never defiled by any sin, neither original nor actual. For He knew no sin, 2 Cor. V, 21. He is ἄκακος, ἀμίαντος, κεχωρισμένος ἀπὸ τῶν ἀμαρτωλῶν (innocent, unpolluted, segregated from sinners), Hebr. VII, 26. You say: Christ was made sin, 2 Cor. V, 21. E. He is not devoid of all sin. Response: Christ was made sin, not as if his own sin inhered in him, but because whatever sin there is was imputed to him in the divine judgment by reason of fault as well as of punishment. For every sin was cast upon him, Isa. LIII, 6.

Proof c. It was fitting for Christ ἐν πᾶσι πρωτεύειν (to hold the first place in all things), Col. I, 18. The soul of Christ holds the first place in wisdom, by which it so shines that in his twelfth year of age he taught in the middle of the temple and the assembly of the chief doctors of the church, Luke II, 46, and no man ever spoke like this greatest prophet, John VII, 46. The soul of Christ holds the first place in holiness; since it made little of the vanities of the world, rejected the allurements of the flesh, abstained from laughter, cultivated gravity, endured immense torments for the fallen human race, and conquered a most bitter death. The body of Christ holds the first place in beauty; since he is heard to be the most beautiful among the sons of men, Ps. XLV, 3. The beauty of Christ's body is conjectured from the excellence of the indwelling soul, which undoubtedly fabricated for itself a most elegant dwelling, and from the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit, by whose ἐπελεύσει (coming upon) the temple of Christ's body was most splendidly constructed. Those things are certainly more perfect which God makes by himself, than when he uses second causes as ministers. But we assert the beauty of Christ's body to be not feminine, but manly, i.e., that which befits a grave and honorable man. To this is added that the body of Christ stands out in ἀθανασία (immortality), or immortality, which belongs to it both on account of the integrity of an impeccable nature, Rom. VI, 23, and on account of the indissoluble bond of the personal union. You say: How could an immortal die? Response: Christ by reason of an intrinsic principle is immortal, but that He died, this is from an extrinsic principle, and according to a voluntary οἰκονομίαν (economy). John X, 17, 18. Yet the body of Christ remained in the freely undertaken death ἀφθαρτον (incorruptible), or immune from corruption, Ps. XVI, 10; Acts II, 31.

Question XIII: Is the flesh of Christ ὁμοῦσις (consubstantial), or of the same substance, with us?

The flesh of Christ has the same essence in species with us, and therefore is ὁμοῦσις (consustantial), or of the same substance, with us.

Proof 1) From Hebr. II, 14: "Since the children have become partakers of flesh and blood, he himself likewise made himself a partaker of them". Observe here: a) that Christ calls us his brothers, v. 11, his sons and his children, v. 13, 14; b) that Christ is our brother not only on account of a brotherly affection, but also on account of the communion of the same flesh and blood; which the Apostle teaches in v. 14. From which we argue: Whoever is our brother on account of the communion of the same flesh and blood, he is ὁμοῦσις (consustantial) or of the same substance with us; But Christ, etc. Therefore. 2) From the testimony of the council of Chalcedon: "We confess one and the same to be true God and true man, from a rational soul and body: co-essential with the Father according to the divinity, and co-essential with us according to the humanity, in all things like us, sin excepted".

The antithesis is of both the ancient heretics, the Marcionites, Cerdonians, and Manicheans, who denied the truth of the human nature of Christ; and of the Anabaptists, Socinians, Schwenckfeldians, and Weigelians, (*) who impugn the ὁμοουσίαν (consubstantiality) of the flesh of Christ with the following arguments:

I. Whoever was sent in the likeness of human flesh, his flesh is not consubstantial with our flesh (likeness is an index of quality, not of substance): But Christ, etc., Rom. VIII, 3. Response: Christ is not simply said to be sent in the likeness of flesh; but only in the likeness of sinful flesh; and thus the consubstantial truth of the human nature of Christ with us is not denied, but the foulness of sin is removed from Christ.

II. Christ was found ἐν σχήματι (in fashion) as a man, Phil. II, 7. E. he is not a true man. The reason for the consequence is; because σχῆμα (fashion) denotes an external figure, or phantasm, and is opposed to substance. Response: σχῆμα in that place does not designate an empty figure or phantasm, but external gestures and habits, from which the true humanity of Christ became known.

III. Whoever is opposed to the first man formed from the earth, as the lord from heaven, his body is not terrestrial, but celestial and sidereal, and therefore not consubstantial with us; But Christ, etc., 1 Cor. XV, 47. Therefore. Response: The second man is called the lord from heaven, not because he is not a true man, but because he is not a mere man, because he is at the same time true and eternal God, who is said to have come from the highest, John 1, 14, because his origin is supernatural (**).<sup>156</sup>

IV. Whoever descends from heaven brought a body from heaven; for such as the descent, such is the origin. But Christ etc. John III, 13. Therefore. Resp. The Son of God descended from heaven, not by bringing a body from heaven, but by assuming flesh in the virgin's womb, and by manifesting himself to men in the assumed flesh.

V. Christ denies that Mary is his mother. Matth. XII, 48. Therefore he did not assume from her a nature consubstantial with us.

Resp. Christ in that passage, when asked about his mother, was not denying the origin of his human nature from his mother, but was comparing his fatherly ministries with maternal affections, and preferring the former to the latter. And therefore Christ did not allow himself to be withdrawn or called away from the administration of the office committed to him by the Father by the arrival of his mother. Add that the Savior intended to indicate that the bonds of minds are more religious than those of bodies, as AMBROSE teaches, and as cited by CALOVIUS in his biblia illustrata on this passage, fol. 295.

VI. If the flesh of Christ is consubstantial with us, Christ according to his human nature will be a creature; from which manner of speaking the ancients abhorred. It is answered: The Arians contended that the Logos (λόγον) in himself, even without assuming human nature, was a creature made from nothing. Therefore the ancients, because of the snares of the Arians, rejected this proposition: "Christ is a creature." But because of Schwenkfeld, who denied that Christ was a creature with respect to his human nature, this phrase concerning Christ according to his human nature was used in the assembly of Smalcald in 1537. "We disapprove," they say, "of the delirium of Schwenckfeld, and we say that the human nature in Christ both is and remains a creature, as John says: 'The Word was made flesh.'" Confer. D. GERHARD's exegesis on locus IV, p. 428.

VII. Whoever was not conceived from the seed of a man, but by the coming upon (ἐπελεύσει), or advent of the Holy Spirit, his flesh is not consubstantial with ours; But Christ etc. Luke 1, 35. Therefore. Resp. I deny the major premise. For the origin of Christ's flesh is indeed dissimilar, but the nature is similar. "If you seek the truth of his human nature, acknowledge the material. If you other terrestrial. Which error the voice of the Apostle prostrates with one blow, as it were, 1 Tim. II, 5: "one mediator," the man, Christ, 1) just as there is one God to be reconciled to men; 2) so, that this one Reconciler, one man, is opposed to the one Adam, the first and common author of the perfidy and misery into which the entire human race has fallen. From which shines forth the most wise counsel of God, for what reason there ought to have been but one man who would perform the parts of a Reconciler. Rom. V, 15, 18, 19; 1 Cor. XV, 45. E. one human flesh, with which Christ would be clothed, was sufficient for the purpose; E. a second would have been utterly superfluous.

(**) Nor does Paul say: ἄνθρωπος ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (a man from heaven), but thus: δεῦτερος ἄνθρωπος, ὁ κύριος ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (the second man, the Lord from heaven). Therefore this addition, ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (from heaven), must be referred not to ἄνθρωπον (man), the human nature of Christ, but certainly to ὁ κύριος (the Lord), his divine person.

scrutinize the reason of his origin, confess the divine power," says LEO in sermon II on the nativity.

VIII. The human nature of Christ is destitute of its own subsistence; Therefore it is not consubstantial with us. Resp. Subsistence does not pertain to the essence of man, because it does not make a man, but terminates him.

IX. Christ does not have the same essence in number with us; Therefore he is not of the same substance (ὁμοούσιος) with us. The consequence is proven from the fact that the Logos (ὁ λόγος) is said to be of the same substance (ὁμοούσιος) with God the Father, because he has the same essence in number with God the Father. Resp. Sameness of substance (ὁμοουσία) is twofold: specific and numeric. Christ as man is of the same substance (ὁμοούσιος) with us, not according to number, but according to species; because he is of the same genus and species as our nature.

Question XIV. From whom does the human nature of Christ have its origin?

The origin of Christ's flesh. The human nature of Christ has its origin from the Triune God a), from God the Father b), from the Son of God c), from the Holy Spirit, to whom the production of Christ's flesh is appropriated in the sacred writings d).

Proof a. The production of Christ's flesh, and its application to the hypostasis of the Son of God, is a work ad extra and undivided, or common to the three divine persons. The ancients declared this mystery with a simile taken from three virgins, one of whom is clothed or crowned, while each contributes something to the adornment.

Proof b. "In the fullness of time, God the Father sent his Son, born of a woman," Gal. IV, 4. "He sent him in the likeness of sinful flesh, and to atone for sin," Rom. VIII, 3.

Proof c. The Son of God, the hypostatic power of the most high, overshadowed the virgin Mary: "whence also that holy thing which was born of her was called the Son of God," Luke 1, 35. Obs. a) The "power of the most high" here is not the Holy Spirit, since it is distinguished from him, who was mentioned before. To the Holy Spirit is attributed the coming upon (ἐπέλευσις); to the power of the most high, the overshadowing (ἐπισκίασμος). Who would believe that the angel was tautological, and in a vigorous description of a most sublime mystery said the same, or nearly the same, thing twice? Nor by "the power of the most high" is understood the essential omnipotence of God, because the overshadowing of the virgin Mary is attributed to the power (namely of God the Father) as a personal action. Since, therefore, actions belong to supposits, we consider that by "the power of the most high" is indicated the hypostatic power, or the Son of God, who comes by this name, 1 Cor. I, 24. Just as also among humans a son is named the power of his father, Gen. XLIX, 3. The overshadowing (ἐπισκίασμος) denotes the secret and admirable filling of the temple of the body, constructed by the Holy Spirit. Namely, the Son of God overshadowed the virgin Mary, when in an unsearchable manner he descended into the virgin's womb, and filled the mass of virgin blood, quickened by the Holy Spirit, with a peculiar approximation, and united it to himself, so that he might dwell in it bodily (σωματικῶς), as in his own temple, Col. II, 9; of which there was formerly a figure in the tabernacle of the covenant, as also in the temple of Solomon, both of which, when they were constructed, the divine majesty filled with an intervening overshadowing (ἐπισκίασμός), Exod. XL, 35; 1 Kings VIII, 10, where likewise the verb to overshadow (ἐπισκιάζειν) is used by the Septuagint interpreters. Obs. b) The consequence of this overshadowing is the nativity of the Son of God, now made the son of man from Mary, which is expressed in the words of the angel: "Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of you shall be called the Son of God" (Διὸ καὶ τὸ γεννώμενον ἐκ σοῦ ἅγιον, κληθήσεται υἱὸς θεοῦ). From which words we again gather that by "the power of the most high" here is to be understood not the Holy Spirit, but the Son of God. For the proximate cause why the son of Mary is the Son of God is not the singular conception by the Holy Spirit (which if the angel had intended to indicate, he would have said: "therefore also the holy thing, which is born of you, will be called the son of the Holy Spirit"); but the incarnation of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ). For the celestial legate means to say: "Therefore" (Διὸ), for this reason that holy thing which will be born of you will be called and will truly be the Son of God, because the substantial power of God will assume flesh in you and from you.

Proof d. The angel says: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you" (Πνεῦμα ἅγιον ἐπελεύσεται ἐπὶ σε), Luke I, 35. Obs. a. The coming upon (ἐπέλευσις) of the Holy Spirit was not idle, but operative and most efficacious. For a special and plainly singular divine presence, such as occurred here, is never without efficacious operation. Yet the coming upon (ἐπέλευσις) was not seminal (σπερματική), communicating seed (because the Holy Spirit is not the father of Christ; for he, as to his human nature, is without father (ἀπάτωρ) Hebr. VII, 3.); but 1) creative (δημιουργική) (as DAMASCENE says in book III of De Orthodoxa Fide, c. III), or quickening the mass of blood in the virgin's womb, from which the human nature of Christ was produced; 2) the coming upon (ἐπέλευσις) was sanctifying, by which the adhering sin was wiped away, so that whatever was born of Mary would be holy, which the ancients explained with a simile, taken from a bee, sucking honey from a rose garden without poison; 3) the coming upon (ἐπέλευσις) was connective, or unitive, by which the eternal Logos (λόγος) was joined to the mass of virgin blood, as a bridegroom to a bride, by an indissoluble bond. Obs. b. The conception of the God-man (θεανθρώπου) is appropriated to the Holy Spirit: 1) Because the entire work of fecundation is ascribed to him, Gen. 1, 2; 2) So that the purity of the mass of blood, from which the flesh of Christ grew, might be more evident; 3) So that thus the same might be the cause of the generation of Christ the man, and of our regeneration, namely the Holy Spirit.

Question XV. What is the material, or passive, principle of the conception and production of the human nature of Christ?

The total material principle of the conception and production of Christ the man is Mary, the undefiled virgin a), from the royal lineage of David, and thus sprung from the tribe of Judah b); The partial and proximate material principle is the animated seed of the virgin Mary c).

Proof a. 1) Because Christ is said to be born not only in Mary (locally) Matth. I, 20, but from Mary (materially) Luke I, 35. 2) Because Christ is called "the fruit of Mary's womb," Luke I, 42. 3) Because Christ was "made" (γενόμενος) of a woman, Gal. IV, 4.

Proof b. Because the genealogy of Mary delineated by the evangelist Luke in c. III shows that Mary was procreated from the royal blood of David. For Luke traces the genealogy of Jesus from Eli, who was the natural father of Mary, as the most ancient writer Africanus records, up to David, through the line of Nathan, who was equally a Son of David by Bathsheba, as was Solomon, 1 Chron. III, 5. For which reason Christ is commonly called in S. scripture the son of David, the fruit of the loins of David, Acts II, 30. From which it is evident that Christ the man traces his origin from the tribe of Judah, to which king David owes his birth. Moreover, the undefiled virginity of Mary is proven 1) from Isaiah VII, 14, where Jehovah, about to give Ahaz a sign of miraculous deliverance from his enemies, says: "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." (1) ἁλμᾱ (almah) in the sacred code always denotes an undefiled virgin. This Hebrew word occurs seven times, Gen. XXIV, 43; Exod. II, 8; Ps. LXVIII, 25; Cant. 1, 3; c. VI, 8; Is. VII, 14; Prov. XXX, 19. The words of the last place are: "There are three things which are too wonderful for me, yea, four which I know not: The way of an eagle in the air; the way of a serpent upon a rock... and the way... in a virgin." From this place the modern Jews strive to gather that not every one is a pure and undefiled virgin; but very ineptly. Certainly the way to a pure and hidden virgin is far more abstruse than to a harlot or a prostitute, who either offers herself willingly or makes herself available without much difficulty to a suitor. (2) If ἁλμᾱ (almah) did not always denote a virgin, the sign given to Ahaz would not be so valid. You say: The son of the virgin was to be called Immanuel, not Jesus. Resp. Jesus and Immanuel are the same name not in sound, but in sense, as TERTULLIAN says in book III against Marcion. 2) Mary, to whom the angel announced the conception, is expressly called a virgin, Luke I, 27, who had not known a man v. 34, who was made fruitful by the wondrous advent of the Holy Spirit v. 35. Therefore Mary was a virgin before the conception, in the conception, and in the birth; but whether she was ever-virgin (ἀειπαρθενός), even after the birth, cannot be apodictically shown from the sacred letters. Nevertheless, some conjecture the perpetual virginity of Mary from the fact that Christ, fixed to the cross, committed his mother to the care of John, whereas he would have commended her to surviving sons, if she had borne any after knowing a man.

Proof c. 1) Christ assumed the seed of Abraham, Hebr. II, 16, which he joined to himself from no one but Mary. 2) "Just as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same," Hebr. II, 14. But children are made partakers of blood through animated seed. Therefore Christ also. 3) If Christ had not assumed a soul from the soul of Mary, he would not have redeemed the human soul. For "that which is not assumed is not healed" (τὸ ἀπρόσληπτον, ἀθεράπευτον), as GREGORY NAZIANZEN says in epistle 2 to Cledonius. But indeed the intention of the Son of God was to heal the whole human nature infected with the stain of sin, of which the soul is the first receptive vessel (πρῶτον δεκτικόν). Therefore he assumed the whole human nature, consisting of body and soul.

The antithesis is of the Anabaptists and Socinians, some of whom deny that Mary was descended from the stock of Judah, while others deny that Christ was born from the seed of Mary. They fight against us with the following arguments:

I. Elizabeth was of the daughters of Aaron, and thus from the tribe of Levi, Luke I, 5, and she is called the kinswoman (συγγενής) of Mary, Luke I, 36. From which it is gathered that Mary was also from the tribe of Levi. Resp. Elizabeth indeed was from a priestly father, but from a mother who was born of the tribe of Judah and the house of David.

II. Whoever was not in the loins of Adam does not trace his origin from the tribe of Judah and the royal lineage of David; But Christ was not in the loins of Adam; Therefore. The minor is proven because he who is born from the loins of Adam is a sinner; since in Adam all have sinned, Rom. V, 12. Resp. Christ was not in the loins of Adam when he sinned, because the power of generating and procreating offspring, instilled in man, preceded the fall, Gen. I, 28, but by the force of the promise finally made after the fall, Gen. III, 15, he was indeed derived from the blood of Adam, but sanctified.

III. Women lack seed; Therefore Christ was not born from the seed of Mary. Resp. Physicians demonstrate with firm reasons that women have seed. In the sacred code, the "seed of the woman" is commemorated, Gen. III, 15; c. XII, 3. Sarah, being made fertile, is said to have received "strength to conceive seed" (δύναμιν εἰς καταβολὴν σπέρματος), Hebr. XI, 11.

IV. Whatever woman is a sinner, the holy flesh of Christ does not derive its origin from her seed; But Mary is a sinner; Therefore. Resp. Whatever woman is a sinner, the flesh of Christ does not derive its origin from her seed, if it is not purified by the Holy Spirit. But the seed of Mary was purified by the coming upon (ἐπελεύσει) of the Holy Spirit, from which indeed the poison of sin was wiped away.

ON THE ACT OF THE PERSONAL UNION

Question XVI. Are there two persons in Christ, just as there are two natures in him?

THE PERSON OF Christ is one a), and that composite (σύνθετος), in which the divine nature of the Son of God is most closely and indivisibly joined with the assumed human nature through a personal union b).

Proof a. If there were two persons of our redeemer, there would be two Christs, two mediators, two saviors. But "there is one Lord, Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. VIII, 6; "one mediator," 1 Tim. II, 5; "one Savior," outside of whom there is no salvation, Acts IV, 12. Therefore there is one person of our redeemer Jesus Christ.

Proof b. Christ is called a composite person (σύνθετος), not because he consists of two natures as parts, but because in Christ the divine nature is so composed or joined with the human that the two natures, intimately united, have coalesced into one person. The reason is that, the union having been made, the human nature, stripped of its own hypostasis, subsists by the subsistence of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ), communicated to it. Hence it is that the same one who is born of Mary is said to be the son of the most high, Luke I, 35.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who state that it can in no way happen that Christ is a composite person (σύνθετος); their arguments are:

I. Every composite is constituted of parts; Christ is not constituted of the divine and human nature as parts; Therefore Christ is not a composite person. The major is self-evident; because every composite is formed from parts into which it can be resolved. The minor is clear; because the divine nature of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) cannot be a part of Christ; for it is complete both in subsisting and in being. Resp. a) Every essential and integral composite is indeed constituted of parts; but not a personal composite, since it consists of two natures complete in being; one of which within its union lays aside its ultimate subsistence, and is terminated by the personality of the other nature. b) I distinguish between a composite from these, and with these. Not every composite is formed from parts, but often one is composed with another, which is not a part of the composite, e.g., when an angel appears in an assumed body, the angelic nature does not take on the character of a part. Wherefore we do not say that Christ is composed from two natures, but that in Christ the divine nature is intimately joined with the human.

Instance; Christ consists of two natures; Therefore he is composed of two natures. Resp. Christ consists of two natures, not as from two parts, but as from two substances, personally united. Therefore THOMAS notably teaches in part III, question II, that Christ is not a composite person by reason of parts, as if he consists of two essential parts, but by reason of number, because he is one person in two natures.

II. Whatever is incommunicable cannot be communicated to another; But the hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) is incommunicable; Therefore the hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) cannot be communicated to the human nature. The minor is clear; because hypostasis is the incommunicable manner of subsisting. Resp. I distinguish between a communication which is made to a person, and a communication which is made to a nature. The hypostasis of one person cannot be communicated to another person, because each person is complete and terminated in its ultimate subsistence; but it is not repugnant for the hypostasis of one person to be communicated to another certain united nature; because this communication does not cause that which is communicated to be terminated by another.

Question XVII. What is the principle by which the composite person of Christ obtains its unity?

Personal Union. The principle by which the composite (σύνθετα) person of Christ has received and retains its unity is the personal union of the two natures in Christ.

Proof. A personal union is said to be that by which two complete natures are united to constitute one person. For it is called a personal union from its terminus ad quem (to which), because such a union terminates in the God-man (θεάνθρωπον) person, or because by such a union one person is constituted in two natures, who is at the same time true God and true man.

Question XVIII. In how many ways is the personal union considered?

The personal union is considered in two ways: a) with respect to the act; b) with respect to the state. The act of union is also called unitio. The act of union is properly and specifically called personal union, in Greek hypostatic union (ἑνωσις ὑποστατική).

Proof. Unitio and unio, strictly speaking, differ. 1) Unitio is the act by which the two different divine and human natures are joined; unio is the state of the natures joined by unitio. 2) Unitio is the cause by which the natures, divided in themselves, acquire a certain indivision in the unity of the person; but unio is the proximate effect of unitio, and the personal indivision of the two natures itself. 3) Unitio is transient and momentary; unio is permanent and perpetual. 4) Unio is reciprocal; for the Son of God is united to the assumed flesh, and the flesh is united to the Son of God; but unitio is not reciprocal. We rightly say: "The Son of God united the flesh to himself"; you would say less rightly: "the flesh united the Son of God to itself." 5) Some propositions flow from unitio, others from unio. The subject of the former is the uncompounded person, or the unincarnate Logos (λόγος ἄσαρκος); the subject of the latter is the compounded person, or the incarnate Logos (λόγος ἑνσαρκος).

Question XIX. By what equivalent word is the union of the two natures in Christ called?

The unitio, which is the actual coalition of the divine and human nature into one person of the God-man (θεανθρώπου), is commonly called the incarnation.

Obs. As CHEMNITIUS teaches in his book on the two natures of Christ, chap. IX, p. 108 sqq., IRENAEUS was the first to call the personal union, taken effectively, incarnation (σάρκωσιν καὶ ἐνσάρκωσιν); IGNATIUS called it inhumanation and incorporation (ἐνανθρώπησιν καὶ ἐνσωμάτωσιν), ATHANASIUS assumption (πρόσληψιν) of humanity into the divinity of the Son of God, and most of the Greeks called it dispensation (οἰκονομίαν). They used the word dispensation (οἰκονομία); 1) Because the supreme divine majesty, without any diminution of itself, submitted itself to union with the miserable mass of our nature; 2) Because it so exalted that assumed nature that it now pertains to the very person of the Son of God; 3) Because now in the economy (οἰκονομία), or administration of the kingdom and office of Christ, neither nature acts without the other, but each acts with the communication of the other.

Question XX. What is incarnation?

Incarnation. Incarnation is the divine action by which the Son of God assumed human nature in the womb of the virgin Mary into the unity of his person.

It is more fully defined; Incarnation is the divine action by which the Son of God assumed human nature—consubstantial with us, yet free from sin, and destitute of its own subsistence—in the womb of his mother the virgin Mary into the unity of his person, and communicated to it both his hypostasis and his divine nature, so that now Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) perpetually subsists in two natures, divine and human, most closely united.

Obs. I. Incarnation, taken broadly, comprises both the production of the flesh in the womb of Mary and the assumption of the produced flesh; taken strictly, it denotes only the assumption of the flesh into the person of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ). The production of the flesh is common to all three persons of the deity; The act of assumption proceeds from the divine power common to the three persons; The terminus of the assumption is the hypostasis of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ). Therefore, incarnation is the work of the three divine persons efficiently and inchoatively, but of the Son of God alone formally and terminatively.

Obs. II. The assumption of the flesh and incarnation are indeed synonymous in a certain respect; but this difference intervenes, that the Logos (ὁ λόγος) is said to be actively incarnated, the human nature passively incarnated. The incarnation of the Son of God is proven 1) from John I, 14. "The Word was made flesh" (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο). By the Logos (λόγον) is understood God of God, or the Son of God; For John says: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." See above part I, p. 309. But that God is subject to no change or conversion is manifest. By "flesh" is understood man consisting of body and soul, by a familiar scriptural phrase, e.g., Gen. VI, 12. "All flesh," i.e., every man, "had corrupted his way." Is. XL, 6. "All flesh," i.e., every man, "is grass." But John uses the word "flesh" rather than "man" to indicate a) the non-hypostatic nature (ἀνυποστασίαν) of the human nature considered in itself, that the Logos (ὁ λόγος) assumed not a person, but the nature of man, i.e., true and complete humanity, destitute of its own hypostasis (ὑποστάσεως); b) on account of the kinship (συγγένειαν), or consanguinity with our nature; c) on account of the love for mankind (φιλανθρωπίαν), by which moved to our most miserable and abject condition, the Son of God descended from the throne of his majesty. The Socinians understand by "flesh" fragility; but they deceive and are deceived, because 1) that signification is unused in scripture; 2) Fragility, which is an accident, cannot be without a subject; 3) The glory of this flesh was seen. From these premises it is argued: Whoever is the eternal and immutable God, and becomes flesh, is not changed into flesh, but assumes it, and intimately unites it to himself; But the hypostatic Word of God etc. Therefore.

2. From Hebr. II, 14. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." Whoever is God, and becomes a partaker of flesh and blood, just as our children are, he assumes flesh and blood into the unity of his person; But the Son of God etc; Therefore. The minor is proven from chap. I of the epistle to the Hebrews (in which chapter the divinity of Christ is demonstrated) compared with chap. II, 14.

3. From Hebr. II, 16. "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." Whoever is a partaker of flesh and blood in such a way that he assumes the seed of Abraham, he has personally united human nature to himself; But the Son of God etc; Therefore.

You say: The word to take on (ἐπιλαμβάνεσθαι) signifies to receive, and the "seed of Abraham" is taken collectively, to designate the posterity of Abraham, so that the sense is; Christ receives the posterity of Abraham into grace. Resp. Let it be that to take on (ἐπιλαμβάνεσθαι) in general signifies to receive, yet here, for the matter at hand, it signifies to assume the seed of Abraham, so that the one assuming, the Son of God, may become a partaker of flesh and blood, v. 14, and like his brethren, v. 17. That "seed" is not always taken collectively, Paul teaches, Gal. III, 16.

4. From Rom. XI, 5. "Of whom (the fathers) as concerning the flesh Christ came" (κατὰ σάρκα), "who is over all, God blessed for ever, amen." Whoever is the supreme God, and has flesh propagated from the fathers of the Israelites, he has personally united the flesh to himself; But Christ etc; Therefore. The major is proven; because God cannot be predicated of man in the nominative case, unless God and man are united; for the personal union is the foundation of such a predication.

5. From Gal. IV, 4. "The Son of God was made of a woman"; Therefore the immutable Son of God was made man, not by a substantial change, but by a personal union.

6. From 1 Tim. III, 16. "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh." By "God" in this place is understood the Son of God, who is also called God, John I, Acts XX, 28, 1 John V, 21, and is said to have been made flesh, John I, 14. He, in the flesh and through the flesh, made his glory conspicuous and demonstrated that he was true God. John teaches this in c. 1, 14. "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father," and in chap. II, 11. "Christ manifested his glory." But he could not have manifested his glory in the flesh, unless he had assumed the flesh.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who fervidly impugn the mystery of the incarnation; they rely on the most futile inventions of reason:

I. The incarnation of the Son of God is repugnant to sound reason, which dictates that it cannot happen that two substantial and perfect forms should fall into one and the same supposit; since thus there would not be one, but two different supposits. Resp. a) Reason, left to itself, knows nothing of the incarnation of the Son of God, since it is "confessedly a great mystery" (ὁμολογουμένως μέγα μυστήριον), 1 Tim. III, 16. Therefore it must be believed because of divine revelation. Reason, taking judgment upon itself concerning the mysteries of faith, is not sound, but unsound, corrupt, and ferocious. b) Who ever called the divinity of Christ a form? c) Philosophy teaches that the forms of the elements remain in one supposit.

II. If the divine nature of the Son of God is incarnate, then the divine nature of the Father and the Holy Spirit is also incarnate. The latter is heretical; for by it the heresy of the Sabellians and Patripassians is brought back. Resp. We assert that the Son of God, or the second person of the deity, who is not the Father and the Holy Spirit, was incarnate; not indeed excluding the divine nature of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου). But we distinguish between the nature considered absolutely, as it is common to all three persons, and considered relatively, as it is marked by the hypostatic character of the Son of God.

III. He whose human nature is a true person cannot be a divine person; But the human nature of Christ is a true person; Therefore. The major is established; because two persons cannot coalesce into one person. The minor is proven a) from the description of a person. For every first and intelligent substance is a person. But the human nature of Christ is a first and intelligent substance. b) Human nature is a man and a son of man, who cannot but be a person. c) Actions and passions belong to supposits. The human nature of Christ acts and suffers. d) The prophetic, priestly, and royal office belongs to the human nature of Christ, which office no one performs unless he is a person. Resp. To a): Every first and intelligent substance that subsists in itself (ἄνυπόστατος) is a person. But the human nature of Christ is not subsisting in itself (αὐθυπόστατος), i.e., enjoying its own subsistence, but subsisting in another (ἐνυπόστατος), i.e., destitute of its own subsistence; it is terminated by the subsistence of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) communicated to it, and therefore is not a person, but personated, as they commonly say. To b): The human nature of Christ, in itself, considered apart from the hypostasis of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ), is not a man, nor a son of man; but taken with the hypostasis of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ), it is a man and a son of man. For "man" and "son of man" signify by way of supposits, and connote a hypostasis (ὑπόστασιν). We also grant that the son of man subsisting in the son of God is a composite person (σύνθετον), who is called the God-man (θεάνθρωπος). To c): Not only do supposits act. For even a separated soul acts, which however is not a person. But what is commonly asserted, that actions belong to supposits, does not have this sense, that a thing has from its very supposit-hood that it acts, or can act, but that by the law of nature a thing, before subsistence, is not constituted in a complete state and accommodated for operating. But if some thing, destitute of its own subsistence, is constituted from elsewhere and by a subsistence communicated from another, in a complete state and accommodated for operating, then nothing prevents the nature from also properly acting and suffering. But this is the case with the human nature of Christ. To d): The threefold office belongs to Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), not to the human nature alone, considered in itself, without the connoted divine hypostasis (ὑπόστασιν).

IV. One and the same subject cannot be two disparate things at once, nor can one of the disparate things be the other, nor can two disparate things be predicated of the same subject; But supreme God and man are disparate things; Therefore Christ cannot be at the same time God and man. God cannot be man; nor can God and man be predicated of Christ. Resp. Disparate things, in themselves, considered apart from their union, cannot be predicated of each other, nor can one subject be two disparate things, nor can one of the disparate things be the other. But if it happens that two disparate things are united with each other, then it is not repugnant for one to be predicated of the other, not indeed in the abstract, but in the concrete, and with the union connoted; and one and the same subject can at the same time be two disparate things, and one of the disparate things can be the other, not indeed according to the same, but in one respect and another, e.g., I rightly say: a certain white thing is sweet (milk); a certain soldier is a musician (king David); a certain philosopher is a theologian (Justin Martyr).

Instance: Two complete substantial disparate things cannot be predicated of each other; e.g., a sheep and a wolf are not affirmed of each other. Resp. Two complete substantial disparate things are not united by the law of nature to constitute one supposit, but that they can be united by divine power is not repugnant. When this happens (as it was done in the incarnation of Christ), then they can be predicated of each other in the concrete, not indeed by a usual predication, but an unusual one. For philosophers have formed their canons by the induction of natural examples, with which it is not licit to impugn the mysteries of faith. We believe the scripture which says: "The Word was made flesh," John 1, 14. "The branch of David is Jehovah," Jer. XXIII, 5.

V. No complete intelligent substance can lack its own personality, and subsist by another's; But human nature etc; Therefore. Resp. I deny the major. For personality is not of the formal aspect of a complete substance, but the ultimate mode, or grade of subsisting, posterior to nature, and in creatures really differs from subsistence itself. But indeed every prior can be without a posterior, and what are really distinct in a finite essence, can be separated from each other by an infinite power. Let us piously and submissively acknowledge that it is a perfection of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) that he can terminate with his hypostasis (ὑποστάσει) a singular humanity, in itself untermiated in subsisting, yet intimately united to him, since in this very thing no contradiction is involved. And since the Son of God is able to do this, humanity also could receive it; for to the active power of God there corresponds in creatures an obediential power.

Question XXI. In what does the incarnation formally consist?

The form of the incarnation. The incarnation formally consists in the assumption of the flesh into the unity of the person a), and the communion of the divine nature b).

Proof a. The incarnation is the personal union of the two natures, whose terminus ad quem is one person, because by the personal union, subsistence is communicated from the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) to the assumed human nature, which does not subsist of itself, so that those two natures, the divine and human of Christ, are one person.

Proof b. The incarnation of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) is not completed by the sole communication of subsistence, but also includes the assumption of the flesh into the communion of the divine nature of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου). From which ATHANASIUS described it in his creed (*) as the "assumption of humanity into divinity" (πρόσληψιν ἀνθρωπότητος εἰς θεότητα). The reason is; because the subsistence of the Son of God cannot be communicated to the assumed flesh without his divine nature itself; because hypostasis is a mode, which can in no way be outside, or apart from, the nature, from which it does not really differ. Wherefore, the divine subsistence being communicated to the flesh, the divine nature and essence of the Son of God itself cannot but be communicated.

Question XXII. What is the communication of the hypostasis, or subsistence?

The communication of the hypostasis is that by which the Son of God truly and really conferred his divine hypostasis (ὑπόστασιν) to the assumed human nature, destitute of its own personality, for communion and participation, so that it is terminated by the same, is completed in subsisting, and is constituted in its ultimate hypostatic being.

Obs. 1. The divine and human natures, existing in the one composite (συνθετῷ) person of the Son of God, have one and the same hypostasis, yet in a different manner of having. For the divine nature has it primarily and in itself (πρώτως καὶ κατ' αὐτό), through itself and independently; but the human nature has it secondarily and through another (δευτέρως καὶ κατ' ἄλλο), on account of the personal union, and thus participatively.

Obs. II. The flesh of Christ was made a partaker of the divine subsistence for possession, use, and denomination. For possession; because the Son of God so assumed the human nature into his hypostasis, that the hypostasis of the Son of God became the hypostasis of the human nature, or of the assumed flesh, which was conferred on it not by transfusion, but by communication. For use; so that, by virtue of this communication, the human nature might actually enjoy and be enriched by the personal act of the Son of God, and subsist by the same. For denomination; so that from this it is not indeed called a hypostasis (ὑπόστασις), or subsisting (ὑφιστάμενον), but subsisting in another (ἐνυπόστατος), or subsisting in the Logos (ὑποστᾶσα ἐν τῷ λόγῳ), as DAMASCENE says in Book III of De Orthodoxa Fide, c. 1, subsisting in the Son of God, and thus not a person, but personated, which word the commentator of Damascene uses.

(*) The Blessed Man uses the common manner of speaking. For he knew well that ATHANASIUS was not the author of the symbol, but was easily the chief defender of the doctrine which is contained in it, and from that the name stuck to that confession. On this argument, the writers who have illustrated ecclesiastical history with erudite and wise commentary should be consulted.

The communication of the hypostasis is proven; 1) from Jo. 1, 14. "The Word was made flesh," which is to be understood thus, as DAMASCENE notes in Book III of De Orthodoxa Fide, c. 11, that the hypostasis of the Word, without conversion, became the hypostasis of the flesh. From which we gather; Whatever hypostasis, proper to the Son of God from eternity, became in time the hypostasis of the assumed flesh, that was communicated to the flesh; But the divine and infinite hypostasis, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because it cannot happen that what is proper to one be possessed by another, except by a real communication of itself with that other. 2. Christ, consisting of a divine and a human nature, is one person; Therefore he has one hypostasis, or personality. For where there is a twofold personality, there are two persons. Hence we further gather; Whoever, consisting of a divine and a human nature, has one hypostasis, in him either the divine nature has communicated its hypostasis to the human nature; or the human nature has communicated its hypostasis to the divine nature, or finally one has been formed from the hypostasis of the divine nature and the hypostasis of the human nature. But neither did the human nature communicate its subsistence to the divine nature, because the Logos (ὁ λογός) subsisted from eternity in a most perfect manner, while the flesh began to exist only in time, and to subsist in the Logos (ἐν λόγῳ); nor did one hypostasis arise from the hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) and the hypostasis of the flesh, because this denotes a mode of subsisting that is incommunicable and ultimately complete. But that a third incommunicable and ultimately complete thing should be formed from two incommunicable and ultimately complete things is simply impossible. Therefore the divine nature communicated its hypostasis to the human. 3. If the Logos (ὁ λόγος) had not communicated his hypostasis to the assumed flesh, the son of the virgin Mary would not be called the son of the most high. But he is rightly so called, Luke I, 35. Therefore. The consequence is proven; because for the truth of that proposition, it is required that the son of Mary be personally the same as he who is the Son of God, or have the very hypostasis of the Son of God; which how could the human nature of Christ have, unless it had received it communicated from the divine? (*).

(*) So it is indeed; If we compare those testimonies of Scripture which commend to us one Christ, and not more, with those which attribute a double nature to this one, one indeed divine, the other human; it will follow that we should firmly believe that one has been assumed into the ὑπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence) of the other. But indeed such an assumption cannot happen without change of that nature which is assumed by the other, and communication of infinite perfection. Therefore what is changeable and capable of communicating infinite perfection with itself must necessarily be finite. Human nature is finite per se; divine is infinite, and free from all change, nor can greater perfection be communicated with it, but it itself has power, if it wills, to communicate with another nature. Therefore it is necessary that not the divine nature received ὑπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence) communicated from the human, but the human from the divine. We make the same necessary consequence from a certain principle, proper to revealed Theology, the force of which that we may perceive, this philosophical principle must be premised; Whatever is, is altogether on account of some certain end, or several. Therefore of what kind is the end, for the sake of obtaining which the whole thing is, and so indeed, and not otherwise is; such also the mode by which that thing so is must be made. Therefore if some altogether singular end has been constituted for a thing, and besides it no other; there cannot but also be an altogether singular mode by which the thing so is, so that no other can be compared with it. With these things premised, it must now be considered; to what end, or, that I may speak more correctly in Latin, by what counsel and purpose did the divine nature of Christ receive human nature into its own ἑνωσις (henosis / union)? Indeed it was an altogether singular and incomparable end, suitable to no created things; neither to mortal nor to angel.

You say: I. Hypostasis is the incommunicable mode of subsisting: Therefore the hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) could not be communicated to the assumed flesh. Resp. Hypostasis is incommunicable to another ultimately subsisting person; it is not incommunicable to another nature, destitute of its own subsistence.

You say: II. If the Logos (ὁ λόγος) communicated his subsistence to the human nature, the human nature will be a person; and thus there will be two persons in Christ, which is Nestorian. The consequence is evident; because, whatever ultimately subsists, is a person. Resp. I deny the consequence. For the human nature is not a person for this reason, that it has a communicated subsistence; ..but for that very reason it is not a person, but personated, having personality participatively, not independently and subsisting in itself

It was namely vicarious satisfaction to be provided to God for all and individual men, the reconciliation of God and men. For accomplishing so great a business, altogether two things were necessary: of which indeed one was most perfect obedience, to be provided both in performing and in suffering; but the other was its infinite price, equal and sufficiently suitable for placating infinite God. Both are contained in this one saying, Heb. 9:12. But the former was proper to human nature, but this latter was of divinity. I will complete the argumentation; If two things are required for one end, one to be attributed to divine nature, the other to human, and so indeed that both ought to be joined by the closest bond as it were for the consummation of one effect and work, to be perfected by one and the same subject; it is necessary that two natures be joined in one subject. Therefore one Reconciler of God and men cannot but be one person, in whom there are two natures. Right reason and illuminated mind apprehends nothing here that is absurd, nothing that contradicts itself. But he thinks absurdly who, proceeding from human things, indeed even common and perpetual ones, to a divine thing, and the same altogether singular, concludes. There is no man who can coopt some other nature into his own ὑπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence): Therefore neither can God do this? Is there therefore no difference between God and men, much less infinite? The finite is not capable of the infinite. I concede, as to comprehension. Human nature did not grasp and comprehend divine nature in Christ; Rightly. Who denies this? Therefore also as it pertains to receiving conjunction and retaining it perpetually? Will not infinite therefore also be capable of finite, so that it can join this whole with itself and assume it into its own ὑπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence)? Either you will rashly deny every union by which God can be present to created things; or you will easily grant me this: If God can, as he is accustomed, join himself παραστατικῶς (parastatikos / assistingly) with any of his effects, especially with men, so that in him we live, move, and are, Acts 17:27-28, why cannot he also join human nature with himself in some singular way, and by the closest bond, ὑποστατικῶς (hypostatikos / hypostatically)? Nor is there the danger which PETER BAYLE vainly fears, lest our opinion patronize scepticism. He argued in a wonderful way: If the conjunction of soul with body does not suffice for the person of man (which, as he says, the example of Christ taught us); it follows that no one can know with certainty that he is a person. Who does not see that the consequence by no means holds, which is drawn from the altogether singular condition of one man, and not ψιλάνθρωπος (psilanthropos / mere man), born for the salvation of all, to the common lot of all men? We also deny, and utterly deny the antecedent. Who ever said, or whom did our Theology teach, that the coupling of soul and body is not sufficient for constituting the person of man, insofar as he is man? Who of our people attributed to Christ a human person, so called philosophically? We all confess with one mouth and mind his divine person, and in it human nature, and we are most certainly persuaded that the conjunction of soul with body did not suffice for the person of Christ and θεάνθρωπος (theanthropos / God-man), not insofar as he is man, but insofar as he is Christ and θεάνθρωπος (theanthropos / God-man), that one μεσίτης (mesites / mediator), interceding between God and men. That the divine nature of Christ should assume human nature into its own ὑπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence), this was necessary not for the truth and integrity of human nature, which he himself assumed, so that Christ might be man, but for that altogether singular end, that he might be ὁ μεσίτης (ho mesites / the mediator) and θεάνθρωπος (theanthropos / God-man), to whom this was proposed, that he might perfectly perform the parts of Conciliator of peace between God and men.

(αὐθυποστάτως). Not whatever subsists in any way whatsoever is a person, but that which subsists in itself (αὐθυπόστατον), i.e., what subsists by itself and incommunicably, and does not depend on another in subsisting.

You say: III. To whom the hypostatic character of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) is not communicated, to him also his hypostasis is not communicated; But to the human nature it is not etc. Therefore. The major is clear: because the hypostatic character of the Son of God does not really differ from the hypostasis itself, but through it he is constituted in the being of a son. The minor is proven: because the hypostatic character of the Son of God is the eternal passive generation; which was not communicated to the human nature. Resp. the hypostatic character of the Son of God, properly speaking, is not generation, but sonship, although its foundation is generation. The human nature was indeed received into the communion of sonship, because Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) is one proper and natural Son of God, subsisting in two natures, divine and human.

Instance: The proper and natural Son of God is begotten from eternity; The human nature of Christ is not begotten from eternity; Therefore the human nature of Christ is not the natural and proper Son of God. I concede the whole argument. For "Son of God" is the name of a person. Therefore, just as we do not say: "the human nature is a hypostasis," or "a person," but "subsisting in another" (ἐνυπόστατος) and "personated"; so also we do not say: "the human nature is the Son of God begotten from eternity," but "it is assumed into the sonship of the Son of God, begotten from eternity." Whence in the concrete: "The son of the virgin Mary is the Son of God, begotten from eternity," is rightly said. Conf. Jo. I, 14.

Question XXIII. What is the end of the incarnation?

The end of the incarnation. The proximate end of the incarnation is the redemption of the human race corrupted by sins a); the ultimate end is the glory of God b).

Proof a. From the words of Matth. XX, 28. "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom (λύτρον) for many."

Proof b. To the Son of God exhibited in the flesh the angels sang, Luke II, 14: "Glory to God in the highest." For from the mystery of the incarnation shines forth the glory of the goodness, justice, wisdom, and omnipotence of God.

Question XXIV. Would Christ have come in the flesh if man had not sinned?

The Son of God would not have assumed flesh if man had not sinned.

Proof. 1) Because, as sacred scripture teaches, the end of the incarnation is the redemption of the human race. But redemption presupposes sin, and the misery contracted from sin. To avert this, the Son of God put on our flesh. For "forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; And deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Hebr. II, 14.

2. The Son of God was to come in the flesh not by some absolute decree, but was promised after man had been seduced by the devil, to bruise the serpent's head, Gen. III, 15, and to bring about a blessing for the curse, Gen. XII, 3. What therefore was done by the force of the evangelical covenant after the fall, had no place before the fall. But the promise of sending and the coming of the Son of God in the flesh was made by the force of the evangelical covenant.

The antithesis is of certain Scholastics (to whom ANDREAS OSIANDER, a professor of Königsberg, gave his approval) and of the Socinians, who state that Christ would have come in the flesh, even if man had not sinned. Their principal arguments are:

I. Whoever ordained the hypostatic wisdom to undertake the priestly, royal, and prophetic office, before all his works, he decreed to send the eternal son in the flesh before he decreed to create men, or to raise the fallen; But God the Father etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the hypostatic wisdom, ordained to the office, is the Son of God. The minor is proven from Prov. VIII, 23, where the Son of God, or the celestial wisdom, says: "The Lord possessed me, the beginning of his way; before his works, from then, from eternity I was ordained" (נִסְכַּחַתִּי), "enjoined," "inaugurated," namely to the royal, priestly, and prophetic office. Resp. 1. נִסְכַּחַתִּי is rendered by SEB. SCHMID as "I was poured forth," and thus the eternal generation of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) is described metaphorically (μεταφορικῶς) by this word. Not in vain does D. CALOVIUS say in his biblia illustrata on this passage, fol. 150: "Some also investigate that personal property in the word אֲנִי, 'I was anointed,' because, with the divine essence being communicated to the Son by eternal generation, the divine majesty and dominion over all things to be created was also communicated." 2) The same concedes that the anointing here is properly the destination made from eternity of the Son begotten from eternity to the office not only royal, but also priestly and prophetic, just as kings, priests, and prophets used to be inaugurated to their office by anointing. But although that destination of the Son of God to the office in the sign of divine reason preceded the creation and the works of the world, it did not however precede the divine decree concerning the creation of the world; and although that decree of sending the son to the office is eternal and immutable, it is not however absolute, but respective, made according to the foreknowledge (κατὰ πρόγνωσιν) of sin.

II. No most glorious act of God depends on sin; The incarnation of the Son of God is a most glorious act of God; Therefore. Resp. We do not say that the incarnation of the Son of God depends on sin as on a cause; but we assert that sin, foreseen, offered to God the occasion to form the decree of sending his son in the flesh and liberating the human race from the misery of sin.

III. The Son of God is called the firstborn of creatures, Col. I, 15, because God the Father made the decree of sending his son before that of creating any things, or of raising the fallen. Resp. Christ is called the firstborn of every creature, not because he was begotten in creation, or among creatures; but because he was begotten before every creature. Which predicate belongs to him by reason of his divine nature, not with respect to the incarnation.

IV. Whatever contributes much both to the manifestation of divine goodness, and to the sublimity of the human race, that God would have procured, even if man had not sinned; But the incarnation of the Son of God etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because God wills his goodness declared, and man's excellence promoted, with no sin existing. The minor is proven because 1) the incarnation of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) is a notable document of divine goodness; for while the Logos (ὁ λόγος) assumes flesh, the divine and human nature are most sweetly united, so that no one may doubt the love of God. 2) By the incarnation the human nature was exalted into the person of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου), which sublimity of human nature is incomparable. Resp. 1) God before the fall manifested his goodness toward man most clearly by the bestowal of his image; he would have declared it more clearly in the blessed life, if man had never sinned. 2) Nothing would have been lacking from the essential perfection or excellence of man, even if the human nature had never been raised into the hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου); just as the nature of the angels confirmed in good remains excellent, even though it is constituted outside the hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου).

Question XXV. Was the incarnation of the Son of God necessary?

The incarnation of the Son of God was necessary not absolutely a); but, this hypothesis being posited, that God willed to receive fallen man into grace with his justice saved, and to save him eternally b).

Proof a. The incarnation of the Son of God would not have been necessary if man had persisted in the state of integrity. Nor was it simply necessary in the state of misery after the fall; because God could, by a most just right, have punished man, fallen into sins, with eternal penalties.

Proof b. The incarnation of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου), as far as is evident from the scriptures, was necessary by hypothesis; if God decreed to raise fallen man, and to gift him with celestial beatitude. For 1) "neither is there salvation in any other (than Jesus)." "For there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved," says Peter, Acts IV, 12. 2) "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. III, 11. 3) If another remedy had existed against sin, God would have spared his own son (*). But he did not spare this one, but delivered him for us to a most bitter death, that with him he might freely give us all things necessary for salvation, Rom. VIII, 32. "Therefore an indissoluble damnation would have remained without the incarnate word," says AUGUSTINE in sermon V on the nativity.

(*) And indeed to the Father thus supplicating the son: "If it can be done, make it so that this cup may be turned away from me," Matt. 26:39. But that which can in no way be done otherwise is altogether necessary.

You say: I. In fact, indeed, salvation is in no other than in Jesus; yet it is not licit to gather from this that there were no other means for God to repair the salvation of men than the incarnation of his son. Resp. The apostle Peter in that passage not only says that in no other than in Jesus is there salvation; but he also adds that no other name is given under heaven, in which we must be saved, to indicate that the salvation of the human race depended on the satisfaction of the Son of God, as an infinite person, which the incarnation of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) necessarily preceded.

You say: II. God, the absolute lord of all creatures, could by his absolute power have justified the sinner and received him into grace, without the intervention of satisfaction; Therefore the incarnation was not necessary. Resp. What God can do by his absolute power is not clearly established for us, scripture being silent, for he can do more abundantly than we understand, Eph. III, 20. Our discourse is about the ordained power of God, by which God, his justice being saved, could not receive a sinner into grace without satisfaction. For every earthly judge, justifying the impious, is an abomination to God, Prov. XVII, 15. Therefore it is repugnant to the essential justice of God to justify the impious without the intervention of satisfaction, for the rendering of which the incarnation of the Son of God was necessary.

Question XXVI. Has the Son of God, the redeemer of the human race, already been incarnated long ago?

The Son of God, who is the promised Messiah and redeemer of the human race, came in the flesh long ago.

Proof. 1) Because the scepter has long since been taken away from the tribe of Judah. But the scepter was not to be entirely taken away from the tribe of Judah until Shiloh, that singular peacemaker, namely the Messiah, should come. For so has the swan song of the aged prophet Jacob, Gen. XLIX, 10: "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Obs. 1) Shiloh is most conveniently derived from שָׁלוֹחַ (shalah), he was tranquil, and thus denotes a tranquilizer, or the author of eternal peace and tranquility, so that the sense is: Judah will indeed be afflicted by various evils, yet the scepter will not completely depart, until the peacemaker comes, who will bring him true peace. עַד כִּי (ad ki), until, does not infer that at the very moment Shiloh comes, the government and sanhedrin of the Jews must be suddenly and as if by one blow cast down, but it admits a certain latitude in this way: Around that time when Shiloh comes, it may indeed happen that the polity of Judah inclines and gradually begins to fall, yet it will not be utterly abolished before he comes. Namely, the Jews were indeed sent under the yoke of servitude by the Romans before the advent of Christ, yet they were permitted to live by their own laws, and thus enjoyed a certain autonomy (αὐτονομία), especially since Herod lived by Jewish customs. The scepter of Judah was therefore shaken by Pompey and Herod, but was finally broken not long after the advent of the Messiah, and plainly taken away by Vespasian, who leveled the city of Jerusalem to the ground. Wherefore, the Jewish republic having been utterly overthrown, we most validly conclude: The scepter has long since been taken from the tribe of Judah; Therefore the Messiah has come long ago.

2. The temple of Jerusalem has long since been destroyed, and has remained destroyed for many centuries hence; although the Messiah had to come before the destruction of the second temple, which was to be destroyed shortly after with a notable commotion of the entire Jewish people and of its religion. See Hag. II, 7, compared with Hebr. XII, 26; Mal. III, 1.

3. The family of David has so perished that it cannot be demonstrated by any suitable argument who, man or woman, is descended from that family, but the promised Messiah had to come while the family of David was then surviving; because he was to be born from it, and it was then known, so that he could be recognized from it as the son of David. See Ps. LXXXIX, 30, 37; 2 Sam. VII, 16; Jer. XXIII, 5; c. XXXIII, 15; Mich. V, 2; Is. VII, 14.

4. The seventy weeks of Daniel have without doubt long since elapsed; which not even the Jews can deny, even if you grant them the calculation which they wish to be observed in numbering the kings of Persia and the years of their reign. But the Messiah had to come before the completion of the course of those weeks, as Daniel testifies, IX, 24. That the starting point of the seventy weeks of years of Daniel is the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (in which Ezra came to Jerusalem at the special command and diploma of king Artaxerxes, to restore the ruined city, and to reestablish both the ecclesiastical and the civil polity: See Ezra VII, 8 sqq.) and that the terminus ad quem must be so ordered that the passion of the Savior falls in the middle of the last week, D. CALOVIUS has demonstrated with firm arguments in his biblia illustrata on this passage, p. 653 sqq., with whom cf. D. PFEIFFER's dubia vexata p. 55.

5. Not only have the gentile oracles ceased; but also the Levitical ceremonies have been abrogated, and the sacrificial fire itself has been extinguished. But indeed the gentile oracles were to gradually cease at the advent of the Messiah, and the Levitical ceremonies with the sacrificial fire were to be extinguished, Zach. XIII, 2, 4; Jer. III, 16; Dan. IX, 26, 27.

6. Whatever things were predicted in the old testament concerning the Messiah, or the redeemer of the human race, and pertain to demonstrating and recognizing him, are such that they all converge on a certain person, who was born long ago, and can be most fittingly explained of him; which person we are now about to demonstrate solidly to be Jesus of Nazareth.

*) And to the Father, the son thus praying; "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me," Matth. XXVI, 39. But that which can in no way be done otherwise, is entirely necessary.

Question XXVII. Is Jesus of Nazareth the true Messiah promised in the O.T.?

Jesus of Nazareth, in whom we Christians sincerely believe as the author of eternal salvation, is the true Messiah, in whom all the prophecies of the O.T. published concerning the Messiah, perfectly square. (*)

(*) A most worthy argument, which we should explain somewhat more fully. There are altogether three propositions which contain the matter: 1) That the Messiah, and he indeed one, was sometime going to come; 2) That he has long since come; 3) That there is no other than Jesus of Nazareth. Of these propositions the first, which the Jews profess with us, is supported by the prophecies of the O.T. by which all the signs of Christ were foretold and determined. The second is confirmed by this, both that the time assigned to the future Christ has long ago passed, and that those things from which certain signs of the coming Christ were to be recognized have long since ceased to be, e.g. where is the temple today? where is the family of David? where is the distinction of tribes into which the Jewish nation was divided? where are the genealogies? The third finally is made from this, that all the signs, with not even one removed, agree with Jesus of Nazareth, and so we see all the predictions completed in him alone. No one else ever showed himself to be such as the Messiah ought to show himself to be, which is so manifest that the Jews themselves, although after our Jesus was brought into the light (for before no one existed as ψευδόχριστος [pseudochristos / false christ]), were deceived by many, yet could constantly have faith in none. From which it appears clearer than light that the Jews did not doubt that the time was consummated when the ψευδόχριστοι [pseudochristoi / false christ] induced them to follow them credulously. Therefore the whole proof will be completed so that we studiously collect the signs of the Messiah, predicted by the divine Prophets, and compare with each of them, with none omitted, those things which have been committed to monuments concerning the properties and deeds of Jesus of Nazareth. Those signs are namely:

I. Of Person, which pertain either generally to both natures, divine and human; that he should be Emmanuel, Is. 7:14, add Matt. 1:23, son of David, and the same David's Lord, Ps. 110:1, add Matt. 22:42-43 (see note to question 3); or individually to either nature, to the divine indeed, that he be the second person of the Holy Trinity, Son of God, through eternal generation, Ps. 2:7, Is. 9:6, Mic. 5:2, add Luke 1:32, 35, Gal. 4:4, Heb. 1:3, 5; but to the human, and its 1) origin, 2) sanctity, Ps. 45:7, Dan. 9:24, Is. 53:9, add Heb. 1:9, Luke 1:35, John 8:46, 1 Pet. 2:22; 3) perpetuity, that the human nature of Christ should never be separated from the divine, and much less destroyed, indeed that the body of Christ should be altogether free from corruption, although lifeless, Ps. 16:10, add Acts 2:27ff. As it pertains to origin, various surrounding circumstances are determined: α) Whence? We have four indications, of which the first signifies from what nation the Messiah was to originate, Gen. 22:18, add Gal. 3:16, Rom. 9:4-5, John 4:22; the second, from what tribe, Gen. 49:10, add Heb. 7:14, Acts 13:22-23, Rev. 5:5; the third, from what family, namely David's, Jer. 23:5, 33:15, conf. with Matt. 22:42, but that very much weakened and diminished, Is. 11:1, conf. with Rev. 5:5, & add the genealogy of our Jesus, recorded in writing by Matthew and Luke, whose difficulties, besides many and greatest men, blessed GOTTFRIED OLEARIUS solves in his excellent book, which he entitled: Jesus the True Messiah; the fourth finally, from what mother, namely from a virgin, Is. 7:14 - for thus Christ ought to be the seed of the woman, not of the man, congruently with the πρωτευαγγέλιον [protevangelion / first gospel], Gen. 3:15, add Luke 1:34-35, Matt. 1:23. β) Where in the world? Namely the land of Canaan, and indeed in the town of Bethlehem, Mic. 5:2, add Matt. 2:4-5, Luke 2:4. γ) When? There were three marks. Christ ought to be born; a) while rule still endured in the tribe of Judah, but with affairs almost inclined to destruction, Gen. 49:10, add Luke 2:1; b) with the second temple not yet destroyed, Mal. 3:1, Hag. 2:9, for the word הנה [hineh / behold] demonstrates as if with a pointing finger that very temple which was then constructed, whatever ABARBANEL argues to the contrary with some of his people; c) near the end of LXX weeks of years, whose terminus is established in the exile of the Jewish land, Dan. 9:24 to the end, add Matt. 24:15.

II. Of State, that it was altogether going to be 1) double, and the former indeed of misery and lowest humility, but the latter of glory and highest dignity, 2) both in one and the same Christ, Ps. 22 throughout, 110 v. last, Is. 53 throughout, conf. with Acts 8:34. From which it clearly appears how absurd is the fable of recent interpreters about a double Messiah.

III. Of Office, whence the name משיח [mashiach] or χριστός [christos] stuck to him. A) Generally and universally there are three signs: 1) How manifold and what kind ought the office entrusted to Christ to be? Namely altogether threefold, and such indeed: Priestly, Prophetic, Royal. The saying by which these three offices joined together are foretold, most indeed think this to be, Is. 33:22. But indeed in this place nothing more is signified than the royal office, מלכנו [malkenu / our king], and its two chief parts, namely legislative power (although Christ clothed in flesh never brought new laws, yet he confirmed the ancient and perfect ones again by his authority, using this customary manner of speaking: ἐγὼ λέγω ὑμῖν [lego lego hymin / I say to you]), מחקנו [mechokekenu / our lawgiver], and judicial, שפוטנו [shoftenu / our judge]. But there are other most illustrious sayings of the Prophets, especially two: One, Is. 11, where is predicted a) the Priestly office, expressed by the word ריח [reach / smell], v. 3, add Gen. 8:21 & in Leviticus often, Eph. 5:2; b) the Prophetic office, v. 4 latter part, add 2 Thess. 2:8; c) the Royal office, in the former part of the same v. The other is extant in Ps. 22, in which the Priestly office is foretold, v. 1-22, then the Prophetic, v. 23, 26, finally also the Royal, v. 28 to the end. And this also was going to be something proper to Christ, that he alone was going to undertake these three offices simultaneously, as which God never willed and allowed to be associated in one man. It was never permitted to anyone to administer the province of Priest, teacher, and simultaneously King. We see the fulfillment in Heb. 4:14, John 3:2, 18:36-37. 2) In what manner he himself was to be anointed and inaugurated: namely with oil, not properly so called, Ps. 45:7, Is. 11:2, 61:1, add John 3:34, Acts 10:38, especially John 1:33, this expression, τὸ πνεῦμα μένον ἐπ' αὐτόν [to pneuma menon ep' auton / the Spirit remaining upon him], manifestly corresponds to that prediction, as it is in Isaiah 11:2-3: ונחה עליו רוח יהוה [venachah alav ruach YHVH / and the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him]. 3) That he would use a certain precursor, Mal. 3:1, 4:5, which the Jews have wrongly interpreted, as is customary for them today, about Elijah himself returning from heaven to earth, Mark 9:11, Matt. 11:14, 17:10ff, Luke 1:17, Mark 1:2-3. B) Specially it was necessary that there be certain properties and prerogatives of individual offices, by which this one Priest, Prophet & supreme Ruler would be distinguished from all others. Therefore the signs were individually:

a) Of the Priestly Office: 1) That he himself would be a priest according to the order of Melchizedek, not Aaron, Ps. 110:4, add Heb. 7 throughout. 2) That he would sacrifice no other victim than himself, Is. 53:10, add Eph. 5:2, Heb. 9:25-26. 3) Not for his own sins, which would be altogether none, but altogether for ours, he would be a piacular sacrifice, Is. 53:5-6-7, add Heb. 7:26-27. 4) With this victim slain, offered to God and accepted, it would be that the typical sacrifices of the O.T. would be altogether abolished, and there would be no use of them hereafter, no force, no efficacy, Dan. 9:27, Jer. 3:16, 31:31ff, Ps. 40:6-7, add Heb. 8:5, 7ff.

Proof. 1) Whoever is God and man, is the true Messiah; But Jesus of Nazareth etc. Therefore. The major is evident from 2 Sam. VII, 12, 13; Ps. CX, 1; Mich. V, 1; Jer. XXIII, 5. The minor is established; because that Jesus of Nazareth is a true man the Jews do not deny; but the divinity of Jesus of Nazareth is proven by very many arguments, and especially by the miracles performed with his own power (αὐτοκρατορικῶς) and for his own glory, to which Jesus himself appeals, Matth. XI, 5; Jo. X, 25.

2. Whoever was born of the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Judah, the royal stock of David, and of an undefiled virgin, is the true Messiah; But Jesus of Nazareth etc. Therefore. The major is clear from Gen. XXII, 18; c. XLIX, 10; 2 Sam. VII, 12; Is. VII, 14. The minor is evident; because Jesus of Nazareth was born of the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Judah, the royal stock of David, as testified by the genealogy which Luke in c. III, 23 sqq. recounts according to the ascending line, and Matthew in c. I sqq. according to the descending line; he was also born of a most chaste and inviolate virgin, who indeed had not known a man, Luke II, 34.

3. Whoever is the ruler of Israel, as God begotten from eternity, as man born in the fullness of time, was born in Bethlehem, to be magnified to the ends of the earth, is the true Messiah; But Jesus of Nazareth etc. Therefore. The major is clear in the prophecy of Micah c. V, 1. The minor is confirmed by Matthew c. II, 6.

4. He for whose coming a divinely destined precursor prepared the way is the true Messiah. But for Jesus of Nazareth etc. Therefore. The major is clear from Is. LX, 3; Mal. III, 1. The minor is evident from Mark I, 2, 3.

5. Whoever, as the poor and humble king of Zion, entered Jerusalem riding on a donkey, is the true Messiah, Zach. IX, 9. But Jesus of Nazareth, etc. Matth. XXI, 5. Therefore.

6. Whoever is the Goe!, or redeemer by right of kinship, Job XIX, 25; a prophet like Moses, Deut. XVIII, 15; a catholic king, Zach. IX, 9; Ps. LXXII, 8; a priest according to the order of Melchizedek, Ps. CX, 4; a priest interceding for sinners, Is. LIII, 12; was to suffer extreme things, Ps. XXII; Is. LIII; was to die, Dan. IX, 26; was to be buried, Is. LIII, 9; was to be immune from corruption, was to descend to hell and rise again, Ps. XVI, 10; was to ascend to the heavens, Ps. LXVIII, 18; was to sit at the right hand of God the Father, Ps. CX, 1; he is the promised Messiah. All of which the new testament preaches concerning Jesus of Nazareth.

The antithesis is of the Jews, who state that the Messiah has not yet come, and who deny that Jesus of Nazareth is the true Messiah. Their principal arguments are:

I. The Messiah is to be called Immanuel, not Jesus, Is. VII, 14. Resp. The name Immanuel is the same as the name Jesus, not as to the sound of the voice, but as to the truth of the thing signified. For the name Immanuel implies that God is with us, not by a mere juxtaposition (παράτασιν) and gracious assistance, but by the fellowship of our nature, and thus it is a name of person

b) Of the Prophetic Office: That this Prophet would be the greatest of all: 1) like Moses, Deut. 18:15ff compared with 34:10-11-12, add Acts 3:22, 26. 2) Common teacher of all nations, Is. 2:2-3-4, 9:1ff, add Matt. 4:16, Is. 42:6, 49:6, add Luke 2:32, Acts 13:47. 3) Herald of salvation & righteousness, to be found in no one else except in him himself, Is. 45:22, 24, add Matt. 11:28, Acts 4:12. 4) Most gentle and conspicuous with altogether singular mildness, Is. 42:2-3, add Matt. 12:19. 5) About to undertake all parts of the prophetic office: α) by teaching, Is. 42:1, 3, 54:13, add John 6:45; β) by performing miracles, Is. 35:5-6, add Matt. 11:5, and indeed plainly singular and excellent, of what kind no other Prophet ever did, John 9:32, 15:24; γ) by prophesying and also knowing hidden things of others, Is. 11:3, which words ABARBANEL himself interpreted thus: So great will be his prophecy that he will know even the secrets of the human heart, although they are declared by no external signs; add John 2:24-25, 4:29, Matt. 26:68. 6) Also using a certain singular manner of teaching, or method, namely parabolic, Ps. 78:2, add Matt. 13:35.

c) Of the Royal Office: That his kingdom would be 1) spiritual, namely of righteousness, Is. 45:23ff & of peace, Is. 2:4, 11:9, 9:6-7, especially Zech. 9:9-10, add Matt. 21:5, see Hellen. Hebopfer Vol. I p. 433. 2) Universal, so that not only Jews, but also profane nations ought to obey the command of Christ alone, and indeed in all regions of the earth, Ps. 2:8, 10, 72:8, 11, add Rom. 15:8-9, Is. 45:23, add Rom. 14:11, with not even the highest Rulers excepted, Ps. 2:11-12. 3) Continuous and perpetual, without any either intermission or termination, Ps. 45:6, 72:17, Is. 9:7, Dan. 7:13-14, add Luke 1:33, Heb. 1:8.

and office. For just as the name Jesus primarily designates the office, but supposes and connotes however the God-man (θεάνθρωπον) person, to whom alone the office of saving belongs; so the name Immanuel primarily designates the God-man (θεάνθρωπον) person, but at the same time sub-inserts the end of the personal union of the divine and human nature, the reconciliation of God and man, and the leading back of man to God, and thus the salvation of the human race. Whence by the very fact that Christ is Jesus, i.e., Savior, he is also Immanuel, by reason of his person; because no one can save sinful man from his sins, unless he is Immanuel, God and man.

II. The Messiah was to come after the scepter was taken from Judah; But Jesus came before the scepter was taken away: Therefore Jesus of Nazareth is not the Messiah. The major is evident from the prophecy of the patriarch Jacob, Gen. XLIX, 10. The minor is clear; because, when Jesus was born, the king of the Jews was Herod, Matth. II, 3. Resp. The patriarch Jacob did not predict that the scepter was to be taken away from Judah before the advent of Shiloh, but that the scepter was not to be taken away from Judah before the advent of the Messiah, although he would be seen in a restless state and troubled by various wars (*). For this reason he predicted the coming of Shiloh, or the peacemaker, so that the pious Israelites, pressed by calamities, might think of the coming of the tranquilizer Messiah, by whose benefit they would have peace with God, far nobler than all temporal peace. Moreover Herod, an Idumean by nation, a Jew by religion, was not indeed a foreign ruler, but he was a vassal of the Roman Emperor, and thus the Jewish scepter at the coming of Shiloh was not indeed completely broken, but was shattered; which is shown by 1) the census taken by the emperor Augustus, Luke II, 1; 2) the collection of tributes by publicans and solemn registrations, Matth. XXII, 17; 3) the imposition of garrisons and the quartering of Roman soldiers, Matth. VIII, 9; 4) the lack of capital jurisdiction, John XVIII, 31.

III. The promised Messiah will be the ruler of Israel, Mic. V, 1, who will raise up the collapsed kingdom of David, Is. IX, 7; Jer. XXXIII, 15; But Jesus of Nazareth never ruled the Israelites, nor did he raise up the collapsed kingdom of David: Therefore. Resp. The dominion of Jesus of Nazareth, the true Messiah, is spiritual, and that universal, according to the antecedent will of God; although however not a few Jews, no less than gentiles, reject his rule, he nevertheless remains the ruler of the true Israel, which is called the Israel of God, Gal. VI, 16. And since an eternal throne was promised to David through the prophets, it is easily gathered that it is established not by corporal, but by spiritual force, because no corporal throne is eternal.

IV. To the repenting Jews God promised a return to the land of Canaan, Lev. XXVI, 44. Resp. God promised that the Jews in the time of the O.T. would be brought back to their land, if they repented; which was done, when they were brought back from the Babylonian captivity (conf. Neh. 1, 8, 9; Is. XI, 11; Jer. XVI, 15.). But in the time of the N.T. (in which that external constitution of sacrifices and the Mosaic polity was to be abrogated, and the land of Canaan was to be desolated without hope of restitution, Dan. IX, 26.) God did not utterly cast away the Jews, Rom. XI, 2, but if they truly repent, he receives them into grace; which reception into grace is indeed to be understood, according to the nature and condition of the N.T., not of a corporal return into the long-desolated Canaan, but of a spiritual one to the true church, namely the celestial Jerusalem.

Question XXVIII. What predications flow from the act of union?

The predications, or personal propositions, flowing from the act of union are those in which an act of union with the human nature, considered as in itself non-hypostatic (ἀνυποστάτω), or devoid of subsistence, is predicated of the concrete of the simple person of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου).

Proof. Such propositions are given in the sacred writings, e.g., "The Word was made flesh," John I, 14; "God was manifest in the flesh," 1 Tim. III, 16; "The Son of God took on him the seed of Abraham," ibid. v. 16.

(*) It must be carefully considered and closely held that to the complete prophecy of dying Jacob pertains not only that עד כי־יבא שילה [ad ki-yavo shiloh / until Shiloh comes], but also this ולו יקחת עמים [velo yikahat amim / and to him shall be the obedience of the peoples]. Therefore, before royal power was altogether taken away from that tribe, it was not sufficient that Christ had come, but it was also necessary that he himself be made perfect (Heb. 5:9), and his advent be announced to all nations. Now let the terminus be! with Jesus himself as interpreter, Matt. 24:14, and also with experience as witness.

Obs. The predications that flow from the act of union are not to be confused with the propositions that proceed from the state of union. For in personal propositions which enunciate the act of union, the subject is always the simple person of the Son of God, or the unincarnate Logos (λόγος ἄσαρκος), while the predicate is the act of his union with the human nature, inasmuch as this is considered as in itself non-hypostatic (ἀνυπόστατος); e.g., "The Word (unincarnate) was made flesh"; "God (the uncompounded second person of the divinity) was manifest in the flesh." But in propositions signifying the state of union, the subject is the composite person (σύνθετος), denominated either from the divine nature, or from the human nature subsisting in another (ἐνυποστάτω), or from both natures, while the predicate is likewise sometimes the divine nature, sometimes the human nature in the composite person (συνθετῶ), e.g., "God is man, man is God"; also: "Christ is God," Acts 20, 28; "In Christ is God," 2 Cor. V, 19.

Question XXIX. What is the personal union?

On the Personal Union. The personal union is the conjunction of the two natures, divine and human, subsisting in the one hypostasis of the Son of God, inferring a mutual, and that indissoluble, communion of each nature.

Obs. In describing the personal union, two things are to be observed: 1) the conjunction of the two natures in the one hypostasis of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου), 2) the mutual communion (κοινωνία) of each nature, although it may be doubted whether this enters into the very form of the personal union. The Epitome of the Formula of Concord described the hypostatic union as "the highest communion which God truly has with the assumed man," p. 607. The Declaration of the Formula adds 1) that the hypostatic union can neither be thought of, nor subsist, without a true communication, and shows that the ancient doctors of the church joined these two words, communion (κοινωνίαν) and union (ἐνώσιν), in the explanation of this mystery, p. 766. Nevertheless, the F.C. says 2) that "the highest and ineffable communication of the natures follows from the personal union," p. 607, where it is necessary that some distinction be admitted between the personal union and the communication of the natures. For what follows from the personal union cannot be the personal union itself. Wherefore D. IOANN. MUSAEUS in his lectures on the epitome of the F.C. annotates that, although, as to the thing itself, the personal union and the communication of the natures do not differ, they yet differ in our manner of conceiving. For in the reason of understanding, the extremes united with each other are conceived before the communication which they have with each other is conceived. He admits in the meantime that, because the communication of the natures and the personal union do not really differ, they cannot be defined by different real definitions.

Question XXX. What kind of union is that of the two natures in Christ?

The union of the two natures in Christ is not merely verbal, nor notional, nor habitual or respective, but real, and that not accidental, nor essential, but personal and perichoretic.

Proof. The union of the two natures in Christ is not 1) merely verbal, arising either from a title without the reality, as when one is called a counselor of a prince, who was never in his counsel, or from an improper locution, as when Herod is called a fox. For Christ is not just in name only, or improperly, but truly and properly Immanuel and the God-man (θεάνθρωπος). 2) It is not notional, or of reason, by which several concepts distinct by reason are, by the operation of the mind, conceived as undivided. Such a union is given between a genus and a difference in a species. For neither is the divine nature of Christ a genus, nor his human nature a difference, or vice versa. 3) It is not relative (σχετική), habitual, or respective, which can exist even if the extremes of this union are in reality separate and distant. For there is a various respective union, namely a moral one between friends, who even when absent have one mind; an economic one between spouses; a political one between citizens; an ecclesiastical one between members of the church. The union of the two natures in Christ is far more intimate than a habitual one, which indeed implies a relation of many things to each other, but without their real conjunction. The Son of God was made a partaker of flesh and blood, like the children, Hebr. II, 14. Therefore the union of the two natures in Christ is real, because it is given between truly coherent extremes, with the exclusion of any separation or distance. 4) It is not accidental, by which several things, divided among themselves, are joined to some sort of indivision. Such an accidental union is given a) between two or more disparate accidents, coupled in one subject; thus whiteness and sweetness are united in milk; b) Between an accident and a substance, such as is given in a learned man; c) Between two substances, so united with each other that from them results not one thing per se, but per accidens. To this pertains a physical union by confusion or mixture (κατὰ σύγχυσιν), as in mead; by apposition of the united parts (κατὰ παράθεσιν), as in a heap of stones; by assistance (κατὰ παράτασιν), such as is both in things present and contiguous to each other, as when two embrace each other with their hands, and in continuous things, as when two planks are fastened together. To an accidental union pertains the mystical, which they make threefold: sacramental, gracious, and glorious. A sacramental one is given between an earthly and a heavenly thing sacramentally united; a gracious one between God and believers in the militant church; a glorious one between God and the blessed in the triumphant church. The union of the two natures in Christ is not accidental; because no species of accidental union can be applied to it. For this union is not between two accidents, nor between a substance and an accident, but between two substances, which are united not by mixture or confusion, because the divine nature, which is spiritual, most simple, and infinite, cannot be mixed with the human; nor by assistance (παράστασιν), or apposition, since this infers no communion (κοινωνίαν), or internal communication. Moreover, this union far surpasses in its eminence the gracious conjunction of believers and the glorious one of the blessed with God. For no believer in this life, no blessed one in the celestial life, is one subsisting thing (ὑφιστάμενον) with the son of God. In none as in Christ does the whole fullness of the divinity dwell bodily. 5) Nor is it an essential union, by which two incomplete natures concur to constitute one complete nature, e.g., soul and body constitute one man. The two natures in Christ are complete in being, nor do they concur to one complete nature, but to constitute one composite (σύνθετον) person. In essentially united things, no constituting principle pre-exists by nature; but the divine nature of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) subsists by itself from eternity. Therefore the union of the two natures in Christ is of a single kind and exceptional (μονότροπος καὶ ἐξαιρετος), i.e., wonderfully singular, and singularly wonderful. For it is a union of natures, but not natural; it is personal, but not of persons, because it is called personal not by reason of the terminus a quo (from which), as if it were made from two persons, but by reason of the terminus ad quem (to which), into one person, because the Logos (ὁ λόγος) terminated the assumed humanity with his personal perfection, ultimately completed it, and constituted it in a hypostatic being, and thus the hypostasis of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) became the hypostasis of the flesh. This union is called perichoretic, to indicate that it is not parastatic, external, and imperfect, such as is between two planks fastened or glued together, between a man and a garment, between an angel and an assumed body; but intimate and most perfect, which cannot be without a mutual communication of the united things. For a perfect union (ἔνωσις) is defined by SUIDAS and PHAVORINUS as a "communicative concourse of different things (substances)" (συνδρομή κοινωνική διηρημένων πραγμάτων). See D. CALOV. in metaphys. divin. part. general. p. 315. Since therefore the union of the two natures in Christ is intimate and most perfect, the same can neither exist, nor be thought of, without the communication of each nature.

Obs. The Fathers in the council of Chalcedon, assembled in the Year 458, intending to express the mode of the hypostatic union, confessed that our Savior exists in two natures unconfusedly (ἀσυγχύτως), unchangeably (ἀτρέπτως), indivisibly (ἀδιαρρέτως), inseparably (ἀχωρίστως). DAMASCENE adds the word undistantly (ἀδιαστάτως), that the two natures united in Christ are not distant from each other by any space of place, or interval, placed apart. See CHEMNIT. de d. n. Chr. fol. 64.

Question XXXI. What is the communion of the two natures in Christ?

Communion of natures. The communion of natures in the person of Christ is the mutual participation of the divine and human nature of Christ, by which the divine nature of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου), having been made a partaker of the human nature, permeates, perfects, inhabits, and appropriates this to itself; while the human nature, having been made a partaker of the divine nature, is permeated, perfected, and inhabited by it.

Obs. I. Κοινωνία is rendered in Latin by communicatio and communio; which two words are sometimes used promiscuously, sometimes so distinguished that the former designates a transient act, the latter a permanent state. The latter mode is considered here.

Obs. II. The communion of the two natures in Christ is not 1) merely verbal, as when the wife of a certain Elector, on account of the conjugal union, participates in the name of Electress, although in reality she is not an electress, since she does not possess the authority of electing the Emperor. 2) The communion of which we speak is not notional, or intellectual, otherwise called communication by participation (κατὰ μέθεξιν), which our intellect conceives between extremes which are the same as to the thing; in which manner a genus communicates its essence to a species, a species to individuals. But it is 3) a real communion, because the divine nature of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) truly and really was made and remains a partaker of the human nature, and the human nature truly and really was made and remains a partaker of the divine nature. Nor 4) is this communion merely a conferral of dignity (in Greek κοινωνία κατ' ἀξίαν), in the way that God communicated the dignity of the priesthood to Aaron; for the most eminent communion, of which we now speak, is not between personally diverse extremes, but its root is the communion of the hypostasis; and so 5) it is not a commixtive communion, as when salt is communicated to water by mixture; for the foundation of such a communication is an accidental union; nor 6) is it a natural, or essential communication, such as is between form and matter, soul and body, which flows from an essential union; but it is 7) personal, called according to conjunction (κατὰ συνδυασμόν), also according to union (καθ' ἔνωσιν), because it arises from the union of the two natures in the one person of Christ.

Obs. III. The Greeks called the communion of the two natures in Christ perichoresis (περιχώρησιν), i.e., interpenetration, permeation, circuminsession (as the Scholastics rendered τὴν περιχώρησιν). Perichoresis (περιχώρησις) is indeed not a biblical term, but an ecclesiastical one, and began to be used especially when Nestorius denied the communion of natures. They did not, however, understand a local and quantitative perichoresis (περιχώρησιν), as a jar is said to contain (χωρεῖν) water, but an unlocal one and spoken metaphorically. The Fathers took the occasion of describing the personal perichoresis (περιχωρήσεως) a) from the essential perichoresis (περιχωρήσει) of the persons of the Holy Trinity, b) from the natural perichoresis (περιχωρήσει) of the soul and body, c) from the accidental perichoresis (περιχωρήσει) of fire and iron. For just as one person of the trinity is in another; the soul permeates the body; fire penetrates all the pores of iron; so the divinity of Christ is in the humanity which it surrounds, fills, and permeates on all sides. From which it is easy to gather that perichoresis (περιχώρησις) denotes, 1) that the personal union is intimate and most perfect. An external and imperfect union occurs when an angel assumes a body, a pilot is present to a ship, a garment adheres to a man; to remove which external union the doctors of the church called the personal union and the communion flowing from it perichoresis (περιχώρησιν). For just as the soul is not externally present to the body, nor does it only direct its motion, but it interpenetrates it, enters into it, informs it, bestowing its own essence, life, and faculties to the body; so the Logos (λόγος) interpenetrates the flesh, and intimately communicates his divine nature to it. 2) That the communion of the natures is mutual, yet in such a way that the divine nature, as a pure actuality (ἐντελέχεια), permeates and perfects the assumed human nature, while the assumed flesh is permeated and perfected. 3) That the union and communion of the natures in Christ is personal and inseparable (ἀχώριστον). The rational soul so insinuates itself into the body that it could in no way be separated from it, unless, the fall having intervened accidentally, the violence of death had followed by divine judgment. The natural union of the soul and body of Christ was indeed dissolved in the three days of death; but the divine nature of the Logos (τῷ λόγῳ) was not dissolved from the assumed humanity, but was most present to it. 4) That the natural union and communion is unconfused, unmixed, and untransmutable (ἀσύγχυτον, ἄμικτον, καὶ ἀτρέπτον), i.e., it infers no confusion, mixture, or transmutation. The persons of the Trinity mutually permeate each other without confusion; the soul informs the body without any disturbance, mixture, or change of either; so the Logos (λόγος) permeates his flesh, so that nothing is lost from the essentials of either, neither is mixed with the other, or is confused with the other. 5) That the united natures of Christ are without distance (ἀδιαστάτους), or, are mutually present to each other. The persons of the Trinity so interpenetrate each other that none is either outside or beyond the other. Likewise, the rational soul is so in the body that it is nowhere outside or beyond it; so also the Logos (ὁ λόγος) is in the flesh, so that he is nowhere beyond, nowhere outside it. Conf. D. DANNH. hodos phanom VIII, p. 626 sqq.

Proof. The intimate communion of the two natures in Christ is proven 1) from John I, 14. "The Word was made flesh." Whoever, being the existing, immutable God from eternity, was made flesh, not by a conversion or change of his nature, but by its union with the flesh, there must be some communion between his divine nature and the united flesh; But the Son of God etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because every real, internal, and perfect union, as defined by SUIDAS, is a "communicative concourse of different things." The minor is evident; because the Logos (ὁ λόγος) is not only the name of a person, but also of the divine nature, while "flesh" is the name designating the human nature.

2. From Hebr. II, 14. "Since therefore the children have become partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." Here Paul teaches with set words that the Son of God was made a partaker of human nature, which is denoted by flesh and blood. Since however the Son of God made himself a partaker of human nature, this was certainly assumed into the communication of deity and beatitude, as EUSEBIUS says in book IV of his demonstratio evangelica, c. 13.

3. From Col. II, 9. "In him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily." In this brief saying the Apostle comprises three things: (1) the inhabitant, (2) the habitation, (3) the mode of habitation. The inhabitant is the whole fullness of the Godhead, by which is noted the most perfect divinity of the Son of God, and whatever is in it, or pertains to it, with all its properties. The habitation is Christ, considered according to his human nature; for this is inhabited, while the divine nature inhabits. The mode of inhabitation is expressed by the word bodily (σωματικῶς), which AUGUSTINE, in epistle 457 to Dardanus, thus explains: "Bodily, it is said, because in the body of Christ, as in a temple, dwells all the fullness of the deity; this indeed also dwells in holy men, but in a singular manner in the body of Christ, as in a personally assumed temple." Hence we argue; In whom, as in a personally assumed temple, the most perfect divinity of the Son of God dwells, there is some communion between him and the divinity of the Son of God; But in the human nature of Christ etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because just as the soul has communion with its body because it inhabits it; so there is a communion between the inhabiting divinity and the inhabited flesh of Christ.

4. If some communion (κοινωνία) flows from the mystical union of the faithful with Christ, much more does some communion (κοινωνία) arise from the personal union of the divine and human nature. The antecedent is true; Therefore the consequent also. The consequence of the major is evident; because the personal union is far closer and more intimate than the gracious union of believers with God. The antecedent is confirmed from the saying of Peter, who affirms that the faithful are "partakers of the divine nature" (κοινωνοὶ τῆς θείας φύσεως), 2 Petr. I, 4.

5. If the communion of the divine and human nature is denied, the communication of the divine subsistence cannot but be denied; because subsistence is a mode, which cannot be outside the nature which it modifies or affects.

6. If the communion of the two natures in Christ is denied, these propositions must be denied: "God is man"; and "man is God." The reason is; because neither can God be imagined without the divine nature, nor man without the human nature.

7. If the communion of natures in the person of Christ is denied, it must be denied that in the works of the office each nature acts with the communication of the other.

8. Samosatenus and Nestorius were condemned by pious antiquity, because they taught that the two natures of Christ are entirely incommunicable with each other. See Declar. Form. Concord. p. 610, seq.

The antithesis is of Bellarmine and others, who deny the communion of the two natures in Christ. BELLARMINE in book III on Christ, chap. VIII, argues:

I. The personal union was made by the communication of that which is proper to the son, not of that which is common to the other persons of the deity. But only subsistence is proper to the son, while the divine nature is common to the other persons; Therefore only subsistence was communicated. The major is established; because only the Son of God was made flesh. But if the divine nature had been communicated to the flesh, the whole Holy Trinity would have been incarnated, because the divine nature is common to all three divine persons. Resp. The divine nature is considered either absolutely, and thus is common to the three divine persons, or relatively, as it is marked by the hypostatic character of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου); in this manner of considering, we assert that it was communicated to the assumed flesh.

II. If the deity was communicated to the human nature, this will be the divine essence itself; The consequent is absurd; Therefore the antecedent also. The consequence of the major is evident, because the communication of natures begets a synonymical and essential predication, e.g., an animal communicates its nature to a man; Therefore man is an animal. Resp. I distinguish between a notional communication, or by participation (κατὰ μέθεξιν), and a real one, or by conjunction (κατὰ συνδύασιν). The former infers a synonymical predication, the latter a paronymical one, e.g., the soul is communicated to the body; Therefore the body is animated, not the soul itself. Thus the divine nature was communicated to the human nature. Therefore the human nature is a partaker of the divine nature, not the divine nature itself.

III. A real communion of natures infers their confusion or mixture. Resp. Not every communion of natures is commixtive, but only that which is accidental, not however that which is essential or personal. The soul communicates its whole self to the body, yet it is not mixed with it.

IV. If divinity was communicated to the flesh of Christ, all the divine attributes were also communicated to it; The latter is false; Therefore the former also. The consequence of the major is manifest; because the divine attributes and the essence of God are the same (ταυτόν). Resp. All the divine attributes were communicated to the flesh, as to possession; but as to denomination, a distinction must be made between the operative (ἐνεργητικά), or active attributes of God, and the quiescent (ἀνενεργητικά), or quiescent ones. The former were communicated as to immediate denomination, the latter as to mediate denomination. For from this I say; omnipotence, which is independent, infinite, and eternal, was communicated to the flesh of Christ.

V. BECANUS, GREGORIUS de VALENTIA, and other Jesuits (cited by D. CALOVIVS in his systema, tom. VII, p. 155) teach that only the subsistence of the Word was proximately, immediately, and formally communicated to humanity in itself, and through it humanity proximately, mediately, and formally subsists; and because that subsistence is in reality the same as the divine essence and attributes, therefore consequently and identically the divine essence and attributes were communicated to humanity. D. CALOVIVS responds; this distinction between immediate and mediate communication was only composed to entice and deceive the ignorant. For to be communicated mediately, consequently, and identically in the Jesuitical sense is to be not really communicated; which I show thus; The divine nature and idioms are either really communicated to the human nature according to the mind of the Jesuits (whether immediately or mediately, whether proximately or consequently, whether formally or identically; it matters little so far, provided the communication is true and real), or they are not really communicated. If they are really communicated, it must be granted that the human nature truly becomes a partaker of the divine nature, truly a partaker of the divine idioms, of omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence; and indeed no less truly a partaker of the divine nature and divine idioms than of the divine subsistence, although not equally primarily. But the Jesuits will never admit this. Therefore it is certain that they by no means believe in a real communication of the divine nature and its attributes. D. JOANN. ADAMUS OSIANDER agrees in his colleg. systemat part. IV, p. 61, saying: "The distinction between mediate and immediate communication is a mere illusion, because they acknowledge no participation of the divine nature in the human; but, if the human does not participate in the divine, accurately speaking it will not be united with the divine nature, it will not be the proper body or habitation of the inhabiting deity with all its fullness, not of the permeating and perfecting divine nature." A unifiable thing that admits of really distinct things is one thing, one that does not admit of them, but in which the highest identity reigns, is another. The former indeed admits the distinction of mediate and immediate union, but not the latter. Let us posit with some philosophers that the soul and its faculties really differ, because the soul is a spirit and a substance, while the intellect and will are faculties and accidents; but this has no place in the union of the Logos and the flesh, because the subsistence and nature of the Logos are indivisibly identified, so that the subsistence cannot be said to be communicated immediately, but the divine nature mediately, that is, by means of the subsistence itself, by the very fact that the divine nature is indivisibly and really one thing with its subsistence.

Question XXXII. What is the end of the personal union and communion of the two natures in Christ?

The end of the personal union and of the intimate communion of the two natures is the performance of the works of the office.

Proof. In the actions of the office, each nature of Christ does what is proper to it, with the communication of the other. But one result cannot flow from different principles, unless a communion of those principles is supposed, e.g., from a fiery sword proceeds a burning and keen cut; the cause of which is that the sword and the fire have a certain communion in the power of cutting and burning; so from the two natures of Christ proceeds the saving effusion of blood, the life-giving death, the victorious passion, the enriching poverty, because of the mutual perichoresis (περιχώρησιν), or the intimate communion (κοινωνίαν) of the two natures in Christ.

Question XXXIII. What follows from the personal union and communion?

From the personal union and communion of the two natures of Christ flow personal propositions, as well as the communication of idioms.

Proof. The mode of predicating follows the mode of being, and the communication of properties supposes a perfect and intimate union of the distinct natures and their mutual perichoresis (περιχώρησιν).

Question XXXIV. What are personal predications?

Personal propositions. Personal predications are those in which the concrete of one nature is predicated of the concrete of the other nature in a singular and unusual manner, to express the union of the two natures and their communion in the unity of the person.

This definition of personal propositions is proven by examples from scripture and the church. Scriptural examples are: "The branch of David is Jehovah our righteousness," Jer. XXIII, 5; XXXIII, 16. "The son of David is the lord of David," Matth. XXII, 42; Ps. CX, 1. "The Son of man is the son of the living God," Matth. XVI, 13, 16. "The son of Mary is the son of the most high," Luke I, 35. "The second man is the Lord from heaven," 1 Cor. XV, 47. Church examples are: "God is man, man is God"(*).

Obs. I. These propositions are called personal because they derive their origin

(*) There are three types of personal propositions. In the first and most evident are those in which the Concrete of one nature is predicated of the Concrete of another nature, of which kind are all those which the blessed Augustine brought forth. In the second are numbered those in which the Concrete of a person is predicated of the Concrete likewise of a person, for example: Jesus is Christ, 1 John V, 1. Jesus is Emmanuel, that is, θεάνθρωπος (theanthropos / God-man). In the third are those in which the Concrete of a person is predicated of the Concrete of either nature, in this manner: Our Mediator is man, 1 Tim II, 5. Christ is God, superior to all things, Rom. IX, 5. If you wish to add a fourth type, I would certainly not prevent it, although it can conveniently be referred to the third, namely when of the Concrete of both, both of either nature and of the person, the Concrete of another nature is predicated, as: The Son of God, Jesus Christ, is true God, 1 John V, 20. Generally I demonstrate the matter thus: Every proposition which pertains to Christ is either personal or idiomatic. A third, which might exist, cannot be conceived by the mind. Therefore that proposition which is not idiomatic cannot but be personal. Idiomatic is always that reasoning which expresses the properties of Christ. Personal is that which signifies his very υπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence). But in all the types which I have mentioned, what is predicated, as it is called, is not some property, but is the very υπόστασις (hypostasis / subsistence) itself. Therefore from whichever of these types a proposition is made, it is not idiomatic; Therefore it must be personal.

from the personal union, express the mystery of the personal union, and their force, truth, and connection are to be judged from the personal union.

Obs. II. The "concrete of the nature" is a word by which is signified the nature with the connotation of a hypostasis (ὑποστάσεως), or subsistence; or it is a word that signifies by way of a supposit, as when I say: God, man, Son of God, son of man; for upon hearing these words we immediately conceive in our mind a person, or supposit, which is and is called God, man, son of man, Son of God. The "concrete of the person" is a word that formally signifies the whole person, consisting of both natures, as, Christ Jesus. The "abstract of the nature" is a word that denotes either nature by itself, without connoting a hypostasis, as, humanity, deity, human nature, divine nature. It is called abstract because it signifies by way of a form, not by way of a supposit (**).

Obs. III. The foundation of this predication: "God is man," consists in the personal union and the communion of natures. If they are considered outside the personal union, the divine and human nature, or God and man, are disparate, nor can one be affirmed of the other. For just as I cannot say: "A lion is a horse"; so I cannot say: "God is man." But if a union occurs between God and man, and indeed a real union, such as occurs in Christ between the divine and human nature, they can rightly be predicated of each other in the concrete. The reason is that by the union the two natures constitute one person, and any concrete of the nature signifies that very person. Since therefore the man Christ is that same one who is God, or this person who is God is that very person who is man, it is also rightly said: "man is God," and "God is man." But the abstracts of the nature, which do not connote a hypostasis, or formally do not signify a person, but the nature by itself, cannot be predicated of each other (*). I will illustrate the matter with an example founded in an accidental union. Theology and philosophy are accidents; which in the abstract cannot be predicated of each other. But if theology and philosophy are joined in one person, a theologian is rightly called a philosopher. Thus divinity and humanity are not predicated of each other in the abstract; but since both are united in the person of Christ, it is rightly said: "God is man," and "man is God."

Obs. IV. Personal propositions must be resolved in such a way that the unity of the person and the union of the two natures are expressed by them. The genuine sense, therefore, of these propositions: "God is man," and "man is God," is expressed by a most simple analysis thus: The Son of God is personally the same as he who is the son of man, and the son of man is personally the same as he who is the Son of God. Conf. D. CALOVII systema tom. VII, p. 149. D. GERHARDUS in his exegesis of loc. IV, §. 168, explains them by a periphrasis: "The Son of God assumed human nature into his hypostasis, and the human nature was raised into the very hypostasis of the Son of God." B. CHEMNITIUS explains this proposition: "God is man," thus: "the whole fullness of the deity of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου) dwells personally in the assumed flesh." But this proposition: "man is God," he explains thus: "The human nature of Christ does not subsist in itself, but has the Logos (τὸν λόγον) for its hypostasis, and has the divine nature personally united to itself."

Question XXXV. Are personal propositions merely verbal, improper, identical, or to be judged from other usual propositions?

Personal propositions are not merely verbal a); nor improper or tropical b), nor

(**) But the Abstract of a person is called by the custom of some such a name which denotes either nature, but simultaneously with the very subject being indicated, which subsists in the divine nature, when it is said: God, or man; Son of God, or son of man. And so the Abstract of a person is entirely the same as the Concrete of nature.

(*) Namely, it is not right to speak thus: "divinity is humanity"; nor vice versa. For 1) no confusion or change of the natures ever took place, as the Eutychians imagined; 2) nor did the divine nature of the entire Holy Trinity assume the human, but only the second person of the divinity; 3) nor was the entire human nature received into the divine hypostasis (ὑπόστασιν), but one man, the surety of all, a partaker of human nature. Therefore the Reformed do us the highest injury when they attribute this absurd opinion to us, not only the old ones, but also the more recent, among them not to be held in the lowest place, JOHANNES MARCKIUS, in his compendium theol. Christ. chap. XXI, § 433.

Proof a. If the personal propositions, "God is man," and "man is God," were only verbal, the son of the virgin Mary would be called the son of the most high by title only, which is Nestorian. For NESTORIUS denied that the virgin Mary truly gave birth to God.

Proof b. When we say: "Man is God," the subject no less than the predicate retains its proper signification. For by "man" is understood an intelligent animal, by "God" an independent spirit. If personal propositions were improper, the son of the virgin Mary would be not God, just as a painted man is not a man.

Proof c. Personal predications are not identical, because in them the same is not predicated of the same, but the concrete of one nature is predicated of the concrete of the other nature with the connotation of a hypostasis; and just as the personal union is not between the same things, but between most distinct things; so the predication flowing from the personal union is not identical.

Proof d. Personal propositions are real; because they have a true and real foundation, which is the personal union and communion of the two natures in Christ. Yet they are not to be judged from other common propositions; because they are most singular and, in the philosophical circle and gentile logic, unusual. A philosopher from the light of nature does not know that one substantial disparate thing can be predicated of another disparate thing in the nominative case. The predications used in philosophy are distinguished into Synonymical and paronymical. Personal predications are not synonymical, because in them 1) the predicate is not of the essence of the subject, much less the essence of the subject itself; 2) their foundation is not an essential union. For neither is man a part of the divine essence, nor is God a part of the human essence. Man is not God by essence, but by the grace of union, nor is God essentially a rational animal. Personal predications are also not paronymical; because a proper and a predicable accident are predicated paronymically. But neither is human nature a property of divinity, nor is divinity an idiom of humanity, nor is man a predicable accident, in relation to the Logos (τὸν λόγον). For an accident is predicated of its subject because of its accidental connection with it; but the foundation of a personal proposition is not an accidental union, but a hypostatic union.

You say: I. That predication whose predicate does not enter into the essence of the subject is paronymical. But of this predication: "God is man," the predicate does not enter into the essence of the subject. Therefore. Resp. A predication is called paronymical either in a general or a special sense. In a special sense, a predication is called paronymical in which either a property or a predicable accident is predicated of its subject, for an accidental union. But in a general sense, a predication is called paronymical whose predicate is not of the essence of the subject; in which general sense a paronymical is that which is attributed to something truly, but not preceded by an essential union, and is divided into predicamental, transcendental, and mystical. See GUTH's logic, p. 115. We do not deny that a personal predication can be called paronymical in that general sense.

You say: II. Personal predications are not unusual, because they frequently occur in S. scripture, are also found in the books of logicians, and many examples are given where two disparate things are predicated of each other in the nominative case, e.g., "A doctor is a consul," "a tailor is a senator," etc. Resp. Personal predications are called unusual not with respect to S. scripture and theology, but with respect to Aristotelian logic and gentile philosophy, constructed from the induction of natural examples. Christian logicians and philosophers have derived personal propositions from S. scripture or theology. The examples adduced present propositions in which two accidental disparate things are predicated of each other. But when I say: "God is man," a substantial disparate is predicated of a substantial disparate in its proper signification and in the nominative case; of which a similar example is not given in the entire universe of things. For it is "confessedly a great mystery: God was manifest in the flesh." 1 Tim. III, 16.

Question XXXVI. Is the proposition: Christ, according to his human nature, is the natural Son of God, true?

The proposition: "Christ, according to his human nature, is the natural Son of God," is true, in a specificative sense a); false in a reduplicative, or causal sense b).

Obs. I. Limiting particles are sometimes taken causally (αἰτιολογικῶς), or reduplicatively, and signify that that to which they are added is the cause for which the predicate belongs to the subject, e.g., "Man, inasmuch as he is a sinner, is mortal," i.e., Sin is the cause for which man is mortal. Sometimes they are taken definitively (ὀριστικῶς), or specificatively, and designate the nature, part, or condition, according to which the predicate agrees with the subject, e.g., "Christ, inasmuch as he is a man, died," i.e., Christ according to his human nature died. These things being presupposed, we say that Christ, as man, or according to his human nature, is the natural Son of God, not in a reduplicative or causal sense, but in a specificative or subjective one, so that the sense is: Christ, according to his human nature, or Christ the man, is the same supposit, the same person, who is the natural Son of God.

Obs. II. The subject, of which some idiom or axiom is predicated, is either a first subject (δεκτικὸν πρῶτον), to which the predicate belongs per se, immediately and formally, e.g., "Fire is hot"; or it is a second subject (δεκτικὸν δεύτερον), to which the predicate agrees on account of another united to it, and thus mediately and communicatively, or participatively, e.g., "Iron, united to fire, is hot," on account of the fire, and thus mediately and participatively. Thus Christ the man is called the natural Son of God, not per se, immediately and formally, but by the grace of the personal union, and thus mediately and communicatively. Theologians intended to indicate this very thing when they asserted that Christ, as man, can be called the natural Son of God, not naturally, but personally.

Obs. III. "Natural son" is here opposed to "adopted son," and thus the sense is, Christ the man is not the adopted Son of God, but the natural one, not by eternal generation, but by personal union.

Proof a. 1) Christ the man is the proper Son of God, whom God the Father did not spare, but delivered to death, Rom. VIII, 32. Therefore Christ the man is the natural Son of God. The reason for the consequence is: because "proper Son of God" never denotes an adopted son, but a natural one.

2. "That holy thing born of Mary" (Τὸ γεννώμενον ἐκ Μαρίας ἁγίου) is the son of the most high, Luke I, 35. Therefore the son of the B. virgin Mary is the natural Son of God.

3. The hypostasis of Christ the man is the divine one, of the natural Son of God himself; Therefore Christ the man is the natural Son of God. The reason for the consequence is: because here it is not a question of humanity in the abstract, but in the concrete, inasmuch as it subsists in the divine hypostasis.

4. The divine nature was communicated to Christ the man; Therefore Christ the man is the natural Son of God.

5. Christ, as man, is not a person extraneous to God; Therefore Christ, as man, is not the adopted Son of God. For adoption is of an extraneous person.

6. The Logos (ὁ λόγος) assumed the flesh into his hypostasis, that he might be the proper son of God in two natures, just as before he was the proper son in one nature. But if on account of the assumption he were to be called adopted, then he would be the adopted son of himself, because only the son assumed humanity.

Proof b. The cause for which Christ as man is the natural Son of God is not the human nature, but the personal union.

The antithesis was formerly of Felix of Urgell and Elipandus of Toledo, Bishops, who taught that Christ according to his humanity is the adopted Son of God. For which cause the council of Frankfurt on the Main was convened in the 8th Century, A.D. 794 by Charlemagne, in which it was concluded and defined against Felix and Elipandus that Christ even according to his human nature is the Son of God. To these are added the Socinians and Arminians, who state that Christ the man is the adopted Son of God. Their main arguments are:

I. Whoever is the natural Son of God, was begotten from eternity; Christ the man was not begotten from eternity; Therefore. Resp. Whoever per se and naturally is the natural Son of God, was begotten from eternity; I grant. But Christ the man is the Son of God not per se and naturally, but personally, on account of the communicated hypostasis and divine nature.

II. According to which nature Christ was not begotten of the substance of God the Father, nor is similar to God the Father, according to that nature he is not the natural Son of God; But according to the human nature etc; Therefore. Resp. There is a third option, and so the major premise, lest it should suffer from a defect of parts, must be formed thus: According to which nature Christ was neither begotten of the substance of God the Father, nor is similar to God the Father, nor was assumed into the glory of eternal sonship by a hypostatic union, according to that nature he is not the natural Son of God; But according to the human nature etc. Thus the minor is false.

III. If Christ according to his human nature is to be called the natural Son of God, either the human nature is the cause of this denomination, or it is the immediate subject to which eternal sonship per se and formally belongs; But neither is consistent with the truth; Therefore. Resp. There is a third option. The human nature is not the cause of eternal sonship, nor its primary subject; yet it is the secondary subject, to which eternal sonship belongs not per se and essentially, but communicatively and by the grace of the personal union.

Instance I. In restrictive propositions, the limiting particle specifies the primary subject, to which the predicate per se and immediately belongs, e.g., "Man lives according to the soul," because the soul is the primary subject of life. Resp. This is not perpetual. For I also rightly say: "Man lives according to the body," because life was communicated to it from the soul. Thus Christ according to his human nature is the natural Son of God, because it was assumed into the communion of the highest sonship.

Instance II. This limiting proposition: "Christ according to his human nature is the natural Son of God," must be resolved thus: "The human nature of Christ is the natural Son of God," which is false. For the natural Son of God is a person; the human nature of Christ is not a person, but personated. Resp. The human nature of Christ here is not taken in the abstract, but in the concrete, as it constitutes one composite (σύνθετον) person with the divine nature, so that the sense is: Christ the man is not essentially, but personally the natural Son of God.

IV. Christ according to his human nature is subject to God, and his servant; Therefore Christ according to his human nature is not the natural Son of God. Resp. The humanity of Christ is considered in three ways: a) by reason of its natural condition; b) by reason of its spontaneous self-emptying; c) by reason of the personal union. The human nature of Christ in itself is a creature subject to God, and by spontaneous self-emptying assumed the form of a servant, which he laid aside in the state of exaltation; but by the personal union it constitutes one person with the divine nature of the Logos (τοῦ λόγου), and thus was assumed into the communion of the highest sonship.

Question XXXVII. Is the holy virgin Mary to be called θεοτόκος, or God-bearer?

The Christian church rightly calls the holy virgin Mary θεοτόκον, or God-bearer.

Proof. 1) That which is born of Mary is the son of the most high, as the angel teaches, Luke I, v. 35. 2) Paul in Gal. IV, 4 says: "When the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his son, made of a woman." From which sayings of scripture we argue; That virgin, from whom God was born, is the God-bearer (θεοτόκος). But the B. Mary is that virgin etc. Therefore. The minor is clear; because the son of the most high is true God.

Obs. The proposition: "Mary is θεοτόκος," or God-bearer, can be understood in two ways. 1) Formally and reduplicatively, in this manner: "Mary is θεοτόκος," i.e., she gave birth to God, as God, or according to the deity; and thus the proposition is false. For Christ according to the deity was not born in time from the virgin Mary, but was begotten of the substance of the Father from eternity. 2) Materially and specificatively, in this manner: "Mary is θεοτόκος"; because she gave birth to God, or to him who is true and eternal God; and in this sense that proposition was understood by pious antiquity, and was defended against NESTORIUS, in which sense we also understand it. For the person of Christ is one, one supposit, which is God and man. Wherefore we not only rightly say that Mary gave birth to a man specifically of the same substance (ομοῦσιον) as us, but also to have given birth to God Himself; since that one and the same who was born of the virgin Mary is God and man.

Question XXXVII. What is the communication of idioms?

On the Communication of Idioms. The communication of idioms is the true and real participation of the properties of the divine and human natures in Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου), who is denominated from either or both natures, resulting from the personal union.

Obs. I. The personal union and the communication of idioms differ as antecedent and consequent, not in order of time, but of nature.

Obs. II. Idioma in Latin is called a property. Now, some idioms are so called ἀπλῶς, or simply, others κατὰ τι, according to something, and are such respectively. Idioms simply and strictly so called are those which necessarily flow from the essence, affect it, denominate it, and distinguish it a posteriori from another thing. Idioms of this kind for a man are: being capable of laughter, of admiration, endowed with the faculty of speech, capable of disciplines. Idioms κατὰ τι, or respectively such, are those which distinguish one thing from another in some way, although they may be ἐνέργηματα καὶ ἀποτελέσματα (operations and results), works of office, or even common accidents, for example, to be born, to die, to shed blood, etc., which are called properties of the human nature, according to something, and respectively, insofar as they belong to the human nature outside of its first concept, and distinguish it to some extent from the divine nature.

Obs. III. This phrase, "communication of idioms," is not found αὐτολεξεῖ (in the exact words) in the sacred letters; yet the thing itself has the clearest foundations in the scriptures. For as often as scripture assigns actions and works of divine omnipotence to the flesh of Christ, so often, by consequence, omnipotence itself is attributed to it, as the first act, from which the divine ἐνέργεια (operation), as the second act, flows. What's more? The epistle to the Hebrews clearly shows us the use of this phrase, when it uses these two Greek words, and very emphatic ones at that, κοινοῶνῃκε (he has shared) and μετέσχε (he partook), he communicated and he participated, and indeed in this very matter of the personal union of the two natures in Christ, ch. 2:14. Although, however, it was first called the communication of idioms by the Scholastics, orthodox antiquity in the contests with NESTORIUS and EUTYCHES used equivalent formulas of speaking, which you may see in D. HUTTER's Formula of Concord, article VIII, "on the person of Christ," p. 759.

Question XXXVIII. What kind of communication of idioms is this?

The communication of idioms is not merely verbal and titular a), nor intellectual b); but real, between two substances really distinct, but not separated; and therefore it is not equalizing c), nor multiplicative d), nor transfusive e); but συνδυαστική (combinative), between two substances perfectly and intimately united; yet neither accidental, nor commixtive f), nor essential or natural g); but personal and supernatural h).

a. It is proven. The communication of idioms is not a title without a thing. For Christ as man is truly omnipotent, not just in title, just as quacks and mountebanks are not rarely called doctors, who are anything but such.

b. It is proven. Intellectual communication occurs between subjects that are distinct not really, but only in reason. Thus an animal is said to communicate its idioms to man κατὰ μέθεξιν (by intellectual communication). But the personal communication of idioms is between the two natures of Christ, which are really distinct.

c. It is proven. The communication of idioms implies an equalization neither of the united natures nor of the idioms; because such an equalization conflicts with the real difference between the divine and human nature, and the idioms flowing from each nature.

d. It is proven. The communication of idioms is not multiplicative, of the kind that occurs when a generating man κατ' ἁλλοποίησιν (by alteration) communicates his soul to his son. For multiplicative communication is between two separate substances; but the communication of idioms is between two united substances.

e. It is proven. The communication of idioms is not transfusive. For we believe, teach, and confess that there is not such an effusion of the majesty of God and all its properties into the human nature of Christ that the divine nature loses anything; or that it so bestows something of its own on another that for this reason it does not retain it in itself; or that the human nature in its substance and essence has received an equal majesty, by which it is separated and divided from the nature and essence of the divine nature; as when wine, water, or oil is transfused from one vessel into another. For neither the human nature in Christ, nor any other creature in heaven or on earth, is capable of divine omnipotence in such a way as to become by itself an omnipotent essence and nature, or to have omnipotent properties in and through itself. For by this reasoning, the human nature in Christ would be denied and completely transmuted into the divinity, says the F. C. p. 780.

f. It is proven. The communication of idioms is not commixtive; because neither the two natures of Christ, nor the idioms of each nature, can be mixed. We believe, teach, and confess that the divine and human natures are not mixed into one substance, nor is one changed into the other; but each nature retains its essential properties, so that the properties of one nature cannot become the properties of the other, says the Formula of Concord, p. 606.

g. It is proven. The communication of idioms is not essential, in the way that God the Father from eternity communicated his essence and all divine properties to his co-eternal Son; whence he is both of one essence with the Father and equal to him. But in the person of Christ, each nature retains its own properties, within its distinct nature and essence; so that the human nature always is and remains inferior to the divinity. Nor is it essential or natural in the way that the soul communicates its properties to the body; because the foundation of this communication is an essential union, by which two incomplete natures concur to constitute one complete nature; But the two natures of Christ, being complete in their being, are united to constitute one composite (σύνθετον) person.

h. It is proven. Therefore, the communication of idioms, of which we are now speaking, is real, συνδυαστική (combinative), i.e., between united natures, and that personal, arising from the hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ.

The communication of idioms is proven to be real; 1) No perfect and perichoristic union can exist without a communication of idioms, as examples of an animated body show. We readily grant that a parastatic union of two planks can occur without a communication of idioms, because that degree of union is the lowest and imperfect. But, as scripture defines it, the personal union of the two natures in Christ is most absolute, most perfect, and perichoristic; Therefore, it cannot be without a communication of idioms. Furthermore, we conclude: As the union is, so is the communication of idioms. But the union of the two natures in Christ is real; Therefore, the communication of idioms flowing from it is real.

2. As truly as the humanity of Christ has the hypostasis of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) communicated to it, so truly also does it have the divine idioms communicated to it; But the humanity really has the hypostasis of the Word communicated to it. Therefore, it also really has the divine idioms communicated to it. The major is proven; 1) because the divine idioms, in point of fact, are the same as the divine hypostasis. But whatever things are really the same, when one of them is communicated, the other is also communicated. 2) If the hypostasis is communicated, much more will the idioms be communicated. For these are common to the three divine persons; but the hypostasis is proper to the Word (λόγῳ) alone.

3. In whatever body, as a personally assumed temple, the whole fullness of the divinity dwells, to that body the divine idioms are truly and really communicated; But in the body of Christ, etc. Colossians 2:9. Therefore.

4. Whoever, like children, is a partaker of human flesh and blood, he becomes a partaker of human idioms; But the Son of God, etc. Hebrews 2:14. Therefore. The major is established; because human flesh and blood denotes human nature, which is never destitute of its properties.

5. The communication of idioms is necessary for performing the works of office, in which each nature of Christ does what is proper to it, with the communication of the other.

The antithesis was formerly that of Samosatenus, Sabellius, Nestorius, Eutyches, who either introduced a confusion of natures or denied the communication of natures and idioms, whom the Pontificians today follow in many things. See BELLARMINE, book III, On Christ, ch. 9. Their arguments are:

I. Of those things whose essence and definition are not common, their properties are not communicable; But the essence and definition of the divine and human natures of Christ are not common; Therefore. The major is clear; because communicable predicates pertain to the definition of the thing, e.g., "animal" communicates its nature to man, and pertains to the definition of man. Resp. I distinguish between intellectual communication, which is the effect of a union κατὰ μέθεξιν (by participation), and is between a subject and predicate that are really the same and distinct only in reason; and between real communication, which is the consequent of a union κατὰ συνδύασιν (by combination). The argument is valid concerning the former, not the latter communication.

II. Whatever is communicated to another emigrates from its own subject; But the properties of the divine and human natures of Christ do not emigrate from their own subject; Therefore. Resp. By way of limitation; Whatever is communicated to another through transfusion; But the communication of idioms in Christ is by no means done through transfusion, but through a perichoristic union.

III. Whatever is communicated becomes common; But the properties of the divine and human natures are not common. Therefore. The major is evident; because "proper" and "common" are diametrically opposed to each other. The minor is established; because each nature of Christ retains its own properties, so that they cannot become the properties of the other. Resp. 1) Whatever is communicated to another becomes communicable, not common, strictly speaking. 2) Something is called common in two ways: a) In a stricter sense, that is called common which belongs to several equally and in the same way; in this special signification, it is opposed to "proper." b) In a broader sense, that is called common which belongs to several in any way whatever and even in a different manner, to one primarily, immediately, and through itself, to the other secondarily, mediately, and through another. In this broader sense, the properties, on account of the perichoristic union, indeed become common, and yet they remain the properties of that nature to which they primarily and through themselves belong.

IV. Whatever things remain distinct in the union itself, their properties are not communicated; The two natures of Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because distinction and communication seem to conflict with each other. Resp. Distraction conflicts with communication, not distinction. In a glowing sword, the natures are distinct, yet the power of burning is communicated to the iron, and the power of cutting to the fire.

V. If the properties of the divine nature were communicated to the human nature, they would be in two subjects; The consequent is false, because one property cannot be in two subjects; Therefore, the antecedent is also false. Resp. One property cannot be in two primary and immediate subjects; yet it can be in two subjects united by περιχώρησις (perichoresis), of which one is primary and immediate, the other secondary and mediate.

VI. If the properties of the divine nature were communicated to the assumed human nature, they would inhere in it; But they do not inhere in the human nature, because they are not accidents, whose nature it is to inhere; Therefore, they are not communicated to the human nature. Resp. The mode of inherence is various. The divine idioms do not inhere in the human nature by subjective inherence, like accidents, but by intimate union and inhabitation.

VII. Whatever dogma introduces an equalization of the divine and human natures, that must be rejected; The dogma of the communication of idioms, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because, according to the doctrine of the communication of idioms, the human nature of Christ is equally omnipotent, omniscient, etc., as his divine nature. Resp. I deny the minor. For although the same omnipotence belongs to the divine and human natures of Christ, the mode of having it is nevertheless far different. For the divine nature is omnipotent formally, immediately, and through itself; the human nature of Christ is omnipotent communicatively, mediately, and through the grace of the personal union.

Question XXXIX. How many genera of the communication of idioms are there?

There are three genera of the communication of idioms.

It is proven. For there are three general classes to which all the sayings of scripture that deal with the communication of idioms can be conveniently referred. For either the properties of each nature are predicated of the whole person of Christ, denominated from one or both natures, whence is the first genus; or the divine perfections are conferred upon the human nature of Christ, whence is the second genus; or the works of office according to both natures, whence results the third genus. The first genus is called ἰδιοποιία (idiopoiia, communication of properties); The second, μεταποιία (metapoiia, communication of majesty); The third, κοινοποιία (koinopoiia, communication of results), or of the operations of office.

Obf. The order of placing the genera, or classes, of the communication of idioms is inverted by some Theologians; for they distinguish between the order of doctrine and of nature, and on account of the greater difficulty and prolixity, they postpone the μεταποιία (metapoiia) to the κοινοποιία (koinopoiia). But since order should be adapted to things, not things to order, we, saving the judgment of others, think that we should first treat of the communicated excellences (ἀνυψήμασι) of the human nature of Christ, before the results (ἀποτελέσματος); because the communication of office necessarily presupposes, as a cause prior to its effect, the communication of majesty made to the assumed flesh.

Question XL. What is the first genus of the communication of idioms?

The first genus of the communication of idioms is when the properties of the divine or human nature are truly and really attributed to the whole person of Christ, denominated from either or both natures.

Obf. This first genus is called by DAMASCENE, book III of On the Orthodox Faith, ch. 4, ἀντίδοσις (antidosis), alternation, τρόπος ἀντιδόσεως (tropos antidoseos), the mode of alternation, because divine and human things can be predicated alternately of the composite (συνθέτω) person of Christ, e.g., Christ is begotten of the Father from eternity; Christ was born in time of the virgin Mary. By THEODORET it is called ἐναλλαγή καὶ κοινωνία ὀνομάτων (enallagē kai koinōnia onomatōn), a permutation and communication of names, not merely verbal, but real, because names are of things. By CYRIL it is named ἰδιοποιία καὶ ἰδιοποιήσις (idiopoiia kai idiopoiēsis), appropriation, because that which is proper to one nature, the whole person, who is God and man, claims for himself and makes his own. It is also called by DAMASCENE ἀλλοίωσις (alloiōsis), by which both divine and human idioms are really predicated of one and the same composite (συνθέτω) person, yet κατ' ἄλλο καὶ ἄλλο (according to one and another); because the distinctive particles show according to which nature each idiom is predicated of the person. But one must accurately distinguish between a determinative and distinctive ἀλλοίωσις, and between a segregative and exclusive ἀλλοίωσις, e.g., God suffered κατ' ἄλλο (according to another), i.e., God truly and really suffered according to the assumed humanity, there the particle κατ' ἄλλο determines the human nature, to which the suffering formally belongs, and distinguishes it from the divine nature, but does not segregate it, to which, of course, the suffering is appropriated. But if you expound it thus: God suffered κατ' ἄλλο, i.e., only the human nature suffered, the particle κατ' ἄλλο is separative, not distinctive, because by that exposition God is excluded from the communication of suffering. Compare GERHARD, exeg. book IV, § 188. (*)

Question XLI. What is the foundation of the first genus of the communication of idioms?

The foundation of the first genus of the communication of idioms is both the unity of the person of the God-man (θεανθρώπου), and the true and real difference of the divine and human natures.

It is proven. Since in Christ there are two distinct natures, which are neither changed nor confounded in their essences and properties, but of both natures there is only one person; those things which are the properties of only one nature are attributed not to the other nature separately, as if separate, but to the whole person (who is at once God and man), whether he is named God or man, says the Formula of Concord, p. 770.

Question XLII. How many species of the first genus of the communication of idioms are there?

There are three species of the first genus of the communication of idioms. The first species is ἰδιοποίησις (idiopoiēsis), or οἰκειώσις (oikeiōsis), appropriation, when human idioms are enunciated of the concrete of the divine nature a). The second species is κοινωνία τῶν θείων (koinōnia ton theion), communication of divine idioms, when divine idioms are enunciated of the person of the incarnate Word, denominated from the human nature, on account of the personal union b). The third species is ἀντίδοσις

(*) Therefore, this ἀλλοίωσις (alloiōsis) is separated by the longest interval from that which is called the Zwinglian ἀλλοίωσις, about which the Formula of Concord, Declaration, art. VIII, admonishes us to be wary. Those who wrote by divine instinct and inspiration, expressly ascribe the properties of either the divine or the human nature not to one or the other nature, but to the whole person of Christ. And they indeed express this in such a way that they use the same manner of speaking, as when we say: according to the divine, according to the human nature. For they use particles which have the force of distinguishing, not of separating, namely, ἐν (in), and κατὰ (according to), e.g., Christ, and therefore the whole person, derives his origin from the Fathers, κατὰ σάρκα (according to the flesh), Romans 9:5; Christ bore our sins, ἐν τῷ σώματι αὐτοῦ (in his body), 1 Peter 2:24.

(antidosis), or συναμφοτερισμός (synamphoterismos), alternation or reciprocation, by which both divine and human idioms are predicated of the concrete of the person, or of Christ, denominated from both natures c).

a. It is proven. To the first species belong the following idiomatic predications: "The Author of life was killed," Acts 3:15. "God obtained the church with his own blood," Acts 20:28. "The Lord of glory was crucified," 1 Corinthians 2:8. "The Son of God loved me and gave himself for me," Galatians 2:20. "God was anointed with the Holy Spirit," Psalm 45:8.

b. It is proven. To the second species belong the following idiomatic propositions: "The Son of Man will ascend to where he was before," John 6:62. He who was "born in the fullness of time, is, before Abraham was," John 8:58. "The second man is the Lord from heaven," 1 Corinthians 15:47.

c. It is proven. To the third species pertain these idiomatic propositions: "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today," i.e., from eternity, Hebrews 13:8. "Christ is from the fathers according to the flesh," Romans 9:5. "Christ was crucified in weakness," 2 Corinthians 13:4. "Christ was put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit," 1 Peter 3:18.

Obf. The idiomatic predications of the first and second species differ from the predications pertaining to the third species. For the idiomatic predications, in which a human idiom is enunciated of the concrete of the divine nature, and conversely, a divine idiom is enunciated denominatively of the concrete of the human nature, are so constituted that the predicate belongs to the subject not formally, or according to something that is signified in its formal concept, but κατ' ἄλλο (according to another), or by reason of the other nature which is personally united to it, e.g., when I say: "The Son of God suffered," the predicate does not belong to the subject formally, or according to something that is signified in its formal concept, but κατ' ἄλλο, or according to another, namely according to the human nature, which is personally united to the Son of God. But when the concrete of the person is placed as the subject, of which a divine or human idiom is predicated, then the predicate belongs to the subject formally, and not κατ' ἄλλο, e.g., when I say: "Christ suffered"; this predicate belongs to Christ formally, according to the human nature.

Again, when I say: "Christ is from eternity," this predicate also belongs to Christ formally, by reason of the divine nature; for since Christ is the concrete of the person, both natures, the divine and the human, are of the formal reason of Christ. Whence HUTTERUS, loci communes, fol. 155, says: since the propositions ("Christ was tempted by the Jews," 1 Corinthians 10:9; "he is of the seed of David," Matthew 22:42) do not enunciate the idioms of one nature about the other nature by some communication, either in the concrete or in the abstract, but predicate of the whole person that which with respect to one nature is attributed to the whole person; therefore in these propositions, properly speaking, there does not seem to be a communication of idioms. Wherefore, in order that a communication may have a place, it is necessary that in place of Christ such a word be put which has respect to that nature whose idiom is not that which is enunciated by the predicate. Cf. D. MUSAEUS in prælect. in Form. Concord. p. 289. D. BAIERUS in Comp. p. 519, warns that nevertheless in the already recounted propositions, the communication of idioms is involved, on account of the subject being denominated from both natures, and the communicated ὑπόστασις (hypostasis). For unless that were communicated, the subject could neither be denominated from both natures, nor could the divine predicate be attributed to the whole person denominated from the divine and human nature. Indeed, if you consider more deeply the relationship of the predicate to both natures comprehended in the subject and its signification, it will appear that the predicate is formal only by reason of one of the natures comprehended in the subject, not by reason of the other. Whence also in those propositions the use of discrete particles has a place, e.g., "Christ was born of the fathers according to the flesh," Romans 9:5. Therefore, a distinction must be made between idiomatic propositions, in which the communication of idioms strictly speaking and expressly has a place; and between propositions in which the communication of idioms is in some way involved. This proposition: "God suffered," is most strictly speaking idiomatic, which NESTORIUS does not admit; but this proposition: "Christ suffered," is said to be idiomatic in a broader sense, and is approved by NESTORIUS.

Question XLIII. What must be observed concerning the idiomatic propositions of the first genus of the communication of idioms?

Concerning the predication pertaining to the first genus of the communication of idioms, one must observe: a) the subject, which is not the abstract, but the concrete of the nature or person; b) the predicate, which designates not the divine or human substance itself, but an idiom of one of the natures; c) The mode of predicating is real and proper, by which divine or human idioms are enunciated of the whole person of the God-man (θεανθρώπου), in such a way, however, that through discrete particles they are vindicated for the nature to which they formally belong, but are appropriated to the other nature, to which they belong not formally, but on account of the personal union.

a. It is proven. The subject of idiomatic propositions is not the abstract of the nature. For 1) Holy scripture does not use abstractive phrases, but concrete ones. We do not read in the sacred code that the "deity" was crucified, but that the "Lord of glory" was crucified, 1 Corinthians 2:8. That the "Author of life" was killed, Acts 3:15. That the "Son of God" was delivered to death, Romans 8:32. 2) The deity is ἀπαθής, ἄτρεπτος, καὶ ἀναλλοίωτος (impassible, unchangeable, and inalterable), devoid of passion, conversion, and mutation. 3) Actions and passions belong to supposita. Whence the Apostle Peter does not say: "The divinity suffered in the flesh"; but: "God suffered in the flesh," 1 Peter 4:1.

You say: I. God suffered; The deity is God; Therefore, the deity suffered. Resp. The major is not universal in the first figure, since one cannot say: "Everything that is God has suffered." Furthermore, "God" in the major is taken relatively and personally, in the minor absolutely and essentially.

You say: II. Christ suffered; Christ is both natures; Therefore, both natures suffered. Resp. Christ suffered, as the concrete of the person. Hence the minor is denied; because both natures by themselves are not the concrete of the person, but each nature is an abstract. Whence arise four terms; for although both natures do not differ really from Christ, they nevertheless differ formally.

You say: III. The divinity was incarnated; Therefore, it suffered. Resp. Incarnation is one thing, suffering is another. The former belongs to the Word before incarnation (λόγου ἀσάρκου), because it denotes the act of union; the latter belongs to the incarnate Word (λόγου ἐνσάρκου), and belongs to him in the state of union. The former implies no mutation and imperfection, the latter implies mutation and emptying through itself. Wherefore, just as it does not follow: The divinity was incarnated; Therefore, it was assumed. So it does not follow: Therefore, it suffered (*).

You say: IV. That the divinity suffered in the flesh is asserted by the fathers and doctors of the primitive church. From CYRIL's On the Incarnation of the Only-Begotten, chapter 28, the statement is: "The divinity suffered impassibly." From VIRGILIUS, book II, chapter 3, Against Eutyches: "The divinity was fixed with nails, but it could not be penetrated, like the flesh." From AUGUSTINE in his Meditations, chapter 6: "The deity, which put on my flesh, ascended the gibbet of the cross, and in the assumed flesh bore a sad punishment." It is also certain that some Theologians from our own ranks have used abstractive locutions, namely BRENTIUS, JACOBUS ANDRAE, SELNECCER, and in our own time, the most learned Theologian, IOANNES ADAMUS OSIANDER in his colleg. theolog. systemat. part IV, p. 84. Resp. The phrase used by the fathers and theologians, "The divinity suffered in the flesh," can be excused; because the foundation of this proposition, "God suffered in the flesh," is the unity of the person, which the personal union indeed constitutes, but this is proximately followed (according to our mode of conceiving) by περιχώρησις (perichoresis), or the mutual communication of the natures. Therefore, although it is first said, "God suffered in the flesh," the aforementioned Fathers and Theologians think it can consequently be said not inconveniently, that the divinity suffered in the flesh, because the divinity truly appropriated to itself that suffering which the flesh felt in itself, and rendered it satisfactory and salutary. But we more safely say: "God suffered in the flesh." For 1) this proposition is ἔγγραφος (written), 1 Peter 4:1, Acts 20:28. 2) Just as actions, so also passions belong to supposits, or persons. 3) The distinction between the idiomatic propositions of the first and second genera must be accurately observed. In the latter, the subject can be abstract, not so in the former. 4) It is to be feared that, on account of the use of such abstractive propositions, the error of the Theopaschites, who taught that the divinity in Christ grieved and suffered when his flesh was fixed to the cross, may be rubbed off on our churches. Cf. D. GERHARD in exeg. book IV, § 198. D. BROCHMAND in univers. theol. System. de Christo, sect. IV, quæst. unic. p. 784.

(*) And, if we wish to speak accurately, not even that should be conceded, that the divinity was clothed in flesh. For not the abstract, but the concrete of the divine nature assumed the human, which is the perpetual locution in the sacred letters: "God was manifested in the flesh"; "The Son of God was sent into the world."

b. It is proven. The predicate of idiomatic propositions of the first genus does not designate the divine or human substance itself. For these propositions: "God is man," "the seed of David is Jehovah," etc., are not idiomatic, but hypostatic, or personal. Wherefore it is fitting that in idiomatic propositions of the first genus, an idiom of the divine or human nature be put in place of the predicate. Now, idioms are here taken in so broad a signification that they also embrace in their scope actions, passions, and common accidents. For the rest, it must be well observed here that if the predicate comprehends a use redounding to the human race, it denotes an ἀποτέλεσμα (apotelesma), or work of office, and pertains to the third genus of the communication of idioms, e.g., this predication: "Christ shed his blood for us," pertains to the third genus of the communication of idioms.

c. It is proven. The mode of predicating of idiomatic propositions pertaining to the first genus of the communication of idioms is true, real, and proper, by the propriety of signification. For those things which are properties of the humanity κατ' αὐτό (in itself), or through itself, are truly and properly predicated of the Son of God καθ' ἑνωσιν (according to union), or on account of the personal union; and vice versa, those things which are properties of the divinity are truly and properly predicated of the son of man, on account of the personal union. But so that it may be more clearly known which predicates belong to the divine or human nature κατ' αὐτό (in itself), and which belong to it καθ' ἑνωσιν (according to union), certain discretive particles must be especially noted, by which the properties are vindicated for that nature to which they belong through themselves and formally; which particles are either ῥητῶς (expressly) and distinctly had in the biblical sayings, or are elicited by the doctors of the church from the context according to the analogy of faith, e.g., "The Son of God was born of the seed of David κατὰ σάρκα (according to the flesh)," Romans 1:3. "Christ is from the fathers, as far as the flesh is concerned," Romans 9:5. "God obtained the church through his own blood," Acts 20:28. Sometimes Holy Scripture, in place of those discretive particles, employs the ablative case, e.g., "Christ was put to death in the flesh, but made alive in the spirit," 1 Peter 3:18. To the doctors of the church, the particles qua, quatenus, in quantum, respectu, tanquam, secundum are familiar. Which limitative particles are not χωριστικαὶ (separative) of the subject, but a) αἰτιολογικαὶ (etiological), showing the cause and origin for which the predicate is enunciated of the subject; b) προσδιοριστικαὶ (determinative) of the nature to which the predicate κατ' αὐτό (in itself), through itself, and formally belongs; c) διακριτικαὶ (distinctive) from the other nature, to which the properties do not belong formally, but appropriatively, or communicatively. This mode of predicating can be declared by examples: "The Son of God was born of the seed of David, according to the flesh," Romans 1:3. The subject of this idiomatic proposition is "the Son of God," by which is noted the whole person of Christ, denominated from the divine nature. The predicate is "to be born of the seed of David," which is a human idiom. This is predicated of the concrete of the divine nature, to which it does not belong κατ' αὐτό (in itself), through itself, but κατ' ἄλλο (according to another), through another, on account of the unity of the person of the God-man (θεανθρώπου). Whence by the limitative particle, κατὰ (according to the flesh), the human idiom is vindicated for the human nature, to which the temporal nativity formally belongs; yet the divine nature is not excluded or separated from the participation of the nativity, to which, of course, "to be born of the seed of David" belongs appropriatively. We will take another example from Genesis 3:15. "The seed of the woman shall crush the head of the serpent." The subject is "the seed of the woman," or the son of the Blessed Virgin Mary, by which is signified the whole composite (σύνθετος) person, who is God and man. The predicate is "the crushing of the serpent's head," which, since it is an act of omnipotence, is a divine idiom, which is enunciated of the concrete of the human nature, to which it indeed does not belong κατ' αὐτό (in itself), yet it does καθ' ἑνωσιν (according to union), on account of the personal union. The limitative particle is not ρητῶς (expressly), or distinctly, had in the text, yet according to the analogy of faith it can be added: "The seed of the woman will crush the head of the serpent, inasmuch as he is true God." The particle "inasmuch as" is here taken reduplicatively, or causally, and vindicates the divine idiom for the divine nature, to which it formally belongs; yet it does not exclude the human nature from the crushing of the serpent's head, inasmuch as that act of omnipotence belongs to it communicatively.

Question XLIV. Did the Son of God really and properly suffer, was he crucified and did he die?

The Son of God truly, really, and properly suffered, was crucified, and died a); to whom, of course, suffering is attributed ὑποστατικῶς (hypostatically), personally b), ιδιοποιητικῶς (appropriatively) c), and ἐνεργητικῶς (effectively) d).

a. It is proven. 1) From the clearest sayings of scripture. For Jehovah is said to be pierced, Zechariah 12:10, cf. John 19:37. The Son of God was delivered up for us, Romans 8:32. The Author of life was killed, Acts 3:15. The Lord of glory was crucified, 1 Corinthians 2:8. Which sayings of scripture testify that not only the human nature suffered, but the Son of God himself, Jehovah himself. 2) From the syllogistic consequence of personal propositions. For we rightly conclude: The Son of man was truly and really delivered to death. 3) From the parity of examples. If scripture truly and without a trope asserts that the Son of God was born of the virgin Mary, Luke 1:35, then it must certainly also be taken truly and without a trope that the Lord of glory was crucified. 4) If only the human nature suffered, that saying of NESTORIUS will be true: "Do not glory, O Jew, because you crucified not God, but a man." See EVAGRIUS, book I of his History, ch. 2; hist. tripartit. book 12, ch. 4.

b. It is proven. Actions and passions belong to supposita. For which reason, when I say: "God suffered," the subject of the suffering, as that which, is God; the subject, as that by which, is the human nature, subsisting in the hypostasis of the Son of God. Whence I expound this proposition, "God suffered," thus: The Son of God suffered according to the human nature subsisting in the divine personality. Therefore, just as, when a wound is inflicted on Peter's flesh, not only Peter's flesh is said to be wounded, but truly Peter is wounded, or the person of Peter, although his soul cannot be wounded; so, when the Son of God suffers according to the flesh, not only the flesh suffers, or his human nature, but truly the Son of God suffers, or the person of the Son of God, however ἀπαθής (impassible) the divine nature may be.

c. It is proven. From the mutual communion of each nature, the divine and the human, in the one person of Christ. For because a mutual, and that true and real, communion is given between the two natures in the one person of Christ, therefore the divine nature truly and really appropriates to itself the idioms of the human nature. For the two natures come into communion not naked, but endowed with their properties. Paul has respect to this ιδιοποίησιν (idiopoiēsis), or appropriation, when in Acts 20:28 he says: "God obtained the church through his own blood." From which we conclude: Whoever shed his own blood, he truly, really, and properly suffered. But God, etc. Therefore. To be sure, God suffered in his flesh as truly and really as Paul and Peter suffered in their own flesh; for just as his flesh is proper to Paul and Peter essentially, so is his flesh proper to the Son of God personally.

d. It is proven. God suffered in the flesh ἐνεργητικῶς (energetically), or effectively, because the divine nature of the suffering Christ added weight, strength, efficacy, and value to the passion of the flesh, so that it might be most weighty, most efficacious, most salutary, and plainly satisfactory. The Passion of the flesh alone, however most just, does not satisfy for itself, less so for others, and least of all for the whole world. You say: Whoever really suffers, feels the passion; But God did not feel the passion; Therefore, God did not really suffer. Resp. Whoever suffers really and physically, feels the passion, I grant. But although the Son of God suffered really, he nevertheless did not suffer φυσικῶς (physically), but ὑποστατικῶς (hypostatically), or personally, and appropriatively, or as ATHANASIUS, book IV On the Trinity, says: "The Son of God suffered, not by the nature of the deity, but by the dispensation of the union."

Question XLV. What is the second genus of the communication of idioms?

Second genus of the communication of idioms. The second genus of the communication of idioms is that the Son of God communicated his divine majesty to the assumed flesh.

It is more fully defined: The second genus of the communication of idioms is that by which the Son of God truly and really communicated the idioms of his divine nature to the assumed human nature on account of the personal union, for common possession, use, and denomination.

Question XLVI. What must be observed to understand this second genus of C.I.?

To understand the second genus of the communication of idioms, the following must be observed: 1) The appellations of this genus, 2) The cause and foundation of the communication, 3) The subject of the communication, 4) The communicated gifts, 5) The end of the communication, 6) The predications resulting from this second genus of C.I.

Question XLVII. By what names is the second genus of C.I. designated?

The Greek leaders of the church designated this second genus with emphatic names to express its character. By the Latin doctors, it is commonly called the communication of majesty.

It is proven. The Greeks call this genus of C.I. 1) βελτιῶσιν (beltiōsin, improvement), on account of the infinite gifts conferred, by which the human nature of Christ is perfected for undertaking the threefold office; 2) προσθήκην μεγάλην (prosthekēn megalēn, a great addition), because, with omnipotence, omniscience, etc., being communicated, no greater addition can be given; 3) ὑπερύψωσιν (hyperypsōsin, exaltation), because through the communicated divine majesty the flesh of Christ was raised to the highest state; 4) μετάδοσιν (metadosin, bestowal), namely of infinite majesty; 5) δόξασιν (doxasin, glorification); since the flesh of Christ was heaped with that glory which the Son of God has from eternity, John 17:5; 6) μετάληψιν θείας ἀξίας (metalēpsin theias axias, participation in divine dignity), because from the divine gifts with which the assumed flesh was adorned, its divine dignity shines forth; 7) μετοχὴν θείας δυνάμεως (metochēn theias dynamēōs, participation in divine power), from which results the highest glory; 8) θεώσιν (theōsin), ἀποθέωσιν (apothēōsin), θεοποίησιν (theopoīēsin), Deification; which DAMASCENUS, book III of On the Orthodox Faith, ch. 12, explains, that the ancients by the name Deification in no way understood a transmutation, confusion, conversion, abolition, or equalization of natures, but that first they wished to note the economy of the hypostatic union by that term; a) because on account of that hypostatic union, it is predicated of the man Christ that he is God; b) because the ancients by this word, Deification, indicated the περιχώρησις (perichōresis) of the natures. Cf. D. CHEMNITZ, de d. n. c. 26. The Latins called it the communication of majesty, because the divine and infinite gifts are the very majesty and glory of the eternal God. The occasion for this denomination was taken from the Greeks, who called the divine gifts given to Christ in time ἀξιώματα (axiōmata, dignities), and ἀρχήματα (archēmata, excellences). In the sacred letters, the communication of majesty is called anointing, i.e., the gift of the Holy Spirit without measure, Psalm 45:8, John 3:34, Acts 10:38.

Question XLVIII. Who communicated the divine idioms to the flesh of Christ?

The Son of God personally communicated the divine excellences (ἀρχήματα) to the assumed flesh a), which, however, God the Father also gave b), and the Holy Spirit c).

a. It is proven. For just as the Word (ὁ λόγος) assumed the human nature into the unity of his person, Hebrews 2:16, so the same personally communicated his divine properties, marked with his hypostatic character, to the assumed humanity. A distinction is to be made here between δόσις καὶ κοινωνία (dosis kai koinōnia), between giving and communication. The divine excellences (ἀρχήματα) are said to be given to Christ according to the human nature by the Father and the Holy Spirit, but not communicated, if we wish to speak strictly and in rigor; because the communication of which we speak here is and is called personal, and therefore presupposes the personal union. But the personal union is not between the Father and the flesh of Christ, or the Holy Spirit and the flesh of Christ, but between the Word (λόγος) and his assumed flesh.

b. It is proven. God the Father gave the son of man power, honor, and a kingdom, Daniel 7:13. Cf. John 5:27, Matthew 11:27.

c. It is proven. The Holy Spirit anointed the Messiah, Isaiah 61:1, and indeed not by measure, John 3:34. Therefore, he endowed the flesh of Christ with immense gifts.

Question XLIX. On what foundation does the communication of majesty made to the flesh of Christ rest?

The foundation of the majesty communicated with the flesh of Christ is both the personal union, by which the divine hypostasis was communicated to the human nature of Christ a), and the intimate communion of the divine and human natures in the one person of Christ b).

a. It is proven. Through the personal union, the hypostasis (ὑπόστασις) of the Word (τοῦ λόγου) was communicated to the human nature of Christ. Therefore, also to the same were communicated the properties, which are in reality identified with it. The reason for the consequence is; because, of things that are really the same, when one is communicated, the other is also communicated. And again; If the divine idioms cannot be communicated to the human nature, neither could the hypostasis (ὑπόστασις) of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) have been communicated; for this is proper to the Son of God, while the idioms are common to the other divine persons. Surely it is much more credible that the common attributes were communicated than the proper hypostasis; For communication is less repugnant to the communicable (τῷ κοινωνικῷ) than to the incommunicable. The Father communicates to the Son the essence, not the personal property, otherwise the Son would be the Father. But in the personal union, both the substance of the Word (λόγος) and his very deity are communicated to the assumed humanity.

b. It is proven. No perichoristic union, i.e., one that implies a communication of the united natures to each other, can be without a communication of idioms. But the personal union of the two natures in Christ is perichoristic, i.e., it implies a communion of the divine and human natures to each other; Therefore. The major is proven; 1) because that degree of union is the least which is not followed by any communion (κοινωνία). 2) A union which is made by παράτασις (parataxis, juxtaposition), or παράθεσις (parathesis, setting beside), is without a communication of idioms, e.g., two compacted metals have no internal communion. Nor is an angel, although he may grant motion to an assumed body, united with it by περιχώρησις (perichoresis), because he does not permeate and inform that body as an ἐντελέχεια (entelechy). 3) Where two natures are united κατὰ συνδυασιν καὶ κατὰ περιχώρησιν (by combination and by perichoresis), of which one is like a δύναμις (dynamis), or power, the other like an ἐντελέχεια (entelechy), or act, there the latter communicates to the former truly and really its idioms for common possession, use, and denomination. It is illustrated by examples: The soul, most closely united to the body, imparts to it the vital faculty, as well as the sensitive faculties, truly and really; fire, having entered iron, communicates to it the power of burning and shining. We confirmed the minor above, in question XXX.

The subject to whom the divine majesty was given is Christ according to the human nature a), or, what is the same, the human nature assumed into the hypostasis (ὑπόστασιν) of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) b).

a. It is proven. The subject which received the communication is the person of the incarnate Word (τῷ λόγῳ ἐνσάρκῳ). For just as actions and passions belong to persons, so whatever is given is given to a person, and whatever is received is received by a person. Whence the Savior says, Matthew 28:18, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me (Christ)." And Paul says, Philippians 2:9, "God has highly exalted Christ and bestowed on him the name that is above every name."

b. It is proven. The subject by which is the nature to which the communication of divine majesty was made. For since in the one person of Christ there are two distinct natures, the question is; according to which nature was the communication of majesty made to the person of Christ? To which we distinctly respond; according to the human nature. We confirm our assertion; 1) Whatever was given to the person of Christ not according to the divine nature, that was given to him according to the human nature; But the divine majesty, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because whatever is predicated of the person of Christ pertains either to the divine, or to the human, or to both of his natures; because the person is not some third thing and really distinct from those two personally united natures. The minor is proven; because the divine nature is too exalted to be exalted, too rich to be enriched, too glorious to receive an increase of glory, too perfect for anything to be given or added to it. 2) Holy scripture designates the subject to which the communication of majesty was made, John 6:51, 54, where the flesh of Christ is called life-giving, and the same subject is determined by a specificative particle, John 5:27, "The Father has given the Son authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man"; where the particle ὅτι (hoti), because, is not taken reduplicatively or causally, because the human nature is not the cause of that giving; otherwise it would follow that all men have judicial authority (ἐξουσίαν κριτικὴν), since, the cause being posited and not impeded, the effect follows; but it is taken specifically, to determine the nature according to which the divine majesty was given to the person of Christ. 3) There exists a most common rule, approved by the greatest consensus of the whole orthodox church: "Whatever scripture says was given to Christ in time is understood to have been given to him not according to the deity, but according to the assumed humanity." Which rule D. DANNHAVER, in hodos phænom. VIII, p. 660, limits with various instances; "Whatever idiom was given to Christ in time by the grace of union or exaltation, for the perfection of the recipient, not only manifestatively but really, was given to him according to the human nature." Now, that the divine excellences (ἀρχήματα) were given to Christ is liquidly established; because a) Holy Scripture itself expresses the circumstance of time in which this donation occurred: "Seventy weeks are decreed... to anoint the most holy," says the prophet Daniel, ch. 9:24. And Christ himself, addressing the Father, says in John 17:1, 5, "Father, the hour has come; glorify your Son that the Son may glorify you! ...And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed." b) Because exaltation is described as the immediate consequence of the emptying. Therefore, exaltation also belongs to Christ according to the same nature according to which he was emptied in time, that is, according to the human nature.

The sacred letters teach the connection of the emptying and the exaltation in many places. "It is necessary for the Christ to enter into his glory through suffering," Luke 24:26. "He became obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross. Therefore God has highly exalted him and bestowed on him the name that is above every name," Philippians 2:8-9.

Question LI. Were truly divine, uncreated, infinite, and immense gifts communicated to Christ according to his human nature?

Through and on account of the personal union, truly divine, uncreated, infinite, and immense gifts were given to Christ according to his human nature.

Obf. Threefold gifts belong to the human nature of Christ. Some belong to it by the condition or character of its own nature, e.g., health of body, senses, intellect, will, memory, etc. Some belong to it by habitual grace, of which kind are certain peculiar gifts, yet created and finite, which inhere in it habitually, subjectively, and indeed in the highest degree. Some were imparted to it by the grace of personal union, which are truly divine, uncreated, and infinite. The question has been formed concerning these.

Our assertion is proven 1) from the testimony of Paul, who says, Colossians 2:9, "In Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily." Obf. a) The Greek πλήρωμα (plērōma) denotes an all-encompassing and consummate perfection. Therefore, πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος (plērōma tēs theotētos) is the full and perfect deity. For the sake of greater emphasis is added πᾶν πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος (pan plērōma tēs theotētos), to indicate that the full and perfect deity, and everything that is really in it, dwells in Christ. Therefore, "all the fullness of the Godhead" comprehends omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and finally all the properties and all the ἐνέργεια (energeia, operation) of God. Obf. b) σωματικῶς (sōmatikōs) is rendered by some as "personally"; by some, "as in its own body," as is expounded by THEODORET; and also by DAMASCENE, Τοῦτ' ἐστίν, ἐν σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ (Tout' estin, en sarki autou), "that is, in his flesh," to imply that the flesh of Christ is the most sacred temple and dwelling place of the inhabiting divinity (*). AUGUSTINE confirms this exposition in epistle 7 to Dardanus: "It is said 'bodily,' because God dwells in the body of Christ, which he assumed from the virgin, as in a temple." Where one must distinguish between a common and a proper temple. The saints are common temples of the inhabiting God, but the flesh of Christ is a proper temple, personally assumed. c) Inhabitation implies habitation or possession.

Hence IGNATIUS called the body of Christ σῶμα ἔχον τὸν Θεὸν ἐνοικον (sōma echon ton Theon enoikon), "a body having God as an inhabitant"; but it has him not by the condition of human nature, but by supernatural union and communication. These things being established, we argue: He in whose flesh, as in a proper and personally assumed temple, dwells all the fullness of the Godhead, he has and possesses in his flesh all the divine idioms not through himself, but through union and communication. But in the flesh of Christ, etc. Therefore.

2. From the statement of St. John the Protobaptist, John 3:34-35. "He whom the Father has sent speaks the words of God, οὐ γὰρ ἐκ μέτρου διδῶσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὸ πνεῦμα (ou gar ek metrou didōsin ho Theos to pneuma), for God does not give the Spirit by measure (to him). The Father loves the Son and has given all things into his hand." Obf. a) The Giver here is God the Father, the fount of the deity, who in the fullness of time sent the Son, born of a woman, Galatians 4:14, and anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power, Acts 10:38, and out of most singular love gave all things into his hand. b) The person to whom the donation was made is Christ according to the human nature; for he is described as sent in time, who also in the course of time had to grow, and into whose hand all things were given. Now, concerning things given in time, the rule is certain, that they were given to Christ only according to the human nature. c) That which was given is the Holy Spirit, who here is understood not only with respect to his person, but also with respect to his gifts; for his gifts in the outward communication (κατ' ἔξω) are not to be separated from his person. Now those gifts are said to be given, if you look at the manner, ἐκ μέτρου (ek metrou), that is, without measure, and therefore in an immense way. The faithful men receive gifts according to the measure of the gift of Christ, Ephesians 4:7, whose gifts are finite; but those which were given without measure are infinite. Whence we validly conclude: To whomever the gifts of the Holy Spirit were given not by measure, he is endowed with immense and infinite gifts of the Holy Spirit; But to the human nature of Christ, etc. Therefore. You say: The immense gifts of the Holy Spirit were given to the person of Christ, but not to his human nature. Resp. The person is not a third thing, distinct from the natures. Therefore, if the immense gifts of the Holy Spirit were given to the person of Christ, the question is: according to which nature? Were they conferred according to the divine or the human nature? But nothing could be given to the divine nature in time; Therefore, they were given to the human nature of Christ.

3. From the description of the glory given to Christ, John 17:5. "And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed." Obf. a) The glory which Christ had with the Father before this world was made is the divine, eternal, uncreated, and infinite glory. b) Christ, as God, had eternal glory with the Father, not by reason of intention or predestination, but actually and in reality, as the only-begotten of the Father, John 1:14. The same, as man, he received through the personal union, as to κτήσις (ktēsis), or possession; but through the ascension into heaven and the session at the right hand of God, as to χρῆσις (chrēsis), or full use. c) The

(*) There is a certain third interpretation, and it is indeed the most probable, namely this: antotypically. The testimony of AUGUSTINE seems to me to point rather to this third one than to that second one. For it is most likely that σωματικῶς (sōmatikōs) ought to be understood in the same way as that word, σῶμα (sōma, body), v. 17. Σῶμα is opposed to σκιά (skia, shadow), ibid. σκιά without any doubt is the type, the image of the future thing, signified in the O.T. Therefore, σῶμα is the antitype; Therefore, σωματικῶς is also equivalent to what is usually called antotypically. We see the type in Exodus 40:34, 1 Kings 8:11. Both those structures, the tabernacle and the temple, were like a shadow of the human nature which God was to assume, John 1:14, 16; 2:19, 21. There God dwelt πραγματικῶς (pragmatikōs, actually), but by that type it was foretold what would be perfectly and ὑποστατικῶς (hypostatikōs, hypostatically) in the antitype, which is the human nature of Christ.

Savior speaks of a real glorification, not a declarative one, or a bare manifestation of glory. For Christ desires to be glorified with the Father, just as he had glory with him before the world was created. But he had the same really and in fact before the foundation of the world. Therefore, he also desired the actual and real participation of the same glory in time. These things being premised, we argue; Whatever glory Christ desired that he might be adorned with by the Father in time, the same he received in reality, communicated according to the human nature; But Christ desired eternal and infinite glory, that he might be adorned with it by the Father in time; Therefore. The major is of manifest truth; for Christ desired glory according to that nature according to which he could be glorified by the Father. But according to the divine nature he could not be glorified by the Father; because it is immutable, most perfect, and most high, so that it is neither in need of glory, nor can it be advanced to a greater sublimity. Therefore, he desired glorification according to the human nature, according to which he had been emptied. Add to this, that the glory which the Savior here sought is a gift given to Christ in time. But whatever gifts were given to Christ in time were given to him not according to the divine nature, but the human. You say: I. The divine glory is not understood in that passage, but the mediatorial glory, which is inferior to the divine glory, not equal to it, but next to it; yet more sublime than all the glory of creatures. Resp. The glory indicated is that which Christ had with the Father before the world existed. But before the world was created, there was nothing but eternity, nothing but infinite majesty. Therefore, the mediatorial glory is supreme and infinite. You say: II. Christ had glory with the Father before the foundation of the world by reason of divine predestination. Resp. There is no indication of predestination in the text. Christ asks to be glorified in time really; therefore, the possession of glory before the world is also real, and does not consist merely in intention and bare predestination. If Christ had spoken of glorification by reason of a divine decree, he would have said nothing that does not also apply to other elect. For all the elect receive at the appointed time that glory to which they were predestined before the world was made. You say: III. The words of Christ are to be understood of the declaration and manifestation of glory through the resurrection and session at the right hand of God. Resp. Christ here desired to be glorified with the Father, and therefore the manifestation of glory before men cannot be understood.

4. From the exaltation of Christ, Philippians 2:9. "God has highly exalted Christ and bestowed (ἐχαρίσατο, gave out of grace) on him the name that is above every name." A name above every name implies not some finite majesty, but an infinite and truly divine one; for if it were finite, it would not yet be a name above every name, but would have above itself another more infinite and sublime name.

5. That the majesty of omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and of religious adoration has been given to the human nature of Christ, we will clearly show below.

6. Christ performs the works of office (by redeeming, gathering, illuminating, regenerating, justifying, governing, defending the church, etc.) according to both natures. But in order that the human nature of Christ might be able to concur and cooperate in those results (ἀποτελέσματα), it has need not only of created or finite gifts, but of the communion of the very infinite power of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ); since those works are not of a finite, but of an infinite virtue; about which we are to treat in the following questions.

Question LII. Are all the divine attributes communicated to the flesh of Christ?

All the divine attributes have been communicated to the flesh of Christ, as to inhabitation and possession a); but for use and immediate predication, the active (ἐνεργητικά) or operative divine idioms have been conferred upon it b).

a. It is proven. 1) To whomsoever the infinite hypostasis has been communicated, to him also have all the divine idioms been communicated; for they do not really differ from the divine subsistence. 2) The personal union and the perichoristic communion of the divine and human natures necessarily imply the communication of all the divine idioms, as to inhabitation and possession. For how would all the fullness of the Godhead dwell in the flesh of Christ, as in a personally assumed temple, unless all the divine idioms dwelt in him?

b. It is proven. The inactive (ἀνενεργητα) or quiescent divine attributes (e.g., eternity, infinity, immensity, etc.) do not admit of a second act, and therefore do not exert themselves through an operation ad extra. Therefore, the same have not been communicated to the human nature of Christ for use (χρησιν); for which reason also the quiescent divine idioms are not predicated immediately of the assumed flesh of Christ. But the active (ἐνεργητικά) divine properties exert themselves through an operation ad extra, and therefore can be communicated for use. From this it happens that they are predicated immediately of the flesh of Christ, e.g., "The human nature of Christ is omnipotent, life-giving, omniscient, a searcher of hearts," etc.; since omnipotence, the life-giving power, omniscience, the searching of hearts exert themselves in and through the flesh of Christ. But the inactive (ἀνενεργητά) attributes, although they are not predicated immediately of the assumed flesh of Christ (for the flesh of Christ is not called eternal, infinite, etc.; it implies a contradiction to be eternal and to have begun in time, to be infinite and to remain finite); yet they can be predicated of the same mediately (by means of an operative attribute), e.g., "The power of the man Christ is infinite, immense, and eternal." The reason is: because infinity, immensity, and eternity do not exert themselves through their own operations (ἐνεργήματα), but through the actions of omnipotence. For the action of omnipotence is of an eternal, immense, and infinite operation. Add to this, that this difference is also clear in this, that the former contribute to the function of the mediatorial office, royal, priestly, and prophetic, which cannot be discharged without the communicated operative attributes. The Son of God would not discharge the priestly, royal, and prophetic office through the flesh, unless it were instructed with omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, majesty, and glory. But the quiescent divine idioms through themselves and immediately do not concur in the execution of the mediatorial office. You say: The divine attributes on the part of God do not differ. Therefore, if all have been communicated to the flesh of Christ, they can also be predicated of the flesh of Christ. Resp. 1) The divine attributes do not differ κατ' ἔσω (internally), or within the most simple complex of the divine essence, but they do differ κατ' ἔξω (externally), by reason of the external operation. 2) All the divine attributes are predicated of the human nature of Christ, the operative attributes immediately, the quiescent attributes mediately. It is illustrated by similar examples: The soul, united perichoristically to the body, imparts to it life and the sensitive faculties, so that the body can be called living and sentient; yet from a spiritual, immortal, and invisible soul, the body is not called spiritual, immortal, and invisible. In glowing iron, there is the power of burning and shining, there is also lightness and simplicity, since fire is a light and simple body; yet the iron is not therefore called a light and simple body. Thus the flesh of Christ is not immediately denominated from the quiescent divine idioms communicated to it.

Question LIII. By what mode of communication was the flesh of Christ made a partaker of the divine idioms?

The mode of communicating by which the flesh of Christ was made a partaker of the operative divine idioms is not effective, by gemination a), nor transient or transfusive b), nor adequate c), nor subversive or destructive of the human nature d), but entelechial and perichoristic e), not unto subjective inherence f), but unto common possession, use, and denomination g).

a. It is proven. There is not a twofold omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and glory in Christ, but whatever glory the divine nature of the Word (τοῦ λόγου) has from eternity, the same the assumed flesh received in time, John 17:5, just as the body has the same life as the soul.

b. It is proven. The attributes of the Son of God are so communicated to the humanity that they nevertheless perpetually remain the properties of the divine nature, and never become the properties of the human nature. For they do not depart from the hypostasis of the Word and immigrate and pass into the human nature as into a subject; but the humanity, assumed into the communion of the person by God the Word, was at the same time made a partaker of the divine nature and its properties. Nor does it receive them into itself as into a subject, so that they become its properties; but it possesses them in the person of the Word by a real communication.

c. It is proven. For equalization, not only the communication of the same thing is sufficient, but in addition the same mode of having it is required; which is one with respect to God and the Son of God, another with respect to the flesh; the former has majesty by eternal generation, the latter by the grace of union. Whence even today Christ, as man, is less than the Father, 1 Corinthians 15:28, because the divine idioms which he received, he has from grace, Philippians 2:9.

d. It is proven. By the communication of idioms, the human nature is not abolished or destroyed, but is adorned and perfected for the function of the mediatorial office. For the fullness of the divinity inhabits the body of Christ, as its proper temple, not to subvert it, but to illustrate it.

e. & f. The internal and perfect union of two substances, essentially distinct indeed, but intimately joined, of which one has the manner of an ἐντελέχεια (entelechy), or perfecting act, the other the manner of a δύναμις (dynamis), or perfectible power, necessarily implies a communication of the idioms, which inhere subjectively in the more virtuous, uncreated substance, but are participated by the other for common possession, use, and denomination. For example, life and the sensitive faculties inhere in the soul and exert themselves through the members of the body. Fire is in iron, yet it burns and shines through the glowing iron. As specifically pertains to the divine idioms of the Word (τοῦ λόγου), since they are not qualities or accidents, they inhere in no subject by inherence; yet their subject of attribution, primary and immediate, to which they formally and through themselves belong, is the divine nature of the Son of God; the subject of attribution, secondary and mediate, to which they belong participatively and by the grace of personal union, is the human nature.

g. It is proven. The active (ἐνεργητικά) divine idioms inhabit the flesh of Christ, as their proper temple, they operate through the flesh, as an instrument hypostatically united, and they are predicated of the flesh, as the subject of attribution, secondary or mediate.

Obf. We have discussed the mode of communicating more broadly above, in question XXXVIII.

Question LIV. At what moment of time was the divine majesty communicated to the flesh of Christ?

At the same moment that the personal union took place, the communication of majesty took place, as to κτήσις (ktēsis), possession and first act a). The flesh of Christ was advanced to the exercise, or full and never-ceasing use, of majesty at the same point in time when it was exalted to the right hand of God b).

a. It is proven. The personal union occurred at that point in time when the hypostatic power of the Most High overshadowed the virgin Mary, that is, descended in a mysterious way into the womb of Mary, filled the virginal mass of blood, stirred by the Holy Spirit, with a peculiar approximation, and united it to itself, so that the whole fullness of the divinity (to which all the divine idioms pertain) dwelt in the body of Christ, as a most sacred temple, Colossians 2:9.

b. It is proven. Christ, being exalted, received a name above every name, that is, the highest and truly divine majesty, Philippians 2:9, and was glorified with the glory which he had with the Father before the world was created, John 17:5, namely as to the exercise and full use of majesty.

Question LV. For what purpose were the divine idioms communicated to the flesh of Christ?

They were communicated for the salutary function of the priestly, prophetic, and royal office.

It is proven. Christ performs the highest office, priestly, prophetic, and royal, according to both natures; for which salutary office, to be discharged with care and fruit, the human nature would have been by no means equal, unless it had been endowed with omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, and divine glory.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who utterly deny that the divine majesty was communicated to the flesh of Christ, moved by the following arguments:

I. Whatever nature is finite is not capable of infinite majesty; But the human nature of Christ, etc.; Therefore. The major is proven from the most celebrated axiom: "No finite thing is capable of the infinite." Resp. I deny the major. To the proof we say that the finite is indeed not capable of the infinite by a physical, comprehensive, active, and adequate capacity; yet the finite is capable of the infinite by a supernatural, participative, passive, and inadequate capacity. To be sure, it is most certain that no finite thing can actively and adequately grasp and physically comprehend the infinite; yet it is no less certain that the finite can passively grasp, or inadequately receive, the infinite (especially through the supernatural grace of God). For all and every creature are capable of their most present creator; who, without any division of himself, is whole in all things and everywhere. The same are capable of divine, and therefore infinite, conservation and cooperation. The human intellect is capable in its own way of knowing God and eternal things. The faithful are capable of the triune God, who dwells in their hearts by a most benevolent union and communication of himself. The same are capable, as to knowledge as well as fruition, of the infinite satisfaction of Christ, of the infinite divine mercy, of the infinite justifying and saving grace also. Finally, the flesh of Christ is capable of the most closely joined to it, and certainly infinite, Word (Λόγος), and of his infinite hypostasis; from which in Colossians 2:9 the whole fullness of the deity is said to dwell in Christ bodily, that is, in the body of Christ, as its appropriate temple.

II. To whomsoever the divine idioms are communicated, he is God; The human nature of Christ is not God; Therefore. Resp. To whomsoever the divine idioms are communicated by an essential communication, through eternal generation or procession, so that they are the properties of him to whom they are communicated, and thus belong to him per se, he is God; I grant. To whomsoever the divine idioms are communicated by a personal, entelechial, and perichoristic communication, he is God; I deny. For just as the properties of the soul are communicated to the human body by an entelechial and perichoristic communication, and yet the body is not therefore called soul, but animated; so the divine idioms are communicated to the human nature of Christ, and yet it is not therefore to be called God, but deified, or a partaker of the deity, since the divine attributes do not belong to it κατ' αὐτό (in itself), through itself, but κατ' ἄλλο (according to another), through the grace of the personal union.

III. If on account of the personal union and the περιχώρησις (perichoresis) of the natures, the divine nature communicates its idioms to the human nature, for the same reason the human nature will also communicate its idioms to the divine nature; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven, because the union is reciprocal, and the περιχώρησις is mutual. The falsity of the consequent is clear; because, if the human nature had imparted its idioms to the divine, the deity would have suffered, died, been buried, would be palpable, divisible, etc. Resp. I deny the consequence of the major. The union is indeed reciprocal and the περιχώρησις mutual, but not equally, or in the same way. For the divine nature is not only united, but also uniting; but the human nature is only united. The former is assuming, the latter assumed. It is the part of the assuming to give, according to the canon of LEO THE GREAT, not of the assumed. The advancement is of the assumed, not of the assuming. The περιχώρησις is indeed mutual, but not active on both sides. For it is active on the part of the Word (Λόγου), passive on the part of the flesh. The former permeates, the latter is permeated. From this it happens that the human nature indeed passively receives the divine idioms; but it does not actively communicate its own properties to the divinity. To this is added that it is repugnant to the immutable, most perfect, and most simple divine nature to receive any alteration, passion, or finite property into itself.

IV. Whatever dogma produces a confusion of the divine and human nature is Eutychian; The dogma of the communication of the divine idioms produces a confusion of the divine and human nature; Therefore. The minor is proven; of those things whose properties are the same, their nature is the same; But in the opinion of the Lutherans, the properties of the divine and human nature are the same; Therefore. Resp. I deny the minor of both syllogisms. For the Lutherans do not assert that the divine idioms are communicated to the human nature of Christ by a transient or transfusive communication, so that they become the idioms or properties of the human nature, but they teach with Holy Scripture and the primitive church that on account of the closest union and the intimate communion of the natures, the divine idioms have been communicated to the assumed flesh for common possession, use, and denomination, so that the human nature of Christ, although omnipotence does not belong to it formally and as its primary subject, can nevertheless operate through it and is truly called omnipotent. Therefore, the distinction between the divine and human nature remains unharmed. The former is omnipotent ἐσιωδῶς (essentially), or formally, immediately, κατ' αὐτό (in itself), and per se;

the latter is omnipotent οικονομικῶς (economically), or communicatively, mediately (by means of the divine nature), and κατ' ἄλλο (according to another), or through the grace of the personal union.

V. With the communication of idioms made to the human nature standing, the arguments which are drawn from the divine properties to prove the divinity of Christ perish. For if such an argument is constructed: "He to whom the divine idioms belong is God; But to Christ, etc. Therefore, etc."; the Socinians can object that the divine idioms belong to the human nature of Christ, yet this is not God. Resp. 1) With the communication of idioms standing, the argument drawn from the divine idioms to prove the divinity of Christ remains valid, provided it is formed in the following way: "He to whom the divine idioms belong per se, formally, and from eternity, is true God; But to Christ, etc. Therefore." 2) The orthodox doctors, through the doctrine of the communication of idioms, do not undermine the demonstration of the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), but rather presuppose it; because the divine idioms could not have been communicated to the human nature from the Word (ἀπὸ τοῦ λόγου), unless the same had belonged to the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) from eternity.

VI. The divine nature does not have idioms properly so called; Therefore, it does not communicate them to the human nature. The antecedent is clear; because those things which are called idioms of the divine nature are not really distinguished from the divine nature; Therefore, they are not properly so called idioms of the divine nature. Resp. For predicamental idioms, it is indeed required that they be really distinguished from the subject of inherence. But the divine idioms are transcendental, which although they do not differ really from the divine essence, they nevertheless differ formally, and are called idioms, or properties, because they are perfections of God, which according to our mode of conceiving, follow the divine essence through themselves, are predicated of it paronymously, and are reciprocated with it.

Obf. See the remaining arguments, which are usually objected to our assertion, above, question XXXVIII.

Question LVI. Was omnipotence communicated to the flesh of Christ?

Communication of omnipotence. Infinite, uncreated, immense, and therefore truly divine power, which we commonly call omnipotence, was communicated by the Son of God to the assumed flesh, through the grace of the personal union.

It is proven. 1) From "all authority in heaven and on earth" given to Christ, Matthew 28:18. "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me," said Christ, just as he was about to ascend into heaven. To whom all authority in heaven and on earth has been given, to him omnipotence has been communicated; But to Christ as man, etc. Therefore. You say: I. Christ speaks of his person, not of his human nature. Resp. The composite (σύνθετος) person of Christ does not really differ from the two natures. Wherefore, the person having been named, it must be discerned according to which nature all authority was given to Christ. But since it was not given in time to Christ according to the divine nature—which, being immutable and most perfect, receives no perfection of itself in time—it is easy to conclude that it was granted to Christ according to the human nature, so that it might be rendered fit for the efficacy of the works of office, such as here are: the institution of the ministry of the word and sacraments, the gathering of the church from all nations, and its protection, even to the consummation of the age, vv. 19-20 (*). You say: II. ἐξουσία

(*) That this saying ought to be understood of that which was given to Christ in time, is plainly apparent from John 5:27: ὅτι (quatenus, inasmuch as) he is the Son of Man. But Christ asserts that all things were bestowed upon him, according to his human nature, not only in the glorious state, but also in the calamitous state, when he himself humbly walked the earth, Matthew 11:27, John 3:35, 16:15, and indeed for this reason, that all might trust in him alone, and thus by his benefit aspire to eternal salvation, John 3:36. Therefore, not then only, when the ascension to the highest peak of dignity was made, were all things given to him, but at that very moment when the Son of God assumed the flesh, the closest conjunction of both natures and the most perfect communication was made at the same time. And how could Christ, according to his human nature in the state of κένωσις (kenosis, emptying), have been able of his own will to abstain from the use of divine perfections, (exousia) or right and authority is one thing, δύναμις (dynamis), power, force, and faculty, is another. Often a prince has the right and authority to occupy a province, for which he nevertheless lacks the power and faculty. Resp. Human authority is sometimes destitute of sufficient strength; but all divine authority in heaven and on earth, without divine power, cannot even be conceived (**).

2. From the "authority over all flesh" given to Christ, John 17:2.

3. From the authority granted to the "Son of Man to execute judgment," John 5:27.

4. From the "proper and supreme authority to forgive sins," which Christ, as the "Son of Man," exercised even in the state of emptying, Matthew 9:6.

5. From the power "that is able to subject all things to himself," Philippians 3:21, which is the victor and triumpher over all, Revelation 5:12.

6. From the "life-giving power," John 6:51. "I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever. And the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who deny that omnipotence was communicated to the flesh of Christ. Their more important arguments are:

I. No dependent being is omnipotent; The flesh of Christ is a dependent being. Therefore. Resp. No dependent being is omnipotent ἐσιωδῶς (essentially), formally, and through itself; I grant. No dependent being is omnipotent οἰκονομικῶς (economically), participatively, and through the grace of union; I deny.

II. Whoever is omnipotent is God; The flesh of Christ is not God; Therefore. Resp. 1) In this syllogism there are four terms. For the major is understood of the concrete, or of the person, in this sense: "Whatever person is omnipotent, that person is God." In the minor, however, the abstract is subsumed, or the human nature, which is designated by "flesh." 2) If the syllogism is formed thus: "Whoever is omnipotent is God; The man Christ is not God," then the minor is denied; for the man Christ is God personally. Instance: The argument can be constructed thus: "Whatever nature is omnipotent is God; But the human nature of Christ is omnipotent; Therefore, the human nature of Christ is God." Resp. "Whatever nature is omnipotent, through itself and formally, is God"; I grant. "The human nature of Christ is omnipotent through itself and formally"; I deny. For since the human nature of Christ is omnipotent participatively and through the grace of the personal union, it is easily concluded that it should not be called God, but deified, or a partaker of the deity; for the idiomatic predications are not synonymic, but paronymic.

III. Whoever has infinite power cannot be overcome by a finite power; The man Christ was overcome by the finite power of the Jews; Therefore, the man Christ is not omnipotent. Resp. "Whoever is omnipotent and fully uses his omnipotence cannot be overcome by any finite power"; I grant. The man Christ in the state of emptying was not lacking the κτήσις (ktēsis), or possession, of omnipotence, but he suspended the χρῆσις (chrēsis), or full use, of that omnipotence, so that by his death he might reconcile us to God, Romans 5:10.

IV. Whatever nature sustains human infirmities and death itself is to be called impotent rather than omnipotent; The human nature of Christ sustained human infirmities and death itself, etc. Therefore. Resp. Whatever nature sustains human infirmities and death itself out of necessity, and not from a most free will, is not omnipotent. The man Christ assumed human infirmities of his unless he had already then had them, communicated with his human nature? But that he himself had them, as the Son of God, by eternal generation from the nature of the Father, before the world was created, is clear from John 17:5.

(**) Most lucid is the statement by which δύναμις (dynamis, power) itself is also ascribed to Christ, and in such a way that that nature of his is considered, according to which he is the slain lamb, Revelation 5:12. Indeed, what was said most significantly, so that nothing can be above it: ἐνέργεια τοῦ δύνασθαι... τὰ πάντα (energeia tou dynasthai... ta panta, the working of the power... all things), Philippians 3:21. Most openly also, and most plainly, Christ is said to be exalted above all ἀρχή (archē, rule) and ἐξουσία (exousia, authority), and δύναμις (dynamis, power), Ephesians 1:21. But this is attributed to him by reason of that nature by which he himself was raised from the dead (and that is without doubt the human), ibid. v. 20.

own accord, and with a most free will underwent a most bitter death, so that he might perform the mediatorial office and become a victim for our sins. By which act he indeed did not exert the second act of omnipotence, but he did not lack infinite power, as the first act, in the state of emptying.

V. Whoever is subject to another, his power is not infinite; The man Christ is subject to God the Father, 1 Corinthians 15:28. Therefore. Resp. In whatever respect someone is subject to another, in that respect his power is not infinite. Christ with respect to his human nature, considered in itself, is subject to the Father. Therefore, with respect to his human nature, considered in itself, he is not omnipotent; thus we concede the whole argument. Namely, Christ is subject to God the Father according to the act of his human nature, precisely considered, or according to those things which he has from nature as man; he is not subject to the Father as to the act of the person, or according to those things which he has from the personal union.

Question LVII. Was omniscience communicated to the man Christ?

Communication of omniscience. Infinite and truly divine knowledge of all things was communicated to the human nature of Christ, by virtue of the intimate union with the divine nature of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), at the first moment of conception, which knowledge, however, in the state of emptying, he did not always and everywhere use, but freely, when and where he willed.

It is proven. 1) From the testimony of Paul, Colossians 2:3. "In Christ are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." Obf. 1) "All the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" designate the divine all-wisdom and omniscience, which the Apostle calls "the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God," Romans 11:33. 2) These treasures are hidden in Christ according to his humanity, according to which all the fullness of the Godhead dwells in him as its proper temple, v. 9. They are notably said to be "hidden," because Christ in the form of a servant did not bring forth or use these treasures. Whence an argument is born; If in Christ, as man, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden, then certainly Christ, as man, is omniscient; The antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent.

2. From the knowledge of all things ascribed to Christ, John 16:30. "Now we know that you know all things and have no need that anyone should question you." Obf. a) To know all things is the same as to be omniscient. b) The Apostles in their assertion respect not only the divine but also the human nature of Christ, since they say, "now we know that you know all things." That Christ, as God, knew all things was not obscure to the Apostles; but now they had learned by experience that the rays of the inhabiting omniscience shone forth from the mouth and speech of Christ. Cf. John 20:17.

3. From καρδιογνωσία (kardiognōsia), or the inspection of hearts, which the Evangelist John attributes to Christ, ch. 2:24-25. "But Jesus on his part did not entrust himself to them, because he knew all people and needed no one to bear witness about man, for he himself knew what was in man." That these words are said of Christ as man, we prove by this argument; According to which nature Christ, in his earthly and visible conversation, guarded himself from the multitude of weak faith, according to that nature also, by the light of his divine knowledge, he penetrated the recesses of the hearts of those conversing with him; But according to his human nature, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because Jesus, as man, guarded himself from the surrounding multitude of men for this reason, that he inspected their hearts, which were prone to perfidy and fraud.

4. From the administration of the future judgment, John 5:27. "The Father has given the Son authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man." Here the authority to exercise the ecumenical judgment is distinctly attributed to Christ as man. From which we conclude; According to which nature Christ will judge the thoughts, words, and deeds of all men, according to the same he is omniscient; But according to his human nature, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis was formerly that of the Agnoetae, who taught that Christ, according to his human nature, does not know all things in his glory; today it is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who deny that infinite and truly divine knowledge was communicated to the soul of Christ. They rely on the following arguments;

I. He who grows in wisdom and knowledge is not omniscient. But the man Christ, etc. Luke 2:53. Resp. Christ, as man, grew in finite, habitual knowledge, inhering subjectively in the human nature; he did not grow in the omniscience communicated to the soul of Christ by virtue of the personal union, as that which admits no degrees, no increments.

II. The man Christ was ignorant of the day of the last judgment, Mark 13:32, Matthew 24:36. Therefore, omniscience was not communicated to the soul of Christ. Resp. to both: Some of the ancient Fathers expound the words of Christ concerning an economic ignorance, that the son of man did not know the last day not for himself, but for others, i.e., that he did not know the day of the universal judgment, so as not to reveal it to others. But by the same reasoning it could be said of the angels and men, to whom Christ compares himself, that they indeed know the last day for themselves, but not for others, that they do not know it so as not to reveal it. But just as men and angels are naturally ignorant of the final day, so Christ, according to the act of his human nature, and therefore according to his finite and habitual knowledge, was truly ignorant of the day and hour of the universal judgment, which he nevertheless knew according to the act of the person, and therefore according to the omniscience communicated by virtue of the personal union. For Christ exactly and infallibly predicted the signs of the last day, Matthew 24:29, Mark 13:24, Luke 21:25; why would he not also have had the last day itself in full view? But he did not wish to exercise the knowledge personally communicated in the state of emptying at that time when he compared himself with the angels and other men, being about to restrain the curiosity of the disciples who were affecting hyper-angelic knowledge (*). "He sufficiently repressed the apostles," says CHRYSOSTOM, "that they should not learn or seek that which the angels themselves do not know, because they are not superior to the angels and to Christ, considered according to the act of his nature, but are far inferior." Cf. JOANNES ADAMUS OSIANDER's colleg. systemat. part III, On Christ, p. 93.

III. Christ, according to his human nature, was ignorant of certain things; Therefore, according to his human nature he is not omniscient; The antecedent is proven because Christ, as man, was ignorant of the absence of fruit on the fig tree, which is clear from his closer approach to it. He certainly would not have approached the tree more closely if he had known that it lacked fruit, Mark 11:13. He was also ignorant of the location of Lazarus's tomb, John 11:34. Resp. The man Christ, considered according to the properties of human nature, was truly ignorant of certain things. But he exerted the majesty of omniscience not always and everywhere, but when and where he pleased, in the state of emptying.

IV. Christ is said to have been tempted, Hebrews 2:18, ch. 4:15. But temptation belongs to one who is ignorant. Resp. a) Not every temptation belongs to one who is ignorant. How many times was the omniscient God tempted by the Israelites in the desert? b) Temptation contributes not a little to experimental knowledge, which, for the human nature precisely regarded, as to its proper condition, formally competent to it, subjectively inheres in it. But from this, the personally communicated omniscience is not to be denied.

Question LVIII. Was the majesty of omnipresence communicated to the man Christ?

Communication of omnipresence. The Son of God, through the personal union, truly and really communicated the majesty of omnipresence to the human nature assumed into his divine hypostasis, so that it, from the first moment of conception, was most present with the divine nature of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) to all creatures a), and now indeed in the state of glory, the same, having been raised to the right hand of God the Father, operates most presently everywhere, and governs all things in heaven and on earth most powerfully b).

Obs. I. A distinction is made between physical or natural presence, and hyperphysical or supernatural presence. The former is gross, corporeal, extensive, diffusive, and local; the latter is majestic, divine, spiritual, indivisible, and illocal. Not the former, but the latter was communicated to the flesh of Christ through the personal union, namely the same which belongs to the divine nature of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ). Therefore, just as the latter is not extended, expanded, or diffused, so as to be omnipresent; so neither should or can the assumed flesh be said to be co-extended with the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), so as to be omnipresent. For insofar as the human nature is considered in the Word (λόγῳ), in that respect it is certainly as exempt from all place as if there were no place at all; since the hypostasis of the Word (ὑπόστασις τοῦ λόγου), within which the humanity subsists, is no less today outside all places than it once was, when there was as yet no place in the nature of things. For just as with the hypostasis of the Son of God all times are like a certain atom (ἄτομον), a now, or a moment, Psalm 90:4, so before the same hypostasis this universe is like a single speck of dust, or a droplet, Isaiah 40:15, 17. Therefore, in no way is any local extension required for the divine omnipresence communicated to the flesh of Christ.

(*) Not only about to restrain, but also to expiate. For this modesty of our sponsor was thus fitting to the purpose, or end, of the Sacerdotal office, that by this pact he himself might make satisfaction for a most grave sin of men, namely, the affected knowledge of things that do not pertain to them, a most perfect knowledge of all things, which would be entirely equal to the divine, Genesis 3:5, also the foreknowledge of future events, the cognition of which God reserved for himself alone, Acts 1:7, add Mark 13:32.

Obs. II. A distinction is made between the natural and the personal act of the flesh of Christ. The flesh of Christ by a natural act, when Christ walked on this earth, was in a certain place, in the womb of his mother, on the cross, in the tomb, etc., circumscriptively or occupatively; and now also in the state of glory, according to the property of glorified bodies, it is in some celestial place, not indeed circumscriptively, but definitively. But this natural act does not obstruct that personal act, by which it is illocally in the Word (λόγῳ), from which presence all local ideas or concepts must be abstracted. See D. AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS, de commun. idiomat. p. 86.

Obs. III. That which is the omnipresence of the divine nature of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), the same is the omnipresence of the human nature, with a different mode of being. For the divine nature is omnipresent by essence; the human nature is omnipresent by the grace of union. The former is omnipresent formally and immediately; the latter is omnipresent participatively and mediately (by means of the hypostasis and divine nature, of which it has been made a partaker through the hypostatic union and the mutual communion of the united natures). In the same sense, the divine nature of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) is said to be omnipresent essentially; the human nature is said to be omnipresent personally. Cf. GERHARD, exeg.

book IV, On Christ, § 261. But it must be especially noted that "personally" is taken in a twofold sense: a) It notes only the subject, namely that only the person, or hypostasis, is present, but not the human nature; which sense is heterodox; or b) it designates the mode and cause, that the human nature itself is present not from the property of its own nature, but through and on account of the personal union, because and insofar as it subsists in the person of the Son; which sense is that of our church, and is orthodox. See D. CALOV, de persona Christi, p. 106.

Obs. IV. A distinction is made between the intimate and the external presence of the divine and human natures. The intimate presence is that by which the Word (ὁ λόγος) is present to the flesh, and the flesh to the Word, so that neither is the Word outside the flesh, nor the flesh outside the Word. The external presence is that by which the Word together with the flesh, and the flesh together with the Word, is most present to creatures, so that nowhere and never is the Word, after the union was made, where the flesh is not. The external presence is a consequent of the intimate presence, and is inferred from it by an unmovable consequence, as we will now show.

Obs. V. A distinction is made between the external presence, taken ὁλικῶς (holistically), or totally, and taken μερικῶς (meristically), or partially. In the phraseology of scripture, omnipresence taken holistically designates a presence that operates effectively and governs creatures, and since its modes are distinct—because, with respect to some things the presence is of power, to others of grace, to others of glory—it is commonly called modified presence, also the presence of dominion. But omnipresence taken partially notes a bare ἀδιαστασία (adiastasia, non-distance), a substantial proximity or non-distance in essence to all creatures, and is called simple, absolute presence, also the presence of proximity or of non-distance. Cf. D. SCHERZERUS in syst. theol. loc. VIII, de Christo, p. 223.

a. It is proven. That the flesh of Christ in the state of emptying was omnipresent and non-distant from all creatures is confirmed 1) from the perichoristic and indissoluble union of the two natures in Christ. Whatever is united really and actually, by a total and personal union, to that which is present to all creatures, it itself, by virtue of this union, is also non-distantly present to all creatures. But the human nature of Christ, constituted in the state of emptying, is united really and actually, by a total and personal union, to the divine nature, which is present to all creatures. Therefore, the human nature of Christ, constituted in the state of emptying, by virtue of the personal union, was also non-distantly present to all creatures. The major is established; because, where one of the united things is, there also is the other. Whence it is impossible that there be a real union without a real presence of the united things. You say: I. It is not universally true that where one of the united things is, there also is the other. For the human soul is so united to the human head that it is also outside the head in the hands, feet, etc. Resp. We are speaking of a total and adequate union, whose term is one subsistent being (ὁφιστάμενον); the soul and the head are united partially and inadequately. Venerable antiquity compared the union of the divine and human natures with the communion of the soul and body. "Just as the rational soul and the flesh are one man, so God and man are one Christ," says ATHANASIUS in his Creed. Therefore, just as the soul is not outside the body, nor the body outside the soul, saving the natural union; so neither is the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) outside the humanity, nor the humanity outside the divinity, saving the personal union. You say: II. Where one of the united things is, there also is the other, as to intimate presence, but not always as to external presence. Thus the flesh was always present to the Word (λόγῳ), where he existed, yet it does not follow from this that the flesh was present to creatures existing outside the Word (λόγον). Resp. When the external presence is removed, the intimate one is also taken away. For whatever is not non-distantly present there, where the Word (λόγος) is present, that is not even non-distantly present to the Word (λόγῳ) itself. The reason is manifest; because things that differ somewhere, as distant and non-distant, as present and absent, those two are not present to each other in the same place. Therefore, if the Word (ὁ λόγος) is present to creatures somewhere where the flesh is distant from them, there the flesh is not non-distantly present to the present Word, and thus the Word will be outside the flesh. But if the Word (λόγος) is outside the flesh, a διάστημα (diastēma, interval) is given between the divine and human natures of Christ; by which the bond of personal union is dissolved.

2. From the communion of the divine hypostasis. Whatever subsists by a subsistence proximate to all creatures, that also, by virtue of that subsistence, is present to all creatures; But the flesh of Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because, where the hypostasis of the Word (λόγου) is, there also must be the flesh, which is assumed into that hypostasis. For subsistence is not outside the subsisting nature, which it affects and terminates as a mode. It is impossible for a mode to be outside the thing itself of which it is the mode, and for the ultimate act of subsisting to be outside the nature which enjoys that act of subsisting. Surely where someone subsists, there he exists.

3. From the perichoristic communion of the two natures in Christ. In which nature the whole fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily, or as in its own personal temple, to it for this very reason it belongs to be present everywhere in a divine and illocal manner; But in the human nature of Christ, even in the whole state of emptying, the whole fullness of the Godhead dwelt bodily, Colossians 2:9. Therefore. The major is established; because, if the divinity is outside the flesh of Christ, it cannot be said that the whole fullness of the Godhead dwells in the flesh of Christ, or that the whole divinity of the Word (λόγου) is incarnate.

4. From the condition of the composite (συνθέτου) person. The God-man (θεάνθρωπος) person, according to the divine and human natures, is present everywhere; But Christ in every state, both of emptying and of exaltation, is the God-man (θεάνθρωπος). Therefore. The major is clear; wherever the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) is, where the assumed humanity is not, there Christ is not the God-man. But wherever Christ is, he is the God-man. Therefore, nowhere is the divinity of the Word (λόγου) where the humanity is not. Furthermore; If the Word (ὁ λόγος) is anywhere whole outside the flesh, he will certainly be there without flesh (ἄσαρκος); and again; Wherever he is whole in the flesh, he will be there with flesh (ἔνσαρκος). From which it follows that there are two persons in Christ, one simple, the other composite.

5. From the presence of Christ in heaven and on earth. Whoever exists on earth and at the same time is present in heaven, is omnipresent; But the man Christ, emptied, existed on earth and at the same time was present in heaven; Therefore, the man Christ, emptied, existed as omnipresent. The minor is proven from John 3:13. "No one has ascended into heaven except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man who (still) is in heaven." The discourse is about the Son of Man, who was already visibly conspicuous on earth and familiarly engaged in human society, and thus was constituted in the state of emptying. He, after performing the mediatorial office, was to ascend into heaven, from which he had descended by assuming human flesh, and yet he was in heaven, not indeed by a natural presence, but by a personal one.

b. It is proven. That omnipresence modified, or the presence of dominion, belongs to Christ in the state of exaltation, according to his human nature, is gathered 1) from his session at the right hand of God. According to which nature Christ sits at the right hand of God, according to the same he dominates omnipresently (for the right hand of God fills heaven and earth, Psalm 139:7-8); But according to his human nature, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because to sit at the right hand of God is expounded as "to reign," 1 Corinthians 15:25. Therefore, just as the right hand of God is everywhere and everywhere dominates—since in the sacred letters it designates the immense and infinite virtue and power of God, nowhere excluded, nowhere not operative—so to sit at the right hand of God is, by virtue of exaltation, to dominate everywhere with truly immense divine virtue, which cannot even be conceived without omnipresence, since divine dominion is not of one who is absent, but of one who is present.

2. From the royal office of Christ. According to which nature Christ is the king and head of the church, according to the same he is omnipresent; But according to not only the divine but also the human nature, etc. Ephesians 1:22. Therefore. The major is clear; because a divine king rules his subjects presently, and the head is not torn away from its members.

3. From the filling of all things, about which Paul says in Ephesians 4:10. "He who descended is the one who also ascended far above all the heavens, that he might fill all things." Cf. Ephesians 1:22. "(God the Father) put all things under his feet and gave him as head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all." We conclude; According to which nature Christ ascended far above all the heavens, that he might fill all things, according to that nature he is omnipresent, and being most present, governs all things in heaven and on earth; But according to his human nature he ascended far above all the heavens; Therefore. The major is proven; because the effective (ἐνεργητική) or operative presence of God is described by the filling of all things, Jeremiah 23:24, Wisdom 1:7. The minor is clear; because the ascension of Christ is with respect to that nature according to which he could be moved in place, and according to which he suffered and was emptied. You say: From this passage the governing omnipresence of Christ is not validly concluded. For 1) If Christ was also omnipresent in the state of emptying, to what end did he ascend into heaven, that he might fill all things? 2) While Christ is said to have ascended according to his human nature, it is certainly signified that he is absent from us, not that he is everywhere according to his human nature. 3) The filling of all things does not necessarily note omnipresence, but either the fulfillment of prophecies, or the effusion of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, with which he fills the church.

Resp. To 1): In the state of emptying, Christ, as man, was omnipresent by a presence of non-distance, or absolute presence; but the filling of all things notes a modified omnipresence, or a presence of dominion and of unceasing operation, to which the man Christ was at length admitted through exaltation. To 2): The ascension into heaven does not imply an absence from the earth of every kind, but only a visible one. The glorified flesh of Christ ascended into heaven visibly, κατ' οἰκονομίαν (according to dispensation), according to the character or condition of glorified bodies; although in an invisible manner, in the mode of the communicated hypostasis, he was most present to every creature, especially the church, as to his personal act. For the rest, it is so far from being the case that the absence of the flesh of Christ is inferred from the ascension of Christ into heaven, that it is rather validly concluded from it. For Christ ascended into heaven for this reason, that he might fill all things with a most omnipresent dominion. To 3): By the scriptural phrase, "the filling of all things," is designated the operative omnipresence of God, by which God everywhere, especially in the church, operates most efficaciously; for which reason the church is called the body and fullness of him who fills all in all, Ephesians 1:22. But when scripture speaks of the fulfillment of prophecies, it uses this prefix: "that it might be fulfilled what was written." The filling with gifts is not treated here, since Christ is said to fill all things, not only to fill the church. Moreover, when the discourse is about gifts, to the word "to fill" is added a mention of gifts or of grace, see e.g., Colossians 1:9, Philippians 1:11.

4. From the universal power and dominion. As true and certain as it is that all things are subject to Christ according to the flesh, that all authority in heaven and on earth has been given, so also true and certain is it that the majesty of omnipresence has been communicated to the same; But it is most true and most certain, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because Christ would not have all things subject to himself unless all places were also subject to him; nor would he exercise full authority over all things subject to him in heaven and on earth unless he were most present to them. The minor is clear from Psalm 8:7, 1 Corinthians 15:27, Ephesians 1:22, Matthew 28:18.

5. From the universal cooperation of Christ, who cooperates everywhere with the sacred preachers, about which Mark 16:20 says, "And they went out and preached everywhere, while the Lord worked with them and confirmed the message by accompanying signs." Whoever cooperates with the Apostles, who are preaching everywhere, is omnipresent; But the man Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because the cooperation of Christ is not of one who is absent, but of one who is most present. The minor is clear; because in the cited passage, the discourse is of the Lord who ascended and was received into heaven.

6. From the promise of Christ, which is had in Matthew 18:20, "For where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them," and ch. 28:20, "And behold, I am with you all the days, even to the end of the age." From which we argue: Whoever is in the midst of all the members of the church, wherever they are gathered in the name of Christ, all the days until the end of the age, is omnipresent;

But Christ according to both natures, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; since the members of the church are dispersed throughout the entire globe. He who is present to all of them must be omnipresent. You say: Christ is in the midst of the members of the church according to his divine nature, because 1) the pronoun "I" indeed notes the person, but it must be restricted to the divine nature, as in John 8:58; 2) because here the concern is not with the presence of the body, but of the spirit and of grace; 3) the promise of Christ is to be understood of a special or gracious presence, not of omnipresence. I respond a) generally. The one who promised is Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), who, wherever he is present, there is present not only his divine but also his human nature, unless the personal union is to be dissolved; just as, where the whole person of Abraham is, there is not only the body but also the soul of Abraham. The thing promised is a gracious presence in the midst of the faithful, which pertains to the mediatorial and royal office of Christ, which Christ discharges according to both natures. The promise was made to those who are gathered in the name of Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου), so that we may acknowledge, invoke, and venerate him not only as God but also as man, our redeemer. Therefore, Christ is present in the midst of Christians not only according to the divine but also the human nature. Resp. b) Specifically to 1): The passage John 8:58 is cited impertinently. For there, pre-existence before Abraham is predicated of the Word before incarnation (λόγῳ ἁσάρκῳ); but we assert that the incarnate Christ (ἐνσαρκον) is omnipresent according to both natures. To 2): The presence of grace and of the spirit does not exclude the body or the human nature of Christ. The context (συνάφεια) of verses 19 and 20 teaches this. "Whatever two or three of you shall ask in my name, it will be done for them by my Father"; Reason: "because I am in the midst of them." Whence we argue: According to which nature Christ makes the prayers of the faithful acceptable and valid to God, according to that nature he is present to them. But he makes the prayers of the faithful acceptable and valid to God as much according to the divine as the human nature (because he performs this as mediator between God and men according to both natures); Therefore. To 3): From a special presence, a universal one is rightly inferred. For the presence of grace presupposes the presence of power, just as well-being presupposes being. Christ could not be present to the faithful with special grace, wherever they are gathered in his name, unless he were omnipresent.

7. From the invocation of Christ. Christ is to be invoked according to both natures (which we are now about to demonstrate); Therefore, Christ is omnipresent according to both natures. No one of sound mind invokes one who is absent, who neither hears prayers nor is present to help. Whence Holy Scripture closely connects religious worship with the divine presence, Deuteronomy 4:7, Psalm 91:15, Psalm 145:18.

8. From the sacramental presence. Whosoever body and blood is truly and really present in the Holy Eucharist is present in the whole world; for the Holy Supper can be dispensed in the entire world; But the body and blood of Christ is truly and really present in the Holy Eucharist; Therefore.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians. Their more important arguments are:

I. Whatever is not immense and infinite is not omnipresent. But the flesh of Christ is not immense and infinite; Therefore. The major is evident; because immensity is the root of omnipresence, which an infinite nature enjoys. Resp. Whatever is not immense and infinite is not omnipresent by essence; I grant. But the flesh of Christ is said to be omnipresent not by essence, but by the grace of union and communication, because it subsists in the hypostasis of the Word (τοῦ λόγου), which is immense and infinite.

II. Of those things whose omnipresence is the same, their divine essence is the same (because the latter does not really differ from the former); But in the mind of the evangelical doctors, the omnipresence of the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) and of the assumed humanity is the same. Therefore, in the mind of the evangelical doctors, the essence of the divinity and of the humanity is the same, which to assert is Eutychian. Resp. 1) by an instance; Of those things whose infinite hypostasis is the same, their divine essence is the same, because the latter does not really differ from the former. But of the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) and of the assumed humanity, the infinite hypostasis is the same. Therefore, of the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) and of the assumed humanity, the essence is the same. The Pontificians concede the minor. Whatever, therefore, they will respond to the Socinians, we will reply to them. 2) Of those things whose omnipresence is the same, as an essential property, their divine essence is the same; I grant. But of the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) and of the assumed flesh, the omnipresence is the same, as an essential property of both; I deny. For omnipresence remains an essential property of the divine nature, although through the hypostatic union it has been communicated to the human for common possession, use, and denomination.

III. Every natural body is in one place; The body of Christ is a natural body. Therefore. Resp. a) Generally; The conclusion of this argument is drawn from theology, and the major proposition, on which the syllogism chiefly rests, is taken from physics. Therefore, a μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος (a transition into another genus) is committed. b) Specifically α) to the major, I distinguish between being locatable and being in one place. Every body is locatable, i.e., it can be in one place; but infinite power of God can separate actual location from it. β) To the minor, I distinguish between a natural body by reason of substance, and by reason of qualities or inherent properties. The body of Christ is indeed natural by reason of substance; but it is not natural by reason of its singular and hyperphysical affections, but is far superior to them, because it is a body most eminently glorified, assumed into the divine hypostasis, and exalted to the throne of the divine right hand and majesty; whence it is not to be judged concerning the same according to the rules or laws of physics.

IV. The Lutheran opinion concerning the omnipresence communicated to the flesh of Christ subverts three most grave articles of faith; 1) concerning the truth of the flesh of Christ; 2) concerning the death of Christ; 3) concerning his ascension into heaven. Therefore, the Lutheran opinion concerning the omnipresence communicated to the flesh of Christ is not to be tolerated in the church. The antecedent is proven; because a true human nature cannot be extended to infinity, so as to be omnipresent. Secondly, he who is omnipresent cannot die, because by death the union of body and soul is dissolved. But if Christ is omnipresent, his soul was always there where his body was; Therefore, that union was not dissolved, and consequently Christ did not die. Furthermore, if Christ is omnipresent by virtue of the personal union, he was certainly in heaven and on earth before his ascension into heaven. But if he was in heaven before the ascension, how could he ascend into it? Resp. No article of faith is subverted by the Lutheran opinion concerning the omnipresence communicated to the flesh of Christ. The article 1) concerning the truth of the flesh of Christ is not undermined by the same, since it is not omnipresent by a physical and extensive presence, but by a hyperphysical, divine, and illocal one, which belongs to it not formally and through itself, but participatively and by the grace of the personal union. 2) The article concerning the death of Christ is not overturned; For by death the natural union of the body and soul was indeed dissolved, yet the hypostatic union of the divine and human natures remained safe; just as when a soldier unsheathes his sword, holding the sword in one hand and the sheath in the other, the union of the sheath and the sword is indeed dissolved, yet nevertheless both this and that remain joined with the soldier. 3) The article concerning the ascension of Christ is not subverted; For before the ascension, the flesh of Christ was present in heaven by a presence of non-distance, as to its personal act; but κατ' οἰκονομίαν (by dispensation), with his glorified body he ascended visibly into heaven, that he might fill all things with the omnipresence of dominion. For Christ by his divine omnipotence can make himself present in different ways.

V. Whoever is a true man, and yet omnipresent, must be present in all jugs, dishes, and sordid places; But the man Christ is not in all, etc. Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between a physical and a hyperphysical presence; The former implies inclusion in a certain place, not the latter. The Holy Spirit is omnipresent, yet a pious mind shudders to assert that the Holy Spirit is in all jugs, etc.

VI. Christ in the state of emptying progressed from place to place; Therefore, in the state of emptying he was not omnipresent. Resp. I distinguish between the natural and the personal act of the man Christ. The former flows from the properties of the human nature, and is common to Christ, as man, with all men, except for sin; The latter is said to be that which befell the human nature of Christ alone from its intimate assumption into the hypostasis of the Word (τοῦ λόγου). The emptied Christ progressed from place to place, as to his natural act, but yet he was omnipresent, as to his personal act.

VII. If Christ in the state of emptying was omnipresent, he was conceived in the wombs of all women, crucified on all mountains, buried in all tombs; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. The same predicates do not belong everywhere to him who is everywhere, since he can exert a peculiar act in a peculiar place. Hence you would wrongly conclude; The omnipresent God gave his law on Mount Sinai; Therefore, he sanctioned and promulgated it on all mountains. The omnipresent Holy Spirit appeared in a dove over the baptized Christ; Therefore, he showed himself to be seen in all doves. For the rest, that Christ, conceived, lay in the womb of one virgin, was crucified on one mountain, this is to be referred to the natural act of the man Christ, but the personal omnipresence of the man Christ is not therefore to be denied.

VIII. Scripture distinctly testifies that the man Christ is not everywhere: a) Matthew 26:11. "You will not always have me." b) John 16:28. "I am leaving the world." c) "I am glad that I was not there," John 11:15. d) The angel says: "He is not here, but has risen," Luke 24:6. Resp. 1) In general. From the negation of a special and modified presence, to the negation of a general and absolute presence is not a valid consequence. 2) In specie. Resp. to a); Christ says: "you will not always have me," namely in a humble and servile state, so that you can relieve my indigence and anoint me in prefiguration of my death. To b); Christ left the world by withdrawing his visible presence from it, which world, however, having been raised to the right hand of God the Father, he governs most presently in an invisible manner. To c); I distinguish between κτήσις (ktēsis, possession) and χρῆσις (chrēsis, use), or between the majesty and the exercise of the effective (ἐνεργητικῆς) or operative presence. Christ, as to both natures, had been invisibly present in the house of Mary and Martha, but had abstained from the exercise of his operative presence, by not keeping Lazarus safe and immune from the power of death. To d); Christ was not in the tomb locally and visibly, according to the mode of a dead body; for according to that mode the women sought to anoint the body, and did not find it, Luke 24:3.

IX. He whom heaven contains is not omnipresent; But Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Acts 3:21, ὃν δεῖ οὐρανὸν μὲν δεῖξασθαι (hon dei ouranon men dexasthai), "whom heaven must receive"; and therefore, as Peter testifies, heaven contains and comprehends Christ, so that he cannot be everywhere. Resp. The relative pronoun ὃν (hon, whom) refers to Christ, who is the subject of this sentence, but the remaining words, οὐρανὸν μὲν δεῖξασθαι (ouranon men dexasthai), comprise the predicate, to designate the majestic occupation, possession, and governance of the heavenly kingdom, not, however, a local containment or inclusion. For Christ so occupied heaven that, ascending above all the heavens, he fills all things in heaven and on earth with a most present dominion, Matthew 28:18, Ephesians 1:20. That Christ is not contained by heaven is clear from the fact that after his ascension into heaven he appeared several times in his true body, and was seen by Paul four times: on the road to Damascus, Acts 9:3; in the city of Corinth, Acts 18:9-10; in the camp at Jerusalem, Acts 23:11; in the Roman court, 2 Timothy 4:17; and also by Stephen, Acts 7:55.

X. Christ is not a priest on earth, Hebrews 8:4. Therefore, he is not omnipresent. Resp. The words of the Apostle are: "For if he were on earth, he would not be a priest." By which words, not simply the place is excluded, but the state of the earthly priesthood, so that the sense is: If Christ were on earth, or an earthly and typical priest, he would not be a priest sufficient for our redemption. Christ certainly functioned as a priest on earth, but he is not an earthly and typical priest, such as are those Levitical priests who serve a copy and shadow of the heavenly things, v. 5.

XI. Christ is to come in his body for judgment on the last day, Acts 1:11. Therefore, before the last day he is not present to us who are living on earth in his body. Resp. The advent of Christ to judgment will not be a local transition from some higher place to some lower place, but a visible appearance in a certain place, namely on a cloud, where he will place the throne of his visible judgment. Therefore, the return of Christ to judgment is called ἐπιφάνεια τῆς παρουσίας (epiphaneia tēs parousias), "the appearance of his presence," 2 Thessalonians 2:8, to imply that Christ, by reason of his human nature, is by no means absent from us, even if his presence does not appear.

XII. Operation cannot be separated from divine presence; Therefore, if the emptied flesh emptied itself of operation, it could not be present to all creatures by the divine presence. Resp. 1) by an instance; Divine operation cannot be separated from divine omnipotence (creatures existing). Therefore, if the emptied flesh emptied itself of divine operation; Therefore, it was not omnipotent in the state of emptying; which is absurd. 2) The divine presence cannot be separated from operation in him who is present by nature, or by a natural act; but it can well be in him who is present only by the grace of union, or by a personal act. Instance; Christ, as an emptied man, abdicated the use

(χρῆσει) of omnipresence and retained its possession (κτῆσιν). Resp. The use (χρῆσις) can be absent from a modified presence, or presence of dominion, but not from an absolute presence, or presence of proximity. For whoever possesses and retains proximity is altogether proximate. You should not understand by χρῆσις the act, and by κτῆσις the potency. For just as the emptied flesh was united to the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) in act, not only in potency; so also it was present in act, not only in potency, wherever the Word (ὁ λόγος) was. The words of LUTHER, which are recounted in the Formula of Concord, p. 784, are most worthy of remembrance. "There are not in Christ two separate persons, but there is only one person. Wherever it is, there is only one and undivided person." And wherever you should rightly say, "here is God," there you must confess and say: "Therefore, Christ the man is also present." And if you were to show some place in which God alone was, but not the man, the person would immediately be divided. For then I could rightly say: "here is that God who is not a man, and who has never yet been made man."

Question LIX. Is the religious worship of adoration communicated to the human nature of Christ?

Communication of adorability. To the human nature of Christ, subsisting in the person of the Son of God, the religious worship of adoration has been communicated through the hypostatic union, so that the flesh of Christ the mediator is to be venerated and adored with the same adoration as the divine nature in the Word (τῷ λόγῳ).

Obs. I. We are not here speaking of civil worship, nor of some intermediate worship between civil and religious, but of religious worship.

Obs. II. We do not assert that the flesh of Christ is to be adored separately, and as a separate nature, but as a nature that has its subsistence (ὑποστᾶσαν), subsisting in the person of the Son of God.

For the adequate object of divine adoration, by which Christ is worshipped, is not the human nature in Christ alone, but the whole God-man (θεάνθρωπος) person, adorable according to both natures, so that the worship of adoration, which is offered to him, terminates in both natures.

Here the definition of the Council of Ephesus, anathema VIII, must be accurately observed.

"If anyone does not venerate Emmanuel with one supplication, and render one glorification, because the Word was made flesh, let him be anathema."

Therefore, we are bound to follow Christ with one glory of adoration, according to his divine and human nature; not to co-adore the man assumed by God the Word.

This is likewise explained by the Blessed CYRIL, the author of the anathemas, in On the Right Faith to the Queens and in Defense of the Anathemas. "8. If anyone says that the flesh of our Lord is unadorable, as that of a man, and not to be adored, as the flesh of the Lord and God, the holy and catholic church anathematizes him."

Obs. III. The human nature of Christ is not to be adored in itself, on account of some subjectively inherent excellence, nor, however, even accidentally, just as those venerating a king accidentally venerate his purple robe and crown, but on account of the indwelling of the fullness of the divinity, of which the human nature of Christ is the proper temple and the hypostatically united, and therefore most suitable (ἑνχρησόν), organ.

Proof I. By the words of Christ, John V, 22-23: "For the Father judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son, that all may honor the Son, just as they honor the Father."

From this we argue: According to the nature by which God the Father gave the Son the power of executing judgment, according to that same nature the Son of God is to be afforded the same worship of honor as the Father, i.e., truly divine; But it is according to the human nature, etc. Therefore.

II. By apostolic testimony, Philippians II, 9: "God has highly exalted Jesus Christ and given him the name that is above every name, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." From which apostolic testimony we conclude:

According to the nature by which Christ received the name above every name, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, according to that nature he is to be religiously adored; But it is according to the human nature, etc. Therefore.

III. By his mediatorial office. Christ is to be invoked as mediator, Apocalypse V, 8. But Christ is our mediator according to both natures. Therefore, he is to be invoked according to both natures.

IV. By the unity of person. The whole person of Christ is to be adored, John V, 22-23. The whole person of Christ is both of his natures; Therefore, both natures of Christ are to be adored. The minor premise is clear; because the person is not a third thing, different from the two natures, but the two natures are the person itself. For Christ is not εἰς ἑτέρων ἑτερόν τι (something different from other things), but εἰς ἀμφοῖν τὰ αὐτὰ (the same things from both), DAMASCENUS book 3, ch. 4.

You say: The whole Christ is to be adored, but not the whole of Christ. Just as those venerating a king robed in purple and crowned do not look to the king's purple or crown, but to his majesty, although they do not separate the crown and purple from it; so in religious worship, the humanity of Christ is not to be regarded, but his divinity, although the humanity is not to be segregated from it.

Resp. The given analogy does not fit. For the king and the purple cohere by an external, parochoristic, and accidental union; the two natures of Christ are joined by an internal, perichoristic, and personal union. Therefore, just as those venerating a king honor both the soul and the body of the king, so those venerating Christ adore both his divinity and his humanity.

V. By the communication of idioms. Whichever nature of Christ is a participant in omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, that one is a participant in divine adorability. But the human nature of Christ is, etc. Therefore.

VI. From the examples of angels, Psalm XCVII, 7, Hebrews I, 6; of the elect in the church triumphant, Apocalypse V, 12; and of the faithful in the church militant, Matthew II, 11, ch. VIII, 2, ch. V, 22, etc., who adored and invoked Christ the man.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who attribute to Christ, as a man, not the highest and truly divine worship, but one inferior to the divine. Their arguments are:

I. Whoever is not God is not to be adored; Christ the man is not God. Therefore.

Resp. Whoever is not God, neither essentially nor personally, is not to be adored; But Christ the man is God personally.

II. God will not give his glory to another, Isaiah XLII, 8. Therefore, not to the flesh of Christ.

Resp. God will not give his glory to another person existing outside of God, whether this be a true or a fictitious person, like an idol. But the human nature of Christ is neither a person, nor does it exist outside of God, but pertains to the person of the Word Incarnate (λόγῳ ἐνσάρκα). For there is not in Christ ἄλλος καὶ ἄλλος (another and another, i.e., a different person), but ἄλλο καὶ ἄλλο (another and another, i.e., a distinct nature).

III. Cursed is he who trusts in man, Jeremiah XVII, 5.

Resp. Cursed is he who trusts in a mere man (ψιλανθρώπων). Christ is the deified God-man (θεάνθρωπος), or a partaker of divinity.

IV. Christ the man is our fellow servant, Isaiah LIII, 11. Therefore, he is not to be adored.

Resp. In that passage, Christ in his state of humiliation is called the servant of the Father on account of his voluntary subjection and obedience even unto death, but he is nowhere in the sacred letters called our fellow servant.

V. Whoever adores him who by nature is not God, they are idolaters: Whoever adores Christ the man, adores him who by nature is not God: Therefore. The major premise is from Paul, Galatians IV, 8. The minor is clear: because Christ the man, although personally called God, is not by nature God.

Resp. The Apostle in that passage speaks of the personal and adequate object of adoration, which is not the human nature of Christ; yet this is part of that adequate object, spoken of analogically, because with the Son of God it makes one composite person (σύνθετον), to be adored according to both natures.

Objection: Thus it will be that Christ is worshipped with a double adoration; because one terminates on the human nature, the other on the divine.

Resp. The adoration is not twofold, but one and indivisible, because in religious worship we behold the human nature of Christ not separately, but conjointly, so that our adoration terminates on Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπον), Immanuel and the giant of twofold substance, in one person.

Question LX. What is to be observed concerning the idiomatic predications pertaining to the second kind of communication of idioms?

To be observed in these predications are their a) quality, b) subject, c) predicate, d) foundation, e) difference from other idiomatic propositions.

Obs. a. The predications of this second kind are not synonymic, but paronymic. Hence you would wrongly say: The human nature of Christ is God. The reason is: because a synonymic predication argues and presupposes an essential agreement of the predicate with the subject; and therefore it has no place in a communication that is κατὰ συνδύασιν (by combination), but only in a communication κατὰ μέθεξιν (by participation). DAMASCENUS, in book III of On the Orthodox Faith, ch. 17, calls the flesh of Christ, with CYRIL, GREGORY NAZIANZEN, and other ancient writers, ἀποθεωθεῖσαν, deified, and adds this exposition: the flesh of Christ is deified, not κατὰ μεταβολὴν φύσεως, ἢ τροπὴν ἢ ἀλλεῖωσιν, ἢ σύγχυσιν (according to a transmutation, conversion, alteration, or confusion of nature), but κατὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν (according to the economy), the hypostatic union, and κατὰ τὴν περιχώρησιν (according to the perichoresis), the mutual indwelling of the natures.

BASIL THE GREAT, in On the Incarnation of the Word, says: The human flesh of the Lord was made a partaker of the Godhead. Cf. D. CHEMNITZ, De Duabus Naturis, ch. 25, fols. 152, 165. D. CALOVIUS, De Persona Christi, pp. 168, 170.

Obs. b. The subject of these predications is the person of the Word Incarnate (λόγῳ ἐνσάρκα), stated sometimes by a concrete term of the person, e.g., "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me (Christ)," Matthew XXVIII, 18; sometimes by a concrete term of the human nature, e.g., "The Son of Man has authority to forgive sins," Mark II, 10; sometimes by a more abstract term, e.g., "The flesh of Christ is life-giving," John VI, 51. The flesh, however, is the subject of divine excellences not in a primary, immediate, and formal sense, which is the divine nature of the Word (τοῦ λόγου); but in a secondary, mediate, and participative sense. Whence I explain this proposition, "The flesh of Christ is omnipotent," thus: The flesh of Christ is omnipotent not formally, but participatively; not immediately, but mediately (through the medium of the divine nature); not by essence, but by the grace of the personal union.

Obs. c. The predicate of these propositions is not abstract, but concrete, because of the paronymic mode of predication. The human nature of Christ is not called omnipotence, because this is and remains an essential property of the divinity; but to the human nature it is communicated only as a divine and most sublime gift, out of the grace of the union.

Obs. d. The foundation of these predications is the personal union and the intimate communion of the divine and human natures. For since the human flesh of the Lord was made a partaker of the Godhead, as BASIL says, it is also a partaker of all the divine idioms, which do not really differ from the Godhead itself.

Obs. e. The predications of this second kind differ from the idiomatic propositions of the first kind of communication of idioms; because the subject of the latter is never abstract, but always concrete, e.g., Holy Scripture does not say that the deity shed its own blood; whereas the subject of the former can also be abstract (*). The first kind is reciprocal and alternately admits divine and human predicates; but the predicates of the second kind are only divine idioms. When divine idioms are predicated of the Son of Man in the first kind, they are asserted of the divine nature, to which they formally belong, e.g., "the Son of Man is before Abraham," namely, according to his divine nature; but in the second kind, the divine idioms are considered as they belong to the human nature communicatively or inhabitatively. The predications of this second kind differ from the idiomatic propositions of the third kind; because the subject of the latter is the person of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) considered according to both natures; but the subject of the former is the person of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) considered according to the human nature. The predicates of the third kind are ἀποτελέσματα, or works of his office; but the predicates of the second kind are divine idioms, with which the human nature is endowed to become a suitable organ (ὄργανον ἑυχρησόν) for performing the works of the mediatorial office.

(*) A certain distinction is needed. Namely, the Abstract is one thing in mind and thought (logically so called); another in reality itself (really). The former is such a mode of thinking by which our mind discerns a thing, which is in and inheres in a subject, from it; the latter, however, is a separation, by which the thing is indeed absent from the subject. Theologians use this word in this place in the former way, but by no means in the latter. For the human nature of Christ is never separated from its subject, nor is it ever outside the divine nature in Christ, although in our thought it can and should be considered in itself separately. Therefore, it is not permissible to speak thus: the human nature, separated from its subject, is in itself everywhere present, all-powerful, all-knowing (for that would be a real abstract). But this is what we profess: The human nature of Christ, which and insofar as it is in Christ, is indeed always and everywhere (which is a logical Abstract). This opinion is found in our Formula of Concord and its declaration, chapter VIII, p. 776, signified in these words: "finally, Scripture in this matter not only makes mention of the Son of Man in general, but as if it points a finger at the assumed human nature, when it says: the blood of Christ, the Son of God, cleanses us from all sin." Thus the flesh of Christ is life-giving... Therefore, that this Abstract is not real, but logical, is there declared with sufficient clarity, both by the addition of this word, "assumed," and by the copious explanation a little before, on pages 773 ff., where it is most plainly written that the human nature, so abstractly called, is to be understood as none other than that which is in the person of Christ. To be compared with these is the general preface, prefixed to the symbolical books, §. "As for the phrases," etc. In which way the disputes between TILEMANN HESHUSIUS on the one hand, and JOHANN WIGAND on the other, were not difficult to resolve, about which see the esteemed JOHANN GEORG WALCH's Introduction to the Symbolical Books, p. 836. But already before that time, the Württemberg theologians had disputed against the Crypto-Calvinists about the use of the abstract, as is mentioned ibid, p. 834. What was debated on this matter in the Colloquy of Kassel, see in the aforementioned WALCH's Introduction to the Controversies in the Evangelical Church, Part I, p. 290 ff. We are indeed pleased with the modesty of the theologians, in the Blessed HUTTER's Concordia concors, ch. XI, p. 680, where these words are read: "1) That they compel no one to use these phrases, provided it remains firm that Christ according to his human nature was made a partaker of the divine majesty, 2) that before the unlearned multitude they do not use those phrases, 3) nor wish to use them elsewhere, unless necessity should require it." But these last words declare why we ought not to abstain entirely from the use of the name "abstract," namely when we must counter the errors of the followers of CALVIN, especially the Crypto-Calvinists, who deny the true and real communication of divine properties and perfections to the human nature in Christ, and with the intention that from this they may draw the conclusion: that the body and blood of Christ are not truly and really present in the most holy supper.

Question LXI. What is the third kind of communication of idioms?

Third kind of communication of idioms.

The third kind of communication of idioms is when in the actions of his office each nature of Christ does what is proper to it, with the communication of the other in acting.

Obs. I. This third kind of C.I. is called by CYRIL κοινοποιία, also κοινοποιήσις, a communion of operations. The reason for this denomination may be sought from the Declaration of the F.C. p. 773. "As for the matters of the office of Christ, the person does not act and operate in, or, with one, or through one nature only, but rather in, with, according to, and through both natures." By DAMASCENUS it is called κοινωνία ἀποτελεσμάτων, communion of the works of his office; because each nature of Christ in the actions of his office acts not dividedly, but conjointly and unitedly to produce one ἀποτέλεσμα, which is referred to both natures. (**).

Obs. II. Our definition is taken from the canon of the Council of Chalcedon: "Each form (i.e., each nature in the person of Christ) acts with the communication of the other, what is proper to itself, the Word of course operating what is of the Word; and the flesh executing what is of the flesh." Because this ecumenical council not only expressly names this kind κοινωνίαν, but also adds that each nature in Christ acts μετὰ κοινωνίας, with the communication of the other, which is ἴδιον, proper, to each nature, therefore this kind is rightly called κοινωνία τῶν ἰδίων, i.e., communication of idioms, taking the name of idioms in a broader sense.

(**) And so this name, ἀποτέλεσμα, is accustomed to be used in a broader sense. For otherwise, taken more strictly, it denotes not just any action, but the completion of a work, for the accomplishment of which several conjoined actions are required. In which sense that would at last be a ἀποτέλεσμα, strictly so called, when the dying Christ pronounced: τετέλεσται. Most worthy of note is the saying of James I, 15. This is a great comfort to us. Thus indeed, by the benefit of Christ, we enjoy such great felicity that, escaping the ἀποτέλεσμα of sin, we embrace with firm confidence the ἀποτέλεσμα of our Savior O. M. Between ἐνέργημα and ἀποτέλεσμα there is this difference, that ἐνέργημα is indeed each single action, but ἀποτέλεσμα is the completed business, to the resolution of which all actions pertain. In order that Christ might perform the duties of a sponzor, many actions were required, closely connected among themselves, but especially an infinite price, necessary for the reconciliation and eternal salvation of all men, both to be recovered and to be imparted to each one. From this it is easily understood what in each of Christ's offices is ἐνέργημα, and what is ἀποτέλεσμα. In the priestly office (as far as its first part, the offering of the sacrifice to God) each of those things which Christ performed, both in doing and in suffering, is an ἐνέργημα, but the expiation of sins, completed through all those actions and sufferings of evils, is the ἀποτέλεσμα, John XVII, 4. ἐτελείωσα, I have finished the work commanded to me. Add. V. 19. Hebrews X, 10. In the prophetic office, each voice of Christ, and also each miracle, is an ἐνέργημα, but the whole doctrine, and the correction of men, effected through the power of all the words and miracles, is the ἀποτέλεσμα. In the kingly office, the individual acts pertaining to the governing of the church are ἐνεργήματα, but the universal government itself, and its effect and fruit, namely the preservation and blessedness of the church, is the ἀποτέλεσμα. But, by established custom, the word ἀποτέλεσμα has a broader scope, so that it contains within its compass any action common to both natures, considered individually. Ἐνέργημα, however, in a stricter sense, is called the effect proper to one or the other nature. And indeed, every single action of Christ, where neither nature does anything without the communication of the other, is by its own right called an ἀποτέλεσμα, certainly for this reason, because each of those actions is in no way deficient, but has that perfection which is required for this act.

Question LXII. What is to be observed for distinctly understanding the third kind of communication of idioms?

In this third kind of communication of idioms, there are to be observed and diligently distinguished the principle of acting, the action itself, the term of the action, the communication of each nature, the foundation of the communication.

Question LXIII. What is the principle of acting?

The principle of acting is either quod (that which) or quo (by which). The principle which operates (in Greek ἐνεργῶν) is the whole God-man (θεάνθρωπος) person, God and man a). The principle by which the official action is performed (in Greek ἐνεργητικὸν) is both natures of Christ, divine and human b).

Proof a. Since actions and passions belong to their suppositis, the actions of his office are attributed to Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπον), with sacred scripture leading the way. For thus says Paul, Ephesians V, 2: "Christ gave himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a fragrant aroma," and Galatians II, 13: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us."

Proof b. The principle by which the actions of the priestly, royal, and prophetic offices are carried out is both natures of Christ; and indeed the divine nature is the original principle, to which infinite power of acting formally belongs; but the human nature is the organic principle, with respect to the divine operations, e.g., redemption, satisfaction, salvation, etc. For it acts as an instrument personally united with the divine nature, by the divine power communicated to it through the hypostatic union. But the same human nature of Christ is the formal principle, with respect to its own actions and passions, e.g., speaking, the shedding of blood, etc.

Obs. I. When the human nature of Christ is called the organ or instrument of the actions of the mediatorial office, this is to be understood in a most eminent sense, so that the name of instrument is cut off from all imperfection. For it is not a separate instrument, as a window is when the sun shines through; not inanimate, like the axe or hammer of a craftsman; not inactive (ἄνεργον), like the staff of Moses; but it is an instrument most closely and personally united, and cooperative (σύνεργον). It is a living organ, just as the members of the body are living organs of the soul, acting through them. It is not a brute instrument, like the talking donkey of Balaam; but intelligent; not common, like any minister of the church; but most singular and without parallel.

Obs. II. There is a huge difference between Christ the man, and the Prophets and Apostles, who also performed miracles, and are called vessels and organs of God. For the Word (ὁ λόγος) operated in the flesh, as in its own temple; with the flesh, as personally united; through the flesh, as a most effective and singularly cooperative instrument; according to the flesh, as a subject partaking of divine majesty. From this it follows that the flesh of Christ is rightly called life-giving, his hand omnipotent, his eye all-seeing, his blood cleansing from sin. On the other hand, Christ operated in Paul, who was united not personally, but accidentally; not through Paul as a most singular instrument, but as a common one; much less according to Paul, as a subject partaking of divine omnipotence. Wherefore, the flesh of Paul is not to be called life-giving, nor his hand omnipotent, nor his eye all-seeing.

Question LXIV. Are the ἐνέργειαι, the powers of acting and operations, of the two natures of Christ therefore distinct?

In the mediatorial office, the ἐνέργειαι, the powers of acting and operations, of the divine and human natures in Christ are distinct, but not separate. Therefore, in carrying out the threefold office, each nature does τὸ ἴδιον, what is proper to it.

Proof 1) Generally: Just as the two natures of Christ, personally united, are and remain really distinct; so also they act distinctly, but not dividedly. "Of whom the nature is distinct, of them also the operation is distinct," says DAMASCENUS in book III of On the Orthodox Faith, ch. 9.

Proof 2) In the priestly office the flesh suffers, obeys, intercedes; the divine nature wills the obedience, does not repel the force inflicted, sustains the human nature, lest it succumb, adds infinite force, momentum, price, value. In the royal office the divine nature rules all things most presently; the human nature understands with a conscious mind, wills the same things, sees with a human eye, will call forth the dead on the last day. In the prophetic office the human nature embraces the divine counsels, wills, executes, speaks, preaches, offers its mouth, hand, body for miracles; the divine nature brings forth the counsels from the bosom of the Father, by its own infinite power performs miracles and casts out demons. Conf. DANNHAVER in Hodosophia Phenomenon IX. p. 674.

Question LXV. What is the terminus of the divine and human ἐνέργεια?

The terminus of the ἐνέργεια is the work flowing from it, and it is either an ἐνέργημα or an ἀποτέλεσμα. An ἐνέργημα is an effect proper to one nature a). An ἀποτέλεσμα is a common effect resulting from the intimate and communicative confluence and efficacious influx of both natures, divine and human b).

Proof a. The effect of the human nature is the shed blood; The effect of the divine nature is the value and price of the blood.

Proof b. "The blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, which cleanses us from our sins," 1 John I, 7, is an ἀποτέλεσμα, a work common to both natures, divine and human. It is called by DAMASCENUS a θεανδρικὸν work, God-manly, or divine-human. Indeed, the official actions themselves are commonly called θεανδρικοί, God-manly, because Christ acts in the mediatorial office as both God (θεός) and man (άνηρ).

Question LXVI. By what mode of communicating do the divine and human natures flow together for theandric action?

The mode of communication and mutual confluence consists in this, that the divine nature in the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) not only performs divine works, but also truly and really appropriates to itself the actions of the assumed flesh; while the human nature acts in the office of mediator not only according to its natural powers, but also according to that divine power which it has communicated to it from the personal union.

Proof 1) Generally from the rule of the Council of Chalcedon: "Each nature in Christ acts what is proper to it, with the communication of the other." Which κοινωνία is not accomplished by a divine concurrence with the action of Christ the man; because God concurs with the actions of all men, who act according to their natural powers, and yet a theandric work does not result from this; but a real κοινωνία of the natures in acting is also required, from which comes the divine-human action, as from a flaming sword there is a burning cut and a cutting burn.

Proof 2) Specifically. When St. Paul in Acts XX, 28 asserts that "God purchased the church with his own blood," he not obscurely implies that the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) appropriated to itself the shedding of the blood which flowed from the flesh of Christ; and when Christ teaches that "God the Father has given him authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man," John V, 27, he clearly indicates that the assumed human nature concurs in the execution of the universal judgment, not only according to its natural powers, but also according to the divine power given by the Father to the flesh of Christ.

DAMASCENUS illustrates this excellently in book III of On the Orthodox Faith, ch. 17: "Not according to its own operation, but on account of the Word united to it, did it (the Lord's flesh) perform divine things, the Word manifesting through it its own proper operation. For ignited iron also burns, not possessing the burning operation by its natural reason, but obtaining it from the union of fire and iron. Therefore, the Lord's flesh itself was mortal on its own account, and life-giving on account of its hypostatic union to the Word."

Question LXVII. What is the foundation of this communication of theandric operations?

The remote foundation of this communication is the unity of the person and the intimate communion of the divine nature in Christ a). The proximate foundation is the communication of idioms of the first and second kind b).

Proof a. From the unity of the person flows the unity and community of the ἀποτελεσμάτων. From the communion of the natures, in turn, results the confluence and communion of the united operation. We argue; Whatever person is one, consisting of the divine and human natures, most closely united, and therefore having mutual communion between themselves, of that person each nature has mutual communion in performing the works of the office; But the person of Christ, etc. Therefore. The major premise is constant; because the mode of operating follows the mode of being.

Proof b. If the incarnate divine nature of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) truly appropriates to itself those things which are of the human nature, and communicates to this its own properties (omnipotence) for possession and use; it infallibly follows that the divine nature appropriates to itself what the human nature does in the mediatorial office, and that the latter operates not only by natural, but also by the communicated divine ἐνεργεῖα. The antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent.

The antithesis is that of Bellarmine, Tanner, Danaeus, and others, who deny the mutual communion of the natures of Christ in acting. Their arguments are:

1. Whatever is an instrument of the operating divine nature, does not operate by divine power; But the human nature of Christ, etc. Therefore. The major premise is constant; because an instrument does not possess the same power as the principal cause, e.g., the staff of Moses was not instructed with the same power as Moses.

Resp. Distinguish between a separate instrument and a conjoined one. Not the former, but the latter can be instructed with the same power as the principal cause enjoys, e.g., a flaming sword burns with the same heat as fire, the eye sees with the same faculty as the soul. The difference is that the principal cause has the same power formally, the instrument participatively. Moreover, the human nature of Christ is an instrument personally united, living, intelligent, and most effectively cooperative.

2. The doctrine by which the ἐνεργεῖαι of the divine and human natures are confounded is not consonant with the truth; But by the doctrine of the Lutherans, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear from the rule of the Council of Chalcedon: "Each nature in Christ acts what is proper to it." The minor is manifest; because according to the opinion of the Lutherans, the human nature of Christ in theandric actions is said to act not only by its own proper power, but also by the divine power communicated to it.

Resp. 1) To the major; in it is committed the fallacy of division; for the council adds: μετὰ τῆς ἑτέρου κοινωνίας, with the communion of the other. 2) To the minor: The Lutherans neither confound nor separate the ἐνεργεῖαι of the natures, but with orthodox antiquity they assert their κοινωνίαν. Communion in acting is not confusion. The soul communicates its faculties in operating to the members of the body, without any confusion.

3. If in the works of the office the human nature of Christ were to operate by communicated divine power, it would understand with divine omniscience, and will with the divine will, which is the error of the Monothelites.

Resp. The Monothelites, as far as was in them, took away from the human nature of Christ its own will; but we teach and believe that the human nature retains its own knowledge and will; but that the intellect of the man Christ is illuminated by the light of divine omniscience, and his human will is perpetually ruled by the divine will.

4. The works by which the Word (ὁ λόγος) rules the church, by hearing prayers and remitting sins, are performed immediately by the divine nature; Therefore, the human nature of Christ does not carry them out. The reason for the consequence is; because the divine nature of the Word (ὁ λόγος) in the works of the office uses the human nature as an organ, personally united. But hearing prayers and remitting sins are inorganic actions, which are carried out by the act of the divine mind and will alone.

Resp. The human nature of Christ not indeed per se, but nevertheless through communicated omniscience truly hears the prayers of the faithful, and by the power communicated to it, remits sins.

Question LXVIII. Of how many orders are the ἀποτελέσματα of Christ?

The ἀποτελέσματα of Christ are of a twofold order; some the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) cannot produce without the confluence of the flesh a); some by free will, or good pleasure, it does not wish to produce without the flesh b).

Proof a. Of the former order are the satisfactory passion, the shedding of blood that cleanses from sin, the life-giving death, the enriching poverty.

Proof b. Of the latter order are the miracles, which the divinity of the Word (τοῦ λόγου) could have performed by the mere nod and command of its will, but by a certain counsel employed the flesh for their performance, as a most efficacious organ.

Question LXIX. What is to be observed concerning the predications of the third kind of communication of idioms?

To be observed are a) the subject, b) the predicate, c) the mode of predication.

Obs. a. The subject of the propositions of the third kind of communication of idioms is a concrete name, denominating the person either from both natures or from one. For sometimes a concrete term of the person is used, e.g., 1 Corinthians XV, 3: "Christ died for our sins"; sometimes a concrete term of the divine nature, e.g., 1 John III, 8: "The Son of God appeared to destroy the works of the devil"; sometimes a concrete term of the human nature, e.g., Luke IX, 56: "The Son of Man came to save the souls of men."

Obs. b. The predicate is an ἀποτέλεσμα, or an operation of his office, as is clear from the biblical propositions adduced. When Paul says, 1 Corinthians XV, 3, that "Christ died for our sins," the predicate "to die for our sins" is a work of the mediatorial office, which comprises partly "to die," which is an idiom of the human nature, and partly the addition of infinite value, so that that death should have the character of a ransom (λύτρον) for our sins, which infinite value is from the divine nature.

Obs. c. The mode of predication is true and real. For the Word (ὁ λόγος) truly and really appropriates to itself the actions and passions of the human nature, by virtue of the first kind of communication of idioms, and the human nature is a true and real participant of supernatural powers for operating, by virtue of the second kind of communication of idioms.

Question LXX. How does the third kind of communication of idioms differ from the first and second kind?

It differs from them by certain criteria (κριτηρίοις).

Proof. In the first kind, properties are asserted of that nature to which they formally belong; in the third kind, the ἀποτελέσματα are asserted of the person, operating according to both natures. In the second kind, Christ as man is placed as the subject, a divine idiom stands as the predicate; but in the third kind, the subject is the composite person (σύνθετος), the predicate is the divine-human work.

MEMBER II.
ON THE MEDIATORIAL
OFFICE OF CHRIST

Question LXXI. What is the mediatorial office of Christ?

THE MEDIATORIAL OFFICE of Christ. The mediatorial office of Christ is that by which Christ acts as a mediator between an offended God and sinful man, sanctioning the covenant of grace between both with his blood and death, declaring and offering the sanctioned covenant in his gospel, and confirming and preserving the offered covenant by his most powerful governance.

Obs. I. The sanction of the covenant of grace pertains to the priestly office of Christ, the declaration and offering of that covenant to the prophetic office of Christ, the confirmation and preservation of the covenant to the kingly office of Christ.

Obs. II. If the mediatorial office of Christ is taken in a stricter sense, it seems to coincide with his priestly office, according to 1 Timothy II, 5-6. Nothing, however, prevents it from being taken in a broader sense, so as to embrace the prophetic and kingly offices. For the prophet Moses is also called a mediator, Galatians III, 19, according to the opinion of some theologians, and that kings not rarely sustain the persons of mediators, escapes no one (*).

(*) For in general, a Mediator is one who intercedes between two parties, to undertake and accomplish something that pertains to both. Therefore, Christ is εἰς μεσίτης Θεοῦ καὶ ἀνθρώπων (1 Tim II, 5), because he alone intercedes between God and men, with the express intention of performing a matter partly divine, partly human. This, therefore, was specifically done in the threefold office which he himself discharged. For Christ presented himself as a mediator between God and men, 1) by reconciling the disagreeing parties, God and men, to each other with his bloody atoning sacrifice, 2 Cor. V, 19-20, and then by procuring the application of men's salvation by his intercession with God—which is the duty of a Priest, for which reason the high Priest of the O.T., typically signifying Christ, was to be considered a Mediator, inasmuch as he offered and immolated victims to God for the expiation of men's sins, as is plainly written in Heb. V, 1: ὑπὲρ ἀνθρώπων καθίσταται τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, ἵνα κ.τ.λ.; 2) by revealing the decrees of the divine will to men, John XVII, 6, 8 (this is of a Teacher, or Prophet; therefore Moses, the interpreter of the divine will, is named μεσίτης, Gal. III, 19, cf. with Ex. XX, 19, Deut. V, 5, עַמִּד בֵּין יְהוָה וּבֵינֵכֶם; Christ, however, is μεσίτης καινῆς διαθήκης, Heb. IX, 15); 3) by imparting the fruit of divine grace to men, and bending the minds of men to obedience, but coercing and punishing the disobedient and contumacious (and this is to be attributed to the kingly office). Therefore, the name of Mediator is entirely fitting for the threefold office of Christ, not only the priestly. He himself is the one μεσίτης, no other, whose preeminence is so great that by his own power and efficacy he can perform these duties, for which no other, unless an infinite person, is adequate. Therefore, it was necessary that this μεσίτην should have both natures, both divine and human, that he himself might plead the cause of both parties, both of God and of all men. Therefore, he could not not be Immanuel.

Question LXXII. According to which nature is Christ our mediator?

Proof a. 1) From the name of mediator. ATHANASIUS aptly says in dialogue 1 of On the Trinity: "If Christ were only man, or only God, he would not be a mediator between God and man." 2) For the works of the mediatorial office, such as blood that takes away sins, life-giving death, satisfactory passion, etc., the κοινωνία and confluence of both the divine and human natures are necessarily required, since, according to the elegant saying of FAUSTUS, "neither God alone could feel death, nor man alone could overcome it."

Proof b. 1) From apostolic testimony: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself," 2 Corinthians V, 19. From which we argue: According to the nature by which Christ reconciled us to God, according to that he is our mediator; But it is according to the divine nature, etc. Therefore (**). 2) From the purpose of the incarnation, about which Paul says, Galatians IV, 4: "But when the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive the adoption as sons of God." If a mere man could have redeemed sinful men from the curse of the law, and acquired for them the divine adoption (τὴν υἰοθεσίαν), the Son of God would never have come in the flesh, never have subjected himself to the law.

Proof c. 1) From the clear designation, 1 Timothy II, 5: "There is one mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ." 2) From the remission of sins, flowing from the blood of the Son of God, 1 John I, 7; Romans V, 9. According to the nature by which Christ shed his blood for the remission of sins, and died for our reconciliation with God, according to that same he is our mediator; But it is according to the human nature, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis is that of the Osiandrists, who acknowledge Christ as our mediator according to the divine nature alone, and of the Stancarians, who with the Pontificians acknowledge him according to the human nature alone. Their arguments are:

1. According to the nature by which Christ is called our righteousness, according to the same he is our mediator (because the final cause of mediation is the restoration of righteousness): But according to the divine nature, etc. Therefore. The minor premise is established from Jeremiah XXIII, 6: "Jehovah is our righteousness." Resp. The words of Jeremiah are: "The branch of David shall be called Jehovah our righteousness." Which is a personal proposition, by which the union of the divine and human natures is expressed, and their communion in the unity of the person, and consequently the same thing is implied, that Christ is our righteousness according to both natures.

II. Whichever nature cannot restore eternal righteousness, according to it Christ is not our righteousness; But according to the human nature he could not, etc. Therefore. The major premise is constant; because the office of the mediator is to restore eternal righteousness, Daniel IX, 24. The minor is clear; because the human nature is not eternal, nor does it have eternal powers. Resp. Distinguish between the human nature subsisting outside the divine hypostasis, and that assumed into the hypostasis of the Word (τοῦ λόγου). The former indeed, but not the latter, is destitute of the powers to restore eternal righteousness. And although the human nature of Christ did not exist from eternity, yet divine power, which is eternal, was communicated to it.

The Pontificians object:

I. Our mediator is explicitly called a man, 1 Timothy II, 5. Resp. In that passage is not understood a mere man (ψιλάνθρωπος), but the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), the deified man.

II. If Christ were our mediator according to the divine nature, then God the Father and the Holy Spirit would also be our mediators (because they have the same divine nature as the Son of God); The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. Distinguish between the divine nature considered absolutely, and relatively, insofar as it is marked by the hypostatic character of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ). It performs the work of mediation not in the former sense, but in the latter.

(**) Indeed, this reconciliation had to be mutual, so that both the angry God to men, and men alienated from God would in turn be reconciled to God, which we constantly maintain against the Socinians. Therefore, it is apparent even from this that a most close union of the divine and human nature in this one Reconciler was most necessary.

III. Every mediator is distinct from the party that is injured: The Son of God, according to the divine nature, is not distinct from the party that is injured. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between a mediator, so called because of his distance from both disagreeing parties; such a one is not required here; and a mediator so called because of his conjunction with both parties; and such is Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος). For a mediator is rather named from his appropriation (οικειώσις) to each party, as IRENAEUS says, book III, ch. 20, than from his distance from each party. For the end of a mediator is to join those who are disjoined. But if distance is precisely urged, Christ the man is distant from God, as God is distant from man.

IV. If Christ were a priest according to his divinity, according to the same he would be less than the Father: The consequent is false: Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is clear: because a priest is less than the one to whom he sacrifices. Resp. In a priest there are two things, dignity and subjection. The former is due to his divinity, the latter to his humanity: just as the Son of God is said to be sent and to obey the Father without any inequality of himself (an obedience not subjective, but voluntary, from the decree of always doing what pleases him, John VIII, 29; Hebrews X, 7). The Father is also said to beseech (παρακαλεῖν), without any diminution of his majesty, 2 Corinthians V, 20.

Question LXXIII. What is the priestly office of Christ?

The priestly office of Christ. The priestly office of Christ is that by which Christ the mediator and priest of the new testament, by a most exact fulfillment of the law, and by the sacrifice of his body, satisfied the injured divine justice on our behalf, and offers the most efficacious prayers to God for our salvation.

Question LXXIV. What kind of priest is Christ?

Christ is a priest who is truly and properly so called a), high b), unique c), eternal d), and impeccable e).

Proof a. Christ is frequently in Holy Scripture called a priest: Psalm CX, 4; Hebrews V, 10; ch. VI, 20; ch. VII, 26; ch. IX, 11; ch. X, 21. He is called a priest not metaphorically or improperly, but properly and truly: because he performed the duties of properly called priests. The duties of properly called priests are to offer an expiatory sacrifice for sins and to intercede for sinners (*). We shall now show that Christ the priest performs these two things.

Proof b. Christ is distinctly called ἀρχιερεὺς μέγας, the great high priest (**), who has passed through the heavens, (*) Both parts are predicated conjoinedly in 1 John II, 1-2. To these two, a third is rightly added by some, namely, blessing. For it is agreed among all that it was some part of the priestly office, both of Melchizedek, Heb. VII, 1, 6, 7, and of Aaron, Lev. IX, 22, Num. VI, 22, 1 Chron. XXIII, 13 (that is, insofar as blessing is the annunciation of divine grace and of all benefits, indeed also the bestowal in the name of God, or, as it is commonly called, the ministerial collation; for otherwise, if by that name nothing more is understood than a wish and a prayer, to bless another is the duty of any upright man). There were indeed more sacred actions commanded to the O.T. priests, e.g., to pass judgment on leprosy and its healing; but all can be conveniently referred to one or the other of these three kinds. But all the O.T. priestly actions were secret, or typical, which prefigured the coming Christ as in a shadow. Therefore Christ is said to bless us, Genesis XXII, 18, add Acts III, 25, Gal. III, 8, Eph. I, 3, indeed as often as mention is made of some blessing angel, who is not created, as in Genesis XVI, 10, XXXII, 26, 29, 30, XLVIII, 16. So also that expression, Hebrews IX, 28: ὁφθήσεται τοῖς αὐτὸν ἀπεκδεχομένοις εἰς σωτηρίαν, is to be illustrated from the typical rites of the O.T. priests, see Luke I, 21: ὁ λαὸς ἦν προσδοκῶν τὸν Ζαχαρίαν, that is, with great attention of mind to receive the blessing.

(**) The reason for this name must be diligently inquired into (for there is no doubt about its meaning). The Roman Catholics persuade themselves of a falsehood, rashly proclaiming that Christ is by this name distinguished from the priests of the New Testament properly so called, namely those who were accustomed to offer a propitiatory sacrifice to God daily, and especially the supreme priest, as the vicar of Christ, whose see is Rome. The principle of this error is this: that they imagine the Mass to be a sacrifice for sins to be expiated on any given day. For that reason, they wrongly attribute the title of priest to those who Hebrews IV, 14. Which greatness is estimated 1) from a comparison with the Aaronic priesthood. The dignity of the Aaronic priesthood was supreme, miraculously confirmed by divine authority, Numbers XVI, 35; CXVII, 8. But as the shadow yields to the body, so Aaron yielded to Christ in eminence. For the Levitical priests are said to have served a copy and shadow (ὑποδείγματι καὶ σκιᾷ) of the heavenly things, Hebrews VIII, 5. But Christ gave himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a fragrant aroma, Ephesians V, 2. The Levitical priests first offered sacrifices for their own sins, then for the sins of the people; But Christ has no necessity of sacrificing for his own sins, since he is ἄκακος καὶ ἁμίαντος, innocent and undefiled, Hebrews VII, 26, 27. 2) From a comparison with the Melchizedekian priesthood. Melchizedek was greater than Aaron. Christ is Melchizedek antitypically. Therefore, he is also greater than Melchizedek, which argument the Apostle treats at length, Hebrews VII, 1 ff (*).

officiate in sacred rites, and indeed not to all, but only to those to whom the power has been given to consecrate the Holy Supper, or, as they say, to confect it. But since that Mass sacrifice is entirely non-existent (Heb. X, 14 & 26), it follows that this reason for the name must be utterly repudiated. Paul certainly, in Eph. IV, 11, when he is in the process of enumerating the sacred orders which Christ established by his own authority, makes no mention of priests, who would have been named in the first place, if the opinion of our adversaries had any validity. We defend the true opinion, that Christ is so called with respect to all the priests of the Old Testament, even the high priest himself, for this one ἀρχιερεὺς far and greatly surpasses him also; for which reason Christ is not so simply called ἀρχιερεὺς, but with the distinguished addition, ἀρχιερεὺς μέγας, and also τοιοῦτος ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς, ὃς ἐκάθισεν ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θρόνου κ.τ.λ. Heb. VIII, 1. Such was not the dignity of the O.T. high priest, who, so far was he from sitting on this throne, that it was not even permitted for him to perform his duty sitting in the earthly temple. And it must be well observed that in the entire letter to the Hebrews, our Jesus is perpetually opposed to the high priest, whom the divine religion in the Old Testament commanded all to venerate. But of the Roman Pontiff, both in this epistle and in the whole of Scripture, there is a deep silence.

(*) The excellence and preeminence of the priestly office, which was entrusted to Christ, are declared by two propositions.

FIRST PROPOSITION: The priesthood of Christ is far more excellent than the Levitical priesthood of the O.T. We see its prerogative with respect to the subject; Namely 1) Every O.T. priest was a ψιλάνθρωπος, nothing but a mortal man, Heb. V, 1, add VII, 8, and the same was contaminated by sin, ch. VII, 28. But Christ, and he alone, is a θεάνθρωπος, and the eternal Son of God, ibid. and ch. I, 1, 1 ff., indeed also, if you consider his human nature, void of all sin, ch. IV, 15, VII, 26. 2) Every O.T. priest had to offer victims not only for the sins of his people, but also for his own, ch. V, 2, 3. Much differently Christ, ch. VII, 27. 3) Every O.T. priest originated from the tribe of Levi; but Christ arose from the tribe of Judah, because he alone had to be conspicuous not only with priestly, but also with royal dignity, ch. VII, 14. 4) All O.T. priests, and especially the highest of all, and all the functions of the so holy office, were types and images, adumbrating Christ and his sacred work to be done. The antitype, however, undoubtedly excels the type, the body surpasses the shadow in dignity, Heb. X, 1 ff. With respect to the legation: 1) Each of the O.T. priests was indeed sent from God, but mediately, through men, and so Aaron himself, by Moses the minister of God, Heb. V, 4 coll. with Ex XXVIII, 1; Christ immediately from his Father, Heb. V, 5, not only so sent, but equally also declared and inaugurated by his Father, Matth. III, 17. 2) They indeed all, without an oath; but Christ received a much more splendid vocation, confirmed by the Father's oath, Heb. VII, 20, 21. 3) With respect to the object, namely the sacrifice to be offered to God: 1) The O.T. priest was always different from the victim; Christ, on the contrary, offered himself as a victim to God, Heb. IX, 23-26. 2) The blood by which the O.T. priests indeed expiated sins was entirely that of brute animals; but the atoning blood of Christ of the N.T. precedes by an infinite price, Heb. IX, 12, 13, 14. 3) The O.T. sacrifices all had to be repeated often, and those indeed which prefigured the future acquisition of our salvation, once a year, Heb. IX, 7, 25, but those which signified the application of the same through trust to be placed in the merits of Christ, daily, Heb. IX, 27.; Christ, on the contrary, immolated himself once, as if forever, ibid. and ch. IX, 26, X, 18 & 26. 4) The O.T. sacrifices all had no power of expiation in themselves, Heb. X, 3, 4, 11, but it all depended on the thing signified, and the faith of men in Christ, whom those shadows signified as coming, Heb. VIII, 5, IX, 22, X, 1. In themselves they were worth no more than to effect a cleansing of the body, or its Levitical declaration, Heb. IX, 13. But Christ's atoning sacrifice has all power in itself, ibid. v. 14. 5) The O.T. High Priest had to enter the earthly most holy place, and indeed with the blood of another, Heb. IX, 25. But Christ entered the heavenly sanctuary, and not otherwise than with his own blood, in the same ch. v. 12, 24. 4) With respect to the adjunct, namely duration. All O.T. priests were mortal, and for that reason many, one succeeding another. On the contrary, Christ is immortal, and the same unique and perpetual N.T. Priest, Heb. VIII, 23 & 24.

SECOND PROPOSITION: Christ is a priest according to the order not of Aaron, but of Melchizedek, Ps. CX, 4, Heb. VI, v. last & VII, entire. It is not my purpose now to fight and win on the question: Who was Melchizedek? Was it Christ himself, seen by Abraham in human form? Or some other, a type and image of Christ? The latter is indeed more probable. But this dispute pertains more to hermeneutical than to dogmatic theology. This one thing pertains here: what was the difference between the Melchizedekian and the Aaronic Priesthood?

It is indeed a) one true one, which the sacred letters show us is fourfold. For it is not credible that in the classic passage, chapter VII of the epistle to the Hebrews, anything was omitted of what is true, what is worthy of note, what is relevant to the matter. 1) The genealogy of Melchizedek always remained hidden, but Aaron's family was obscure and unknown to no one. Thus was signified this excellence of Christ, by which he, God, is ἀμῆτωρ, and the same, man, is ἀπάτωρ, Heb. VII, 3. 2) Melchizedek was both King and Priest, v. 1, 2. But no one of the order of Aaron was permitted to usurp royal power. In this, therefore, Melchizedek was an image of Christ the Priest, at the same time conspicuous with Royal dignity and therefore sprung from the royal tribe, v. 13, 14. 3) The fruit of the Melchizedekian Priesthood pertained to Abraham himself, but that of the Aaronic only to the posterity of Abraham, v. 5, 10. 4) Melchizedek left no successor in the office; so also Christ, v. 23, 24. Therefore, the principal error of the Gichtelians is plainly intolerable, and peculiar to this sect, concerning the Melchizedekian Priesthood, common to all reborn men. But, you say, an order is a succession of many, of whom one follows another as is fitting. Resp. α) There existed a certain successor, but he was none other than Christ, who succeeded in the place of Melchizedek, not as an equal to an equal, but as an antitype succeeds a type. β) Order is not always spoken of with respect to succeeding men, but sometimes also with a view to the things and parts of the office. γ) The Greek name, τὰξις, corresponds to the Hebrew דְּבָרָה, inasmuch as it denotes not so much an order as an institution, a manner, a condition, just as the word τὰξις is sometimes used, e.g., Col. II, 5.

b) Another, false, reason for the distinction, which the Roman Catholics have fabricated, thinking it to be chiefly situated in this: that the Aaronic priests immolated bloody victims, while Melchizedek offered an unbloody sacrifice to God, and that a propitiatory one, namely bread and wine, Gen. XIV, 18. They think so with the express intention of serving their own hypothesis about the sacrifice of the Mass. Wrongly, indeed! For α) that offering of bread and wine was by no means a priestly and sacrificial action, but was only a civil one, to refresh and restore the strength of Abraham; for Melchizedek offered these gifts not to God, but to Abraham, but every sacrifice had to be consecrated to the one God, and it is not even written so: הקריב or הביא, but the verb הוציא is used, which is never accustomed to be used for sacrifices to be offered to God; β) much less is it to be thought that the sacrifice was propitiatory, of which kind there can be none without shed blood, Heb. IX, 22. γ) Melchizedek is called a priest not because of the offered bread and wine, since that action is distinguished from the name of priest by the Athnach accent, but by reason of the blessing, Gen. XIV, 18. For which reason Paul, certainly the best interpreter, when he is entirely occupied with explaining that type, passes over that action in silence, and commemorates nothing but the blessing, Heb. VII, 1. δ) Christ is compared with the Aaronic priests in that he himself made a bloody sacrifice, Heb. IX, 12, 24-26, and so indeed that this, once performed and perfected, is never to be repeated, much less often, indeed on any day, Heb. X, 10, 12, 17.

Proof c. 1) The Old Testament differs from the new, in that there were many priests, here one; Therefore in the N.T. there is none but a monadic priest. The antecedent is clear from Hebrews VII, 23-24: "And they indeed (the Levitical priests) have been made many priests, because they were prevented by death from continuing; but this one, because he remains forever, has an unchangeable priesthood." 2) The Old Testament also differs from the new by daily repeated and more than once made oblations: Therefore a daily repeated and more than once made oblation can have no place in the N.T. The antecedent is clear from Hebrews VII, 27: "Christ offered himself once," ch. X, 14: "Christ by one offering has perfected for all time those who are being sanctified." 3) Christ is not a priest according to the order of Aaron, in which the priesthood was transferred to successors, but according to the order of Melchizedek, who had neither predecessors nor successors in the priesthood. Hebrews VII, 11, 12, 15.

Proof d. Hebrews VII, 3: "The Son of God remains a priest forever." The fruit of Christ's priesthood extends into past and future ages, or the merit of Christ the priest is valid backwards and forwards.

Proof e. "It was fitting for us to have such a high priest, holy, harmless, undefiled, separated from sinners, and made higher than the heavens," Hebrews VII, 26. "Christ was tempted in every way, according to the likeness (of the common lot of men), yet without sin," Hebrews IV, 15.

The antithesis is 1) of the Pontificians, who deny that Christ is the unique, properly called priest of the N.T. 2) of the Arminians, who maintain that Christ is not simply an impeccable priest, or immune from all power of sinning (*). 3) of the Socinians, who deny the eternal priesthood of Christ.

The Pontificians argue with the following reasoning: Christians are called priests, Apocalypse I, 6. Therefore, Christ is not the unique priest of the N.T. Resp. Christians are called priests metaphorically, on account of the eucharistic (εὐχαριστικά) sacrifices of prayers and praise; but Christ is a priest properly so called, on account of the expiatory (ἱλαστικὸν) sacrifice, which Christ offered once, Hebrews VII, 27.

Objection: Christ the high priest indeed offered a bloody sacrifice once; but it is the duty of subordinate priests to offer an unbloody sacrifice more often, so that that bloody sacrifice, which acquires salvation, may be applied again and again. Resp. The sacrifice of Christ, offered on the altar of the cross, is applied not through another sacrifice, but through the word and sacraments.

The Arminians argue:

I. Whoever descends from Adam can sin; for Adam, most holy, was not immune from the power of sinning; But Christ, etc. Therefore. Resp. Whoever descends from Adam by natural means can sin; I grant it. But Christ descends from Adam not by a natural way of natural propagation, but by a supernatural one, by virtue of the supervening promise, Genesis III, 15.

II. Whoever is tempted, comforted in temptation, and has prayed to avoid the cup of temptation, is not simply impeccable; But Christ, etc. Matthew IV, 1; Luke XXII, 43. Therefore. Resp. The temptation of Christ does not presuppose his peccability, but the extreme impudence of the devil, and serves Christians as a consoling hope of victory, and as an example of a strenuous fight against the devil. The angelic comforting was not done to prevent some moral fallibility of Christ, but to support the infirmity of his nature in the highest degree of humiliation. Nor does the prayer to avoid the cup, being conditional and tempered to the will of the Father, argue a power of sinning; but it demonstrates the highest conformity with the will of the Father. For Christ did not resist draining the cup absolutely, but with the condition of some other way of redeeming the human race, supposed by his divine and infinite power.

The Socinians conclude: Whoever did not exist from eternity is not an eternal priest; But Christ the man, etc. Therefore. Resp. Christ the man did not indeed exist from eternity naturally, or entitatively, as to his substance; yet he existed from eternity morally, by virtue of the decree and (*) Indeed, the first followers of ARMINIUS, at the Synod of Dort, defending a good cause badly, in the heat of disputation fell into this most grave error, which thereafter the Remonstrants, as they are called, held with great obstinacy of mind, as is wont to happen. But more recent ones are nevertheless ashamed and embarrassed of so great an error, from which ADR. de CATTENBURGH professes himself to be alien in his Spicilegium Theologiae Christianae, pp. 341 ff.

prescience of God, i.e., from eternity Christ was foreseen by God as the impulsive and meritorious cause, moving God to receive sinners into grace.

Question LXXIV. By which acts is the priesthood of Christ fulfilled?

Acts of the Priestly Office. The priesthood of Christ is fulfilled by two acts, satisfaction and intercession.

Proof. The office of the O.T. priests consisted 1) in the oblation of an expiatory sacrifice; 2) in intercession for the people, that God might forgive them; so Christ "gave himself for us as an offering and a sacrifice, for a fragrant aroma," Ephesians V, 2, "and intercedes for us," Romans VIII, 34.

Question LXXV. What is the satisfaction of Christ?

Satisfaction. Satisfaction is an act of the priestly office, by which Christ, by divine decree, with the most complete obedience, active and passive, satisfied the divine justice, which was injured by the sins of men, for the praise of divine justice and mercy, and for the acquisition of our righteousness and salvation.

Obs. 1. Satisfaction is not a biblical word, but an ecclesiastical one, whose synonyms, however, exist in the sacred code, namely ἱλασμός, propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1 John II, 2; καταλλαγὴ, reconciliation, Romans V, 10; ἀπολύτρωσις, redemption, Ephesians I, 7; the payment of a ransom (λύτρον), Matthew XX, 28. For that redemption denotes the payment of a price, which is sufficient, for a captive, and that reconciliation of God with men is so described in the scriptures that it is clear that it was not made without a ransom (λύτρον), which divine justice demanded from the mediator (*).

Question LXXVI. Do the satisfaction and the merit of Christ denote the same thing?

(*) There are more things that note the same thing, and especially these two: 1) the Hebrew הָשִׁיב, Ps. LXIX, 5, the force of which word you can know from Num. V, 7-8; 2) the Greek δικαίωμα, whose power, and of what kind, is apparent from its opposites. When it is opposed to κατὰκριμα, it cannot but denote the judge's sentence of absolution, or, as it is said, justification, Rom. V, 16. But when it is the contrary of παράπτωμα, then it signifies the expiation of a crime, or satisfaction for guilt and punishment, to be rendered to the judge; ibid. v. 18.

(**) The most ample testimony of PAUL, Romans V, 10, is of great value in confirming this distinction.

The satisfaction and the merit of Christ are indeed inseparably joined, yet they differ in various respects.

Proof. For 1); Satisfaction precedes, merit follows: For having rendered satisfaction, Christ merited righteousness and eternal life. 2) Satisfaction is made to God and his justice; But Christ merited salvation not for God, but for us (**). 3) Merit, generally speaking, precedes the order to a reward, satisfaction to compensating an injury. Therefore, Christ by his satisfaction compensated for the injury inflicted upon God, expiated iniquity, paid the debt, and freed us from eternal punishments; but by his merit he acquired for us righteousness and eternal salvation. 4) The satisfaction of Christ is the payment of our debts, by which we were bound to God; but merit arises from the fulfillment of the law and an undeserved passion. 5) The acts of Christ's humiliation are at the same time satisfactory and meritorious; the acts of his exaltation are only meritorious, if merit is considered broadly. Conf. D. FEUERBORN, Syntagma, I, p. III, dissert. VIII.

Question LXXVII. To whom did Christ make satisfaction?

Christ made satisfaction to the triune God a), who is infinite b), just and angry c); truthful d), wise and merciful e).

Proof a. Because God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were offended by sin, Psalm V, 5. Therefore, the triune God had to be expiated. Observe that Christ in a certain respect made satisfaction to himself. For insofar as Christ made satisfaction as mediator, he is regarded as the God-man (θεάνθρωπος); but insofar as he himself also demanded satisfaction, precisely as God, the author and vindicator of the law, essentially just, he must be viewed.

Proof b. The one injured was the infinite God, on account of whose offense sin is said to have infinite guilt (not formally, for so it admits of more and less; but objectively). For the greater the dignity of the person violated, the greater the offense. But here an infinite person was violated.

Proof c. The wrath of the most just judge God was kindled by the sins of men; "For the wrath of God is revealed," provoked "from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," Romans I, 18. Wherefore the most just judge could not but vindicate evil, either in the sinner himself, or in his sponsor.

Proof d. The most truthful God willed that the threatening decree against Adam and his posterity should stand firm, Genesis II, 17; "You shall surely die."

Proof e. The wisdom and mercy of God shine forth most greatly from the admirable satisfaction of the mediator, by the most precious ransom (λύτρον) most wisely found, and most mercifully decreed and accepted.

From these divine attributes arises a most valid argument; Whatever judge is of infinite majesty, and incensed by the sins of men, and has threatened to justly vindicate the same, must be satisfied by an infinite ransom, most wisely found and most acceptable; But God is such a judge, etc. Therefore (**).

Question LXXVIII. By what means did Christ satisfy the triune God?

Means of satisfaction. Christ satisfied by active and passive obedience. By active obedience Christ most exactly fulfilled the divine law in our place, so that penitent sinners, applying this vicarious fulfillment of the law to themselves by true faith, might be reputed righteous before God the judge a). By passive obedience Christ transferred the sins of the whole world onto himself, and willingly paid the penalties due to them, shedding his most precious blood, and undergoing a most ignominious death for all sinners, so that for believers in Christ the redeemer, sins might not be imputed to eternal punishment b).

Proof a. 1) From Galatians IV, 4-5: "But when the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive the adoption of sons." Obs. a) The speech is about Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος); for the Son of God is said to be born of a woman in the fullness of time. b) The law to which he is subject is understood as both universal, or moral, and particular, i.e., ceremonial and forensic, to which Christ was subject, not for himself, out of debt or obligation, but for us out of mere grace, since he is the Lord of the law, Mark II, 28. c) The end, or effect, is both our redemption and the reception of spiritual sonship. We argue; Whoever is the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), and therefore Lord of the law, and fulfilled the law for the purpose that we might be made sons of God, he satisfied divine justice for us; But Christ, etc. Therefore.

2. Romans X, 4: "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone who believes," cf. Matthew V, 17: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them." We conclude: Whoever is the end of the law, not by abolishing it but by fulfilling it, so that the end of its fulfillment, namely righteousness, might redound to believers, he has satisfied divine justice in our place: But Christ, etc. Therefore.

(**) So that we may understand what was necessary for undertaking and perfecting so great a business, these things must be established beforehand; Satisfaction was to be rendered 1) to God the judge, 2) and that vicariously, 3) for men, indeed 4) for all men, for all the sins of all. Therefore, a subject of this kind would always be unequal to performing this work and bearing this burden, which either 1) was not at all fit to know and holily observe the divine laws, and to feel the vengeance of an angry Deity; or 2) was itself already obligated to render obedience to the laws, and to endure punishments (for thus it would have rendered not another's, or vicarious, but entirely its own, due by itself, satisfaction); or 3) was not a partaker of human nature, and therefore not capable both of the duties which, as far as they are concerned, befit human nature, and of the punishments which, as far as they are concerned, are denounced against depraved men; or finally 4) was not suitable for expiating all sins, and reconciling to God the entire multitude of men, for placating God, who is infinitely just. Therefore, there are four properties required for this satisfaction; Our sponsor, if there were to be one, had to be one who 1) enjoyed intellect and free will, 2) was bound by no laws, much less already subject to the guilt of fault and punishment, 3) would assume human nature, 4) would possess infinite power. From these, a necessary consequence is effected; A suitable subject could be neither any thing lacking the use of reason (for requirement 1 is absent, along with the rest, cf. Heb. X, 4, 1 Pet. I, 18); nor any man, insofar as he is a man, much less as he is guilty of sin (for requirements 2 & 4 are lacking); nor any angel (for requirements 2, 3, 4 are repugnant); nor any created thing, even if it were the most excellent of all (against requirements 2, 3, & 4). Therefore, only the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) was capable of this, himself the Lord of the law, Mark II, 28, who of his own accord took upon himself all our obligation, Heb. X, 7.

Proof b. Penal satisfaction is either proper or vicarious. The former the guilty party himself, the debtor of the punishment, renders; the latter another, in his place. We are not now speaking of proper satisfaction. If penal vicarious satisfaction is considered a) formally, there is required 1) Surrogation, by which another is substituted in the place of the debtor, and a transfer of guilt, or the imputation of another's crime; 2) the payment of penalties, which the substituted surety, or sponsor, pays in place of the debtor. Considered finally, that payment of penalty is made to obtain the absolution of the debtor, so that he may be pronounced immune from guilt and punishment.

That these requisites of true satisfaction concur in the satisfaction of Christ is easy to demonstrate.

1) Christ was substituted in the place of all sinners, and transferred their crimes upon himself. Paul teaches this openly, a) 2 Corinthians V, 21: "Him who knew no sin (inherently), God made to be sin for us (ὕπερ ἡμῶν) (imputatively), so that in him we might become the righteousness of God." Obs. Sin, repeated a second time in this apostolic saying, denotes a sinner imputatively so, and consequently a victim for sin. b) Galatians III, 13: "Christ redeemed us from the curse, having become a curse for us (ὕπερ ἡμῶν κατάρα)." Therefore, Christ, substituted for sinners, devolved their guilt upon himself (*).

2) Christ paid the penalties for our sins. a) Christ is said to bear our sins, Isaiah LIII, 4: "Surely he has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows"; 1 Peter II, 24: "He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree." Cf. John I, 29. To carry, or bear sin, is to take upon oneself the penalties of sin, and thus to satisfy for sin by the payment of penalties (**). He who bore the sins of men paid the

(*) Not only that little word ὑπερ has this meaning: in place of another; but also ἀντι, Matth. XX, 28, whence it is called ἀντιλυτρον, 1 Tim. II, 6, just like the Hebrew word תחת, Gen. XXII, 13, Is. XLIII, 3, 4. This was once signified by an illustrious type, namely the propitiatory sacrifices of the O.T., in which the imposition of hands was necessary for offering them to God. For that the imputation of sin was indicated by this custom is plainly apparent from the appended interpretation: "he shall bear the sin," he shall suffer the penalties, Levit. XXIV, 14-16. Therefore, this very rite, joined with the confession of the people's sins over the head of the victim to be immolated in the sacrifices for the people, was an indication that the sins of the whole people were to be attributed to that animal, and that it would therefore be a vicarious victim. Hence, this manner of speaking among the Jews is both very old and common, used of such sacrifices: נפש תחת נפש (a soul for a soul).

(**) The Socinians interpret these words only as "to take away," and in no way as "to bear," an imputation having been made. We maintain the contrary opinion, and argue for it 1) from what we said before about the force of the words ὑπερ, ἀντι, 2 ; תחת) from the interpretation which ISAIAH expressly taught us, ch. LIII, v. 6 coll. with v. 12: יהוה הפגיע בו ; 3 ; את עון כלנו) from the perpetual usage of this expression in holy scripture; for by the custom of divine speech, "to bear sin" is nothing other than to be held in guilt, for the purpose of undergoing punishment, Ezech. XVIII, 19, 20, and therefore it is joined with an express denunciation of punishment, as Ex XXVIII, 43, Levit. XX, 17, 19, 20, XXIV, 15, 16, Num. V, 31; 4) from a synonym, or the use of another verb, which means the same thing and is used to designate the same matter, namely סבל; for that is never "to take away," it always denotes "to bear," to receive something into oneself, so that it may be attributed to oneself as one's own, or, as it is customary to say, imputed, and this very verb is accustomed to be used for vicarious penalties, substituted for someone, if someone pays the penalties merited by the fault of others, Thren. V, 7; 5) finally from the matter itself: If Christ did nothing more than what the Socinians want; by what right then should he be named our sponsor? why was a bloody victim needed? would there even be anything proper and singular to Christ? Do not God the Father and the Holy Spirit also take away our sins from us, through a true change and renewal of mind?

penalty due to sins and satisfied vindictive divine justice; But Christ, etc. Therefore.

b) Christ transferred the penalties of our sins upon himself; because "he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities," Isaiah LIII, 5; "delivered up to death," Romans IV, 25; "died for our sins," Galatians I, 4, 1 Corinthians XV, 3, 1 Peter III, 18, Hebrews X, 12. Since, therefore, "death is the wages of sin," Romans VI, 23, it is easily concluded that Christ diverted onto himself the penalties merited by the sins of men. c) The same is proved by the places of scripture in which Christ is said to have been offered, or to have offered himself for our sins, and to be that one sacrifice which was adumbrated by the expiatory sacrifices of the O.T. For as the sacrifices of the O.T. offered for sins were expiatory, on account of the one sacrifice of Christ; so the sacrifice of Christ is in itself expiatory and satisfactory for sins, the matter itself speaks. "Christ was offered once to bear the sins of many," says the Apostle, Hebrews IX, 28, and ch. X, 12: "After he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, he sat down at the right hand of God."

3) Christ paid the penalties due to sins, so that the sinner might be absolved from the penalties. For Christ "gave his life as a ransom (λύτρον) for many," Matthew XX, 28. Christ gave himself "as a ransom (ἀντιλύτρον) for all," 1 Timothy II, 6. We were therefore "reconciled to God through the death of his Son," Romans V, 10, and we are cleansed from sins by the blood of Christ, 1 John I, 7; washed, Apocalypse I, 5, so that we may have "in his blood the forgiveness of sins," Ephesians I, 7, and "be justified by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," Romans III, 24. But he who, by the payment of a ransom (λύτρον), has freed a guilty party of temporal and eternal punishment from guilt and punishment, so that he may have remission of sins, and be reputed just before the divine tribunal, has truly satisfied divine justice for him; But Christ, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis was formerly that of Photinus, Abelard, and today is that of the Socinians, Schwenckfeldian, and Weigelians, who deny the satisfaction of Christ for our sins, relying on the following arguments.

I. The name of satisfaction is not found in the sacred letters; Therefore, the satisfaction of Christ is not to be believed. Resp. Although the word "satisfaction" does not exist in the sacred letters, we have already shown that the thing signified is nevertheless found in them. (*).

II. Whatever a man can do, God can do much more (otherwise he would be more impotent than man); But a man can remit a sin without satisfaction; Therefore. Resp. 1) The question here is not what God could have done absolutely (namely, whether he could have remitted sins without satisfaction); but what he willed, and how he revealed his will concerning the pardoning of sins. If sins could have been pardoned to us without the intervention of satisfaction, it is

(*) Although most Socinians are unwilling to bear this name, "satisfaction," as it is most hateful to this sect, some of them, nevertheless, do not hesitate to use it. But they speak ambiguously. For that to which satisfaction can be made is either the will, or vindicating justice. In the former sense, it is written in Mark XV, 15: ἰκανὸν ποιῆσαι, namely, to the will and desire, add Luke XXIII, 24-25. Therefore, they affirm that Satisfaction was rendered by Christ; but to whom? Indeed, to the will of the Father only. But they deny, and utterly deny, that satisfaction was also made by Christ to vindicating justice. The truth which we profess proceeds entirely from this principle; that vindicating justice in God is not arbitrary, as they indeed opine; but entirely natural and necessary. For there can be no property and perfection in God, unless it is most agreeable to the divine nature, and such and so great as God himself is, nor can there be anything in God which is not God himself. But this is the nature of God, that he alone is the necessary being; Therefore, divine justice cannot but be equally necessary. As to the matter, the Socinians indeed confess in their Racovian catechism, p. 171, 4to ed., that Christ suffered and died for us, for the purpose that he might expiate our sins. When they say expiation, they understand a liberation partly from all guilt of punishment, partly from the dominion of sins, lest we should serve them in the future. But they think that former part is nothing other than a defense from all punishment, by a propitiatory victim, slain indeed on earth, but to be offered to God in the heavens. For they opine that Christ, at the time when he was on earth, had not yet performed the office of a priest, nor truly sacrificed. Therefore, they utterly deny the vicarious penalties which Christ suffered for us, and they also completely deny that the obedience which Christ rendered by acting was vicarious.

credible that the most wise God would have spared his only-begotten Son, and not so easily, and with no pressing necessity, have subjected him for our sake to such great torments and a most ignominious death. 2) Resp. to the major, a) Whatever a man can do, without any mark of imperfection, God can do that much more; I grant. But not whatever a man does on account of some imperfection, can God do that. A man moves from place to place, eats, drinks, God, the purest Spirit, cannot do that. A man remits, because he himself is a sinner. If he is adorned with any righteousness, it is mutable. But God is most perfectly holy, and his justice is natural. b) Whatever a private man can do, a universal judge can also do that; I deny. For a private man can remit injuries without satisfaction, but with the right of the superior being safe. But who is superior to God? A judge without satisfaction cannot justify a sinner, with justice being safe: "He who justifies the wicked is an abomination to Jehovah," Proverbs XVII, 15. "Your eye shall not pity," Deuteronomy XIII, 8. "The magistrate does not bear the sword in vain," but for vengeance, that justice may be satisfied, Romans XIII, 4.

III. Whatever is a debt can be remitted without satisfaction; Sins are ὀφειλήματα, or debts; Therefore. The minor is clear from Matthew VI, 12. Resp. Distinguish between a monetary debt and a blood debt, or a crime. The former can be remitted out of mere liberality without detriment to the public good, with justice unharmed; not the latter. Proverbs XVII, 15.

Objection: Even a crime must be remitted freely. Resp. Eli, not punishing the crimes of his sons, gravely offended God, 1 Samuel III, 14. Cf. Deuteronomy VII, 16; ch. XIII, 8; 1 Samuel XV, 2, 9; 1 Kings XX, 42.

IV. Whoever is an absolute lord can remit offenses without satisfaction; because he does what he wills; But God, etc. Therefore. Resp. Whoever is an absolute lord, and acts absolutely, with no regard to justice or law, can remit without satisfaction. But God in the business of justification does not act absolutely, but as a most just judge, who is a law to himself, and to whom justice is natural. Hence he set forth his Son as a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον), through faith in his blood, for a demonstration of righteousness (εἰς ἐνδειξιν δικαιοσύνης), Romans III, 25.

V. As our mercy ought to be, such is the mercy of God, Luke VI, 36. But our mercy ought to be gratuitous, urging no satisfaction, Matthew XVIII, 35: Therefore. Resp. As our mercy ought to be, such is the mercy of God, in the matter and in the sincerity of mercy, Matthew XVIII, 35; not in the mode of the matter, or of mercy; otherwise, by the example of God, a human father also, moved by mercy toward a guilty party, could or should kill his own son, which would be impious.

VI. God is a king who remits debts to a servant without satisfaction, Matthew XVIII, 27. Resp. Even if in that parable there is no mention of the satisfaction of Christ, because Christ did not wish to declare the whole business of the remission of sins, but only the principal source of divine mercy, and to direct it to the confusion of our lack of mercy, on the occasion given by Peter; yet it is sufficient that it is proposed in other places of scripture.

VII. Whatever is impossible with respect to God the Father is not to be maintained; But the satisfaction of the Son of God for sinners is impossible with respect to God the Father; Therefore. The minor is proved. It is impossible for God to lie, Hebrews VI, 18. But God has bound himself that he will not punish one for another; not the father for the son, nor the son for the father, Ezekiel XVIII, 20. Resp. This place is cited impertinently. For a) the prophet Ezekiel speaks of a son who is a mere man; but Christ is the God-man (θεάνθρωπος). b) The saying of the prophet is legal, but the passion and death of Christ pertain to the Gospel. The former urges strict justice (ἀκριβοδικαίον), the highest rigor; the latter shows equity (ἐπιείκειαν), and a tempering of justice and clemency. c) The prophet's speech is about personal sins, or individual sins of the father, not about common ones. For these God is accustomed to visit also upon the sons, Exodus XX, 5; Joshua VII, 24; ch. XXII, 20; 2 Samuel XXI, 6.

VIII. Whatever judge inflicts capital punishment on an innocent person for a guilty one is neither just nor clement. According to the mind of the evangelical doctors, God the Father inflicts capital punishment on his innocent Son for the guilty. Therefore. Resp. The Apostle Peter says, 1 Peter III, 18: "Jesus suffered for the unjust." Distinguish therefore a) between God the judge, and a human one. The latter cannot inflict capital punishment on an innocent person for a guilty one, since he is not the supreme lord, not the absolute lord of life and death. Namely, men have delegated power over life only in the case of a capital crime, but God is the supreme arbiter of life. b) Distinguish between an unwilling innocent person, and a willing one; also between an innocent person simply free from all guilt, and one who is a partaker of guilt either by himself or by imputation. Christ, most innocent, was afflicted with capital punishment for sinners not unwillingly, but willingly, and is a partaker of human guilt not indeed per se, but nevertheless imputatively, not only as a sponsor, but also as the lamb, bearing the sins of the world. He who willingly bears the sins of another, transfers that one's punishments upon himself (*).

IX. Whoever He loved men before Christ died, his wrath or justice did not need to be satisfied by the death of Christ; But God, etc. John III, 16; Romans V, 8; Ephesians I, 6. Therefore. The major premise is constant; because love and wrath are opposed to each other. Satisfaction is made to one who is angry, not to a friend. Resp. 1) Distinguish between a general love and a special one. The former is a love of mercy, benevolence, and ordering of means; the latter is a love of complacency and conferring of friendship. The former obtains a place in God, even when he is angry with the human race; the latter presupposes a placated God. 2) Distinguish between supreme wrath and tempered wrath. The former excludes benevolence, the latter does not. An offended person (e.g., an enemy in war) thinking about reconciling peace can propose conditions of peace, which is a general love of benevolence and placability; but he is not actually placated, or enters into friendship with the offender, unless he is satisfied.

X. Whatever cannot be made another's cannot be handed over to death in place of another; But the life of Christ cannot be made the life of a sinner. Therefore. Resp. The life of one cannot be made the life of another physically, but it can morally and imputatively. Which life, although it is not the same in number, is nevertheless the same in species, and is imputed to another for impunity.

XI. Whoever did not sustain the same punishment that damnable men were bound to sustain, did not pay their penalty, and therefore did not make satisfaction for them; But Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved because the punishment of damnable sinners is eternal, namely perennial death; But Christ's death was for three days. Resp. Whoever did not sustain the same punishment that damnable men were bound to sustain, nor an equipollent punishment, could not pay their penalty; I grant. But Christ sustained a punishment equipollent to eternal punishment; for he underwent the infernal penalties intensely, as to their force, weight, and substance, although not extensively, as to duration and the accidents of the suffering subjects. He sustained the extremity of torments, not the eternity.

Objection I: We cannot understand with our intellect how the three-day death of one man can be equal to the eternal punishments of many thousands. Resp. Our adversaries would understand this, a) if they acknowledged the truly divine and infinite majesty of Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου), from which the passion and death of the mediator receive infinite force and weight, so that it is an equivalent ransom (λύτρον ἰσόρροπον), an equivalent price for the sins of the whole world; b) If they distinguished between the debtor, or the guilty one, upon whom the wrath of God remains, John III, 36, and the sponsor, or (*) To attribute the most grave crimes of another to a certain innocent sponsor will by no means be unjust, under this condition: 1) If the sponsor willingly receives the guilt of another upon himself (Ps. XL, 8-9); 2) if he enjoys perfect power over himself, and does not depend on the will of another (John II, 19; X, 18); 3) and not to his own harm; even though he was not born under the condition of acquiring something for himself by his own merits, since he already possesses all things (ibid. v. 17; Phil. II, 9 ff.); 4) if the sins of others, attributed to him, are by this pact abolished, and it cannot otherwise be done that violated justice is satisfied, and at the same time the salvation of those who have sinned is provided for, and irreparable damage is repaired (Matth. XXVI, 39; Rom. VIII, 3); 5) if the matter is conducted in such a way that no lust for sinning is sustained by the hope of impunity (John III, 18; Gal. II, 17; 2 Pet. II, 1; Rom. VI, 1; 2 Cor. V, 14-15); 6) if the supreme Judge by his own decree fully consents to that sponsorship (John X, 18). These requisites are nowhere in a human court, and indeed cannot be anywhere, and they are fitting for no man, except the God-man (θεάνθρωπος). Do not wonder, therefore, that not one single example of such imputation is ever found in the entire universe of men.

surety, who had to taste death in such a way as to swallow it up, 1 Corinthians XV, 54. For Christ was able, with an infinite price, through a passion of three days, to pay off to the last farthing the whole that all men owed; Therefore, he could depart after three days. The damned debtors in hell never pay off what they owe; Therefore, they never depart.

Objection II: The human nature of Christ suffered, which does not have infinite majesty. Resp. God in the human nature of Christ suffered; for he appropriated to himself the passion and death of the flesh, and added force, value, and weight to its passion.

Objection III: Christ did not despair; Therefore, he did not sustain infernal punishments. Resp. Despair is not a part of the infernal torments, but their adjunct, and the condition of the damned debtor, who can never pay off what he owes.

XII. Whatever obscures the glory of divine grace is not to be believed; But satisfaction, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved because God remits sins to us through the bowels of mercy, Luke I, 77, and we are justified freely, Romans III, 24. But remission and satisfaction, gratuitous justification and that provoked by some merit, mutually cancel each other out. Resp. Gratuitous remission and satisfaction do not mutually cancel each other out, but present for consideration a tempering of grace and divine justice. The latter demands punishment either on the guilty party or on his sponsor. But divine grace a) remits sins, without our merit; b) decreed and ordained satisfaction, Romans V, 8; John III, 16; c) kindly accepted the satisfaction of another, d) derives the same upon us, just as if we ourselves had made satisfaction. Hence it is that we have remission in the blood of Christ, according to the riches of the grace of God, Ephesians I, 7, and we are justified freely by the grace of God, through the redemption of Christ, Romans III, 24.

XIII. Scripture does not say that Christ reconciled God to us, but that we were reconciled to God by the death of Christ; Therefore, God was not angry with us, but we did not love God, but rather pursued him with hatred. From which it is concluded that God was not reconciled, but that we were converted by the death of Christ, the hatred of God being extinguished, and love for him being kindled. Resp. God was indeed angry, which is most apparent from the divine threat, Genesis II, 17. But Holy Scripture pointedly says that we are reconciled to God, because a) God was the offended party, b) man the sinner was the offending party, c) the source and origin of reconciliation is found in God, not in the sinner (*).

XIV. If Christ satisfied God the Father for our sins, his mercy toward the human race

(*) Thus the Socinians think that this reconciliation was made as a one-sided act (μόνopleυρος), not two-sided (δίπλευρον). But to us the documents of mutual reconciliation are most clear, that both God was reconciled to the world, and the world in turn to God. The arguments by which we prevail are especially these three: 1) God is said to be propitiated, Luke XVIII, 13; Rom. III, 25; 1 John II, 2. The word ἱλάσκομαι has this power; to turn away someone's wrath, to render propitious him who is angry. H. GROTIUS indeed, in his annotations on 1 John II, 2, has falsely interpreted the force of this word: "you provide strength, lest we sin in the future." He, however, elsewhere, in Defense of the Catholic Faith concerning the Satisfaction of Christ, ch. 7, contradicting himself, rightly professes: "ἱλάσκεσθαι among all Greek writers is to placate, and is accustomed to be construed with the accusative designating the person whose wrath is turned away." 2) Christ is said to have effected this, that "we have peace with God," Rom. V, 1, and that peace indeed a) which is founded on justification, v. ibid. (but this justification is posited in this, that we obtain the remission of sins, ch. IV, 6-8, so that no condemnation is to be feared thereafter, ch. VIII, 33-34); b) by which it is effected that access to God is opened to us, whose grace had hitherto been denied to us, V, 2, προσαγωγὴν ἐσχήκαμεν, which is to be illustrated by its opposite, Is. LIX, 2; c) to which is opposed the wrath which condemns and destroys us, v. 9 of the cited ch. V of the ep. to the Rom. Therefore, the reconciliation in v. 10 must be so understood that God is placated, and his wrath is turned away from us. A passage related to this is found in Ephesians II, 17, add vv. 3, 16, & 18. 3) As the enmity is, such also must the reconciliation be; But that is certainly mutual, and not only is the impious man of a hostile and inimical mind toward God, Rom. VIII, 7, but also the most holy God toward the wicked man, Ps. V, 5-6; Is. LXIII, 10; John III, 36; Rom. V, 10 coll. with the preceding v. 9. On both, see Rom. VIII, 7 & 8.

was greater than the Father's; because he moved him to have mercy on us and be reconciled to us; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the prior. Resp. Speculation about the degrees of divine mercy is superfluous. The supreme charity of the Father is commended to us in the scriptures, that he did not spare his Son, but delivered him up to death for us, Romans VIII, 32. The supreme charity of the Son is commended, that he died for his enemies, Romans V, 6-7. But supreme love does not admit of degrees.

XV. The passion and death of Christ is an example of patience, Matthew X, 22; of charity, John XV, 13; of most humble obedience, Philippians II, 5. Therefore, it is not a ransom (λύτρον) or price of redemption. Resp. Subordinate ends are not to be opposed. The primary end of the passion and death of Christ is that it be a ransom; the secondary is that it be an example.

XVI. In the O.T., men were justified without a ransom, e.g., Abel. Resp. The merit of Christ is valid backwards and forwards. Abel, sacrificing, looked with the eye of faith to the Word (τὸν λόγον) to be incarnated, the lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Apocalypse XIII, 8, and Hebrews XI, 4.

XVII. The doctrine of satisfaction extinguishes the ardor of piety. Resp. It does not extinguish, but kindles it. This Paul teaches, 2 Corinthians V, 15: "Christ died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves but for him who died for them and was raised again."

The satisfaction of Christ through active obedience, rendered to the divine law, was denied by JOHANNES PISCATOR (**),<sup>187</sup> whose arguments are:

A. Whoever is himself subject to the law cannot satisfy the law in place of others; But Christ the man, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear; because by due obedience we merit nothing. The minor is proved because Christ the man is a creature; but every creature owes obedience to the creator. Resp. 1) Christ satisfied the divine law not only as man, but as the God-man (θεάνθρωπος); although the human nature of Christ is a creature, it nevertheless subsists in the hypostasis of the Word (λόγου), and is a partaker of divinity, and therefore is not per se liable to the law (*).

II. If Christ fulfilled the law in our place, we are not bound to fulfill the same; The latter is false; Therefore, so is the prior. Resp. We are not bound to fulfill the law for the cause of satisfaction; yet we are bound to observe the law to declare our faith and render obedience.

III. "By a single offering Christ has perfected for all time those who are being sanctified," Hebrews X, 14. Therefore, the satisfaction of Christ, to be rendered by obedience to the law, was not necessary. Resp. The one offering of Christ is opposed not to active obedience, but to the repetition of victims, which was commanded in the O.T.

IV. The action of one cannot be the action of another; The fulfillment of the law is the action of Christ; Therefore, the fulfillment of the law cannot be our action. Resp. An action is considered either physically, as it is the motion of the agent, or morally, as it is good or bad. Not physically, but morally, the action of one can be that of another through imputation. Thus the laudable deed of Phinehas, killing the fornicators, was imputed to all the Israelites, so that the plague might be averted, Numbers XXV, 8.

V. If Christ by the holiness of his life made satisfaction to God for us, his death will be superfluous; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proved; because if the fulfillment of the law rendered by Christ is imputed to us by God for righteousness, what need will there be for the imputation of the death of Christ? Resp. I deny the consequence of the major. For a twofold satisfaction is needed for a twofold salutary end for us. We sinners are 1) unjust, on account of contracted guilt, 2) damnable, on account of merited punishment. Christ by suffering and dying devolved our penalties upon himself, so that we might be immune from punishment and damnation; by acting most holily, he most perfectly fulfilled the law in our place, so that he might derive the righteousness abounding from the fulfillment of the law not into himself, but into us.

(**) Those who in our age follow the Illustrious Count ZINZENDORF as their leader pass over in silence the obedience which Christ rendered by acting. The blood and wounds are always on their lips, nothing more.

(*) This is added; that Christ became man not for his own sake, but for us men, and for our salvation. All divine laws were sanctioned with this counsel, that they might be means for us to our felicity, for living well and blessedly. But as is the end of human nature, such also cannot but be all the actions suitable to it. Since, therefore, a certain entirely singular end was established for the human nature in Christ, that he should not live for himself, but for us, and should meet death, and, revived, enter into glory; it follows that not for his own cause, but for the cause of all men, he alone satisfied the law.

Question LXXIX. Is the death and oblation of Christ on the cross a true sacrifice, so that on account of it Christ may properly be called a priest?

The death of Christ, which he met on the altar of the cross, is a true propitiatory sacrifice, on account of which Christ on this earth was a true, properly so called, and most consummate priest.

Proof. 1) From the Pauline testimony, Ephesians V, 2: "Christ loved us and gave himself up for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a fragrant aroma." At the time when Christ gave himself up to death, at that same time he offered a most pleasing sacrifice to God; But at the time when Christ was affixed to the cross, he gave himself up to death; Therefore.

2. From the Petrine testimony, 1 Epistle II, 24: "Christ himself bore our sins in his body on the tree." At the time when our sins were imposed on Christ to be borne on the tree of the cross, at that same time he was truly made a sacrifice for our sins; But at the time of the passion, etc. Therefore.

3. From the nature of sacrifices, which consists in slaughter, Leviticus I, 3. But Christ was slaughtered and killed on earth.

4. From the cleansing of sins, which preceded the ascension into heaven, about which the Apostle says, Hebrews I, 3: "After Christ had by himself made purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high." The Apostle speaks of the acquisition of the purification of sins, which was completed before the session of Christ at the right hand of God; but its application, by which we are made partakers of the remission of sins, continues until this machine of the world shall stand.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that the death of Christ was only a preparation for his priesthood, and that the sacrifice of Christ was not performed on earth, but is finally performed in the heavens. Their more important arguments are:

1. Whoever is not a priest on earth could not offer a sacrifice on earth; But Christ, etc.

Therefore. The minor is established from Hebrews VIII, 4: "If indeed he were on earth, he would not be a Priest." Resp. By the words of the Apostle, not simply the place, but the state of the earthly priesthood is excluded, so that the sense is: If Christ were on earth, or an earthly and typical priest, he would not be a priest sufficient for our redemption.

II. As all those things which the high priest of the old testament did in slaughtering the animal, before he entered the holy of holies, were only a preparation for the future sacrifice; so also the very affliction and death of Jesus Christ were only a certain preparation for his sacrifice, which he actually perfected upon entering heaven. Resp. The Socinians err from the truth by the whole heaven. For the O.T. priests sacrificed in the holy place, or the first tabernacle, but not in the Holy of Holies, in which there was no altar destined for sacrifices. The high priest entered the holy of holies once a year; but sacrifices were not made only once a year. The high priest was already a priest before he entered the holy of holies; so also Christ before he entered heaven.

Objection: But "Christ entered once into the holy places through his own blood, so that he found eternal redemption," Hebrews IX, 12. Therefore, the oblation of the blood of Christ was made in heaven. Resp. Christ the priest entered into the holy places through blood, but in the holy places he did not offer the blood as a sacrifice. Oblation is one thing, presentation of the blood another. In the O.T., the presentation of the blood and appearance before God in the holy of holies happened after the sacrifice was performed, not the sacrifice itself. So also the sacrificial oblation of the blood of Christ was made in his passion, Hebrews IX, 27; but the presentation of the blood was made in heaven, so that Christ might now appear in the sight of God for us, i.e., intercede for us, Hebrews IX, 24.

III. "We have a high priest who has passed through the heavens," Hebrews IV, 14. Therefore, Christ is a priest in heaven. Resp. We grant that our priest is in heaven, for the cause of interceding for us. But from this it does not follow that Christ was not a priest on earth, nor that he sacrificed there; just as it does not follow: The prophet Elijah ascended into heaven; Therefore, he was not a prophet on earth, but was finally made a prophet in heaven. The Apostle describes not the time of the priesthood, but the glorious state of our priest.

Question LXXX. For whom did Christ make satisfaction?

Christ satisfied the triune God for all the sins a) of all men fallen into sin b), and for all the penalties of sins c).

Proof a. 1) From the testimony of John, 1 Epistle II, 2: "Christ is the propitiation for our sins; indeed, not for ours only, but for (the sins of) the whole world." By this saying the universality of the merit and satisfaction of Christ is most openly established. For the Apostle proceeds from the commemoration of the faithful to the entire human race, with a very clear amplification, saying: "not for our sins only, but also for the sins of the whole world." Which amplification was indeed entirely necessary for the solid force of apostolic consolation, lest any of sinners should despair, and, carried away by the waves of doubts, presume himself excluded from the salutary fruit of the intercession of this paraclete.

2. From the Pauline testimony: "Christ gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity," Titus II, 14. Christ redeemed us from the guilt of all sin, because by his blood he cleanses us from all sin, 1 John I, 7; and also from the dominion of all sin, so that being made free from sin we may serve righteousness, Romans VI, 18.

Proof b. 1) From those sayings of scripture which are manifestly universal. In the O.T., the oracle of Isaiah is clearer than light, ch. LIII, 6: "All we like sheep have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way, and the Lord has laid on him (the Messiah) the iniquity of us all." In the N. Test., the apostolic words diffuse no less light: a) Romans VIII, 32: "God did not spare his own Son, but delivered him up for us all"; b) 2 Corinthians V, 14: "If one died for all, then all died"; c) Hebrews II, 9: "Jesus by the grace of God tasted death for everyone"; d) 1 Timothy II, 6: "One mediator between God and men, who gave himself as a ransom (ἀντίλυτρον) for all."

2. From those sayings of scripture which extend the merit of Christ even to the reprobate, and those who perish by their own fault: a) Romans XIV, 15: "Do not by your food destroy him for whom Christ died"; b) 1 Corinthians VIII, 11: "And the weak brother will perish by your knowledge, for whom Christ died"; c) 2 Peter II, 1: "There will be false teachers among you, who will secretly bring in destructive heresies, even denying the Lord who bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction"; d) Hebrews X, 29: Those who sin against the Holy Spirit are said to have been sanctified by the blood of the covenant.

Proof c. 1) Isaiah LIII, 5: "The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his wound we are healed." The word מוסר denotes chastisement, or affliction, which has the nature of a penalty, on account of guilt either proper or imputed. It is called the chastisement of peace, because by the chastisement or affliction of Christ, peace and impunity were acquired for us, as if to say: Christ therefore sustained penalties for the sins of men, so that men might be immune from penalties.

2. Galatians III, 13: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us." A curse is the execratory and damnatory sentence of the divine law, concerning the temporal and eternal penalties to be undergone which are due to sin. But Christ was made a curse for us, i.e., accursed, or execrable, by the divine casting, derivation, and imputation of our sins and punishments upon him, for the purpose that he might redeem us from the curse of the law, i.e., from the temporal and eternal punishment which the law denounces, or might free us by a price paid.

The antithesis is that of Perkins, Piscator, Jansen, Weigel, and others, who deny the universality of the satisfaction and merit of Christ; who rely on the following arguments:

1. "Christ gave his life as a ransom for many," Matthew XX, 28. Therefore, not for all. Resp. The opposition of "all" and "many" is not accurate. For all men are also many. Therefore, there is no consequence: Christ redeemed many by his blood, therefore a few elect (*).

(*) A multitude sometimes is called the university of men, especially when "many" are opposed to "one." The most perspicuous example of all is Romans V, 19, in which place they cannot but be πάντες, with no one excepted. This is plainly apparent 1) from the opposition, and that a twofold one, α) of words, for πολλοί are opposed to τῷ ἑνί, β) of expressions and things; for just as "many" are said to be sinners, namely all to a one (in which cause the Reformed agree with us); so equally "many" are called endowed with righteousness (as far

II. For whom Christ does not pray, for them he did not die; For both intercession and satisfaction are acts of the priestly office, and therefore of equal latitude; But Christ does not pray for all, John XVII, 9. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between the general and special intercession of Christ. The former prays for all, that they may be converted; the latter intercedes for the faithful, that they may be preserved in the acknowledged truth and concord.

III. Those for whom Christ died, God the Father loved, Romans V, 8. But he did not love the reprobate (for how would God love those whom he reprobates?). Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between the love of benevolence and the love of friendship. Those for whom Christ died, God loved with a love of benevolence; in which way he also loved the reprobate, not as reprobate, but as creatures and men.

IV. Those for whom Christ died, he reconciled to the Father and saves, Romans V, 10, cf. 2 Corinthians V, 14. But Christ did not reconcile the reprobate, nor does he save them; Therefore. Resp. a) The major premise is two-membered; 1) that they have been reconciled for whom Christ died; 2) that they have been saved. Reconciliation is understood either with respect to merit, insofar as it is acquired, or with respect to fruit and event, insofar as it is applied to salvation. If reconciliation is understood in the former sense, the major is granted, and the minor is denied. For Christ is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (therefore also of the reprobate). If it is understood in the latter sense, the major is denied. Romans V, 10 is understood as reconciliation admitted and applied. As for the latter member, or preservation, for it is required the constancy of reconciled grace, and therefore those who have been reconciled with salutary effect, and strive to remain in the state of grace, are saved.

V. Those to whom the satisfaction of Christ is not announced, for them Christ did not make satisfaction; otherwise the satisfaction and merit of Christ would be plainly useless to them. But not to all, etc. Therefore. The minor is constant; because there are many gentiles to whom the gospel of the death of Christ has not been announced. Resp. Those to whom the satisfaction of Christ is not announced by the destined will and counsel of God, for them Christ did not die. But that the satisfaction of Christ is not announced to many gentiles, this is not done by the destined will and counsel of God, simply denying the grace of vocation, but by the fault of men, who repel the word of the gospel, by which the satisfaction of Christ is announced. Acts XIII, 46.

VI. Whoever died for all men also died for the damned; But Christ did not die for the damned. Therefore. The minor is clear; because Christ died for those who are capable of eternal salvation, which the damned are not. Resp. The damned are considered either in a divided sense or in a composite sense. In a divided sense, those are called damned who in the state of the way have petulantly rejected the means of grace by which the satisfaction of Christ is offered, and thus have drawn condemnation upon themselves by their own fault; in a composite sense, those are called damned who, having received the final sentence, have been cast into the abyss of hell. Christ made satisfaction to God for all men, even for the damned, insofar as they were in the way, and could have escaped condemnation if they had admitted the means of grace.

VII. For whose cause Christ was not sent, for them he did not die. But Christ was not sent for the cause of all men, Matthew XV, 24. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between the priestly and prophetic office of Christ. The former is universal, the latter is exercised by the ministry (διακονία) of Christ either immediate or mediate. Christ performed the immediate prophetic function to the Israelites; the mediate through the Apostles to the gentiles. For the sons were to be fed before the dogs.

VIII. Christ died for the sheep, John X, 15; for the elect, Romans VIII, 34. Therefore, not for the goats, not for the reprobate. Resp. I deny the consequence. Christ indeed died for them, but not for them alone. By the same reasoning one might perhaps conclude; The pious will rise again; Therefore, not the impious.

IX. Christ never knew the reprobate, Matthew VII, 23. Therefore, he did not die for them. Resp. Christ never knew the reprobate with a special knowledge; but with a general knowledge he knows every man.

as acquisition is concerned), namely all, with none taken away; 2) from the interpretation; for those who in this verse are called πολλοί, the same in vv. 12 & 18 are called πάντες.

X. Those for whom Christ died receive the remission of sins. But not all men receive the remission of sins. Therefore. The major is established from Ephesians I, 7; Colossians I, 14, where the redemption made by the death of Christ is explained exegetically by the remission of sins. Resp. Distinguish between the acquisition and the application of the remission of sins. Those for whom Christ died, applying the death of Christ to themselves, receive the remission of sins.

Question LXXXI. Did Christ by his death also reconcile the angels to God?

Christ by his death did not reconcile angels to God a), neither the good b), nor the evil c).

Proof a. 1) Christ is called the mediator of God and men, 1 Timothy II, 5, but not the mediator of God and angels. 2) Christ did not assume the nature of angels and unite it personally to himself, Hebrews II, 16. Therefore, he did not redeem the angels. "What is not assumed is not healed" (Τὸ ἀπρόσληπτον, ἀθεράπευτον), says GREGORY NAZIANZEN.

Proof b. The good angels, since they are not only devoid of sin but also immune from the danger of sinning, do not need a satisfier.

Proof c. The evil angels are by divine judgment without mercy, says DANNHAVER, Hodosophia Phenomenon VII, p. 532, for they are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness for the judgment of the great day, Jude v. 6. Therefore, a mediator was not destined for them, who might loose those everlasting chains.

You say: Paul distinctly says in Ephesians I, 10: "God purposed to unite all things in Christ, which are in heaven and which are on earth." Cf. Colossians I, 20.

Resp. The angels in heaven were not reconciled to God through Christ, as they were never hateful to him; but men were reconciled to the angels through Christ. For with God reconciled, peace was also established with the angels. Cf. Luke II, 14; ch. XV, 10.

Question LXXXII. Did Christ, as man, merit anything for himself by his obedience?

Christ, as man, merited nothing for himself by his obedience.

Proof. 1) Because Christ, through the personal union, was endowed with all the fullness of the divinity, Colossians II, 9, and was anointed with the oil of gladness (the gifts of the Holy Spirit) above his companions, Psalm XLV, 8. Therefore, it was not necessary that he should merit anything for himself.

2. Christ obtained the name above every name by grace, Philippians II, 9, and by inheritance (κληρονομίαν), Hebrews I, 4. Therefore, not by merit.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians and Socinians, who maintain that Christ by his most humble obedience merited for himself the highest and singular grace. They urge:

I. The particle διὸ, in Philippians II, 9: "Wherefore God also has highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name." Resp. The particle διὸ is not taken by the Apostle causally (αἰτιολογικῶς), but ratiocinatively (συλλογιστικῶς), and indicates not a meritorious cause, but order and consequence. For humiliation was the way through which Christ came to glory, not the meritorious cause.

II. Hebrews II, 9: "We see Jesus, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory." Resp. The particle διὰ, to be rendered in Latin by per, denotes the way to glory and honor, not merit, as if to say: We see Jesus indeed crowned with glory, yet not otherwise than through the passion of death; that is; so that he should first suffer death, and by this way enter into glory. Cf. Luke XXIV, 26.

Question LXXXIII. What is the intercession of Christ?

Intercession. The intercession of Christ is the other act of the priestly office, by which Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), by the power of his universal merit, for all men, but especially for his elect, truly and properly, yet without any diminution of his majesty, intercedes, to obtain for them whatever he knows to be salutary for the body, and especially for the soul.

Question LXXXIV. What is the nature of Christ's intercession?

The intercession of Christ is not merely interpretative, by the showing of his merits a), not humble, by submission b); but it is expiatory (ἱλαστική) c), and efficacious for obtaining salutary goods for men d).

Proof a. Although it is most true that Christ moves God the Father by the virtue of his sacrifice once offered, to be propitious to sinners; yet the word ἐντυγχάνειν, Romans VIII, 34, Hebrews VII, 25, used of the intercession of Christ, implies more than that real, indeed, but mute showing of merits; for that seems to pertain to the prior act of the priestly office of Christ. The intercession of Christ is therefore not only real, but also vocal and oral.

Proof b. We are not here speaking of the humble mode of intercession, which pertained to the state of humiliation and the days of his flesh, Hebrews V, 7, where "he offered up prayers and supplications, with loud cries and tears, to him who was able to save him from death"; but of that intercession by which Christ, sitting at the right hand of God, intercedes for us, Romans VIII, 34. It is called by DANNHAVER, Hodosophia Phanomenon VIII, a theandric action, and therefore humbly sublime and sublimely humble. GREGORY NAZIANZEN says excellently, oration XXXVI: "It is not right, when we hear the voice of interpellation, to conceive in our mind Christ, for our sake, prostrating himself at the feet of the eternal Father. Far be that servile suspicion, and unworthy of the Spirit! For it is not the Father's part to require this, nor the Son's to suffer it, nor is it pious and right to think so of God." The intercession of Christ is full of majesty, John XVII, 24: "I will that where I am, they also may be with me, that they may behold my glory."

Proof c. The intercession of Christ is expiatory (ἱλαστική), because the foundation of this intercession is the satisfaction of Christ the intercessor, or his universal merit. For through and on account of his bloody satisfaction, or by the power of his merit, Christ the priest intercedes for us. Hence the Apostle says, Romans VIII, 34, that Christ, who died for us, and has now been raised to the right hand of God, intercedes for us; and Hebrews XII, 24, that the blood of Christ speaks better things than the blood of Abel.

Proof d. The intercession of Christ, the high priest, is efficacious; because whatever he asks of the Father is pleasing and approved by him. John XI, 42. The intercession of Christ is efficacious for obtaining salvation for us, although those who do not believe in Christ do not enjoy its effect. Therefore, it is called efficacious with respect to the salutary intention of Christ, not with respect to the event in the unbelieving and reprobate.

Question LXXXV. How many kinds of intercession of Christ are there?

The intercession of Christ is twofold, general and special. By general intercession Christ prays to the Father for all men, that the salutary fruit of his death may be applied to them a); by a special intercession He prays for the reborn elect, that they may be preserved and grow in faith and holiness b).

Proof a. 1) Christ interceded for the transgressors, Isaiah 53:12; Luke 23:34. He prayed for His crucifiers indefinitely, with no one excepted. But without doubt, some of them persisted in their impiety. Christ, however, praying for them, showed that, as far as it was in Him, He did not want them to be deprived of the fruit of His death, but rather to be converted and saved. 2) For whichever men Christ is the mediator, for them He is also the intercessor; for intercession is a mediatorial action. But Christ is the mediator for all men, 1 Timothy 2:5. Therefore, He is also the intercessor for all.

Proof b. John 17:9: "I am not praying for the world, but for those whom you have given me, for they are yours." By the world, the Savior understands worldly men, indulging in the lusts of the flesh, and stubbornly impious, for whom He does not intercede with a special prayer as He does for the Apostles, given by the Father into the school and discipline of Christ. How He prays for them, we read in John 17:11: "Holy Father, keep them in your name, which you have given me, that they may be one, even as we are one!" and v. 15: "I do not ask that you take them out of the world, but that you keep them from the evil one." Furthermore, v. 17: "Sanctify them in your truth." From which it is gathered that Christ intercedes for the reborn and elect in such a way that they may be preserved from evil, kept in the unity of faith, and be sanctified more and more by the word of truth.

Question LXXXVI. Does Christ also intercede for us in heaven?

Christ, having been raised to the right hand of God, intercedes truly and properly for all men, especially for the reborn and elect.

Proof. 1) From His priestly office; Christ is a priest in heaven, Hebrews 7:24, not through the offering of a victim, Hebrews X, 12. Therefore, through intercession. 2) From apostolic testimony; Christ is at the right hand of God and intercedes for us, Romans 8:34. Cf. Hebrews 7:24-25; C. 9:24. 3) From His office as paraclete, or advocate, 1 John

2:1; "My little children, I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin. But if anyone does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous."

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, and some of the Pontificians, who contend that Christ's intercession in heaven is not true and proper, but an appearance before God, a glorious presentation of Christ's body; who support their opinion with the following arguments.

I. Whoever has been made Lord of all, possessing absolute power in the matter of salvation, does not properly intercede for us. Reason; because he does not act as a lord by supplication. But Christ, etc. Matthew 28:18. Therefore. Response; We distinguish between an intercession of humility through submission, and one of authority through glorious postulation. Not the former, but the latter can consist with the full power conferred and the highest dominion.

II. We do not need a true intercession; because the Father Himself loves us, John 16:26-27. Response; When Christ says that He will not pray for the disciples, this is not to be understood ἀπλῶς, simply, because in the very next chapter, XVII, Christ prays most fervently for the disciples, but κατὰ τι, or in a certain respect, so that the sense is; that Christ alone will not pray for the disciples hereafter; not as if the angry Father would not admit the disciples into His sight, but because the reconciled Father loves them in Christ, in whom they believe, and will most graciously accept their prayers, so that by the withdrawal of Christ's visible presence, nothing may be lost from the disciples' advantage.

III. Christ's intercession in heaven is described by ἐμφανισμὸν, or the glorious appearance of Christ, and a presentation conformable to the state of glory; Therefore, it is not an intercession in the proper sense. Response; Εμφανισμός, or appearing before the face of God, does not take away ἐντεῦξιν, or intercession in the proper sense. The former precedes, the latter follows, Romans 8:34.

Question LXXXVII. What is the end of Christ's priestly office?

The end of Christ's priestly office is, on God's part, the demonstration of a) divine justice; b) divine mercy; on our part, it is redemption c). Finis O. S.

Proof a. From Romans 3:25; "God put forward Christ Jesus as a propitiation, ἱλαστήριον, through faith in his blood, to demonstrate his righteousness." Observation: 1) Christ is called ἱλατήριον, a propitiation; because by His own death and the shedding of His own blood He placated God, who was incensed against us for our sins. 2) Christ is a ἱλαστήριον through faith in His blood; because our trust rests on the blood of Christ, shed for us, without which shedding of Christ's blood there is no propitiation. 3) God put Christ forward as a ἱλαστήριον εἰς ἐνδειξιν δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ, to demonstrate His righteousness. By righteousness we understand the righteousness that vindicates sin; because Paul is dealing with a righteousness founded on shed blood, or one which demands a bloody death. But where righteousness is demonstrated in the exaction of a bloody death, there vindictive righteousness is declared. Therefore, it was necessary for Christ the priest, destined by divine decree to expiate the sins of men, to undergo a bloody death, so that from this it might become most clear to sinners that God, the most just judge, does not leave the crimes of men unpunished, since He vindicated them so severely in His own Son, the mediator of the human race.

Proof b. From Romans 5:8; "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us." The most merciful God gave a distinguished and incomparably commendable proof of His love by delivering His only-begotten Son to a most bitter death for wretched sinners, so that by this satisfactory death they might be restored to a state of grace. Therefore, from the satisfaction of Christ, a wonderful balance of divine justice and mercy shines forth.

Proof c. 1) From Galatians 4:4; "For this purpose the Son of God was made under the law, that he might redeem those who were under the law." 2) From Galatians 3:13; "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us."

Question LXXXVIII. What things are to be observed for a correct understanding of the redemption of the human race?

To salutarily understand the great benefit of our redemption, the following must be weighed with a pious estimation of the mind: 1) the redemption, 2) the captive, 3) the captive's chains, 4) the one detaining the captive, 5) the redeemer, 6) the end and fruit of the redemption.

Question LXXXIX. What kind of redemption is understood?

Redemption. It is not a corporal redemption that is understood here, but a spiritual one a); not extra-judicial, but judicial b); not simple, absolute, and metaphorical, but costly, satisfactory, and proper c).

Proof a. Corporal redemption is a liberation from those evils by which the body is afflicted, for example, the redemption of the Israelites from the Egyptian captivity, in respect of which Moses is called λυτρωτής, redeemer, Acts 7:36. Spiritual redemption is a liberation from sin, the wrath of God, the curse of the law, and temporal and eternal punishments. The redemption made by Christ is a spiritual liberation from sin, Titus 2:14; from the wrath of God, 1 Thessalonians 1:10; from the curse of the law, Galatians 3:13; from the tyranny of the devil, Hebrews 2:14-15; from hell and eternal death, Hosea 13:14, 1 Corinthians 15:54-55.

Proof b. Extra-judicial redemption is liberation from an inconvenience, inflicted by one who is not the judge of the afflicted. Thus, often in war a citizen or soldier is captured and redeemed from the power of the enemy, for example, Lot was redeemed by Abraham from the power of Chedorlaomer, Genesis 14:16. Judicial redemption is that by which a subject, having transgressed the law of his lord and judge, and by the same sentenced to death, prison, exile, or servitude, is restored to a state of liberty through the intervention of a price of redemption, or by supplication, either his own or another's, for example, the Jews in Persia, condemned to death, were redeemed from the sentence of King Ahasuerus through the intercession of Esther. Esther 8:8.

Proof c. Judicial redemption is either simple and absolute, or costly and satisfactory. The former is a liberation from an imposed penalty, without the intervention of a price, for example, the prophet Daniel, who was considered to have violated the command of the Persian king, was thrown to be torn apart by beasts; but by God's moderation and the closing of the lions' mouths, and also by the compassion and dispensation of King Darius, he was redeemed from the penalty, or liberated, without any price. The latter is that by which the guilty party is redeemed from guilt and punishment by the payment of a price. A simple liberation is metaphorically called a redemption. For properly speaking, to redeem signifies to buy again, just as the Greek words, λυτρῶν (which is from λύτρα, the price of redemption), ἀγοράζειν, ἐξαγοράζειν, and the Hebrew פָּדָה, designate a purchase or redemption which occurs with the intervention of a price. Therefore, since in the present argument, where we are dealing with the redemption of the human race, fallen into sin, performed by Christ, the same Hebrew and Greek words are used in the sacred code, we take them in their proper sense, because no necessity appears to us for departing from the proper sense. (*)

Question XC. What is the redemption of the human race performed by Christ?

The redemption of the human race is the spiritual, judicial, and most precious liberation of all men, bound by the chains of sin, from guilt, the offense of God, and temporal and eternal punishment, accomplished by Christ the θεάνθρωπος through His active and passive obedience, which God, the most just judge, graciously accepted as a most perfect λύτρον, so that the human race, vindicated into spiritual liberty, might live eternally with God.

Proof. That the redemption of the human race is not simple or absolute, but most precious and satisfactory, is proven:

1. From the testimony of Paul, 1 Corinthians 6:19-20: "Or do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, whom you have from God? You are not your own, for you were bought with a price (ἡγοράσθητε γὰρ τιμῆς)." We argue: Whoever does not have the power to abuse the members of the body for fornication, for the reason that they were bought with a price, their redemption is not absolute, but most precious. But all men do not have, etc. Therefore.

2. From the testimony of Peter, 1 Epistle 1:18: "Knowing that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your forefathers, not with perishable things such as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish or spot." Observation; 1) St. Peter connects a certain price to the word λυτρῶν, to redeem, removing gold and silver, by which things that are profitable and pleasing to the body are bought, and asserting that the price of our spiritual redemption is the most holy blood of Jesus, far more excellent than all gold and silver. 2) By the futile ways πατροπαράδοτον, the apostle understands the depraved custom of living, handed down from the fathers both through the contagion of original sin and through bad examples. We conclude: Whoever has been redeemed from the corruption of the carnal life not with gold and silver, but with precious blood, their redemption is not simple, made without the intervention of a price. But all men, etc. Therefore.

(*) Not only does no necessity urge us to depart from the proper signification of those words; but it is also necessary for us to hold it fast, since 1) the life of Christ, and therefore Christ himself, is called λύτρον, in Matthew 20:28 and Mark X, 45, and ἀντίλυτρον, in 1 Timothy 2:6, and 2) the entire obedience of Christ altogether obtains the force of satisfaction, rendered to God the judge and avenger, about which has been said above.

3. From the clear designation of τῷ λύτρω καὶ ἀντιλύτρω. Christ Himself makes mention of λύτρον, Matthew 20:28: "The Son of Man came... to give his life as a ransom (λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν) for many." Λύτρον, however, by force of its etymology, denotes a price by which someone is liberated not only from captivity, but also from servitude, exile, death, and other troubles. Paul mentions Ἀντιλύτρον in 1 Timothy 2:6: "There is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom (ἀντιλύτρον) for all." Ἀντιλύτρον, as explained by Hugo Grotius, is such a λύτρον in which the liberator undergoes something similar to the evil that was threatening the one who is being liberated; a paraphrase of which can be gathered from Galatians 3:13: "Christ redeemed (ἐξηγόρασεν) us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us." We conclude: Whoever redeems sinners by a certain ransom, undergoing the kind of evil that was threatening the sinners themselves, his redemption is not simple or absolute, but costly, satisfactory, and meritorious. But Christ, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that the redemption made by Christ is not satisfactory or meritorious, but simple. Their main arguments are:

I. Just as we are said to be sold under sin, so by Christ we are redeemed from it (the reason for opposites is the same): But we were sold under sin without any price. Therefore, we are also redeemed from sin without an intervening price. Response:

Negative to the Major premise. The term "selling" is more general than "buying." A brother can sell a brother, 1) by drawing him into the society of sin; but a brother cannot redeem a brother, Psalm 49:8. 2) He is sold under sin who does it by choice, so that he becomes a slave of sin, John 8:34; but we are redeemed not only from servitude, but also from the curse of the law and the punishment of sin, which cannot happen without the intervention of a price.

II. From whom the λύτρον is not paid, from him we are said to be improperly redeemed; But to the devil, etc. Therefore. Response; 1) Negative to the Major premise. For someone can be properly redeemed from the punishment of prison by a paid price, and yet the ransom is not paid to the prison. 2) We distinguish between the supreme judge and the lictor. God is the supreme judge, against whom alone men principally sin, Psalm 51:6, who confines them under sin, Romans 11:32, Galatians 3:22. To Him Christ paid the most precious ransom, His own blood, when He offered Himself as a victim to God, Ephesians 5:2. The devil is the lictor and minister of the prison, to whom the price of redemption is not owed.

III. God redeemed the people of Israel, with no price paid, through Moses, who is also called λυτρωτής, Acts 7:36, and was a type of Christ, Deuteronomy 18:15, John 6:14. Therefore, in the same way, without a price, Christ redeemed us from the tyranny of the devil. The reason for the consequence is: because whatever is in the type, the same is also in the antitype, and whatever is not in the former, is not in the latter either. Response; 1) We distinguish between a corporal redemption, which happens by power, with no intervening ransom, and a spiritual redemption, which happens by justice; for this, a certain price must be paid. 2) The agreement of the type and antitype is respective and fitting, not absolute and in every way.

IV. God himself made our redemption, Luke 1:68. Therefore, he did not demand a satisfactory redemption. The consequence is proven; In a proper redemption, the price is given on behalf of the captive, so that he may be released, not, however, to him who procures the redemption. But God the Father procured the redemption of the Son; Therefore, the price was not given to him. Response; God himself made the redemption through a decree not absolute, but ordained. For he procured the redemption, as a most benign Creator; but he demanded satisfaction, as a most just Judge, so that his justice might be satisfied. Therefore, God the Father demonstrated in the work of redemption both his justice and his mercy. Justice; because he most justly punished the penalties of sins due to the debtors in their surety, Christ. Mercy; because he decreed the redemption of Christ, accepted his satisfaction, and willed its fruit to be transferred to us.

V. We nowhere read in the sacred letters that we were redeemed from divine justice or judgment; Therefore, divine justice did not demand a satisfactory redemption. Response: We are said to be redeemed from the divine wrath, Romans 5:9, 1 Thessalonians 1:10. But the wrath of God is the just will of God to punish sins. We are said to be redeemed from the curse of the law, Galatians 3:13; which is the most just sentence of God the judge condemning sinners.

Question XCI. Which captive did Christ redeem?

The captive whom Christ redeemed is the entire human race.

Proof: Because the whole world is guilty before God, Romans 3:19, that is, the entire human race is subject to the divine law, and on account of transgressions of the law is liable to guilt and punishment; therefore Christ gave himself as a ransom (ἀντίλυτρον) for all, 1 Timothy 2:6.

Question XCII. What are those bonds from which Christ redeemed the human race?

The bonds from which Christ redeemed the human race are sins a), the offense of God b), and temporal and eternal punishments c).

Proof a. That sins are snares with which the devil is accustomed to entrap men, Paul teaches, 2 Timothy 2:25-26: "if perhaps God may grant them repentance leading to a knowledge of the truth, so that they may come to their senses and escape from the snare of the devil, after being captured by him to do his will." Not only by the error of dogmas, but also by the vices of life are mortals ensnared by the devil, says Theophylactus on this passage, quoted by Calovius in his illustrated bible, p. 1023. But Christ gave himself for us to redeem us from all iniquity, Titus 2:14.

Proof b. Jesus rescued us from the coming wrath, says Paul, 1 Thessalonians 1:10. Observation: The wrath is ἐρχομένη, that which is always imminent, and adheres with silent steps, as it were. The law declares the wrath of God, by announcing a condemnatory sentence; therefore Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse himself, Galatians 3:13.

Proof c. The punishments of sin are a bad conscience, fear of death, the tyranny of the devil, and eternal condemnation; from all these Christ redeemed us, as the Apostle teaches, Hebrews 2:14: "Since therefore the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise partook of the same things, that through death he might destroy the one who has the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong slavery." The Redeemer himself promised this, Hosea 13:14: "I shall ransom them from the power of Sheol; I shall redeem them from Death."

Question XCIII. Who is the one detaining the captive?

The one detaining the captive is either the master or the minister. The supreme master and most just judge is God a); The minister of the prison, and also the tyrant, is the devil b).

Proof a. God was offended by the sins of men; for He hates all workers of iniquity, Psalm 5:6. Therefore He judicially confined all men in disobedience, Romans 11:32, and under sin, Galatians 3:22. To Him the ransom had to be paid, not that any advantage might accrue to Him, but lest anything be detracted from His justice.

Proof b. Sinners are said to be caught in the snare of the devil to do his will, 2 Timothy 2:26. Therefore the devil is the minister of the prison, and also a tyrant and a hunter, *); who binds the impious with the (*) Rightly so, indeed. For since the malignant Spirit is the common adversary of all, and an enemy to both God and the entire human race; he himself, as a vicious enemy, led men captive because by fallacious persuasion he brought it about that they, defecting from God, would obey his will. For this reason he is said to be the one who has τὸ κράτος τοῦ θανάτου, Hebrews 2:14. This is indeed the same as the κέντρον τοῦ θανάτου, that is, sin, of which he snare of sins. To him, not a price, but punishment is due.

Question XCIV. Who is the redeemer?

The one a) catholic redeemer of the whole human race b) is Christ the θεάνθρωπος, possessing the right c), the strength d), and the will e) to redeem.

Proof a. Christ is the one redeemer; because He is the one mediator between God and men, who gave Himself as a ransom for all, 1 Timothy 2:5-6.

Proof b. Christ is the catholic redeemer; because He is the Savior of the world, 1 John 4:14, the Savior of all men, especially of believers, 1 Timothy 4:10.

Proof c. Christ possesses the right and power to redeem. He has the right of ownership over us, as God and Lord of all, He also has the right of kinship, as true man, bone of our bones and flesh of our flesh. For which reason He is called by Job, c. 19:25.

Proof d. Christ is furnished with the most sufficient strength to redeem, for He is παντοκράτωρ, almighty, Revelation 1:8.

Proof e. The most ardent love, which Paul proclaims, Ephesians 5:25, testifies to His will to redeem; "Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her."

Question XCV. By what means did Christ redeem us?

The means of redemption is both the most bitter passion of Christ, the shedding of His blood, and His satisfactory death a), and also the most complete fulfillment of the divine law, performed in our stead b).

Proof a. Christ entered once for all into the holy places, not by means of the blood of goats and calves but by means of his own blood, thus securing an eternal redemption, Hebrews 9:12. Christ, having once entered the heaven of divine majesty through His own blood, made satisfaction for the sins of the whole human race, which it has committed and will commit until the end of the world, so that His redemption is valid at any time and for all sins.

Proof b. For as by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, so by the one man's obedience the many will be made righteous, Romans 5:19. Therefore, Christ rendered the most perfect obedience to the divine law in our place, so that, redeemed from sin, we might be accounted righteous before God.

Question XCVI. What is the end of redemption?

The ultimate end of redemption is the glory of God a), the intermediate end is freedom from the guilt and dominion of sin b).

Proof a. You were bought with a price; so glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's, 1 Corinthians 6:20.

Proof b. So if the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed, John 8:36. Christ by His satisfactory redemption acquired for men freedom from the guilt and dominion of sin, of which freedom they are partakers who through faith are in Christ Jesus, Romans 8:1.

Question XCVII. What is the prophetic office of Christ?

Christ's prophetic office. The prophetic office of Christ is that by which Christ the θεάνθρωπος both explained the true meaning of the divine law and most clearly revealed the will of God concerning the salvation of men by the word of the gospel, with the serious intention that the way to obtain justice and eternal salvation might be established for all men.

Observation: It was the duty of the prophets of the Old Testament to teach the word of God, to hand down the true worship of God, to know hidden things and to foretell the future, (*). Since Christ also did these himself is the author and effector, 1 Corinthians 15:56. But to name him the minister of the prison; I would hardly dare; for he cannot be a minister unless he is faithful and obedient, who turns himself to the nod and will of the Lord; nor is it probable that the torturers of the damned are evil demons, who are themselves the most miserable of all the damned, and are to be afflicted perpetually with the most bitter torments. They are themselves captives, and enclosed in prison; indeed, they have been such ever since the time they first sinned and fell away from God, 2 Peter 2:4. Therefore, they are not, nor ever were, ministers of the prison.

(*) Miracles were also an outstanding and proper characteristic of the prophets, which indeed only they, although not all of them, performed. For they were necessary to create faith in the doctrine and prediction, especially when some principal part of the doctrine things, He thus fulfilled the office of a prophet.

Question XCVIII. What kind of prophet is Christ?

Christ is the greatest a), catholic b), most illuminated c), most sealed d), most effective e), and exemplary f) prophet.

Proof a. "A great prophet has arisen among us," the people said, Luke 7:16. Christ is that great prophet whom God promised, Deuteronomy 18:18: "I will raise up for them a prophet like you from among their brothers; I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him." Peter shows that Christ is that promised prophet, like Moses, in Acts 3:22, and the Jews acknowledged it, John 1:45; c. 6:14. What more? The Apostle asserts that Christ is far more eminent than Moses. For he was a servant in the house of the heavenly Father; but this one is the only-begotten son. Hebrews 3:5-6. (**).

was either to be revealed for the first time, or to be more fully declared, and there was a danger that the divine legation of the Prophet might be brought into doubt, for then his authority could not be confirmed otherwise than by effects proper and supreme to God alone, which are miracles. Exodus 4:1, 8. Numbers 16:28, 29, 30. Mark 16:20. John 3:2. 5:36. Hebrews 2:4.

a) One reason, true, signified by God himself, which has three parts, comprehended in one saying, Deuteronomy 34:10-12, is namely 1) the singular mode of divine revelation, which happened to Moses, and the excellence of his person, since Moses, and he alone, was permitted to converse familiarly with God, v. 10. add Exodus 33:11. Numbers 12:6, 8. and cf. with John 1:18. Matthew 11:27; 2) The multitude and magnitude of miracles, v. 11. cf. with John 15:24; 3) The governance of the whole people, over whom that one Prophet, Moses, also the Leader, presided, v. 12. coll. with Hebrews 3:1, in which place the connection of the words, ὡς καὶ Μωσῆς, is connected not so much with those, πιστὸν ὄντα, (for Moses had this in common with other Prophets, in that therefore there was nothing singular and preeminent) as with these, ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ ὄϊκῳ αὐτοῦ. To this third property and preeminence of Moses should be referred the function of the office of μεσίτης in sanctioning the divine covenant, which pertains to the whole nation, Galatians 3:19. add Exodus 19:3-8; 20:19; 34:27. Deuteronomy 5:5. In which not only the comparison of Christ and Moses is seen, but also the excellence of Christ is conspicuous, in respect of α) the covenant, of which Christ is the sponsor and μεσίτης of a new and better one, not that of the law, but of the gospel, Hebrews 8:5-6; 12:18-25; β) the people, for Christ is the μεσίτης not of a certain nation, like Moses, but of the entire human race, Galatians 3:20. ὁ δὲ μεσίτης (that very one, whom our religion venerates, and who is different from him who was mentioned in v. 19) ἐνὸς οὐκ ἔστι (understand, λαοῦ, and see v. 28. add Romans 3:29-30).

b) Another reason, however, is false, which is opposed by the testimonies of Holy Scripture, so far is it from being able to be confirmed by them. There are indeed four errors, Proof b. Christ is a catholic prophet; because He is the true light that enlightens every man coming into the world, John 1:9. Αυτοπροσώπως indeed, or in His own person, He announced the gospel to the Jews, but its universal preaching among all nations, as He was about to ascend into heaven, He commanded to the apostles, Matthew 28:19.

Proof c. Christ is a most illuminated prophet; for He is, by virtue of the personal union, endowed with the light of omniscience, and blessed with the clearest vision of God. For He was anointed with the oil of gladness above all His companions, Psalms 45:8, and received the Holy Spirit οὐκ ἐκ μέτρου, John 3:34, from which all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden in Him, Colossians 2:3. He rejoiced in the most intimate contemplation of the heavenly father. "No one has ever seen God, but the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has made him known." John 1:18.

Proof d. Christ is a most sealed prophet; as one whom God the Father sealed, John 6:27. He sealed and confirmed him both by the testimony heard three times from heaven; 1) at the entrance of His office, to be avoided with all foresight; 1) The error of the Jews, a) whom the vain hope deceives, and has indeed deceived for so long, that the Messiah, whom they fruitlessly await, will, like Moses, lead the Jewish nation, having loosed the bonds of captivity and calamity, into the land of Canaan; as if the salvation to be recovered by the benefit of Christ ought to be none other than temporal, and as if it pertained only to the Jews; and not by Moses, but by Joshua as leader, did the descendants of Abraham enter the land granted to them by the benefit of God; b) by whose preconceived opinion the person of Christ was to be known by some heavenly sign, just as Moses had shown their ancestors bread sent down from heaven, John 6:14 coll. with v. 30, 31, 32. 2) The error of the Socinians, who imagine that Christ, under the auspices of publicly administering his office, ascended into heaven, or, as they are accustomed to say, was rapt away, for the purpose of God teaching him his will, to be announced to men, just as we read related of Moses in Exodus 34:27-28. This fable of theirs arose from no other cause than extreme desperation, when they did not find a way, denying the divinity of Christ, to explain the meaning of such sayings as John 1:2; 3:13; 6:38, 62; 16:28. 3) The error of certain Roman-Catholics, that Moses, just like Christ, performed a threefold office, namely, priestly, prophetic, and royal. Worthy of being read is J. Frischmuth's oration against Barthold Nihusius. 4) The common error of the Socinians and Roman-Catholics, although proceeding from different principles, when they think that Christ was like Moses in that he himself brought new laws. But α) the legislative power does not at all pertain to the prophetic office, to which they nevertheless refer it, but entirely to the royal; β) nor do laws properly and strictly so called, and certainly not new laws, befit the kingdom of Christ, insofar as it is of Christ. γ) Moses was not the law-giver, but the minister and interpreter of the law which God had sanctioned in that form of government, which is called a theocracy, for which reason he is called μεσίτης, not νομοθέτης, Galatians 3:19. δ) Christ never brought any new laws. For all those which the adversaries bring forth, are either plainly not laws, properly so named (e.g., concerning salutary trust to be placed in Christ, concerning the right use of the New Covenant Sacraments; these, and things of this kind, pertain not to the legal will of God, which demands duties to be performed by us, but to the evangelical will, which offers us benefits to be received, yet in a manner consistent with the order of salvation); or they are not new laws (e.g., the prohibition of unjust revenge, and hatred of enemies, Matthew 5:44. add Exodus 23:4-5. Leviticus 19:17-18. Romans 12:19-20. add Deuteronomy 32:35. Proverbs 25:21-22. concerning anxiety of mind and distress, Luke 21:34. Matthew 6:25. add Psalm 37:5; 55:23.) But when ancient laws are called new, the reason for the name lies partly in this, that they were illuminated and confirmed by new moving arguments, John 13:34; partly that they were renewed, brought out of darkness into light, as it were, and purged of many human corruptions, 1 John 2:7-8. And so in Matthew 5, Christ did not oppose his doctrine to the divine laws, but to the opinion of the Elders, and to perverse interpretation, as is plainly apparent from v. 20, 21, 43. Therefore this word, πληρῶσαι, in v. 17, is not to supply, as if there had been some defects in the holy law of God, which was always the most perfect norm of actions; but it is to fulfill, not only by obeying, but also by teaching, namely to hand down to men the perfect and integral meaning of the law, hitherto miserably perverted and mutilated by the Jewish masters; for to this perfection is opposed defection, and indeed in doctrine, v. 19.

Matthew 3:17; 2) in the middle of its course, Matthew 17:5; 3) near the end of its course, John 12:28; and by the power of performing miracles, by which, as if by impressed seals, the doctrine of Christ was fortified.

Proof e. Christ is a most effective prophet; as one who taught heavenly truth most clearly, confuted falsehood most solidly, exhorted most gravely, and foretold the future most truly.

Proof f. Christ is an exemplary prophet, who expressed in deeds what He taught in words. From which He is heard as a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people, Luke 24:19.

Question XCIX. According to which nature is Christ a catholic prophet?

Christ is a catholic and most perfect prophet according to both natures, human a) and divine b).

Proof a. According to His human nature, Christ taught with His living voice for a whole three years and more, indicated the sacraments to be celebrated, Matthew 26:19; C. 28:19, and chose for Himself ministers of the word and sacraments, Matthew 28:19 and John 20:21.

Proof b. According to His divine nature, He joined power, efficacy, and the highest authority to the word and sacraments. Whence, as the Apostles preached everywhere, the Lord worked with them, Mark 16:20 (*).

(*) To explain this difference a little more distinctly, the miracles of Christ pertain N) to his human nature, in a twofold way: 1) inasmuch as he himself did them in the name of the Father, John 3:2; 10:25; 2) as he implored the help of the Father, and professed to be acting for the glory of the Father, John 11:41-42. He himself expressly added this reason; that they may believe that I was sent by you: O) to the divine nature of Christ, in a threefold way: 1) inasmuch as Christ claims for himself a power and authority equal, and altogether the same, as that of the Father, John 5:19; in the latter part indeed there is a twofold strength of proof: One in the universality of the thing, ἃ γὰρ ... ταῦτα καὶ κ.τ.λ. without any exception (but there would have to be something proper and preeminent to the Father, unless Christ were the highest God, equal and co-equal to the Father); The other in the universality of the mode, ὁμοίως ποιεῖ. The former words, however, which our adversaries vehemently object to us, testify to nothing more than this; that the son does nothing, and indeed cannot do anything, alone, separated from the Father. From this very fact shines forth the closest and necessary conjunction of the son with the Father, which, since it is mutual, is certainly of such value that neither can the son do anything without the Father, nor, in turn, can the Father do anything without the son. See John 10:30, coll. with the preceding v. 28, 29. add. 14:10. 2) Inasmuch as he himself performed such great works in his own name, by his own will, and by his own power. Matthew 8:3-4. Luke 7:14. This saying is particularly noteworthy, Luke 4:36. No one divinely sent, not even an angel, ever dared to act in this way. All, if they undertook anything, did it under divine auspices; always appealing to the will and authority of the highest Deity: כה אמר יהוה The one greatest of all prophets, Moses, never fails to call God the effector of such great things, God, he says, did this, but he lent his hands to God Exodus 4:22-23; 7:16; 9:14; 14:21, 24. At no time did he dare to say: I will accomplish this! thus I will, thus I command! in the way that Christ, and that one Christ, did not hesitate to speak. What then? That his Legates performed their miracles in the name of Christ, which would by no means have been lawful for them, if the son were inferior to the Father. Certainly they would have had to appeal to the name of the Father at the same time, and even to have placed it before the name of Jesus. Acts 3:6; 4:10, 30; 16:18. 3) As he himself exhibited his miracles to men with this intention, that he might reveal his own glory, John 2:11. But all things are to be directed to the glory of the one God. As for the miracles themselves, since Christ had to be not only a Prophet, but also the greatest of all Prophets, and therefore greater than Moses; it was a necessary consequence that he one among all should excel in clearly singular miracles, John 15:24. Let us see, therefore, how outstandingly our Jesus surpassed all divine Prophets, not even excepting Moses, in the miracles performed by him: I. In multitude, John 20:30; 21:25. In one hour there was a huge number of miracles, Luke 7:21. The confession of the Jews is extant in John 7:31. II. In variety; if indeed α) There is almost no kind of created thing in which many of Christ's miracles were not to be seen, namely 1) in heaven, Luke 23:44-45; 2) in the air, Matthew

Question C. What did Christ the prophet teach?

Christ the prophet taught primarily the gospel a), and secondarily the law b).

Proof a. 1) From the testimony of John the Baptist: "For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ," John 1:17. Grace and truth are the marrow of the evangelical proclamation, inasmuch as it is the truest doctrine concerning the grace of God. 2) From the saying of the Messiah, Isaiah 61:1: "The Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me, because the LORD has anointed me to bring good news to the poor; he has sent me"; the fulfillment of which prophecy is found in Matthew 11:5: "The poor have good news preached to them." This is understood as the poor in spirit, who hunger and thirst for the righteousness of Christ, Matthew 5:6. 3) The argument of the doctrine which Christ professed in the days of His flesh is found in Mark 1:14: "Jesus came into Galilee, proclaiming the gospel of the kingdom, and saying: 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent and believe in the gospel.'"

Proof b. Christ neither abrogated, nor mitigated, nor perfected the old moral law, since it is most perfect, Psalm 19:8; yet He vindicated the same from the corruptions of the Pharisees and solidly interpreted it, see Matthew 5:21 sqq. Therefore, Christ is not a new legislator, but an interpreter and vindicator of the old law.

Question CI. In how many ways does Christ exercise His prophetic office?

8:26; 3) on earth, Matthew 27:51-52. in fruits, Matthew 21:19: and crops, Mark 8:6. John 6: 4) in water and the sea, John 2:9. Matthew 8:26. John 6:19: 5) in spirits, by expelling malignant demons; 6) in men, both living, especially the sick, who were suffering from some incurable disease, and the dead; 7) in brute animals, specifically quadrupeds, Matthew 8:30-32, and aquatic animals, Mark 8:7, 9. John 6: Luke 5:5-6. John 21:3, 6, 11. β) Nor is there any kind of miracle of which Christ did not give many examples. That there can be four, and no more, kinds of miracles, is apparent from this: that of all things there are not, and cannot be, more than four properties: 1) existence, as the philosophers say, 2) essence, or nature, both common and proper, 3) quantity, and 4) quality. In all these, therefore, our Jesus manifested a power altogether divine, 1) by first bringing things into being, and calling things that are not as though they were, John 9:32. add Romans 4:17: 2) by changing the nature of things, John 2:9: 3) by increasing quantity, with one word, Mark 8:7-9. John 6:11: 4) by removing quality, by a wonderful conversion, as in restoring the health of the sick, in returning life to the dead, in the fig tree suddenly withering, and many other things similar to these. All these things, without any natural cause fit and suitable for such great effects. III. In magnitude. To be sure, there are four miracles that are the greatest of all, and proper to Christ: 1) The opening of the eyes of a man, blind from birth, John 9:32: 2) The casting out of demons from bodies, which work indeed befitted no one, except him to whom this was given, that he alone should destroy the works of the devil: 3) The recall of the dead to life, and in such a way as he himself willed, John 5:20-21: 4) The recall of his own dead body to life, John 2:18-19; 10:18, of which power and might the most evident proof was the strength of Christ, when he was already on the point of breathing out his soul, Mark 15:37 and 39. IV. In utility: For among all the miracles of Christ, not one was ever done to the detriment and harm of any man, so that all might know that he himself was born for the salvation of all; Moses on the contrary, Elijah, and other divine Prophets, by their miracles both benefited good men, and harmed the wicked, Luke 9:54-56. Let us also turn our minds to those things which are singular in the prophecies of Christ, as being indications of divinity, and for that reason not befitting any of the other Prophets, specifically these two: 1) That Christ foretold many things about his own affairs, and also pertaining to his own glory, and especially about the amplification of his kingdom, Matthew 26:64; 24 and 25 entire. Revelation 1:13 ff; 2 and 3 entire. 2) That Christ confirmed those things which he himself foretold about future events with no other assertion than the authority of himself speaking, and thus swore by himself, for he generally used this manner of speaking, which no one else ever used: ἀμὴν, ἀμὴν, λέγω ὑμῖν. Add. Matthew 24:34. John 14:29. Revelation 2:1, 8, 12, 18; 3:1, 7, 14. The other Prophets, however, to a man, never spoke in their own name, they always appealed to the authority of God speaking, and swearing, with this accustomed turn of phrase: כִּי יְהוָה & כֹּה אָמַר יְהוָה.

Christ exercises His prophetic office a) immediately, b) mediately.

Proof a. Christ in the days of His flesh taught the gospel αυτοπροσώπως and immediately with His honey-sweet mouth, purged the moral law from the leaven of the Pharisees, and prepared His disciples for their future ministry.

Proof b. Christ mediately, through the Apostles (whom, however, He had called immediately) and their successors, the faithful ministers of the church (called mediately by Christ), reveals to men the will of the heavenly Father concerning the means of salvation and eternal salvation itself, and through His doctrine operates in the hearts of men. Therefore, the following pertain to the prophetic office of Christ: 1) the promulgation of the divine counsel concerning the redemption of the human race, made through the doctrine of the gospel, 2) the institution and preservation of the ecclesiastical ministry, 3) the ordination of the sacraments, 4) the gift of the Holy Spirit, 5) the call to the church, 6) illumination, conversion, regeneration, renewal, confirmation of faith.

Question CII. Was Christ taken up to heaven to learn the mysteries of heaven, before He undertook His solemn teaching office?

Christ, before the beginning of His prophetic office, was not taken up in His body into heaven to learn the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven.

Proof. 1) Because there is a deep silence in the sacred writings about that rapture of Christ into heaven before the start of His prophetic office. 2) Christ entered heaven only once, and indeed through blood, Hebrews 9:12; He ascended into heaven once, Ephesians 4:10, Acts 2:32. 3) That rapture was not necessary, since Christ possessed all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge by virtue of the personal union. Colossians 2:3. 4) During the forty-day period, in which the Socinians claim that rapture took place, He was with the wild beasts, not in heaven; He was tempted for forty whole days, not taught in heaven, Mark 1:13. He was led by the Holy Spirit into the desert for the purpose of being tempted by the devil, not to be snatched up into heaven, Matthew 4:1.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who contend that Christ, before He began His public teaching office, was taken up into heaven to learn celestial mysteries; who try to persuade us of their most vain opinion with the following arguments:

I. They urge the assertions of Christ: "I have come down from heaven... to do the will of him who sent me," John 6:38. "I came from the Father and have come into the world," John 16:28. Response: Christ is said to have descended from heaven and to have come from the Father, not with respect to His human nature, but by reason of His divine nature, not by local motion, but by the assumption of human nature and the manifestation made through it on earth. Instance: But the Son of Man is said to have descended from heaven and to have ascended into heaven, John 3:13. Response: The Son of Man in that place denotes the person, not the nature; that same person, who after the incarnation is the Son of Man, and at the appointed time ascends into heaven, descended before the incarnation to become the Son of Man.

II. John 8:28: "I do nothing on my own authority, but speak just as the Father taught me." Response: God the Father taught Christ, not by snatching Him up to heaven, but by anointing Him with the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

III. Moses and Paul were caught up to heaven: Therefore, this must be stated all the more of the Lord Jesus. Response: The argument can be inverted: Moses ascended Mount Sinai, and Paul was caught up to heaven, to learn the will of God, previously unknown to them; Therefore, Christ before the beginning of His office was not caught up to heaven, because from the first moment of His conception He was anointed with the Holy Spirit οὐκ ἐκ μέτρου, John 3:15, and knew all things, John 20:10. Surely, he who has the omniscient τὸν λόγον as an internal teacher does not need to be caught up to heaven and receive celestial information.

Question CII. What is the royal office of Christ?

The royal office of Christ is that by which Christ θεάνθρωπος (theanthropos / God-man), being constituted as lord of all things which are in heaven and on earth, and especially as king and head of the church, governs all things in his kingdom of power, grace and glory with supreme majesty, so that they may serve the glory of God and the salvation of the elect.

Question CIV. What kind of King is Christ?

Christ is a most exalted king a), spiritual b), eternal c), catholic d), omnipotent e), omnipresent f), omniscient g), renowned in victory h).

Proof a. Christ is called the prince of the kings of the earth, Rev. 1:5, the king of kings, Rev. 19:11.

Proof b. Jesus answered: My kingdom is not of this world, John 18:36. Indeed the kingdom of Christ is in the world and over the world, but not of the world; that is: it is not governed in the manner of the princes of this age, not with iron arms or carnal weapons. Christ refused the offered political governance, John 6:15, nor did he wish to function in the office of a civil judge, Luke 12:14.

Proof c. There is no end to the kingdom of Christ, Dan. 4:31, ch. 7:14, Luke 1:33.

Proof d. Christ dominates from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth, Ps. 72:8, Zech. 9:10.

Proof e. Eph. 4:10. Christ ascended above all heavens, that he might fill all things. He fills all things, who is omnipresent, Jer. 23:5.

Proof f. Christ is παντοκράτωρ (pantokrator / almighty ruler), Rev. 1:8, that is, the omnipotent governor, to whom also belongs καρδιάρχια (kardiarchia / rule over hearts), dominion over the consciences and hearts of men; of which he gave a special example in that very humble conveyance, mention of which is made in Matt. 21:3, where he moved the heart of the owner of the donkey to lend the animal, and the hearts of the children to sing Hosanna.

Proof g. Christ is an omniscient King, because he knows all things, John 21:17, and he searches the kidneys and hearts, Rev. 2:23.

Proof h. The triumph of Christ is threefold: 1) in hell, into which he descended gloriously; 2) on earth, which he revisited alive, having been raised from death; 3) in heaven, into which he was most magnificently carried up. Therefore he triumphed over the world, death, the devil and hell.

Question CV. How many kinds of kingdom does Christ have?

The kingdom of Christ is threefold: the kingdom of power (*), grace, and glory.

Question CVI. What is the kingdom of power?

The kingdom of power is that by which Christ most powerfully preserves and governs all creatures in this universe, for the praise of the Creator and the prosperity of creatures.

Observation. The subjects in the kingdom of power are generally all creatures, or, in the phrase of Scripture, all the works of God's hands, Ps. 8:7, 1 Cor. 15:27, Eph. 1:20. Specifically in this kingdom the subjects of Christ are those whom this king holds under his feet, reigning in the midst of them, Ps. 110:2, Eph. 1:13. The royal acts in the kingdom of power are: both the preservation and governance of all creatures, and indeed the subjection of enemies.

Question CVII. What is the kingdom of grace?

The kingdom of grace is that by which Christ gathers the church militant on earth, governs it, adorns it with spiritual gifts, preserves and defends it for the praise of the divine name, the destruction of the satanic kingdom, and the salvation of the faithful.

Observation. The subjects in this kingdom of grace are all faithful men who constitute the militant church. The royal acts are the collection, governance, adornment, preservation, and defense of the church against the enemies of grace, and dominion in the midst of them.

Question CVIII. What is the kingdom of glory?

The kingdom of glory is that by which Christ most gloriously rules the church triumphant in heaven, and fills it with eternal happiness, for the praise of the divine name and the eternal refreshment of the blessed.

Observation. The subjects in this kingdom of glory are both good angels and blessed men. The royal acts are: the resurrection of the faithful dead to life; their solemn introduction into eternal life, Matt. 25:34; and their most happy and most glorious governance.

(*) Or, if you prefer, the kingdom of nature: For 1) it is not power, but nature which is opposed to both grace and glory; 2) Christ exercises his power in every kingdom, and in none alone, but joined with infinite goodness and wisdom. Concerning power in the kingdom of grace see Col. 1:11; concerning the same divine perfection in the kingdom of glory, Phil. 3:20-21.

You say: There is also given a fourth kingdom of Christ, namely the kingdom of justice over evil angels and damned men. Response: We refer the kingdom of justice to the kingdom of power.

Question CIX. Will the kingdom of Christ have an end?

The kingdom of grace will indeed be terminated on the last day a), but the kingdom of glory will never cease or be finished b).

Proof a. For Christ will hand over the kingdom to the Father, 1 Cor. 15:24, both by way of presentation, as if for inspection, and by way of abdication; not as if Christ were about to abdicate every kingdom, but because he will no longer administer the kingdom of grace through word and sacraments in the midst of enemies. Conf. D. CALOV. in bibl. illustrat. ad h. l.

Proof b. The sacred letters expressly testify that there will be no end of the kingdom of Christ, Dan. 7:14, Luke 1:33.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who establish that the kingdom of Christ will not endure after the end of the world. They object:

I. Christ will hand over the kingdom to the Father, 1 Cor. 15:24. Therefore after the end of the world he will no longer reign. Response: Christ on the last day will hand over the kingdom of grace to the Father, so that the kingdom of glory may follow.

II. If Christ were to govern the kingdom of glory, the Apostle would not have said that the Son himself will be subject to the Father, 1 Cor. 15:28. Response: Ὑποταγή (hypotagē / subjection) or passive subjection is said of Christ according to his human nature, and that mentioned here is not simply such (for the flesh of Christ was subject to the Father before also), but is understood as more illustrious. Namely Christ, as man, on the last day will be subject to the Father both in reality and in confession, because he will openly confess that he refers all right, all power, all dominion as received from God the Father. But therefore the kingdom of Christ will not cease; for all things, except God, will be subject to him, v. 27.

III. Christ must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet, 1 Cor. 15:25. Therefore when he has destroyed his enemies, the end of the kingdom will come. Response: The force of the argument rests on the particle "until," which is sometimes taken finitely or determinately, so as to note a certain terminus, sometimes infinitely and indeterminately, so as to designate perpetuity, even in the most difficult time. Here the "until" seems to be taken infinitely, so that the sense is: Christ must reign always and perpetually, even in the most difficult time, when he will have the devil and the impious under his feet. Conf. D. GEIER in Ps. 110, p. 696, & D. SCHERZER in Colleg. Anti-Socin. p. 579. Nevertheless D. CALOV. in bibl. illustr. p. 397 concedes that the "until" here can be taken determinately, so as to note the terminus not of the kingdom of Christ simply, but of a certain mode of reigning, and so the sense will be: Christ must rule the kingdom of grace through word and sacraments until all his enemies are fully subjected; and then the kingdom of grace will cease. But by that very fact the kingdom of glory will not be terminated. For the lamb in glory will feed the faithful, Rev. 7:17, who will follow him wherever he goes, ch. 14:4.

IV. If Christ were to rule the kingdom of glory, in the same God the Father would not be all in all; But God the Father in the kingdom of glory will be all in all. See 1 Cor. 15:25. Therefore Christ will not rule the kingdom of glory. Response: God the Father will be all in all because he will immediately govern the kingdom of glory. He himself will be our teacher, our King, our food, our salvation. But since Christ is ὁμοούσιος (homoousios / of the same essence) with God the Father, together with God the Father and the Holy Spirit he will be all in all.

Question CX. Was Christ King in the state of humiliation?

Christ at that time when he was visibly dwelling in these lands was a true King.

Proof: Christ is a King born, Luke 2:11, a King riding on a donkey, Luke 19:35, a King in the days of his flesh, Mark 14:61.

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who deny that Christ was actually King before the resurrection; although they do not deny that he was designated King before death. The same object; Jesus after death was first made Christ, that is King, Acts 2:36. Raised from the dead he received the name above every name, Phil. 2:9, and was placed in his kingdom, Luke 24:26. Therefore before death he was not actually King. Response: The adversaries confuse the state of humiliation and exaltation, likewise the χρῆσις (chrēsis / use) and κτήσις (ktēsis / possession) of the rule of Christ. For he was immediately anointed to royal dignity in the very

MEMBER III.
TWOFOLD
STATE OF CHRIST.

I.
EXINANITION OF CHRIST.

Question CXI. Did Christ always exercise the majesty communicated to His flesh in the same way?

STATE OF EXINANITION. Christ did not always exercise the divine majesty communicated to His flesh in the same way, but from His conception until His death and burial, He retracted and inhibited its full use; but having been made alive, resurrected, and lifted up into heaven, and exalted to the right hand of God, He fully usurped the same. From this arises the twofold state of Christ, one of exinanition, the other of exaltation.

Question CXII. In what does the exinanition of Christ formally consist?

The Formal aspect of exinanition. The exinanition of Christ formally consists not a) in the assumption of human flesh, nor b) in the mere κρύψις, or hiding, of divine majesty, nor c) in the complete abdication or evacuation of divine majesty, but d) in the abdication of the full and unceasing use of divine majesty, the assumption of the form of a servant, the assimilation with other men, and the most humble obedience.

Proof a. Although in an ecclesiastical and improper sense incarnation is sometimes called exinanition; properly, however, and from the use of scripture, incarnation is not to be called exinanition. For 1) exinanition is called κένωσις, an emptying, by Paul. (*).

(*) Although the Greek, ἐκένωσεν, just like the Hebrew, הריק usually and mostly has the same meaning as the Latin, vacuefacio (I make empty); yet that signification is neither perpetual, nor congruent with the thing signified. For by this agreement it would follow that we should think that Christ had completely abdicated himself from all use of the divine perfections and properties, which are perpetually communicated with his human nature, and even from their possession; which, however, by the confession of us all is most false, and also far from the mind of the blessed Author. But there is another power subject to this word, and it is most accommodated to this matter, for it is this: to restrain the effect, and the use of a thing, which indeed always holds its efficacy tightly within itself, but does not always offer it to be seen by everyone outside itself. See Isaiah 55:11 and 1 Corinthians 1:17-18. Thus Christ ἐκένωσεν αὐτὸν where, when, and to what extent, he abstained from the

But incarnation is nowhere called by the name of emptying, nor can it conveniently be so called. 2) Exinanition is said of the Son of God ἐνσάρκω, that is, of Christ the θεανθρώπων; incarnation is said of the Son of God ἁσάρκω. 3) That exinanition is understood here which was removed by the exaltation, but the state of incarnation remains. 4) That exinanition is designated by the Apostle in Philippians 2:5, which is proposed to us as an example, but the incarnation is inimitable.

Proof b. The exinanition of Christ is not a mere κρύψις, or hiding of divine majesty. For exinanition 1) does not apply to the exalted Christ, to whom, however, the hiding of majesty does apply: For we await the ἐπιφάνειαν καὶ ἀποκάλυψιν, the appearance and revelation of Jesus Christ, 1 Corinthians 1:7. 2) Because Christ was truly emptied before God, angels, and men. But if Christ had only hidden the ἀσχήματα communicated to Him, He would indeed have been obscure before men, but glorious before God. But He asked to be glorified with God, John 17:5. 3) The hiding of gifts is not a true exinanition, just as the sun, covered by clouds, is not truly darkened; although we do not deny that Christ hid the κτήσιν, or possession, of the communicated majesty, and did not everywhere exert it.

Proof c. A complete evacuation and, as it were, pouring out of divine majesty could not have 1) happened without the dissolution of the personal union; which, since it is a perfect and internal union, cannot exist without the communication of natures and properties. 2) During the state of exinanition, Christ sometimes produced clear examples of the divine majesty dwelling in His flesh, although Christ used that majesty more rarely and, as it were, extraordinarily.

Proof d. Four requisites must be connected to fully describe the exinanition of Christ: 1) Κένωσις, the emptying of the full use of the communicated divine majesty, of the divine omnipotence, omni-opulence, omniscience, of the modified, or effectively operating and governing, omnipresence, of adorability. 2) Λήψις μορφῆς δούλου, the assumption of a servile condition. For Christ was treated like a servant, sold, and afflicted with a servile punishment. 3) Ὁμοίωσις ἀνθρώπων, assimilation with poorer and ignoble men, especially Israelites, in birth, circumcision, weaning, the craft of a carpenter, ἐν σχήματι, in conversation and deportment. 4) Ταπείνωσις ὑποτακτική, most humble active and passive obedience. All of which are comprehended in that memorable saying of Paul, Philippians 2:5-8: Τοῦτο γὰρ φρονεῖσθω ἐν ὑμῖν, ὁ καὶ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, ὃς ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων οὐχ ἄρπαγμόν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ, ἀλλ' ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσε, μορφὴν δούλου λαβὼν, ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος καὶ σχήματι εὐρεθεὶς ὡς ἄνθρωπος ἐταπείνωσεν ἑαυτόν, γενόμενος ὑπήκοος μέχρι θανάτου, θανάτου δὲ σταυροῦ. "Have this mind among yourselves, which is yours in Christ Jesus, who, though he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, by taking the form of a servant, being born in the likeness of men. And being found in human form, he humbled himself by becoming obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross."

Observation: a) In this classic saying, the submission of Christ is presented for us to behold, as an example proposed for imitation. b) The submission is described κατ' ἄρσιν, that He did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, i.e., He did not judge that the majesty of the omnipotent and omnipresent Lord should be publicly displayed like plunder, but He held it secretly, and only then, when it seemed good to Him, did He put forth some rays of His deiformity. c) By μορφὴν θεοῦ is not understood precisely and immediately the essence of God itself, but the glorious state of Christ. For, in the judgment of Chemnitz, de duab. nat. p. 352, it is called μορφή when a nature, or essence, is so considered as it is endowed with, and as it were clothed and adorned with, properties, attributes, and conditions, whether divine or human. Therefore, the form of God is divine omnipotence, supreme wealth, omniscience, the dignity of receiving supplication. The Apostle says: ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, existing in the form of God, i.e., a partaker, or possessor, of glory, power, external use and effect of the divine perfections and properties, which indeed he never ceased to possess in himself, and whose internal and perpetual efficacy he also exercised, where, when, and to what extent was suitable for the function of his office. In the same way, the Blessed Gerardus interpreted this word, in his loc. theol. Exeg. T. I. loc. IV. §. 297. Therefore, if the word κένωσις is to be converted into Latin, it is most rightly called abstinentia usurpationis (abstinence from usurpation).

wisdom. d) Εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ signifies to conduct oneself equally with God in glory and majesty. He was not an ostentatious displayer of the glory due to Him, but a humble abdicator. e) The Apostle describes the submission of Christ κατὰ θεῶν. ἀλλ' αὐτὸν ἐκένωσε, but He emptied Himself, not by pouring out the communicated majesty, but by retracting and restraining its full and universal use. *). f) Μορφὴ δούλου is not the human nature, which Christ the θεάνθρωπος did not then assume but already had; which He also did not lay aside through exaltation; but it is the servile state, and abject condition. g) Ὁμοίωμα ἀνθρώπων is conformity with other men, in natural and artificial actions, in the common way of living, in gesture and conversation, except for sin alone. h) Ἐταπείνωσεν αὐτὸν γενόμενος ὑπήκοος μέχρι θανάτου, He humbled Himself in the great passion, both external of the body and internal of the soul, approving to God the Father a most humble active and passive obedience.

Question CXIII. What is the exinanition of Christ?

The exinanition is the state of Christ the θεάνθρωπος, in which He did not, like robbery, publicly display everywhere the divine majesty communicated to His flesh, but, having for a time abdicated its full and universal use, and having assumed a servile condition, He not only became like other men in the common way of living, but also sustained a most bitter passion and death with the most humble obedience, in order to redeem the human race from guilt and punishment, and to restore to it the salvation it had lost.

Question CXIV. According to which nature was Christ emptied?

Christ was emptied a) according to the human nature considered in the personal union b).

Proof a. 1) The subject which is said to be of the exinanition is Jesus Christ, Philippians 2:5, which names are of a person συνθέτω, or composed of both natures. 2) The subject which is of obedience is also the subject which is of exinanition. But indeed the subject which is of obedience is the person θεάνθρωπος, according to that of the Apostle: "Christ Jesus, being in the form of God, emptied himself, and rendered himself humble, becoming obedient even to death on a cross." Philippians 2:5, 7, 8.

Proof b. The subject by which is the humanity alone, but considered in the union; for 1) divinity, since it is immutable and most perfect, can neither be exalted nor emptied. 2) The exinanition was made even to death on a cross, Philippians 2:8. But divinity neither died nor was crucified. You say: 1. Christ emptied Himself according to the divine nature by assuming mortal and passible flesh. Response: The assumption of frail flesh is not properly speaking exinanition, although in ecclesiastical style it is called humiliation. For exinanition properly denotes an emptying; but through the incarnation ὁ λόγος did not empty Himself of His majesty. You say: II. Christ emptied Himself by laying aside the deformity which belongs to Him according to the divine nature. Response; Μορφὴ θεοῦ belongs to the divine nature formally and in itself, but to the human nature participatively and by the grace of the personal union. The divine nature of Christ did not lay aside its deiformity, since it is immutable; but the human nature, which is capable of exinanition, did.

(*) Paul quite clearly establishes two parts of the humility of Christ, or, as it is customary to say, of the exinanition: 1) ἐκένωσε αὐτὸν, 2) ἐταπείνωσεν αὐτόν. But what is signified by the added words pertains to the definition and true reason of each of those parts. For the form of words which is called a participle is used; λαβὼν, γενόμενος. Therefore, that first part, μορφὴν δούλου λαβὼν, ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος, must be referred to the prior part, ἐκένωσε αὐτόν. But this, γενόμενος ὑπήκοος κ. τ. λ., pertains to the other, ἐταπείνωσεν αὐτόν. Therefore, μορφὴ δούλου and ὁμοίωσις ἀνθρώπων are not to be distinguished ἀπὸ τῆς κενώσεως, but are to be referred to it, and are contained in it. Κένωσις, however, and ταπείνωσις differ from each other, as antecedent and consequent. The ἄνθρωποι, whose ὁμοίωσις is attributed to Christ, are to be considered not in respect of human nature, but in respect of the infirmities and miseries by which men are pressed, as long as they are in this mortality; see the very clear saying in Hebrews 4:15. Therefore, the definition of each part is this: 1) Κένωσις is the humble condition of human nature, by which Christ, having become man, at the same time as He assumed human nature into the union of the divine, abstained from the perfect and continuous use of the divine properties and perfections communicated with the human nature, took the form of a servant, and undertook to endure all human infirmities, as far as was necessary for the consequent ταπείνωσις. 2) Ταπείνωσις is the humble way of living, suitable to the form of a servant, by which Christ rendered consummate obedience to God, even to an ignominious death.

Question CXV. Of the use of which glory did Christ abdicate Himself in the state of exinanition?

Generally speaking, Christ in the state of exinanition abdicated Himself from the plenary, universal, and unceasing use of the eternal glory communicated to the assumed flesh through the personal union a). Specifically, He suspended and restrained the use of omnipotence b), omniscience c), the most abundant wealth d), omnipresent dominion e), and religious adorability f).

Observation: A distinction must be made between the full, universal, and unceasing use of divine majesty, and the partial, particular, and ceasing use of the same majesty. Christ in the state of exinanition did not suspend or interrupt all use of the divine majesty communicated to His flesh, but only the full, universal, and unceasing use. In certain particular and miraculous actions, Christ, in the midst of the state of exinanition, truly usurped His divine majesty and vibrated certain rays and sparks of it, for example, when Christ changed water into wine at the wedding in Cana, He is said to have manifested His glory, John 2:11. But that particular use later ceased for a time.

Proof a. From John 17:5: "And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed." This glorification, of which Christ speaks here, does not designate 1) the gift of the possession of glory; for Christ as man already possessed infinite glory, John 1:14, nor 2) its particular usurpation, which He had shown in certain miracles; but 3) it denotes the enthronement and introduction of Christ the man into His kingdom to be administered omnipotently, omnipresently, all-wisely, totally, and universally.

Proof b. Christ, in the assumed form of a servant, retracted the full use of omnipotence; which if He had exercised, the passion of Christ and His satisfactory death for our sins would have been prevented; for He would have repelled all injuries and prostrated all enemies.

Proof c. Christ suspended the universal use of omniscience; for He truly was ignorant of the day of the final judgment, Matthew 24:36, the barrenness of the fig tree, Matthew 21:19, the burial place of Lazarus, John 11:34.

Proof d. Christ abstained from the use of wealth; for indeed for our sake He became poor, 2 Corinthians 8:9. Cf. Matthew 8:20.

Proof e. The same restrained the use of omnipresent dominion. Of which Martha, the sister of the deceased Lazarus, was not unaware, saying, John 11:21: "Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died."

Proof f. Christ did not always exert the full light of adorable majesty; for indeed He was made a little lower than the angels, Hebrews 2:7.

Question CXVI. How long did the state of exinanition last?

The state of exinanition lasted from the first moment of conception until the last moment of rest in the sepulcher.

Proof: From Philippians 2:8: "Christ humbled himself, so that he became obedient to the point of death, even death on a cross." By death here we understand both the state of separation of the soul from the body, and the state of the dead man Christ, which also includes the burial and the three days of death.

Question CXVII. For what purpose did Christ empty Himself and abdicate the full use of divine majesty?

Christ emptied Himself not for His own sake, but for us sinners a), in order to satisfy divine justice for the theft of deiformity committed by the first parents b), and to redeem the entire human race from sins c).

Proof a. From 2 Corinthians 8:9: "For your sake our Lord Jesus Christ became poor, though he was rich, so that you by his poverty might become rich." We are by nature children of wrath, Ephesians 2:3, and therefore lack the riches of grace and justice; but for our sake the most rich Christ became poor, so that by His want our wealth might be.

Proof b. The Messiah paid what He did not steal, Psalm 69:5. It pleased our first parents, at the suggestion of the devil, to seize deiformity against all right and law; but Christ expiated that most foul theft by not proudly displaying the full use of the deiformity communicated to His flesh, but modestly inhibiting it.

Proof c. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us." Galatians 3:13. Christ freed us from the execratory sentence of the law by undergoing a detestable death in our place.

Question CXVIII. What are the principal acts which constitute the exinanition of Christ?

Acts of exinanition. The following acts pertain to the exinanition of Christ: 1) Conception, 2) Nativity, 3) Circumcision, 4) Education, 5) Visible conversation among men, 6) Great Passion, 7) Death, 8) Burial.

Question CXIX. What is the conception of Christ?

Conception. It is the supernatural act by which the flesh of Christ, by the coming of the Holy Spirit, produced from the blood mass of the Virgin Mary, received its first, consubstantial-with-us being in her womb.

Observation: We have considered the conception of Christ above, questions XIV, XV, where we dealt with the origin of Christ's flesh; now, however, we consider it not precisely in itself, but insofar as it pertains to the state of exinanition, that is, insofar as the flesh of Christ, although not from the seed of a man, was nevertheless formed in the womb of a woman; for which reason it is certain that some infirmities concur. Cf. D. Baier's compendium, p. 607.

Question CXX. What is the nativity of Christ?

Nativity. The nativity of Christ is the egress of the God-infant from the maternal womb into the light of this world.

Proof: It is clear that the nativity of Christ pertains to the state of exinanition; because Christ was born 1) from a mother who was indeed a virgin, but poor; 2) Not in a splendid city, but in the small town of Bethlehem; 3) Not in a royal citadel, but in a filthy stable; 4) At the time of the Jewish scepter, if not completely broken, yet not a little shaken, with Octavius Augustus holding power, the tyrant Herod raging, and Quirinius the governor demanding a census.

Observation: By this most poor nativity, Christ sanctified our sinful nativity, Isaiah 9:6, and obtained for us spiritual adoption (υιοθεσίαν) with God, Galatians 4:4-5.

Question CXXI. What is the circumcision of Christ?

Circumcision. The circumcision is the bloody amputation of the foreskin of the infant Jesus Christ, done on the eighth day.

Proof: The circumcision is an act of the most humble obedience of Christ, by which Christ not only lay in a profound state of exinanition under the razor of the circumciser, but was also made subject to the divine law; although He is the Lord of the law, Matthew 12:8, Mark 2:28.

Observation I. By this circumcision, Christ obligated Himself to fulfill the whole law, and by the first shedding of drops of blood, He gave a pledge of the future redemption through His blood, see Galatians 4:4-5 and 5:3.

Observation II. Other reasons are also usually given for why Christ willed to be circumcised: 1) to show that He was a true man; 2) so that He could be recognized as a Jew, descended from the seed of Abraham; 3) to put an end to circumcision.

Question CXXII. What was the education of Christ?

Education. The education of Christ was His habituation in boyhood, both to a manner of living worthy of an Israelite, and to the trade of a carpenter.

Proof: The education of Christ is a degree of submission, by which Christ of His own free will subjected Himself to the care of Joseph His father and the commands of His mother Mary, Luke 2:51.

Observation: By this obedience, rendered to His parents, Christ obtained every kind of prosperity for obedient children.

Question CXXIII. What was the visible conversation of Christ on these lands?

Conversation. The conversation of Christ was His most holy custom in the days of His flesh with various, even the most contemptible, men, full of troubles, discomforts, and dangers.

Proof: Christ conversed familiarly with fishermen, publicans, and sinners, Luke 15:2. He was surrounded by a crowd of the blind, deaf, lame, and those possessed by demons, Matthew 11:5. But what slanders did He not everywhere absorb? What dangers did He not approach? The Jews took counsel to stone Jesus, John 8:59, or to kill Him by some other violent kind of death, Matthew 21:46. Indeed, even His countrymen in Nazareth tried to throw Him headlong from the brow of the hill, Luke 4:29. Furthermore, Christ tolerated hunger, thirst, and the discomforts of journeys. All of which testify to the exinanition of Christ.

Observation: By this familiar conversation with sinners and the sick, He both fulfilled the divine law concerning loving one's neighbor and performed His prophetic office.

Question CXXIV. What was the great passion of Christ?

Great passion. The great passion of Christ is the extreme passion which our redeemer endured, near the end of His life, in the two days before His death, suffering the greatest and most bitter pains partly in His soul, and partly in His body. Therefore, the extreme passion of Christ is one internal to the soul a), another external to the body b).

Observation: The passion of Christ is one incipient and small, another extreme and great. The former Christ sustained throughout the whole course of His life, and especially in His prophetic office; the latter befell Him near the end of His life, two days before His death.

Proof a. How bitter the internal passion of Christ's soul was is gathered 1) from the names by which its gravity is expressed. For it is called 1) ἀγώνια, a struggle, in which Christ had to contend with a still strong death, Luke 22:44; 2) λύπη, sadness, by which the soul of Christ was deprived of all consolation, Matthew 26:37; 3) περιλυπία, an ineffable siege of sorrow, even to the point of death, Matthew loc. cit. v. 38; 4) ἐκθάμβησις, consternation, such as strikes those suffering from a fever, or struck by lightning, or seeing a ghost, Mark 14:33; 5) ὀδημονία, the anxiety of solitude, due to the lack of present help, both divine and human, Matthew loc. cit. and Mark loc. cit. 2) From the external signs, which are: a) the prostration of the body to the ground; b) the prayer for the cup to be taken away; c) the bloody sweat of the body, a most clear witness and index of the supernatural affliction and the fire burning within; d) the comfort of an angel; e) the most sorrowful complaint of Christ, both on the Mount of Olives, about the affliction unto death, and on the cross, about the desertion of God, conceived in these words: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" Matthew 27:46, Mark 15:34.

Observation: Christ is to be viewed here not in Himself, and for Himself, but in His mediatorial and priestly office, insofar as He represents the whole human race in the judgment of God, and bears all the sins of all men. In this respect, He anxiously complains that He has been forsaken by God. Which dereliction formally consists a) not in desperation; for these words breathe filial confidence: "My God! My God!" nor b) in the dissolution of the personal union; for what Christ once assumed, He never laid aside; but c) in the sense of divine wrath, on account of the sins of men imputed to Him, and in the privation of all solace, which otherwise was accustomed to flow from the indwelling Deity.

Proof b. Christ sustained the great passion of His body in a threefold theater, as it were: earthly, stone, and wooden. The earthly theater of the passion was the Mount of Olives, where Christ, having endured the internal passion, was betrayed by the perfidious Judas, and was captured and bound by His enemies. The stone theater was both the palace of Caiaphas and the praetorium of Pilate. In both, Christ's hands suffered bonds, His ears slanders, His face blows, His eyes spittle, and, what is horrendous to say, in the theater of the praetorium, the whole body of Christ was torn by scourges, His head was crowned with a crown of thorns, and His hands were dishonored with a reed placed in them. To these is added the tragic fall of Judas and Peter, the former despairing, the latter restored to penitence. In the wooden theater of the cross, His hands and feet were transfixed with iron nails, and His side was struck and pierced with a lance. To which add all the slanders inflicted on the savior from the ignominious company of robbers, from the reproachful inscription, and from the sharp words of those standing by or passing by.

Observation: In this great passion of both soul and body, Christ is to be seen as a mirror of wrath, grace, and virtue. Christ felt the wrath of God on account of the alien sins of men, transferred onto Himself; He reconciled sinners to the grace of God by His satisfactory passion; He left to men an incomparable example of virtue, love, meekness, and patience.

Question CXXV. Did Christ feel infernal pains?

Christ sustained infernal pains, as to their substance, not as to their accidents. He sustained pains intensively most grievous, equivalent to the eternal pains of the damned. He sustained them not in the place of the damned, but on the Mount of Olives and the wood of the cross.

The assertion is proven: Whichever pains were so bitter and vehement that they afflicted the soul of Christ to the point of death, left it destitute of all help, excited prayers for the turning away of the cup, drenched the whole body prostrate on the ground with a bloody sweat, and expressed a most sorrowful complaint about the desertion of God, those pains were intensively infernal; But the internal pains tolerated by Christ on the Mount of Olives and the wood of the cross were so bitter and vehement; Therefore.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who deny that Christ sustained infernal pains. Their main arguments are:

I. He who suffers infernal pains, despairs; because infernal pains include desperation; But Christ did not despair. Therefore. Response; He who suffers infernal pains, by succumbing to them, despairs; I concede. Whoever suffers infernal pains, by overcoming them, despairs; I deny. The situation is far different for the guilty party, upon whom the wrath of God remains; and different for the surety, (*) who had to taste death in such a way as to swallow it. Desperation coheres with infernal pains not necessarily, but accidentally. For the Lord leads down to the underworld and brings back up, 1 Samuel 2:6.

II. Christ did not suffer eternal pains; Therefore He did not suffer infernal pains. Response; Christ suffered pains intensively infernal and eternal, with respect to their degree; not infernal and eternal extensively, with respect to their duration. He suffered pains, if you consider their gravity, equivalent to infernal pains; if you consider the sublimity of the one suffering, preeminent over the eternal penalties of the damned.

III. Christ did not feel the wrath of God (because He was always the most holy and most beloved Son of God); Therefore, He did not suffer infernal pains. Response; Christ felt the wrath of God, not for His own sins; for thus He was always most holy; but for the alien sins, transferred onto Himself, on account of which He was made a κατάρα, a curse, i.e., subject to a curse, Galatians 3:13.

IV. The soul of Christ was always blessed, since it was most closely united to God; Therefore, it did not feel infernal pains. Response; The soul of Christ was always blessed, as to the first act; the second act and the fruition of beatitude were impeded by the satisfactory passion for the sins of the world.

Question CXXVI. What is the death of Christ?

Death. The death of Christ is the privation of life, due to the dissolved natural bond of the body and soul of Christ.

(*) The blessed Author uses this name in a broader signification, so as to generally denote a sponsor, Hebrews 7:22. Otherwise, if it is taken more strictly, a surety (fideiussor) is distinguished from an undertaker (expromissor), as lawyers say. Each is indeed a sponsor, but in a different way. A surety is said to be one who sponsors for a certain debtor in such a way that he interposes his faith, promising that he will pay for him what he owes, on the condition that if the debtor does not satisfy the creditor on the appointed day, or is to be considered bankrupt. In the meantime, the debtor is obligated to pay. An undertaker is named as one who sponsors for another, as for a debtor, altogether and simply, receiving upon himself all of his guilt and obligation, by which pact he is released and dismissed without delay. This is what necessarily pertains to the nature of an undertaking. The surrounding circumstances, which indeed are required for an undertaking in a human court, are not likewise to be considered in a divine court. Few today are unaware of the error in which Johannes Cocceius and his followers were involved, thinking that Christ in the O.T. was only a surety, not an undertaker. From that opinion of theirs this distinction arose, about which we will see subsequently in the section on justification, that there is one πάρεσις ἁμαρτιῶν in the O.T. and another in the N.T. It would be an unjust suspicion to think that the blessed Man stood on their side. He speaks of the sponsor of all men, not only of those who departed from this life before Christ was born. He understands, therefore, by the name of surety, a sponsor, and indeed one who, if we wish to speak distinctly and strictly, is usually called an undertaker.

Question CXXVII. What kind was the passion and death of Christ?

The passion and death of Christ was real, not putative a); spontaneous, not coerced b); undertaken not by chance, but from the certain disposition and counsel of God c); bloody and ignominious d); vicarious, meritorious, and satisfactory e).

Proof a. The Messiah truly bore our sicknesses, and carried our sorrows, Isaiah 53:4; He truly gave up His spirit on the cross, Matthew 27:50.

Proof b. Christ most readily went to His passion and death. For this reason He said: "Behold, I have come; in the scroll of the book it is written of me; I delight to do your will, O my God," Psalm 40:8, John 5:46.

Proof c. Peter says in Acts 2:23: "This Jesus, delivered up according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God, you crucified and killed by the hands of lawless men." By "plan," the Apostle understands the decree of God concerning the delivering up of His son to death for us, Romans 8:32, which ἐκδοσις, or "delivery," is directed to our salvation, although the λήψις, or "reception," was done with evil intent.

Proof d. Christ died on the wood of the cross. But scripture says: "Cursed is everyone who is hanged on a tree," Deuteronomy 21:23, Galatians 3:13. The punishment of the cross was most infamous according to Roman customs.

Proof e. The death of Christ is a λύτρον, Matthew 20:28, and an ἀντίλυτρον for our sins, 1 Timothy 2:6. Therefore, it is a vicarious death, i.e., undertaken in our place, satisfactory, by which satisfaction was made to the divine justice offended by our sins, and meritorious; because by that same death the remission of sins was merited for us.

Question CXXVIII. How long did the death of Christ last?

The death of Christ lasted for a triduum, but not a complete or fully consummated one. Cf. Matthew 17:23; 20:18; Mark 9:31; Luke 18:31.

You say: Christ, in Matthew, c. 12:40, says: "The Son of Man will be in the heart of the earth (dead) for three days and three nights." Therefore, the death of Christ lasted for a complete triduum. Response: In the cited passage, not three natural days are meant, but civil ones, or three νυχθήμερα accepted by Hebraism, and those not whole, but taken synecdochically, since Christ suffered on the preparation day of the Passover and the Sabbath, and at the ninth hour (which is our third hour in the afternoon) He gave up the ghost, and was buried at the tenth hour, or our fourth; whence there were still two hours remaining of that νυχθήμερον, from which that civil day could be named synecdochically, as a whole from its parts; to which succeeded the entire day of the Sabbath spent in the sepulcher, as the second νυχθήμερον; and the third began around the evening of the Sabbath, from which, to the hour of the resurrection on the third day, about ten hours had elapsed. Cf. D. Calov. Chron. S. sect. VIII. qu. 13.

Question CXXIX. Was Christ a true man in the triduum of death?

Christ was a true man in the triduum of death, not physically, from the bond of natural union, which was disrupted a); but theologically and by the estimation of faith, from the bond of the personal union, which the triduum of death left intact b).

Proof a. Physically, a man is called true who is actually living, while the body and soul are naturally united. But if the natural union of Christ's body and soul had not been dissolved, Christ would not have been truly dead. If He did not truly die, He did not truly make satisfaction for our sins, to assert which is ἀθεόλογον.

Proof b. The three-day death in no way harmed or broke the bond of the hypostatic union, by which the two natures in Christ are joined. For a) Christ in the triduum of death was a person σύνθετος. Therefore, God and man. b) At the time when Christ was a priest, at that time He was θεάνθρωπος. But He was a priest in the triduum of death. Therefore. The minor is proven because Christ remains a priest εἰς τὸ διηνεκές, forever. Hebrews 7:3. c) What ὁ λόγος once assumed, He never laid aside; But ὁ λόγος assumed a true human nature; Therefore ὁ λόγος never laid aside the true human nature, and consequently in the triduum of death He was a true θεάνθρωπος.

Question CXXX. What were the ἐπόμενα or consequences of the death of Christ?

The death of Christ was followed by a) miracles, most worthy of eternal memory, and b) the conversion of the centurion and the attending soldiers.

Proof a. Five miracles followed the death of Christ: 1) the tearing of the temple veil, 2) an earthquake, 3) the splitting of the rocks, 4) the opening of the tombs, and the coming out and appearance of the saints, 5) the flowing of blood and water from the side of Christ. Concerning these miracles, cf. Matthew 27:51 sqq. and John 19:34.

Proof b. Luke 23:47-48: "Now when the centurion saw what had taken place, he praised God, saying, 'Certainly this man was innocent!' And all the crowds that had assembled for this spectacle, when they saw what had taken place, returned home beating their breasts."

Question CXXXI. What was the burial of Christ?

Burial. The burial of Christ is the placing of the body of our Savior, who died on the cross, in a new tomb, to declare the truth of Christ's death.

Question CXXXII. What is to be observed concerning the burial of Christ?

To be observed are a) the antecedents, b) the concomitants, c) the consequents of the burial.

Observation a. The antecedents are: 1) The time of the burial, which was the προσάββατον, or the day of preparation, and the fourth hour of that day, according to our computation. 2) The place, which was in a garden, a rock-hewn cave, which offered our Savior a new tomb, which no other body had occupied. 3) The curator of the funeral, namely from the political estate, Joseph of Arimathea, a pious, honorable, and wealthy senator; from the ecclesiastical estate, Nicodemus, once a nocturnal, now a diurnal disciple of Christ, a teacher of Israel, a defender of Christ's innocence, John 7:50; from the economic estate, women, burning with piety for Christ.

Observation b. The burial of Christ was accompanied by 1) the removal of the dead body from the cross by the hands of Joseph, and its translation into the garden; 2) the washing of the body, done with warm water; see R. Maimonides, de luctu c. IV.; 3) the anointing, or embalming, John 19:40; 4) the binding of the feet and hands with burial cloths; 5) the placing of the body in the rock-hewn cave; 6) the rolling of a stone to the entrance.

Observation c. The burial of Christ was followed by 1) the grief of the male and female disciples of Christ; 2) the plots and calumnies of the enemies against the deceased; 3) the sealing of the rolled stone; 4) the guard of soldiers.

Question CXXXIII. What kind was the burial of Christ?

The burial of Christ was a) glorious, b) fruitful.

Proof a. This burial was glorious: 1) On account of the body buried, which is the temple of the deity, a vessel full of the immense anointing of the Holy Spirit, the most effective organ of many miracles; 2) On account of the honorable curators; 3) On account of the dignity of the monument.

Proof b. The fruits of Christ's burial are: 1) The sealing up of our sins, Daniel 9:24; 2) our co-burial, which occurs in renewal, Romans 6:4; 3) The consecration of our tombs, Isaiah 57:2.

II. ON THE STATE OF EXALTATION OF CHRIST.

Question CXXXIV. What is the state of exaltation of Christ?

THE STATE OF exaltation of Christ is that in which Christ, having laid aside the infirmities of the flesh, took up and exercised the plenary use of divine majesty.

Observation I. Exaltation here is not taken in the ecclesiastical sense, by which it denotes the exaltation of the incarnation, or the collation of divine majesty made to the flesh of Christ by virtue of the personal union; but in the biblical sense, by which it denotes both the exaltation of the cross, John 12:32, and the exaltation of glorification, John 17:5; which, although sometimes, taken inadequately, signifies the exaltation of Christ to the right hand of God, here however it is taken adequately, as it denotes the universal glorification of Christ, freed from death, adequately opposed to the preceding exinanition.

Observation II. Exaltation sometimes designates the act, or the actual glorification; sometimes the eternal glorious state, in which latter sense we have described it. Taken actively, it is defined; that it is the solemn enthronement and inauguration of the revived Christ to the full and perfect usurpation and governance of the celestial empire of heaven and earth, especially of the church. See D. Gerhard's exegesis, book IV. §. 306.

Observation III. This exaltation of Christ is also called ὑπερύψωσις, Superexaltation, to designate the highest exaltation, Philippians

2:9; δόξαις, glorification, John 17:5; στεφάνωσις, coronation, Hebrews 2:9; ἐνθρονισμός, enthronement, Hebrews 8:1.

Question CXXXV. According to which nature was Christ exalted?

Christ the θεάνθρωπος a) was exalted according to the human nature b).

Proof a. The subject which is exalted is Christ the θεάνθρωπος. For 1) He who, Jesus Christ, emptied Himself, having taken the form of a servant, having become obedient even to the death of the cross, αὐτὸν ὑπερύψωσε, the Father superexalted the same one, as Paul testifies, Philippians 2:9. 2) Since actions and passions belong to suppositis, the whole person of Christ is rightly said to be exalted, just as He was emptied.

Proof b. The subject by which the exaltation occurs is the human nature of Christ. For 1) the divine nature of the λόγος is most high, and therefore cannot be really exalted. 2) Christ, as He was emptied according to the human nature, so He was exalted according to the same. 3) Through exaltation, Christ received a name above every name in the fullness of time out of grace, which the word ἐχαρίσατο shows, Philippians 2:9. But according to the divine nature, He receives nothing from the Father in time through grace, but has all things from the Father through eternal generation.

Question CXXXVI. In what does the exaltation of Christ formally consist?

The formal aspect of exaltation. The exaltation of Christ formally consists in the deposition of the servile state and of all the infirmities of the flesh, and in the full, universal, and unceasing usurpation of the divine majesty, communicated through the personal union.

Proof. 1) From Philippians 2:9-10: "Therefore God has highly exalted him and bestowed on him the name that is above every name, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth." Where observe: a) The particle διὸ does not denote a meritorious collation, but a consequence of order. b) The bestower of glory is God the Father, to whom, as to the source, both of the divine essence and of the communicated glory, the bestowal is attributed. Cf. John 17:7; Romans 6:4. For the rest, there is no doubt that the act of exaltation, being extra-essential, is common to the entire Holy Trinity. For the Son of God himself also raised himself from the dead, John 2:19; 10:17, and ascended above all the heavens, Ephesians 4:10, and entered into his glory, Luke 24:26. And the Holy Spirit is said to have raised Christ from the dead, Romans 8:11. (*) c) Ὑπερῶψως, or superexaltation, following the exinanition and humiliation, by force of opposition, implies in place of the emptying of the form of God, the full usurpation of the form of God; in place of the concealment of those things which are equal to God, their public manifestation; in place of the assumption of the form of a servant, its deposition, and the administration of universal dominion. d) The gift of the name above every name designates the bestowal of the highest glory, than which none more sublime can be named, which through exaltation was given to Christ, as to its most full χρῆσιν, or usurpation. e) The consequence of the glory given is the subjection of all creatures, adumbrated by τῇ γονυκαμψίᾳ, or genuflection. For at the name of Jesus, angels must bow their knees (in a spiritual manner), Psalm 97:7, and the blessed in heaven, Revelation 5:12, and mortal men upon earth, John 14:13, and creatures under the earth (by reason of their most squalid state), demons and damned men with trembling, James 2:19.

2. From Hebrews 2:9: "But we see him who for a little while was made lower than the angels, namely Jesus, crowned with glory and honor because of the suffering of death, so that by the grace of God he might taste death for everyone." The Apostle joins the state of exinanition and of exaltation. He calls the former ἐλάττωσιν, or a condition lower than the angelic. For the angels enjoy eternal glory and beatitude; but Christ, in His most bitter passion, was forsaken by God and deprived of all solace, so that an angel from heaven comforted him. But the most ignominious passion and death was the way to the σεφάνωσιν, or coronation of Christ. And God crowned Christ with royal honor, and the glory of omnipotent dominion. This we learn from verses 7 and 8: "You made him for a little while lower than the angels; you have crowned him with glory and honor, setting him over the works of your hands; you have put all things in subjection under his feet."

Therefore, this coronation implies the actual usurpation of omnipresent dominion and the axiom of adoration.

Question CXXXVII. Are there certain acts, or grades, of the exaltation of Christ?

Grades of exaltation. The acts, or grades, by which Christ, having been exalted, exercised more and more the divine majesty communicated to His flesh, are: 1) The descent of Christ to the underworld, 2) His resurrection, 3) the ascension of Christ into heaven, 4) the session at the right hand of God. These grades of exaltation were preceded by ζωοποίησις, or vivification, as a prerequisite condition, disposing the subject to be exalted.

Proof: The revived Christ exercised His divine majesty through certain grades: 1) By descending to the underworld, He showed Himself alive to the evil spirits and damned men, as the victor over death; 2) By rising, He declared to the apostles, and through them to the whole world, that He had satisfied divine justice through His death; 3) By ascending into heaven, He showed to the angels and blessed men that He was the victor not only of death, but also of the evil demons, and the savior of men; 4) By sitting at the right hand of God, He exercises the most full and universal dominion over all creatures, which are in the kingdom of power, of grace, and of glory.

(*) In that place, indeed, it is not attributed to the Holy Spirit, but to God the Father. For it is not said: the Spirit, who raised Christ from the dead; but thus it is written: the Spirit of him, who raised the dead Christ to life. It pleases some to accommodate this saying to this cause, Romans 1:4. But yet others understand by πνεῦμα ἀγιωσύνης the human nature of Christ, by way of opposition: κατὰ σάρκα, and κατὰ πνεῦμα. But it is sufficient 1) that the Holy Spirit, equally as the Father and the Son, is true and highest God, 2) that without any exception the general rule is valid: The divine works, which are called ad extra, are equally common to all three persons in unity.

Observation: Ζωοποίησις, or vivification, is the liberation of Christ from death, and the reunion of the soul and body, by which Christ according to the flesh began to live again. This is not a peculiar grade of exaltation, but a prerequisite condition for disposing the subject, namely Christ, to undertake the full and universal use of divine majesty.

Question CXXXVIII. What is the descent of Christ to the underworld?

Descent to the underworld. The descent of Christ to the underworld is a true, real, and supernatural motion, by which Christ, having escaped the bonds of death and being revived, went with His whole person to the underworld, to demonstrate Himself as the victor over death to the evil spirits and damned men.

Observation I. The descent to the underworld is taken a) metaphorically, and designates the infernal pains, arising from the sense of divine wrath and the privation of all solace. As it is used, 1 Samuel 2:6, where the pious Hannah says: "The LORD brings down to Sheol and raises up." And so Christ, before His death and burial, descended to the underworld by a metaphorical and sorrowful descent, having suffered immense pains in the garden of Gethsemane, Matthew 26:38, and having complained of God's desertion on the altar of the cross, Matthew 27:46. b) Taken properly, the descent to the underworld denotes a true and real departure into the place of the damned, which St. Peter in his 1st epistle, chapter 3:19, calls a πορείαν, or journey.

Observation II. Although the descent of Christ to the underworld was true and real, it was not physical or local, but was a supernatural motion. For physical and local motion is proper to natural bodies; but the body of Christ, having been vivified, was glorified. Nor was it a successive motion. For it was done ἐν πνεύματι, in the spirit, i.e., by divine power, 1 Peter 3:19, which knows not slow endeavors; which D. Dannhauer, in Christosophy, p. 306, urges with D.

Affelmann. The descent of Christ was instantaneous, because it was done ἐν πνεύματι, by him who was no longer subject to the weaker necessities and laws of nature. D. Calovius agrees in his theol. posit. p. 372. The descent of Christ to the underworld was not successive; because it was accomplished in a single instant, nor does the divine hypostasis of the flesh, which is everywhere, need progressive motion, but by the presence of a demonstration or operation it shows itself to be present, and to that extent it is understood to have been present here in the underworld as well.

Question CXXXIX. According to which nature did Christ descend to the underworld?

Christ the θεάνθρωπος a) descended to the underworld according to His human nature, and that whole, consisting of body and soul b).

Proof a. 1) Christ, ζωοποιηθεὶς, or having been vivified, descended, 1 Peter 3:18. But ζωοποιηθεὶς is the whole Christ, not the soul alone. Therefore. 2) He who ascended, also descended, Ephesians 4:10. But the whole Christ, not the soul alone, ascended; Therefore also the whole Christ, not the soul alone, descended. 3) Since the descent of Christ is a personal action, it cannot but be ascribed to the whole person of the θεάνθρωπος. Therefore, just as it is said of the whole θεάνθρωπος in the Apostles' Creed, that He suffered, was crucified, and was buried; so also it is said of the same, that He descended into hell. And in the Athanasian Creed: "As the rational soul and flesh is one man; so God and man is one Christ, who suffered for our salvation and descended to the underworld." Therefore, we simply believe that the whole person, God and man, after the burial descended to the underworld, says the Formula of Concord, p. 788.

Proof b. 1) The descent to the underworld is a grade of the exaltation of Christ, and therefore cannot be attributed to the divine nature, which does not receive a further grade of exaltation. 2) The πορεία, or departure into the underworld, is placed after the vivification of Christ by the Apostle Peter in the cited chapter, 3:19. Therefore, the descent of Christ to the underworld was made after the reunion of the soul and body; and the soul of Christ did not descend to the underworld at the time when His body lay in the sepulcher.

You say: I. The descent of Christ precedes the resurrection, by which Christ showed Himself alive, as the Apostles' Creed teaches: Therefore, it was not made after the vivification. Response: We distinguish between the external and internal resurrection. The former is the egress from the sepulcher, and the external manifestation before men, and is designated in the Apostles' Creed; the latter is the vivification itself, about which the Apostle Peter speaks in the cited place.

You say: II. Every royal and triumphal act belongs to Christ according to both natures; for it is an ἀποτέλεσμα, or an official act: But the descent to the underworld, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Colossians 2:15: "Christ, having disarmed the principalities and powers, made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them in himself." Christ triumphed over the infernal principalities by His descent into the underworld. Response: The descent of Christ to the underworld is taken either precisely, as it is a real departure from the sepulcher into the underworld, without connoting its effect; or it is taken complexly, so that it simultaneously connotes the effect and fruit, i.e., the triumph over enemies. We take the descent of Christ to the underworld in the former sense; taken in the latter sense it is an apotelesma.

Question CXL. Did Christ then descend into the infernal prison itself?

Christ descended into the infernal prison itself, or the place of the damned.

Proof: That the terminus ad quem of Christ's descent is the place of the damned, Peter teaches, in his 1st epistle, c. 3:18-19: "Christ also suffered once for sins... being put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit, in which he went and proclaimed to the spirits in prison, because they formerly did not obey, when God's patience waited in the days of Noah." Where by φυλακήν we understand the infernal prison; 1) Because in that φυλακή are the disobedient, who were destroyed by the flood on account of their disobedience, who are surely in the place of the damned; 2) Because φυλακή is also taken for the underworld in other places of Holy Scripture, Matthew 5:25; Luke 12:58; Revelation 20:7.

Question CXLI. For what purpose did Christ descend into the underworld?

Christ descended into the underworld not for the purpose of suffering any evil from the demons a), but to celebrate a triumph over the demons b), and to convince the damned men that they are justly confined in the infernal prison c).

Proof a. After death, Christ sustained no real passion, because on the cross He exclaimed: "It is finished," John 19:30, and through death He entered into glory, Luke 24:26.

Proof b. From Revelation 1:18: "I died, and behold I am alive forevermore, and I have the keys of Death and Hades." Christ, as the revived victor, holds the keys of the underworld and of death, celebrating a triumph over the evil demons and death, Colossians 2:15. Wherefore in the infernal prison Christ presented Himself alive to the evil spirits, as the victor over death and the underworld. Cf. Hosea 13:14; 1 Corinthians 15:55.

Proof c. Christ preached to the spirits in custody, (just as to those) who were once disobedient, when God's long-suffering waited in the days of Noah, 1 Peter 3:19. The preaching of Christ in the underworld was not evangelical, which is announced to men only in the kingdom of grace, but legal, refutative, terrible, and that both verbal, by which He convicted them that they had merited eternal punishments, and real, by which He struck immense terror into them. Cf. Dannhauer in hodos. phanom. VIII. p. 738.

You say: Why is it said that Christ preached in the underworld only to those who were disobedient in the time of Noah? Why did He not terrify others also with that refutative sermon? Response: 1) Others are not excluded, but these are proposed as enormous examples of impenitence, and singular examples of divine judgment; 2) The Apostle named them specifically, to teach also that the antediluvians ought to have believed in Christ, and therefore that they were justly damned on account of their disbelief; 3) So that the Apostle could conveniently transition from the typical flood to the antitypical baptism.

The antithesis is 1) that of the Pontificians, asserting that Christ descended into the underworld only according to the soul;(*) 2) that of the Socinians, maintaining that the descent of Christ is the state of death in the sepulcher. Their more important arguments are:

I. The descent of Christ to the underworld can be explained by burial; For שׂאול commonly notes the sepulcher, rarely the underworld; Therefore, a peculiar article of faith concerning the descent of Christ to the underworld should not be taught in the church. Response: 1) This argument proceeds from mere particulars. 2) Ἄδης in the N.T. always denotes the place of the damned. 3) The Apostles' Creed teaches that the church constantly believed this article.

II. The descent of Christ denotes infernal pains, Psalm 18:6; 1 Samuel 2:6. Therefore, it does not denote a real descent. Response: The descent of Christ into the underworld, freed from death and revived, is not sorrowful or painful, but glorious and triumphant, and therefore real.

III. If Christ really descended into the underworld, He descended either as God or as man. Not as God; because God by His omnipresence fills heaven, and earth, and the underworld, and therefore does not really descend into the underworld. Nor as man; because He descended either in body, or in soul. Not in body; because that was in the sepulcher. Not in soul; since this was in paradise. Therefore, Christ plainly did not descend into the underworld. Response: A third option is given. The whole Christ, the θεάνθρωπος, vivified, 1 Peter 3:18, i.e., having overcome death, and the union of soul and body being restored, descended into the underworld, and therefore the body of Christ at that point in time when this descent occurred, did not lie in the sepulcher.

IV. Which descent Holy Scripture attributes to the soul of Christ, that does not belong to the whole Christ the θεάνθρωπος. But the descent to the underworld, etc.

Therefore. The minor is proven from Psalm 16:10. Response: The psalmist is dealing with the descent of Christ to the underworld not properly, but metaphorically. For the phrase itself and the mode of speaking sufficiently indicate that it is not dealing with the glorious descent of the triumphant Christ, but with the sorrowful state of the suffering Christ. He who prays that he may not be abandoned in the underworld, sufficiently indicates that the state in the underworld, in which he is not to be abandoned, is by no means joyful or glorious, but full of sorrows. Furthermore, the psalmist deals with that state which indeed precedes being in the sepulcher. For he says: "You will not abandon my soul to Sheol, or let your holy one see corruption." But the real and proper descent follows the burial. Cf. p. Calov's Bibl. illustrat. in h. l. fol. 966.

Question CXLII. What is the resurrection of Christ?

Resurrection. The resurrection is the act of glorious victory, by which Christ the θεάνθρωπος, through the same power with God the Father and the Holy Spirit, led His body, reunited to the soul and glorified, out of the sepulcher, and presented Himself alive to His disciples by various proofs, in confirmation of our peace, fraternity, joy, and hope of our future resurrection.

Obs. The word "resurrection" is taken in two ways: 1) Broadly; in which sense it encompasses in its scope ζωοποίησιν, or vivification, which in the order of nature preceded the descent into hell and the leading out of the body from the tomb, and is called the interior resurrection. 2) Strictly, as it is contrasted with vivification, and denotes the leading out of the body from the tomb and its presentation before others.(*) It is taken in the latter sense here.

(*) They err chiefly in this (for this is most to the point); that they persuade themselves that Christ went to the underworld for the purpose of leading out the souls of the blessedly departed from the limbo of the fathers, some unknown place, which they think is adjacent to the hell of the damned. This error, for which there is no support, is closely coupled with other much more serious ones, by which the principal parts of doctrine are greatly obscured: concerning justification, and its true reason, both in the O. and in the N.T., concerning salutary faith being effective and sufficient for salvation, concerning the always valid and equally great virtue of the satisfaction and merits of Christ before, as after, the satisfaction was rendered.

(*) Holy Scripture speaks appropriately indeed, in which ἀνάστασις (anastasis / resurrection) is distinguished from the recovery of life, and since that was the public testimony of this, therefore the former is named first, consistently with the order of doctrine, although by the order of nature it was posterior, Rom. XIV, 9.

Question CXLIII. By what power did Christ rise again?

Christ rose again by divine power, common to all three persons of the divinity.

Prob. 1) Generally: The raising of Christ from the dead, the terminus of which is the resurrection, is an action ad extra, common to all three persons of the divinity. Whence the Savior himself says: Whatever the Father does, the Son also does in like manner, John 5:19.

2. Specifically: a) The raising of Christ is attributed to God the Father, as the font of divinity, for the consolation of consciences, so that we may know that the Father has been abundantly satisfied, and that He has been reconciled to us; otherwise, He would not have released our surety from the tomb.

From which Paul gravely says: Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, Rom. 6:4. Cf. Eph. 1:20; Col. 2:10. b)

That Christ raised himself from the dead is evident: α) because Christ has the power to lay down his soul and to take it up again, John 10:17. This power belongs to Christ, as God, by essence; as man, by the grace of union. Certainly, the soul of Christ, endowed with divine power, could join its own dwelling to itself and raise it. Therefore, β) the Savior asserts that he would raise up the dissolved temple of his body, John 2:18. γ) If Christ, by divine power communicated to his flesh through the hypostatic union, raised others, John 5:21; why would he not raise himself by the same power? c) The Holy Spirit is said to have raised Christ from the dead, Rom. 8:11. (**)

(**) See the notes on question 136, page 775: But it is of the greatest importance to us that we give the firmest assent. When matters of deeds are disputed, witnesses must be heard, whose faith, if it has been sufficiently explored and proven, leaves no place for doubt. And when that matter is divine, then it is also necessary that signs of divine authority appear in those witnesses. Acts X, 41. Let us gather all arguments into one sum, which are all so clear and certain, that either nothing should be believed, or this one thing above all others ought to be considered most worthy of faith. There are altogether three things to be considered and weighed:

I. The condition of the witnesses, and that indeed α) their internal disposition of mind. In them there was 1) the use of reason and wisdom; for besides the women, there were men, not only of the common people, unlettered and content with ordinary intelligence, Acts 4:13, but also learned and adorned with experience in affairs, especially Paul, Acts 22:3, and the same a most fierce adversary, who had for a long time and much opposed this truth, Acts 26:8-9; 1 Cor. 15:8-9. 2) An almost excessive caution; for so far were they from showing themselves credulous to anyone, that their own lack of faith was rather to be reproved, John 20:25; Luke 24:25; Mark 16:14. 3) Probity, for they were of upright life and pure from wickedness, never suspected of any fraud, Acts 24:21-22. 4) Constancy and fortitude of mind, even to their last breath, amidst the most bitter vexations and calamities, Acts 4:19-20, although by nature they were most timid, Matt. 26:56. 5) Love for God, conquering the world, without any desire for temporal gain, with contempt for all honors and pleasures, Phil. 2:7. β) External. To be considered is 1) The multitude of witnesses, and also the gathering of many at that time when they were together, John 20:19, 26; 1 Cor. 15:6. 2) The contemplation of this matter, repeated often and continued for a long time, for forty days, Acts 1:3, also carefully, as to every surrounding circumstance, since they took in with their own eyes not only the face of the revived Christ, but also the marks of his wounds, his gestures, and his actions, both many and varied; therefore they were eyewitnesses, not earwitnesses, nor negligent, but looking upon the matter with a very attentive mind. 3) The agreement of all the external senses, John 20:25, 27; 1 John 1:1. It was not enough for them to have seen Christ with their own eyes. The other senses were simultaneously affected by his most pleasant manifestation. They heard him speaking, and felt the force of his words in their inmost heart, Luke 24:32. At the same time, the words they had previously perceived were called to mind, ibid. v. 44. They touched Christ with their hands, lest there be any suspicion, into which CELSUS rashly led them, that they were deluded by some specter, Luke 24:37, 39. With their mouths they tasted the bread, received from Christ's hands, and indeed in a certain singular way, from which Christ could be recognized and distinguished from other men, Luke 24:30, 31, 35; Acts 10:41.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that the dead Christ raised himself. They go about strengthening their opinion with the following arguments:

I. No dead man can raise himself. Therefore, neither could Christ. Resp. No mere man who is dead can raise himself. But Christ is the θεάνθρωπος (God-man).

II. The resurrection of Christ is attributed to God the Father; Therefore, he did not raise himself. Resp. The resurrection of Christ is attributed to God the Father, but not to him alone. For what the Father does, the Son also does in like manner, John 5:19.

Instance: Sabellianism will be introduced if what belongs to God the Father is attributed to Christ. Resp. A distinction is made between personal and essential works. The former are divided, the latter are common to all three divine persons, and

II. The matter testified. This was certainly 1) not absurd, in which there was anything that openly contradicted either itself or other truths, but which could be done by the infinite power of God, Rom. 4:17; Acts 26:8. 2) Unexpected, and seemed incredible to all of Christ's own legates, although it had been foretold by Christ numerous times; from which it appears clearer than light that they could not have been deceived by some error, either of a very fallacious imagination or of a rash hope. 3) Foretold by prophecies, Luke 24:25-27; 1 Cor. 15:4, partly literal, as Ps. 16:10, coll. with Acts 2:25; Ps. 22:29, 31; 68:19; Isa. 53:10-11, partly typical, especially two, Isaac (to whom Christ undoubtedly referred, appealing to the writings of Moses, Luke 24:27, coll. with Gen. 22:12; Rom. 8:32; Heb. 11:19) and Jonah, Matt. 12:40. 4) Necessary, on account of salutary ends, especially the declaration of the satisfaction rendered and approved by God, and the application of the justice acquired, Rom. 4:25.

III. The testimony, which they gave 1) with unanimous consent, not privately, but publicly, not timidly, but strenuously, against any adversaries whatsoever, Acts 2:32; 4:10, 13. 2) most effectively, for convincing minds, Acts 2:32, 37, 41; 4:2, 4; 6:7, 10. 3) confirmed by miracles, Mark 16:20; Acts 3:15, 16; 4:10, 14, 16; 6:8, 10.

Confectar. 1. The witnesses of this truth are most worthy of the greatest faith; for not only are all those things that are required for a sufficiently suitable testimony present, but also many more than all in any testimony about whose dignity no one doubts. He who dares to deny this historical event, indeed, he has destroyed all historical credibility.

Confect. 2. Faith is to be given to this truth not only human and historical, but also divine; for to all those things which are most valid for historical faith, insofar as it is a historical event, are added documents altogether singular, given by God, insofar as this event is divine (by propos. II 3, 4 & III 2, & 3).

But what can the adversaries oppose to such great supports? What bears some semblance of truth, they have nothing, except this one thing: If Christ truly came back to life, why did he not show himself to be seen by the Jewish Sanhedrin, nor by Pilate, nor by any of his enemies, but only to his friends? Thus reasoned SPINOZA, whose reheated cabbage the infamous EDELMANNUS served up not so long ago, bringing nothing new. For with the same argumentation CELSUS long ago attacked this truth, against whom ORIGEN disputed. Resp. 1) If this demand were just, could not all atheists, and their easy prince, SPINOZA, demand by the same right that Christ should show himself alive to them also? 2) The divine PETER adduces a most wise reason why the revived Christ showed himself to be seen by the eyes not of just anyone, but of those who were judged to be suitable and trustworthy witnesses, Acts 10:40-41. 3) Not only friends, but also enemies saw Christ, raised from the underworld: the guards of the tomb, Matt. 28:11, and Paul, brought to that point with a most hostile mind, so that he seemed to be insane and to rave, Acts 9:1ff; 26:9-16. Finally 4) so great was the obstinacy of their minds, that they were unwilling to consider the clearest documents, but tried to obscure them all either by force or by fraud, fearing that something might be detracted from their own reputation if they were forced to confess openly that they had pronounced a most unjust sentence against Christ. Matt. 28:11-14; Acts 4:14, 16, 17; add. Luke 16:30-31. Would they not have taken Christ for a specter? in the way that CELSUS imagined, when he found nothing else by which to make the faith of Christ's disciples suspect. And indeed, the enemy could have suspected that much more than the friends from the fact that specters are commonly thought to be especially occupied around the funerals and tombs of wicked men, and the Jews had calumniated that Christ performed his miracles in no other way than with the help of the devil, indeed, his prince.

among these latter actions is numbered the resurrection of Christ from the dead.

III. If Christ raised himself from the dead, he will not be the eternal God; The Evangelicals deny the consequent. Therefore, they ought also to deny the antecedent. The reason for the consequence is; Just as the eternal God does not die, so also he cannot raise himself. Resp. The eternal God does not die in his divinity. The λόγος (Word) died in the flesh; but according to the divinity, dwelling in the flesh, he raised himself.

Instance; Therefore he did not raise himself according to his humanity. Resp. He did not raise himself according to his humanity, as the first and immediate subject, but as the second and mediate subject of the vivifying power. We do not assert that the human nature of Christ acted in the resurrection according to its own powers, but according to communicated powers.

IV. Christ obtained the resurrection of his body from the Father by prayers, Heb. 5:7. Therefore, he did not restore life to himself. Resp. Christ prayed in the state of exinanition, having assumed the form of a servant, according to which he did not raise himself. For the resurrection is a glorious act of Christ, existing in the form of deity.

Question CXLIV. According to which nature did Christ rise again?

Christ the θεάνθρωπος (God-man) a) rose again according to his human nature b).

Prob. a. The subjectum quod (the subject which) of the resurrection is the composite person of Christ. For the angels themselves say that Christ has risen, Luke 24:16. However, he did not rise as the daughter of Jairus, or Lazarus, by another's power, but by divine power communicated to him.

Prob. b. According to the same nature that Christ was crucified and died, according to that same nature he rose again. But he died according to his human nature, Therefore...

Obs. The remote subjectum quo (the subject by which) of the resurrection is the human nature; the proximate is the body which had fallen.

Question CXLV. Did Christ bring out of the tomb the same body that had been affixed to the cross and had died?

Christ brought out of the tomb the numerically same body, as to its substance a), but clothed with new qualities b).

Prob. a. The Savior addresses the Jews, John 2:19; "Destroy this temple" (as if pointing with his finger to the temple of his body, v. 21), "and in three days I will raise it up" (not another in essence, but the same).

Prob. b. The qualities and glorious endowments of Christ's body are; impalpability, invisibility, illocality, so that, where he willed, there he would be in a moment, in a word, spirituality, 1 Cor. 15:42. Whence Christ both presented himself alive, and disappeared when it pleased him, Luke 24:13. On account of which endowments it is called σῶμα τῆς δόξης (the body of glory), by a Hebraism, i.e., a glorious body, Phil. 3:21.

Question CXLVI. When did Christ rise again?

Christ rose again on the third day a), in the morning b), while the tomb was still closed c).

Prob. a. We learn that Christ rose on the third day from Matt. 17:23; Mark 9:31; Luke 18:34. Confer above Question CXXVII.

Prob. b. Luke, in chapter 24:1, testifies that Christ came forth from the monument at early dawn; Mark, in chapter 16:1, very early in the morning, when the sun had risen (that is, above the rational horizon, although not yet above the sensible horizon).

Prob. c. Matthew, in chapter 28:2, 6, asserts that the angel of the Lord removed the stone of the sepulcher, not to open an exit for Christ, but to show others the place, abandoned by the resurrected Christ.

You say: Christ brought a true and substantial body out of the tomb, which could not penetrate another solid body. Resp. 1) Examples teach that more subtle bodies penetrate coarser ones. Thus solar rays penetrate glass, fire penetrates iron. 2) A distinction is made between a physical body and a glorified one. The Apostle is a witness in Heb. 4:14 that our great high priest has passed through the heavens.

Question CXLVII. To what end did Christ rise again?

Christ rose again a) to manifest his victory obtained over death and the devil; b) to offer and apply to all men the fruits of his passion and death.

Prob. a. Unless Christ had reported victory over death and the devil, he could not have come forth from the tomb, Acts 2:24; Hos. 13:14. He manifested this victory by ten appearances, by which he refreshed I. Mary Magdalene, Mark 16:9; II. the whole choir of pious women, Matt. 28:9; III. Peter, Luke 24:34; IV. Cleopas and his companion, setting out for Emmaus, Luke 24:15; V. the eleven disciples, except for Thomas, John 20:19; VI. Thomas, with the other disciples present, John 20:28; VII. the seven disciples, at the shore of the sea of Tiberias in Galilee, John 21:1; VIII. five hundred brethren, 1 Cor. 15:6; IX. James, 1 Cor. 15:7; X. the assembled disciples on the day of ascension, Acts 1:9. The resurrected Christ wished to appear especially to these disciples, that they might be eyewitnesses of Christ's resurrection, and might proclaim it throughout the world, Luke 24:46, 47, 48. He presented himself to them alive ἐν πολλοῖς τεκμηρίοις, by many proofs, Acts 1:3. For he spoke with them about the kingdom of God, and ate with them, Luke 24:41.

Concerning which eating, AUGUSTINE says elegantly, sermon CXLVII on time: What he ate was a matter of power, not of need. The thirsty earth absorbs water one way, the burning ray of the sun another; the former from indigence, the latter from potency. He admitted the disciples to the touch of his body, and showed them his scars, about which AUGUSTINE treats, CXXI on John: To heal doubting hearts, the marks of the nails were retained.

Prob. b. The resurrected Christ commanded his victory to be proclaimed in the world by eyewitnesses, so that the fruits, obtained by his most bitter passion and death, might be offered to the entire human race; which fruits are: I. Justice. Christ was raised for our justification, Rom. 4:25. The resurrection of Christ is evident testimony that Christ by his death fully satisfied the offended God for our sins, and merited for us the remission of sins and justice; Otherwise God would not have released our surety from the bonds of death. Therefore, the resurrected Christ also wished the remission of sins to be applied to us, through the ministry of reconciliation, John 20:23: If you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven them. II. Spiritual Peace, for which he had warred. Therefore, the resurrected one prays for peace for his disciples, John 20:19. III. The confirmation of our Fraternity. For Christ is the firstborn from the dead, Col. 1:17. The faithful, who rise by his power, are brothers of this firstborn Son of God. Therefore he says: I am ascending to my Father and your Father, John 20:17. IV. The living Hope of our resurrection. Christ, having been raised from the dead, has become the ἀπαρχή (firstfruits) of those who have fallen asleep: For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive, 1 Cor. 15:20, 21, 22. Those who are in Christ Jesus through faith are partakers of this fruit. IV. Renewal, which is a spiritual resurrection from the tomb of sin. Just as Christ was raised through the glory of the Father: So we also should walk in newness of life, Rom. 6:4.

Question CXLVIII. What is the ascension of Christ?

Ascension into heaven. The ascension is the glorious act of Christ, by which, having been resurrected, according to his human nature, by a true, real, and through free economy, local motion, and in a visible manner up to the clouds, and thence in an invisible way into the common heaven of the blessed, and to the very throne of God, he raised himself, so that, with his enemies triumphed over, he might occupy the kingdom of God, reopen the closed paradise, and prepare a permanent seat for us in the heavens.

Question CXLIX. According to which nature did Christ ascend into heaven?

Christ the θεάνθρωπος (God-man) a) ascended into heaven according to his human nature b).

Prob. a. The subjectum quod of the ascension is the whole θεάνθρωπος. The same who descended, also ascended, Eph. 4:10. But the whole θεάνθρωπος descended, who, having been made alive, descended, 1 Peter 3:22. Therefore.

Prob. b. The subjectum quo of the ascension is the human nature, which was lifted on high, Acts 1:9, which does not apply to the divinity, which cannot be carried on high (for this belongs to bodies alone). Who would say of the divinity: "He departed from them, and was carried into heaven"? Luke 24:51.

Question CL. By what power did Christ ascend into heaven?

Christ ascended into heaven by infinite power, common to all three persons of the divinity.

Prob. 1) The exaltation of Christ into heaven is an action ad extra, common to all three persons of the deity. 2) Christ is said to have been exalted by the δεξιᾷ τοῦ Θεοῦ, the right hand of God, Acts 2:3, c. 5:31, i.e., by the infinite and immense power of God; for the right hand of God is here taken not relatively, but absolutely.

Question CLI. What is the starting point from which Christ ascended?

The starting point of the ascension is the Mount of Olives near Bethany.

Prob. From Acts 1:12, after Christ was taken up into heaven, the disciples returned to Jerusalem from the mount that is called Olivet. And Christ, about to ascend, led the disciples out as far as Bethany, Luke 24:50.

Question CLII. What is the destination of Christ's ascension?

The destination to which Christ arrived in his ascension is both common and proper. The common destination is the seat and dwelling of the blessed, where Christ presents himself to be seen face to face by the blessed a). The proper and ultimate destination is the majestic heaven of God, or the throne of divine majesty b).

Prob. a. Christ was raised into paradise, in which the thief converted with him, Luke 23:43, where Job also is, ch. 19:27, where mansions are prepared for the faithful, John 14:2, where the most glorious redeemer will gladden the souls of the saints with his most pleasant sight.

Prob. b. The proper destination is the majestic heaven of God, which is above all heavens, Eph. 4:10. We have a great high priest, who has passed through the heavens, Heb. 4:14. He passed through the heavens not by reason of distance, but of a most sublime and divine presence. The majestic heaven of God is the very right hand of God, by which Christ was made higher than the heavens, Heb. 7:26, about which the Apostle says, Heb. 8:1: We have such a high priest, who has sat down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens.

Obs. By heaven here is not meant the airy or ethereal heaven of nature, which it is impious to imagine; nor the heaven of grace, which is the church militant on this earth, from which Christ has withdrawn his visible presence until the day of the last judgment. Therefore, it is understood to be the heaven of glory, either finite or infinite. By finite glory, Christ certainly presents himself to be seen in the place of the blessed by angels and the blessed, after the manner of a true glorified body, yet in such a way that infinite glory is also communicated to him through the session at the right hand of God. Therefore, Christ was raised into the majestic heaven of God, that he might fill all things, Eph. 4:10. Cf. DANNHAVER in hodoi phænomenon VIII. p. 763.

Question CLIII. What was the manner of Christ's ascension?

With respect to its manner, the ascension of Christ was not an ἀφανισμός, or disappearance, but a motion; true, real, successively progressive a), and visible up to the clouds b). But having been lifted up by a cloud, he was exalted in an invisible manner to the right hand of God c).

Prob. a. From Luke 24:51: He departed from them, and was taken up into heaven. Departure implies a successive change of place and a progressive motion from a place into heaven.

Prob. b. From Acts 1:9: While they were watching, he was taken up, and a cloud received him from their sight.

Prob. c. Christ passed through the heavens, Heb. 4:14, having been made higher than the heavens, Heb. 7:26. Therefore, he was raised above all heavens in an invisible manner.

Obs. The visible motion of Christ up to the clouds was local, not according to the motion of a natural body, which by its nature is carried downwards, but of a glorified one and endowed with supernatural gifts. Nor was it through the indigence of nature, but through free economy that Christ assumed a local and visible motion, who, had he wished, could have withdrawn himself from his disciples in a point of time and occupied heaven. But it pleased the Savior to be carried upwards gradually, so that the disciples might testify to the true ascension more clearly and confidently. From which we gather that Christ ascended up to the clouds by a local motion, but not locally, or physically. Cf. D. SCHERZERI System p. 247.

Question CLIV. To what end did he ascend into heaven?

The general end of the ascension is that he might gloriously show himself as the victor over death and the devil to angels and the elect a). The special ends are that he might occupy the heavenly kingdom b), reopen paradise to us c), and prepare dwellings in heaven d).

Prob. a. From Col. 2:15: Disarming the principalities and powers, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them in himself. Christ, in hell, showed to the evil spirits through his descent to hell, on earth to men through his resurrection, in heaven to angels and blessed souls, that he had conquered his enemies and was holding a just triumph over them.

Prob. b. From Acts 3:21: Ὅν δεῖ ἐρανὸν μὲν δεξαθαι, ἄχρι χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων, whom heaven must receive until the time of the restoration of all things. The sense is: It is necessary for Christ, by divine decree, to occupy the heavenly kingdom, to be governed by the full and universal use of the communicated divine majesty.

Prob. c. From Apoc. 3:7: These things says the holy and true one, who has the key of David, who opens so that no one may shut, and shuts so that no one may open. Christ has full power in the government of the church, to open heaven, and to receive into the church not only the militant, but also the triumphant.

Prob. d. From John 14:2: In my Father's house there are many mansions. If it were not so, I would have told you; I go to prepare a place for you. The Savior teaches that by divine decree, to each is appointed his own seat and degree of glory. If this were not so, Jesus would have already told the disciples, nor would he have deluded them with a vain hope. But now he openly says that he is about to depart to prepare for them by his merit a most blessed place and dwelling, since the divine decree, concerning the conferring of a blessed seat, is founded on the merit of Christ.

Question CLV. What is the session of Christ at the right hand of God?

Session at the right hand of God. The session at the right hand of God is the highest degree of glory, by which Christ the θεάνθρωπος, according to his human nature, having been raised to the throne of divine majesty, governs all things which are in the kingdom of power, of grace, and of glory, most powerfully and most presently, for the glory of his name, and for the comfort and salvation of the afflicted church.

Question CLVI. What do you understand by the right hand of God?

The right hand of God here does not denote a corporeal member a), but infinite power b), and immense glory c).

Prob. a. God is spirit, John 4:24, who does not have flesh and bones, Luke 24:39.

Prob. b. The right hand of God signifies infinite virtue; because it is called in the sacred letters the right hand of power, Matt. 26:64; the striking right hand, Exod. 15:6.

Prob. c. The right hand of God is also called by the Holy Spirit the right hand of majesty, Heb. 1:3; c. 8:1; the right hand of the throne of God, Heb. 12:2. It is the right hand of God above all principality, power, virtue, and dominion, Eph. 1:21. It is the omnipresent right hand of God, Ps. 139:10.

Question CLVII. Does the right hand of God designate a place?

The right hand of God does not denote a certain and determinate place.

Prob. Because the right hand of God is infinite power and immense majesty, as we have already demonstrated, it cannot be a determinate place.

You say: 1) It is called the right hand of God on high, Heb. 1:3. 2) In the Apostles' Creed we believe that Christ will come from thence at the right hand of God. "Thence" is an adverb of place. Resp. To 1. It is called the right hand on high, not by reason of a sublime place, but by reason of a most exalted state. To 2. The adverb "thence" in the Apostles' Creed must be referred not to the right hand of God, because Christ, coming to judgment, will sit at the right hand of God, Matt. 26:64. Therefore he will not come from thence; but to the heaven of the blessed, or to that blessed place, in which Christ is according to the mode of his glorified body, as explained by D. AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS, Qu. de maiestate Christi, p. 184.

Question CLVIII. Why is it called the right hand of God the Father?

It is called the right hand of God the Father because the right hand of God, to which Christ was raised, is here taken not absolutely, as it is common to all three persons of the divinity, but relatively, inasmuch as it is the right hand of the first divine person, who is the fount of the deity a), and to indicate a notable difference between the right hand of the Father and that of Christ b).

Prob. a. God the Father said to God the Son: Sit at my right hand, Ps. 110:2. Where the right hand of God cannot be taken absolutely, to denote omnipotence and glory common to all three divine persons. For thus Christ would sit at his own right hand, and at the right hand of the Holy Spirit, which is ἄγραφον (unwritten). Therefore, the right hand of God is here taken relatively, as it denotes the divine power and immense majesty, communicated by God the Father to τῷ λόγῳ ἀσάρκῳ (the un-incarnate Word) through eternal generation, and to the λόγῳ ἐνσάρκῳ (the incarnate Word), as to his human nature, through exaltation. Cf. D. DANNHAVER in Christos p. 335.

Prob. b. The right hand of Christ has a contrasting left hand, Matt. 25:33; but the right hand of the Father does not have a corresponding left. "I mean the right hand, lest you look for a left hand there," says AUGUSTINE, sermon CXIX on time. The right hand of God the Father is incommunicable to mere men; but the right hand of Christ is communicable. The former denotes infinite glory, the latter finite.

Question CLIX. Why is it called the right hand of the throne?

It is called the right hand of the throne, on account of the royal, spiritual, and most high majesty communicated to Christ as man through his exaltation.

The right hand of the Father is called the right hand of the throne of God, Heb. 12:2; the right hand of the throne of majesty in the heavens, Heb. 8:1. The throne of God is the divine majesty, glory, opulence, and magnificence, differing from the right hand not in reality, but in reason, in the same way that divine majesty differs from divine power. See DANNHAVER in hodof. phanom. VIII, 775.

Question CLX. What does it mean to sit at the right hand of God?

To sit at the right hand of God signifies: to use fully and unceasingly the omnipotence and royal majesty communicated by the Father through exaltation, for the universal and most glorious governance in the kingdom of power, of grace, and of glory: or, what is the same, to sit at the right hand of God is, by virtue of the personal union and the exaltation that followed it, to govern all the works of God's hands most powerfully, most presently, and most gloriously.

Prob. 1) From the Pauline interpretation, 1 Cor. 15:25: It is necessary for Jesus to reign, until he has put all enemies under his feet. Coll. with Ps. 110:1-2: The Lord said to my Lord: Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies your footstool. The Lord will send the scepter of your strength from Zion (saying): rule in the midst of your enemies. 2) Because Christ, crowned with glory and honor, was set over all the works of the divine hands, so that all things are subject under his feet, Heb. 2:7-8. Therefore, through the exaltation to the right hand of God, universal dominion over all creatures was conferred upon Christ.

Question CLXI. According to which nature was Christ exalted to the right hand of God?

Christ the θεάνθρωπος (God-man) a) was raised to the right hand of God according to his human nature b).

Prob. a. I have overcome and have sat down with my Father on his throne, Apoc. 3:21. Whoever has overcome death and the devil is Christ the θεάνθρωπος; The same is the sitter on the Father's throne.

Prob. b. 1) From Christ's own assertion: From now on the Son of Man will be seated at the right hand of the power of God, Luke 22:69. Christ, standing in the midst of the theater of exinanition, says that ἀπ' ἄρτι, from now on, i.e., at this very moment he will be seated, as the Son of Man, at the right hand of God. 2) From the connection of exinanition and exaltation. According to the same nature that Christ was emptied, according to that same he was exalted to the right hand of God; But according to the human nature etc. Therefore. The major is established: because exinanition and exaltation are most closely connected in the sacred code, and are said of the same nature. The minor is clear from the Pauline oracle, Rom. 8:34: Who is he that condemns? It is Christ who died; more rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also makes intercession for us. All these predicates are said of Christ according to his human nature.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who assert that the exaltation to the right hand belongs to Christ according to both natures; they argue:

I. Holy Scripture attributes the session at the right hand of God to the whole person of Christ, Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20-21. Resp. Holy scripture attributes the session at the right hand of God to the whole person of Christ indeed, but according to his human nature. The person is the subjectum quod, the human nature is the subjectum quo of the session at the right hand.

II. To sit at the right hand of God is a royal official act; Therefore, it belongs to Christ according to both natures. Resp. To sit at the right hand of God is taken either precisely, as the highest degree of exaltation, or complexly, inasmuch as it is a royal act, directed for the benefit of the church. To wit, the exaltation to the right hand of the Father belongs to Christ according to his human nature; but the session of Christ, as it denotes the gracious and salutary dominion of Christ, is an ἀποτέλεσμα, or a theandric action.

Question CLXII. By what power was Christ exalted to the right hand of God?

Christ was exalted by the power common to all three persons of the divinity.

Prob. This exaltation is most frequently attributed in Holy Scripture to God the Father, as the font of divinity, Ps. 110:1; Eph. 1:29; Phil. 2:9. Nevertheless, since what the Father does, the Son does likewise, John 5:19, therefore Christ himself is also said to have sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, Heb. 1:3. Nor should the Holy Spirit be excluded from the exaltation of Christ, since it is an undivided action ad extra.

Question CLXIII. Was a truly divine, universal, and omnipresent dominion granted to Christ through the exaltation to the right hand of God?

Through the exaltation to the right hand of God the Father, a truly divine a), universal and omnipresent b) dominion was conferred upon Christ.

Prob. a. 1) Such as is the governance of God the Father on the throne of his majesty, such is the governance of Christ the θεάνθρωπος, sitting at the right hand of God; but the governance of God the Father is truly divine; Therefore. The major is proved; Just as to subsist γεννητῶς (by generation) and essentially do not differ in divine matters, so the divine session simply, and the session at the right hand do not differ essentially. See DANNH. in hodof. phænom. VIII. p. 779. 2) From the session of Christ at the right hand of God flow effects of infinite power, which are recounted in Ps. 110, namely 1) the prostration of all enemies to the footstool of his feet, among which enemies are most powerful spirits, the greatest monarchs and tyrants, 2) the sending forth of a gracious scepter into the whole world, 3) dominion in the midst of enemies, 4) a new generation of innumerable offspring, 5) the administration of an eternal priesthood, which priesthood is the cause of eternal salvation, Heb. 5:9.

Prob. b. 1) Whatever nature has been raised to a truly divine government, that nature reigns substantially present everywhere; But the human nature of Christ etc.; Therefore. The minor is clear from what has already been said. 2) Whatever nature has been placed at the omnipresent right hand of God, and sits on an omnipresent throne, that nature governs most omnipresently; But the human nature of Christ etc. Therefore. The major is established; because everything that is of the divine right hand is omnipresent; Therefore, he who sits there, where the right hand of God is, he is omnipresent.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who deny that a truly divine and omnipresent dominion was conferred upon Christ as man; their principal arguments are:

I. If both natures of Christ govern omnipotently and omnipresently, there will be two omnipotent and omnipresent governors; The consequent is absurd; Therefore also the antecedent. Resp. 1) It concludes viciously from the abstract to the concrete. 2) If each nature of Christ were a person, governing omnipotently and omnipresently, there would be two omnipotent and omnipresent governors; But both natures of Christ make one composite person, who is at once God and man.

II. The placement at the right hand of God, and the session on the divine throne do not infer an omnipresent dominion. For on the last day of judgment the faithful are to be placed at the right hand of Christ, Matt. 25:33, and the elect are said to sit on Christ's throne, Apoc. 3:21. Resp. A distinction is made between the right hand and throne of God the Father, and the right hand and throne of Christ. The right hand and throne of God the Father denotes infinite power and majesty; The right hand and throne of Christ designates a finite dignity and prerogative, reconciled to us by the merit of Christ.

III. The body of Christ is in heaven; Therefore, it does not reign everywhere. Resp. 1) Our Father is in heaven, and yet he reigns everywhere. 2) The body of Christ is in the heaven of the blessed, as to the height of its glorified nature; Yet it is in the majestic heaven of God, as to the act of the person, that it may fill all things, Eph. 4:10. But the glorified body of Christ is not inclusively or circumscriptively in a physical and local heaven.

IV. Christ, as a glorified man, was seen by Stephen standing in heaven, Acts 7:55. Therefore, Christ as man is not omnipresent in the state of glorification. Resp. The vision and revelation of Christ does not undermine omnipresence, but confirms it. For Christ by his most free will can present himself visibly present in any place, and yet remain personally omnipresent; Just as the patriarch Jacob saw God standing above the ladder in heaven, who nevertheless was also present on earth, Gen. 28:13.

V. According to the nature by which the Son of God reigns with the same majesty as the Father, by that nature he is ὁμοῦσιος (consubstantial) with God the Father. But according to his human nature, the Son of God is not ὁμοῦσιος with the Father. Therefore... The major is evident; because from the session of the Son of God, and his omnipresent governance, a valid argument is drawn for proving the divinity of the Son of God; which argument is enervated, if Christ according to his humanity governs with the same majesty as God the Father. Resp. A limitation on the major. According to the nature by which the Son of God reigns by himself and essentially with the same majesty as God the Father, by that same nature he is ὁμοῦσιος with God the Father; I grant. But according to his human nature, Christ does not govern by himself or essentially, but by the grace of union and exaltation, with the same majesty as the Father. However, the reasoning from the session at the right hand of God and the divine governance to τὴν ὁμοουσίαν (consubstantiality) with God the Father is good; because the one who sits at the right hand of God is the θεάνθρωπος, and God does not admit to his right hand a sitting person, unless that person is divine.

Question CLXIV. To what end was Christ raised to the right hand of God?

Christ was raised to the right hand of God a) for the glory of his name, b) for the salvation of the church.

Prob. a. Because through the raising to the right hand of God, Christ was constituted as the catholic King to be adored by all celestial, terrestrial, and subterranean creatures, Phil. 2:9.

Prob. b. Christ sitting at the right hand of God is the head of the church, Eph. 1:22, and therefore he protects it; he intercedes for us, Rom. 8:34, and makes us partakers of his glory according to the capacity of our nature, Apoc. 3:21; but he will destroy the power of the devil and of all enemies, Ps. 110:1.

Question CLXV. What use do you derive from χρισογνωσία (the knowledge of Christ)?

Practical use. From the knowledge of Christ, a very abundant use redounds to all men, but especially to the reborn, and it is both paracletic (comforting) a) and paraenetic (exhortatory) b).

Prob. a. Let all other sciences be and remain ζημιαί καὶ σκύβαλα (losses and refuse), compared to this χρισογνωσία. For this one comfort sustains our anxious minds, that Christ our Priest is most holy and truly divine, by whose death we are reconciled to God, by whose blood we are cleansed from sins; that the same is our Prophet, the Leader and light of the way to heaven; that finally Jesus Christ our King possesses such power that he can repel the force of enemies, and defend us, the citizens of his kingdom.

Prob. b. Let χρισογνωσία excite in us the study of piety! Christ, the high Priest, gave himself for us as an oblation and a sacrifice to God for a fragrant odor. Let us, spiritual Priests, offer our ευχαριστικά (eucharistic) sacrifices, a contrite heart and prayers ardent with piety, to Christ, with no day omitted. Christ, our Prophet, taught us the way of God in truth. Let us strenuously run this way with unoffending feet, until we reach the goal according to our vow. Christ in his royal office is the head of the church, his mystical body. Let us be and remain true and living members of the church, let us adhere to Christ the head, with sincere faith and charity, that he may deign to protect and defend us.

SUSPIRIUM.

To you,  JESUS, the leader and finisher of my faith, I look, as often as I reopen the wounds of my soul! You were struck, that I might be healed. You shed Your blood, that my filth might be washed away. That I might live eternally, you underwent an ignominious death. Lest I wander far and wide, You opened for me an easy way to heaven. Lest I be oppressed by enemies, You have raised my head with Your royal protection. What shall I render for so many and so great benefits conferred upon me? I give, I say, I consecrate to You,  JESUS, whatever I have. I give a contrite heart, I speak to you a faithful soul, I consecrate a body destined for Your worship! To You be praise, and honor, and glory for evermore!

CHAPTER IV.
ON THE APPLYING GRACE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT, AS THE
THIRD PRINCIPLE OF SALVATION, IN PARTICULAR ON THE CALLING GRACE OF
THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Question I. What is the applying grace of the Holy Spirit? (*)

THE APPLYING GRACE of the Holy Spirit is the principle of those divine acts, by which the Holy Spirit, through the word of God and the sacraments, dispenses the spiritual and eternal benefits, destined for the human race by the most benign benevolence of God the Father, and acquired by the fraternal redemption of Jesus Christ, and offers, confers, and seals them to us.

Obs. I. Spiritual benefits are those through which the soul of man, infected with the stain of sin, is divinely liberated from the state of misery, and is transferred into the state of grace and of glory; such as are: the salvific knowledge of God, faith in Christ, remission of sins, justice that avails before God, freedom from the terror and curse of the law, υιοθεσια, or adoption as sons of God, our communion with God, peace of conscience, spiritual joy, the gift of perseverance, and eternal life. God the Father destined these spiritual benefits for the human race in his eternal counsel, God the Son acquired them by his active and passive obedience, so that, with divine justice being preserved, they might redound to sinners; the Holy Spirit dispenses the same through ordinary means, and applies them to men, by offering and conferring them; men, however, endowed with the powers of the Holy Spirit, apply them to themselves by receiving them.

(*) Let it be permitted to me to preface certain things concerning the grace of God, considered in general. There are many and various significations of this name, whose accurate and distinct knowledge is very necessary, both for the explanation of things, and for the interpretation of words in diverse places of Holy Scripture, and indeed for the refutation of errors in the school of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, of whom those especially, as Augustine well observed, made use of great and cunning ambiguity of speech. Therefore attention must first be given to opposition, then to distinction; for from both must be understood what and how manifold is the power of any word.

I. Divine grace is opposed 1) to human merit and worthiness, Rom. XI, 6. Eph. II, 8. & 9; 2) to the nature of men, not to its constitution, but to its corruption, Eph. II, 3. & 8; 3) to eternal glory, which differs from grace as the consequent from the antecedent, as effect from cause, as end from efficacious means, in the same way that the kingdom of grace is distinguished from the kingdom of glory, 1 Corinth. I, 3-8 Tit. III, 7: 4) to wrath and condemnation, and that indeed twofold: α) which follows the first and hereditary sin, and which precedes salvation to be recovered and offered to all, Eph. II, 3. & 7.8: β) which follows the obstinacy of souls and salvation offered and rejected, Rom, IX, 22. Hebr. XII, 15. ff. Jude v. 4. Therefore 1) by force of the first opposition, grace is any benefit of God whatsoever, whether temporal or eternal, even human nature itself, not only in the state of defection, but also in the state of integrity, and both its constitution and conservation, without any merit of man, still integral. Hence we speak of creating and conserving grace, within whose scope are contained all things whatsoever that pertain to divine creation and providence, and therefore it is usually called the grace of the first article (of the Christian faith). By force of the second opposition, grace is the restoration of corrupt nature to wholeness, and both the acquisition and application of lost salvation, and this indeed both inchoate and consummated, to which pertain all benefits procured by the merits of Christ, both temporal and eternal. This is called saving grace, Tit. II, 11.12. 13. and the same grace of the second and third article. By force of the third opposition, grace is the preparation of men for eternal glory, and the granting of all those things which belong to the order of salvation and are necessary for obtaining eternal blessedness. This is especially usually called the grace of the third article. By force of the fourth opposition, as it pertains indeed to its former part, grace is God's mercy and benevolent will concerning the recovery of the salvation of miserable men through some sponsor who would satisfy divine justice sufficiently, to be offered to all and each one; but as to the latter part, grace is God's benevolent will by which He sometimes tolerates wicked and obstinate men, spares them, and provides sufficiently efficacious means for repentance to them, up to the time appointed by judgment. Rom. II, 4.5.

II. Divine grace is distinguished (but we speak of saving grace, which we profess partly in the second, partly in the third article of Christian doctrine) in various ways, according to the variety both of things and of persons which are required for the salvation of men to be freed from their misery. α) By reason of God, whom we venerate as the one common author of all salvation, grace is divided into that decreeing in God's eternal counsel, and that effecting in time. Both are proclaimed Eph. I, 4. 6. 7. β) By reason of salvation, grace is 1) of acquisition, through the satisfaction and merit of Christ, and therefore is called the grace of Jesus Christ, Act. XV, 11. 2 Cor. VIII, 9. and in Paul's customary greeting, Rom, XVI, 24, which John also used, Apoc. XXII, 21; 2) grace of application, through the efficacy of the Holy Spirit who for that cause is called πνεῦμα τῆς χάριτος (pneuma tes charitos / Spirit of grace), Hebr. X, 29. The same distinction is needed when we speak of the means of grace and salvation. For these means pertain either to the acquisition of our salvation, or to the application of the same and the receiving of fruit. The medium of grace, for the acquisition of salvation, is nothing other than the satisfaction and merit of Christ, Act. IV, 12. For application these two are necessarily required; offering and acceptance. Therefore the medium of grace, as to the application of salvation, is altogether twofold. One, by which God offers salvation to us, and when we ourselves are obedient to the word, He confers it upon us; that which is the word, but especially the gospel (for the law, by human vice and fault, effects nothing but wrath and denounces condemnation to man, Rom. III, 19. IV, 15. VII, 13.) and both sacraments. The other, by which we receive salvation offered to us; and this is true confidence placed in Christ, which the Holy Spirit kindles and confirms in the soul. γ) By reason of men, and of the various divine acts by which they are led to salvation, the grace of application 1) some particular grace has been given to ministers of the divine word, insofar as they are ministers, Eph, III, 8. I Corinth. XV, 10; 2 Cor. III, 4.5. 6. and therefore they are called administering gifts, of which some indeed are extraordinary and temporary, granted to the first messengers of the Gospel, such as are; divine instinct and inspiration, Matth. X, 19.20. and power of working miracles, Marc. XVI, 20. Hebr. II, 4; but others are ordinary and perpetual, to be granted to all until the end of the world, and necessary for performing the sacred duty, Act. XX, 28. 2) Common pertains to all men and the church, either gathered to Christ or to be gathered, Eph. V, 26. 27. Tit. III, 5. 6. 7. The gifts of this grace are called sanctifying. (The general sayings, in whose meaning are Obs. II. This οἰκονομίαν χάριτος (dispensation of grace), as Paul calls it in Eph. 3:2, i.e., the dispensing and applying grace of the Holy Spirit, Holy Scripture appropriates to the Holy Spirit, since on account of it 1) it adorns him with the sweetest names. For he is called the Spirit of grace and of prayers, Zech. 12:12; the Spirit of wisdom and of revelation, Eph. 1:17; the Spirit of faith, 2 Cor. 4:13; the Spirit of adoption, Rom. 8:15; the Spirit of glory, 1 Pet. 4:14; the Spirit of promise, by whom believers were sealed, and the guarantee of our inheritance, Eph. 1:14. 2) Because the acts of grace (vocation, illumination, etc.) belong appropriatively to the Holy Spirit.

Obs. III. The principle of all those divine and supernatural acts, by which the goods acquired by the merit of Christ are dispensed, is the grace of the Holy Spirit, since they proceed from it.

Question II. What is the nature of that applying grace of the Holy Spirit?

The applying grace of the Holy Spirit is a) active, b) medicinal, c) undeserved and gratuitous, d) ordered and mediated, e) universal, f) sufficient and efficacious, but g) resistible.

Prob. a. The applying grace is active, since the Holy Spirit through it actively calls, illuminates, converts, and regenerates men. It is therefore distinguished from passive grace, i.e., from the χαρίσματα (gifts), or from the divine gifts conferred by grace, which, by a metonymy of effect for cause, are called passive grace; about which Paul says in Eph. 4:17: To each one of us grace has been given according to the measure of Christ's gift.

Prob. b. This grace is medicinal; because it is occupied not with preserving an intact man in a state of happiness, but with healing a sick man, or one corrupted by the leprosy of sin, and transferring him from a state of misery to a state of grace and glory.

Prob. c. The applying grace is undeserved on the part of God; because God is bound by no law to confer grace. God is a debtor to no one, that he should be bound to give him anything, Rom. 11:35. God is not obliged to an obedient creature; Therefore, much less to a disobedient one. This grace is plainly gratuitous, on our part. For although it has been reconciled for us by the merits of Christ, it nevertheless does not depend on our disposition, dignity, merit, or ικανότητι (sufficiency), which itself is also from God, 2 Cor. 3:5. For benefits of divine grace are not dispensed on account of our merits, as fiefs are conferred on those who run or fight bravely, because of the race or on account of the fight. If it is by works, it is no longer grace, says Paul in Rom. 11:6.

Prob. d. The applying grace is ordered; because the Holy Spirit operates through distinct acts and degrees, succeeding one another in order, so that the second degree of grace follows the first admitted by the sinner, and the third follows this one, and so on; Conversely, if the first degree of applying grace is neglected or contemned, the second degree does not follow; if the second degree is rejected, the third does not follow; just as on a ladder one does not ascend to the highest step except through the intervening steps. Hence he who does not admit calling grace does not receive illuminating grace, and he who contemns this does not become a partaker of converting grace; because divine grace does not pour out all its powers or riches at once and at the same time, nor does it in one moment make a saint out of a most wicked man. This grace is mediated; for this reason, that the Holy Spirit, through the divine word and the sacraments, as ordinary means of salvation, calls, illuminates, converts men, etc.

Prob. e. The applying grace is universal; Because it is destined by the divine intention for all and every man, with not even one excepted, after they have fallen into sin and been redeemed by Christ. God of himself and contained all gifts of grace both sanctifying and administering, and these partly ordinary, partly extraordinary, are these two, Marc. XVI, 15-20. Eph. IV, 11. 12. 13.). As it pertains to diverse divine acts, the grace of application is α) calling, by offering means of salvation to each one, Rom. X, 16-21, 1 Tim, II, 4. Matth, XXII, 3.4; β) preventing, exciting, preparing, by effecting the first holy motions of the soul, by exciting holy attention of the soul, by removing impediments which obstruct the mind's meditation, Act. II, 37. XVI, 14. Apoc. III, 19.20; γ) illuminating, converting and regenerating, Tit. III, 5; δ) justifying, Rom. III, 24; ε) renewing, Eph. II, 10, Hebr. XII, 28. XIII, 21; ζ) confirming and conserving, Phil. I,6. 1 Petr. V,10; η) perfecting, so that we may arrive at consummated and eternal salvation, 1Cor. I, 4-8.

with the whole sentiment of his mind is inclined to call, convert, regenerate, justify, sanctify, and save each and every one. For the grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men, teaching us, Tit. 2:11-12, and the Holy Spirit offers faith to all, Acts 17:31.

Prob. f. The applying grace is sufficient: Because it is proportioned, or adequate, to producing its effect, although it may not achieve the desired event. The most benign God himself shows this, Isa. 5:4; What more was there to do for my vineyard, that I have not done in it? Why then did I expect it to bring forth grapes? But it brought forth wild grapes. If God did all that he ought to have done for the vineyard of Israel to be fruitful, and yet it did not bear clusters, but wild grapes, it follows that a sufficient grace is given, even with respect to the wicked, however much the desired event may not follow. The same sufficient grace is in itself and by its nature efficacious. For Christ said to Paul: My grace is sufficient for you; for my power is made perfect in weakness; Where to sufficient grace is attributed its own power, or efficacy.

Obs. Some Theologians admit the distinction of grace into sufficient and efficacious, others reject it. All grace is efficacious, on the part of God offering it; the event in the man to whom it is offered induces the difference, so that while sufficient grace is offered to all, it becomes efficacious in him who embraces it by faith; and so it is called efficacious with respect to converted men, and sufficient with respect to the unconverted. Confer, D. MEISNER. anthropol. decad. II. p. 11, 24; D. BROCHMAND. system. part. 1. p. 555; D. DANNHAV. hodof. phænom. IX. p. 856. D. HULSEMAN rejects this distinction in breviar. cap. IX. p. 950; Because all divine grace is efficaciously sufficient, and sufficiently efficacious in its order and economy; but from an external impediment to the effect, one wrongly infers a defect of intrinsic efficacy. (*)

(*) So it is: For 1) efficacy must be accurately distinguished from effect, and also from outcome. And it must be carefully guarded that these three things are not confused among themselves. Efficacy is inherent in the very nature of a thing, insofar as it is destined and fitted for some certain end, or several. Effect is the attainment of that end, insofar as that thing, always efficacious in itself, has been rightly employed. Outcome is something plainly different, alien from the proposed end, indeed entirely contrary to it, by the intervention of other things, or by the fault of man, who uses a good thing badly. And so it can happen, and often does, that some thing, most fruitful in itself, becomes pernicious by accident. See Rom. VII, 10. 2) Great caution must be applied, because of the more recent controversies of the Jansenists and others, in whose opinion God exhibits to most men only sufficient grace, to few elect ones efficacious grace. But first they are deceived in this, that they separate sufficient grace from efficacious, assigning one or the other to different men. Then great ambiguity lies hidden in the words. They interpret sufficient grace either so that it is indeed sufficient for God, for His purpose, but not likewise for men, for salvation; or so that it suffices indeed for men, but not for all in the same manner, for the rejected only as testimony, that so much grace has befallen them as God has decreed to give (in this sense they twist such sayings as Matth. X, 18. XXIV, 14. Marc. VI, 11.); for the elect alone as remedy, by which, freed from their misery, they become partakers of salvation. They understand efficacious grace to be that which by some singular force drives and compels the souls of elect men, so that they cannot but obey the divine will. Finally they do not observe accuracy of speech, when they say that efficacious grace is more powerful than sufficient. In which they err vehemently. For indeed 1) that grace which is efficacious for salvation, the same is sufficient, 2 Cor. XII, 9; 2) If any difference is to be established, always that which is called efficacious will be less than that which is called sufficient. Which I will confirm with three arguments: a) Each one of those things which we need for obtaining an end is efficacious; sufficient is the comprehension and joining together of all things necessary for the end, by reason both of the whole end (for thus to man's eternal salvation are required four acts of grace, of which if one were lacking, the rest would not be sufficient, but all together suffice, namely new generation, justification, renewal, finally perfect liberation and freedom from every trouble, 1 Cor. I, 30.) and of the whole man, and of all faculties of the soul, 1 Thessal. V, 23. 2 Cor. VII, 1. (thus arguments explaining and proving, which both relate to the understanding, and moving arguments, which pertain to the will,

Prob. g. That applying grace can be resisted, Stephen asserts in the clearest words, gravely addressing the Jews: You stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears! You always resist the Holy Spirit, Acts 7:51. (*)

Question III. In what order do the acts of applying grace cohere and follow one another?

The acts of applying grace. The acts of applying grace are: I. The Vocation of the sinner to the church; II. Illumination; III. Conversion; IV. Regeneration; V. Justification; VI. Mystical Union with the triune God; VII. Renewal; VIII. Conservation of faith and holiness; IX. Glorification.

Prob. We learn this order, and as it were, concatenated series of the acts of applying grace from Acts 26:17, where Christ addresses Paul: I am sending you to the Gentiles—behold the grace of vocation!—to open their eyes—behold illumination!—and that they may turn from darkness to light—behold the act of conversion!—and from the power of Satan to God—behold regeneration itself, by which we become Sons of God!—so that they may receive the forgiveness of sins—behold justification!—and a place among those who are sanctified by faith in me—behold the union with Christ through faith, sanctification, conservation of holiness, and glorification!

Question IV. Is there another distinction of the acts of applying grace?

The applying grace of the Holy Spirit is commonly distinguished into preventing, preparing, operating, cooperating, and conserving grace a). Likewise into assisting and indwelling grace b).

Prob. a. Preventing grace is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit offers the salvific object—the benevolence of God the Father and the merit of Christ—through the preached or read word of God to man, dead in sins, removes natural incapacity, and invites, excites, impels, and knocks for him to perform penitence. Preparing grace is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit restrains natural and actual resistance, simple and vincible, imbues the mind with a literal knowledge of the gospel, and breaks the will through the word of the law, so that it may be more and more disposed to receive saving faith. Operating grace, specially so called, is the act of grace by which the Holy are individually indeed efficacious, but separated they are not sufficient). b) Efficacious is that which is able to begin a thing, or also to continue it; sufficient is that which can perfect a thing entirely, so that nothing more can be desired. Preventing, exciting, preparing, illuminating, converting, justifying, renewing grace is certainly efficacious; but not yet sufficient. For it is necessary that strengthening, conserving grace be added, and finally that which frees us from every evil. c) Efficacious is the means by which, rightly applied, we attain the end. Sufficient is the instruction of the manner and order to be observed, according to which we ought to use that means properly. The Gospel is the unique efficacious means to saving confidence, and salvation itself indeed. But the order of salvation demands the necessary and perpetual conjunction of law with gospel. See Declaration of the Formula of Concord, ch. V. page 713. Therefore grace, although most efficacious, nevertheless would not be sufficient, unless it led us through the use of law, both elenctic-pedagogical and didactic, so that we both eagerly embrace salvation announced to us in the Gospel, and venerate it received with grateful soul.

(*) This must be held firmly against the Reformed and Jansenists, but also explained, since it seems to have been said ambiguously. Namely, to resist is either to fight back with forces, if not equal, certainly having some power (but who indeed can have even the least thing against God? although θεομάχοι (theomachoi / fighters against God) attempt this with rash audacity, yet with vain effort and empty anger without strength, Act. V, 39. Rom. IX, 19.); or to reject a benefit offered, and to be unwilling to obey the prescribed order, just as a faithless man, although most weak, who does not wish to obey the King and do what is commanded, or who spurns the King's grace, is said to resist him. This is what it means ἀντιτάσσεσθαι (antitassesthai / to set oneself against), Act. XVIII, 6. οὐχ ὑποτάσσεσθαι τῷ θεῷ (ouch hypotassesthai to theo / not to submit oneself to God), Rom. VIII, 7. X, 3. And that word ἀντιπίπτειν (antipiptein / to fall against), Act. VII, 51. what it is, you will be able to know from v. 57: to stop up the ears, to be unwilling to perceive the truth. For by no arguments, which are moral forces, could they restrain the force of truth, Act, VI, 10.

Spirit both confers the powers of believing and kindles justifying faith. To this pertain regeneration, justification, and mystical union. Cooperating grace is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit concurs with the justified man for his sanctification and the production of good works. To this pertains renewal. Conserving grace is the act of grace by which faith and holiness of life are conserved and confirmed; Its effect is the perseverance of the faithful. Concerning this distinction, cf. CHEMNITIUS in loc. de lib. arbitr. fol. 192; D. BREITHAUPT. in institut. p. 235, and in thes. cred. pag. 129.

Prob. b. Assisting grace is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit acts externally upon the man to be converted, not only by proposing and showing the salvific object and what ought to be done, but also by touching, knocking, exciting, and disposing the sinner's heart, so that he may be able to receive faith, and through faith the Holy Spirit may be able to inhabit him. To this assisting grace pertains preventing and preparing grace. Indwelling grace (taken in a more general sense, in which it embraces regenerating, justifying, and indwelling grace, taken in a more special sense) is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit enters the heart of man, and dwells and operates in it, both by conferring the powers of believing, and by kindling, confirming, and increasing saving faith. Cf. D. IOANN. ADAMI OSIANDRI theol. system. positiva, part. III. p. 18; D. QUENSTED. Syst. part. III, fol. 494. The foundation for the distinction into assisting and indwelling grace is found in Apoc. 3:20, where Christ addresses the bishop of Laodicea: Behold! I stand at the door and knock; If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in to him and dine with him, and he with me. Indicated in these words is a) generally assisting grace; because Christ says that he stands at the door, to wit, of the human heart, to convert it; however, he does not stand idle, but knocks and desires to be let in; he knocks, so that his voice may be heard, which is b) preventing and exciting grace, and indeed he knocks in such a way that the door may be opened, which is c) preparing grace. For unregenerate men open the door of the heart not by the natural powers of free will, but by new powers conferred through preventing and preparing grace; just as those resurrected from natural death rise not by their own powers, but by new powers given in the resurrection. For by knocking, Christ bestows the power of opening, which efficacy is proper to the word of the gospel, Rom. 1:16. d) When the door of the heart is opened, Christ enters; which is entering and indwelling grace; for Christ enters in such a way that he may dine with us and we with him; Christ enters, by kindling faith with the light of his word and by dwelling in us through faith, Eph. 3:17. Whence arises our sweetest communion with Christ, which is a foretaste of eternal life. From this saying of the Savior, the applying grace of the Holy Spirit can be distinguished by a τριχοτομίαν (trichotomy) into assisting grace, which operates externally on the closed heart of the sinner and labors to open it; entering grace, which enters the opened dwelling of the heart; And indwelling grace, which dwells in the heart with a gracious and efficacious presence.

Question V. Are the three ways of the mystics arranged in the correct order?

Concerning the three ways of the mystics. The three ways of the mystics are neither arranged in a just order a) nor do men, walking in them, certainly attain to the end predefined by the mystics b).

Antithesis is that of the mystical authors, who teach with great consensus that man 1) called to the church, can expeditiously progress by THREE ways, the purgative, illuminative, and unitive, to the holy mountain of perfection and deification. This is not denied by MAXIMILIANUS SANDAUS, in his clave theologiæ mysticæ, p. 360: Almost all masters of spiritual things are accustomed to circumscribe mystical theology with three ways, the purgative, illuminative, and unitive. HUGO DE PALMA, about to expound this threefold way, in his theol. mystica p. 5, says: The first way is purgative, by which the mind is disposed to learn true wisdom; The second is called illuminative, by which the mind by thinking is kindled to the inflammation of love; The third is indeed unitive, by which the mind, above all intellect, reason, and intelligence, is directed upwards by God alone. In these three ways all mystical theology consists. THOMAS A JESU explains these three ways more clearly, lib. I. Meth. diuin. orat. 1: The purpose of the purgative way is to purge and perfect the senses; of the Illuminative, the reason; of the Unitive, the spirit, or mind, which is the superior part of the soul. In the purgative, man knows himself; in the illuminative, God: in the unitive, he strives for union and transformation into him. Most clearly and fully of all, GOTTFRIED ARNOLD unfolds the same ways in his theol. myst. c. VI. p. 103 ff., from which we may be permitted to excerpt a few things pertinent to the matter. First, God cleanses the senses, and the lowest part of the soul, which is, as it were, its entrance; thereafter, the reason, then the understanding and will, and thus God regains dominion over the entire man, as He makes these parts pure and clear. Finally, He also frees the desires and the anger, through deep contrition and humiliation... And from all this we make such a description: The way of purification is that by which the mind is made fit to learn true wisdom; or it is such an exercise and effort of the mind, by which one arrives at the expulsion of vices, the appeasement of the affects or motions of the mind, the renewal of all qualities of the soul, the preservation of the heart and the senses, and the avoidance of all debts. For illumination, the ancients especially require humility, that one despairs of one's own powers, natural understanding, and self-sought knowledge, and instead hopes in God alone and grounds oneself in His assistance. Further, that one withdraws one's mind from external things, and by abandoning all distraction and excess, collects it; then, that one turns oneself to the divine ray, wishes for and begs for illumination from above, and turns with all one's strength to the contemplation and beholding of God. Thereupon the Lord of all wisdom will help, and make the heart bright through the gift of His wisdom, and fill it with His splendor. Therefore, illumination is described as an occupation of the mind in beholding the wonders of God, especially of the most blessed Trinity, and of the most simple, most beautiful Godhead: thereafter in the consideration of the heavenly and supernatural goods of the truth of the Christian faith, and of all spiritual things. The unification is an action which is directed to the ardor of the purest love, to the ecstatic and flaming infatuation with the Godhead, and to the most fiery, calmest, and most secret contemplation of the hidden wisdom, likewise, that the mind thereby, above all understanding and sense, is actually drawn up on high by God alone, or unites itself with its highest good through love and contemplation... And this is precisely the main point and work, the sum and purpose of the secret doctrine of God, to which the previous two stages must serve and contribute as preparations, namely, that a Christian man should become a God. Otherwise it is also called: to be transformed into God, to be deified. For God communicates His being to a Christian supernaturally, so that he himself seems to be God, and what God has, he himself also has. And when God shows the highest favor to the soul, such a union occurs between them that all that is God's, and all that is the soul's, is one in a common union, and the soul then seems to be more God than soul, indeed it is God through communion, although it is true that it retains its natural being as distinct from the Divine as before, yet it is transformed into God: just as a glass retains its distinct being from the ray of the sun, by which it has been illuminated, writes JOAN. a CRVCE Op. Myst. L. II. cap. V. pag. 38. Thus far ARNOLDUS l.c. p. 150.

Exposition

Obs. I. Since all theology shows and opens the way to heaven, or eternal salvation, it should be especially noted that the way to salvation either denotes the meritorious cause of eternal salvation, in which sense Christ called himself the way, John 14:6; or it designates the causal means of salvation, and that either offering and exhibiting, which is the word of God, and therefore is called the way of truth, Ps. 119:30, or apprehending and receiving, which is faith in Christ, through which we have access to grace, Rom. 5:2; or finally, it denotes that which is intermediate between the starting point and the destination, in which sense BERNHARD, in his book de gratia & arbitr., calls good works the way of the kingdom, not the cause of reigning. How this manner of speaking can be admitted in a sound sense is taught by D. QUENSTED. in his systemate theol. IV, c. IX. p. 330.

Obs. II. Mystical authors, in ordering their three ways, have followed in the footsteps of the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophers; since they said that before the soul can arrive at true wisdom, it has need of καθάρσει, i.e., a certain purgation, by which those stains are washed away from it. But further, to this purgation they joined a certain conversion of the mind into itself, as it were, which they wished to be a second entrance, or door. For they thought that the mind, conscious of its powers, and liberated from the bonds and filth of the body, or matter, before all else turns into itself, with other things that are outside being, as it were, handed over to oblivion, and, as not pertaining to it, ejected from memory. However, because a mind that is pure and liberated from evils is not yet perfectly blessed, they added a final duty of the mind, which they called ἀνοδόν, or ascent. About which IAMBlichus in his protreptic says: From the first purgation of the evils that are born with us from our beginning, there will be rest and immunity. Then will come to us the knowledge of a happy and blessed life, how great and of what kind it will be. With this ascending, we, the chief and divine race of men, will contemplate, and confirmed in this, we will attain the proposed end and a most blessed life with the Gods. Cf. SCHEFFER philos. Ital. c. IX. p. 74 ff. The end, however, of Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy is ὁμοίωσις θεῷ, assimilation with God, as taught by HIEROCLES & STOBÆUS, cited by SCHEFFER l.c. c. VII. p. 42. HIEROCLES in his preface to the golden verses of Pythagoras adds: it is necessary first to become a man, then a God. From which we gather that the mystics, in laying out their three ways, looked to the teachings of Pythagoras and Plato, and accommodated themselves to them.

Confirmation

Prob. a. 1) Mystical authors have erred in more than one way in arranging their three ways; because they have not clearly explained the proximate foundation of the division. If by the way to beatitude, both of grace and of glory, is understood the meritorious cause, there is only one way, to wit, Christ, whose words are golden: John 14:6, I am the way, the truth, and the life. Christ, however, is the way, both by reason of merit, because he reconciled us to God by his death, Rom. 5:10; and by reason of example, because he left us an ὑπογραμμὸν, an example, that we should follow his steps, 1 Pet. 2:21.

2. If, by the way to beatitude, is understood the causal means of salvation, by which the offered salvation is received, or apprehended; again, one way lies open to perennial beatitude, namely, true and sincere faith in Christ. By this, as an expedited way, we approach God, Rom. 11:6. By this, through Christ, we have access to the grace of God, Rom. 5:2. By this we are justified and saved, Rom. 3:22; Mark 16:16.

3. If, by the way to beatitude, is designated, specifically and determinately, the means of salvation ordained by God for wretched men after the fall, which offers and exhibits it, again there is one way, to wit, the way of truth, Ps. 119:30, i.e., the word of the gospel, which with peculiar emphasis is called the word of truth, Jas. 1:18; Eph. 1:13, because not only is it true in itself, just as the word of the law, but it also truly regenerates, and what life of grace and glory it promises, it confers in reality.

4. If, however, by the way to beatitude, generally and indeterminately, is designated the causal means of salvation for all men who lived in the state before and after the fall, there will be two ways, to wit, the legal way and the evangelical way, which twofold way I shall explain in the words of DANNHAVER from hodoi. phænom. VI. p. 462, who says: A twofold way is revealed in the scriptures, which leads to the heavens and to beatitude: One is the Legal, which is of the divine law, as a perfect norm, sealed by a mutual covenant, obliging the conscience to obedience, or to the inevitable punishment of a just judgment, beatifying by its most perfect observance in itself, but so impossible for us mortals that it is accidentally deadly. The other is the Evangelical, revealed from heaven, which, having been opened from the heart of the heavenly Father and by Christ our brother as mediator, the highest gift of the Father, leads most safely, best, and uniquely to the heavens through the vivifying grace of the Holy Spirit.

5. If, however, the mystical writers by their three ways wish to understand the ways of the divine order according to the acts of the applying grace of the Holy Spirit, it is certainly plain that they have perverted the order sanctioned by the divine Spirit. For indeed, with Holy Scripture as witness, the illuminative way precedes the purgative. To demonstrate which, I presuppose that τὴν γνῶσιν, or the knowledge of the mysteries of faith, which cannot be known by the guidance of the light of nature, is an effect of the illuminating grace of God, See 2 Cor. 4:6; Eph. 1:18. Unfolding the sacred codex, therefore,

a) I find that Paul and John the Apostles place τὴν γνῶσιν, or the knowledge of the intellect, before the purgation of the will in express words. The former, indeed, in Col. 1:9-10: We do not cease to pray and ask for you, that you may be filled with the knowledge of his will in all spiritual wisdom and understanding, so that you may walk worthy of the Lord to all pleasing. The latter, however, in 1 Ep. 3:2-3; Beloved, now we are sons of God, but it has not yet been made manifest what we shall be. But we know that when he is manifested, we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is. Therefore, everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself b) There is nothing in the will that was not first in the intellect. For the will does not operate without an object. But if the intellect does not propose an object to the will, the latter will not have an object about which to operate. And therefore it is necessary that, since the will is blind by itself, the intellect should illuminate it, and propose and represent an object. For which reason, in order that the will may be purged from the ἀταξία (disorder) of the affects, it is necessary for the intellect first to be illuminated by the Holy Spirit, both to recognize sin from the divine law, Rom. 3:20; c. 7:7, and to know Christ the mediator, 2 Cor. 4:4. c) Illumination precedes faith, John 1:7, as that from which knowledge flows, which is the first degree or act of faith. Therefore, it also precedes the purification of the soul, which is done through faith, Acts 15:9. d) If the will of man can be purified and sanctified without the prior illumination of the intellect, then man will be carried by a blind impulse to love God, whom he has never known; to place his trust in Christ, of whom he is ignorant; to conquer the world, without the pre-shining of faith; which are the most absurd of absurdities. With what appearance of truth, therefore, do the mystical authors place the purgative way before the illuminative? (*)

You say: A richer and fuller illumination of the intellect follows the purgation of the will, with the obstacles removed. Resp. Although I do not deny that a richer illumination of the intellect follows the sanctification of the will, yet I also affirm this for certain, that a richer illumination precedes a richer sanctification. (**)

6. The mystical doctors have not explained the purgative way with sufficient clarity. For by purgation they understand either the purgation from the guilt of sin, which is justification, or the purgation from

(*) Besides this error, another certain one is intolerable, far the most serious, in which the Pseudo-mystics are involved, if not all, certainly the coarser and fanatical men. For besides the fact that they invert the order of things, they also falsely interpret and define illumination; that it is the inflammation of a spark of divinity, which they imagine, and which they say is naturally implanted in all men. Which is fanatical naturalism. Into this perverse sense they twist this saying, John I, 9. and many more of this kind.

(**) For indeed it is fitting that everyone remember that all motions of the soul and all desires are in the will. But the good desire of an illuminated and renewed man is altogether twofold: One of learning; the other of acting and doing what is commanded. Both are either general or special. General desire, which pertains to the beginning of correcting life, namely the zeal both for learning something and for acting well, follows general knowledge of truth, perceived by the understanding; that God has declared His will in Holy Scripture, and what are the first and general doctrines; but the same precedes knowledge and more abundant illumination of the mind, or special, namely, what is the will of God, declared by the word consigned to letters, concerning things thus far generally known, now to be known both more clearly and distinctly, and more certainly. Special desire, which pertains to the increase and progression of holy life, namely the zeal both for learning more and for acting better, or for advancing more and more day by day, follows knowledge of truth and more abundant and special illumination of the understanding, Phil. I, 9. 10. 11. Col I, 9. 10. 11. These three principles are certainly most certain: 1) There is no desire for the unknown, and greater desire for the more known; 2) Nothing without reason, either true or false; either certain or uncertain; either perfectly and entirely, or imperfectly and in some way perceived; 3) The first motion in the will, whether good or evil, arises from the first perception of the understanding, whether of true or false; But the first perception in the understanding, and the first motion in the will closely connected with it, are followed by more perceptions in the understanding, and more motions in the will. Therefore there can be no desire in the will, unless some knowledge in the understanding has preceded. Nor can there be greater knowledge in the understanding, unless some desire in the will has preceded, following that first and general knowledge. Therefore the first and general knowledge of divine truth without delay excites the first motions of holy desire, which are followed by more abundant, clearer and more certain knowledge of individual parts of divine doctrine, from whose amplification and confirmation arise more and stronger, and constant motions of holy will.

the dominion of sin, which is renewal, or both. Justification follows illumination and precedes mystical union; renewal, however, follows both illumination and mystical union in the order of nature. For indeed a) Christ himself says: As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, unless it abides in the vine, so neither can you, unless you abide in me, John 15:4. b) Paul, Rom. 8:9, says: You are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if indeed the Spirit of God dwells in you. The reborn are not in the flesh, i.e., in the power and dominion of the flesh, but in the kingdom of the Holy Spirit; because the Holy Spirit is not only a guest, but also the master of his dwelling, which he inhabits, governs, purges, and adorns. Therefore, the ways of the mystics should be arranged in such a series that the first is illuminative, the second unitive, the third purgative. But if the mystical writers by purgation designate both justification and renewal, they are playing with an unseemly equivocation, which is the foul mother of errors; because with one word they embrace two acts of the applying divine grace, one of which precedes mystical union, the other follows it. But he teaches badly who does not distinguish well.

7. The mystical authors, in the disposition of their ways, have neglected and omitted the conversion of the sinner, most specially so called, by which contrition is excited through the divine law; regeneration, by which faith is kindled through the gospel; and justification, by which, on account of the merit of Christ, apprehended by true faith, sin is remitted and the righteousness of Christ is imputed. That this hiatus was long ago reproached to the mystics, I gather from the theolog. mystica of GOTTFRIED ARNOLD, cap. VIII, p. 208, who says: Some think that the Mystics teach so little, or nothing, about the New Birth, which is nevertheless the Summa, and the one Necessary thing in Christianity, and on p. 209 again some worry that in it the legalistic ways are presented more than the pure Gospel, in that the soul is always directed to anxious humiliation, purification, separation, and the like, and thereby little to faith in the Lord Christ. Which scruple, because it is very important and far-reaching, must justly be examined somewhat more closely and resolved. The doctrine of regeneration and faith in Christ is undoubtedly of great moment. For Christ, about to inform Nicodemus, who was anxiously inquiring about the way of salvation, said: Unless one is born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God, John 3:3. When the keeper of the prisoners in Acts 16:30 asked: What must I do to be saved? Paul and Silas responded: Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved, you and your household. The doctrine of the justification of the sinner by faith in Christ is also of the gravest weight. For the μακαρισμός, or beatification, is of the man to whom God imputes righteousness without works, Rom. 4:6. The article concerning the righteousness of faith is the chief one in all Christian doctrine, without which troubled consciences can have no true and firm consolation, nor can they rightly acknowledge the riches of the grace of Christ, as the Formula of Concord opines, p. 683.

Prob. b. The end of the mystical union is the mountain of perfection, which the mystics strive to ascend in this life, and deification, or transformation into God. Cf. D. MOLINOS in manuduct libr. III. c. IV. p. 286; ARNOLD. in theol. myst. c. VII. p. 163. But in truth, no mortal attains this end in this life. Which we prove:

1. Because not only the knowledge of God and of divine things of men in this life, but also the sanctity of their spiritual life is imperfect. Concerning the θεογνωσία (knowledge of God) of those in this life, Paul says, 1 Cor. 13:9: ἐκ μέρους γινώσκομεν, we know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect has come, then that which is in part will be done away. Concerning the imperfect sanctity of those in this life, St. James testifies, ep. c. 3:2: In many things we all stumble, and St. John, 1 ep. 1:8: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But those who have sin and often stumble, they are not perfectly holy.

2. To aspire to deification is irreligious for a true Christian. For the affected ἀποθέωσις (deification) cast the first-created men out of paradise. When the king of Babylon said: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the most High, he was cast down into hell by the most just judgment of God, Isa. 14:14-15. The LORD speaks to the prophet Ezekiel: Son of man, say to the prince of Tyre: Thus says the LORD GOD: Because your heart has been lifted up, so that you say: I am a God, I dwell in the habitation of God, in the heart of the sea; when you are a man and not God. Therefore thus says the LORD GOD: because you have set your heart as the heart of God; therefore behold! I am bringing strangers upon you, the violent of the nations: who will draw their swords against the beauty of your wisdom, and they will defile your splendor, Ezech. 28:2, 6-7. When the priests and Levites of Jerusalem asked John the Baptist: Are you the Christ? he responded: I am not the Christ, John 1:20. If the same had persisted in asking: Are you God? John would have undoubtedly responded: I am not God, but I am a sinful man, I am dust and ashes before the divine face. From which it is abundantly clear that the mystical authors have gravely erred in determining the end of theology.

With all these things weighed on the scales of truth, I judge that the ways of mystical theology should be orthodoxly arranged in a fuller and more accurate series, so that THE FIRST WAY IS ILLUMINATIVE, by which a sinful man, called to the church of Christ—for I presuppose the call to the church—arrives both at the acknowledgment of sin from the law, and at the acknowledgment of Christ the satisfier from the gospel; THE SECOND CONVERSIVE, by which a sinful man is led to contrition, or detestation of sins, seriously joined with sorrow; THE THIRD REGENERATIVE, by which he is advanced to faith in Christ; THE FOURTH JUSTIFICATIVE, by which he attains to the remission of sins and the imputed righteousness of Christ; THE FIFTH UNITIVE, by which he becomes a temple consecrated to the triune God, in which He dwells and operates with gracious influx; THE SIXTH GLORIFICATIVE, by which he is introduced into the celestial paradise, in which is the true mountain of perfection. And I prove this order and series of mystical ways from Acts 26:17, where Christ addresses Paul: I am sending you to the Gentiles, to open their eyes (behold illumination)! that they may turn from darkness to light (behold conversion)! and from the power of Satan to God (behold regeneration)! that they may receive the remission of sins (behold justification)! and a place among those who are sanctified by faith in me (behold union with Christ through faith, sanctification, and glorification)!

Resolution

The dissenters object that the three ways of the mystics are not destitute of a certain foundation of order.

I. The author of salvation himself approves them, John 14:21: He who has my commandments and does them, he it is who loves me; and he who loves me will be loved by my Father; and I will love him and manifest myself to him, in verse 23 he adds: We will come to him and make our home with him. Resp. Verse 20 must also be repeated, so that the συνάφεια (connection) of the text may be clearer, where Christ says: In that day you will know that I am in my Father, and you in me, in verse 21 he says: He who has my commandments and does them, he it is who loves me. From which cohesion of the text it appears that the first illumination, whose effect is knowledge, precedes sanctification, whose effect is the love of Christ. But when the Savior adds, I will manifest myself to him, it is understood as a continued illumination, whose effect is a fuller and richer knowledge of Christ and of the divine mysteries. The Lord Jesus, in the cited place, did not make mention of conversion, regeneration, and justification, because he had not intended, at that time, to enumerate each and every act of applying grace.

II. The Holy Spirit, through Paul, addressing the sinner, confirms the three ways of the mystics: Eph. 5:14: Awake, you who sleep, and arise from the dead, that Christ may shine upon you. Here, awakening from the slumber of security and resurrection from the dead is placed before illumination. Resp. The mystical writers cannot establish their three ways from the adduced words of Paul; for Paul 1) made no mention of the unitive way; 2) the Holy Spirit shakes off the slumber of security through converting grace, so that contrition and detestation of sin may be excited in the will; through regenerating grace man is raised from spiritual death, so that he may receive the life of faith; through justifying grace Christ ἐπιφάνσει, illuminates the man with the light of righteousness. The Apostle has therefore recounted the conversive, regenerative, and justificative way. (*) But if (*) I indeed think that by these words of Paul is signified not the light of truth and doctrine, but the light of happiness and grace, to be imparted by God to the renewed man in the whole course of life, just as Job XXXIII, 30, Isa. LVIII, 8.; nor do I doubt that the one should prefer to draw the last words to renewing grace, then it is understood as a continued illumination, from which a richer χριστογνωσία (knowledge of Christ) proceeds. | But the first and initial illumination of the intellect precedes the purgation of the will. (**)

Legate of Christ had regard to that part of divine benediction, Num. VI, 25: For this expression, ἐπιφαύσει σοι (epiphausei soi / will shine upon you), manifestly corresponds to that Hebrew יאֵר פָּנָיו אֵלֶיךָ (ya'er panayv 'eleykha / may He make His face to shine upon you) as also Ps.IV,7: נִסְהַרְעֵלֵינוּ אֹר פָּנֶיךָ (nesah-'aleynu 'or paneykha / lift up upon us the light of Your face) and the particle ἐπὶ (epi / upon) is an indication that not internal perception of light in the mind, but external splendor over man should be understood. Illumination of the understanding is designated by another word, φωτισμός (photismos / illumination), φωτίζω (photizo / I illuminate).

(**) What has been disputed thus far pertains to the ways which the Pseudo-mystics both interpret wrongly and place in perverse order. But as it concerns the end which they set for themselves, namely ἀποθειώσιν (apotheiosin / deification), by which it happens that man, as if absorbed and reduced to nothing, is entirely converted into the divine nature, let us examine that opposition on which they chiefly rely. That saying is 2 Pet. I, 4. by which they defend themselves. But so far is it from the meaning of these words being, or seeming to be, even the least protection for them, much less the greatest, that it provides us with a most powerful argument against them. Peter does not proclaim that transformation of human nature which they indeed fabricate, but communion of divine nature, which makes man a participant of it. But one cannot become a participant of another unless it is something that is different from it. There are altogether three modes of communion, and no more, concerning which the name κοινωνία (koinonia / communion) is employed in the sacred letters. We are participants of some thing 1) by conjunction (Hebr. II, 14. VI, 4. add. Rom, VIII, 11. I Cor. VI,19.); 2) by fruit, and its perception (1 Cor.X, 17.Hebr. III, 1.); 3) by imitation (Matth. XXIII, 30. compared with the following v. 32. 34.). Therefore the man born again becomes a participant of divine nature in all these three ways: 1) by conjunction with God through saving confidence placed in Christ Hebr. III, 12. & 14.; 2) by perception and fruit of divine grace, Phil. I, 7. 3) by imitation of divine virtues, for thus John interprets the matter expressly, 1 ep. I, 7. And this also is not to be passed over in silence, that there is open contradiction of things, and fanatical men contradict themselves alone, when they speak of union, by which they understand change of nature, and that conversion by which man ceases to be man, and passes entirely into God. Every union is a conjunction of one with another, and no union and conjunction can exist, except of two, or more. Therefore what is united is twofold, if not manifold. Therefore it is twofold and distinct. For it is necessary that two things be present; one, which is conjoined; another, with which that is conjoined. Therefore every union takes place between two, or more, either things or persons, distinct among themselves; just as the soul is indeed joined with the body by the closest bond, but nevertheless different from it, and never, as long as it exists, or can that conjunction exist, is it to be converted into the nature of the body. I will say more: the human nature of Christ, by the bond of personal union, than which none can be closer, is perpetually conjoined with the divine nature of the same, but not indeed converted into it, so that it ceased to be human.

GRACE OF CALLING, OR THE VOCATION TO THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST.

Question I. What is the vocation to the kingdom of Christ?

HE VOCATION TO the kingdom of Christ is an act of grace, by which the Holy Spirit manifests the will of God concerning the salvation of sinners to men constituted outside the church through the divine word, and offers to them the benefits from Christ the redeemer, so that they may be brought to the church, be converted, and attain eternal salvation.

Obs. I. It is called a salutary vocation to the kingdom and glory, 1 Thess. II, 12. A translation into the kingdom of the Son of God, Col. 1, 13.

Obs. II. We have described the special, direct, and salutary vocation to the kingdom of Christ, from which salutary conversion takes its beginning. To this is contrasted the general, indirect, and pedagogical vocation to the church, which is a preamble to the salutary vocation.

Question II. What is the general and pedagogical vocation to the church?

General. The general pedagogical vocation to the church is that by which God invites sinners constituted outside the church, more obscurely and as if from afar, to inquire into the true worship of God and the assembly in which it thrives, and brings them to the door of the church.

That general vocation occurs: a) objectively, through the proposition of the divine governance and beneficence in creatures; b) effectively, through an efficacious divine influx and impulse, by which practical conclusions are aroused in the minds of infidels, though in unequal measure, both from innate theoretical and practical notices and from the documents of divine beneficence, to inquire about the true worship of God; c) cumulatively, through the fame of the church, diffused throughout the whole world.

Proof a. From Acts XVII, 25, 26, 27. "God gives to all life, and breath, and all things; and has made of one blood every kind of men to dwell upon the whole face of the earth, defining the preordained times and the setting of the limits of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him." God has proposed his providence concerning the human race to be contemplated in his works, so that in them men may clearly perceive the footprints of the best and greatest God; by which, observing them diligently and desiring to acquire more than innate knowledge comprises, they might studiously seek who that great God is, namely Jehovah, and indeed in those very works feel after him by natural light and know him confusedly, yet not stopping there, but find him fully in the supernatural revelation, which God has not denied.

Proof b. From Romans II, 4. "Or despisest thou the riches of his (God's) goodness and forbearance and longsuffering? Not knowing that the goodness of God invites thee to repentance." Obs. 1) The Apostle addresses all men, both Gentiles and Jews, inasmuch as they judge others for their own fault, for which they are liable in the judgment of God, and he teaches that they are convicted by their own conscience. 2) By the riches of divine goodness is denoted the most abundant beneficence of God in the kingdom of nature, in which indeed God has not left himself ἀμάρτυρον, i.e., without witness, by doing good, giving us rains from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness, Acts XIV, 17. By this beneficence the Gentiles were stimulated to repentance. Therefore the Apostle says: "The goodness of God (αγε) invites thee to repentance." Ἄγειν in Greek signifies not only to propose the will of God, and thus verbally to invite to himself, but to really move, and to effect and do something in man. God, therefore, through nature so copiously, so amply and intensely dispenses his goodness, that he draws and entices and moves man to himself in every way. And indeed to repentance for evil deeds, not only insofar as this is a detestation of a shameful thing, but also insofar as after a sin committed against God it tends toward this, that he might desist from his anger and be reconciled to man. For this is to feel the divine goodness, patience, and also longsuffering, so that when man desists from sins and repents, the good and patient God may be so towards him. And although this repentance of man and aversion from sins cannot obtain the benefit of divine grace outside the word of the gospel, yet by divine intention it ἄγει, leads and invites to it, through the arousal of practical conclusions, such as are:

I. Because God, the most omnipotent, most wise, best, and most just ruler of the universe, is to be worshipfully, reverently, and fearfully venerated.

II. God is to be worshiped not in any manner, but in the one he himself has prescribed; because every minister, as experience testifies, must worship the Lord not according to his own ingenuity, but according to the will of the Lord.

III. It is therefore necessary that there be somewhere in the world a supernatural light, by which the most good God has declared his will; it is necessary that there be somewhere an assembly, to which God has prescribed the legitimate mode of worship, which must be most diligently sought. (*)

Proof c. The general vocation of sinners to the church was also made through its celebrity. What nation has not heard of the circumcision of the Israelites, the sacrifices kindled by heavenly fire, the divine miracles performed in the Israelite church, the prophecies confirmed by infallible event, the celebrity of Jerusalem, the academy of the world, the splendor of Solomon's temple? The Israelites migrated to Egypt, to spread the fragrance of the divine word through Africa; they were deported to Chaldea, to spread it through Asia; not a few of them lived in Rome, to spread it through Europe. The Greek version of the Hebrew bible under the Egyptian king Ptolemy Philadelphus, as well as the multitude of proselytes of justice and of the gate, also brought no small momentum to seeking the God of Israel.

The celebrity of the New Testament church became known everywhere on earth. Concerning the church of Christ, gathered at Rome, the Apostle of the Gentiles testifies, Rom. I, 8. "Your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world." Rome, while Paul was alive, was the head of many nations, to which not only subjects, but also foreign peoples flocked in droves. Therefore, what was done in political and sacred matters at Rome could not be hidden, but was divulged everywhere. Concerning the church of the Thessalonians Paul says, 1 Thess. I, 8. "From you sounded out the word of the Lord not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place your faith to God-ward is spread abroad." Thessalonica was a famous market, to which merchants from distant places went and returned, who testified of the faith of the Thessalonian church to remote peoples. Today, the fame of the Christian church has pervaded the entire circuit of the lands, through so many journeys, so many navigations undertaken to the most remote regions and islands.

(*) Between the second and third proposition, these two intervene: 1) I perceive in my nature many and great defects, a mind alienated from God, a perpetual repugnance against God, and in what way God is to be reconciled to me, and finally who might make me more certain about the true reason of worship which is pleasing and acceptable to him, I nowhere find. I also see that this is the same common condition of mortals, innate in all. Therefore, the light of nature is obscured by such great corruption and defect of the soul, and is sufficient neither for me nor for anyone. 2) Nor indeed is there any doubt that God, with his immense kindness and a will most inclined toward all men, has exhibited a certain and sufficient means for all. Therefore, what was the third proposition will be placed in the fifth place.

Question III. How many types of special vocation to the church are there?

Special. The special vocation to the church is either ordinary or extraordinary. The former occurs through the preaching of the divine word, by the work of ministers a). The latter is that which occurs either immediately from God, or through miracles, or through a man not functioning in the ordinary office of teaching b).

Proof a. The ordinary and solemn vocation occurs through the preaching of the gospel, by the work of the ministers of the church, functioning in the public office of teaching, through whom men believe, 1 Cor. III, 5.

Proof b. The extraordinary vocation is either immediate or mediate. Immediate is that by which God himself calls a sinner to the church without the intervention of means. Of this kind was the calling of Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, to whom God himself said, Gen. XII, 1. "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, unto a land that I will shew thee." Mediate occurs either through miracles (thus the magi were called to Christ by a miraculous star, Matth. 11, 1.); or through men sent extraordinarily (thus the Ninevites were called through Jonah); Or through persons not appointed to the public office of teaching. Thus Naaman the Syrian was called to the Judaic church by an Israelite maiden, 2 Reg. V, 7. It not rarely happens that the sacred codex is proposed to a gentile man to be read by a Christian layman, and he is converted; whose vocation is indeed less solemn, yet not inefficacious.

Obs. The solemn vocation occurs through the preached word; The less solemn through the read word, or the word that can be read.

Question IV. How many types of ordinary vocation to the church are there?

Division of ordinary vocation. The ordinary vocation is either simple, or conjoined. The former is the manifestation of the divine will and the offering of benefits, earned by the merit of Christ, which is scorned and rejected by contumacious sinners a). The latter is the invitation to the communion of Christ conjoined with the obedience of those invited b).

Proof a. God often spreads out his hands to a rebellious people, Is. LXV, 2. He invites many to the wedding feast of his son, who refuse to come, Matth. XXII, 3.

Proof b. The conjoined vocation is called by St. Paul a vocation κατὰ πρόθεσιν, according to the divine purpose, Rom. VIII, 28, to which purpose men most humbly submit and conform themselves.

Question V. Who has called us to the kingdom of Christ?

Efficient cause of vocation. The whole Holy Trinity has called us to the kingdom of Christ a), and particularly the Holy Spirit, to whom this act of grace is appropriated b).

Proof a. The vocation to the church is a divine action ad extra, common to all three persons of the deity. God the Father is said to have called us, 1 Cor. 1, 9: "God is faithful, by whom you were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord." The word "God" is taken by the Apostle ὑποστατικῶς, and denotes the first person of the divinity, or God the Father; for he is explicitly distinguished from the Son of God. God the Father therefore called us to the fellowship of his Son, who is the head of the church, which is his body, and the fulness of him who fills all in all. Eph. 1, 23. Therefore, he who is not a member of the church does not have fellowship with Christ.

Christ himself, when he was visibly present in these lands, called men into his kingdom. "Jesus began to preach and to say: Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," Matth. IV, 17. Christ taught that the kingdom of the Messiah, often promised by the prophets, had now drawn near, not because it was not in the Old Testament, but because in the time of the New Testament it had peculiarly drawn near; 1) By reason of the king Messiah being exhibited in the flesh; 2) By reason of the acquisition of benefits, in which the kingdom of God consists, Rom. XIV, 17. For they were to be acquired at that very moment by the death of Christ; 3) By reason of the clearer, more frequent, and more widespread announcement of the kingdom of God; 4) By reason of the translation into the kingdom of God through the word of the gospel and the sacraments of the N. T. But when Christ was about to be taken up into heaven, he commanded the gospel to be preached to every creature, Mark XVI, 15.

Proof b. The vocation to the church is appropriated to the Holy Spirit. For the ministry of the word, through which we are called, is called the ministry of the spirit, 2

Cor. III, 6. The Holy Spirit speaks through the ministers of God, Matth. X, 20. The Holy Spirit calls and ordains bishops to preach the divine word, Acts XX, 28.

Question VI. What moved God to call sinful men to the kingdom of grace?

Impulsive causes of vocation. The internal impulsive cause of the gracious vocation is Φιλανθρωπία, or the mercy of God towards the human race, fallen into sin a). The external impulsive cause is Christ the Mediator, who by his active and passive obedience satisfied the offended divine justice, so that, this being saved, God intended our salvation and called us to the kingdom of grace b). Human misery, however, did not causally impel God to the gracious vocation, but it offered him an occasion for compassion c).

Proof a. God has called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, 2 Tim. 1, 9.

Obs. a) that our works did not impel God to our calling, for they are nothing before calling, regeneration, and faith. Rom. XIV, 23. Wherefore our calling is plainly gratuitous. b) That πρόθεσις, or the purpose of God, is the divine decree concerning the salvation of men who would believe in Christ. c) That we are said to be called according to the purpose and grace, given to us in Christ, because the temporal calling and the bringing to salvation corresponds to the eternal purpose of God and the eternal predestination to salvation; but this was done according to the most merciful good pleasure of the divine will, Eph. I, 5. Therefore, so was that. d) That grace was given to us in Christ; because it is based on his merit, and indeed was given by reason of the decree before the ages of the world, i.e., from eternity, since before the series of times there was nothing but mere eternity.

Proof b. Unless Christ the mediator had satisfied God, the most just judge and avenger of sinners, by his active and passive obedience rendered in our place, we would have been destined for the kingdom of darkness without any compassion, just like the apostate angels; because the infinite justice of God, offended by sins, inflicts eternal punishments. But that God, after the fall, his justice being saved, wishes us well, desires our salvation to be promoted, and thus calls us to the kingdom of grace; all this is owed to the satisfaction and merit of Christ. Paul teaches this, 2 Cor. V, 19, 20. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God!" God, reconciled by the satisfaction of Christ, has put the word of reconciliation in the mouths of the sacred preachers, i.e., the gospel, so that, as ambassadors of Christ, they might offer the reconciliation acquired by this mediator with God to sinners, and entice them by this offered reconciliation to the kingdom of grace.

Proof c. Our misery, properly speaking, is not an external cause impelling God to our calling, but it only presented an occasion to God, and set before him the fallen human race, as a miserable object, toward which he should not, but could, exercise his φιλανθρωπία. For in sinful man there is plainly no impelling cause. This God himself impresses upon us, Ezech. XVI, 5, 6. "Thou wast cast out in the open field, to the loathing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born. And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood (plainly unclean and impious, so that there was no just cause to excite any effort to help you, but rather that blood and impurity, voluntarily and maliciously contracted against my severe prohibition, as it were, cried out for vindictive justice to punish you: Yet moved by mere Φιλανθρωπία, when you were in your blood, and rather to be punished, I said unto thee (out of mere grace): live." Conf. D. HULSEM. in brev. enucl. cap. VII. §. 4. p. 351.

Question VII. By what means does God call us to the church?

Medium of vocation. God calls miserable sinners to the church directly and salutarily by the word of the gospel a), to which baptism also pertains b). However, the divine law contributes something to the vocation of sinners, but only indirectly, privatively, and by accident c).

Proof a. That the salutary act of vocation proceeds from the gospel, Paul teaches, 2 Thess. II, 14. "God hath called you by our gospel to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." From which the gospel is called the gospel of the kingdom of God, Mark I, 14. Because through it we are introduced into the kingdom of God; it is also called the word of reconciliation, 2 Cor. V, 19; for by it the grace of God, reconciled through Christ, is offered to us. The gospel is a most sweet word, by which we are invited to the spiritual nuptials, Matth. XXII, 4.

Proof b. Through baptism we enter the kingdom of God, John III, 5. Therefore, through baptism we are called to the church. But since the efficacy of the baptismal water is to be attributed to the divine word, which is in and with the water; since indeed baptism is the washing in the word, Eph. V, 26; therefore we assert, that the salutary vocation to the church is made through the evangelical doctrine of the grace of God, inclined toward all sinful men, and founded on the merit of Christ, whether it be proposed nakedly and simply, or accompanied and, as it were, clothed with the washing of baptism.

Proof c. "The law is our schoolmaster to Christ," Gal. III, 24. But the law, like a schoolmaster, leads to Christ not directly, because it is ignorant of Christ, and since in this weakness of our nature after the fall it cannot be fulfilled, it works wrath, Rom. IV, 15. but indirectly and occasionally, just as a disease leads to a physician. For the law bestows the spirit of bondage to servile fear, Rom. VIII, 15. to this end, that we may cease to do evil, just as servants from fear of whips. It terrifies and curses all who do not keep all its commandments, Gal. III, 10. But by this very thing it removes impediments, and thus paves the way for accepting the gospel. For while the law convicts the conscience of not having kept the law; by this very thing it provides the occasion for seeking and finding another who has fulfilled the law most perfectly, namely Christ, who is the end of the law, Rom. X, 4. Luther aptly says, tom. III. Ien. fol. 29. "The law prepares for grace, while it reveals and increases sin, humbling the proud to desire the help of Christ." And the Apology of the A. C. says, p. 170. "Therefore God terrifies by the law, so that there may be a place for consolation and quickening; because secure hearts, not feeling the wrath of God, disdain consolation."

Question VIII. Through which ministers does God call us to the church?

Ministerial cause of vocation. God ordinarily calls sinful men to the kingdom of Christ through preachers of the divine word, duly appointed to the public office of teaching a). But outside the ordinary way, that vocation is sometimes accomplished through others b).

Proof a. Sacred preachers are ambassadors of Christ, through whom reconciliation with God is offered to sinners, 2 Cor. V, 20. By their ministry men are led to embrace the faith, 1 Cor. 3, 5. They are those servants through whom guests are invited to the spiritual wedding feast of the Son of God, Matth. XXII, 3.

Proof b. Naaman the Syrian was called to the Judaic church by an Israelite maiden, 2 Reg. V, 7.

Question IX. What is the starting point and endpoint of the vocation?

Starting point and endpoint of vocation. The starting point is the state of sin and deepest misery, in which men live constituted outside the kingdom of Christ a). The endpoint is the church b).

Proof a. Men who live outside the church are without hope and without God, Eph. II, 12. They serve those who by nature are not gods, Gal. IV, 8. They are under the power of darkness, Col. 1, 13. And they sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, Luke 1, 79.

Proof b. The endpoint of vocation is the church, the house of the living God, the kingdom of Christ and the workshop of the Holy Spirit, in which the faithful have spiritual communion with Christ the head and the other members. Sacred Scripture indicates this endpoint of salutary vocation in many places. "God has called you" (says Paul) "into his kingdom (of grace) and glory," 1 Thess. II, 12. "God has delivered us from the power of darkness and has translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son," Col. I, 13. "You are called to be in one body" (the church), Col. III, 15. "You are called into the fellowship of the Son of God, Jesus Christ our Lord," 1 Cor. I, 9. In this church we are taught, and by repeated proclamation of the word we are instructed for salvation, 2 Tim. III, 15. Gal. I, 6, 9.

Question X. In what does the gracious vocation to the church formally consist?

The formal aspect of vocation. The gracious and salutary vocation formally consists in the manifestation of the universal benevolence of God, and the offering of the benefits, earned for us by the merit of Christ, through the preaching of the gospel.

Proof. St. Paul, in 1 Tim. II, 4, 5, 6, connects the benevolence of God the Father, the universal redemption of Jesus Christ, and the preaching of the gospel, so that all men, brought to the church, may enjoy the grace of God and the merit of Christ. The Apostle's words are: "God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; Who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." The testimony of due time is the preaching of the gospel, which is indeed the testimony of the Holy Spirit concerning Christ the mediator resounding in the church through the ministry of the word, John XV, 26, 27. It is called the testimony of due time because the Apostles and their successors had to testify in their times that Christ had already given himself for us as a ransom, whereas in the Old Testament the Prophets testified that he was going to give himself. For which reason, by the intention of God, all men are to be convoked by the preaching of the gospel to the one kingdom of grace, so that the benevolence of God the Father, concerning the salvation of all men through Christ the catholic mediator, may become known to them.

Question XI. Does God will that the vocation to the kingdom of grace reach all men?

Just as God intends the salvation of all men, so also he wills that all be called to the church a). But that many peoples are destitute of the salutary vocation, this happens by their own fault, not by a destined will or counsel of God absolutely denying them the preaching of the word b).

Obs. When we assert the universal vocation to the kingdom of God, we do not mean this, that the doctrine of the gospel has been announced in act, in person, and immediately to all and singular men, through preachers specially sent; but that the most merciful God has promulgated the evangelical doctrine concerning obtaining salvation through faith in Christ so clearly that all men whatsoever can come to the knowledge of it, so that God has denied to no nation, no man, the supply of that doctrine, and the way by which one might attain to the knowledge of it, by an absolute decree.

Proof a. Our assertion 1) from the declaration of universal divine benevolence, about which Paul says, 1 Tim. II, 4. "God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth," and Peter, 2 ep. III, 9. "The Lord is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance," cf. Ezech. XXXIII, 11. From which we infer: Whoever is kindled with the desire of saving, illuminating, and converting all men, he denies the preaching of the gospel to no man by a destined will; But the most merciful God, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because he who wills the end, wills also the means necessary to obtain the end. But the preaching of the gospel is necessary for illumination, etc.

2. The universal, solemn, and actual vocation occurred on three distinct occasions: a) The first vocation was made in Adam, and through Adam, after the fall, who doubtless inculcated the gospel of the seed of the woman that would crush the serpent's head, or the gospel of Christ, which he had received from God, no less to Cain than to Seth. But just as Seth propagated the knowledge of this gospel to his posterity, down to Noah, so Cain could have transmitted the same to his descendants. But that Cain did not transmit it to his posterity was the fault of his and his posterity's impiety, and their contempt for the divine word.

b) The second universal vocation was made after the flood in Noah, the second Adam, and through Noah, who was indeed a preacher of justice, 2 Petr. II, 5. and "became heir of the righteousness which is by faith," Hebr. XI, 7. Therefore Noah preached to his sons, and their posterity, righteousness through faith in Christ. As long as they remained united by the use of one language and one speech, they were imbued with the instruction of Noah, Shem, and others, until the time when they were dispersed by the divinely sent confusion of tongues, from whom after the dispersion into various parts of the world the vocation could be propagated to all their posterity.

c) The third universal vocation occurred in the time of the Apostles, who were sent by Christ to teach all nations, Matth. XXVIII, 19. to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; as Paul testifies, Col. I, 23. "The gospel was preached to every creature which is under heaven." From which we infer: Whoever lives under heaven, to them the gospel has been preached; All and singular men live under heaven; Therefore. And the Pauline testimony, which is found in

Rom. X, 18, should not be passed over in silence: "Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world." Cf. Ps. XIX, 5. From which we argue: As widely as the line of heaven extends, so widely did the sound of the gospel spread. But the line of heaven extends through the whole world; Therefore, the sound of the gospel spread through the whole world. Ambrose aptly says, on chap. X. Rom. "Everywhere the preaching of the name of Christ has been heard and has reached every place. For where the presence of a preaching man was lacking, nevertheless the sound and the fame arrived." Our Dannhauer also says wittily: "Where the foot of the apostles did not go, there at least the apostolic sound, or an apostolic epistle, penetrated."

3. Although outside the periods of time now enumerated, the universal, solemn, and equal preaching of the divine word did not always and everywhere befall all nations; yet God has utterly denied the universal vocation to no nation, and has barred the way to the church from no man. For God calls very many peoples a) through a less solemn vocation, which is done by the divine word read, or able to be read, which is transported to distant regions, either by Jews, the bearers of the divine law, or by Christians, the guardians and messengers of both the law and the gospel, dispersed throughout the whole world. b) Through the fame of the church diffused far and wide. For the church is called catholic, not as if an illustrious assembly of believers in Christ exists everywhere, but because with hands always open it invites all nations to itself, excluding no people, no man from its fellowship. c) Through the documents of divine beneficence, everywhere obvious in the kingdom of nature. For the divine benefits are pedagogical proclamations, and as it were certain signposts, inviting all men to the court of God, where at length the mysteries of the gospel are unfolded. d) Through the efficacious impulse of God, by which practical conclusions are aroused, and consciences are stimulated to inquire into the true worship of God and the assembly in which it thrives.

Proof b. That the gentiles of old, and today many peoples, are destitute of the preaching of the word, is their own fault, not by a destined will or counsel of God simply denying the light of the gospel. For 1) those peoples scorn and maliciously reject the divine word. This we learn from the words of Paul, Acts XIII, 46. "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles." And from the threat of the most just God, Amos VIII, 11. "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord." And from the parable of Christ, Matth. XXII, 2. Luke XIV, 16, about the man who, sending his ministers, invited guests to a supper, but with little success. Whence Christ concludes the parable thus, v. 24. "I say unto you, That none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper." 2) They neglected the vocation and the knowledge about the dogmas and ceremonies of the Christians in general, through fame, which today is universal. For if the fame spread abroad about the wisdom of Solomon attracted the queen of Arabia to know Solomon distinctly; why would not the fame spread about Christ and his kingdom attract one to know Christ? Cf. 1 Kings X, 1. & Matth. XII, 42. 3) They did not put to use the pedagogical vocation, offered through the proposition of divine governance and beneficence, and effective through the arousal of practical conclusions and the injected stimuli of conscience, namely to inquire into the true worship of God and the assembly in which it thrives. Wherefore, by their own fault, they deprived themselves of the salutary vocation, which is through the preaching of the gospel. Paul teaches this, Rom. I, 18, 19. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse; Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God."

The Antithesis is of Bellarmine, Cornelius Jansenius, Beza, and others, who state that the gospel has not yet been preached in the whole world, and therefore the vocation to the church is not universal. They rely on the following arguments:

I. "Many are called" to the church, Matth. XX, 16. Ch. XXII, 14. Therefore, not all. Resp. Between "many" and "all," there is no formal opposition; Because all are also many, e.g., God created all the stars, and they are very many. "By one man's disobedience many were made sinners," Rom. V, 19; who are certainly all. Compare Rom. V, 12. (*)<sup>211</sup>

II. In the times of the O. T. the vocation to the kingdom of God was not universal, as the psalmist testifies, Ps. CXLVII, 19. "He hath revealed his statutes unto Israel, he hath not dealt so with any nation." Resp. 1) We have shown above that in the times of Adam and Noah a universal and actual vocation took place. 2) The royal psalmist does not absolutely deny all vocation to the gentiles under the O. T. through the voice of conscience, nature, fame, reading; but he denies it to them comparatively, a solemn and actual vocation through the preaching of the divine word, which degree of comparison is indicated by the particle ך "so," as if to say: God did not so clearly and distinctly reveal his statutes to the gentiles in the time of the O. T. as to the Israelites. God invited the gentiles even in the time of the O. T. "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth," Isa. XLV, 22. Ps. XCVI, 3. Many gentiles, having cast off idolatry, professed their names to the true God, of whose number are Job the Idumean, Jethro the Midianite, Uriah the Hittite, Rahab the Canaanite, Ruth the Moabitess, the Queen of Sheba, Naaman the Syrian, the Ninevite Assyrians, Nebuchadnezzar, Darius, Cyrus, and others. In Jerusalem there were dwelling devout men, from every nation which is under heaven, Acts II, 5.

III. "God in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways," Acts XIV, 16. Therefore, God in times past did not call the gentiles to the church. Resp. The Apostles speak of the will of God not antecedent but consequent, because God in just judgment "gave over" the obstinately impious gentiles "to a reprobate mind," Rom. I, 28. who by their own fault deprived themselves of the salutary vocation. Yet God did not let the gentiles go without any light, without any testimony of divine beneficence; because God never left himself ἀναμάρτυτον, i.e., without witness, Acts XIV, 17.

IV. The times of the O.T. are called "the times of ignorance," Acts XVII, 30. Therefore, in the time of the O.T. the universal benevolence of God, and the benefits acquired by Christ, were not known. Resp. The times of the O.T. are called times of ignorance comparatively, and in a certain respect; because the gospel of Christ in the times of the O.T. was neither so clearly proposed, nor so widely diffused, as in the times of the N.T.

V. The gospel in former ages is said to be kept secret, i.e., not revealed, Rom. XVI, 25. Resp. The words of the apostolic text are: "God is of power to stablish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest by the scriptures of the prophets." The doctrine of Christ is a μυστήριον, because it is unknown to reason. This doctrine of Christ, as to its substance, is proposed in the old testament; for it is called a mystery revealed by the prophetic scriptures. But that Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Mary, is the promised Messiah, is a mystery kept secret in former times, in illustrating which mystery the entire new testament is occupied. The gospel is therefore said to be a mystery kept secret for a very long time: a) with respect to fulfillment; because what was promised in the O.T. was fulfilled in the N.T., Christ having been exhibited in the flesh; b) with respect to clearer revelation; because in the N.T. it was revealed that Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Mary, is the Christ, which is not established from the O.T.; c) with respect to broader promulgation; because the gospel in

(*) See the notes to Chap. III. quest. 10. page 746. Besides those, it will be helpful to ponder these points: 1) There are few places in which "many" are said to be called. Far more passages exist of this kind, which announce that salvation is prepared for all. This rule is valid; More numerous and difficult passages are not to be explained from fewer, but fewer are to be explained from more numerous and easier to understand. 2) In the opinion of the Reformed, no more are called by the serious and efficacious will of God than are elect. But in these places "many" are said to be called, "few" elect. Therefore, the call is broader than the election. 3) The few elect are expressly included in the number of the "many" who are called. Therefore, the same call which they accepted with a grateful mind, was also offered to the rest of the despisers, but was repudiated by these ungrateful ones. Therefore, the Reformed fail their own cause more than they support it, when they appeal to passages of this kind.

VI. "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Isa. LIII, 1. Where the Prophet denies that the arm of the Lord has been revealed to all. But if the arm of the Lord (i.e., the power of Christ in redeeming the human race) has not been revealed to all; the assertion of a universal vocation is in vain. Resp. The Prophet does not simply deny the universal revelation of the arm of the Lord; but looking to the times of the N.T. he teaches that few of the Jews would believe in Christ, and that the greatest part of them through ἀπιστία would reject the benefit of the Lord, as if it had not been revealed to them, so that the sense is: Which of you (with the exception of a few passively obedient ones) draws living faith from the preaching of the divine word, since most obstinately reject it, and remain blind, just as if the gospel of Christ had not been revealed to them. The Prophet therefore denies that the revelation achieves its intended or desired effect in all.

VII. That not all men were called to the kingdom of Christ in the times of the new testament, they go to prove from Matth. X, 5. "Go not into the way of the Gentiles." Resp. Distinguish between a vocation denied, and one postponed or delayed. The vocation of the gentiles was deferred for a time, because the divine word was first to be inculcated to the Jews, who, when they rejected the offered word, were deserted, and a transition was made to the gentiles, Acts XIII, 46. Meanwhile the gentiles were called objectively, through the documents of beneficence; effectively, through the stimuli of conscience; confusedly, through the fame of the Israelite church, until a distinct and proximately salutary vocation through the preaching of the gospel of Christ followed at the appointed time.

VIII. Paul and Timothy were forbidden by the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia and Bithynia, Acts XVI, 7. Therefore, the Holy Spirit did not will all to be called to the kingdom of Christ. Resp. Distinguish between different times, or between different hours and delays of God. Although at the same point in time, when the apostolic men wished to travel to Bithynia, they were prohibited by the Holy Spirit; because He by the light of omniscience foresaw that the word to be preached at that time would bring more utility in Macedonia; yet that the gospel was later preached in Asia and Bithynia can be gathered from 1 Peter I, 1. Apoc. I, 11.

IX. That not all have been called to the church, they strive to prove from 1 Cor. I, 26. "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called." Compare Rom. VIII, 30. where the called are said to be justified. But not all are justified. Therefore, not all are called. Resp. In both places is understood the vocation conjoined with the obedience and salutary effect of the hearers, which is called the vocation κατὰ πρόθεσιν, v. 28. But they are called according to the purpose who passively admit the efficacy of the vocation, and subject themselves to the same with most humble obedience. Since the wise according to the flesh, the noble, and the powerful do not do this, they do not obtain the salutary effect of the vocation.

X. Whatever vocation is free, is not universal; But the vocation of sinful men to the church is free: Therefore, it is not universal. The major is established; because a universal vocation is said to be that by which all men living at all times and in all places are called. But a free vocation is said to be that which by the most free disposition of God can be consummated and omitted, can be done now in this, now in another place, now at this, now at another point in time. The minor is proven; because the grace of the calling Holy Spirit is compared to the wind, which blows where it wills, John III, 8. Resp. 1) Universal vocation must be rightly understood. We do not state that God has always and everywhere called all men in act, in person, and immediately through sent preachers of the gospel, but that in three periods of time, namely, the time of Adam, of Noah, and of the Apostles, he has notified the doctrine of the gospel to all men so clearly and solemnly, that all men who are obligated to investigate the true religion could have attained to its salutary knowledge, and that God has denied the evangelical doctrine to no nation, no man, by an absolute decree. 2) Its freedom does not oppose the universality of the calling grace. For this calling grace is universal with respect to the divine intention, by which God offers faith to all men, Acts XVII, 31.; but it is free with respect to its execution. For the actual vocation is free as to the circumstances of mode, place, time, hour, delay, goal. Conf. D. DANNHAV. H. C. P. 1938. 3) John III, 8 does not deal with the vocation to the church, but with the incomprehensible manner of spiritual regeneration.

XI. The Apostles could not, within the short course of their life, in such ignorance of nautical matters, penetrate to the farthest provinces of the east, west, south, and north, and the distant islands, and preach the gospel everywhere. Resp. The Apostles had as co-workers many apostolic men, who filled the world with their living voice, their written letters, and the illustrious fame of the Christian religion. This is taught by histories and annals, the martyrdoms of all nations, the councils of bishops convened from Europe, Asia, and Africa. Therefore, when we say that the gospel was preached in the whole world, we teach and believe that in the time of the Apostles the gospel was so preached to all men, that individuals had either the voice of the Apostles, or proximate fame, and that after the times of the Apostles, those who before had only fame, then had the consummated preaching. Conf. D. JOANN. ADAM OSIANDER in colleg. System. loc. X. pag. 215.

XII. Experience has taught that many nations in China, Japan, and America had no knowledge of the preached gospel. Therefore, the gospel was not preached to them. Resp.

1) Those nations could have lost the treasure of the gospel they had received through their own negligence. 2) That vestiges of the Christian religion have been found among the Indians is mentioned by Osorius; among the Chinese, Gonzales de Mendoza reports; among the Americans, Johannes Lerus testifies. Vid. JOANN. ADAM OSIANDER l. c. p. 212.

XIII. Many myriads of gentile infants are snatched away by a swift death in the tenderest bloom of infancy, who have never been called to the church; Therefore, the vocation is particular. Resp. The infants of the gentiles were called in their ancestors, to whom the divine word was once preached and the sacraments were granted, so that they should sacredly guard these means and propagate them to their posterity. For just as they are rightly said to be created in the image of God in Adam; so also they were called to salvation in their parents. And just as all infants are justly punished with the privation of the image of God, because of the transgression of Adam; so also with the privation of the means, because of the ingratitude of their parents. (*). But they

(*) But the grace of Christ, the Sponsor and Liberator, intervenes, whose merits, since they pertain to all men, are certainly to be attributed also to those infants who neither enjoy the use of reason, nor neglect or despise the special vocation, and cannot even perceive any general or pedagogical vocation. For 1) not privation, but contempt damns; 2) Where ordinary means can in no way be applied, which must be affirmed not of adults outside the church, but of infants, there some extraordinary grace of God, on account of the power of Christ's merit, must be posited. 3) If the application of salvation did not befall them in any way, through some extraordinary grace, since they are completely lacking the ordinary means; it would have to be denied altogether that the acquisition of salvation also pertains to them, and that Christ suffered death for them. 4) All of our theologians agree on this; that the necessity of sacred washing for salvation is indeed supreme ordinarily, John III, 5.; but not simply and without any exception, but the case of contrary necessity must be excepted, and indeed extreme necessity, if it can in no way happen that one becomes a partaker of this most holy washing. An example is the dying thief on the cross, converted by hearing the word alone. But there are altogether three modes of this extreme necessity: 1) If water is lacking, Acts VIII, 36.; 2) If no minister is present, neither ordinary, nor one to be employed extraordinarily, for if a layman is present, with the other absent, and there is danger in delay, there is indeed a necessity (whence it is called an emergency baptism), but not yet an extreme necessity, so that a man cannot but lack so great a benefit; 3) If a man to be initiated into the sacred rites can neither seek nor desire it himself, due to a defect of the use of reason, nor is he admitted to it by others. But as pertains to the infants of profane nations, extreme necessity befalls them, and indeed its mode, both the second and the third. To the support, by which the contrary opinion of certain theologians is chiefly sustained, we oppose this: if either the ungrateful mind of the parents, or the foreseen contumacy of the children, were the cause of their damnation and the denial of saving grace to them; it would follow that either those infants alone, and only for the offenses of their parents, would be afflicted with so great a punishment, (for they have hereditary sin in common with those infants who are born of Christian parents), nor would they in any way are extinguished by an untimely death, before they can inquire into the true worship of God, because the omniscient one foresaw that if they had grown up, they would not have accepted the means of salvation, but would have contumaciously rejected them, just as their parents once did.

Instance: "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father," Ezech. XVIII, 20. Why then is the word, which the ancestors despised, denied to their posterity? Resp. The son shall not bear the sins of the father, if he has not consented to the sins of the father; if he makes himself a partaker of them, he also becomes a partaker of the punishment. But God foreknew the future contumacy of the gentile infants, if they had been longer among the living, equal to the fierceness of their parents.

Question XII. Is God's vocation through the word of the Gospel sufficient for salvation?

God's vocation, through the preached and read word of the gospel, is sufficient for salvation.

Obs. Our discourse is about the special vocation through the gospel; whether it be solemn, through the preached gospel, or less solemn, through the read, or readable, gospel. However, the general and pedagogical vocation, dispensed through conscience and providence in the kingdom of nature, is sufficient for inquiring into the true worship of God and for seeking out the church; but the confused vocation, spread through the fame of the church, is sufficient for acquiring a weak and languid knowledge of the dogmas and ceremonies of the church.

Proof 1) Because through the gospel the whole counsel of God concerning our salvation is manifested. Acts XX, 27.

2. Because those whom God has called, these (who passively admit the vocation) he has justified, and whom he has justified, these he has glorified. Rom. VIII, 30.

Therefore, the vocation is sufficient for salvation.

Question XIII. Is the universal vocation of all men serious and efficacious?

The universal vocation of all men by God to the kingdom of Christ is so serious that it is not only manifested by a sign and a precept, but also arises from the inmost good pleasure of God, and seriously intends the salutary illumination and conversion of all men a). The same is efficacious, because it wills all men to be brought to the kingdom of grace and glory through efficacious means b).

Proof a. The universal vocation of all men to the kingdom of Christ is serious: Because 1) it arises from the will of God, who desires the salvation of men, 1 Tim. II, 4. 2 Petr. III, 9. 2) Because it is founded on the merit of Christ, 2 Cor. V, 19. and is confirmed by a divine oath, Ezech. XXXIII, 11. 3) Just as a hen with serious affection gathers her chicks under her wings; So God sincerely wills to gather us in one church, Matth. XXIII, 37. 4) God has called us from darkness to his marvelous light, 1 Petr. II, 9. and commands all men everywhere to repent, Acts XVII, 30. Therefore, he intends the illumination and conversion of all whom he has called. 5) For which reason God also testifies in express words that the fault, why the impious, though called, are not converted, resides not in himself, but in them, Prov. I, 24. "I have called, and ye refused." Isa. LXV, 2. "I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people."

Proof b. The divine vocation is efficacious: 1) Because God seriously intends the bringing of all men to the kingdom of grace and glory through efficacious means. For men are called by God through the gospel, which is Spirit and life, John VI, 63, i.e., animated by the life-giving Spirit; From which it is commonly called the vehicle of the Holy Spirit. 2) Because the divine word has that efficacy of illuminating, converting, regenerating which the Spirit has independently and by essence, dependently and by participation. Whence it is called the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes, Rom. 1, 16. Infants are introduced into the kingdom of Christ through baptism, which is the washing of regeneration and renewing, Tit. III, 5.

be partakers of the merit of the common Sponsor of all; or all others also, whom God likewise foresaw would be obstinate, and emulators of their wicked ancestors, would have to be extinguished by a premature death for the same cause. The latter is false, and contrary to experience. The former seems harsh to me. Not simply concerning saving grace, viewed universally, but comparatively and in a certain way, namely concerning the ordinary way by which God confers his grace on men, are these words in our Apology of the Aug. Conf. p. 156 to be understood: "The promise of salvation pertains also to little children; But it does not pertain to those (little children) who are outside the church of Christ, where there is neither word, nor sacraments; because the kingdom of Christ exists only with the word and sacraments." Vid. IO. HULSEMANNI praelect. in E. C. p. 370. & B. CARPZOV. Isag. in Libros Symb. p. 156. seqq.

You say: 1. The internal vocation by the grace of the Holy Spirit, operating in the hearts of the elect, is indeed efficacious; But the external vocation, which is through the ministry of the word, is not always efficacious in the reprobate. Resp. If by external vocation is understood that by which God, with the preached word, as a sign of his will, commands to repent and believe, without an internal purpose of conferring sufficient powers to repent and conceive faith; the distinction of vocation into internal and external is not to be admitted or tolerated. For it is repugnant a) to the veracity of God. For if God by an external word were to call to the kingdom of grace a man who by his own fault is reprobate, without an internal purpose of drawing and leading him to that kingdom; he would signify one thing by the external word, and would have decreed another by his internal purpose, which is very far from the most veracious God. b) It is repugnant to the goodness of God. For if God were to command a man that which he did not will to be done by him, and, lest it be done, would deny efficacious grace, he would not be supremely good, but would be mocking the man; just as, in the judgment of all, a prince would mock him to whom he would command something under penalty of death, which he did not want to be done by him, and from whom, lest it could be done by him, he would subtract sufficiently strong means. If Christ had said to the paralytic; "Take up thy bed, and walk," Matth. IX, 6. yet had not willed to grant him the strength to rise, he would have mocked the paralytic. c) It is repugnant to the wisdom of God. It is not characteristic of a wise person to offer means to a man in need of help, which are vain and useless from a lack of his own aid. If God at the beginning of creation had said to the creatures; "Increase and multiply," yet had not instilled in them generative power, that command would have been void, and thus alien to divine wisdom.

You say: II. By the external vocation the reprobate are called; a) so that they may be admonished of their duty, b) lest they be inexcusable. Resp. to a). The most benign God does not demand a duty without a benefit and sufficient and strong means being offered. For how would he demand a duty from him to whom neither native nor given powers are available, and from whom God completely subtracts all grace, without which the duty cannot be performed? Ad b). By an external vocation, without an internal purpose of conferring sufficient powers, not every excuse is taken from the reprobate.

For they will be able to say; "Lord, we would have most willingly come into your kingdom, we would have believed, and we would have performed the duty of a Christian man, if only you had been willing to grant us miserable ones the powers which you could."

You say: III. Whoever are efficaciously called, they believe. But very many men do not believe. Therefore. The major is proven from Hebr. IV, 2. "The word preached did not profit, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." Resp. 1) Distinguish between a vocation efficacious with respect to the cause, and the effect. The vocation is efficacious on the part of God, as the cause, seriously destining efficacious means, by which faith as a salutary effect can be produced; but this effect is impeded by malicious resistance; just as medicine in the first act is efficacious; but in the second act it does not heal, if it is neglected, or rejected. 2) The cited words of the Apostle; ἐκ ὧφέλησεν ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀκοῆς ἐκεῖνες, μὴ συγκεκραμένους τῇ πίσει τοῖς ἀκέσασιν, should be rendered in Latin; "The word heard did not profit them, not being mixed by faith with them that heard." The things to be mixed are not the word of hearing and faith; since the word of hearing produces faith; for how will a cause be mixed with its own effect? But the word of hearing, and those who hear the word. These conceive faith from hearing, unless they maliciously resist the operation of the Holy Spirit. Confer. SEB. SCHMID, in comment. h. l. p. 418.

Question XIV. Is the vocation to the church equal?

The ordinary vocation is equal in substance, or insofar as it is considered essentially a); but it is unequal with respect to order, mode, degree, hour, and delay b).

Proof a. The ordinary vocation is equal: because 1) we are called by a grace equally salutary. "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men," says Paul, Tit. II, 11. Just as the same sun shines on all; so the same light of saving grace illuminates all men who do not maliciously close the eyes of their mind. 2) Because the same powers of believing are offered to all, which God also intends to confer on all, unless they are stubbornly and morosely rejected. Whence God is said to provide (παρ'χεν) faith to all, Acts XVII, 31. An ισότιμον πίστιν, a faith of equal value (den gleich theuren Glauben), is also received, 2 Peter I, 1. Faith is indeed, with respect to degree, one greater, another smaller: yet it is equal a) with respect to the cause; because it is kindled by the same Holy Spirit; b) With respect to the object; because the faith of all men embraces the same mercy of God, the same Jesus, the same promise; c) With respect to the end; because it looks to the same crown of righteousness, 2 Tim. IV, 8. 3) Because we are called by the same means, the same gospel, the same baptism, equally efficacious, if you consider the divine purpose.

Proof b. The inequality of the divine vocation, considered accidentally, is established; because 1) with respect to order, the word of the gospel was to be preached first to the Jews, then to the gentiles, Acts XIII, 46. 2) With respect to mode and degree, to some a greater light shone, to some a lesser. Some nations were called by the word solemnly preached; others by the written and read word supplied by Jews or Christians; others by the fame of the church spread abroad, and that either nearer and clearer, or more remote and more obscure. 3) With respect to delay and hour, some peoples were called sooner, some later. For some the light of the gospel shone for a longer stretch of time; among others it was obscured within a few years. Which accidental inequality, since it cannot be fully investigated in this mortality, let us acquiesce in the divine dispensation of the means of salvation, let us confess and admire, but not anxiously scrutinize the abyss of the divine judgments, impervious to human minds, Rom. XI, 33.

You say: I. If the vocation to the kingdom of grace were equal; two men, hearing the same divine word, would be converted equally. The consequent is false, as the example of Peter and Judas, among others, shows: Therefore, the antecedent is false.

Resp. 1) That two, hearing the same divine word, are not converted equally, is not to be imputed to the principal and organic cause, God and the gospel, but to the Subjects, or men, who are disposed differently, of whom some embrace the offered grace, some repudiate it. Some men use the pedagogical powers, some abuse them; In some the actual resistance is simple, in others it is affected and morose. Hence it happens that the gospel in two hearers does not obtain the same effect, just as seed, equally efficacious, dispersed in different ground, does not bear fruit equally. 2) As for the example of Peter and Judas: the same grace was offered to them; but it was accepted by Peter, repulsed by Judas. Peter sinned, led by the present danger to his life, Judas was instigated by mere malice, and from a completely free will. The former looked at Christ with a sad eye, desirous of medicinal grace, the latter with a wicked and hypocritical eye. The latter followed the seducing priests, whom the former fled. The latter forgot the word of Christ, the former remembered it.

You say: II. If the reason for the distinction between faith and infidelity can be found in the Subjects; it follows that the faithful can distinguish himself from the infidel; The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The falsity of the consequent is clear from 1 Cor. IV, 7. "Who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?" Resp. The cited passage does not pertain directly to the arising of faith and perseverance in infidelity, because the Apostle speaks of the diversity of charisms already possessed, which the Corinthians were abusing for pride and arrogance. But if it is referred analogically to the distinction between the faithful and the infidel, a distinction must be made between active and passive discretion. The faithful does not distinguish himself from the infidel actively, by disposing himself for faith through natural powers, but he is distinguished by God, because he passively admits the offered means.

You say: III. Whatever vocation is made by the same means, but operating unequally, is an unequal vocation; The vocation to the kingdom of God etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because an unequal operation makes an unequal vocation. The minor is proven; because the word of God is to some the savor of life unto life, to others the savor of death unto death, 2 Cor. II, 16. Resp. Per se and by the intention of God, the divine word is to all who are called the savor of life unto life, because it is Spirit and life, John VI, 63. Per accidens, and by the fault of men who disdain it, it becomes the savor of death unto death; just as Christ is to the pious a rock of salvation, to the impious a rock of scandal, 1 Petr. II, 7. Wine is of use to the healthy, a harm to those with a fever.

You say: IV. Whatever grace of vocation is sufficient for salvation for some, and insufficient for others, is an unequal grace of vocation to the kingdom of Christ etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from the words of Christ, Matth. XI, 21. "Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes." From which words it is established that the grace sufficient for the Tyrians was insufficient for the people of Chorazin. Resp. 1) The grace of vocation is called equal, not with respect to the effect, or the outcome; but with respect to the intention and the means. 2) The cited passage deals with an extraordinary vocation, of which the Tyrians and Sidonians were destitute, who nevertheless were called by the fame of the Israelite church, conspicuous with so many miracles, whose neighbors they were. 3) The obstinacy of the people of Chorazin was comparatively greater than that of the Tyrians. If the divine word, accompanied by the miracles of Christ, had been preached to the latter as it was to the people of Chorazin, it would have been a sufficiently strong means for them to repent.

Question XV. What is the end/purpose of the vocation to the church?

The end of vocation. The ultimate end of our vocation, on the part of God, is the glory of the divine name a), on the part of men the ultimate end is their own eternal salvation b). The intermediate ends, to be practically and salutarily acknowledged under the guidance of scripture, according to the diverse aspects of salutary conversion, are divided into antecedent, constituent, and consequent c).

Proof a. From 1 Petr. II, 9. "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." We have been called to the church, which is the assembly of chosen men, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people appointed for the acquisition of salvation, to this end, that we should proclaim the virtues (the power, wisdom, grace, and justice, which shine forth especially in the matter of vocation) of God, who has called us from the darkness of ignorance into the marvelous light of faith.

Proof b. The ultimate end, on our part, is eternal salvation. For we are called to the prize, Phil. III, 14. to the inheritance of blessing, 1 Petr. III, 9. to eternal glory, 1 Petr. V, 10. to eternal life, 1 Tim. VI, 12.

Proof c. We are called to repentance, Matth. IX, 13. from darkness to light, 1 Petr. II, 9. to the fellowship of the Son of God, 1 Cor. I, 9. to sanctification, 1 Thess. IV, 7. to peace, Col. III, 15. to charity, flowing from the one hope of our calling, Eph. IV, 4. to sufferings, of which Christ has left us an ὑπογραμμὸν, i.e., an example, or a delineated form, 1 Petr. II, 21.

Question XVI. What use does the meditation on our vocation confer to us?

The use. Consideration of the vocation to the church provides a) a paracletic use for us who have been brought to the kingdom of Christ, which is not only a kingdom of the cross, but also of light; b) a paraenetic use, for leading a life worthy of our vocation.

Proof a. In the kingdom of Christ, of the cross and of light, there is an alternation. The cross represses the ferocity of the flesh; The light of grace and solace restores the soul. We are therefore certain that the God of all grace, who has called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that we have suffered a while, will restore, establish, strengthen, settle us, 1 Petr. V, 10.

Proof b. "Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called!" Eph. IV, 1. "For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness," 1 Thess. IV, 7. Therefore, according to him who has called us, who is holy, let us also be holy in all our conversation, 1 Petr. I, 15.

SUSPIRIUM

To You, O IMMORTAL GOD! I render immortal thanks, that you have brought me, by nature a child of wrath, to the kingdom of grace and the workshop of your most HOLY SPIRIT. That I was born in the bosom of the church, is yours.

That I was sprinkled with the salutary water, and made a member of the mystical body of CHRIST, is yours. That the bowels of your mercy are open to me, and the benefits bought by the blood of the SAVIOR have been offered to me, is yours. Recalling all this with a grateful memory time and again, I humbly pray that you would keep and protect me in your kingdom against the assaults of the devil, the world, and my flesh, and supply me with spiritual strength, so that I may lead a life worthy of the gospel, worthy of my vocation, worthy of a Christian man!

CHAPTER V.
ON THE ILLUMINATING GRACE, OR
ILLUMINATION OF THE SINNER CALLED TO THE CHURCH.

Question I. What is illumination?

ILLUMINATION IS AN act of applicatory grace, by which the Holy Spirit teaches the sinful man, called to the church, through the ministry of the word, and with sincere study informs him more and more, so that, the darkness of ignorance and errors having been dispelled, He may imbue him with the knowledge of the word of God, and instill in him the acknowledgment of sin from the law, and the cognition of divine mercy, founded on the merit of Christ, from the gospel.

Obs. I. Illuminating grace is also called teaching grace; because the Holy Spirit, by illuminating, teaches all things necessary for salvation, John XIV, 26. Conf. DANNHAV. in hodos. phanom. IX. p. 938. & lect. catechet. part. VI. p. 195. Also anointing grace, from 1 John II, 20, 27. For the chrism is not only medicinal and paracletic, but also enlightening, the type of which was that chrism which was given of old to kings and priests and prophets, with instruction for the liturgy of their office, and a change into other men. Furthermore, illumination is called the opening of the eyes of the mind, Acts XXVI, 18. For just as a blind man through the opening of his eyes acquires the faculty of seeing; so the sinner, filled with the darkness of ignorance, receives through the illumination of the Holy Spirit the faculty of knowing the true God.

Obs. II. What is understood here is not objective illumination, by which the light of the divine word is externally proposed, but effective illumination, by which the Holy Spirit kindles the light of knowledge, and subjective illumination, by which the blind sinner allows himself to be illuminated by the operation of the Holy Spirit.

Obs. III. That preparing divine grace consists in illumination is asserted by D. FECHTIUS in his Dissertation de ordine modoque gratiae divinae, aphorism IX. p. 18. although that most celebrated theologian at the same time confesses that the word 'illumination' is a little broader than preparing grace. For the latter precedes conversion, whereas some illumination, namely a more abundant one, also follows conversion. In this way theologians are to be reconciled, when they refer illumination now to preparing grace, now to indwelling grace. The first and principal reason for illumination consists in preparing man for conversion. For this is why the natural darkness, ignorance of mysteries, and the errors opposed to them are expelled from the human intellect by grace, and it is imbued with the knowledge of God and sacred things, and as it were illustrated by a certain light, so that it may be rendered fit for receiving justifying grace. This illuminating grace therefore precedes the completion of conversion.

Question II. What is the principal efficient cause of illumination?

Principal efficient cause. The principal efficient cause of illumination is the triune God a), the Father b), the Son of God c), and terminally, or appropriatively, the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. 1) The triune God is light, 1 John I, 5. i.e., the fount of all light that is in us. From which he is also called the father of lights, James I, 17. 2) The illumination of the sinner surrounded by darkness is a divine action ad extra, and therefore undivided and common to all three persons of the divinity.

Proof b. God the Father, who said that light should shine out of darkness, has given light in our hearts, for the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of God, which is in the face of Christ, 2 Cor. IV, 6.

Proof c. The Son of God is the true light, which illuminates every man that comes into this world, John I, 9.

Proof d. The Holy Spirit illuminates us terminally, i.e., God the Father through his Son in the Holy Spirit illustrates our minds. For the God of our Lord Jesus Christ gives us the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him, Eph. I, 17. From which also the divine information in sacred matters is appropriated to the Holy Spirit. For he teaches us all things, and brings all things to our remembrance, whatsoever Christ has said, John XIV, 26. The Holy Spirit is the anointing which we receive from Christ, abiding in us, therefore we have no need that any man teach us; but as the same anointing teaches us of all things, and is truth, and is no lie; and even as it has taught us, we shall abide in him, 1 John II, 27.

Question III. Does the Holy Spirit illuminate us immediately today?

Medium of Illumination. The Holy Spirit does not illuminate us immediately, but through the medium of the divine word.

Proof 1) From 2 Petr. I, 19. "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts." Obs. 1) λόγος προφητικός is the word, handed down by the Prophets, and consigned to letters. 2) The prophetic word is called more sure than the voice of the Father, which came down from heaven, but only insofar as it was brought forth by the testimony of Peter. To wit, the prophetic word is more sure than the apostolic testimony about the voice of the heavenly Father, not in respect to itself, but in respect to the readers, or hearers; because the authority of the prophetic word was corroborated by a long time and the consent of the elders. But the authority of the apostolic testimony was more recent, and therefore was not received with such great veneration. 3) The prophetic word is called a shining light, on account of its supreme perspicuity and power to illuminate; But the heart of an unregenerate man is called τόπος ἀρχμηρὸς, i.e., a squalid and gloomy place, from the darkness of ignorance and the filth of sin. 4) The dawning day is the clearer light of salutary cognition; But Phosphorus is Christ, the object of salutary cognition, Apoc. XXII, 16. The sense is; Since the divine word is of unshaken truth, and of such virtue, that it can dispel the darkness of the heart; let us turn the eyes of our mind to this light, so that the salutary acknowledgment of Christ may arise in our minds.

Proof 2) From Ps. XIX, 7, 8. "The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes." Confer. Ps. CXIX, 105. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path."

Question IV. Does God today will to illuminate man immediately through ecstasy or ecstatic rapture, to confirm his faith, and to confer on him a foretaste of eternal life?

God has not promised in his word that he wills to illuminate any man through ecstasy, to confirm his faith, and to impart to him a foretaste of eternal life.

The Antithesis is 1) of the Platonists, whose opinion IAMBlichus explains in de myster. Aegypt. sect. 1. c. 12. "The divine irradiation, which is wont to happen during prayer, as it spontaneously flashes forth, so it spontaneously operates, and is far from all traction, as it manifests itself through divine efficiency and perfection, and anticipates the freest motion in us by as much as the divine volition of the good precedes our choice. Through this volition the Gods, benevolent and merciful without any parsimony, infuse their light into the priests, and call their souls to themselves, and procure a union between them, and even while still existing in the body, they accustom them to be separated from the body, and to be turned about to the eternal and intellectual principle, whence they originated. It is manifest, however, from the things themselves, that what we now say is the very salvation of the soul."

2. Of the Quakers, about whom the author of the dissertation de hodierno statu ecclesiae in Anglia, Scotia & Hybernia reports, cited by COLBERGIUS in Christianismo Platonico-Hermet. P. I. c. 7. §. 406. "The Quakers frequently fall into such ecstasies, that they tremble with their whole body, because, as they maintain, they are unable to bear or contain within themselves the magnitude of that divine light and splendor by which they are overwhelmed."

3. Of the Mystics, among whom CHRISTIAN HOBURGIUS and GOTTFRID ARNOLDUS are not the least. The former of whom writes in theol. myst. p. 122. "The soul often falls into ecstasy and rapture; which ecstasy is nothing other than when the soul feels such a power of desire, of taste, of sweetness, that it does not feel the senses." The latter, however, in theol. myst. c. VI. p. 126. says: "The mind of a perfect man, which ascends to the highest level, is united with God in a rapturous and self-transcending love, and in the accompanying movements of the mind, in wonderful peace and tranquility of mind, in the enjoyment of spiritual joys, and simple contemplation of the Godhead."

Exposition

Obs. 1. Ἐκτασις, in Latin excessus mentis, in German eine Entzückung, is a rare and extraordinary operation either of God, or of a corrupted fantasy, or of the devil, by which the mind of man is alienated from the senses of the body, so that, with their use ceasing, it is more ready and unencumbered for grasping the presented images of things. It differs from rapture; because ecstasy simply denotes the departure of the mind from the senses; but rapture adds violence.

Obs. II. Ecstasy is divided into supernatural and preternatural. The former, as AUGUSTINE defines it, is an alienation from the senses of the body, so that the spirit of man, assumed by the divine Spirit, may be free for grasping and infusing images. The latter arises either from a corrupted human fantasy, or from the devil. From a corrupted human fantasy arises melancholic and fantastic ecstasy, when through a vehement affect (love, sorrow, horror) or even deep speculation, the animal spirits are withdrawn from the external senses, and with their use ceasing, unusual phantasms are presented to the intellect of man. But diabolical ecstasy is when the cacodemon, having bound the senses of man, represents to his fantasy images of certain things, so that the intellect may apprehend and approve them. DELRIO has graphically described diabolical ecstasies in disquisit. magic. lib. II. qu. 25.

Obs. III. The mystics distinguish between ecstasy of the intellect and of the will. Ecstasy of the intellect is an extraordinary operation of God, by which the human intellect is elevated above its natural powers to contemplate divine mysteries, and indeed with a contemplation so sublime that it perceives in them a greater beauty than it could have persuaded itself of, which they also call an ecstasy of admiration. Ecstasy of the will is that by which the soul is so inflamed with an ardent love of God that, having forsaken earthly inclinations, it enters into a rapture of celestial fruition, and unites itself uniquely and powerfully to the divine goodness. Vid. FRANCISC. SALES, de amore Dei cap. III. & seqq.

Confirmation

We prove our thesis: 1) God in his eternal counsel ordained that the Holy Spirit should call, illuminate, and convert the elect through the word, and justify all those who embrace Christ with true faith, and confer eternal salvation upon them, as the Form of Concord testifies, P. 808. For the word of God shines in a dark place (the unregenerate heart), until the day of salutary cognition dawns, 2 Petr. I, 19. And faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, Rom. X, 17. For which reason, the full vigor of the eyes and ears is required, so that by attentively reading and hearing the word of God we may be illuminated and converted. But ecstasies neither see nor hear what happens to them. Therefore, they are neither illuminated nor converted through ecstasy.

2. The means for preserving and confirming faith in Christ and holiness of life are the word of God and the sacrament of the supper, Ps. CXIX, 11. Matth. VII, 24. Eph. VI, 17. John VI, 56. How, I ask, is a man deprived of the aid of his senses to rightly use these confirming means?

3. A foretaste of eternal life is taken from the milk of the gospel. This the Apostle Peter teaches not obscurely, 1 ep. c. II, 2. "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby; If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." By which words he indicates that God offers himself to be tasted as most sweet in the sweet milk of the gospel; but the gospel must be diligently read and heard, so that we may be affected by a spiritual taste of God. There is therefore no need for ecstasy, by which the senses of the body are bound.

4. Ecstasies are opportune for various illusions of a corrupted fantasy and of the devil. MOLINOSIUS does not deny this, who in lib. III. manuduct. spirit. c. 19 says: "This effective and practical conformity with the divine will in all things leads the soul to annihilation and transformation with God without a mixture of external raptures and ecstasies, or vehement affects; since this way is liable to many illusions, and is joined with the danger of sickness, or the straits of the intellect; by which path, those who reach the summit of perfection are rare." Indeed, it is extremely difficult to accurately discern preternatural, fantastical, and diabolical ecstasies from supernatural and divine ones. For PLINY in hist. nat. L. VII. c. 52. concerning Hermetimus, and AUGUSTINE in de Civ. D. L. XIV. concerning Restitutus, have recorded in writing that they could so abstract their minds from the senses of the body at their own will, that they lay on the ground very similar to the dead. A charming example of an ecstatic man is that which ERASMUS FRANCISCI commemorates in dem Gegenstrahl der Morgenrothe; Qu. XVII. p. 753. "Many of them can masterfully feign a rapture; like that priest in Rome, who, when the words of the Passion history: 'It is finished!' were spoken, was accustomed to fall immediately into a rapture; until one time Rondeletius, the famous physician, who had conceived a suspicion of fraud from it, called for a stout stick, assuring that he would soon make this raptured one twitch and move him from his posture. With which he disturbed the good fellow in his raptured devotion, indeed, he performed such a miracle that he, as it were, awakened him from the dead, and endowed him with swift feet."

On the contrary, the things which PRATEOLUS reports in elencho haeret. lit. E. n. 12. p. 160. concerning the Anabaptists are horrendous: "As if nearly fanatical, inspired by their own Spirit, they changed their countenance, had horrible gestures, and like those suffering from epilepsy, having fallen to the ground, they lay as if dead, whence also their bodies trembled horribly. Snatched into ecstasy, they uttered wonderful dreams, that they had seen Zwingli in the underworld, etc. that the Father had commanded this or that unspeakable thing; that the Father had said the day of the Lord was at hand; the certain time of which they designated. Whence like madmen they ran about, shouting: The day of the Lord, the day of the Lord." The things which OLAUS MAGNUS recounts about the Lapps are also prodigious, in descript. Regn. Septentr. L. III, c. 18. "If any foreigner wishes to know something certain about the condition of his people, they guarantee that within the space of 24 hours he will find out what is happening with them, even if they are three hundred miles away, in this manner: The enchanter, after having invoked his demons with the usual ceremonies, suddenly collapses, and becomes lifeless, as if, with him extinguished, the soul truly departs from the body. For neither does breath seem to remain in him, nor does any sense or movement remain with life; but it is necessary that some should always be present to guard the lifeless body, which if it is not done, the demons carry it away. After 24 hours have elapsed, the spirit returning, the lifeless body awakens as from a deep sleep, with a groan, as if he who had collapsed is recalled to life from death. Afterwards, thus restored, he responds to the questions, and to give faith to the inquirer, he recounts something which the other recognizes and knows for certain to have been in his own house, or that of his relatives." Since, therefore, ecstasy is liable to so many illusions, it will neither kindle faith in Christ, nor confirm it, nor provide a solid taste of eternal life.

Refutation

I. The adversaries appeal to the example of St. Paul, who is said to have fallen into an ecstasy, Acts XXII, 17. and to have been caught up into paradise, or the third heaven, 2 Cor. XII, 2.; where, illustrated by the ὑπερβολῇ ἀποκαλύψεων (abundance of revelations), he heard ῥήματα ἄρρητα, unspeakable words. Which example, although it is extraordinary, nevertheless shows that God can illuminate his beloved children in the same extraordinary way (immediately without the concurrence of scripture), and confirm them in the faith.

Resp. 1) The question is not about the power, but about the will of God. God wills to make us wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus by the intervention of the sacred letters; in which most benign will of God we acquiesce, 2 Tim. III, 14, 15. 2) The example of Paul is plainly singular and inimitable; because God was about to confirm Paul in his apostolic office through an ecstatic rapture, so that he could appeal intrepidly to this extraordinary revelation, as to a seal of his apostolic office. But just as not all Christians are Apostles; so not all need an ecstatic rapture. Add to this that the Apostle after so vehement an ecstasy felt such a temptation that, having prayed against it, he taught curious souls not to affect ecstasy, or a rapture into the third heaven. (*)

II. Not only Paul, but also other servants of God have had ἐκτάσεις (ecstasies), is clear from 2 Cor. V, 13. Εἴτε γὰρ ἐξέστημεν, θεῶ, εἴτε σωφρονέμεν, ὑμῖν, "For whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God; or whether we be of sober mind, it is for your cause." Resp. These words are less conveniently applied to ἐκτάσεις. For that the Apostle would have wanted to make mention of his ἐκτάσεις out of the blue, is hardly likely. That these things are said of madness κατὰ δόξαν (according to opinion) is certain, in the judgment of D. CALOVIUS. Therefore Osiander paraphrases the Apostle's words thus: "If we deal with you with great zeal, and correct your errors severely, so that to some delicate men we seem to be mad, in that matter with that pious zeal, we serve our Lord God, whose glory is at stake. But if humanely and modestly after a sharp correction we treat you, we do it for your benefit, lest you be alienated from the gospel of Christ, or be oppressed by excessive sadness."

III. Those who taste the powers of the world to come, must have been caught up into the third heaven. (For there the celestial powers are tasted.) But regenerate men, etc. Hebr. VI, 5. Therefore. Resp. Neg. major. For the words of the Apostle are: "Have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come." Therefore, they did not taste the powers of the world to come through an ecstatic rapture, but through the good word of God, which contains the promise of future goods, and thus from the gospel they perceived a certain foretaste of the kingdom of glory, when they lived their lives in this kingdom of grace. But this argument will be treated more fully in the following question. (*)

Question V. How many types of illumination are there regarding the illuminating medium?

Legal and evangelical illumination. Illumination, regarding the illuminating medium, is either legal or evangelical. The former is that which manifests to us sin, the wrath of God, and the temporal and eternal

(*) And this also must be considered in the first place, 3) that Christ in that singular revelation, which then happened to Paul, when he was utterly astonished, commanded him to hear the word, to be perceived from the mouth of a minister, by which he himself would be taught what was the will of God, and indeed concerning all things to be done, Acts IX, 3, 6. coll. with c. XXII, 10. The ecstasy which followed thereafter, ibid. v. 17.; did not pertain to the conversion of the soul and the salvation of the renewed man, but in a singular way to the function of the apostolic office, and the confirmation of his soul against the most grievous dangers and vexations. So great, therefore, is the dignity of the ordinary means, by which God effects a salutary change of mind in man, namely the word to be heard and read, that it should not be despised even by the highest Apostle, and not even then, when he himself was illuminated by some extraordinary revelation, and heavenly light, such as indeed is to be expected by no one today.

(*) Μέλλον αἰών, in this place, is not eternal glory, but the time of the New Testament; for this blessed age, after Christ was brought into the light, is called by the ancient Hebrew custom עולם הבא (the world to come); on the other hand, the age of the O.T. before the Messiah was born and had completed his work, is עולם הזה (this world). The consummation of the various periods of the O.T. is called συντέλεια τῶν αἰώνων, with the word ἐπὶ added, in these very letters, IX, 26. Therefore καλὸν Θεοῦ ῥῆμα is the proper word of the New Test., concerning Christ now manifest in the flesh, and none other than Jesus of Nazareth, that word which Christ first himself, then through his Legates, taught everyone, chap. II, 1, 3. Consequently the δυνάμεις of this age, which was future in the O.T., are the miracles by which the divine authority of that word was excellently declared, and the singular χαρίσματα of the Holy Spirit, as PAUL himself interprets, c. II, 4. Since these things are so, all the sinews of the opposition and argumentation which fanatical men wish to construct from these words are cut.

punishments of sin a); The latter is that which reveals to us the grace of God, founded on the merit of Christ, righteousness that avails before God, and eternal life b).

Proof a. Rom. VII, 7. "I had not known sin, but by the law." "For I had not known concupiscence (to be sin), except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet." Confer. Exod. XX, 17. The Apostle, taught by the Pharisees, had not known that evil concupiscence was original sin; Because the Pharisees did not hold it for sin, nor did they consider the first, and involuntary, motions of concupiscence to be sinful; But the Apostle, more correctly informed in the school of the Holy Spirit, recognized that hereditary sin is such a profound and foul corruption of nature, that it can be investigated or understood by the reason of no man, but must be learned and recognized only from the supernatural light of the word, divinely revealed. Conf. Smalcald articles. p. 317.

Proof b. Paul makes mention of evangelical illumination, 2 Cor. IV, 4. "The god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." The gospel illuminates the hearts of men, so that they may recognize the glory of Christ, who was indeed lifted up on the cross, but was raised into heaven, and sits at the right hand of God the Father, of whom he himself is the ἀπαύγασμα, Hebr. I, 3. Therefore the gospel declares and manifests the mercy, wisdom, and justice of God the Father, in the unveiled face of Christ, who is his essential image. Col. I, 15.

Question VI. What is the difference between legal and evangelical light?

The divine law, like lightning, has a terrifying, killing, and condemning light; The gospel, however, like the benefit of the sun, diffuses an exhilarating and vivifying light a). The law possesses powers of illuminating that are pedagogically salutary; But from the gospel arises an illumination that is completely salutary for those men who use the evangelical doctrine correctly according to the intention of God b).

Proof a. From 2 Cor. III, 6, 7, 8, 9. "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away; How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious? For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory." The Apostle compares the law with the gospel, 1) as to the nature of each; For the law is the letter; but the gospel is the spirit. The law is called the letter, partly synecdochically, because it was written and engraved by God on stone tablets with many letters; partly in opposition to the gospel, because it indeed commands holiness of life, but does not confer the powers for holy living. The gospel, on the other hand, is called spirit metonymically, because it is the medium by which the Holy Spirit illuminates, regenerates, justifies, and effects union with God. 2) As to the diversity of their effects: The law declaratively kills and condemns, i.e., it adjudges us to eternal death and condemnation; But the gospel vivifies, or regenerates. 3) As to glory, or clarity: The radiance of the law is lesser, that of the gospel is greater. The brilliance of the former is intolerable, symbolically represented in the radiant face of Moses, which had to be covered with a veil. The splendor of the latter is delightful in the face of Christ, shining with the rays of grace, humanity, and beneficence. The clarity of the former vanishes, diffused by the clarity of the gospel, just as a lesser light is overshadowed by a greater.

Proof b. "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith," Gal. III, 24. The divine law shows and reveals to us both the innate leprosy of the soul and the diseases voluntarily contracted, and thus provides us with an occasion to seek the physician of souls and the author of righteousness and salvation, Christ. But evangelical illumination, translated into use, is completely salutary; because it gives the knowledge of salvation, which is in the remission of sins, and reveals the tender mercy of our God, whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us, Luke I, 77, 78. Conf. D. BREITHAUP in instit. theol. loc. III. p. 251. seqq. & thes. cred. p. 131. seqq.

Question VII. But is illumination so bound to the divine word that none of it is given except at the time when that word is heard, or read, or considered with dedicated study?

The power of illuminating, with which the divine word is endowed, is not precisely bound to the acts of hearing, reading, or meditation, but the word of God, having been heard, read, transmitted into the soul, and retained therein, is always powerful with its illuminating force.

Proof. Docile hearers and readers "with meekness" modestly and courteously receive τὸν λόγον ἔμφυτον, the ingrafted word, James I, 21. which is thus united with the hearts of the hearers and readers, just as food with the body, leaven with the dough, seed with the field, a shoot with a tree; which ingrafted word, as the ordinary medium of the Holy Spirit, is able not only to save souls, but also to illuminate them for salvation.

Question VIII. Are we truly and properly illuminated by the ministers of the word?

Ministerial Cause. Through the ministers of the word, duly performing the public office of teaching, the Holy Spirit truly and properly illuminates the souls of men who are in darkness concerning sacred things.

Obs. The principal cause of illumination is the triune God, and indeed appropriatively the Holy Spirit; the ordinary medium of illuminating is the word of God; the ministerial cause are the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. IV, 1.

Proof 1) From Eph. III, 8, 9. "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; And to make all men see." The Apostle ministerially illuminated men who were ignorant of divine things, by illustrating the doctrine of the gospel, and by notifying and inculcating the benefits of Christ most abundantly to them.

2. From 2 Cor. IV, 6. "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The Apostles and their successors were brought to the light of true acknowledgment by the most merciful God for this purpose, that through them the illumination of true acknowledgment might befall others.

3. The ministers of the divine word "open the eyes" of their hearers, "to turn them from darkness to light," Acts XXVI, 18. Therefore, they truly illuminate.

4. Those who teach the word of God are said to be a light, e.g., John the Baptist, John V, 35. The Apostles, Matth. V, 14.

The Antithesis is of the Enthusiasts, Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians & Weigelians, who state that men today are illuminated immediately by the Holy Spirit. Their chief arguments are:

I. Whatever souls are an epistle, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, are illuminated immediately by the Holy Spirit; But the souls of Christians, etc. 2 Cor. III, 3. Therefore. The minor is clear; because the Apostle excludes the gospel, inscribed with ink on paper, from the act of illumination. Resp. 1) The Apostle does not exclude the ministry of the word from the act of illumination, who explicitly says: "Ye are our epistle ministered by us." 2) We do not attribute the efficacy of illuminating to the gospel considered materially, i.e., insofar as it is inscribed with ink on paper; but considered formally, with respect to its divinely-inspired meaning.

II. St. John in 1 ep. II, 27. says: "The anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you." Those who do not need external information, but are fully informed by the anointing abiding within the soul, are immediately illuminated and informed by God; But the regenerate, etc. Therefore. Resp. 1) That anointing, commended by St. John, is the Holy Spirit, the principal cause of illumination, who informs us not immediately, but through the medium of the word, 1 John II, 14. Nor do we need anyone to teach us new and different things from those which the Prophets and Apostles taught. 2) St. John is referring to those teachers who were offering or obtruding themselves at that time, and were accustomed to seduce the unwary, accusing the doctrine hitherto handed down by the Apostles, whether by living voice or by writing, of insufficiency, and rashly promising a more correct and fuller knowledge of divine things, although they were led by the spirit of Antichrist, according to v. 18, 19, & 26.

III. Whoever are θεοδιδάκτοι, taught of God, are not illuminated by the ministers of the church; But the regenerate, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from John VI, 45. Resp. Whoever are ἀμέσως (immediately) θεοδιδάκτοι, are not illuminated by the ministers of the church; I grant. But after the completion of the canon of scripture, men are illuminated and taught by God through the ministry of the word, through which God is efficacious, 1 Cor. III, 6. Paul writes of the Thessalonians: Αὐτοὶ ὑμεῖς θεοδιδάκτοι ἐστε, "ye yourselves are taught of God," namely through the ministry of the Apostle Paul, 1 Thess. IV, 9. coll. with v. 1 & 2. Therefore, they are θεοδιδάκτοι ἐμμέσως (mediately). Whence in that place Christ adds: "Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me." It is not permitted to seek the voice of the Father elsewhere than in the revealed word, as Peter admonishes, 2 ep. 1, 16, 17, 18.

Question IX. Which men does God illuminate?

Subject of illumination. The most benign God indeed seriously intends to illuminate all men a); but in actuality, those are illuminated who, having been called and brought to the church, admit the grace of the Holy Spirit, and attentively hear, read, and meditate on the divine word b).

Proof a. 1) "Christ is the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," John I, 9. Christ the true light illuminates, as much as is in him, not just one nation, not just one man, but all men coming forth into the darkness of this world. For he came so that through the preaching of the gospel he might shine in the hearts of both all nations and of individual men. The Scythian is not excluded, nor the Jew, nor the Spaniard, nor the Goth, nor the Briton, not the king, not the slave, not male, not female. Many indeed persevere in the darkness of ignorance and errors; But indeed not by the fault of denied light, but by their own fault, just as if someone should stumble at midday because he does not wish to lift his eyes. AUGUSTINE aptly says, tract. XXVII. in John. "He who resists, how shall he be quickened? He is an adversary to the ray of light, by which he is to be penetrated. He does not turn his gaze, but closes his mind."

2. "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us," Tit. II, 11, 12. The teaching, or illuminating, grace has shone upon all men, according to the gracious intention of God: "The light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not," John I, 5.

3. "We preach Christ, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus," Col. I, 28. Paul and the apostolic men intended to teach heavenly wisdom to every man, if not by tongue, certainly by pen.

Proof b. A man called to the church, who admits the divine word and meditates on it attentively, is illuminated. For God has called us "out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Peter II, 9. Sacred preachers are also sent "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light," Acts XXVI, 18. The grace of the Holy Spirit, however, is not irresistible; since the sinner, stubbornly contumacious, can impede supernatural illumination by interposing a veil or a malicious obstacle. The Apostle hints at this, 2 Cor. IV, 3, 4. "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost; In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." To be sure, the gospel, luminous in itself, is κεκαλυμμένον, covered, or veiled per accidens, by the fault of men suffering from a blindness not only innate, but also acquired and voluntarily contracted, and permitted by the judgment of God, when obstinacy, corroborated by Satan, is added. But the sinner who does not morosely resist, the Holy Spirit efficaciously illuminates through the divine word. The psalmist himself ingenuously confesses this, Ps. CXIX, 130. "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple."

You say: I. Whoever blinds some men, does not will to illuminate all; But God etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from John XII, 40. "The Jews could not believe, because that Esaias said, He hath blinded their eyes." Resp. Distinguish between the antecedent and consequent will of God. By his antecedent will, God wills to illuminate all men; But by his consequent, or judicial, will, he blinds some, not positively, by sending blindness into their hearts; but negatively, or privatively, by deserting them, and by withdrawing the light of grace, which was scorned and petulantly repulsed by them. For which reason, the inability to believe is not to be attributed to a destined will, or counsel of God, by which he absolutely denied all illuminating grace, but to the malice of the Jews, who stubbornly rejected the offered light.

You say: II. Those to whom it is not given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, God does not will to illuminate; But it is not given to all, etc. Matth. XIII, 11. Therefore. Resp. 1) Neg. maj. Because God by his antecedent will, or will of mercy, intends to illuminate all men; although in actuality only those are illuminated to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven who admit the light of the divine word by hearing, reading, and attentively meditating. 2) Those to whom it is not given by an absolute divine decree to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, God does not will to illuminate; I grant. But the Savior in that place speaks of a respective decree, which has respect to the sloth, pride, and contempt of the hearers, and so by the just judgment of God, and their own fault, a deeper knowledge of the mysteries of God is not given. The sense therefore is: To you, who are eager to learn, who remain with me, and who seek the interpretation of my parable of the seed scattered on different ground (conf. Mark IV, 10.), it is given to know salutarily the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; To the others, who proudly disdain my sermon and depart from me, the parable was indeed spoken literally, but without a deeper understanding of the mystery latent under it, so that they may pay the just penalties for their negligence and pride.

You say: III. God has hidden the mysteries of faith and salvation from the wise of this world, Matth. XI, 25. Therefore, he does not will to illuminate all. Resp. Christ is speaking in that place of the ministering gifts, conferred by the heavenly Father on his disciples, but denied to the proud Pharisees by a just judgment; not, however, of the hiding of the mysteries of faith, necessary to be known for salvation. Vid. supra Cap. 1. p. 693.

Question X. Is only the intellect, or also the will of the sinner called to the church illuminated?

First and immediately, the intellect of the sinner brought to the church is illuminated a); consequently and mediately, his will is also illuminated b).

Proof a. 1) Illumination is called φωτισμός της γνώσεως της δόξης του Θεού, "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God," 2 Cor. IV, 6. Therefore, the intellect is illuminated, so that it may know the glory of God. 2) God gives us the eyes of our understanding being enlightened, that we may know what is the hope of our calling, Eph. I, 18.

Proof b. "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, Teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." Tit. II, 11, 12. The saving grace of God, which has shone upon all men like the benefit of the sun, instructs the intellect of the sinner, and suffuses it with the light of knowledge, so that this light may be diffused into the will, for fleeing ungodliness and choosing holiness of life. Whence Paul wishes for illumination for the Colossians, so that they may be sanctified, Col. I, 10. Consider therefore what D. FECHTIUS writes, in diss. de O. M. gratia p. 20. "The word illumination, by the usage of scripture, denotes not only the liberation of the mind from ignorance and errors and the guidance into all spiritual truth, but also the change of the will into another and better state." However, D. BREITHAUPT has accurately observed, in thes. credend. that illumination pertains more to the intellect, regeneration more to the will. pag. 136.

Question XI. Can supernatural illumination be in the intellect of man, without the sanctification of the will?

Since supernatural illumination is a successive act of applicatory grace a); certainly an imperfect illumination can be in the intellect of man, without the sanctification of the will b).

The antithesis is of all mystical writers, who state that the purgative way is prior to the illuminative; whose opinion can be perceived from the Theologia Germanica, of which these are the words c. 12. "Now one should know that no one can be enlightened, unless he has first been cleansed, purified, and freed, also no one can be united with God, unless he has first been enlightened." The same is taught by G. ARNOLD. from Hugh of Palma's theol. myst. c. VI. p. 119. "When a disciple of Christ has long walked the way of purification, and now hears the voice of his Bridegroom speaking to him through an inner inspiration: Arise daughter of Zion, arise from the dust! (which he will certainly hear, if he walks humbly, considers himself a sinful man, and recognizes his nothingness), then he should arise, and proceed to the other way of illumination."

Exposition

Obs. I. Illumination is succinctly described as an information from the word of God about sacred things concerning the salvation of men, by the author D. FECHTIUS, in his treatise de ordine, modoque gratia divina p. 18. But it can be more fully defined: Illumination is an act of applicatory grace, by which the Holy Spirit informs a man called to the church, through the ministry of the word, about God and divine things, and elevates and corroborates his intellect above its natural powers, to understand divine mysteries, so that, the darkness of ignorance and errors having been dispelled, He may imbue him with the knowledge of the true God, and instill in him the acknowledgment of sin from the law, and from the gospel, the cognition of Christ and of the divine mercy founded in him.

Obs. II. The given definition rests on a solid foundation; since indeed a) the end and effect of information is a certain knowledge. To teach, or to inform, signifies to make someone knowing or to instill knowledge in someone. Now, the effect of illumination is γνῶσις, or cognition. For it is called φωτισμός γνώσεως, the illumination of the cognition of divine glory, 2 Cor. IV, 6. Therefore, the intellect is illuminated, that it may know the glory of God. God gives us the enlightened eyes of the mind, εἰς τὸ εἰδέναι ἡμᾶς, that we may know what is the hope of our calling, Eph. I, 18. b) King David explains "to illuminate" by "to make intelligent," Ps. CXIX, 130. "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple." In explaining which words, D. GEIER says: "The figurative preceding word, 'illuminates', is explained by a proper word. For יָרָא used transitively means, he caused to understand, he instructed." Therefore, to illuminate is the same as to instruct, and illuminating grace is a guiding grace, as D. DANNHAY says, in hodos. phaenom. IX. §. 938. c) The ministers of the church are said to illuminate their hearers. Eph. III, 9. 2 Cor. IV, 6. But they cannot illuminate their hearers in any other way than by informing them. It remains, therefore, established and fixed, that illumination is an information from the word of God about sacred things concerning the salvation of men.

Obs. III. Theologians distinguish between perfect and imperfect illumination, which distinction is also used by D. SEB. SCHMIDIUS, a theologian of, if any other, a most refined judgment, in his later biblical college, p. 164. "Subjectively there can be a ψυχικός, a natural man, who understands something of the things that are of the Spirit of God; not indeed as such, but as already imperfectly illuminated by the Spirit of God." That this distinction is solid is agreed among all who accurately weigh that illumination is a successive action, which, when it is begun and continued, is imperfect; when it is consummated and brought to an end, is called perfect.

Obs. IV. Imperfect illumination is also called literal and pedagogical by theologians; perfect is called spiritual and completely salutary. DANNHAVER in hodos. praeom. XI. p. 1419. states: "The sin against the Holy Spirit is a deliberate ἀπιστία, in a man sufficiently illuminated, Hebr. VI, 4. c. X, 26. whether that illumination was pedagogical and merely literal, or spiritual, conjoined with a γεύσις (taste) of heavenly things." D. QUENSTEDT explains this distinction more clearly in System. Theol. part. II. p. 77. "Φωτισμός, or illumination, is either παιδαγωγική καὶ γραμματική, pedagogical, merely literal and external, when someone is instructed with the knowledge of divine truth, and is convicted of its certainty in his conscience, yet does not have this known truth sealed in his heart by the seal of the Spirit, or confirmed by the gracious indwelling of the Holy Spirit; or it is πνευματική, spiritual, gracious and internal, when, to be sure, someone truly regenerate not only has a literal intelligence of the evangelical doctrine, but at the same time is a temple of the Holy Spirit, which He graciously inhabits, or when he is corroborated, confirmed, and sealed by the internal testimony of the graciously indwelling one."

Obs. V. Orthodox Doctors attribute imperfect and pedagogical illumination to assisting, not indwelling, divine grace; which distinction D. IO. ADAM. OSIANDER excellently explains in theol. posit. acroam. P. III. p. 19. "Divine grace is distinguished into assisting and indwelling; and indeed assisting is that which still operates extrinsically, not that it does not touch the heart of man itself, but because, with the Spirit still operating externally, and not indwelling, it exerts its force, to which is assigned prevenient grace, which removes the natural incapacity, innate in all; preparing grace, which restrains the natural resistance, adverse to spiritual things; finally, exciting grace, which instructs the mind with a literal sense, operates assent, and contrites the heart; but it is called indwelling, when the Holy Spirit himself enters the heart of man, changes and inhabits it. From this proceeds perfect illumination, which is sufficient to excite faith in Christ, and exerts itself through spiritual, pious motions." The foundation of the distinction into assisting and indwelling grace is found in Apoc. III, 20. where Christ addresses the bishop of Laodicea: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." In these words is indicated a) assisting grace; because Christ says he stands at the door, namely of the human heart, to convert it. He does not, however, stand idle, but knocks, and desires to be let in. He knocks, so that his voice may be heard, and from the voice Christ himself, crying and calling, may be recognized; which is b) prevenient and exciting grace. He knocks in such a way that the door may be opened; which is c) preparing grace. For unregenerate men open the door of the heart not by the natural powers of free will, but by new powers conferred through prevenient and preparing grace; just as those raised from natural death rise not by their own powers, but by new powers given in the resurrection. For by knocking, Christ bestows the power of opening, which is proper to the efficacy of the word of the gospel, Rom. I, 16. When the door of the heart is opened, Christ enters; which is d) entering and indwelling grace. For Christ enters in such a way that he sups with us, and we with him. Christ enters by kindling true and living faith with the light of his word, and by dwelling in us through faith, Eph. III, 17. From which arises the sweetest communion of us with Christ, which is a foretaste of eternal life. They are mistaken, therefore, who take it upon themselves to reject the distinction of grace into assisting and indwelling, as if it were a new invention, resting on no firm support. But this significant distinction stands unshaken, since the author of salvation himself has handed it down to us and impressed it upon us.

Obs. VI. Imperfect and pedagogical illumination is not natural, but supernatural; because a) it proceeds from the light of special revelation; b) it is obtained by us through the supernatural operation of the Holy Spirit; c) it is concerned with the mysteries of faith, and d) it is divinely ordained for a spiritual end. We cannot but note here diligently that truly orthodox theologians have never distinguished illumination into natural and supernatural. The blessed DORSCHAEUS (cited by D. CALOVIUS in bibl. illustr. on Hebr. VI, 4.) considerably says: "It is not a natural illumination of the intelligence, as Beza, Piscator, Marloratus, etc. have said on John I, 9. For that is nowhere in the sacred letters called Φωτισμός, nor is such understood in John I. For there the Φωτισμός pronounced concerning Christ is such that it properly pertains to the prophetic office of Christ, in respect of which Christ is φῶς ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ φαῖνον, 'a light shining in the darkness,' verse 5. concerning which light John the Baptist testified, v. 7. by which illumination the world could have known Christ, if it had not loved darkness more than light, John I, 10. c. III, 19." Our great CHEMNITZ gives the reason why theologians have deliberately abstained from the distinction of illumination into natural and supernatural in his loci theologici P. 1. de Deo, p. m. 20. "The natural knowledge of God is either none, or imperfect, or languid. None; because the whole of philosophy knows nothing of the gratuitous promise of the remission of sins; for the Son of God, brought forth from the bosom of the Father, has revealed it to the church, John I, 18. Imperfect; because the gentiles knew only some particle of the law, but concerning the interior worship of the first table, reason neither knows nor establishes anything certain. Languid; because, although it is impressed upon human minds that there is a God, and that he commands obedience, according to the distinction between the honorable and the shameful, yet the assent is not only languid, but is also often shaken by horrendous doubts." (*)

(*) Theologians who think correctly pronounce so wisely; for the greater caution must be used, the more capital a pestilence is Naturalism, whether philosophical or fanatical. The patrons of both indeed agree in this; that they posit a certain natural illumination, and indeed in such a way that they value it more than the power of sacred scripture to illuminate the mind; for this illumination, given to us by the benefit of the Holy Spirit, they either utterly repudiate, or are accustomed not to value it greatly. But they go their separate ways when asked what that natural illumination is, of which they boast so much. And those indeed, who are addicted to philosophical Naturalism, like ED. HERB. L. B. de CHERBURY, first of all understand by that name the light of nature, to be perceived by the use of reason; then some of them think that this natural light is the only one, and therefore they utterly condemn and reject Sacred Scripture and the illumination which the Holy Spirit works by

Obs. VII. Divine revelation differs from the illumination of the Holy Spirit. For revelation is either natural or supernatural. The former is that by which God has manifested himself both through the innate light of nature and through the effects to be seen in the kingdom of nature, Rom. I, 19. c. II, 14, 15. The latter is that by which God, partly immediately, partly mediately, through his word, reveals himself and his will for the salvation of the human race. But the illumination of the Holy Spirit is always a supernatural action, by which the intellect is elevated above the powers of nature to understand divine mysteries, which cannot be known by the guidance of the light of nature. Revelation can happen through the general concourse of God; illumination always requires a special influx of God. By revelation, the salutary doctrine is proposed externally; but by illumination, it is received within the soul. Hence it happens that revelation not rarely befalls those ignorant of its power and meaning; e.g., Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, the hearers of the Apostles at the feast of Pentecost; but by illumination the Holy Spirit operates and effects cognition in the intellect of the man who does not maliciously resist. God reveals himself to the devil, whom, however, the Holy Spirit never deigns with gracious illumination, since that capital enemy of God and men is not capable of illuminating grace, which has respect to eternal salvation. Beware, therefore, of confusing divine revelation with the illumination of the Holy Spirit.

Obs. VIII. Illumination differs from regeneration. The former pertains more to the intellect; the latter more to the will. The former consists formally in information from the divine word about sacred things; the latter in the donation of faith. The effect of the former is the cognition of divine mysteries; the effect of the latter is trust resting on the merit of Christ. The former precedes, the latter follows.

Obs. IX. Illumination differs from sanctification, strictly speaking. That sanctification, taken in a broader sense, embraces all the acts of applicatory grace, is agreed among all Christians; yet the same, taken in a stricter sense, is distinguished from illumination 1) with respect to the partial subject; because by illumination the intellect is proximately and formally perfected, by sanctification the will; 2) with respect to latitude; because more men are illuminated than are sanctified; 3) with respect to the effect and proper end; because the effect of illumination is γνῶσις, or the supernatural cognition of God and of divine things, Eph. 1, 18. 1 Cor. IV, 6. but the effect of sanctification is ἀγιωσύνη καὶ δικαιοσύνη, holiness and righteousness, Eph. IV, 24.

Confirmation

That a simple, or imperfect, illumination can be in the intellect of a man who does not morosely resist, without the sanctification of the will, is proven: 1) That divine illumination which precedes saving faith by some greater or lesser interval of time, can exist without sanctification; But imperfect divine illumination, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because hearts are purified by faith, Acts XV, 9. Therefore, where there is no faith in the heart, there is no purity or holiness. The minor is proven; because the ordinary illumination of adults is a successive act of grace, which is not completed in one moment, but happens through intervals of time, by degrees, by repeated acts, until they fully and salutarily conceive faith, so that no act of divine applicatory grace has more need of delay and process than illumination, in the judgment of D. FECHTIUS in his most learned treatise de ordine, modoque gratiae, §. 9. p. 19. This gradual and successive illumination of adult men is taught by a) Practice itself. For a minister of the church, about to convert a Jew, strives with all effort and study to illuminate him. First, he convinces the Jew that the Messiah, promised in the O.T., has long since come, using clear testimonies of scripture, and removing doubts from the Jew's mind.

Meanwhile, time passes. Second, he demonstrates that this Messiah is not a mere its efficacy; others, a little more moderate, think that the light of nature is sufficient for salvation, if not for all men, certainly for many, indeed for most, namely those to whom the opportunity of reading the Holy Scripture has not been given. Those who are involved in this error, although they do not dare to deny the dignity of scripture, yet they deny that it is simply necessary. The rest, the defenders of fanatical Naturalism, of whom PETRUS POIRET is easily the chief, feign a certain internal light, naturally implanted in all men, which they are also accustomed to call the internal word of God, distinct from the external, or Christ in us.

man, but true God, and the Son of God the Father, begotten from eternity. Third, he shows that this Messiah and God-man is Jesus of Nazareth, the son of the virgin Mary, by comparing the prophetic oracles with the nativity, doctrine, passion, resurrection, ascension into heaven, and miracles of Christ, where very many doubts must be removed from the Jew. Meanwhile one or two hours elapse. Fourth, he proves from the old testament that in the one divine essence there are three persons, God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, where not only the truth must be asserted, but also the scruples injected into the Jew's mind must be rooted out; which sacred labor requires a certain space of time. Fifth, he instills in the Jew the doctrine of the priestly, prophetic, and kingly office of Christ; which illumination demands a delay of time. Sixth, he inculcates to the one being converted the means of salvation, the word of God and the sacraments, through which God, today, deals with man to convert, regenerate, justify, and save him. 1. It shows, on our part, that to obtain the remission of sins and eternal life, true faith, apprehending the merit of Christ, is required, and thus the sinner is justified not by good works but by faith. The Jew will raise doubts, which are to be resolved as time proceeds. It teaches that the faith which has justified expresses itself through the sanctity of life; otherwise, it is not living but dead. The Jew, receiving this information, is now at last sufficiently illuminated, converted, regenerated, and receives baptism as the seal of regeneration. From this practice, and the particular examples joined to it, it is evident that illumination is not accomplished in a moment, but over a longer period of time.

Let us consider the illumination and conversion of Gerson the Jew, which Dr. CALIXTUS recounts in his treatise on the authority of Holy Scripture, p. 36, and he adduces Gerson's own words: "A certain poor Christian woman," says Gerson, "my neighbor, pawned to me a copy of the German New Testament, translated by Luther: to whom I lent eight shillings, so that I might gain interest in my usual way, and in the meantime, I might look through the book; not indeed because I doubted the truth of the Jewish religion, or believed any article of the Christian faith to be correct, but so that I might know what that so effective error was, which was seducing so many myriads of souls and leading them headlong to destruction. Therefore, with my two kinsmen, Lazarus and Simeon, present, I read through the whole thing, not without blasphemies. In the meantime, however, my heart was struck, and when I noticed that the Evangelists and the Apostles, and Christ himself, so often appealed to the Old Testament, and repeatedly adduced passages from it, one after another; I was drawn to read it again, and secretly indeed, with no one aware, not even my wife, and to compare the adduced passages with the text of the Old Testament itself. When I did this, so great a light shone upon me that for this reason I owe eternal thanks to God." Who does not see that Gerson's imperfect illumination was for a time without regeneration and sanctification?

An excellent example is that of AUGUSTINE, who in his books of confessions explains at length how he was illuminated and converted by God; but everywhere he testifies that the Holy Spirit worked in him over a long period of time before he was fully illuminated and converted. In Book

V of his confessions, c. 14, he recounts what happened to him when he once heard AMBROSE preaching the word of God; namely, that gradually what was being proposed entered his mind, and seemed to him to be very likely true, since he had nothing to reply to it: "Yet I thought," he says, "that more learned men could refute these things." Therefore, he did not yet have faith itself, but still remained in doubt. Afterwards, in Book VI, he explains the temptations and doubts with which he struggled for some time. In Book VIII, c. 2, he recounts what happened when he approached SIMPLICIANUS, who afterwards succeeded AMBROSE in the episcopate of Milan; namely, that Simplicianus told of the conversion of VICTORINUS the Rhetorician, that he was illuminated by the Holy Spirit from the reading of Scripture, that he entered the church, and publicly professed the Christian faith. When AUGUSTINE heard these things narrated by Simplicianus, he says in c. 5: "I was inflamed to imitate the example of Victorinus." Yet he could not at that time strive to that point, because of the strong doubts that inhered in his mind. "For which thing," he says, "I was sighing, bound not by another's iron, but by my own iron will. The enemy held my will, and from it he had made a chain for me, and had bound me." Wherein, indeed, the intellect of AUGUSTINE was successively illuminated, although his iron will for a time resisted converting and regenerating grace.

b) If ordinary illumination were an instantaneous action, it would be irresistible; for no impediment can be placed in the way of an instantaneous divine action. Creation is an instantaneous action, because it is an irresistible divine action. When God said: "Let there be light!" at that very moment light was there, Gen. I, 3. No one could resist the divine creation. But if God, through absolute and irresistible power, wished to illuminate a sinner, that would certainly be instantaneous, and always joined with the sanctification of the will. But experience testifies that most mortals struggle against the divine grace operating through ordinary means. AUGUSTINE says aptly in tractate XXVII on John: "He who resists, how is he vivified? He is an adversary to the ray of light by which he is to be penetrated. He does not turn his gaze to it, but closes his mind."

c) In the same way that the Holy Spirit informs us through Holy Scripture, by proposing and inculcating the heads of Christian doctrine to our intellect, in that same way He illuminates us who are reading or hearing Holy Scripture: But the Holy Spirit informs us through Holy Scripture successively, proposing and inculcating to our intellect one head of Christian doctrine after another; Therefore.

d) The good sower scatters seed in his field, so that it first brings forth the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear, Mark IV, 28. Thus God, scattering the good seed, His word, into the hearts of men, ordinarily and always intends and wishes to confer a more abundant degree of grace upon the hearers, even to completion. From which Christ compels us: "See how you hear! For whoever has (receives and retains the first degree of illumination), to him it will be given," Luke VIII, 18.

e) A symbolic example of successive illumination can be seen in the healing of that blind man, whom Holy Scripture mentions in Mark VIII, 22 seqq.

Christ healed him by putting spittle in his eyes, not by restoring perfect sight in a moment, but by gradually and by degrees opening his eyes, so that at first he saw faintly, and perceived men walking about as if they were trees; then, when Christ laid his hand on his eyes, his sight was fully restored, and he saw everyone clearly: Thus God opens the eyes of the unregenerate man's mind more and more through His word, so that his knowledge of God and divine things is at first tenuous and slight, but with the passage of time it increases, if he continues to meditate on the divine word.

f) The Apostle Paul was extraordinarily illuminated by an immediate revelation and appearance of Christ. Yet his illumination was not instantaneous. For when, surrounded by an unusual light shining from heaven, he fell headlong to the ground, he heard a heavenly voice: "Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me?" Saul, not knowing the author of the heavenly voice, said: "Who are you, Lord?" And the Lord said, "I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting; it is hard for you to kick against the goads." Behold the beginning of supernatural illumination, from which Paul recognized the Lord Jesus and his will, that he should desist from persecuting Christians. But he was not yet fully converted at that point in time, although a desire for conversion had been injected into his will. Therefore, trembling and astonished, he said: "Lord, what do you want me to do?" And the Lord said to him: "Arise and go into the city, and you will be told what you must do." Therefore, having entered the city of Damascus, he was more fully illuminated by Ananias, and was filled with the Holy Spirit, Acts IX.

Prob. 2) If the illumination of the intellect cannot exist without the sanctification of the will, no Jew, no Turk can be successively illuminated today: But Jews, Turks, and Gentiles are not infrequently illuminated successively even today: Therefore. The consequence is clear; because where a sinner is illuminated over a period of time, there the full conversion of the will is not immediately present.

3. Whatever light shines in the unregenerate heart, as in a dark place, until the full day of knowledge dawns, and Christ the morning star shines forth through faith in the same heart, that light for a time irradiates a heart devoid of sanctity: But the prophetic and apostolic light, etc. 2 Pet. 1, 19. Therefore. The words of the Apostle Peter are most emphatic. For thus he says: "We have the prophetic word made more sure, to which you do well to pay attention as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts." There is no time, nor does it help, at present to examine each of the Apostle's words, but we observe only a) that by 'το πον αἰχμηροῦ', a squalid and dark place, is to be understood the human heart, according to the interpretation of the Blessed CALOVIUS, which without the word of God is dark, as is shown by the opposite light, which shines in our hearts, after the darkness of ignorance and errors has been dispelled, and which is attributed to the prophetic word. b) That the particle 'ἕως', until, indicates a successive illumination. For again and again, as St. Peter warns, we must pay attention to the prophetic word, as to a light shining in the darkness, until the day dawns. For just as at dawn the shadows of the night are gradually dispelled, and the light grows until the full day dawns; so through the light of the prophetic and apostolic word the darkness of ignorance is expelled from the unregenerate heart, until the day of saving knowledge dawns and Christ dwells in the heart through faith, and more abundantly diffuses the splendor of his grace in it. From this statement of Peter we gather: a) that the unregenerate heart is successively illuminated by the light of the divine word, and thus that some illumination is imperfect. b) That illumination precedes regeneration, or the kindling of faith, not only in the order of nature, but also in the order of time. Therefore, those who dare to assert that there is no true illumination of the intellect which is without the conversion and regeneration of the will are in vain; since the first and principal reason for illumination consists in preparing man for conversion. For this reason, natural darkness, ignorance of the mysteries, and the errors opposed to them, are expelled from the human intellect by grace, and it is imbued with the knowledge of God and of sacred things, and is illumined as by a certain light, so that it may be rendered fit to receive justifying grace. This illuminating grace therefore precedes the completion of conversion, according to the judgment of Dr. FECHT, in his treatise on the order and manner of grace, aphorism IX, p. 18.

4. We prove our assertion from the oracle of Christ, Luke XII, 47, 48: "That servant who knows his master's will, but neither prepares himself nor does his will, will be beaten with many stripes." To know the Lord's will is an effect of illumination; to prepare oneself to do it is an effect of renewal. But since, as Christ testifies, some servants know their master's will, yet neither prepare themselves nor do his will; it follows that a certain illumination of the intellect exists without the conversion and renewal of the will.

5. If no illumination of the mind exists without sanctification of the will, no one will sin against a conscience illuminated by the word of God, there will be no apostates, and no sinners against the Holy Spirit. But many sin against an illuminated conscience, many are apostates, and sinners against the Holy Spirit. Therefore. The consequence is firm: for he who sins against the dictate of an illuminated conscience is still illuminated at the moment he sins. Nor does he lose the knowledge of the divine law after committing a sin against conscience. The antecedent is clear; because the first parents, Aaron the priest, king David, Peter the Apostle, sinned most grievously against an illuminated conscience. Apostates, however, are graphically delineated by Peter, 2d epistle II, 20, 21: "For if, after they have escaped the defilements of the world through the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled in them and overcome, the last state has become worse for them than the first. For it would have been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after knowing it to turn back from the holy commandment delivered to them." But sinners against the Holy Spirit the Apostle Paul depicted in vivid colors, as it were, Hebrews VI, 4, 5, 6: "For it is impossible, in the case of those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, and have shared in the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come, and then have fallen away, to restore them again to repentance, since they are crucifying once again the Son of God to their own harm and holding him up to contempt." From which it is evident that the intellect of apostates was so illumined with a remarkable light that they knew the way of righteousness and tasted the powers of the age to come, yet their will departed so much from the holy precept that they dared to crucify the Son of God again and hold him up to contempt.

6. Whoever, through a deliberate sin, falls from the state of grace into the state of wrath, and yet retains so much light of supernatural knowledge that through it they can return to the state of grace, their illumination exists without sanctification; But men who sin with determined malice, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Apocalypse III, 3, where John is ordered to write to the Bishop of Sardis: "Remember, then, what you received and heard. Keep it, and repent." This Bishop is described as having a name that he is alive, but in reality he is dead, i.e., he is destitute of regenerating, justifying, and indwelling grace. From which the blessed DANNHAVER concludes in hodo phenom p. 878: "Some sinners are recalled by that supernatural light, which is still in the fallen." And in lacte catechet P. IV. conc. XXIII. p. 285: "Some who have fallen through serious sins still have the supernatural light of faith, as far as knowledge is concerned, and a glow of it still remains."

Instance I. Through deliberate sin the Holy Spirit is driven out, and therefore also the supernatural light of knowledge. Response. By deliberate sin the indwelling grace of the Holy Spirit is driven out, but not the assisting grace, from which comes illumination. Voluntary sin does not immediately expel the supernatural light of knowledge; otherwise, no one would sin against an illuminated conscience.

Instance II. Just as God does not restore sight to a man who is naturally dead without the vivification of the whole body; so neither does he illuminate the intellect without the complete regeneration of the soul. Response. This analogy is flawed because God resurrects a naturally dead man in a single moment, but he converts a spiritually dead man successively. But more on this below.

7. There exist examples of those who were illuminated by the divine word, and yet were not holy.

a) The Bishop of Sardis, of whom we have already treated.

b) Balaam was a man stained with lethal crimes, namely idolatry, Apoc. II, 14, injustice and avarice, 2 Pet. II, 15, Jude v. 11, whose way was evil before the angel of the Lord, Num. XXII, 32, etc.; yet God put his word in his mouth, Num. XXIII, 5, and opened the eyes of his mind, c. XXIV, so that he is even called a prophet, 2 Pet. II, 16.

c) Christ called Judas Iscariot a devil, John VI, 70, and yet he sent him with the other Apostles to preach the gospel, Matt. X, 17. But if Judas had not been illuminated, he would not have been sent by Christ to illuminate others by preaching the gospel.

d) Those workers of iniquity were illuminated who address Christ: "Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name?" Matt. VII, 22, 23. A man devoid of supernatural illumination cannot prophesy in the name of Christ.

e) Those Scribes and Pharisees, whose precepts the Jews were ordered to observe and do, Matt. XXIII, 1, 2, 3, were not devoid of all supernatural light; otherwise, the most wise Lord, Jesus, would not have gravely exhorted not only the people promiscuously, whom he seriously wished to come to the knowledge of the truth, but also his own disciples, to observe and express in their actions all that they enjoined to be observed from Moses and the prophets. You object: Those Pharisees are called blind guides, Matt. XXIII, 24. Response. They are called blind comparatively and in a certain respect; because they had not directed the knowledge of spiritual things, which they had drawn from the word of God, to a living practice, which the Savior objects to them, saying: "They say, but do not do." But a respective blindness can coexist with an imperfect illumination. This is clear from the example of Christ's disciples, Luke XVIII, 34.

f) Those rival teachers of Paul were illuminated, who, in order to demean him, preached Christ out of envy and contention; yet the Apostle, detained in chains, rejoiced at their preaching, Phil. I, 16.

g) Supernatural light irradiated the mind of the prophet of Bethel, who, having deceived another innocent prophet by fraud, brought him back from the way he was going by the will of God; for the word of God came to him, by which he predicted a sudden death for this man. 1 Kings XIII, 20.

You object: The illumination of Balaam, and of this prophet of Bethel, was extraordinary, which does not make a common rule. Response. From that extraordinary illumination it can be gathered that sometimes the illumination of the intellect occurs without the sanctification of the will.

Resolution

Those from the opposite side object: I. Whoever maliciously resists divine grace, they are not illuminated; But unregenerate men, etc. Therefore. Response. Whoever maliciously resists illuminating divine grace, they are without doubt not illuminated. For the subject of illumination is a teachable man, called to the church, admitting the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, and attentively hearing, reading, and meditating on the divine word. Nevertheless, this is also true, that many admit illuminating grace, but resist converting and regenerating grace.

II. Theologians of great name teach that conversion happens in an instant, among whom is also Dr. CALOVIUS, who in systemat. theolog. vol. X, p. 16, writes: "Conversion happens in a moment of time, at once and simultaneously, and as it were 'ἐν ῥιπῇ ὁφθαλμοῦ', speaking here of God 'κατ' ἀνθρώπου παθεῖαν'." Response. The form of conversion, specifically so-called, consists in the translation of an unregenerate man from the state of wrath and sin to the state of grace and faith, from the kingdom of darkness to the kingdom of light, which has its preparatory acts, with respect to which it is said to happen successively. For preparation has its degrees, and happens successively. But the translation itself from the state of wrath to the state of grace happens in an instant and a moment, since it is impossible for any subject even for a moment to be simultaneously in the state of wrath and in the state of grace, simultaneously under life and under death, as the most accurate theologians teach, Dr. KOENIG in theol. positiva §. 502, and Dr. QUENSTEDT in system. theol. P. III. VII. p. 493. But the illumination of adult men (we are not speaking here of the illumination of infants), being imperfect and pedagogical, pertains to the preparatory acts of conversion, and happens successively. Relevant here are the most memorable words of Dr. SONTAG in fanaticismo §. 62: "Since the whole conversion of man (and that taken not terminatively, or exclusively, but cumulatively) happens successively, Mark IV, 28, and does not consist in a mathematical point (as the Blessed Martin Chemnitz said); it is not surprising if that divine economy of grace, which we call the illumination of the intellect, and which God works resistibly through the preached word, does not happen in an instant. For there are many impulses of assisting grace, among which is also that by which the Holy Spirit works the perception of the literal biblical sense." Now...

Instance: If imperfect illumination is pedagogical, it will be natural. For pedagogical actions are done by the guidance of nature. Response. Pedagogy is one thing general, another special. The former is done by natural powers; the latter is done by the elevation of the intellect above natural powers. To this pertains the illumination of the intellect from the divine word, preparing man to conceive faith in Christ.

III. There is one soul in man, whose faculties (intellect and will) are distinguished not essentially, but virtually, or by their operation. Since, therefore, the harmony of the intellect and will is perpetual and intimate, the intellect cannot be illuminated without the will being simultaneously amended, nor can the will be healed without the intellect being simultaneously illuminated. For they perpetually conspire from one and into one. Response. 1) The harmony of the intellect and will after the fall is not necessary and perpetual. For the will is a free power, which, with all the requisites for acting present, among which is also the dictate of the intellect, can act and not act, or act in this or that way. The impulse of the affections often rages with great vehemence, which snatches the will away from the judgment of reason, so that it obeys not the intellect, but a depraved appetite; This is what the Medea of Ovid openly confesses in book 7 of the Metamorphoses:

"But a new force draws me against my will, and desire, persuades one thing, my mind another; I see and approve the better,

I follow the worse."

2) If, with the intellect illuminated, the will were immediately converted, illumination would be instantaneous; which we have abundantly proven to be false.

Instance: If, with the intellect illuminated, the will is not simultaneously converted, at the same point in time there would be an empire for God in the intellect, and for the devil in the will of man, which is absurd. Response. If God wished to exert his absolute and irresistible force, he would certainly cast the devil out of the human soul in one moment; but he uses an ordained and resistible power in converting man. Therefore, he gradually illuminates the intellect, so that with the progress of time the will may be freed from the captivity of the devil.

3. If the intellect is illuminated without the will being amended, that illumination will be vain and devoid of all fruit; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, also the antecedent. The consequence is proven; because the will of man, not being amended, but enslaved to depraved appetite, draws the intellect into consent by its force and vehemence, and imbues it with foul errors, which impede illumination. Response. I deny the consequence, because this only follows: If the intellect is illuminated without the will being amended, that illumination is not perfect and completely salutary, but imperfect and pedagogical. The will, serving a depraved appetite, impedes the completion, not the beginning and some progress, of illumination. Nor, however, should imperfect illumination be considered vain and sterile; since it is divinely ordained for correcting the will. Which it would also accomplish, unless the will maliciously and morosely struggled against it.

IV. Where the Holy Spirit is present, there He is whole, not half; there He also works wholly, and exercises all His acts; Therefore, whatever human heart the Holy Spirit illuminates, He at the same time converts, regenerates, justifies, and renews it. Response. Distinguish between the essence of the Holy Spirit and His operations. Where the Holy Spirit is present, there His whole essence is present, since He is 'ἀμερίστος', or indivisible; but He does not exercise all His operations at once and simultaneously; He does not pour out all the riches of His goodness at once and simultaneously, nor does He in one moment make a most wicked man into a saint.

V. Whoever cannot receive the Holy Spirit, cannot be illuminated; But the unregenerate, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from John XIV, 17: "The world cannot receive the spirit of truth." Distinguish between the assisting grace of the Holy Spirit and the indwelling grace. Whoever can receive neither the assisting nor the indwelling Holy Spirit, they cannot be illuminated; I grant. But although the unregenerate do not receive the indwelling grace of the Holy Spirit within a moment of time, they can nevertheless receive the assisting grace of the Holy Spirit, by which they are prepared and disposed to conceive faith in Christ, so that through this the Holy Spirit may dwell in their hearts.

Instance: Assisting grace is that which helps a renewed man, and cooperates with him; which grace does not precede, but follows indwelling grace. Response. By assisting grace here is not understood the grace that helps a renewed man, but assisting grace is spoken of when the Holy Spirit is working externally around the heart of man, not only by proposing the salvific Object and showing what ought to be done, but also by effectively touching, knocking, and stirring up, so that he may know the will of God, although he does not always do it, Apoc. III, 20.

VI. He who does not love his brother is not illuminated. But a man devoid of holiness does not love his brother. Therefore. The major is proven from 1 John II, 9, 10, 11;

"Whoever says he is in the light and hates his brother is still in darkness. Whoever loves his brother abides in the light, and in him there is no cause for stumbling. But whoever hates his brother is in the darkness and walks in the darkness, and does not know where he is going, because the darkness has blinded his eyes." Response. He who does not love his brother is not illuminated with a perfect and completely salutary illumination. He can, however, be imperfectly and pedagogically illuminated by divine grace. Perfect illumination is sufficient to generate faith that is effective through love, Gal. V, 6. But by imperfect illumination, the Holy Spirit intends to prepare and dispose a man to believe in Christ and love his neighbor; although this intended effect does not always follow because of the contumacy with which the sinner resists regenerating and renewing grace.

VII. He who does not love God has not known him, 1 John IV, 8, and therefore is not illuminated; A man devoid of holiness does not love God; Therefore. Response. He who does not love God does not know him with a practical and effective knowledge; he can, however, being prevented and stirred up by the Holy Spirit, know God with a theoretical and literal knowledge.

VIII. In whom there is no true knowledge of God, he is not truly illuminated by the Holy Spirit; But in a man devoid of holiness there is no true knowledge of God. Therefore. The minor is proven from 1 John II, 4: "Whoever says, 'I know him,' but does not keep his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." Response. In whom there is no knowledge of God that is true neither logically nor ethically, he is not illuminated by the Holy Spirit. But in an unregenerate man, insofar as he is imperfectly illuminated by the Holy Spirit, there can be a knowledge of God that is logically and formally true, although it is not true ethically and finally, i.e., although it is not led to the true practice and end intended by the Holy Spirit. He who from the light of supernatural revelation knows that God is one in essence and three in persons, his knowledge of God is logically and formally true; but if he does not apply it to placing trust in Christ the mediator, to loving and venerating the triune God, his knowledge is not true ethically and finally.

IX. He who is not light in the Lord is not illuminated; But an unregenerate man, etc. Eph. V, 8. Therefore. Response. He who is not light in the Lord is not perfectly illuminated;

I grant. For in order for a man to be light in the Lord, it is required that for the state of this life he be adequately illuminated, converted, reborn, justified, and renewed.

X. The soul that is not capable of heavenly wisdom is not illuminated by the Holy Spirit; But a malicious soul, etc. Wisdom 1, 4. Therefore. The soul that is capable of neither theoretical nor practical wisdom is not illuminated by the Holy Spirit; I grant. From imperfect illumination comes theoretical wisdom, by which God is simply apprehended and known, but not practical wisdom, by which God is so known that He is loved and worshipped.

XI. He who knows under the condition of doing the divine will that the doctrine of Christ is divine, cannot be illuminated without sanctification; But a sinner, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from John VII, 16, 17: "Jesus answered them and said: 'My doctrine is not mine, but His who sent me. If anyone wills to do His will, he will know of the doctrine, whether it is from God, or whether I speak on my own authority.'" Response. 1) To do the will of the Father in that passage does not mean to live holily. For who that is blind will walk holily? Must not the intellect first be illuminated? Must not one first judge of the doctrine, whether it is divine or not? Must not those things then be done to which the illuminated intellect, by knowledge of the doctrine, directs? And therefore, since the object of the dispute between Christ and the Jews is the doctrine of Christ, whether it is the doctrine of the heavenly Father; 'to' to do the will of the Father' must here be taken not absolutely, but restrictively, according to the subject matter, so that it means, by the will of the heavenly Father to search the scriptures of the O.T., and to compare the doctrine with them, to see if it is consonant with them. 2) By knowledge in that passage is understood a more abundant, fuller, and more illustrious knowledge of the doctrine of Christ.

XIII. Whoever is dead in sins, cannot be an illuminated man. But an unregenerate man is dead in sins; Therefore. The major is proven; because, just as a man who is naturally dead does not see with his bodily eyes, so a man who is spiritually dead sees nothing with the eyes of his mind; but he would see, if he were illuminated. The minor is clear; because a man receives the life of faith through regeneration, Gal. II, 20, but before that he was dead in sins, Eph. II, 5. Response. Whoever is dead in sins cannot be illuminated with a perfect and completely salutary illumination; for this is sufficient to arouse faith. However, a man, though spiritually dead, yet placed under the dispensation of assisting grace and the divine impulse, can be imperfectly and pedagogically illuminated. For although he does not yet have an internal vital principle in his soul, the Holy Spirit nevertheless works and is occupied extrinsically around his soul, touching, knocking, stirring up, and sending in the light of literal knowledge through the preached or read word. I prove this assertion of mine by the example of the Bishop of Sardis, who is mentioned in Apoc. III, 1, 3. He is called dead, and yet he is ordered to remember how he received and heard; From this I validly argue; Whoever is spiritually dead, and yet can remember what doctrine he received from the Lord through the ministry of the word, is imperfectly illuminated; But a certain man, though spiritually dead, but placed under the dispensation of assisting grace and the divine impulse, can remember what doctrine he received from the Lord through the ministry of the word; Therefore. I would compare such unregenerate people to those dead bones which the Prophet Ezekiel saw in chapter XXXVII, 7, which were moved externally by the wind, bound with sinews, covered with flesh and skin, with no spirit existing in them. Thus the assisting grace of the Holy Spirit touches, knocks, moves the hearts of the unregenerate from without, and instills in them a literal knowledge of the things to be believed, although they are destitute of the life of faith.

Question XI. How many kinds of illumination are there with respect to the subject, that is, the sinner?

Illumination with respect to man receiving the heavenly doctrine is either literal and pedagogical, or spiritual and completely salutary. The former is the operation of the Holy Spirit, by which, through his externally assisting and preparing grace, he instructs the intellect of an unregenerate man, who is indeed tending towards generation, with a literal knowledge of the things to be believed, and produces a historical assent to the gospel, so that he may be more and more disposed to receive saving faith; The latter is the operation of the Holy Spirit, by which, entering and inhabiting the contrite heart of man, he kindles in it a saving knowledge of the divine mercy founded on the merit of Christ, produces a trusting assent to the gospel, and confirms and seals the same with his internal testimony.

Obs. The distinction of illumination into literal and spiritual is used by orthodox theologians (*). Dr. DANNHAVERUS, about to judge accurately concerning the sin against the Holy Spirit, says in hodof. phænom. XI. p. 1419: "The sin against the Holy Spirit is a deliberate 'ἀπιστία' in a sufficiently illuminated man, Hebr. VI, 4, c. X, 26, 29. For no one would speak an insult to a king, unless he knew him to be a king. Sufficiently, I say, because 'ἅπαξ', i.e., perfectly, Hebr. IX, 26, whether that illumination was pedagogical, and only literal, or spiritual, joined with a 'γεύσας' of heavenly things, which, being neglected, by a later divine judgment turns into blindness." Dr. QUENSTEDT explains this solid distinction more clearly in System theol. part. II. p. 77: "Φωτισμός, or illumination, is either 'παιδαγωγική καὶ γραμματική', pedagogical, merely literal and external, when someone is instructed in the knowledge of divine truth, and is convicted of its certainty in his conscience, but does not yet have this known truth sealed in his heart by the seal of the Spirit, or confirmed by the gracious indwelling of the Holy Spirit; or 'πνευματική', spiritual, gracious and internal, when, that is, someone truly reborn not only has a literal understanding of the evangelical doctrine, but is at the same time a temple of the Holy Spirit, which He graciously inhabits; in fine, when the truth is not only known and acknowledged, but is at the same time corroborated and sealed by the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit graciously inhabiting the heart." Dr. SEB. SCHMIDIUS agrees with them in colleg. bibl. post. writing thus on p. 164: "Subjectively, it can be 'ψυχικός', an animal man, who understands something of the things which are of the Spirit of God; not as such, but as already imperfectly illuminated by the Spirit of God." What illumination Dr. DANNHAVER and QUENSTEDT called pedagogical and literal, the same Dr. SCHMID calls imperfect. To whom Dr. IOANN. ADAMUS OSIANDER adds his vote, in theol. positiva, Part. III, p. 19: "Grace is distinguished into assisting and indwelling. And indeed, that is assisting which still operates extrinsically, not because it does not touch the very heart of man, but because the Spirit, still working externally and not inhabiting, exerts its force, to which is assigned prevenient grace, which removes the natural incapacity, innate in all; preparing grace, which restrains the natural and actual resistance, opposed to spiritual things; finally, exciting grace, which instructs the mind with the literal sense, works assent, and contrites the heart. But it is called indwelling when the Holy Spirit himself enters the heart, changes and inhabits it." And in colleg. system. Part. IV. p. 335: "The first degree of prevenient and assisting grace is objective illumination, in the preaching of the word, either strictly or analogically so-called, with the application of the special object, revealed by grace, to the individual; The second degree of the same is the inhibition and restraint of actual and natural repugnance; The third, finally, is the dispensation of literal knowledge, and historical assent to the gospel, and also a general trust in God, and, through the law, contrition." Therefore, Dr. OSIANDER attributes to assisting grace both objective illumination and the dispensation of literal knowledge and historical assent. From more recent authors I add Dr. FECHTIUS in Tr. de ordine modoque gratiæ, p. 21: "The Holy Spirit illuminates and exercises his actions not only in the faithful, but also in the unfaithful to be prepared for faith."

Prob. Pedagogical illumination of the unregenerate is evident 1) from John 1:9: "Christ, the true light, which enlightens every man coming into this world." Which words Dr. FECHTIUS explains lucidly l.c. p. 21: "Christ, as much as is in him, through the ministry of the word, with all study and effort, and therefore with repeated acts, implants true knowledge of God in all who admit his operation, as far as they admit it.

(*) But after the controversy was moved and long agitated, it must be said very cautiously, and this distinction, which some have interpreted wrongly, should either not be used because of its ambiguity, or should be so explained that neither some internal light, besides the written letter, is understood by the name of spiritual illumination, nor is the efficacy of the Holy Spirit denied to literal knowledge, in the way that fanatical men speak of it abjectly, and have dared to attack the letter as if it were dead; concerning which caution to be observed, the blessed Author will admonish you shortly after, in the response to opposition I.

For the generality of the expression does not permit it to be understood only of that illumination which attains its completion in the full conversion of man. For was that young man not informed by Christ because after the information he 'went away sorrowful', he departed from Christ sad, because he could not retain his riches? Matt. XIX, 22. Is he therefore not illuminated by the Holy Spirit, who has received some light, although by his own fault he has not admitted all of it? Does the sun therefore not illuminate a room, because it either does not illuminate the whole of it, or does not illuminate all its parts equally? Balaam, taught by God concerning the Savior of the world, who would one day arise from Jacob, although he was an unbeliever, nevertheless calls himself 'העין' open of eye, or, what is the same, illuminated, who heard the words of God, and saw the visions of the almighty."

2. From 2 Pet. 1:19, where the word of God is called a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawns. That by 'το ποναύχμηρόν', a human heart, dark without the word of God, is to be understood, Dr. CALOV teaches in bibl. illustrat on this passage, fol. 1545. We argue; Whatever light shines in a dark place until the day of the knowledge of Christ dawns, that illuminates an unregenerate man; But the light of the divine word, etc. Therefore.

3. From Ps. XXV, 8: "Good and upright is the Lord; therefore he instructs sinners in the way." God is the highest good, and therefore communicative of himself; He is upright and just in himself, and most willingly wants to draw his creatures to justice; Therefore, he informs sinners (I speak with Dr. GEIER) both by the external prescription of the word and by internal preventient and subsequent grace, what way they ought to enter, that is, what they should believe, do, and omit.

4. From Eph. III, 9, where the Apostle asserts that he illuminates all men. Therefore, he also illuminated the unregenerate successively, and by repeated acts, until they conceived faith fully and savingly.

5. If no unregenerate person can be illuminated, no Jew, no Turk, no gentile can be converted; But they are not rarely converted; Therefore, they are truly illuminated. Since this illumination is not completed in one moment, but by degrees, by turns, by many acts, it disposes and prepares the Jew or Turk to conceive saving faith, a certain pedagogical illumination of a man not yet fully converted, but placed on the way of conversion, must certainly be granted.

You say: I. The distinction of illumination into literal and spiritual does not seem to be accurate, since literal illumination draws its origin from the assisting and preparing grace of the Holy Spirit. I respond in the words of OSIANDER: "Although the powers of assisting grace are new and spiritual; they are not such, however, except with respect to the efficient cause, the divine intention, and the end to be obtained, inasmuch as they proceed from the Holy Spirit and are directed to a spiritual end, although they do not yet constitute a man as spiritually alive." See OSIANDER colleg. systemat part. IV. p. 335. Spiritual illumination, therefore, is here called in a stricter sense that which makes a man spiritually alive, expresses itself more and more in him as in a temple of the Holy Spirit, and is sealed by the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit.

You say: II. There is no illumination of an unregenerate man; because the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, so that the illumination of the glory of Christ might not shine on them, 2 Cor. IV, 3. Response. We are not speaking of the obstinately contumacious unregenerate man, who, because he loves darkness more than light, by God's permission is so blinded by the devil that he maliciously closes the eyes of his mind to the light of the divine word; but of the sinner, unregenerate indeed, yet teachable, and admitting the light of the divine word, placed on the way of conversion, and therefore prevented by the Holy Spirit. This man is illuminated pedagogically, until the day of spiritual knowledge of Christ dawns in his heart.

Question XII. Should the sinner, pedagogically illuminated, aspire to spiritual illumination?

The sinner, placed on the way of conversion and pedagogically illuminated, should diligently and attentively read, hear, and meditate on the divine word, and entrust himself wholly to the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, until the light of spiritual wisdom, which can stand before the judgment of God, rises in his soul.

Prob. 1) From 2 Pet. 1:19: "We have the prophetic word more sure, to which you do well to pay attention, as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts." As Peter admonishes, we must pay attention to the divine word until the illumination of faith follows, and Christ, dwelling in the heart, pervades it, like a most brilliant morning star, with a more abundant light of saving knowledge.

2. A sinner is pedagogically illuminated for the purpose of being disposed and prepared for spiritual illumination, which not only illustrates the intellect, but also directs the will to the love of God and neighbor. If the sinner who is to be converted does not attain this spiritual illumination, his literal knowledge is not sufficient, not fruitful, not salutary, because it is not led to its due use, and therefore can be called finally false, because it is frustrated of the true end intended by God. Cf. Dr. FECHT, l.c. p. 22, § 46. To this pertains the words of St. John, 1st ep. II, 4: "He who says, 'I know him,' but does not keep his commandments, is a liar, and in him the truth is not"; And the words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. VIII, 2, 3: "If anyone thinks he knows anything, he knows nothing yet as he ought to know; but if anyone loves God, he is known by Him."

3. Literal knowledge, which is the effect of pedagogical illumination, cannot stand before the judgment of God. Christ indicates this in Matthew VII, 22: "Many will say to me on that day: 'Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name?' But then I will confess to them: 'I never knew you; depart from me, you workers of iniquity!'" And Luke XII, 47: "The servant who knew his master's will, but neither prepared himself nor did his will, will be beaten with many stripes."

4. Spiritual knowledge, which is the fruit of spiritual illumination, is effectively and completely salutary; from which it is called the science of salvation, Luke I, 77. For since this is the beginning of saving faith, it makes men not only wise before God, but also just. "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many," says the Lord, Isaiah LIII, 11. From which it is concluded that a sinner, placed on the way of conversion, should not rest or stop at literal and pedagogical illumination, but should strive and endeavor towards spiritual and salutary illumination.

You say: The literal knowledge of things to be believed is 1) true; because it conforms to Holy Scripture; 2) salutary; because it flows from the word of salvation and is ordained by divine intention for salvation; Therefore, the sinner can rest in it. I respond to I with the words of Dr. BREITHAUP, from instit. theol. p. 263: "Knowledge among the unregenerate can be true with a logical and literal truth, or with respect to the doctrine and the credible object; but not with respect to the divine nature and efficacy, under which the Holy Spirit wishes the objects of scripture to be known to the intellect and will; which, unless He can effect it, it happens that what is truth according to the letter is not truth according to the spirit." To II. Something is said to be salutary in two ways; a) by reason of its ordination or destination to salvation; in which sense a medicine is salutary in itself, which is destined to restore the health of the body; b) by reason of the actual bestowal of salvation; in which sense a medicine is called salutary which actually restores health. Literal knowledge is indeed divinely ordained to procure salvation; but it does not actually confer salvation. Therefore, although it can be called pedagogically salutary, it is not, however, effectively or completely salutary. Cf. Dr. FECHT l.c. p. 22, and Dr. BREITHAUP, in thesib. credend. p. 133, 134 (*).

Question XIII. What aids should a sinner use to be spiritually illuminated?

(*) So that we may finally bring together all that has been disputed thus far into one sum, this part of purer doctrine, concerning the illumination of man, not yet indeed born again, but yet reading and hearing the word, and perceiving its true meaning, proceeds from these principles: 1) The Word of God, committed to letters, is that single ordinary means, by the right use of which the Holy Spirit illuminates the mind of man and imbues it with the knowledge of divine truths; 2) The meaning of this word is and remains a divine and always one truth, whoever it may be who uses it with eyes or ears, and perceives it with the mind; 3) The efficacy of the word is always one and the same, although its effect is impeded by the fault of man; 4) Even the first movements, excited in the mind while reading or hearing, are the first effects which exist from that efficacy which is always in the word. Therefore, the illumination of a man not yet born again, as soon as he reads, hears, and perceives the word, is true, is divine, is efficacious, and not void of all effect, although it is only begun, to be continued daily, and to be perfected with its whole effect, which is entirely salutary.

To obtain spiritual illumination, three aids are required: Prayer a), meditation b), temptation c).

Prob. a. From Luke XI, 13: "The Father will give the Holy Spirit to those who ask." Since the salutary understanding of the divine word is not obtained without the grace of the Holy Spirit, we must pray constantly that God may give us the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of himself, and the enlightened eyes of the intellect, Eph. 1, 17, 18. Thus King David prays: "Open my eyes, that I may see wonderful things from your law," Ps. CXIX, 18.

Prob. b. From John V, 39: "Search the scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life, and they are the ones that testify of me." Just as miners of metals search the innermost caverns of the earth, and hunters track wild beasts in the hidden recesses of the forests; so Holy Scripture must be inspected not cursorily, but most deeply, that we may find the way to eternal life (which is Christ, John XIV, 6).

Prob. c. From Ps. CXIX, 71: "It is good for me that I was afflicted, that I might learn your statutes." Afflictions open the way to a practical and experimental knowledge of the divine statutes.

Question XIV. Does the illumination and regeneration of a sinner occur through purification, or the abstraction of the soul from creatures, and its conversion into itself?

The illumination and regeneration of a sinner does not occur through purification, or the abstraction of the soul from creatures, and its conversion into itself.

The antithesis is to 1) the Pythagoreans and Platonists, who held that before the soul can arrive at true wisdom, it needs 'καθα'ρσει', that is, a certain purification, by which the filth of the body and of the material senses might be cleansed from it. To purification they joined a kind of conversion of the mind into itself, which they wanted to be like an entrance or door to true wisdom; for they thought that the mind, conscious of its own powers, and freed from the bonds and filth of the body or matter, turns first of all into itself, the other things which are outside being, as it were, consigned to oblivion, and, as pertaining in no way to it, ejected from memory; this they called 'ἐπιστροφή' νείκε'αυτο'ν'. Finally, they added the last office of the mind, which they called 'ἀνοδόν', or ascent. For they wanted the mind, pure from all contagion of the body and liberated, having collected its powers as it were into itself, to desert these lower things, and be carried upwards, and to seek heavenly and divine things, and to strive to return to its own principle, and this they named its ascent. See SCHEFFER, philosoph. Italicam c. IX. p. 74 seqq. 2) The Mystics, who embraced the dogmas of the Pythagoreans and Platonists. MICHAEL DE MOLINOS very frequently inculcates this introversion in his manuduct. spirituali, book III, c. 2, p. 270: "The continual exercise of spiritual men is to enter into themselves, into God, with quiet and silence, because there is his center, habitation, and delight. They value this interior retreat more than discourse about God. They retreat into that interior and secret center of the soul, to know God and to receive his divine influence with fear and most loving reverence." And from what things the soul must be abstracted, the same author teaches in the same place on page 379, saying: "Know that he who desires to arrive at mystical science must deny himself and be alienated from five things: 1. creatures, 2. temporal things, 3. from the gifts of the Holy Spirit themselves, 4. from himself, and 5. he must lose himself in God. This last is the most perfect, because only that soul which can so alienate itself is the one which arrives at losing itself in God." This 'κα'θαρσιν' he also calls annihilation, by which a man makes nothing of himself and all things in the world, p. 382, and also interior solitude, which consists in the oblivion of all creatures, in alienation, and perfect nudity of all affects, desires, and thoughts, and of one's own will, ibid. p. 338. MOLINOS calls abstraction also interior mortification and perfect resignation, ibid. p. 304, about which he philosophizes thus: "You will never taste the delicious Manna of Apoc. 2, which no one knows except he who receives it, unless you perfectly conquer yourself, until you die in yourself; therefore resign yourself, and deny yourself totally." Introversion is also called by MOLINOS interior recollection of oneself, book I, c. 11, p. 92. WEIGELIUS greatly commends this introversion (Einkehr, oder Einkehrung) in Part II of his postil, p. 62: "If we could turn inward, and hear God in ourselves, we would come to an excellent light." And p. 67: "We in the New Testament are ourselves the temple, into it we should turn through fasting, watching, and praying, so we will also learn the things which no book nor man can teach us, until the last day." 3) The Quakers, whose leader in his Apology, p. 226, writes: "Souls ought to turn to that internal principle in themselves, as to a most excellent teacher, who can never be removed into a corner."

Exposition

Obs. I. We do not disapprove of all abstraction of the mind from foreign matters and secular cares in the actual use of the word, and in pious meditations and prayers. For prayers are not devout which a man's mouth recites while his heart is distracted by foreign and widely wandering thoughts. See Isaiah XXIX, 13. We reject that abstraction, or annihilation, by which the mind is abstracted from all creatures and from divine gifts, and loses its being in God.

Obs. II. We do not reprehend all resignation, since our theologians also teach a moderate and pious resignation (die Gelassenheit), which the Blessed SCRIVERUS elegantly described in his Spirituali thesauro animæ, Part. III, p. 1390: "Resignation is a fruit of faith, and a childlike confidence of the soul in GOD, by which it surrenders and yields itself wholly and entirely to his holy and gracious will, willingly and humbly submits to his fatherly providence and all-wise governance, and seeks and desires nothing else than that it may be everywhere and at all times, in love and sorrow, in good fortune and misfortune, in wealth and poverty, in life and death, a work of his grace and a vessel of his honor." But we disapprove of that resignation which denotes the stripping away of all affects, desires, and thoughts, which WEIGELIUS wishes to be the entrance and way to illumination, saying: "If I could be a child, or work as much as a clod, for only half an hour, I would become a prophet and an apostle," Part II, postil p. 229.

Obs. III. A distinction must be made between a descent into the heart or soul that is commemorative of sin or of a state of misery, and one that is exploratory of penitence and faith, and one that is apprehensive of an internal, immediately revealing light. Who would dare to reprehend a descent of the mind into itself that is commemorative of sin? The prodigal son, 'εἰς αὐτὸν ἐλθὼν', returning to himself, said: "How many of my father's hired servants have bread enough and to spare, but I perish here with hunger!" This return of the mind to itself pertains to the recognition of sin, without which there is no true penitence. To this descent into the heart God exhorts the Israelites, Isaiah XLVI, 8: "Return to your heart, you transgressors." But the descent into the soul that is 'δοξιατικὸς', or exploratory, belongs to all Christians, that they may test themselves, whether they have true faith, to which all the requisites of true faith belong. To this 'δοκιμασίαν' the Pauline exhortation rightly moves us, 2 Cor. XIII, 5: "Test yourselves, to see whether you are in the faith; examine yourselves." At present, the controversy is about 'ἐπιστροφῆς αὐτοῦ', or the introversion of the mind into itself, for the purpose of expecting and observing and apprehending an internal, immediately revealing light.

Confirmation

I. Whatever dogma rests on a false hypothesis, it is to be rejected; But the dogma of introversion into the inmost center of the soul, to observe and apprehend an internal light, immediately (without the concurrence of Holy Scripture) revealing, rests on a false hypothesis; Therefore. The minor is clear from the preceding question; because we have demonstrated most lucidly that there is no internal, immediately teaching light in the human soul at the present time.

II. Whoever finds the densest darkness in his heart, cannot be illuminated by introversion into the inmost recesses of the heart; But the gentile, destitute of the light of scripture, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Eph. V, 8, 18.

III. Whatever doctrine calls man away from the ordinary means of illumination, is not to be tolerated in the orthodox church; But the doctrine of the mystics, concerning introversion into the heart, to expect and observe an internal light, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because the ordinary means of illumination is Holy Scripture, 2 Pet. I, 19. To this external light the sinner who is to be illuminated ought to turn the eyes of his body and mind.

IV. Let that opinion by which enthusiasm is introduced into the church be alien from us; But by the opinion concerning introversion into the heart, to expect an internal light, etc. Therefore. The major is confirmed from the epitome of the Formula of Concord, p. 581: "We also reject and condemn the error of the Enthusiasts, who imagine that God draws men to himself, illuminates, justifies, and saves them immediately, without the hearing of the word of God and the use of the sacraments." But the mystics, turning their mind to the inmost depth of the heart, wish to be illuminated immediately.

V. Abstraction from all creatures is impious; Therefore, unbecoming for a pious Christian. The antecedent is clear; because also the human nature of Christ, Holy Scripture, with respect to the material aspect of its letters and syllables, and the sacraments, with respect to their external elements, are in the category of creatures.

VI. Mystical resignation is opposed both to divine worship and to the rational nature of man; Therefore, it is unbecoming for a Christian. The antecedent is clear; because God demands a worship not 'ἄλογον', but 'λογικόν', or rational, not 'ἀπαθή', destitute of affects, but 'παθητικόν', burning with pious affects, Rom. XII, 2, 11. But the resignation of the mystics is the stripping away of all senses, thoughts, and affects, and transforms man into a block, lacking sound reason.

Resolution

The adversaries object; I. Descent into the soul is commanded by the divine word, Isaiah XLVI, 8. But descent into the soul is introversion of the soul into itself. Therefore. Response. That descent into the soul which is done for the purpose that man may be immediately illuminated is commanded by the divine word, I deny. In the cited passage, what is understood is a descent into the soul that is commemorative of sins and misery.

II. Self-denial is commanded, Matt. XVI, 24. Abstraction from all external things is self-denial. Therefore. Response. I deny the minor. For self-denial is an act of the will, by which we postpone our own honor and convenience to the divine glory. But abstraction is an act of the intellect, by which the Mystics abstract the mind from the consideration of all creatures.

III. Those whose duty it is to test and prove themselves, must turn their mind into themselves. But it is the duty of Christians, etc. 2 Cor. XIII, 5. Response. Those whose duty it is to test and prove themselves for the purpose of being illuminated and regenerated, it is their duty to turn their mind into themselves; I grant. But true Christians are not to be illuminated or regenerated, but are illuminated and regenerated, and therefore their 'δοκιμασία' is not a means of illumination and regeneration, but is instituted by those who are illuminated and reborn for the purpose of being made more certain that they have true and living faith. Therefore, having instituted an examination within themselves, they test their faith against the touchstone of the divine word, whether it exhibits the requisite conditions, parts, and virtues in it, and expresses itself with the true fruits of living faith. For which reason the 'δοκιμασία' of Christians differs very much from the Pythagorean 'ἐπιστροφῆς αὐτοῦ'. The former belongs to an illuminated man; the latter to a man to be illuminated. The former is done according to the external word of God; the latter observes an internal and immediate light. The former is done by a reflex act of the mind, by which a man reflects upon his knowledge, and knows that he truly knows God and believes in him; the latter is done by a direct act of the mind, which is like an entrance and way to knowing God.

IV. Whoever is a temple of God can turn himself to the inmost depth of his heart, to seek God dwelling in him; But a true Christian, etc. 1 Cor. III, 16. Therefore. The major is confirmed by MICHAEL de MOLINOS, book I of the spiritual manual, 6, III, p. 52, from the soliloquies of AUGUSTINE, addressing God thus: "I, Lord, was wandering like a stray sheep, seeking you with industrious discourse outside, when you were within me. I was greatly fatigued that I might seek you outside of me; and you have your dwelling within me, when I desire and long for you. I was going around the streets and squares of this city of the world, seeking you, and I did not find you, because I was seeking in vain outside for him who was within me." Response. 1) An ignorance of the point at issue is committed. For the question is whether a sinner is illuminated and regenerated by the conversion of the mind into itself. But a true Christian, who is a temple of God, is already illuminated and regenerated. 2) Man as a wayfarer, by a direct act of the mind, seeks and finds God a) in the kingdom of nature, by observing the innate natural light and the documents of divine beneficence so lucid that they can be felt even by a blind man, Acts XVII, 28; b) in the kingdom of grace, by meditating on scripture, which testifies of Christ, John V, 39, and in which are found the salutary counsel of God, Acts XX, 17, the mysteries of God, revealed for our salvation, Rom. XVI, 25, and the riches of Christ, Eph. III, 8. But by a reflex act of the mind, a true Christian proves his faith, whether it is true and living, and thus inquires whether God dwells in him through it, which is what the blessed AUGUSTINE seems to have had in view.

Question XV. Should the supernatural and salutary light of God be awaited in silence?

Far from the supernatural divine light having to be awaited in silence, rather the external word of God, which is a most clear light, must be seriously preached, diligently heard, frequently read, and attentively considered, just as pious prayers, mixed with sacred hymns, are to be sent to heaven, so that the salutary light of knowledge may arise in our hearts, and subsequently take on greater increments.

The antithesis is of the Mystics, Weigelians, and Quakers. MOLINOS, the author of QUIETISM, especially commends silence, in book I of the spiritual manual, c. XVII, p. 146, saying: "There is a threefold kind of silence. The first of words, the second of desires, the third of thoughts. The first is perfect, the second more perfect, the third most perfect. By the first, which is of words, virtue is acquired; by the second, which is of desires, quiet is obtained; by the third, which is of thoughts, interior recollection. Not by speaking, not by desiring, not by thinking does one arrive at the true and perfect mystical silence, in which God speaks with the soul, communicates himself to it, and teaches it the most perfect and most sublime wisdom in its inmost depth." The same silence WEIGELIUS urges in his postil, P. II, p. 230: "Everything must come to a stillness, if I am to hear or perceive the divine in-speaking, that is, if I am to be enlightened or made a believer, then I must go into my little chamber, and go to a corner, and wait for GOD in a stillness; which waiting in a stillness the literal enthusiasts call fanaticism, or Schwärmerey." The Quakers in their public assemblies love silence, which CATON does not deny in his simple inquirer, p. 8: "When the Quakers convene, they wait for the Lord in his light, sometimes for a second or third hour, in silence. Sometimes, however, before it passes, some are moved by the Lord to say more or less, for the edification of others in the most holy faith." The Quakers call this silence the internal Sabbath of the soul, about which GEORGE KEITH, in his friendly response to Dr. BAIER, p. 14, writes: "From the exercise and use of the words of scripture, the faithful soul, following its internal teacher the Holy Spirit, diverts for a time into another kind of nobler exercise and life, as from labor into rest, and as it were from the six days' work into this most pleasant Sabbath, indeed from all its other exercises (both external and internal, where scripture has its distinguished place) it is snatched into this leisure, Sabbath, and as it were spiritual sleep with Jacob, where it sees the heavens opened, and as it were the angels of God ascending and descending." This internal Sabbath wonderfully pleases WEIGELIUS, who in part II of his postil, p. 86, says: "Give yourself often after your inward prayer into a silence, let GOD have his way with you completely from within and from without, come into a forgetting of yourself, so that GOD may find room and place to work and to enlighten you."

Exposition

Obs. 1. Since the mystics distinguish between the silence of words, thoughts, and desires, we certainly approve of the first, the silence of words; for meditations on the divine word within private walls love silence; but we disapprove of the silence of desires and thoughts.

Obs. II. It is indeed fitting for true Christians to have an expectation of divine help conjoined with silence, but not a silent expectation of immediately revealing light.

Obs. III. The doctrine of the internal Sabbath of the soul, insofar as it denotes 1) a cessation from the works of the flesh, 2) the rest of the soul in God, 3) meditation on divine benefits, 4) the desire and expectation of the eternal Sabbath, is retained and inculcated in our churches. See GERHARD in Schol. pietatis P. III. c. 28. But the internal Sabbath is rejected, insofar as it denotes a silence not only of words, but also of all thoughts and senses.

Confirmation

We confirm our assertion; 1) Those who are not illuminated by immediate divine revelations, it is not for them, having set aside external means, to expect in silence an immediately revealing divine light; But men living at the present time, etc. We have demonstrated the major and minor above.

2. Those whose duty it is to meditate on the law day and night, Ps. I, 2, to hear the word of God attentively, Matt. XI, 15, so that they may conceive faith from it, Rom. X, 14, to pray always and without ceasing, Luke XVIII, 1, 1 Thess. V, 17, to give thanks always for all things, Eph. V, 20, to converse about divine things, Col. III, 16, 1 Thess. IV, 18, it is not for them to expect in silence a supernatural, immediately teaching light; But for true Christians, etc. Therefore.

3. In whatever manner the Savior, teaching in person, and his Apostles celebrated sacred assemblies, in the same manner we today ought to institute ecclesiastical assemblies and perform public exercises of piety; But Christ was preaching, Mark 1, 39; while Peter was preaching, three thousand hearers were converted, Acts II, 41. The other Apostles also devoted themselves to prayer and the ministry of the word, Acts VI, 4. Therefore, their assemblies were not mute.

4. Whatever silence excludes both a perennial thought of God and a perpetual desire for divine grace, that is impious; But the silence of the mystics, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because it is our duty always to think of God and to long for his grace. See Ps. LXIII, 7, Isaiah XXVI, 8, 9. The minor is proven, because the mystical authors demand from the spiritual man a silence not only of words, but also of all desires and thoughts, so that he even intermittently suspends actual knowledge of God. BONAVENTURA, with MOLINOS citing and approving, l.c. 55, teaches that nothing should be thought of, not even of God himself; since it is an imperfection to hold forms, images, and species, however subtle they may be, whether of the will, or of goodness, of the trinity and unity, or even of the divine essence itself; since all those species and images, although they may seem godlike, are not God himself, who does not admit any image or form. The same author adduces, l.c. p. 53, THOMAS AQUINAS, persuading the silence of desires: "It is a great blindness," says THOMAS, "in many, who are always seeking God, continually sighing for God, frequently desiring God, daily crying out to God in prayer and knocking, when they themselves, according to the word of the Apostle, are the temple of the living God, and God truly dwells in them, since their soul is the seat of God, in which he continuously rests."

5. The Mystics and Quakers, while waiting in silence for an immediately revealing light, cannot escape the mark of Enthusiasm; because they imagine that God illuminates men immediately, without the hearing of the divine word and the use of the sacraments. Cf. F. Conc. p. 581.

Resolution

I. "A woman should learn in quietness," 1 Tim. II, 11, 12. Which Mary of Bethany did, Luke X, 39. Therefore, an argument can be formed: She whose duty it is to learn in silence, it is her duty to expect an immediately illuminating light; But it is the duty of a woman, etc. Therefore. Response. I deny the major. For it is indeed the duty of a woman to learn in silence, by reading or hearing the word of God committed to letters; which Mary of Bethany did, since she is said to have sat at the feet of Jesus, not in some fanatical quiet, but so that she might hear his word, l.c. v. 39; But it is not the duty of a woman to expect an immediate illumination in silence.

II. Jeremiah, Lam. III, 26, says: "It is good to wait quietly for the salvation of God." Therefore, a man should silently expect the internal illumination of God. Response. In that passage, the prophet's discourse is not about a silent expectation of light, but a patient expectation of help.

III. The Apostles were commanded to wait for the promise of the Father, Acts I, 4. Who also in Acts II, 1, are said to have all been in one place, with no one speaking; and then suddenly the Holy Spirit came: Therefore, today it is the duty of Christians to wait in silence for the illuminating Holy Spirit. Response. 1) The example of the Apostles is extraordinary; since they were illuminated immediately by the Holy Spirit, to teach all nations. But just as not all the faithful should be apostles, 1 Cor. XII, 28, so not all are illuminated immediately. 2) The Apostles awaited the promise of the Father not by keeping silence, but by praying and preaching constantly. Acts 1, 14, 15.

Instance: It is not necessary for those who are temples of the living God, and in whom God truly dwells and rests, to sigh to God continually, to cry out to God in prayer. For God knows their necessities and speaks in their hearts.

Response. Christ commanded us to pray always, Luke XVIII, 1, and Paul persuades us to pray without ceasing, 1 Thess. V, 17. But we present our desires to the present, heart-inhabiting, and omniscient God, not to inform the omniscience of the most present Deity, but to testify our faith that all good and perfect gifts descend from the Father of lights, James 1, 17.

IV. The friends of Job sat silent for seven days and as many nights. This was a long silent gathering, Job II, 13. Cf. Ezra IX, 4. Response. Job with his friends, and also Ezra, were silent for a time, not suspended in expectation of a light, but struck and stupefied with immense grief.

Terminus from which and to which.

Question XVI. What is the terminus of illumination from which and to which?

The terminus of illumination from which is the blindness of the intellect, filled with the darkness of ignorance and errors a). The terminus to which is the salutary light of knowledge b).

Prob. a. Unilluminated men are darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, due to the hardness of their heart, Eph. IV, 18.

Obs. I. In an unilluminated man, there is not only ignorance 'κατ' ἀποφασιν', of simple negation, but also ignorance 'κατὰ διὰ θεσιν', or of a depraved disposition, which is error, contrary to true science; because the 'ψυχικός', or natural man, not only does not apprehend the things of the Spirit of God, but also judges them to be absurd, 1 Cor. I, 14. Therefore, opposed to salutary knowledge is not only simple ignorance, but also 'φρονηματισσαρκός', the prudence of the flesh, Rom. VIII, 6, and the wisdom of this world, 1 Cor. I, 20. For the world has its wisdom, but it is immersed in the darkness of arrogance, so that it sets itself against the divine wisdom, 1 Cor. X, 4.

II. The impiety of life and 'πώρωσις', or the hardening of the will, follows from the innate and affected ignorance of the intellect.

Prob. b. From the law comes the knowledge of sin, Rom. III, 20. From the gospel proceeds the glorious knowledge of the grace of God in the unveiled face of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. IV, 6. Which knowledge is accompanied by assent, by which the illuminated man holds for certain and indubitable both everything that is revealed in the word of God, and especially the gospel concerning the remission of sins and eternal salvation to be obtained through Christ: This indubitable assent is called 'ἐλεγχος', the conviction of the intellect, Hebr. XI, 1.

Form of illumination.

Question XVII. In what, therefore, does illumination formally consist?

Divine illumination formally consists in the information of the Holy Spirit through the read or preached word of God, not only external, but also internal, and effectively penetrating the inmost recesses of the human heart, so that from it the darkness of ignorance and errors may be expelled, and the light of supernatural knowledge may be infused into it.

Prob. 1) Because God ordinarily illuminates a sinner, brought to the church, through the ministry of the word. This is clear from Eph. III, 8, 9: "To me, the least of all the saints, this grace was given, to preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to illuminate all men." Paul illuminated the Gentiles, not by immediately infusing the light of knowledge into them, but by informing them through the preaching of the gospel. Whence H. GROTIUS, commenting to explain the cited passage, says: 'φωτίζει, 'האיר' is to teach."

2. From Ps. CXIX, 130: "The hearing of your words gives light, giving understanding to the simple." Dr. GEJERUS, about to explain these words, says: "The preceding figurative expression, 'illuminates,' is explained by a proper term. For 'הבין', taken transitively, signifies, 'he caused to understand, he instructed.' Therefore, to illuminate is the same as to instruct, and illuminating grace is teaching, as DANNHAVER says in hodof phænom IX, p. 938. Moreover, when we describe illumination by information, we do not understand only the external information, which is done by the tongue or pen of a minister of the church, but also the internal, by which the Holy Spirit, with his special and gracious concurrence, in the hearts of hearers or readers who do not maliciously resist, through the preached or read divine word, kindles the light of supernatural wisdom. Illumination is therefore an internal information of the Holy Spirit, but not immediate; because it does not exclude the external ministry, but graciously concurs with it, and, inseparably united with the preached and read word, communicates to it the power of penetrating and illuminating hearts.

Question XVIII. Is the illumination of a sinner, called to the church, completed in one moment?

Successive illumination. Ordinary illumination is not completed in one moment, but occurs through intervals of time, by degrees, by acts often repeated, so that a man may be disposed and prepared to admit a greater light of truth from time to time, to such an extent that if he rejects the first degree of illumination, the Holy Spirit denies him the second; since it cannot have a place without the first.

Obs. I. We are speaking of ordinary illumination, not extraordinary. That God by a singular and extraordinary grace, and by absolute power, can fully illuminate a man in one moment, so that he has all the articles of faith known, we have no doubt; since it is established for us that the Holy Spirit infused the gift of tongues into the Apostles in one moment, Acts II.

Obs. II. Nor are we dealing here with the illumination of infants through baptism, which the Greek Fathers called 'φωτισμόν', since the manner in which the light of knowledge and of saving faith is kindled by the Holy Spirit in infants through baptism can neither be comprehended nor explained by us, as CHEMNITZ says, in exam. Conc. Trid. fol. m. 247. We assert that the ordinary illumination of adult men is not instantaneous, but successive.

Prob. 1) Every instantaneous action is irresistible; But the ordinary illumination of adult humans is not irresistible; Therefore. The major is clear; because no impediment can be placed in the way of an instantaneous action, e.g., Creation is an instantaneous action, since nothing can slow it down. The minor is evident; because men of a stiff neck resist the Holy Spirit, Acts VII, 51. They resist the ray of light by which they are to be penetrated. They do not turn their mind, but close it.

2. It is the nature of seed and the intention of the sower that not only should the blade sprout, but also that after the blade the ear, and after the ear the full grain in it should grow, Mark IV, 28. Thus God, scattering the good seed through his ministers into the hearts of men, ordinarily and always intends to confer a more intense degree of grace upon the hearers, even to completion.

3. When Christ had finished his discourse on the efficacious operation of the divine word according to God's institution, but with a diverse effect according to the diversity of the hearers, he exclaimed with a loud voice: "See how you hear! For whoever has (receives and retains the first degree of illumination), to him will be given (a further and more intense degree of light); but whoever does not have (does not receive and retain the more intense degree of knowledge), even what he thinks he has (concerning the first degree of illumination) will be taken away from him (by the judicial will of God)." Luke VIII, 18. Therefore, illumination happens not in an instant, but by degrees. Compare Dr. HULSEMANN, breu enucl. c. VIII, p. 456.

4. The gradual and successive illumination of adult men is most clearly evident from practice. A minister of the church, about to convert a Jew, strives with all effort and study to illuminate him. a) He teaches that the Messiah has already come; b) He demonstrates that this Messiah is not a mere man, but the true God and Son of God the Father, begotten from eternity; c) He convinces that this Messiah and 'θεοῦ υἱὸν' is Jesus of Nazareth, the son of the virgin Mary; d) Having established the duality of divine persons, he proves that the Holy Spirit is also true God; e) He instills in the Jew the doctrine of the priestly, prophetic, and kingly office of Christ; f) He shows that, on our part, for the remission of sins and the attainment of eternal life, true faith apprehending the satisfaction of Christ is required; g) He inculcates in him that justifying faith expresses itself through the sanctity of life. Therefore, the Jew is illuminated not in one moment, but through intervals of time, by degrees, by repeated acts. And if it should happen that the Jew obstinately resists the final step of information, by the just judgment of God the prior degrees of light will also be taken away from him.

Question XIX. What is the end of illumination?

The end of illumination. The proximate end of illumination is the conversion and regeneration of the sinner a). The ultimate end, on our part, is the immediate illumination to be obtained in the kingdom of glory b). The ultimate end, on God's part, is the glory of the divine illuminating grace c).

Prob. a. For this end, the eyes of sinners are opened through the ministry of the word, that they may turn from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, Acts XXVI, 18.

Prob. b. The servants of God (who were spiritually illuminated in this life) will serve him (in the city of God), they will see his face, and his name will be on their foreheads;

And there will be no night there, nor will they need a lamp or the light of the sun; because the Lord God will illuminate them, Apoc. XXII, 4, 5.

Prob. c. "Give thanks to the Father, who has made us fit to share in the inheritance of the saints in light," Col. I, 12. Thanks are to be given to the most merciful Father, who has made us, blind by nature and unfit for any good, fit for the participation of the heavenly inheritance promised to the saints, through the light of the gospel, by which he kindles the saving light of knowledge in this age, to bestow a more resplendent light in the age to come.

SUSPIRUM.

*P*raise Your GOD, O my soul! in whom is the fount of spiritual life, which all faithful souls live, tasting the sweetness of divine goodness. Therefore, they rejoice wondrously that, O GOD, author of light, in your light they see light, while they are advanced from grace to grace. Through the light of Your revealed word they attain to the light of faith, by the light of faith they aspire to the light of glory. Shine forth, O JESUS, most splendid morning star, in my soul! Expel from it the gloom of ignorance! Dispel the darkness of vices! Pour forth a clearer light of knowledge, a purer light of holiness, so that having beheld you through the mirror of the word on the path of this life, I may one day see you face to face in the heavenly homeland!

CHAPTER VI.
ON THE CONVERTING GRACE OF
THE HOLY SPIRIT, AND THE TRANSITIVE
CONVERSION OF THE SINNER.

Question I. Is conversion here taken in a transitive or intransitive sense?

CONVERSION AT PRESENT is taken in a transitive sense, and denotes the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit is said to convert the sinner, and the sinner is said to be converted a).

Intransitively accepted, conversion signifies an immanent and reciprocal act of the will, by which the sinner is denominated as converting himself b) (*).

Prob. a. Since at present we are engaged in unfolding the acts of divine applicatory grace, it is readily apparent that we are not yet considering professionally the intransitive conversion of the sinner, or his repentance. Moreover, that gracious action by which God converts the sinner is not

(*) Conversion in Latin is called a change, of whatever sort it may be, whether good or bad, and thus this name is valid in either direction, just as all vicissitudes, now bitter, now pleasant and salutary, are called conversions of things. Specifically, therefore, it is usually used for a good change of mind, which in Hebrew is called 'חליפה'. Ancient, and today known to few, is that power of the word, about which it is discussed thus in the Catech. mai. on the VI petition, p. 529: "There is a threefold temptation, or, as our Saxons long ago used to say, conversion." By now perpetual custom, Theologians use this name, conversion, in that signification which the word, reversion, obtains, if someone returns, or is brought back to his former condition, or to that place from which he had departed. In the same manner of speaking, the word 'שובה' and what is derived from it, 'תשובה' (which is not to be confused with this, 'משובה', for this always denotes an aversion, joined with perfidy and repugnance), are frequently used in the sacred letters, as are the Greek words 'ἀποτρίψων' and 'ἐπιστρέφω', of which the former indicates the terminus from which, and the latter the terminus to which. Both are written in Acts III, 19 and 26. This name, therefore, reversion, is a little more significant than that, although more customary, conversion. For besides the fact that the former is ambiguously stated, it should also be noted that the former indeed has a simple notion (for it denotes nothing more than a change); but the latter contains in itself a composite and duplicated notion, namely partly a recollection of man's perfidious defection and secession from God, partly a good and blessed change of mind, by which it happens that man recalls himself to the right way, or rather obeys the recalling God. Concerning both these notions, see Apoc. II, 5. Therefore, as often as we are commanded to return from sins, it is a certain deficient way of speaking, and the 'ἐλπίς' is to be supplied in this way: to God, from whom indeed we have been turned away, Isaiah LV, 7. For every terminus from which cannot be understood without a certain terminus to which. Both are commended to us in Acts XXVI, 18. The so-called intransitive reversion of man, in the language commonly used in the sacred letters, is called not only 'תשובה' and 'שובה', but also inconveniently called transitive conversion, because it does not terminate in the agent God himself, but passes from him into another subject, namely into the sinner: To which action corresponds a passion, by which the sinner, not morosely rejecting converting grace but passively admitting and receiving it, is said to be converted by the Lord, according to that of Jeremiah chapter XXXI, 28: "Convert me, O Lord, and I shall be converted." God actively converts, the sinner is 'passively' converted by God; but the active conversion of God and the passive conversion of the sinner are, as to the thing, one and the same conversion; which, with the connotation of God as agent and insofar as it proceeds from him, is called active; with the connotation of the subject, or man, and insofar as it is received by him, is called passive.

Prob. b. Intransitive conversion is the terminus and effect of transitive conversion, and is repentance itself, by which the sinner, through powers conferred by converting grace and passively received, is said to convert himself, just as a ship is said to turn itself not by its own powers, but by the powers of the sailors. The repentance of the sinner is rightly called intransitive conversion; because it does not pass into another subject, but terminates in the sinner himself. The words of Peter, Acts III, 19, deserve to be noted concerning intransitive conversion: "Repent therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." For which reason the sinner, by repenting, converts himself with powers not native, but given.

Question II. In how many senses is transitive conversion taken?

Transitive conversion, by which God converts the sinner, is taken in a general, a special, and a most special sense.

Question III. What divine action is denoted by general conversion?

Transitive conversion, by which the sinner is converted by God, taken in a general sense, embraces in its scope illumination, aversion from sin, regeneration, justification, and renewal.

Prob. Conversion in a general sense is taken in the solid declaration of the Formula of Concord, p. 675: "This is most certain, that in true conversion a change, renewal, and movement must occur in the intellect, will, and heart of man; namely, that the mind of man may acknowledge its sins, fear the wrath of God, turn itself away from sin, acknowledge and apprehend the promise of grace in Christ, agitate pious thoughts in the mind, have a good purpose, and apply diligence in ruling its morals, and fight against the flesh. For where none of these things happen, there without doubt is no true conversion to God. But since the question is about the efficient cause, that is, who works these things in us, whence man has this very thing, and how he can obtain it; This pious doctrine shows the source of these good things in this way. Since the natural powers of man can contribute nothing to true conversion, nor bring any aid, God in his ineffable goodness and mercy prevents us, and causes the gospel (through which the Holy Spirit wishes to work and perfect conversion and regeneration in us) to be announced, and through the preaching and meditation of his word, he kindles faith and other virtues of piety in us." Most theologians abstain from this broader meaning of conversion, since confusion and error can easily creep into incautious minds from it; indeed, distinct acts of grace are thus joined together under one word.

very often 'μετανοία'. 'Μετανοεῖν' is to change one's mind, or rather, as others prefer, to be wise after having erred, which is also signified by the Latin word, resipiscere. Although in this interpretation of the name a certain ellipsis is to be assumed, so that the error, or evil deed, is understood, yet this very explanation seems more convenient to the perpetual use of the word than that other one, a change of mind. For the word 'μετανοία' is never used otherwise than in a good sense, if someone repents of his error; but that name, change of mind, is not free from ambiguity, since one change is for the worse, another for the better. It is also called 'μεταμελῖα', since we demonstrate against BELLARMINE that this word is sometimes used for the reversion of man to God, with a most lucid testimony indeed, Matt. XXI, 9, 32. Nor indeed should it be concealed that there is some difference between 'μετανοίαν' and 'μεταμελῖαν', especially this, that 'μετανοία' is never not taken in a good sense, concerning a true, whole, and salutary conversion of the mind, but 'μεταμελῖα' is sometimes in a bad sense, concerning a false conversion, Matt. XXVII, 3.

Question IV. What is transitive conversion, accepted in a special sense?

Transitive conversion, taken in a special sense, is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit excites in a sinner a serious sorrow for his sins by the word of the law, and by the word of the gospel kindles true faith in Christ, so that he may obtain the remission of sins and eternal salvation.

Obs. I. Of conversion, accepted in a special sense, the terminus from which is the state of sin, which is the most miserable condition of the sinner, who has neither morally retracted his sin, nor obtained pardon, or remission of sin; The terminus to which is the state of faith, which is the better condition of the sinner, who seriously detests his sins with sorrow of mind, but flees to Christ, the only mediator between God and men, apprehends his merit and satisfaction, and presents it to God, the most just judge, as a most valid ransom ('ἀντιλυτρον') for his own sins and those of the whole world, and, lifted up by this trust, he asks for the pardon of his sins from Him.

Obs. II. The medium of conversion, accepted in a special sense, is the divine word, and that both the word of the law, by which contrition is excited, and the word of the gospel, by which faith in Christ the mediator is kindled.

Obs. III. The common synonym of conversion specifically so-called is considered to be regeneration. However, Dr. KOENIGIUS in theol. posit. Part. III, §. 451, has observed some difference between conversion and regeneration; According to his opinion, these two differ 1) with respect to their subjects: For regeneration is of adults and infants; but conversion is of adults at least; since infants are indeed regenerated, but are not equally commonly said to be converted (unless someone perhaps with the Blessed DANNHAVER wishes to attribute to them some analogue of conversion and penitence. See hodos p. 1269); 2) with respect to the means: Regeneration happens through the word and the sacraments, conversion through the word alone. Someone could add 3) conversion happens through the law and the gospel; regeneration only through the gospel.

The special acceptance of conversion is proven; 1) because God, by opening the eyes of sinners through the ministry of the word (illuminating them), converts them from darkness to light, Acts XXVI, 18. Where by darkness we do not understand precisely the ignorance of the mind, nor by light, knowledge, so that those words might present a fuller description of illumination; because the succinctly delineated tables of Paul's vocation do not admit of 'περισσολογίαν', but rather by 'σκοτός', darkness, are designated the works of darkness, Rom. XIII, 12, Eph. V, 11; but by light is denoted the light of faith, which not rarely in the sacred letters comes under the name of light, Matt. V, 16, Eph. V, 8, 1 John II, 9, 11, and believers are called sons of light, Luke XVI, 8, John XII, 36, 1 Thess. V, 5. Conversion is therefore transitive and specifically so-called, by which God converts a sinner, an act of grace by which the Holy Spirit turns a sinner away from the works of darkness, by working a detestation of sins, and pervades him with the light of faith.

Prob. 2) Man is converted so that his sins may be blotted out, Acts XI, 19. And to the Gentiles God gives repentance unto life, Acts XI, 18. Therefore, by converting grace, besides active contrition, faith in Christ is conferred, without which neither the remission of sins nor any spiritual life is obtained.

Question V. What is conversion taken in the most special sense?

Conversion taken in the most special sense is the act of grace by which the Holy Spirit inhibits, breaks, and contrites the will and heart of a sinner in the midst of the state of sin, so that he may detest his sins with sorrow of mind, and thus be prepared to conceive saving faith in Christ.

Prob. 1) The strictest signification of conversion is conformable to scripture, which is accustomed to call that act by which the heart of a sinner is contrited, conversion. Thus the people of Israel pray: "Convert me, O Lord, and I shall be converted (with a passive conversion); for after I am converted (passively), I will repent" ('μερικῶς' taken, for contrition), "and after it is shown to me, I struck my thigh; I am ashamed and I blushed" (behold! still acts of contrition) "because I have borne the reproach of my youth," Jer. XXXI, 12. And God, exhorting the Israelites to repentance, says: "Return to me with all your heart, with fasting, with weeping, and with mourning. So rend your hearts and not your garments; Thus (I say) return to the Lord your God," Joel II, 12, 13.

2. Just as there is one act of applicatory grace by which God works contrition, and another act of grace by which He gives to the contrite sinner trust based on the merit of Christ: So the former act is conveniently called conversion (most strictly taken), and the latter act of grace, regeneration. God converts the sinner through the law, He regenerates through the gospel. Contrition is the effect of converting grace, faith is the effect of regenerating grace. Repentance, taken 'ὁλικῶς' (consisting of contrition and faith), is the effect of both acts of grace, namely conversion and regeneration, flowing together to produce one 'ἀποτε'λεσμα'. For repentance is a divine 'ἀποτε'λεσμα'. For it is not properly a virtue or a habit, but an act, composed of contrition and faith, and therefore an 'ἀποτε'λεσμα', a salutary theriac against the plague of sin, as Dr. DANNHAVER says in hodos p. 1265.

3. In the order of nature, conversion precedes, regeneration follows; which order scripture retains, when it describes conversion by the removal of the heart of stone, and regeneration by the bestowal of a heart of flesh, Ezech. XI, 19, c. XXXVI, 26. It expresses the former by the rending of the heart, Joel II, 13, Ps. LI, 19, and the latter by the healing of a broken heart in the prophetic style, Isaiah LXI, I.

4. Practice itself shows this equitable order of grace. The most wise God, about to convert the fallen first parents of the human race, preached the law to them, so that, struck by this thunderbolt, they might tremble and grieve; to the fearful and contrite he preached the gospel, so that he might regenerate and justify them, Gen. III, 7, 8 seqq. The hearers of Peter, having heard the apostolic sermon, were cut to the heart, and said to Peter and the rest of the Apostles: "What shall we do, men and brethren?" (behold the grace of conversion through the law!) Peter said to them: "Repent" (that is, active contrition, which followed passive conversion!), "and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ" (by which words regeneration through baptism is expressed), "for the remission of sins" (thus justification immediately follows regeneration). Acts II, 38.

5. The Formula of Concord accurately distinguishes the converting and regenerating grace of God on p. 662: "Man is illuminated, converted, regenerated by the Holy Spirit." And p. 681: "The intellect and will of a man not yet reborn are only the subject to be converted. For they are the intellect and will of a man spiritually dead, in which man the Holy Spirit works conversion and renewal. To which work the will of the man being converted contributes nothing: But it suffers God to work in it (now regeneration follows as the terminus of conversion) until it is regenerated." In this strictest signification, the word 'conversion' is used by Dr. CARPZOV in isagog. p. 1244, B. HOEPFNERUS loc. theol. p. 451, Dr. NEUMANN in disput. de nexu & discrimine donorum gratiæ §. 13.

You say: Conversion through the law is not an act of grace, but of vindictive justice, because the law works wrath, Rom. IV, 15. Response. The law, good and holy in itself, works wrath by the fault of men who transgress the precepts of the law, by accusing and condemning their sins; but this operation of the law is directed by the most merciful God to a salutary end for man. Dr. J. MUSÆUS teaches this excellently in disput. II de convers. c. III. edit. Jena, p. 80: "The law is a certain organ of divine grace, operating in a sinner, softening his hard heart, preparing and disposing it for faith, to be kindled in it by the voice of the gospel."

Ordinary and extraordinary conversion.

Question VI. How many kinds of conversion are there?

Conversion is twofold, ordinary and extraordinary. The former is that by which God, by means of the word of the law, in the usual way and manner, leads a sinner to the detestation of sins a). The latter is that by which God, either immediately or by miracles, so strikes a sinner that he seriously grieves for the sins he has committed b).

Prob. a. Ordinarily, God breaks men with the hammer of the law, Jer. XXIII, 29, and hews them by the Prophets, or the duly called and ordained ministers of the church, Hosea VI, 5, Acts XXVI, 17, 18.

Prob. b. Extraordinarily, God converts sinners, either by addressing them immediately, or without the intervention of his ministers; in which way Abraham was converted, Gen. XII, 1, the thief on the cross, Luke XXIII, 42, Paul, Acts IX, 3, 4; or by supporting his word and the ministers of the word with miracles and signs, where, however, that converting power is to be ascribed not to the miracles and signs, but to the divine word. Thus the miracles which accompanied the death of Christ struck the centurion and others standing by the cross, so that they beat their breasts, Luke XXIII, 48.

Question VII. How many kinds of ordinary conversion are there?

First and second. Ordinary conversion is twofold, first and second. The former is the action of the Holy Spirit, by which he contrites and softens the hearts of unbelieving men, and those established outside the church, through the word of the law, for the kindling of saving faith in Christ in them by the voice of the gospel a). The latter is that by which the Holy Spirit calls back to repentance sinners who indeed live in the bosom of the church, but have fallen from the state of regeneration by committing deliberate sins b).

Prob. a. God gave repentance unto life to the Gentiles also, Acts XI, 8. God calls Gentiles, Turks, Tartars, Jews to the church of Christ, and in this workshop of the Holy Spirit he illuminates them, and breaks their ferocity with the hammer of the law, so that they may be prepared to receive faith in Christ.

Prob. b. Men living within the boundaries of the church make shipwreck of the faith through sins that lay waste the conscience, 1 Tim. I, 19, and fall from the grace of God, Apoc. II, 5. God calls these back to repentance, "Return, backsliding Israel!" says the Lord, "For I will not cause my face to fall (in anger) upon you; for I am merciful," says the Lord. "I will not keep (my anger) forever. Only acknowledge that you have transgressed against the Lord your God." Jer. III, 12, 13. The conversion of these is called the second conversion, also the conversion of the relapsed.

God a), the Father b), the Son c), and terminatively the Holy Spirit d).

Question VIII. Who converts man?

The efficient cause of conversion. Prob. a. Conversion, on the part of the operating God, is active; on the part of the converted man, merely passive. For God alone circumcises the heart, Deut. XXX, 6, takes away the heart of stone, Ezech. XI, 9, c. XXXVI, 26, and gives repentance for the knowledge of the truth, 2 Tim. II, 25. Therefore, God alone actively converts, so that man is passively converted, Jer. XXXI, 18, Lam. V, 21.

Prob. b. God the Father commands all men everywhere to repent; because he has appointed a day on which he will judge the world in righteousness, by the man whom he has destined, Acts XVII, 30. Obs. When God the Father commands sinners to repent, he at the same time offers and confers the efficacy of conversion, unless they maliciously resist.

Prob. c. Christ is said to turn away impiety from Jacob, Rom. XI, 26. Who, having fulfilled the prophetic office in the flesh, began to preach: "Repent and believe the gospel!" Mark 1, 15. Christ stands at the door of the heart and knocks, exciting the sinner to repentance with the hammer of the law, Apoc. III, 20.

Prob. d. The Holy Spirit convicts the world of sin, he convinces that 'ἀπιστία', or unbelief, by which Christ the mediator is rejected, is the greatest sin, John XVI, 9. (*)

Question IX. By what means does God convert a sinner, so that he detests his sins?

God converts a sinner by the word of the law, so that he detests his sins with serious (*) Every sin, strictly and properly so named, is 'ἀνομία', a defection from the law, strictly so called. But 'ἀπιστία', and indeed that by which one rejects the merits of Christ, is contempt for the saving grace offered to us not in the law, but in the Gospel. Sometimes, however, the name of law is used in a broader sense, so that it generally denotes a declaration of the divine will to be observed by men, which pertains partly to receiving benefits, partly to performing duties. And the former is the evangelical will, the latter the legal will, insofar as the law in a stricter sense is distinguished from the Gospel; just as Paul taught us the distinction of 'νόμος πίστεως' and 'τοῦ μετῴντων', Rom. III, 27. Therefore, that 'ἀπιστία' by which a man repudiates Christ as his surety is called a sin not strictly, but broadly; but it is the one greatest of all, because it is contrary to the greatest of all God's benefits. As for that saying of Christ, John XVI, 9, I think this is its meaning: that 'ἀπιστία', which is hostile to Christ, is not itself a sin, but is absolutely the cause of permanent sin, both with respect to guilt and punishment, because remission of sins cannot happen to a man, John III, 36, VIII, 24; and also with respect to dominion, because a man cannot but serve sin, who, with a blinded mind, does not want to know Christ, John VIII, 34, 36, IX, 41.

sorrow of mind a), and is prepared to conceive faith in Christ from the word of the gospel b).

Prob. a. 1) Just as the knowledge of sin is from the law, Rom. III, 20, so also is sorrow for sin, which follows the knowledge of sin. 2) The law works wrath, Rom. IV, 15, by accusing sins, by denouncing a curse on transgressors of the law, and thus by striking terror into them. For which reason it is also said to kill and condemn, 2 Cor. III, 6. But the law kills, not so much in the manner of a physical cause, as a moral cause; not so much by destroying us, as by adjudging and condemning us to death; although it is also said to kill as a physical cause in that it contrites and mortifies our hearts, so that they feel nothing but death and that we must perish eternally, being prostrated by the blow and thunderbolt of the law, unless grace comes to our aid. Thus Dr. CALOVIUS aptly says, explaining the cited passage in bibl. illustr. fol. 443.

Prob. b. The law is a pedagogue to Christ, Gal. III, 24, who is said to be the end of the law, Rom. X, 4. God has sanctioned this order, that the stony and iron hearts of sinners should be broken by the divine law as by a hammer, and softened as by fire, see Jer. XXIII, 29, and prepared to conceive faith in Christ, and through him to obtain the remission of sins. Dr. CHEMNITZ inculcates this order in exam. concil. Trid. fol. m. 155: "There is altogether a certain order, or manner, designated and prescribed in the word of God, which God uses when he wishes to lead a man to justification, so that he may receive reconciliation, remission of sins, adoption, etc. And those who do not want to accommodate themselves by the guidance of the Spirit to that manner or order divinely prescribed, but neglect and trample upon it, these do not arrive at justification; for God wishes us to begin from the knowledge and assent of his word. And before justification, contrition must precede, that is, a serious recognition of sins, terrors of conscience acknowledging the wrath of God against our sins, and grieving because of sin; in which contrition the purpose of persevering and continuing in wickedness is not retained, but cast off." To these terrors, however, it is necessary that faith be added, which, by the recognition and trust of the mercy of God promised for the sake of the son, the mediator, again raises up and consoles the soul, lest, oppressed by desperation, we rush into eternal destruction; but that faith may approach God, seek, desire, ask, apprehend, and receive the remission of sins. And in this manner, or order designated in the word of God, a way is prepared for the Lord, so that in him, through and for his sake, by faith we may obtain and receive justification, as scripture itself teaches. For thus the voice cries: "Prepare the way of the Lord," Isaiah XL, 3, Matt. III, 3, Mark I, 3, Luke III, 4. And concerning the ministry of the baptist, preaching the baptism of repentance, Gabriel says, Luke I, 17: "To make ready for the Lord a people prepared." DANNHAVER rightly explains this order in hodo. phenom. XI. p. 1260: "The divinely required order on our part demands repentance, first required in the preaching of Christ and the apostles, to level the way for God. This order, divinely intimated in the first sermon of Christ: 'Repent and believe the gospel!' Mark I, 15, is on the part of man not dispositive, let alone meritorious, but pedagogical and in a sound sense preparatory, by which the way is prepared and leveled for the Lord, Matt. III, 3, and privative, removing, prohibiting, just as in surgical medicine the removal of pus precedes; removing, I say, the incapacity and the obstacles to the remission of sins, namely the opinion of not being in need, and the zeal for continuing in sins, John IX, 41, Isaiah LXVI, 2, Apoc. III, 17."

Question X. What ministers does God use in the conversion of sinners?

In the conversion of sinners, God ordinarily uses sacred preachers, decently called a); extra-ordinarily, any pious Christian can call back an erring person to the way b).

Prob. a. From 1 Cor. III, 9: "We are God's fellow workers." Sacred preachers are called fellow workers of God, not from an innate faculty, but from grace granted by God, 1 Cor. XV, 10. They are fellow workers of God, not as if they were associate causes with God in the business of conversion, but because they are subordinate and less principal, or ministerial, causes.

Prob. b. James V, 20: "Let him know that whoever brings back a sinner from the error of his way will save his soul from death and will cover a multitude of sins."

The antithesis is of the Schwenckfeldians, who derogate the efficacy of converting from both the divine word and the ministers of the word. Who strive to confirm their opinion with the following two arguments:

I. God works all in all, 1 Cor. XII, 6. Therefore, he does not need fellow workers. Response. In the business of conversion, God works all things not immediately, but by means of the sacred ministry, to which he has granted ministerial gifts.

II. "Neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but only God who gives the growth," 1 Cor. III, 7. Therefore, in the business of conversion, the minister of the church is of no value. Response. a) The ministers of the church are of no value outside of their office, insofar as they are not subordinated to Christ. b) In their office, they are indeed of some value, because they are dispensers of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. IV, 1. However, they refer that value back to Christ as the head and source. Whence in their office, comparatively (a comparison being made to Christ), they are of no value.

Question XI. Who is to be converted?

To be converted is the adult man, turned away from God by mortal sins a), whose will, prone to sins, is struck by the thunderbolt of the law, so that he detests them b), and whose sensitive appetite is so pierced by the sword of the law that it is moved to a serious sorrow for sins c).

Prob. a. Properly, an adult man is said to be converted; since he is capable of hearing, reading, and meditating on the divine law, as well as of detesting sin; since infants are destitute of this capacity by reason of their age, they are indeed regenerated by baptism, but are not equally commonly said to be converted. Moreover, an adult man is either joined to God by faith and reborn, or is turned away from God by unbelief and mortal sins and is unregenerate. 'Ακριβώς speaking, a man turned away from God is said to be converted, whom iniquity has separated from God, Isaiah LIX, 2. There is indeed also a repentance of the standing, or of reborn and faithful men, who still persist in the state of rebirth and grace; because, however, they have sins which they ought daily to acknowledge, detest, and grieve for, they are for this reason rightly said to be capable of conversion from sins. But it must be confessed that the name of conversion is then taken more generally, which in its more special meaning has for its subject only the wicked man, who is constituted in potency to his conjunction with God, but is not actually conjoined. See BAIER, Comp. Part. III, c. IV, p. 729 (*).

Prob. b. The will of an unregenerate man is so headlongly carried into evil, prohibited by the divine law, that it cannot be subjected to the law even by a natural passive power, Rom. VIII, 7. Yet the will of an unregenerate man is the 'subject-in-which' of conversion; because in it there is a passive potentiality of obedience, by which it is apt to receive converting grace and supernatural powers to retract sin morally and to cast off the purpose of continuing in illicit acts.

Prob. c. The sensitive appetite rages, indulging in inordinate affections, unless it is divinely pierced. The hearers of Peter 'κατενύγησαν τῇ καρδίᾳ', were cut to the heart, Acts II, 37. Their heart, the seat of the affections, was lacerated with such great sorrow, as if it had been pierced by a needle or transfixed by a lance.

Obs. Some authors refer also the intellect of an unregenerate man to the 'subject-in-which' of conversion; who do not distinguish the act of illumination from the act of conversion. But since for us illumination is a peculiar act of applicatory grace, we suppose at present that the intellect, illuminated by the word of God, recognizes the foulness of sin, and holds a torch for the will, which is blind in itself.

The antithesis is of the Pelagians, Papists, Socinians, and Arminians, who attribute an active power of converting to the human will; most of whose arguments we considered in Part II, c. V. A few remain to be examined here.

I. Whoever converts himself has active powers to elicit his own conversion; But an unregenerate man, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because to convert oneself denotes an immanent and reciprocal act, which presupposes an active power. The minor is proven from Acts III, 19: "Repent and be converted." Response. Whoever converts himself by his own natural powers has active powers to elicit his conversion. But (*) If by the name of conversion a change is signified, there is no doubt that a man born again daily changes his mind, for every day he reproves himself, grieves for the sins of infirmity, and more and more corrects himself. But if what is understood is a reversion from sins to God, this does not pertain to him who already enjoys conjunction with God, but is proper to the wicked man, whose mind is indeed still turned away from God, Acts III, 19, 26, XXVI, 18.

an unregenerate man does not convert himself by natural or his own powers, but by supernatural powers, granted through the converting grace of the Holy Spirit, and passively received by the unregenerate man, just as a ship is said to turn itself not by its own powers, but by the powers of the sailors and the winds.

II. Whoever is converted not necessarily, but freely, his will can actively determine itself to conversion; But a sinner is converted not necessarily, but freely: Therefore. The major is proven; because if a man were determined to his conversion by another principle than his own will, he would be converted not freely, but necessarily. For whatever is determined to one of two opposites is no longer free, but necessary. The minor is established; because a sinner is not converted by a necessitating grace, or one inflicting any violence, and therefore freely. Response. I deny the major; because a sinner is indeed converted freely negatively, inasmuch as he can prevent himself from being converted; but not positively, as if his will could dispose or determine itself to conversion by its own powers; for a sinner is spiritually dead before he is regenerated, Eph. II, 5, and therefore is destitute of active powers. Then, to the proof, we say that a man is indeed determined by converting grace, but acting by a resistible power, which has no necessary, but only a hypothetical necessity as its companion. But this does not take away freedom, but can coexist with it.

III. God so converts man that yet not God, but man repents; Therefore, the supply of powers is indeed from God, but their exercise is of man, who as a particular cause actively determines himself to the act of conversion; because otherwise it would follow, if both the powers and their exercise were ascribed to God, that man would be denominated from such an exercise. Response. Repentance is considered either with respect to its origin, or with respect to the receiving subject. Repentance with respect to its origin is from transitive conversion, by which God gives not only the powers to repent, but also repentance itself, Acts XI, 18. The suffering subject that receives the supernatural powers is the sinner, who, having been passively converted by God, repents, by exerting, exercising, and lucidly showing the received supernatural powers. It is illustrated by an analogy. Christ, resuscitating the dead Lazarus, bestowed on him both the powers of living and life itself; yet Christ was not called living from this conferred life, but Lazarus, because he used the granted powers of living. Thus the Holy Spirit both confers the powers of repenting, and by a special influx brings the conferred powers into act, so that yet not the Holy Spirit, but the sinner is said to repent; because he uses the conferred powers of repenting.

Question XII. Does God want to convert all men, even the hardened?

The most merciful God, by his antecedent will, wants to convert all men, even the hardened a), from whom by his consequent judicial will he indeed withdraws regenerating, justifying, and sanctifying grace, but does not cut off the common grace for all b), by which, throughout the entire span of time in which they run the course of this life, he invites them to repentance and effectively calls them back c), so that not a few of the hardened are converted d). But those who maliciously resist the Holy Spirit until the end of life and die in impenitence, rush into eternal destruction from their own voluntary fault, not from a divine decree absolutely denying converting grace e).

Obs. 1. When we assert the universal converting grace of the Holy Spirit, we are not speaking of the consequent will of God, by which he decreed to save those who finally believe and to condemn those who are finally impenitent; but of the antecedent will of God, by which God offers to all men sufficient and efficacious means of conversion, both by inviting sinners, established outside the church, to the kingdom of grace and thus to repentance, and by calling back to repentance those who live in the external communion of the church but have lapsed from the state of regeneration by deliberate sins.

Obs. II. Revoking grace is that which, after the first grace has been lost through relapse, the Holy Spirit being driven out, and faith lost, and after the admission of an obsession by the blinding and hardening Satan, as if by postliminy, calls back the most miserable man, fallen by himself, impotent to rise by himself, entangled in diabolical fetters, to repentance, to the means of salvation, to salvation, as defined by DANNHAVER in hodof. phen. IX, f. 877.

Obs. III. Revoking grace is dispensed by the antecedent will of God. For the Father of mercies ('ὁ κτρυμὼν') is equally affected by the misery of a relapsed man as of one to be converted for the first time, according to the judgment of DANNHAVER, l.c.

Obs. IV. Our discourse is about hardened men, constituted in the way of this life, whom the universal grace of God seriously intends to convert; after this life, the door of indulgence, the door of mercy, the door of hope, the door of consolation, the door of good operation will be closed, in the opinion of Dr. QUISTORP in annotat. bibl. ad Matth. XXV, p. 71. Dr. POL. LYSERUS agrees with him, c. 117, harmon. p. 1264: "When is the gate of salvation closed? For individuals in the hour of death, for all universally on the last day after the universal judgment of the world. For then there will no longer be a place for repentance, or a time for procuring salvation, but the exact justice of God or paternal consolation is to be expected; while this gate of the kingdom of heaven otherwise lies open to everyone as long as he lives, and in general also stands open for all men until the consummation of the age."

Prob. a. 1) From the classic text: "When the wicked man turns away from all his sins which he has committed, and keeps all my statutes, and does what is just and right, he shall surely live and not die. All his transgressions which he has committed shall not be remembered, but in his righteousness which he has done, he shall live. For do I indeed desire the death of the wicked? says the Lord God: Is it not that he should turn from his ways and live?" Ezech. XVIII, 21, 22. With which agrees that divine oath, Ezech. XXXIII, 11: "As I live, says the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live; turn back (therefore), turn back from your evil ways; for why will you die, O house of Israel?" Obs. I. The prophet's discourse is about the most wicked sinners, indeed those who, from a perverse habit of sin, ferociously perpetrate whatever is permissible, who practice robbery, shed blood, who contaminate themselves with idolatry, pollute their neighbor's wife, oppress the needy and the poor, v. 14, 15, 16. And to these, nevertheless, God offers revoking grace with the most significant words, even asserting the religion of an oath by his own life, and moreover with so serious and inclined a protestation of a benevolent mind, that he not obscurely hints that the doors of converting grace are not closed up to that time when the obstinate sinner, and the one who stubbornly opposes the divine revoking grace, dies in his sins, that is, with a temporal and eternal death, according to the parallel passage 2 Chron. X, 13. 2) When God says: "Do I indeed desire the death of the wicked?" HUGO GROTIUS understands those words comparatively, saying: "This does not prevent there being with God some limit of mercy, as appeared in Pharaoh, the Canaanites, and others." To which the Blessed CALOVIUS responds: "These things are to be understood not comparatively, but absolutely. Simply, God wills that man be converted and live. He not only prefers life to death. But concerning a limit of mercy, there is nothing in the scriptures; which everywhere preach the highest mercy of God, having no end; nowhere is a limit fixed for it, but we are ordered to hear the voice graciously calling us, whose end is our gracious conversion. 'Exhort one another every day, as long as it is called 'today,' that none of you may be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin,' Hebr. III, 13." Pharaoh was moved to repentance by God with a living voice and miracles, up to the very end of his life. For even then, when he saw the Israelites crossing the Red Sea on dry land, there was still time to return to a sounder mind, to desist from their persecution, and not to wage war against God. Nor were the Canaanites excluded from mercy by any absolute decree, but that they could have, upon seeing and hearing the miracles, humbled themselves and obtained grace, which is established by the example of Rahab and the Gibeonites. Whence we argue thus: Whoever does not will the death of the sinner, even the most wicked, but seriously intends his conversion, he wills by an antecedent will that all the hardened be converted: But God, etc. Therefore.

2. From 2 Peter III, 9. God is patient toward us, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. From which apostolic statement we gather: Toward those sinners to whom God shows Himself long-suffering, to the end that they should not perish but return to repentance, He seriously and efficaciously wills to convert them. But toward hardened sinners, etc. Therefore.

3. From 1 Tim. II, 4. For whom Christ died, them He wills to convert. But Christ died for all, even the hardened. Therefore. The major and minor are clear from the Pauline testimony: God wills all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ, who gave himself as a ransom, ἀντίλυτρον, for all.

4. From Acts XVII, 30. God commands all men everywhere to repent; because He has appointed a day on which He will judge the world in righteousness. We gather: Whomever are to be judged on the last day of the universal judgment, them God wills to convert; But all men, even the most obstinate, etc. Therefore.

Proof b. That the consequent will of God, or of justice, does not rescind, expunge, or overturn the antecedent will of God, or of mercy, is the common opinion of Theologians. Dr. Balthasar Meisner writes with consideration in his Anthropologia, decade II, p. 108: The judgment of the consequent will cannot take away the universal call, which God willed antecedently. Dr. Dannhauer adds his vote to this in Hodosophia Calv. p. 1447: The consequent will to have mercy on a few does not overturn the antecedent will to have mercy on all. Nor does Dr. Henricus Müller dissent in his Semicenturia quæstionum theologiarum p. 52: The consequent will of God does not take away or rescind the antecedent. Likewise on p. 53: The antecedent will does not cease, as if expunged by the consequent; The same disposition to save remains, which was before, the condition not yet being fulfilled. This is confirmed from Holy Scripture:

1. By His antecedent will, God does not will the death of the impious man, established in the way of this life, but that he should be converted and live, Ezech. XXXIII, 11. This universal will of God is not rescinded or taken away by the consequent, or judicial, will, so that one may assert that God, by His consequent will, does not will that a hardened sinner be converted and live. Let us listen to Dr. Hülsemann and, supporting him, Dr. Calovius in Biblia illustrata, on this passage, p. 550: It is not necessary, for the exposition of this passage, to have recourse to the distinction of the divine will into antecedent and consequent. For not even by His consequent will does God delight in the destruction of the impious, as the Jews calumniated, but from the necessity of the office of judge, and unwillingly He is forced to pass sentence. See Lam. III, 33.

2. If for hardened sinners, still travelers in this life, all converting grace were completely taken away by the consequent will, they would be like the devils, and would have sustained the execution of judgment in this life. Therefore, converting grace is not completely taken away from hardened travelers. The connection of the major is proven; because no converting grace is promised to the devils; who also have long since sustained the execution of the initiated judgment. Cf. 2 Pet. II, 4; Jude V, 6. The consequent is clear from Heb. IX, 27: It is appointed for men to die once, but after this the judgment. After death, judgment befalls men who are finally hardened, by which all converting grace is simply rescinded. But those who walk in the way of this life, they have Moses and the Prophets, whom they hear, so that by their word, with the Holy Spirit concurring, they may repent, Luke XVI, 31.

3. Whomever by the consequent will have been delivered into the power of the devil, so that the flesh may indeed be afflicted, but the Spirit may be saved in the day of Jesus Christ, from them grace, recalling to repentance, is not simply taken away by the consequent will; But hardened sinners, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from 1 Cor. V, 5.

4. Whomever by the consequent will have been given over to a reprobate mind, and yet are invited to repentance by the kindness of God, from them recalling grace is not cut off by the consequent will; But hardened travelers, etc. Therefore. The minor is evident from Rom. I, 28, compared with Rom. II, 4. For in Rom. I, 28, the contempters of the saving knowledge of God are said to have been delivered to a reprobate mind. The Apostle addresses these gravely in Rom. II, 4: Or do you despise the riches of His goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering? Are you ignorant that the goodness of God leads you to repentance? The same is gathered from Ps. LXXXI, 12, 13, 14: But my people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me; So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust; and they walked in their own counsels. O that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways! etc. God gave up the unhealthy Israelite people to the hardness of their heart, yet with a sincere wish He desired that they would cease from their malicious and pertinacious resistance, and admit medicinal grace.

Proof c. 1) From Isa. LXV, 2, 3: I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walketh in a way that was not good, after their own thoughts;

a people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick. Whosoever all the day of life spreads out his gracious hands to rebellious sinners, who continually provoke the divine anger and serve idols, he wishes to convert the hardened sinners for the whole time of their life; But the most merciful God, etc. Therefore.

2. From Lam. III, 21, compared with Rom. II, 4: The mercies of the LORD are not finite; His compassions are not consumed; They are new every morning. Whatever mercy is not finite, nor consumed, but new every morning, that mercy is terminated by no limit in the way of this life, but is unlimitedly universal; But the beneficent mercy of God, inviting to repentance, etc. Therefore. So that the minor proposition may be more fully understood, the words of Dr. Sebastian Schmid in his commentary on Jer. V, 24 should be observed: Even the daily benefits of God invite men to repent, while He preserves the whole orb of nature with His beneficent longsuffering.

3. From Ps. XCV, 8: Today, if you will hear his voice, harden not your heart! Compare Heb. III, 13: But exhort one another daily, καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν, while it is called today; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin! We argue; The present day is destined by God for any sinner to repent; Every present day of life is "today": Therefore.

4. From Ps. XXIII, 6: Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life. Dr. Geier aptly explains these words: Herein is indicated the ardor of divine grace, which eagerly follows us when we are careless, indeed, turning away and fleeing, which anticipates the unwilling, that he may will well, helps the willing, that he may perfect it, follows the working, that he may persevere; nor does it desert the sinner on any day. You say: These words are understood of a penitent sinner, not of a hardened one. Response; We have adduced these words to show that the universal grace of God accompanies the sinner for the whole time of his life; We note, however, that God exhorts even the most contumacious sinners to repentance, which we learn

5. from Jerem. III, 1: They say, If a man put away his wife, and she go from him, and become another man's, shall he return unto her again? Shall not that land be greatly polluted? But you have played the harlot with many lovers; yet return again to me! says the LORD. So unusual and stupendous is the clemency of God, that He calls back to Himself a soul, polluted by repeated mortal sins just as an adulteress who has played the harlot with many lovers, and stimulates it to repentance.

6. Isaiah's hearers were blinded and hardened. See Isa. VI, 9. Nevertheless, he cried out with a clear voice; Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the LORD, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.

Proof d. 1) From 1 Cor. VI, 9: Do you not know that the unrighteous will not inherit the kingdom of God? Do not be deceived. Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners will inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you; But you were washed, but you were sanctified, but you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God. By which words the Apostle teaches that the most wicked sinners, having been anticipated by the mercy of God and led back to repentance, have been translated from a state of wrath into a state of grace.

2. The Jews by their cruelty, like barren branches, were broken off from the olive tree, Christ, Rom. XI, 19. Yet God is able to graft them in again, v. 23, many of whom were converted, even those who cast out the preaching Apostles, Acts II, 42.

3. The Ninevites, whose wickedness had come up before God, repented at the preaching of Jonah, and obtained forgiveness of their sins, Jon. III, 10.

4. The most obstinate sinners have been converted; Manasseh, hardened to the last degree; David, who lapsed enormously twice, twice obtained pardon; Solomon, seduced to idolatry; Nebuchadnezzar, a seducer of others; a most foul harlot, Luke VII, and many others besides. The example of Paul should not be passed over in silence, who in 1 Tim. I, 15 says of himself: I am the chief of sinners; But for that reason I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show all longsuffering, as a pattern to those who were to believe in him for eternal life.

Proof e. That a sinful man rushes into eternal ruin from his own voluntary fault, and not from a decree of God absolutely denying converting grace, the most merciful God teaches everywhere in the sacred writings. Jer. XXXII, 33: They have turned unto me the back, and not the face; though I taught them, rising up early and teaching them, yet they have not hearkened to receive instruction. Matth. XXIII, 37: O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you that kill the prophets (now and formerly), and stone them which are sent unto you, how often would I have gathered your children together, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and you would not! God, by sending His sacred heralds, seriously and intensely desires to convert the most wicked sinners; but the malicious contumacy of many is such that they repel the word of God and despise medicinal grace.

The antithesis was formerly that of the Novatians, who established that for those who lapsed after baptism, a return to repentance was by no means available; but today it is that of the Socinians, who deny that a sinful man, who has once shaken off the yoke of sin, having lapsed into mortal sin and being entangled in it, so as to have contracted a habit of sinning, can be renewed to repentance. We shall weigh their arguments:

I. Whoever hardens malicious sinners, does not want to convert them. But God, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from Isa. VI, 10, and the example of Pharaoh, Exod. IX, 1. Response: 1) Whoever hardens sinful men effectively, by sending hardness into their hearts, does not want to convert them; I grant it. But God is said to harden partly permissively, by permitting in just judgment that a sinner, who does not suffer himself to be softened, being left to himself, should remain hard: partly negatively, by withdrawing regenerating and justifying grace, as a punishment for preceding sins. 2) Pharaoh hardened himself, Exod. VIII, 15, that is, actively. Therefore, God concurs in the hardening in another way, namely, Pharaoh effectively and directly, God permissively and indirectly. Cf. Pfeiffer, Dubia vexata, p. 250. (*)

II. Whoever deserts a sinful man, and withdraws His grace from him, does not want to convert him; But God deserts the hardened sinner, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear 1) from the example of Pharaoh; 2) from 2 Chron. XII, 5: You have forsaken me, and therefore have I also left you in the hand of Shishak; likewise 2 Chron. XV, 2: If you forsake the LORD, he will forsake you. Response: 1) Although God withdrew from Pharaoh indwelling grace, He did not however desert him with assisting grace, as long as he was in the way; since through the word and miracles He reminded him of his duty, and offered His grace to him. Cf. Dr. Calov., Bibl. illustr., on the passage. 2) Concerning the withdrawal of divine grace, Dr. Hülsemann discusses excellently in his dissertation De peccato, § 5: God by no means withdraws His grace in such a way as to leave none at all, or to remove everything that prohibits sin; because He left the law, by which it is prohibited, both inscribed in nature and prescribed to all; He also calls everyone back from sins by the threat of punishment, as well as by examples of His judgment against sins, and finally, for those lapsing into sins, even against conscience, He has left exciting grace, which warns that they should return to the grace of their former filiation. This is gathered from the context itself of 2 Chron. XII, 6: Whereupon the princes of Israel and the king humbled themselves; and they said: The LORD is righteous. And when the LORD saw that they humbled themselves, the word of the LORD came to Shemaiah, saying, They have humbled themselves; therefore I will not destroy them. The same can be shown from 2 Chron. XV, 3.

(*) To explain the matter a little more fully, these things must be considered in particular: 1) One must accurately discern the effect that God willed, from the contrary event that God foresaw, just as we are accustomed to say: I will enhance this man with benefits, and leave nothing untried; but I already foresee that the more kind I am to that ingrate, the more impudent he will become; Ich werde ihn nur damit verhärten (I will only harden him by it). 2) It is clearly written that this most sad event was in no way God's counsel and determining will, Rom. XI, 11, where the little word 'that' undoubtedly denotes a purpose, which the Legate of Christ denies God had set for Himself. 3) God condemns hardness of mind, and admonishes men to flee from it, Heb. III, 8, 12, 13; IV, 7, 11; add Ps. XCV, 8. Therefore He Himself does not effect it. 4) The cause of a hardened mind is expressly said to be the fraudulent persuasion of sin, and the malignant Spirit, Heb. III, 13; 2 Cor. IV, 4, compared with Eph. II, 2. Therefore, to attribute the same effect to God is certainly the greatest injustice. 5) Man hardens himself, as now, so also before, and more often, Ex. VIII, 32; Jerem. V, 3; Zachar. VII, 11, 12. 6) Before God abandons and punishes the hardened man, He tolerates him with slowness to anger and great gentleness, Rom. IX, 17, compared with the following v. 22. But with what purpose? Surely the best, that the wicked might use the space for repenting, 2 Pet. III, 9. 7) He is sometimes said to do something, who predicts that it will happen. A clear example, Jerem. I, 10. And so God is said to have hardened Pharaoh's mind, not because He Himself effected it, but because He certainly foretold that it would so happen, and by the clearest proofs of His kindness and gentleness, and of His power and severity, He openly signified that He had left nothing undone that pertained to correcting Pharaoh, but that Pharaoh himself was the author and effector of such great obstinacy of mind.

III. He who is unwilling to hear sinners when they cry out, does not intend their conversion; God is unwilling to hear hardened sinners when they cry out: Therefore. The minor is proved from Prov. I, 28: They shall call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me. Response: The impious, when calamity presses, cry out from impatience of punishment, not from a serious purpose of converting themselves to God. They seek God to be freed from punishment, not from guilt. A cry, proceeding from a penitent heart, is heard by God. For whosoever shall call on the name of the LORD shall be delivered, Joel III, 5.

IV. Whom God has delivered to a reprobate mind, him He does not will to convert: Hardened sinners, etc. Rom. I, 28; Ps. LXXXI, 12, 13. Therefore. Response: Those sinners whom God has delivered to a reprobate mind by a consequent, judicial will, the most benign deity invites to repentance by an antecedent will, Rom. II, 4. For the antecedent will, or mercy, is not expunged by the consequent will, or justice.

V. God takes the talent from the useless servant, Matth. XXV, 28. Therefore He denies him converting grace. Response: By talent in that passage is understood an increase of grace, or a more intense and richer degree of grace, not the first assisting grace, i.e., standing at the door of the heart and knocking, that it may be opened, Apoc. III, 20.

VI. God is weary of repenting, Jer. XV, 6. Therefore He does not will to give repentance to disobedient sinners. Response: The cited passage does not speak of the denial of repentance, but of the retraction of the decree concerning the infliction of temporal punishments. God was no longer willing to have mercy and to remove the punishments, says Vatablus on this passage, p. 293. This is clear from the following words in v. 7: Therefore I will fan them with a fan in the gates of the land; I will bereave them of children, I will destroy my people, since they return not from their ways. Meanwhile, through temporal punishments many are excited to repentance. This we learn from Jer. XVIII, 7, 8: At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it. If that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.

VII. For whom one must not pray, they cannot be converted: For the hardened, etc. Jer. VII, 16; c. XI, 14; c. XIV, 11. Response: God does not forbid praying for the conversion of sinners, and for the pardon of guilt through faith in the Messiah, for God wills this to be done and has promised to hear, Jer. XXIX, 12, 13; but He forbids praying for the temporal punishment, the deportation into Babylonia, to be remitted for the obstinate Jews. But this temporal punishment is a real sermon of repentance. See Lev. XXVI, 41, 42.

Objection: But temporal punishment not rarely has eternal punishment as its companion, because they are extinguished in flagrant sin, like Zimri and Cozbi, Num. XXV, 6. Response: Our discourse is about sinners constituted in the way of life, whom the long-suffering of God allures to repentance, not about the finally impenitent, who die in impenitence, or are snatched away by sudden death in an illicit act; for it is beyond dispute that in the hour of death the door of mercy and indulgence is closed to sinners.

VIII. Whoever swears that the ever-erring will not enter into the heavenly rest, he does not will to convert them; But God, etc. Hebr. III, 11, 12. Response: The ever-erring are the finally impenitent, whom God reprobates by His judicial will; whom, however, as long as they were in the way of life, He stimulated to repentance by His antecedent will.

IX. For him who is already judged and condemned, the gate of grace is closed; but everyone who does not believe is already judged; Therefore. The minor is clear from John III, 18. Response: 1) He who does not believe finally, or until the end of his life, is already judged, by reason of the divine decree of reprobation, made from eternity. But we are not at present dealing with the finally unbelieving. 2) He who does not believe for a time, is already judged by the law; in that the judgment, already passed by the law, presses upon him, nor is he freed from it as long as he is an unbeliever. For although liberation from the curse of the law has been obtained for him by Christ the redeemer; whence he could and should have applied it to himself through faith in Christ; yet he does not enjoy it, because he does not embrace by faith the liberation acquired by the redeemer, and offered in the word of the gospel. But indeed, a sinner who is unbelieving for a time can be converted and brought to faith, which the examples of David, Peter, Thomas, Paul and others teach.

X. That divine grace has been denied to those who repent late, is shown by the example of the five foolish virgins, for whom, when they came late, the door was shut, Matth. XXV, 10. I will respond in the words of Gerhard in his Harmony, c. 163, p. 836: Primarily and principally Christ here speaks of the state that will be in the day of judgment, where the time for repentance and grace will have completely passed. But if we wish to accommodate this member of the parabola to the death of a man, it must be established that the door is then at last closed, and the time for repentance, grace, and pardon is finished, when the soul has been separated from the body.

XI. That converting grace is not offered to all hardened sinners is clear from the example of the sons of Eli, who did not hear the voice of their Father; because the Lord willed to kill them, 1 Sam. II, 25, and of Saul, whom God utterly forsook, so that He did not answer him either by dreams, or by Urim, or by prophets, 1 Sam. XXVIII, 6. Response: 1) God did not simply cut off recalling grace from the sons of Eli, whom He seriously intended to recall to repentance through His word, announced by the ministry of their father; But the words of the cited text, simply rendered from the Hebrew source by Dr. Seb. Schmidt, are as follows: The sons of Eli did not hear the voice of their father, because the LORD willed to kill them. 2) Saul remained under the shadow of the visible church, and so was continuously excited to repentance by the voice of the law and the offering of light; although that special grace, by which God in the Old Testament revealed future things, was not divinely granted to him.

XII. Esau found no place for repentance, even though he sought it with tears, Hebr. XII, 16. Therefore God does not will to give repentance to all sinners. Response: The cited passage does not speak of the repentance of Esau (that Esau repented of his rash deed, his tears themselves testify); but of the repentance of Isaac, that even if Esau sought it with tears, he found no place for repentance, namely, that the parent should repent of the blessing of the birthright conferred on Jacob, and revoke it.

Objection: Nevertheless Esau, seeking his father's repentance, but in vain, is a type of the sinner, seeking remission of sins from God the Father, but not finding it. Response: Esau typically represents not just any lapsed man, but one sinning against the Holy Spirit, from which a consequence to any mortally lapsed person is denied. Compare Sebastian Schmid on this passage, p. 1355.

XIII. God denies recalling grace to those sinning against the Holy Spirit, Hebr. VI, 6; c. X, 26. Therefore He does not will to convert all hardened sinners. Response: Those sinning against the Holy Spirit are finally impenitent not because of denied recalling grace, but because of the voluntary and persevering rejection of the ordinary means, that is, the divine word, by which they were to be converted. Wherefore Dannhauer gravely says in Hodosophia, phaenom XI, p. 1420: It is impossible that those sinning against the Holy Spirit be renewed to repentance, not by an impossibility of a decree of reprobation, but of human vice.

XIV. Sinners, living outside the church, are not recalled to repentance by the ordinary means: Therefore the converting grace of God is not universal. Response: That the gentiles living outside the church are not recalled to repentance by the solemn preaching of the divine word, they can accuse not the most merciful God, who intensely desires the repentance of all men; but their ancestors, who did not faithfully, as was proper, preserve the precious deposit of the evangelical lamp. For the rest, they are called by the voice of nature, of conscience, and of the fame of the Christian religion, spread here and there throughout the lands, to the church, the workshop of grace, so that in it they may be converted by the ordinary means of salvation.

XV. The authority of Luther seems to stand in our way, saying: "Although God promised pardon, as Augustine says, yet he did not promise this, that you would certainly return after a fall, just as Saul and Judas did not return." Response: a) If God promised pardon to the sinner, He did not deny him all converting grace. For the evangelical promise, by which pardon is offered to the sinner, is an efficacious means of converting. b) God did not promise that the sinner certainly will return; because He converts the sinner not by irresistible grace, but by resistible grace through ordinary means, which the sinner can reject.

Question XIII. What is the starting point and the end point of conversion, most strictly speaking?

The starting point (terminus a quo) of conversion, most strictly taken, are sins, both actual a), insofar as, after they have been committed, they remain morally as if ratified, or not retracted, and also habitual b), insofar as they not only import a lack of habitual perfection that ought to be present, but also a propensity to all evils, which is the fount and cause of actual sins. The proximate end point (terminus ad quem) is contrition c); the remote is faith in Christ d).

Obs. I. Sins can be viewed in two ways: 1) Physically, insofar as they are actions and depend efficiently on man; 2) Morally, insofar as they are actions against the law, and concern the right of some third party. Viewed in the former way, they have in common with any other actions that they denominate a man as sinning in the present, when they are done, but as having sinned in the past, after they have passed. But considered in the latter way, they have this peculiarity in common with other moral actions, which concern the right of some third party besides the agent, that they induce an obligation in the agent, and hold the sinner, even after they have passed, as if bound under the action, or rather under the state resulting from the action, for example, just as in civil matters a contract once entered into induces an obligation in the contracting parties, and holds them as if bound under the state of the contract, even if the act of contracting has long since passed; so a sin once committed induces an obligation in the sinner, and holds him as if bound under the state of sin, although the act of sinning has long since passed. But since the will of men is mutable, and they are accustomed, having changed their will, to retract what they once did and, as much as is in them, render it morally null; therefore, for past sins to remain morally, and to hold a man in the state of sin, it is further required that they afterwards be held as ratified by subsequent acts of the will, or at least, that they not be retracted by a subsequent act of the will, just as for a contract once entered into, if it is to endure morally, it is required that it afterwards be held as ratified by the contracting parties, or at least that it not be retracted by either of the contracting parties. Compare Musaeus, De conversione, disp. III, § 42.

Obs. II. Not only ratification, or non-retraction, is the cause why sins, after they have passed, remain morally, and hold the sinner in a state of sin. For since sins are forbidden by divine law, and by this very fact, that they violate divine law, they most gravely offend God, they induce in the sinner a guilt of fault, and an obligation to satisfy for the offense and injury done to God. Whence they have that they remain morally not from the sinner's ratification or non-retraction alone, nor can they be abolished by his retraction alone. For if the sinner should ever so seriously retract his past sins with himself, he will still remain guilty of fault for having violated the law of God, and obligated to satisfy for the offense and injury done to God. As long as the guilt of fault and the obligation to satisfaction remain, so long do sins morally remain and man in a state of sin. Wherefore, in order that sins may be morally abolished, and the sinner be transferred from a state of sin to a state of grace, two things are required: 1) That sins no longer be held as ratified, but be retracted; 2) That full satisfaction be exhibited to God, the Supreme Lord and legislator, for the offense and injury inflicted, and so the offended God be reconciled.

Proof a. Actual sins are held as ratified as long as they so please the unconverted sinner that he indulges and performs them, either because he is ignorant that they are prohibited by divine law, or because they entice him with the appearance of some apparent good, for example, the Gentiles did not know that their idolatry was forbidden by divine law (although this ignorance was supine, gross, and affected). The enemies of the gospel, by killing the Apostles, thought they were offering sacred worship to God, John XVI, 2. Avarice pleases not a few on account of its useful good, fornication on account of its pleasant good, etc. As long as the sinner does not hate or detest these vices, but rather is so delighted by them that he proposes to himself to continue and persevere in them, so long do those actual sins remain morally (although they do not survive physically or really), and the man is detained in a state of sin.

Proof b. Actual sins are the immediate and proximate starting point of conversion; habitual sin is the mediate and remote starting point. For since actual sins, when they are committed, present themselves to the sinner's mind by themselves and immediately, and burden and distress his conscience; but the habit of sinning becomes known only a posteriori and from actual sins, of which it is the principle and cause; conversion is indeed directed by its acts toward them, and tends to their abolition first, proximately, and immediately, yet in such a way that consequently and through the mediation of the acts of sinning it is also directed toward this, as toward a more remote terminus, which is connoted in actual sins, as the proximate terminus, by way of a principle. Thus David, repenting after committing the crimes of adultery and homicide, besides the crimes actually committed and now past, also seriously disapproved and detested with much sorrow his own connate malice, as the cause and fount of the crimes committed: Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me! Ps. LI, 7.

Proof c. Just as the office of the law is to break and crush stony hearts like a hammer, Jer. XXIII, 29, to denounce the wrath of God upon transgressors of the law, Rom. IV, 15, and to adjudge them to death, 2 Cor. III, 6; so the end point and proximate and immediate effect of conversion through the law is CONTRITION, by which the sinner, having recognized his sins from the divine law, seriously detests them with sorrow. Therefore, when the Holy Spirit leads the sinner to contrition through the divine law, he no longer holds his past sins as ratified, but retracts them; which retraction is accomplished by two acts, one of which pertains to the intellect, the other to the will. The recognition of sins pertains to the intellect, which is prerequisite as a necessary condition, without which the retraction of sins finds no place. Whence David: I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin (as an abominable, detestable, retractable thing) is ever before me, Ps. LI, 5. This recognition of sin is an effect of illuminating grace. On the part of the will, their displeasure is required for the retraction of sins, which is either simple or efficacious. Simple displeasure is that by which something is displeasing to the will according to some known reason of evil, without the intention of fleeing it. Efficacious displeasure is that by which a thing known as evil is so displeasing to the will, that at the same time it intends to flee it. For the retraction of sins any simple displeasure is not sufficient; for that is found even in the impenitent, who see and approve the better things, but follow the worse; but efficacious displeasure is also required, joined with a serious purpose of fleeing sins; by which, namely, we so abhor sins that not only do we wish to render undone those committed, if it were possible, but also we abhor from the whole heart committing any others in the future; which displeasure we are accustomed to call specifically the detestation of sin. Furthermore, sorrow and grief of mind (to which belong the bites and terrors of conscience) are wont to follow this detestation or efficacious displeasure (by which sins, although they were voluntary when they were being committed, take on the nature of involuntary actions), generally the more grave, the more deeply the sinner considers his sins, the offended God, and the punishments of this life and the next that have been merited. From which it becomes clear that the retraction of sin is the detestation of it, recognized from the law, joined with sorrow of mind.

Proof d. Just as the law is a pedagogue to Christ, Gal. III, 24, so contrition is a certain useful and necessary disposition for kindling faith in the sinner and obtaining salvation by faith, as Musaeus says in disp. II, de convers., I, 60. Dr. Fecht agrees with this in Sylloge contror., disp. XXIX, § 1: Theologians from Matth. III, 5; Acts III, 48, do not fear to call repentance partially accepted (contrition), in a certain sense, a disposition and preparation for faith, and a means of arriving at the end. To be sure, contrition is not a positive or causal medium for kindling faith, but is only a privative medium (such as the removal of pus for healing a wound), by which the incapacity of the subject and the obstacles that would otherwise impede the kindling of faith are removed. For God has respect for the miserable and contrite spirit, Ps. LXVI, 2. Therefore, faith in Christ is the remote end point of conversion; because the Holy Spirit, by working contrition through the law, intends to dispose the sinner's heart for kindling saving faith in him through the word of the gospel. But when I call it remote, I would not wish anyone to think that faith should be removed far from contrition, or be separated from it; for contrition is coupled with faith by the tightest bond in the sermons of Christ; repent and believe the gospel, Mark I, 15; Acts II, 38; 2 Cor. VII, 10. But by this very fact it is at least indicated that the light of faith arises not through conversion from the law, but from elsewhere through regeneration from the gospel, 1 Pet. I, 23; Jac. I, 18. (*)

Question XIV. In what does conversion, taken in the most special sense, formally consist?

The form of conversion. Conversion, most strictly taken, formally consists in the excitation of contrition, through the word of the law, by which the hard heart of the sinner is softened, prepared, and disposed by the Holy Spirit for faith to be kindled in it by the voice of the gospel.

Proof. These things are clear from what has already been said, and also from the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, p. 86: That faith of which we speak, exists in repentance, that is, it is conceived in the terrors of conscience, which feels the wrath of God against our sins, and seeks remission of sins, and to be freed from sin. And in such terrors and other afflictions this faith ought to grow and be confirmed. Wherefore it cannot exist in those who live according to the flesh, who are delighted by their lusts, and obey them.

Question XV. What is the end of conversion?

The end of conversion. The proximate end of conversion is regeneration a); the ultimate, on the part of men, is eternal life b); on the part of God, the glory of the divine name c).

Proof a. Since conversion through the law excites contrition in the heart of the sinner, which is a disposition for kindling faith, it is clear that the Holy Spirit, by crushing the hard heart, intends the regeneration of the contrite sinner; which we have shown lucidly above from Acts II, 38, qu. 5, proof 4.

Proof b. Godly sorrow produces a repentance that leads to salvation without regret, 2 Cor. VII, 10. God, by converting grace, by saddening the sinner through the law, works repentance unto salvation, namely so that repentance partially accepted, or contrition, may not indeed be a causal medium of salvation, but yet may be a medium of divine order. Which divine order we have explained above in qu. IX.

Proof c. When the apostles and the brethren who were throughout Judea heard that the Gentiles also had received the word of God, they praised God, saying: So then God has granted even to the Gentiles repentance unto life, Acts XI, 18. The goodness of God is to be praised, who seeks the bleating sheep, and allures to Himself the relapsed harlot, Jer. III, 1.

Question XVI. Does God convert the sinner by irresistible grace?

Sinful men can resist converting grace.

Obs. I. A distinction is made between natural (*) Conversion in this place is indeed a returning. In every returning there cannot but be a twofold terminus, one from which, the other to which. The terminus to which cannot be other than that very one from which man had departed. The terminus from which, it is necessary, must be that into which man, having made that departure, had betaken himself. The wicked man defected from God, and gave himself headlong into every sin. Therefore, the terminus from which is sin, the terminus to which is God, Acts III, 19, compared with v. 26 and XXVI, 18. Add Luke XV, 18. But for no one guilty of sin is the return to God open, except through Christ, John XIV, 6. Therefore, saving trust, placed in Christ, is not so much the terminus to which itself, as the unique, and therefore necessary, medium by which we arrive at it. No returning can be thought of without one terminus, which is called from which, and another to which. Therefore, both are necessary. Nor indeed is anything more required. Therefore, both are also sufficient. The terminus to which is the proposed end, of which certainly the chief account must be taken. Therefore, the terminus to which is the principal one. From these it follows: 1) that the necessary parts of sacred conversion are two, one indeed the detestation of all sin, or, as it is commonly said, contrition; the other, the conjunction of man with God through trust placed in Christ; 2) that there are no more parts of it; 3) that this second one is the principal; 4) that the Roman Catholics are in the highest error, when they indeed both constitute other parts, and dare to remove the principal one.

and malicious resistance. The former is otherwise called congenital, and flows proximately from the corrupt nature of man, and is common to all men, which through preparing grace, joined to the word of God, is indeed diminished and inhibited, but not however radically removed. For there is a struggle of the flesh against the spirit, even in the reborn. See Rom. VII, 23; Gal. V, 17. Therefore, since man through the corruption of nature cannot but resist the divine law, because the flesh does not subject itself to the law, for indeed it cannot, Rom. VIII, 7; converting grace breaks this necessity of resisting, and brings it about that man can indeed admit the means, but not that he necessarily and irresistibly admits them, but that he retains the freedom of resisting those means. The latter is otherwise called voluntary, affected, and morose, and is procured by the peculiar fault and deliberate effort of man, and thus proceeds from malice, voluntarily contracted; which in some is more pertinacious, in others less pertinacious, in some it is temporary, in others it is final. For the Savior teaches that it is more difficult for the rich to enter the kingdom of heaven than for the poor, Matth. XIX, 23. He also teaches that publicans and harlots can be converted and saved more easily than the Pharisees, because the latter were puffed up with the persuasion of their own righteousness, Matth. XXI, 31. Indeed, we also learn from experience that men occupied with false opinions, inflamed with preposterous zeal, immersed in more serious vices, and more often relapsing into sins of choice, resist converting grace more vehemently than those who decline such dangerous rocks of salvation. The finally impenitent resist most pertinaciously, among whom those sinning against the Holy Spirit are eminent.

Obs. II. Some authors think that extraordinary conversion was irresistible; which others call into doubt. We gather from Acts XXVI, 19 that Paul's extraordinary conversion was not simply resistible, where the Apostle says; I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. By which words he implies that he could have, if he had wished, resisted. So powerful a call did not take away from him the power of resisting, in the opinion of Hugo Grotius on this passage. Even Moses resisted the heavenly appearance and call, until the anger of the LORD was kindled, c. IV, 14. Dr. Hülsemann, in Brevis enucleatio, c. VI, thes. XV, distinguishes between the call and the conversion of Paul. Paul's call indeed was made irresistibly; But his conversion and regeneration were not made irresistibly, Acts IX, 4 ff. For the former happened as if in an instant; the latter, however (within three days), successively. Whence the consequence from the extraordinary and miraculous to the irresistible is not valid. For many resist miracles.

Obs. III. A distinction is made between actual and possible irresistibility. Grace is called resistible, which can be resisted by nature, whether it is actually resisted or not; irresistible, which cannot be resisted by nature.

Obs. IV. When a man lies dead in sins, and lives securely day by day, thinking nothing of his conversion, the most benign God anticipates him, and by means of the word, whether heard, or read, and retained within the mind, from time to time excites good motions in him, which Theologians call inevitable, because their presence and sense cannot be avoided; which also can be called in some way irresistible, by reason of their origin and sense, since the sinful man can in no way oppose their excitation through the word, and their sense, but only his consent to them. The first motions, says Dr. Johann Musaeus, can be called irresistible, insofar as they anticipate our deliberation, so that it is not in our power to prevent them from arising; although, after they have arisen, they can be resisted, and prevented from taking root, or even be plainly suffocated, in his tract De conversione, c. V, § XLVIII. But those good motions, which preventing grace kindles in a sinful man within the church by means of the word, consist in κατανύξει τῆς καρδίας, in the compunction of the heart, Acts II, 37, or in a certain injection of a stimulus, and an internal admonition that has arisen beyond all intention concerning the immense danger and atrocious misery to which the sinner voluntarily subjects himself by the crimes committed daily against conscience, so that sometimes, following the example of the prodigal son, he comes to himself, Luke XV, 5, and ἐμφόβος γενόμενος, Acts XXIV, 25, being pricked and terrified, begins to repeat that saying, Jer. c. VIII, 6: What have I done? Where am I rushing? To what precipice am I being carried? Why do I not rather consult for eternal salvation, than for the fleeting pleasure of the body, joined with the peril of eternal torments? God has so disposed this by His immense grace, that no place of excuse is left for any man. Indeed, the most obstinate atheists, who have hardened their minds against all the objections of Christians, nevertheless from time to time, against their will, when they are as if stunned by the proposition of the divine word, feel such stirrings within themselves.

Obs. V. Non-resistance is twofold, pedagogical and spiritual. Pedagogical non-resistance is in the power of the sinful man in external matters, inviting him to the church. For example, some unregenerate men refuse to go on foot to the temple, some do not refuse. This pedagogical non-resistance, corresponding to external hearing, belongs to free will. But spiritual non-resistance, corresponding to internal hearing, or assent, is from the assisting and preparing grace of the Holy Spirit, which indeed breaks and inhibits natural and simple actual resistance, lest it become malicious, affected, and morose; although through the extreme malice of men it does not always achieve this intended end.

Proof. 1) From Acts VII, 51: Σκληροτράχηλοι καὶ ἀπερίτμητοι τῇ καρδίᾳ καὶ τοῖς ὠσίν, ὑμεῖς τῷ πνεύματι ἁγίῳ ἀντιπύετε, "You stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit." This heavenly oracle is most emphatic. The first emphasis is in the word σκληροτράχηλοι, as if to say, hard of neck, ihr Halsstarrige, oder Hartnäckige (you stiff-necked, or obstinate ones). The metaphor is taken from bullocks impatient of the yoke, and petulantly shaking it off when imposed. The second is in the word ἀπερίτμητοι, that is, spiritually uncircumcised. The foreskin of the genital member was indeed circumcised externally for the Jews, but internally they unseemly nourished the foreskin of the heart. For they are uncircumcised in heart who indulge in vicious affections of the heart, Jer. IX, 26. They are uncircumcised in ears whose ears itch to hear either new dogmas, dissimilar to the divine word, or obscene and scandalous words. The third is in the word ἀντιπύετε, that is, you oppose yourselves as if crosswise to the Holy Spirit, and obstruct the entrance into your heart.

2. From Isa. LXV, 2, compared with Rom. X, 21: All day long I have stretched out my hands to a rebellious people, who walk in a way that is not good, after their own thoughts. They are accustomed to stretch out their hands who freely offer benefits to others, invite and allure them to themselves, to receive them into their embrace or bosom.

This God does, all day long, i.e., at all times, offering assisting grace, even to the refractory, who walk in the way of impiety after their own thoughts, pleasing themselves in their own inventions, and not reining in their senses under the obedience of God.

3. From Matth. XXIII, 37: O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you! How often I wanted to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you (you and your children) were not willing. In which words Christ a) most openly testifies to His most serious will of gathering and converting the Jews. For just as there is in a hen an ardent and most tender affection, by which she desires the safety of her chicks to be promoted; so Christ was inclined with true and sincere benevolence toward the citizens of Jerusalem, to be gathered under the wings of His grace. The same b) complains about the voluntary contumacy of the Jews, morosely repudiating the offered grace.

The antithesis is of certain Scholastics, Jansenists and others asserting that the converting grace of God is irresistible. Their main arguments are:

I. Paul expressly says: "Who resists the divine will?" Rom. IX, 19. Response: Paul speaks these words not from his own mind, but from the mind of an opposing antagonist; to whom the apostle responds a) indirectly by a rebuke, that man ought not to answer back to God; b) directly by information, that God does not harden positively, by sending hardness into hearts with an irresistible will, but invites to repentance, enduring with much gentleness and patience the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction by their own fault.

II. That power which is no less efficacious and potent than that which exerted itself in raising Christ from the dead, is insuperable and irresistible. But the power of the Holy Spirit converting us, etc. Therefore. The major is proven, because the divine power by which Christ was raised from the dead was plainly irresistible and insuperable, which when put into action, the effect could not but follow; The minor is clear from Col. II, 12; Eph. I, 19, 20. Response: The power that resuscitated the body of Christ from the dead agrees with converting grace, with respect to the substance of the divine virtue considered in itself; because a) both are supernatural, b) both give life. The former gives the life of a body to be glorified, the latter the life of a soul to be converted. But it differs with respect to the subject; because the dead body of Christ, as such, or considered precisely, was destitute of all life; but the soul, dead in sins, is indeed destitute of the life of grace, but lives the life of this age; it is devoid of spiritual life, but a partaker of natural life. Whence the dead body of Christ was not opposed to the divine resuscitating power, but the soul, insatiate with and as if drunk with the love of this age, is opposed.

III. Whatever power is far superior to human powers, no one can resist it. But the divine converting power, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the lesser power is forced to yield to the greater. The minor is evident; because the divine heart-turning power is infinite, but human power is finite. Response; Whatever power is far superior to human powers, and operates absolutely, no one can resist it; I concede. But the divine converting power is not absolute, but ordained, operating through ordinary means, which man can reject.

Objection. By this reasoning, man, by resisting the divine power, will be either more powerful than God, or at least equally powerful as God. Response; a) If man resisted through a greater or equal perfection, that would follow; but man resists through the blindness of the intellect, and foolish concepts, through the disorder of the appetite and the malice of the will, which do not argue for perfection, but for impotence. It is illustrated by a simile. God sustains natural life not by absolute power, but by ordained power, by means of bread. If someone should proceed to such a point of madness as to refuse to eat bread, he would resist the divinely established order through his own foolishness, and yet he is not more powerful than God. b) Even then, when the power of God is impeded, it can so act that it would not be impeded, if, that is, it willed to act with irresistible power. Therefore, one cannot infer that there is anything more powerful than God. For just as God permits His ordained power to be overcome, when a malicious obstacle is placed in the way; so His absolute power is insuperable.

IV. In whose hand are the hearts of men, so that He Himself bends them where He wills, those men cannot resist Him; But the hearts of men are in the hand of God, so that He Himself bends them where He wills; Therefore. The major is proven; because he who bends something according to his own will, achieves the scope of the bending without any resistance. The minor is proven from Prov. XXI, 1: The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will. Response; In that passage, Solomon's discourse is not about converting grace, but about divine providence, concerning the affairs of kings, with respect to which God inclines their hearts, whenever it seems good to Him. Although not even this bending of the royal mind is simply irresistible, which is clear from the example of Saul, resisting the divine precept, 1 Sam. XV, 23.

V. He whom God the Father draws to the Son does not resist; For God does not draw the unwilling; But sinners, etc. John VI, 44. Therefore. Response; God does not indeed draw the unwilling; but He makes him who is unwilling by nature, willing by grace. Yet because that drawing is not a violent seizure, but is carried out by the ordinary cords of grace, it is not simply irresistible; for it requires a tractable subject, not morosely resisting, or not shaking off the cords of grace.

VI. If man can resist and not resist converting grace, contrition and faith will depend on the natural powers of free will; The latter is Pelagian; Therefore also the former. The consequence of the major is proven; because not resisting is the same as repenting and believing. Response; a) I deny the consequence of the major. To the proof we say, that non-resistance is only a condition without which contrition and faith are not produced in the sinner's heart, but it is not repentance and faith itself. b) Pedagogical non-resistance in external ecclesiastical matters is from the powers of free will, spiritual non-resistance is from the grace of God.

VII. If man can resist converting grace, God will be frustrated in His purpose; But God is never frustrated in His purpose; Therefore. The major is clear; because resistance impedes the end of the agent. The consequent is proven, because no wise and powerful being intends an end which he knows to be in vain; But God is most wise and most powerful, and so has foreknown the outcome of conversion, and by acting can achieve the same; Therefore He is never frustrated in His purpose. Response; God always attains the ultimate and general end, i.e., the manifestation of His glorious grace, although He does not always obtain the intermediate and special end, i.e., the repentance of the sinner; yet divine wisdom reduces this frustration of the special end to the ultimate end, namely to the glory of His severe justice, which the man who pertinaciously resists has provoked.

SUSPIRIUM.

Convert, O most BENIGN GOD, the sinners turned away from you, prostrate the fierce, bend the contumacious, raise the fallen! Recall, O most GENTLE FATHER, the disobedient sons, gather the dispersed doves, bring back the bleating sheep! With the fire of your word soften iron hearts, with the hammer of the law break the stony, that they may be prepared and disposed to receive with true faith JESUS, the king of souls, the bringer and vindicator of our salvation! Restrain my will, prone to sin, support it when it wavers, strengthen it when it is weak, that I may be and remain established in the constant exercise of repentance, a hater of all filth, a cultivator of true piety!

CHAPTER VII. ON REGENERATING GRACE

Question I. What is regeneration?

EGENERATION IS AN act of grace, by which the Holy Spirit endows a sinful man with saving faith, so that with his sins remitted he may be rendered a son of God and an heir of eternal life. It is defined more fully: Regeneration is an act of applying grace, by which the Holy Spirit, out of mercy founded on the merit of Christ, endows a sinful man, who lacks the powers of believing but is not contumaciously repugnant, with true faith in Christ, kindled through the gospel and baptism, so that he may be justified, adopted as a son of God, renewed, and eternally saved.

Obs. I. Regeneration is called in Greek παλιγγενεσία, from πάλιν, again, and γένεσις, generation, and therefore by the force of the word it is a new, or repeated generation. But παλιγγενεσία has a twofold meaning; for it denotes either a rebirth to the life of grace, or spiritual life, Titus III, 5, or a rebirth to the life of glory, or eternal life, Matthew XIX, 28.

Obs. II. The word regeneration, insofar as it denotes rebirth to spiritual life, is taken either in a broader and general signification, or in a stricter and special signification. Taken broadly, regeneration comprises a) regeneration strictly so called, b) justification, and c) renewal. In which comprehensive sense the Formula of Concord, p. 686, accepts it: "The word regeneration is sometimes taken in that sense, that it embraces at the same time both the remission of sins and the subsequent renewal. Sometimes it also signifies only the remission of sins and the adoption as sons of God. And in this latter signification that word is often and much used in the Apology of the Augsburg Confession. Then also regeneration is often used for sanctification, in which signification Dr. LUTHER used this word much, both in his book on the church and councils, and also elsewhere." Taken strictly, it denotes the gift of faith; which stricter signification we shall prove below.

Obs. III. Regeneration is active on the part of God, passive on the part of the sinner. For just as no son of man generates himself, so no son of God regenerates himself. Therefore, just as natural generation is active only of the father, passive only of the one begotten; so active generation is attributed only to God, passive regeneration to man. Add that conversion indeed in the sacred letters is sometimes taken transitively, sometimes intransitively; but regeneration is always taken transitively; for nowhere in Holy Scripture is it said that man regenerates himself, or ought to regenerate himself.

Obs. IV. Synonyms of regeneration are: 1) Vivification, Ephesians II, 5. For just as generation is the communication of natural life; so regeneration is the communication of spiritual life. 2) A new creation, Psalm LI, 12. Whence also the regenerate are called a new creature, 2 Corinthians V, 17; Galatians VI, 15. The first creation was made by the infinite power of the creator; so regeneration is done by the infinite power of God. The difference is that God founded the world by absolute power; but he regenerates the sinner by ordinate power. 3) Resuscitation, Ephesians II, 6. For just as the resuscitation of the dead is a translation from death to life; so regeneration is a translation of the sinner from the death of sin into a state of living faith. 4) Conversion, as it is accepted in a special, not a most special sense. See above ch. VI, Question IV, obs. III.

Question II. Who regenerates the sinful man?

Efficient cause. The Triune God regenerates the sinner a), the Father b), the Son of God c), and the Holy Spirit, to whom regeneration is attributed appropriatively and terminatively d).

Proof a. From John I, 12-13: "Who believe in his name, were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." John teaches by these words that the origin of regeneration is not to be attributed to blood, i.e., to natural generation from faithful parents (just as the Jews thought themselves to be sons of God, because they derived their origin from the blood of Abraham), nor to the will of the flesh, i.e., to the natural powers of free will, nor to the will of man, i.e., not to the endeavors or brilliantly performed deeds of some outstanding and strenuous man, but solely to God, the parent and author of spiritual generation. Moreover, regeneration is common to the three persons of the divinity; for this reason, that it is an action ad extra, and terminates in an effect to be really produced within man.

Proof b. Peter affirms that God the Father regenerates us, 1 Epistle I, 3: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy has regenerated us to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." The efficacious grace of God the Father excites faith in Christ. "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him," says the Savior, John VI, 44.

Proof c. The Son of God, by reason of spiritual generation to eternal life, is called the Father of eternity, Isaiah IX, 6; the Father of many sons, Isaiah VIII, 18; Hebrews II, 13, to whom a most numerous throng of sons is generated just as dew is most copiously born from the womb of the dawn, Psalm CX, 3.

Proof d. Regeneration is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, because he is the spirit of faith, 2 Corinthians IV, 13, who kindles and gives faith. He is the spirit of adoption (υιοθεσίας), in whom we cry: Abba, Father, Romans VIII, 15. Therefore, he is the author of regeneration, which is vindicated for him by Christ himself, John III, 3, 5, 6: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; but that which is born of the Spirit is spirit"; and by Paul, Titus III, 5, calling baptism the washing of regeneration of the Holy Spirit.

Question III. What moved God to regenerate sinful men?

Impulsive cause. Internally, God was moved to regenerate sinful men by his mercy, most inclined toward the fallen human race a). Externally, the satisfaction and merit of Christ the mediator impelled him b).

Proof a. From 1 Peter I, 3: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy has regenerated us." God was not moved to regenerate the sinner by the natural aptitude or capacity of man, much less by his merit; for there was none, but by mere mercy; although the most profound misery of man, dead in sins, provided God with an occasion for mercy. This Paul inculcates on us, Ephesians II, 4: "God, who is rich in mercy, because of the great love with which he loved us, even when we were dead in our trespasses, made us alive together with Christ." The same is implied by James, ch. I, 18: "The Father of lights βουληθεὶς ἀπεκύησεν ἡμᾶς," i.e., by his beneficent and gracious will he begot us.

Proof b. Christ by his obedience most fully satisfied divine justice, so that, this being safe, God could exert his mercy on man dead in sins, and confer life anew upon him. Paul, indicating this, says, 1 Corinthians IV, 15: "In Christ," he says, "Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." D. CALOV, expounding these words in his Biblia Illustrata on this passage, says: "Paul begot the Corinthians in Christ Jesus, i.e., by the merit and efficacy of Christ, as mediator and redeemer, through and on account of whom we are regenerated to spiritual and eternal life." Therefore Peter asserts, 1 Epistle I, 3, that God has regenerated us to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. The Apostle attributes our regeneration to the resurrection of Christ, a) because this, taken complexly, as it includes the death of Christ, is the meritorious cause of regeneration; b) because by the same all the merits of Christ have been sealed, c) because Christ was therefore raised and exalted into heaven, that he might pour out the spirit of faith into our hearts, John XVI, 7.

Question IV. By what means does the Holy Spirit regenerate the sinner?

Means of regeneration. The means, through which the Holy Spirit regenerates the sinner, and with which he concurs to produce faith, are the word of the gospel a) and the sacrament of baptism b).

Proof a. 1) Paul distinctly says: "In Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel," 1 Corinthians IV, 15. The Apostle begot the Corinthians, with Christ as leader and guide, not through the law, by which contrition and sorrow for sins is excited, but through the gospel, by which trust in Christ is excited.

2. From 1 Peter I, 23: "You have been born again, not of perishable seed but of imperishable, through the living and abiding word of God." The Apostle distinguishes between the perishable seed of earthly crops, and the imperishable seed of the divine word, which is imperishable both formally, inasmuch as it is the eternal concept of the divine mind; and effectively, because it leads to eternal life. The word of God is also a living seed, because it is a fecund and efficacious seed for producing living faith in Christ.

3. From James I, 18: "It pleased him (the Father of lights) to beget us by the word of truth." We learn from Ephesians I, 13 that the gospel is the word of truth, where the Apostle says: "You have heard the word of truth, the gospel of our salvation." Not without emphasis is the gospel called the word of truth, because it is not only true in itself, just as the word of the law is, but because it also truly regenerates, and the life of grace and glory which it promises, it actually confers.

Proof b. That baptism is the ordinary means of regeneration is clearly evident from John III, 5, where Christ, about to reveal the way to heaven to Nicodemus, says: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." By water in this passage is not understood the Holy Spirit; because otherwise a tautology would be committed, but true and natural water, united with the Holy Spirit, who makes the baptismal water a salutary means of regeneration. Whence baptism is called λουτρὸν παλιγγενεσίας, the washing of regeneration, Titus III, 5.

The antithesis is that of the Schwenckfeldians, who deny that the word of God and baptism are efficacious means of regeneration. Their arguments are:

I. Regeneration is an action of the Holy Spirit, which is performed by infinite power: Therefore, it is not to be attributed to the word of God. Resp. Regeneration is attributed to the Holy Spirit as the principal cause, and to the word of God, as the efficacious means of regeneration.

II. Whatever is a creature cannot regenerate a sinner; But Holy Scripture, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because for regeneration infinite power is required, which does not fall upon a creature. I respond with the words of D. CALOV in systema theologicum, vol. I, p. 717: The word of God, formally considered, is not to be counted in the catalog of creatures; since it is a divine concept, the mind of God, the counsel of God, as it is described in the sacred letters. For who would count a divine concept, who the mind of God and the counsel of God among creatures?

III. The word of God is a killing letter, 2 Corinthians III, 6: Therefore, it does not regenerate or vivify. Resp. In the cited passage, the word of the law is understood, denouncing temporal and eternal death to the disobedient; but the seed of regeneration is the gospel.

IV. Baptism is an external element; Therefore, it cannot internally and spiritually regenerate the soul. Resp. Baptism is an external element, joined with the divine word and the name of the Holy Trinity, from which it has the efficacy of regenerating.

V. Adults are not regenerated by the water of baptism; because they are born again by the divine word, by which they were previously informed; nor infants; because in succeeding years they turn out malicious; which is an indication that they were not born again through baptism. Resp. By the baptism of adults, regeneration is confirmed; infants are truly regenerated by the washing of baptism; but if in the course of time they become malicious, by their own fault they fall from the state of regeneration, because they allow themselves to be overcome by the flesh and the devil.

VI. If baptism truly regenerates us, trust can be placed in it; which, however, is idolatrous. Resp. Trust is to be placed in God, not in the means.

Question V. What ministers does God use in the regeneration of men?

Ministerial cause. The ministers whom God uses in the act of ordinary regeneration are sacred preachers, who are said to generate spiritually, inasmuch as they apply the word of God and baptism to men to be regenerated not by their own authority, but by God's, and according to divine institution.

Proof. Paul in his epistle to Philemon, v. 10, asserts that he had begotten Onesimus in his chains. And to the Galatians IV, 19, the Apostle writes: "My little children, for whom I am again in the anguish of childbirth until Christ is formed in you." To be sure, the ministers of the church generate not as principal causes, but as subordinate ones, inasmuch as they sow the seed of the gospel in hearts, and rightly apply baptism. But the supereminent power of regenerating is not from men, but from God alone, 2 Corinthians IV, 7. This the Apostle indicates, 1 Corinthians IV, 15: "In Christ through the gospel I have begotten you," as if to say: The Lord Jesus by his infinite power has regenerated you through the gospel, preached by me among you, so that from Gentiles you might become Christians, from unbelievers faithful, from sons of wrath you might be born sons of grace, and heirs of the heavenly kingdom.

Question VI. Which men are regenerated?

The subject which. Men lacking spiritual life are regenerated a), but not stubbornly resisting b), both infants c), and adults informed by the word of God, and struck and contrite by the thunder of the divine law d).

Proof a. Men living in the faith which is in the Son of God, as the reborn are described by Paul, Galatians II, 20, are not, properly speaking, the subject of regeneration. For just as not the living, but the dead, are resurrected from temporal death to the life of glory; so not the reborn, but those lacking the life of faith, are resurrected from spiritual death to the life of grace.

Proof b. Prevenient and preparing grace indeed diminishes and breaks natural repugnance, lest it impede regenerating grace; but the sinner who opposes the means of grace with voluntary and obstinate resistance is not a capable subject of regeneration through the audible and visible word (verbum ākouσtōv kaì ōpatōv), i.e., through the gospel and baptism. This assertion of ours is clear from examples. The Pharisees and lawyers rejected the will of God against themselves, and therefore were not baptized by John, Luke VII, 30. Paul and Barnabas said to the Jews: "It was necessary that the word of God be spoken first to you; but since you reject it, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life; behold, we turn to the Gentiles. For so the Lord has commanded us; I have made you a light for the Gentiles, that you may be for salvation to the ends of the earth." When the Gentiles heard this, they were glad and glorified the word of the Lord, as many as were ordained to eternal life, Acts XIII, 46-48. From these it is clearly evident that neither are those regenerated by baptism who reject the counsel of God concerning the communication of eternal salvation through the ordinary means against themselves, i.e., to their own greatest harm, nor are those brought to faith by the gospel who maliciously repel it. Therefore, those are regenerated and endowed with faith who do not reject or neglect the order (τάξις) divinely prescribed, but admit it.

Proof c. 1) Whoever are flesh born of flesh, and yet can enter the kingdom of heaven, must be regenerated; But infants, etc. Therefore. The major is clear from John III, 5-6; Romans VIII, 6-8. The minor is clear from Luke XVIII, 16; Matthew XVIII, 10, collated with Hebrews I, 14.

2. Whoever believe are reborn, John I, 12. Infants believe, Matthew XVIII, 6; Mark IX, 42. Therefore.

3. Infants escape eternal damnation, Matthew XVIII, 14. Therefore, they are not incapable of regeneration, through which they become sons of God, John I, 12-13. But the sons of God escape eternal damnation, since they are heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ, Romans VIII, 17.

Proof d. By information, the eyes of adults are opened, so that they may be converted from darkness to the light of faith, and from the power of Satan to God, and thus are truly regenerated, Acts XXVI, 18. God crushes their stony hearts by the law, so that contrition may be a disposition for kindling faith in them. Whence our D. CHEMNITZ gravely says in Loci Theologici, P. II, p. 1: "Unless the stony heart has first been subdued and bruised by the hammer of the law, Jeremiah XXIII, 29, it is not capable of the doctrine of the gospel, but new wine is poured into old wineskins, Matthew IX, 17."

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists and Socinians, who deny that infants are capable of regeneration. Their more important arguments are:

I. Those in whom the corruption of life does not fall, in them regeneration does not fall; But in infants, etc. does not fall. Therefore. The major is constant; because regeneration is the reformation of a corrupt life. Resp. 1) The reformation of a corrupt life is not regeneration, but renewal. Cf. D. SCHERZER, in collegium Anti-Socinianum, Disp. LXXVI, p. 670. 2) Distinguish between original corruption of life, and actual, deliberate corruption. Not indeed the latter, but the former falls in infants. For whatever is born of the flesh is corrupt flesh, consequently it is regenerable by the Spirit, John III, 5-6.

II. Infants are not capable of faith: because they do not use reason, not knowing what is right or left, Jonah IV, 11. Therefore, they are not capable of regeneration. Resp. 1) Many adult phrenetics, those in agony, and those buried in sleep do not use reason, and yet they have faith. Faith does not depend on the use of reason, but reason must be taken captive to the obedience of faith, 2 Corinthians X, 5; indeed, raging reason often impedes the generation of faith. 2) Infants have not a reflexive or discursive faith, but a direct and simple one, kindled by the Holy Spirit, whom they do not maliciously resist, through baptism.

III. For the kindling of faith, the hearing of the divine word is required, Romans X, 17, which infants on account of their age can neither hear nor understand. Resp. For the kindling of faith, the word of the gospel and baptism are required; which means of grace are not opposed, but consonant. In adults, faith is kindled through the hearing of the word, in infants through the use of baptism.

Question VII. Is it the intellect or the will of the sinner that is regenerated?

Through regenerating grace, a more intense and fuller light of the true knowledge of God is kindled in the intellect of the adult sinner, and indeed as much as is required for justifying faith to be conceived in the mind a). In his will, illuminated by the gospel, trust in Christ is excited b).

Obs. In the present, our speech is chiefly about the regeneration of the intellect and will of adult sinners; the regeneration of infants is somewhat more difficult to understand. Yet we have no doubt that the intellect of infants in regeneration through baptism is imbued by the Holy Spirit with a salutary knowledge of God, and their will is endowed with trust in Christ. We acquiesce here in the judgment of D. CHEMNITZ in his Examen Concilii Tridentini, f. 246: "Although we neither sufficiently understand, nor can we explain in words, what kind of action and operation of the Holy Spirit that is in infants who are baptized; yet that it is and is done from the word of God is certain. But that action or operation of the Holy Spirit in infants we call faith, and we say that little ones believe. For that medium or organ by which the kingdom of God, which is offered in the word and sacraments, is received, scripture calls faith; and says that believers receive the kingdom of God. And indeed in Mark X, 15, Christ affirms that adults receive the kingdom of God just as little ones receive it. And in Matthew XVIII, 6, he says: 'Whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to stumble.' And among those little ones he also numbers a παιδίον, a young child. Besides, circumcision in general is called a seal of the righteousness of faith, Romans IV, 11. But if the righteousness of faith is attributed to circumcised infants, faith itself is also attributed to them."

Proof a. Although the intellect of an adult sinner, before the act of conversion and regeneration, attains by a pedagogical and imperfect illumination to a literal knowledge of the things to be believed; yet in conversion through the law a knowledge of sin, practically applied to the detesting of sin, and in regeneration a fuller knowledge of Christ is kindled, so that it exerts itself more clearly, diffuses itself more abundantly into the will, and more solidly instructs and directs it to a trusting embrace of the mediator. The words of the Apostle, Ephesians V, 14, seem to look to this: "For this reason it says: Awake, O sleeper, and arise from the dead, that Christ may shine upon you." As soon as the lethargy of security is shaken off the sinner by conversion from the law, and he is resuscitated from spiritual death by regeneration, Christ the light of the world fills his intellect with a distinct knowledge of himself, so that through it he may be constituted spiritually alive.

Proof b. Through regeneration, trust in Christ is excited in the will of the contrite sinner, so that he may approach this throne of grace μετὰ παρρησίας, with confidence, receive mercy, and find grace for timely help, Hebrews IV, 16.

Question VIII. Did regeneration also obtain a place in the O.T.?

The faithful of the old testament were truly reborn.

Proof 1) Faith and salvation obtained a place in the O.T. Therefore, also regeneration. The antecedent is clear from the saying of the Apostle James, Acts XV, 11: "We believe that we will be saved through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, just as they also were" (namely, the Fathers, v. 10) (*).

2) In the O.T. God was the Father of the faithful, Deuteronomy XXXII, 6, and they were his sons, Isaiah I, 2; Jeremiah XXXI, 20. Therefore, the faithful of the O.T. were reborn.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that regeneration obtained a place in the O.T., whose principal argument is: "We have been regenerated through the resurrection of Christ," 1 Peter I, 3. Therefore, before the resurrection of Christ, no one was regenerated.

Resp. We are regenerated through the resurrection of Christ as a meritorious cause, or rather as sealing the merit, which operates before and after. The Fathers in the O.T. believed in Christ to be incarnated, to die, and to be raised from the dead.

Question IX. In what does regeneration formally consist?

Form of regeneration. Regeneration formally consists in the gift of faith.

Obs. I. The formal aspect of faith is thus expounded by D. CALOV, that it is the procreation of saving faith, also the excitation of trust in our heart, in Biblia Illustrata on John III, 5, fol. 692. By D. KOENIG it is explained by the bestowal of spiritual life. But he does not take spiritual life totally, as it includes immunity from the dominion and guilt of sin besides the attainment of the powers of believing; but partially, inasmuch as it denotes the supernatural powers of believing that have been conferred. See theologia positiva, p. 191. It is therefore more lucidly explained also by D. QUENSTEDT in his systema, Part III, ch. VI, fol. 482: "The form of regeneration consists in the gift of spiritual life, in the bestowal of the powers of believing, and of saving faith, or in the illumination of our mind, and the excitation of our trust in our heart." It is also expressed nervously by D. FECHT in sylloge controversiarum, disp. XXVII: "Regeneration is the conferral of the powers of a new and spiritual life, which consists in faith."

Obs. II. The conferral of the powers of believing, by which some authors explain the form of regeneration, and the gift of faith agree in a certain respect. For those powers either receive the salutary object, and thus are formally faith itself, John I, 12, or they are considered outside of this reception, and thus are merely passive, until they embrace Christ, on whom the efficacy of faith depends.

Proof 1) From Galatians II, 20: "It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God." We gather from this saying that the life of the regenerate is faith, and that regeneration consists in the gift of faith.

2) The reborn are described in the sacred letters as being believers in Jesus Christ; Therefore. Regeneration is the action by which man is made a believer, i.e., by which faith is excited. The antecedent is clear a) from John I, 13: "Who believe in his name (of Christ), were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." Dialectically you would say: who are born of God, believe in his name. b) 1 John V, 1: "Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ has been born of God."

3) By which divine action we are constituted spiritual sons of God, that is properly called regeneration; But by the gift of faith, etc. Therefore. The major is clear from the analogy of carnal generation. Just as by this natural sons are made; so by regeneration spiritual sons are procreated. The minor is proved a) from John I, 12: "As many as received Christ, to them he gave the power to become sons of God, (namely) to those who believe in his name." b) Galatians III, 26: "You are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus."

Question X. What is the terminus a quo and ad quem of regeneration?

Terminus a quo and ad quem of regeneration. The terminus a quo of regeneration in the abstract is spiritual death, inasmuch as this denotes ἀπιστίαν, unbelief, and the lack of the powers of believing. The terminus ad quem in the abstract is spiritual life, or true faith, joined with Christ the mediator, uniting his merit with us, so that it becomes ours a). The terminus a quo of regeneration in the concrete is the sinner, indeed contrite by the divine law, but lacking the powers of believing, and hitherto spiritually dead. The terminus ad quem in the concrete is the believing man, or one endowed with living faith in Christ through the gospel, and therefore spiritually alive b).

(*) We have noted that the meaning of that saying is to be understood differently on page 34. But these are the clearest testimonies which confirm this matter; 2 Corinthians IV, 13; Hebrews X, 38; XI, 1 ff. coll. with XII, 1-2.

Obs. Spiritual death here is not taken holistically (ὁλικῶς), or totally, as it imports, besides the privation of the powers of believing, also the lack of the powers of living holily, together with the dominion and guilt of sin; but partially (μερικῶς), inasmuch as it means ἀπιστίαν, or the impotence of believing in Christ, and of embracing the grace of God founded on this.

Proof a. From Galatians II, 20: "It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me. And the life I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." The meaning is: Whatever spiritual life is in me, is not from me, or my carnal nativity, but proceeds from Christ, and his merit and efficacy, through spiritual regeneration, which indeed has endowed me with faith, which apprehends the grace and merit of Christ, and unites Christ with me, so that Christ lives in me, and I in Christ. Concerning which trusting apprehension of Christ D. JO. MUSAEUS discourses excellently in his tractate de conversione, disp. IV, § CCXV, p. 240: "Apprehension is attributed to faith, not because it joins or unites in any way whatever, but because it unites Christ the mediator, and his merit to us, so that it becomes ours; which it does on the part of the intellect, by believing that Christ is my, your, and everyone's mediator, who by his passion and death has satisfied God for the sins of all and each, etc.; on the part of the will, however, by securely reposing and acquiescing in him, as the one believed mediator and author of the grace and remission of sins to be obtained for us. For not just any uniting act is apprehension, but that one at last by which a thing is united to us, so that it becomes ours, helps us, raises us up, sustains us. Therefore, the union between faith and Christ is such as is between apprehension and the good apprehended; which union, if you consider it rightly, you would not incongruously call the formal union of faith, so that it may be distinguished from the mystical union, as its effect." Whence it is concluded that faith is not alive outside of Christ, but when united with Christ. For just as the body is said to be alive because it is united with the soul, by which it is perfected; so faith is alive which is united with Christ, by whom it is animated. See D. DANNHAVER in his disputation de nexu et origine donorum gratiae, th. XV.

Proof b. From Ephesians II, 5: "God, being rich in mercy, even when we were dead in our trespasses, made us alive together with Christ." Before regeneration the sinner is dead, and therefore destitute of powers to receive spiritual life; which also he does not obtain from the law, which indeed is a killing letter; but from the gospel, through which the Holy Spirit vivifies, 2 Corinthians III, 6, by kindling true faith, which unites Christ with us, so that being joined with him we may live the life which is from God, Ephesians IV, 18.

Question XI. What kind of change does regeneration bring about?

Regeneration brings about a change in the sinner that is not substantial, but accidental.

Proof 1) Regeneration is spiritual vivification, Galatians II, 20. Now, those very same ones who are dead in sins are spiritually vivified, Ephesians II, 1. Therefore, those same ones who were previously not reborn are regenerated by the Holy Spirit.

2) Just as the substance itself of man is not destroyed by sin; so neither by regeneration is a new essence created, but the state of man is accidentally changed; because through regeneration he is transferred from a state of unbelief into a state of faith.

The antithesis is 1) of the Schwenckfeldians, Weigelians, and Anabaptists, who dream that by regeneration the prior substance of the body is abolished, and while the same soul remains, a new body is given, essentially different from the prior one; 2) of the Flacians, who maintain that God in conversion and regeneration creates a new heart, and thus a new man, in such a way that the substance of the old Adam, and especially the rational soul, is utterly abolished, and a new essence of the soul is created from nothing. Their chief arguments are:

I. Creation is the production of a substance, for it is an action with a substantial term. Regeneration is the creation of a new heart, Psalm LI, 12. Therefore, regeneration is the production of a new substance. Resp. Creation properly so called is the production of a substance. But in that passage, creation is taken improperly, and denotes not the production of a substantially different heart, but the restoration of a heart, instructed with new, and those spiritual, powers. For David's speech is not about the creation of a new heart as to essence, but about the creation of a pure heart, i.e., one purged from the filth of sins.

II. The reborn is called a new creature, 2 Corinthians V, 17; a new man, Ephesians IV, 24; Colossians III, 10. Whence arises the argument; He who through regeneration becomes a new man and a new creature, receives a new substance through regeneration. But the contrite sinner, etc. Therefore. The major is constant; because "new man" and "new creature" denote a new substance. Resp. He is called a new man and a new creature on account of the new spiritual powers conferred in regeneration and renewal, by which the image of God is repaired, which consists in the knowledge of God, Colossians III, 10, in righteousness and true holiness, Ephesians IV, 24. Therefore, he is called a new man not physically, with respect to substance, but mystically, with respect to spiritual powers and qualities.

Question XII. Do the reborn receive a new nature from God by the benefit of regeneration?

The reborn by the benefit of regeneration obtain from God not a new nature, but supernatural powers.

Proof. If the reborn by the benefit of regeneration obtain a new nature, this will be either a new substance, or new natural powers. But a new substance is not given divinely through regeneration; because regeneration brings about a change in the sinner that is not substantial, but accidental; nor are new natural powers conferred through regeneration; for the reason that the powers of believing are not native, or natural, but given and supernatural. Therefore, the reborn by the benefit of regeneration do not obtain a new nature from God.

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists and Weigelians, whose principal argument is: Those to whom God by the benefit of regeneration imparts the divine nature, obtain a new nature; But God to converted sinners, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from 2 Peter I, 4, where the Apostle Peter asserts that the regenerate are κοινωνοὶ θείας φύσεως, partakers of the divine nature.

Resp. The regenerate are rendered partakers of the divine nature not through regeneration, but by the gracious indwelling of God, and the spiritual union with Christ. D. GERHARD lucidly explains the words of

Peter in his harmonia evangelica, p. 552: "Christ makes us κοινωνοὺς of τῆς θείας φύσεως by the gift, 2 Peter I, 4, which is to be understood not of a transfusion of the divine essence into us, nor of some essential conversion of our souls or bodies into the divine nature, but of the spiritual union of the faithful with God, and the spiritual and mystical communication arising from the same."

Question XIII. Is regeneration the reformation of life and actions?

Regeneration is formally not the reformation of a past life.

Proof a) Because regeneration differs from renewal, and the former is prior to the latter, Titus III, 5. Therefore, one cannot be defined by the other. The antecedent is confirmed: regeneration confers the first spiritual being, when we are begotten as sons of God through faith; but this reformation, or change, presupposes that first being, and belongs to a man already regenerate.

b) As natural generation is not the change of natural life; so spiritual regeneration is not the change of spiritual life.

c) Infants are truly regenerated by baptism; who yet, being prevented by death, are unable to change their life for the better. The thief on the cross, converted, Luke XXIII, 40, was certainly regenerated, otherwise he would not have entered the kingdom of God, John III, 5; 1 Corinthians XV, 50; yet he could not amend his past life.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who describe regeneration by the reformation of a past life according to the precepts of Christ. Their arguments are:

I. Regeneration in the sacred letters is described by the putting on of the new man, and the putting off of the old man, Ephesians IV, 24; by a solicitous flight from and hatred of sin, 1 John III, 9. Resp. These predicates do not pertain to regeneration, but to renewal. They do not enter into the essence and form of regeneration, but are its fruit and effect, its signs and testimonies.

II. Just as one who is born is changed from not being to being; so one is said to be reborn who, as far as the manner of life is concerned, becomes one who he was not before, namely, devoted to the study of righteousness and holiness, when at one time he had given himself over to sin. Resp. I invert the argument; Just as one who is born naturally is changed from not being to the first natural being; so one who is reborn is changed from not being to the first spiritual being: But a reformed life is not the first spiritual being, but has arisen from the first.

Objection: The regenerated man changes his life: Therefore, regeneration is the change of life. Resp. I deny the consequence. By the same reasoning someone might conclude: The vivified Lazarus walked, John XI, 44. Therefore, vivification is walking. Nonsense!

Question XIV. Is the regeneration of a sinful man completed in a moment, or is it successive?

The regeneration of infants is instantaneous a), but the ordinary regeneration of adult men is successive b).

Proof a. In infants, there is no affected and morose repugnance; but their natural resistance the grace of the Holy Spirit, joined with baptism, breaks and restrains, lest it impede regeneration. For which reason their rebirth is completed in one moment.

Proof b. For a Jew, Turk, or gentile adult to be regenerated, there are many scruples, which must be uprooted with applied care, and he must be illuminated and informed from the divine word over a longer tract of time, until full faith is kindled in his soul. Therefore OLEARIUS rightly teaches in his indicula to Balduin, p. 155: "The form of regeneration consists in the successive communication of grace, and the collation of faith and spiritual life; it is therefore not a sudden action, but one to be perfected in a certain order." Nor is there reason for us to doubt this, since Paul, by his anxious labor in childbirth (which is the emphatic signification of the word ᾠδίνω), not obscurely implies a delay and tract of regeneration, Galatians IV, 19.

You say: I. Theologians of great name assert that regeneration is instantaneous. Cf. D. DANNHAVER in Hodosophia, p. 924. D. CALOV in Biblia Illustrata on John III, 3, f. 692. D. QUENSTEDT in systema, part III, f. 632. Resp. Those theologians seem to have had in view 1) the regeneration of infants; 2) the collation of the beginnings of faith in adults, as to the first holy thought and desire.

You say: II. Natural generation happens in an instant; Therefore, so does spiritual regeneration. Resp. That analogy is not to be extended beyond its third term. The reason for the difference is that through natural generation a substance is produced in an instant due to no interposed impediment, but through regeneration new qualities are produced successively in adults, who not rarely interpose an impediment to the perfecting of regeneration.

Question XV. Is regeneration an efficacious act of the Holy Spirit?

Regeneration is an action of the Holy Spirit that is efficacious and sufficient for producing faith a), but it is not irresistible b).

Proof a. Paul wills "that we may know what is the exceeding greatness of the power of God toward us who believe, according to the working of his mighty strength," Ephesians I, 19. The Apostle indicates that our faith is due not to our natural powers, but to the most efficacious operation of God. The doctor of the Gentiles does not speak of the absolute power of God, by which he can also effect those things which he does not will; but of the power conjoined with his will, and that, not as it exerted itself in creating the world, and still exerts itself in ruling the same, but as it is occupied with converting sinners, whom God by his ordinary power endows with true faith, and preserves in faith; "For by the power of God we are guarded through faith for salvation," 1 Peter I, 5.

Proof b. Because God in regenerating men does not exert his absolute power, it often comes to pass that a contumacious sinner places a malicious obstacle to regenerating grace, and petulantly rejects the offered means of salvation. When the Apostle Paul, agitated by the Holy Spirit, testified that Jesus was the Christ, the Jews opposed him and blasphemed so much that the Apostle, shaking out his garments, said to them: "Your blood be on your own heads; I am clean. From now on I will go to the Gentiles," Acts XVIII, 5-6.

Question XVI. Is the regeneration of a sinful man perfect?

Regeneration is a perfect action on the part of God a); but on the part of the receiving subject, or the sinful man, regeneration is not simply perfect b).

Proof a. Since every work of God is good and perfect, regeneration on the part of the efficient cause, or God, is certainly perfect without any defect.

Proof b. Although the Holy Spirit acts perfectly, being about to regenerate a sinner; yet the sinner does not perfectly receive the influx of the Holy Spirit. Hence it is that faith, to which regeneration tends, can grow and diminish. See Luke XVII, 5. And although faith is essentially perfect with respect to its parts; it is not, however, always perfect accidentally with respect to its degrees.

Question XVII. Is regeneration amissible?

By sins committed with deliberate purpose and which devastate the conscience, the grace of regeneration is lost.

Proof. From 1 Timothy I, 19: "Fight the good fight, holding on to faith and a good conscience, which some have rejected and have made a shipwreck of their faith." From this apostolic oracle we argue: He who makes a shipwreck of faith loses the grace of regeneration; But a reborn man, by sinning ἐκ προαιρέσεως (deliberately), devastates his conscience and makes a shipwreck of his faith. Therefore.

The antithesis is that of the Anabaptists, who maintain that the reborn cannot lose the Holy Spirit. They go about fortifying their opinion with the following arguments:

I. The sons of God are born of imperishable seed, 1 Peter I, 23. Therefore, that seed cannot be lost. Resp. That seed of the divine word is imperishable absolutely and in itself, but respectively, namely with respect to man sinning deliberately (προαιρετικῶς), it is amissible; for it is often taken away from the heart, Luke VIII, 12. Just as the rays of the sun are incorruptible, yet when night approaches, they are withdrawn from our sight.

II. Everyone who is born of God does not commit sin; because his seed remains in him; indeed, he cannot sin, insofar as he is born of God, 1 John III, 9. Resp. The reborn, insofar as he is reborn, and as long as the seed of regeneration remains vigorous in his heart, does not commit sin against conscience proceeding from a deliberate purpose of mind. Indeed, he cannot sin ἐκ προαιρέσεως, and at the same time remain a son of God. He can, however, sin even mortally, insofar as he allows himself to be overcome by the snares of the devil, the love of the world, and the enticements of the flesh.

III. Nothing can separate the faithful from the love of God, Romans VIII, 38. Resp. No external creature can separate the faithful from the love of God; but indwelling sin (which is not a creature), if dominion is permitted to it, tears them away from God.

Question XVIII. Is lost regeneration reiterable?

Lost regeneration can be recovered by a penitent sinner.

Proof. From Galatians IV, 19: Τεκνία μου, οὓς πάλιν ὠδίνω, "my little children, for whom I am again in the anguish of childbirth." Ὤδινειν belongs to mothers, carrying a fetus in the womb with great trouble, until it assumes the form of a perfect man. The Apostle therefore implies that he has anxious care for the Galatians, because, having been corrupted by Pseudo-apostles, they had lost the form of Christ, and he strives intensely that they may be formed anew by the seed of the gospel sown in their hearts, so that the image of Christ, which they had lost, may shine forth in them by a reiterated regeneration.

You say: Baptism, the ordinary means of regeneration, cannot be repeated: Therefore, neither can lost regeneration be recovered.

Resp. Regeneration is recovered not through baptism, but through the seed of the divine word, from which faith in Christ is again conceived and thus the converted sinner begins to live again.

Question XIX. Does God will to convert and regenerate a sinner three, four, or more times?

Reborn men, aided by the preserving grace of God, are solicitously on guard not to wound their conscience by a repeated malicious sin a); but if nevertheless, overcome by the machinations of the devil, the enticements of the world, and the suggestions of the flesh, they fall three, four, or more times into mortal sin, they by no means doubt the converting and regenerating grace of God b).

Proof a. From 1 John V, 18: "We know that everyone who has been born of God does not sin; but he who was born of God keeps himself, and the evil one does not touch him." The reborn are vigilant for their own salvation, lest, being polluted by deliberate sins, they fall from the hope of eternal life; and although they are solicited by the devil to sin, they repel his fiery darts with the shield of faith, Ephesians VI, 16.

Proof b. 1) So stupendous is the clemency of God that he calls back to himself a soul polluted by repeated sins, and invites it to do penance, Jeremiah III, 1: "You have played the harlot with many lovers; yet return to me! says Jehovah."

2. When Peter asked Christ: "Lord, how often will my brother sin against me, and I must forgive him? As many as seven times?" Jesus said to him: "I do not say to you seven times, but seventy-seven times," Matthew XVIII, 21. From these arises the argument: What Christ commands men to do, by the example of his Father, God performs in an infinitely more excellent manner. But Christ commands men that by the example of his Father (see Matthew V, 48), even the reborn, after acknowledging the truth, should forgive even grave sins committed against them more often. Therefore, God, moved by a far more inclined mercy, remits sins more often; but he would not remit, unless he willed to convert and regenerate man more often.

3. That God converts and regenerates a sinner three, four, or more times can be proved by lucid examples: a) In Moses, God considered it a mortal crime that he omitted circumcision for the sake of his wife and tender son, Exodus IV, 24. The same sinned so gravely at the waters of strife that he even lost faith, Numbers XX, 12. We assert as true that he was converted and reborn three times. b) We observe three mortal sins of Aaron. The first was idolatry, Exodus XXXII. The second was contempt for Moses, Numbers XII, 1-2. The third was unbelief (ἀπιστία), by which he rendered himself odious to God at the waters of strife, together with his brother Moses, Numbers XX, 12. He was therefore reborn four times (in infancy, when he was circumcised, and after committing three great crimes). c) The two lethal sins of king David are notorious. The first was adultery with Bathsheba, and the murder of Uriah procured by him, 2 Samuel XI, 4, 15. The second was the foolish and unfortunate numbering of the people. Compare 2 Samuel XXIV, 1 ff. with 1 Chronicles XXI ff. Which sin was certainly mortal. For it was committed at the instigation of the devil, with God being angry, and punishing most severely. David confessed: "I have sinned greatly," 1 Chronicles XXI, 8.

You say: Only one mortal sin of David is recounted in 1 Kings XV, 5: "David did what was right in the eyes of Jehovah, and did not turn aside from anything that he had commanded him, all the days of his life; except in the matter of Uriah the Hittite." Resp. 1) David did right in the eyes of the Lord both by acting well, as long as he stood in faith, and by rising again through repentance, when he had fallen from the state of faith. 2) David did not turn aside from the divine precepts written explicitly and in express letters, except in the matter of Uriah the Hittite. For then by committing adultery and killing he sinned against the express precepts of God, V, VI, VIII, X. It was therefore a most scandalous external sin, against so many precepts written with the divine finger, the like of which there was no other of David's. But the numbering of the people was prohibited by no divine precept in distinct letters; but God, the knower of hearts (καρδιογνώστης), saw the internal pride of the soul from which the census of the people proceeded, and esteemed and vindicated it as a lethal sin.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that God converts and regenerates a man three or four times (*).<sup>224</sup> Whose principal arguments are:

I. The reborn do not commit sin, 1 John III, 9. Therefore, they do not need a threefold regeneration. Resp. The reborn, as long as they are reborn, and as long as the seed of the divine word remains vigorous in their mindful memory, do not sin from deliberate choice (ἐκ προαιρέσεως); but the same, insofar as they succumb to the temptations of the devil and the enticements of the flesh, commit mortal sin.

(*) And the Reformed opine that this cannot even happen a second time. For they say that true faith cannot be lost, certainly that which some of them call rooted, some seminal, in vain appealing to this saying, 1 John III, 9. But that that seed is not faith, but the word of God, perceived by the mind, is plainly apparent from 1 Peter I, 23, 25; James I, 18, 21. Not long ago that famous EDELMANN, in the book which he falsely inscribed, Unschuldige Wahrheiten (Innocent Truths), VI. Unterred. p. 449, put this forth; that absolutely no sin remains in a man born again, nor can it ever happen that he should lose his new disposition of mind. The principle of this error is the false definition of new generation, as if man is so generated from the very nature of God that human nature is wholly converted into the divine. This is the common opinion of FANATICAL men and PSEUDO-MYSTICS, but it is openly contrary, as to many sayings, so especially to this one, James I, 18, in which passage, 1) by that, βουληθεῖς, voluntary generation is distinguished from necessary, 2) by this, λόγῳ, the same is distinguished from natural, to be asserted of the one Son of God, begotten from the Father's nature, who indeed for this very cause is called μονογενής, and also ἴδιος Θεοῦ υἱός.

II. The reborn are perfect. For Noah, Genesis VI, 9, Abraham, Genesis XVII, 1, and David, 1 Kings XV, 5, and others, are called perfect. Therefore, they neither relapse into deliberate sins, nor are they in need of a regeneration repeated twice or three times. Resp. In those passages is not understood an absolute perfection, but a comparative one; not of consummation, but of sincerity; not continuous, but temporary, indeed liable to fail at some time, but to be repaired, or having been repaired, by repentance.

III. The faith was once for all delivered to the saints, epistle of Jude v. 3. Therefore, faith cannot be lost and given again, since it is given only once. Resp. In that passage is denoted not subjective faith, or the trust of the heart, by which one believes in Christ, but objective faith, or the doctrine of faith, which is believed, to which the participle, παραδοθειση, delivered, properly belongs. But faith is said to have been once delivered to the saints, because it was at one time perfectly and most sufficiently delivered, not to be changed, or interpolated with new additions.

IV. Whomever having been once delivered, who have relapsed a second time (τὸ δεῦτερον) into unbelief (ἀπιστίαν), God destroys, he does not convert nor regenerate them twice, three, four or more times; But the faithful, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from the epistle of Jude v. 5. Resp. The words of the cited text flow thus: "Now I want to remind you, that you know this once for all, that the Lord, when he had saved a people out of the land of Egypt, secondly destroyed those who did not believe." Cf. Numbers XIV, 35. Wherefore τὸ ἅπαξ pertains not to the participle σώσας, who saved, but to εἰδότες, knowing, so that the sense is: "know this once for all," i.e., summarily; τὸ δεῦτερον however here means "on the other hand," in which way also πάλιν is taken in Matthew IV, 7; James V, 18. See HUGO GROTIUS on this passage. Moreover, that the Israelites sinned mortally not once, but often, is clear from Numbers XIV, 22. For which reason, persevering in unbelief and the atrocity of their sins, they were destroyed by God.

V. Whoever, relapsing into deliberate sins, become worse, cannot be converted and regenerated; But the reborn, etc. Therefore. The major is constant; because conversion and regeneration make a man better; but he who is rendered worse is not amended. The minor is clear from the sayings of scripture,

2 Peter II, 20 ff.; Luke XI, 24; John V, 14. Resp. 1) 2 Peter II, 20 and Luke XI, 24 deal with apostates, who either from the true doctrine of faith to heretical doctrine, or plainly to gentile infidelity, or from piety to Epicureanism, do fall away. Their conversion and regeneration is difficult, but not simply impossible. For they are recalled by God to repentance, Jeremiah III, 1; 2 Peter III, 9, and are regenerated when they leave room for divine grace. 2) The saying of John V, 14 contains a serious dehortation from relapsing into graver sins; which dehortation the faithful ministers of the church use to this day. But from the same, a negation of regeneration repeated three or four times cannot be established.

Question XX. Is regeneration necessary for a sinner for salvation?

Regeneration is absolutely and simply necessary for a sinful man for salvation.

Proof 1) From the words of Christ, John III, 3: "Unless one is born ἄνωθεν (from above, or again), he cannot see the kingdom of God." By which words he teaches that regeneration is necessary: a) universally, for all, without distinction. For he says: "Unless one is born again," as if to say: Everyone who is born needs spiritual regeneration. b) With respect to the end, for obtaining eternal salvation. "He cannot" implies a simple impossibility; because "flesh and blood will not inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Corinthians XV, 50.

2) Just as faith in Christ is necessary for obtaining eternal life, John III, 36; So regeneration is necessary, by which faith is given.

You say: If regeneration is necessary for a man who is to attain eternal salvation; infants of Christian parents who have died in the mother's womb, or recently born and snatched by a sudden death before receiving baptism, will perish eternally; which is harsh to say. Resp. Ordinary regeneration happens through the word, 1 Peter I, 23, and through baptism, John III, 5; Titus III, 5. But extraordinary regeneration happens without external means, such as the regeneration of infants who have died before receiving baptism. For although we are obligated by the divine command to the use of external means, yet God has not so bound his regenerating grace to baptism that in the case of privation he is neither willing nor able to regenerate infants extraordinarily and immediately. How this happens, we do not solicitously pry into, but commit it to the infinite wisdom and power of God.

Question XXI. What is the end of regeneration?

Final cause. The intermediate ends of regeneration are justification a), υιοθεσια, adoption as sons of God b), and renewal c): The ultimate end on the part of men is eternal salvation d); on the part of God, the glory of divine mercy e).

Proof a. By the benefit of regeneration, the sinner, contrite by the hammer of the law, is endowed with faith, and thus is spiritually changed and made fit to be justified, or to be absolved from the guilt of fault and punishment. This Paul implies, Titus III, 5, where having made mention of the washing of regeneration, he soon adds in verse 7: "so that being justified by his grace we might become heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Therefore, regeneration precedes justification in the order of nature, not in the order of time. For, at the moment the sinner is endowed with faith in Christ, he is justified in the same moment.

Proof b. Adoption as sons of God is the end of regeneration, through the medium of justification. For through regeneration, inasmuch as it is the collation of faith, as a gift inherent in the sons of God, we are not adopted; otherwise faith would save inherently and by reason of its quality, which is false. Wherefore it is necessary that the reborn first be reconciled to God through faith, before they become sons of God. But they are reconciled to God through Christ; who indeed "redeemed us, that we might receive the adoption of sons," Galatians IV, 5. Add that no one is a spiritual son of God who has not obtained the remission of sins.

Proof c. We are baptized and reborn "that we may walk in newness of life," Romans VI, 4. For we are endowed by regenerating grace with true faith in Christ, "which works through love," Galatians V, 6. Wherefore, "if we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit," Galatians V, 25.

Proof d. God has regenerated us "into an inheritance that is imperishable, undefiled, and unfading, kept in heaven for us," 1 Peter I, 4.

Proof e. God is to be celebrated with eternal praises, who has regenerated and vivified men dead in sins out of undue and most liberal grace, so that from sons of wrath they might become sons of grace. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy has regenerated us," 1 Peter I, 3.

Question XXII. Is Christ generated in us through regeneration, so that he himself is the new man in us, and flesh of our flesh?

Properly speaking, neither is Christ born in us a), nor is he the new man in us b), nor by the benefit of regeneration does he become flesh of our flesh c).

Proof a. 1) Because that assertion, that Christ is generated in us, is unscriptural (ἄγραφον). Holy Scripture clearly teaches that God the Father has regenerated us through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, 1 Peter I, 3, and that we have been generated in Christ Jesus through the gospel, 1 Corinthians IV, 15. Which utterances of the Holy Spirit are clear and perspicuous; but the manner of speaking by which Christ himself is said to be generated in us is obscure and intricate.

2. Christ is the father of regeneration, Isaiah VIII, 18; Hebrews II, 13, who spiritually generates us, but is not generated in us.

3. The Son of God is generated from eternity in the bosom of the heavenly Father, John I, 18, not in our bosom. The generation of the Son of God is an immanent action, not an emanant or transient one.

4. Our Jesus, as man, was born in and of the virgin Mary, Luke I, 35, but is not born in or of us; otherwise he would proceed from the essence of the faithful man. For generation is the communication of essence.

5. The Quakers use that assertion, that Christ is generated in us, to corrupt the article on the justification of the sinner. For ROBERT BARCLAY is not ashamed to assert in his Apology, Prop. 7, p. 141: that the sinner is justified when Christ is formed, generated, and brought forth to light in him. Indeed, it is also the most absurd dogma of the Mystics that the generation of Christ in us is done by introversion to God. "The word of the heavenly Father is effectively generated in us as often as we perfectly turn ourselves inward to God," says GERLACUS PETRI, cited by D. LOESCHER in the preface to his theologia mystica orthodoxa, § 8.

Proof b. 1) Holy Scripture nowhere teaches that Christ is the new man. But it does not befit us to be wise above what is written, 1 Corinthians IV, 6.

2. Christ is the cause of the new man. But the cause is never predicated of the effect, nor the effect of the cause, in the nominative case.

3. The new man, formally and abstractly considered, is an accident, namely the knowledge of God, Colossians III, 10, true righteousness and holiness, Ephesians IV, 24. But as it is impossible for a substance to be transmuted into an accident; so it is also impossible for Christ to be changed into new qualities, new powers, and new motions, which, conformably to the word of God, we call the new man (taken abstractly).

4. The new man, concretely accepted, is a mere man (ψιλὸς ἄνθρωπος), instructed with new powers from God; But Christ is the God-man (θεᾶνθρωπος). Therefore, he is not the new man.

Proof c. Christ was made flesh of our flesh both through the incarnation, Hebrews II, 14, and also through the mystical union and communication, the faithful are rendered partakers of the flesh and blood of Christ, Ephesians V, 30, and become living members of the mystical body of Christ, or the church. But through regeneration, faith in Christ is kindled.

The antithesis is that of the Weigelians and Quakers, who maintain that Christ is generated in us, and is the new man, and becomes in regeneration flesh of our flesh. Their more important arguments are:

1. Whoever is formed in us, is regenerated in us (for formation presupposes generation); But Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from Galatians IV, 19, where the Apostle says: "My little children, for whom I am again in the anguish of childbirth, until Christ is formed in you." Resp. 1) I deny the major. For we receive our form and image in a mirror and on a painter's tablet, and yet we are not generated there. The image of Christ is impressed upon our souls first through faith, by which we so know the face and form of Christ as he is described before our eyes in the sacred letters; secondly through the likeness and conformity of the life and holiness of Christ. 2) The object to be generated in Paul's childbirth is not Christ, but the Galatians: "Little children," he says, "for whom I am again in the anguish of childbirth." Therefore, Christ is not generated in us, but he is formed (μορφοῦται), or imparts his conformity (συμμορφίαν) to us, so that in this life we may become like his image, just as we shall bear his image in the next life, 1 Corinthians XV, 49.

II. Revelation XII, 5: "The woman clothed with the sun (by which the church is understood) gave birth to a male child, who was to rule all the nations with a rod of iron (by whom Christ is denoted)." But if the church gives birth to Christ, why not also the faithful? For the church is the assembly of the faithful. Resp. In that passage, by "son," Christ the son of Mary is represented only by a phraseological allusion, but directly, the spiritual sons whom the militant church, which is there treated of, brings forth to God with sorrow and amidst the straits of persecutions.

III. Christ lives in us, Galatians II, 20. Therefore, he is also generated in us. Resp. Christ lives in us, not as the new man, but as the author of new life; for indeed we were created in him for good works, Ephesians II, 10. Nor is he generated in us, but, like a Father, he regenerates us.

IV. Everyone who does the will of Christ is his mother, Matthew XII, 50. Therefore, he generates Christ. Resp. One who does the will of Christ is called his mother, not on account of generation, but on account of love. For man does not generate Christ in the manner of a mother; but Christ loves him most ardently, just as a son loves his mother.

V. Orthodox theologians have used that phrase, that Christ is generated in us by faith. Resp. Those theologians, before the controversies were moved, spoke more securely, to express our most intimate union with Christ; but with Quakerism becoming prevalent, we rightly and deservedly abstain from that catachrestic allegory. But no orthodox theologian has asserted that Christ is generated in us as the new man in us, and flesh of our flesh.

Question XXIII. How do regeneration, justification, and renewal differ?

Regeneration, justification, and renewal differ: a) In the order of nature; b) With respect to the subjects; c) With respect to the terminus a quo and ad quem; d) With respect to the internal form; e) With respect to the mode of acting.

Proof a. In the order of nature, regeneration, or the gift of faith, precedes justification and renewal, without which, as we do not please God, Hebrews XI, 6, so we are neither justified nor renewed, unless we have been regenerated.

Proof b. The subject of regeneration is the sinner converted and contrite by the divine law, but lacking the life of faith, and thus spiritually dead; The subject of justification is the sinner converted and reborn, or contrite and believing in Christ; The subject of renewal is the man who is converted, reborn, and justified.

Proof c. The terminus a quo of regeneration is spiritual death, as this denotes the lack of the powers of believing, the terminus ad quem is saving faith; The terminus a quo of justification is the guilt of fault and punishment, the terminus ad quem is the remission of sins and the imputed righteousness of Christ; The terminus a quo of renewal is the dominion and remnants of sin, the terminus ad quem is the image of God and inherent holiness.

Proof d. Regeneration formally consists in the gift of faith, justification in the remission of sins and the imputation of Christ's righteousness, renewal in the liberation from the dominion and stains of sin, and in the restoration of the divine image.

Proof e. Regeneration is an action of God alone, inferring an intrinsic denomination of the subject which is regenerated, since trust in Christ is excited in his heart by the Holy Spirit, so that the sinner who is regenerated behaves purely passively. Justification is an action of God alone, inferring an extrinsic denomination of the subject which is justified; for indeed by God's estimation his own unrighteousness is not imputed to him, but another's (namely Christ's) righteousness is imputed or adjudged to him. Whence in the business of justification the sinner also behaves purely passively, since no one can absolve himself before the divine judgment. Renewal is indeed an action of God, but not of God alone, for the reason that the justified man concurs in it with powers not his own, but conferred from above, as a subordinate cause. Cf. D. CALOV in Biblia Illustrata on John III, fol. 692.

SUSPIRIUM.

By your singular benefit, O HEAVENLY FATHER, being reborn I live. What do I say, I live? CHRIST lives in me. For the life I live in the flesh, I live by faith, which is in your only-begotten SON, who loved me and gave himself up for me. O grace without my merit! O love without example! Relying on this I live tranquil and cheerful amidst the fiery darts of the devil, amidst the cunning machinations of men. Live, I beseech you, O JESUS, author of blessed life, perpetually in my soul, and most clemently grant that it may live eternally in the bosom and embrace of your mercy!

CHAPTER VIII.
ON JUSTIFYING GRACE, AND THE JUSTIFICATION OF A SINNER BEFORE GOD

Question I. What is justification?

JUSTIFICATION IS AN act of grace, by which God, the most just and most merciful judge, to a sinful man, guilty of fault and punishment, but converted and reborn, out of mere mercy, on account of the satisfaction and merit of Christ, apprehended by true faith, remits sins, and imputes the righteousness of Christ, so that being adopted as a son of God, he may be an heir of eternal life.

Question II. What does "to justify" signify here?

The verb "to justify," in the present context, where the sinner, guilty of fault and punishment, is considered as he is to be justified before the divine judgment, is not taken in a physical sense, but in a forensic, or judicial one. For it does not signify to infuse a habit of righteousness into someone, or to make someone just by infused qualities; but to absolve a sinner from the guilt of fault and punishment for certain causes, and to esteem, declare, and pronounce him just.

Obs. The Latin verb iustificare is not found among profane authors; wherefore its signification must be sought from the scriptures alone. Examining these, we find that the Latin word iustificare is expressed by the Hebrew הִצְרִיק, and the Greek δικαιῶν, and δικαιόσθαι. Which words never and nowhere in the entire codex, even outside the business of the justification of a sinful man before God, signify the infusion of new qualities, but denote: a) The acknowledgment and celebration of divine righteousness, Psalm LI, 6; Luke VII, 29; Matthew XI, 19. b) The showing and manifestation of received justification, James II, 21. c) A comparative justification, Ezekiel XVI, 51, or even a vain one, by which someone reputes himself just, Luke X, 29. d) Liberation from sin, Romans VI, 7. e) They are also used in a forensic sense concerning civil judgments, about which it is sufficient to have noted these few things, Deuteronomy XXV, 1: "When there is a dispute between men, they shall come to judgment, that they may be judged: where they shall justify the just, and condemn the wicked." Proverbs XVII, 15: "He who justifies the wicked, and he who condemns the just, are both an abomination to Jehovah." Isaiah V, 23: "Woe to those who justify the wicked for a bribe."

Proof. That the Hebrew word הִצְרִיק, and the Greek δικαιῶν καὶ δικαιόσθαι, from which comes the Latin iustificare, designate a judicial act in the article of justification, is confirmed:

1) From all the requisites of a judicial process, where we note:

a) A judgment according to the rigid norm of the law, about which Psalm CXLIII, 2: "Do not enter into judgment with your servant; for no one living will be just before you."

b) A most just Judge, who is God the judge of the whole earth, Genesis XVIII, 25.

c) A defendant, who is every sinful man. "For the whole world becomes guilty before God," Romans III, 19. By the whole world is understood the entire human race, liable to punishment on account of the transgression of the law. From which also sins are called debts, Matthew VI, 12.

d) An author, or accuser, who is partly Moses the lawgiver, or the Mosaic law: "There is one who accuses you, Moses," John V, 45; partly the devil, Apocalypse XII, 10.

e) A witness, which is conscience. "Their conscience also bearing witness," Romans II, 15.

f) A handwriting, which is the conviction of the conscience by the moral law, Colossians II, 14 (*).

g) A condemnatory sentence, which is had in the Mosaic law. "Cursed is everyone who does not abide by all things which are written in the book of the law," Deuteronomy XXVII, 26.

h) A Mediator and advocate, who is Christ. "There is one mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ," 1 Timothy II, 5. "If anyone sins, we have a paraclete with the Father, Jesus Christ, the righteous," 1 John II, 1.

i) The satisfaction of the Mediator. For this mediator "gave himself as a ransom (ἀντίλυτρον) for all," 1 Timothy II, 6, "through whose death we were reconciled to God," Romans V, 10, and "by whose obedience we are made righteous," Romans V, 19.

k) The non-imputation of sin, and the judicial imputation of the righteousness of Christ. About which Paul says, 2 Corinthians V, 19: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, by not imputing their trespasses to them," and Romans IV, 5: "To the one who does not work, but believes in him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness."

1) An absolatory sentence, pronounced both generally through the gospel: "Through the name of Jesus Christ, everyone who believes in him receives remission of sins," Acts X, 43; and applied individually to a certain individual: "Your sins are forgiven you," Matthew IX, 2.

2) Condemnation is not the infusion of sin; Therefore, the opposite, justification, is not the infusion of righteousness. For of opposites, the reason is the same. The antecedent is clear from Romans VIII, 33-34.

3) Justification is opposed to the imputation of iniquities, Psalm XXXII, 2; Romans IV, 8. Therefore, it signifies absolution from guilt. The consequence is evident. Just as the imputation of iniquity is an act of a judge who recognizes, esteems, and determines that the iniquity pertains to the delinquent, so that he is obligated to punishment; so the non-imputation of iniquity is an act of a judge who for grave causes absolves a man from the obligation to punishment, or from guilt.

4) Justification consists in absolution from others, from which we cannot be justified by the law of Moses, and are justified by Christ, Acts XIII, 38-39. Therefore, justification does not denote the infusion of righteousness, but absolution from guilt.

5) The forensic meaning of justification is taught by equivalent phrases and periphrases, all of which are judicial, e.g., to impute righteousness, Romans IV, 3, 5; to remit sins, Romans III, 25; John XX, 23; to be reconciled to God, 2 Corinthians V, 19; not to be judged, John III, 18 (**).

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, for whom "to justify" is to infuse a habit of

(*) In that place, indeed, it appears that not the moral law is signified, but the ritual and ceremonial law of the O.T., from various indications, but especially 1) from the coherence and conjunction of the words both with the preceding, v. 13, and with the following, vv. 16-17; 2) from the word δόγμασιν, inasmuch as by this name no other laws than ritual ones are designated, Eph II, 15. The reason for the name, why those decrees are called χειρόγραφον, is situated in this: that in them there was an ἀνάμνησις ἁμαρτιῶν κατ' ἐνιαυτόν, Hebrews X, 3.

(**) Let us collect all the arguments from which it shines clearer than the sun that there is no other meaning of this name than the forensic one. This is indeed effected 1) from the distinction; for justification is discerned from the renewal of the soul, and so indeed that the latter follows the former, 1 Corinthians I, 30; 2) from the interpretation, especially threefold (For that action by which God pronounces a man just is called) α) the imputation of righteousness, and that without any work of man, only on account of the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, accepted by saving trust, Romans IV, 6 & 24-25; β) the remission of sins, so that the delinquent is dismissed unpunished, Acts XIII, 38-39; Romans IV, 5, add 7, 8; Matthew XVIII, 27; Luke VII, 41, 47; γ) the turning away of the wrath of a placated judge, Luke XVIII, 13 & 14; the word ἱλασθήναι contains in itself the notion of ἱλαστήριον, Romans righteousness, and of the Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians, and Weigelians, for whom "to justify" is to make a man just and upright by renewing, or by giving a new heart and a new spirit. Who impugn the evangelical doctrine of justification with the following arguments:

I. The word "justify," by the force of the word, signifies to make someone just; for it is composed of the words, just and to make. To esteem and pronounce just does not signify to make just. Therefore. Resp. a) Arguments from etymology and the grammatical composition of a word are invalid. We sanctify the name of the Lord, not by making it holy, but by acknowledging its holiness and esteeming it most highly. b) The composition of a Latin word does not constitute a rule and measure for investigating the genuine meaning of justification; for this must be deduced from the Hebrew and Greek language, which the Holy Spirit used. Among the Hebrews,  $\text{קָדַשׁ}$  signifies to be just,  $\text{קָדַשׁ}$  to attribute the praise of righteousness to someone, in Hiphil  $\text{קָדַשׁ$  to pronounce just, with which the Greek  $\delta\kappa\alpha\iota\omega\varsigma$  is consonant.

II. Daniel XII, 3, the  $\text{קָדַשׁ}$  are said to be those who lead to righteousness, not those who absolve from sins, or declare just. Therefore, "to justify" does not signify to absolve from sins. Resp. a) To lead to righteousness is not the same as to infuse a habit of righteousness. b) The Vulgate version indeed rendered the Hebrew word thus, but according to the source, the Hebrew word should be translated: "Those who justify," namely the doctors of the church, who absolve from sins ministerially ( $\delta\iota\alpha\kappa\omicron\nu\iota\kappa\omicron\varsigma$ ), and announce the word of reconciliation.

III. Whatever justification admits of degrees, does not denote absolution from sins; But the justification of a sinner before God, etc. Therefore. The major shines by its own light; because absolution from sins is perfect, so that it can neither be diminished nor increased. The minor is established from Apocalypse XXII, 11:  $\text{ὁ δίκαιος δικαιοσύνην ἔτι}$ , "let the one who is righteous be justified still." Resp. In that passage is understood the continuation of justification through the perseverance of faith and the flight from deliberate sin. For the adverb  $\text{ἔτι}$  nowhere signifies an intensification of quality, but a continuation of time; it is not equivalent to  $\mu\acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\omicron\nu$ , more, but to  $\pi\acute{o}\rho\acute{\rho}\omega\tau\epsilon\rho\omicron\nu$ , let him be justified further.

Objection: But the penitent publican is said to have been justified more than the Pharisee, Luke XVIII, 14. Resp. Luke imitates the Hebrews, using a comparative particle for a negative adverb. The sense is: The publican went down justified, but not the Pharisee.

IV. Whatever justification follows sanctification is not absolution from sins; But the justification of a sinner, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because absolution from sins precedes sanctification. The minor is proved from 1 Corinthians VI, 11: "You were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified." Resp. a) Distinguish between the order of words and of things. One must not always attend to the order of words where divine benefits are interchanged, but to the order of things, which is otherwise held in the sacred writings (\*). d) The Apostle III, 23-25, and of  $\text{ἰλασμός}$ , 1 John II, 2; 3) from the opposition, and that a twofold one (For this word  $\delta\kappa\alpha\iota\omega$  is opposed α) to accusation and damnation, Romans VIII, 33-34; β) to sin imputed, so indeed that God does not attribute it to us because it was entirely attributed to Christ  $\text{ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν}$ , 2 Corinthians V, 19-21. From which we argue: By what reason Christ was made sin for us, by the same reason we were made righteousness in Christ; But Christ was made sin for us certainly in no other way than by imputation, and a forensic act; Therefore...); 4) from the conjunction with words of such a kind that universally denote nothing other than a forensic cause, Romans VIII, 33-34. A truly classic passage, in which this is the nerve of the proof; In which action there is a judge, there is a certain defendant, and an accused, there is some sponsor, and both his satisfaction and his intercession and defense of the accused, there is a sentence contrary to damnation, that action is none other than judicial; But in the justification of man before God, etc. Therefore...; 5) from the addition of words which indeed indicate God as judge, but man as utterly lacking his own righteousness, of which kind are: α)  $\text{ἰλάσθητι}$ , β)  $\text{μοι τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ}$ , Luke XVIII, 13, γ)  $\text{χωρὶς ἔργων}$ , Romans IV, 6, δ)  $\text{δωρεάν, τῇ Θεοῦ χάριτι, διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ}$ , Romans III, 24.

(\*) It is indeed pleasing to me the opinion of those who interpret the word,  $\text{ἡγιάσθητε}$ , in this controversial place, not of our sanctification, which the Holy Spirit effects in the speaks with the converted Corinthians, baptized in adulthood.

These, before receiving baptism, were informed from the divine word, and by faith in Christ were justified, i.e., obtained remission of sins, then were renewed and sanctified, and finally were washed by baptism. The Apostle recalls these three things to the memory of the Corinthians, although in reverse order, so that, mindful of their washing in baptism, the holiness conferred, and the remission of sins received, they might not relapse into their former sins. Wherefore, in this place, justification is taken in a forensic sense, and does not denote sanctification, since it is distinguished from the same in the cited text.

Question III. Who justifies the sinner?

Principal efficient cause of justification.

The Triune God justifies the sinner a), the Father b), the Son of God c), and the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. From Mark II, 7: "Who can forgive sins but God alone?" God alone remits sins authoritatively (αὐτοκρατορικῶς), principally; the legates of Christ ministerially (διακονικῶς), John XX, 23. Moreover, since justification is indeed an immanent action of God, inasmuch as it happens within the mind and will of God, yet it tends toward an object outside of God, and thus is an action ad extra; it is common to all three persons of the divinity, yet saving their order, according to that well-known saying: The divine works ad extra are undivided, i.e., common.

Proof b. From Romans VIII, 33: "Who will bring any charge against God's elect? It is God who justifies. Who is to condemn?" Where the word "God" is taken hypostatically (ὕποστατικῶς), and denotes God the Father, because he is distinguished from Christ in v. 34, about whom the Apostle had also said in v. 32: "God did not spare his own Son."

Proof c. From Isaiah LIII, 11: "By his knowledge my righteous servant shall justify many." Where observe: a) Christ is called the servant of God according to his human nature, considered in the state of humiliation. For Christ exalted does not operate servilely concerning the business of our salvation. b) He is called righteous not only in himself, but because he also produced righteousness for us by his most perfect obedience. c) Christ justifies by his knowledge, i.e., by faith, by which he is known and apprehended. d) The Son of God is the efficient cause of justification, inasmuch as he justifies us in one act with the Father and the Holy Spirit; he is also the meritorious cause of justification, inasmuch as by his active and passive obedience he has merited righteousness for us; he is besides the material cause of justification, inasmuch as the merit of Christ is the thing itself which is offered to converted and reborn sinners to be apprehended, and is imputed for righteousness; he is, finally, the formal cause in application, inasmuch as we are justified by the imputed righteousness of Christ.

Proof d. From 1 Corinthians VI, 11: "You were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." The Holy Spirit justifies by offering to sinners the righteousness acquired by the merit of Christ through the evangelical promise, and by conferring and sealing it to the faithful.

Question IV. What is the internal impulsive cause of justification?

Internal impulsive cause. God was internally moved to justify the sinner by his most abundant grace, by which in the present context is understood the benevolence, mercy, and gratuitous favor of God, with which he embraces those who believe in Christ.

Proof 1) From Romans III, 24: "We are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." St. Paul does not simply say that we are justified by the grace of God, but with the addition of the particle, "freely," so that we may renewal of the soul, but of the imputed holiness of Christ to us, by virtue of the satisfaction rendered for us, so that this, ἐδικαιώθητε, is the interpretation of that, ἡγιασθητε. See John XVII, 19; Hebrews X, 10. This explanation agrees very well with the series of words. For PAUL had spoken first of the sins of which the Corinthians now repented, then also of the guilt and punishment, to be abolished in no other way than by the satisfaction of Christ, imputed to man, vv. 9-10. Therefore, to the pleasure of sin (πόρνοι, εἰδωλόλατραι, etc.) is opposed the first expression: ταῦτά τινες ᾔτε - ἀλλὰ ἀπελούσασθε, cf. Acts II, 38. But to the guilt, as it is said, of sin (βασίλειαν Θεοῦ οὐ κληρονομήσουσι) the contrary is this: ἀλλὰ ἡγιασθητε, that is, ἐδικαιώθητε, through Christ the sponsor, and the Holy Spirit the witness, Romans VIII, 15-16.

understand that there is no cause in us which moved God to justify us.

2) From Ephesians II, 8: "By grace you have been saved through faith; and this is not from yourselves, it is the gift of God; not by works, lest anyone should boast." Here the Apostle ascribes all salvation, both of grace, which consists in the remission of sins, and of glory, to the divine will, and opposes this to every quality inherent in us, so that every occasion for boasting may be cut off from us.

3) Synonyms of justifying grace are χρηστότης καὶ φιλανθρωπία, kindness and love of men, as is clear from Titus III, 4.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who maintain that justifying grace is not the gratuitous favor of God outside of us, but an infused grace, and inherent in us like a quality: Who rely on the following arguments:

I. Justifying grace is said to be given according to measure, Ephesians IV, 7. The benevolence of God is not given according to measure, because it is immense and infinite. Therefore. Resp. The Apostle in that passage does not mean justifying grace, but the gifts of the Holy Spirit, both sanctifying and ministerial, which are called grace metonymically, because they are effects of grace.

II. Justifying grace is poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit. Divine benevolence is not charity poured out, etc. Therefore. The major is from Paul, Romans V, 5. The minor is constant; because benevolence is in God, not in our hearts. Resp. a) By charity in that passage is not understood the charity with which we love God, but that with which God embraces us; that charity which God declared toward us when we were still sinners, v. 8, which is certainly of God, not ours. b) Charity is said not to be infused, but poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, i.e., most largely declared, and confirmed and sealed by the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit. It is therefore in us not by way of a subjective inherence, but by way of a termination toward us, of an operation, and of a sense through faith, by which we taste the sweetness of divine charity.

III. The grace of God is called a gift abounding to us, Romans V, 15. The benevolence of God is not a gift abounding to us, because it is the cause of gifts. Therefore. Resp. The words of the Pauline text are: "much more the grace and the gift in the grace of the one man Jesus Christ has abounded to many." The Apostle speaks accurately, and distinguishes grace from the gift of righteousness and salvation; just as also eternal life is called a χάρισμα, Romans VI, 23. But grace and the gift of righteousness are said to abound to us, not with respect to a subjective inherence, but with respect to a most liberal declaration and collation.

IV. Of the benevolence of God it is not rightly said that it was made, because it is eternal and independent: Of the grace of God it is said that it was made. Therefore. The minor is proved from John I, 17: "The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ." Resp. The grace of God with respect to us is said to have been made, i.e., meritoriously acquired for us by Jesus Christ.

Question V. What is the external impulsive cause of justification?

External impulsive cause. The external impulsive cause of justification is the satisfaction and merit of Christ, embracing the active and passive obedience of Christ, both of which are satisfactory and meritorious a). By his passive obedience Christ voluntarily transferred upon himself and suffered the penalties of sins to be inflicted on the violators of the law, lest sins should be imputed for punishment to converted and reborn sinners b). By his active obedience Christ most perfectly fulfilled the divine law in place of the fallen human race, so that that vicarious fulfillment of the law might be imputed for righteousness to sinners who believe in Christ c).

Obs. 1. The meritorious cause is contained under the impulsive, as a species under a genus. For a meritorious cause is that which by a good deed, which is worthy of a reward, impels the efficient cause to confer the reward. Therefore, the merit of Christ impelled the will of God to justify the believing sinner.

Obs. II. The satisfaction and merit of Christ are indeed most closely joined, yet they differ in a certain respect. The former is the payment of our debts, by which we were bound to God; by that satisfactory payment of our debts Christ merited for us immunity from guilt and punishment. Wherefore satisfaction in relation to merit stands as a cause, merit as an effect. Christ made satisfaction to the Holy Trinity, not to us, although for us; but he merited not for the Holy Trinity itself, but for us. Satisfaction implies a respect to compensating for the injury inflicted upon God; merit imports a respect to acquiring a gratuitous reward for sinners. Hence it is that some theologians call only the active obedience of Christ in a stricter sense "merit." Confer. D. CALOV in systema, tom. X, p. 208; JO. ADAM. OSIANDER in collegium Systematicum, P. V, pp. 135-136 (*).

Proof a. By his passive obedience Christ satisfied the threat of the law, expressed in the Mosaic words: "You shall surely die," Genesis II, 17, by undergoing a voluntary death for the sins of men, Galatians I, 4; by his active obedience he satisfied the law itself, by fulfilling it most exactly, Matthew V, 17. By his passive obedience he satisfied for the punishment; by his active, for the guilt of the sinner. His passive obedience merited absolution from the guilt of punishment; his active, a righteousness valid before God. Conf. OSIANDER, loc. cit., p. 83.

Proof b. 1) From Romans III, 25-26: "We are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God set forth as a propitiation by faith in his blood, to demonstrate his righteousness, because of the passing over of the sins previously committed." In which words the Apostle presents for our consideration all the causes of justification. He expresses the efficient cause by the pronoun αὐτοῦ, of him, namely God.

Conf. the preceding v. 24. He calls the internal impulsive cause the grace of God, i.e., the effect of benevolence; from which, by the particle, "freely," he removes all our merit, every cause existing in us. But, that he may clearly show that the grace of God by which we are justified is not absolute, but is founded on the merit of Christ, he subjoins the meritorious cause, or the external impulsive cause, which he calls ἀπολύτρωσις, the redemption of Christ. This he elegantly calls ἱλαστήριον, propitiatory. Just as the cover placed upon the ark of the covenant covered the tables of the law; so Christ by his obedience covers the thunderbolt of the law, Romans IV, 7. The Apostle adds ἐν αὐτοῦ αἵματι, "in his blood." In the O.T. the mercy seat was sprinkled with the blood of victims, to reconcile the people to God, Leviticus XVI, 14-15. So Christ was sprinkled with his own blood, without which there is no remission, Hebrews IX, 22. He names the offering intermediate cause πρόθεσιν, proposition, i.e., the preaching of the gospel, by which Christ with his benefits is proposed and offered. The receiving medium is faith, or the trust of the penitent sinner, fixed on the blood of Christ. The final cause is the demonstration of vindictive divine justice, which had to be satisfied by the blood of Christ, so that, with it being safe, the sinner might be absolved from the guilt of punishment. The formal cause is the remission, that is, the condonation of past sins.

2) From Romans V, 8-10: "God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us. Much more, therefore, having now been justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, having been reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." The Apostle asserts that we have been justified in the blood, i.e., on account of the blood of Christ, through which justification has been acquired for us; which assertion of his he explains by an equivalent phrase, when he says that we have been reconciled to God through the death of his Son. For Paul, to be justified is the same as for a sinful man to be reconciled to God, or, having obtained remission of offenses, to return into grace with God through the death of the Son of God, by which vindictive divine justice was satisfied, on account of the supreme dignity of the mediator, the God-man (θεανθρώπου), who died (*).

(*) The distinction of satisfaction and merit, and the definition of both, is clearly taught us by this statement in Romans V, 10. Satisfaction, therefore, was rendered to God alone; Merit entirely pertains to us. And the former indeed is the obedience of Christ, constant even unto death, and consummated by the sorrows and virtues of him dying, for the reconciliation of divine grace; The latter, however, is our blessedness and the sum of benefits, the most certain expectation of which rests on the life of Christ, raised from the dead. Add 1 Peter I, 3 ff.

(*) Since the Socinians indeed concede that we are reconciled to God, but deny that God, as judge and avenger, has been reconciled to us, it must be shown to them what was said before, not about the hostile mind of men toward God, but about the wrath of God, v. 9. Add 1 Thessalonians I, 10.

3) From Ephesians I, 7: "In Christ we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins." Cf. Colossians I, 14. God remits sins to believers in Christ, because they have been redeemed from the guilt of sin by the bloody death of Christ, as by a ransom (λύτρον).

Proof c. 1) From Romans X, 4: Τέλος γὰρ νόμου, "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone who believes." Observe: a) Τὸ τέλος νόμου denotes not the abrogation or cessation of the law, but its completion, consummation, or perfect fulfillment. b) The righteousness of Christ is understood not as the essential righteousness, common to God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which is incommunicable externally, nor as the habitual righteousness, in which Christ excelled, as man, from the first moment of his conception, but as the righteousness acquired for us by his active obedience, rendered to the divine law in our place. For the effect of the vicarious fulfillment of the law is righteousness, which indeed is Christ's causally, but the believing sinner's terminatively, or, to speak more clearly, righteousness acquired for the sinful man by Christ through the most exact fulfillment of the law. It pertains to Christ as the meriting cause; it also pertains to the converted and reborn sinner as the subject in whom by the intention of Christ it terminates, and to whom by the gracious estimation of God it is imputed. Therefore, the sinner who believes in Christ is called just, from the imputed righteousness of Christ. c) The Apostle adds: παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι, "to everyone who believes," because the righteousness acquired for us by Christ the mediator is to be apprehended and applied to us by true faith, so that it may become and remain ours.

2) From Romans V, 19: "For as by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, so also by the one's obedience the many will be made righteous." Adam by his active disobedience, by which he transgressed the divine law, devolved unrighteousness upon the entire human race; Therefore, Christ the mediator by his active obedience, by which he fulfilled the divine law, derived righteousness upon the entire human race; for of opposites, the reason is the same.

3) If Christ by his active obedience had not fulfilled the divine law for righteousness for the believing man, every sinner would be accursed; But not every sinner is accursed;

Therefore, Christ by his active obedience fulfilled the divine law for righteousness for the believing man.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that we are justified by God on account of the satisfaction and merit of Christ; whose arguments have been confuted above in the place concerning Christ. We will repeat one, which brings no small weight to explaining the nature of justification: Whatever justification is not only gracious, but also gratuitous, is not done on account of the merit of Christ; The justification of a sinner before God, etc. Therefore. The major is constant; because gratuitous justification excludes all merit. The minor is from Paul, teaching, Romans III, 24, that men are justified δωρεάν, freely, by the grace of God. Resp. Distinguish between the proper merit of the sinner, and the alien merit, or that of Christ the mediator. The former, not the latter, gratuitous justification excludes. That the merit of Christ and the grace of God consist and conspire excellently in the act of justification, the Apostle indicates when he teaches that sinners are justified freely, by the grace of God through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God put forward as a propitiation, ἱλαστήριον, through his blood. Therefore, from the justification of the sinner, a balance of divine grace and justice shines forth.

To divine grace it must be attributed that God a) was unwilling to leave the human race, immersed in sins, in the state of sin and (which He could have done by just judgment) to sentence it to eternal damnation. For He embraced sinful men with His mercy, not as such, but as His creatures. b) That for sinful men, who were unequal to the task of providing satisfaction for their own sins, He destined and gave a mediator, and that one His only-begotten son, who would fulfill the law for all sinners and pay the vicarious penalties for their transgressions, and thus He took from His own what was paid for our sins, by whose merit we are justified. For He did not spare His own son, but handed him over to death for us, Romans 8:32. c) That the merit of Christ, since it was not the sinful man's own, and its effect, which is both the remission of sins and perfect righteousness, He imputes and attributes to every penitent sinner who applies the satisfaction of Christ to himself by true faith. d) That not through and on account of our works, but in view of faith in Christ δωρεάν, freely, without the intervention of our own merit, He justifies us.

It is of divine justice to demand satisfaction for the injury and offense inflicted upon God. By the very fact that sins violate the internal and immutable law of God, they induce on the part of the sinner guilt and liability to divine punishment; but they wrong and offend God by injury. They induce guilt and liability to divine punishment because he who sins deviates from the rule of rectitude, and through this he contracts guilt for himself, and the liability of divine punishment accompanies the guilt born from the deviation from the rule of rectitude, by itself and by its nature. But they offend God with injury, and they offend him, because they violate his law. For the violation of the divine law is a certain violation of divine right, and therefore an injury redounding to God, by which God cannot but be most gravely offended. Therefore, as long as guilt and liability for punishment remain on the part of the sinner, so long also do the injury inflicted upon God by the past act of sinning and the offense remain on the part of God. It is also repugnant that someone be culpable for a past act of sinning, and worthy of punishment, and yet not be unjust toward God, and established in offense and hatred with him on account of his violated right. Whence, for the expiation of sins, it is required that both the guilt and the obligation to punishment on the part of the sinner, and the injury and offense on the part of God, be removed. The former is removed by the satisfaction of Christ, apprehended by true faith; which indeed God procured out of mere grace, and which He benevolently accepts.

Question VI. Whom does God justify?

Subject whom God justifies. God justifies a) man b), a sinner, guilty before the divine judgment of fault and punishment c), but converted d), and reborn e).

Proof a. Those justified by God are not the good angels, who, since they persisted in their created holiness, do not need remission of sins, nor the evil angels, who by divine judgment were held to be without mercy; but men. This we prove: Those whose nature Christ assumed, they are justified by faith in Christ, and no others; But Christ assumed the nature of men alone, not of angels. Therefore. For τὸ γὰρ ἀπρόσληπτον, ἀθεράπευτον, that which was not assumed by Christ, was not healed by the same. Therefore, man the wayfarer is healable, that is, one constituted in the way of this life. He who dies with his sins not remitted, departs in a state of wrath, not of grace. For since he has maliciously repudiated the grace offered in the course of his life, the wrath of God remains upon him perpetually, John 3:36.

Proof b. God justifies the ungodly, Romans 4:5. Those who have sinned and fall short of the glory of God are justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, Romans 3:23-24.

Proof c. The sinner, by transgressing the divine law, contracts guilt, and the obligation to punishment follows this. Whence every man, examined according to the norm of the divine law, is ὑπόδικος to God, i.e., liable to God the judge, unto eternal death, Romans 3:19. The sinner therefore stands before the divine throne not as the innocent Mephibosheth, or the beneficent Barzillai before David, but as the cupbearer before Pharaoh, or Shimei before Solomon. For the sinner is accused by Moses, John 5:45, and by the devil, Revelation 12:10, convicted by the witness of conscience, Romans 2:15, so that the conviction of conscience is a handwriting against him, Colossians 2:14.

Proof d. God justifies the ungodly not while he persists in ungodliness, or retains the intention, or purpose, of sinning, but when he is converted and contrite through the divine law, so that he recognizes the baseness of his sins from the law, feels the wrath of God, fears the divine punishments, and thus does not hold the sins he has committed as valid, but retracts them, and seriously with sorrow detests them, and casts away the purpose of sinning. This sorrow for sins, and their displeasure and detestation, is indeed not a positive and causal means of justification; yet it is a required condition on the part of the sinner to be justified, and a privative means of order, removing the incapacity of the subject and the obstacles to the remission of sins, namely, the false opinion of not being in need, and the zeal for continuing in sins. For he who does not acknowledge and detest his sins, but rather is prepared to continue them maliciously, will neither seek nor find remission of sins. God Himself implies this, Jeremiah 3:4-5: "Have you not just now called to me, 'My Father, you are the friend of my youth'? Will he be angry forever? Will he be indignant to the end? Behold, you have spoken, but you have done all the evil that you could!" As if to say, I cannot be a gracious Father, or remit your sins, unless you cease from sinning intentionally. Cf. Hulsemann, Brev. enucl. c. IX. p. 501, 523.

Proof e. From Romans 4:5: "And to the one who does not work but believes in him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness." It is required of the ungodly that he detest his ungodliness with sorrow of mind, but this is not enough; but it is necessary that he also believe in God, who justifies the ungodly. God is indeed a just judge and a severe avenger of crimes; but He is placated by the satisfaction of Christ, who died for the ungodly, Romans 5:8. The penitent sinner recognizes this from the gospel, which promises grace and remission of sins on account of the merit of Christ apprehended by true faith; he who gives undoubted assent to the gospel promise, and thus with singular trust accepts the satisfaction of Christ, applies it to himself, presents it to God the judge, and on account of it seeks and finds grace and remission of sins, and, like the repenting publican, goes away justified, Luke 18:14.

Question VII. Were the repentant sinners of the Old Testament also justified by faith in Christ?

The penitent sinners who lived in the times of the Old Testament were reconciled to God and justified by faith in Christ.

Proof. 1) All the prophets testify of Christ, that everyone who believes in him receives remission of sins, Acts 10:43. 2) We all believe that we are saved through the grace of Christ, just as they (our Fathers) were, Acts 15:11. (*)

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that justification by faith in Christ was first promulgated and announced in the N.T. They urge:

I. Christ the mediator did not exist in the times of the O.T., nor was his satisfaction then performed; Therefore, the Israelites could not believe in Christ. Response: Although the satisfaction of Christ for sins was performed at the appointed time, yet in respect to its value it is universal, and extends itself to all men of all times and ages. For it relates to the remission of sins by way of a meritorious cause. This, before it exists, can exercise its causal power by the value of its foreknown merit, and can move the will of the efficient cause to act. That the satisfaction of Christ was known to God before it was performed is beyond doubt. See Acts 2:23; 4:28. But that the same was also foreknown to sinful men, or at least so (*) What should be determined about the true interpretation of these words, and what other, and far clearer, testimonies of this matter are at hand, I have demonstrated on page 34. I now add that from Romans 4:6, in which place these words, καθάπερ καὶ, openly signify one and the same reason for the matter. To what end also so many, and such illustrious prophecies of the future Christ, both those literal and those typical, but especially the expiatory sacrifices, which in themselves had no power of expiating, as also the lustrations, to what end, I ask? unless they had this value, that all should place all their trust in the future Christ, so foretold and foreshadowed. See John 8:56, coll. with v. 52, 53 & Hebrews 11:17 & 19. For which reason our Jesus is called the ἀρχηγὸς τῆς πίστεως in the O.T. and its τελειωτής in the N.T., Hebrews 12:2, the same yesterday in the O.T. as today in the N.T., Hebrews 13:8. But this principle: the satisfaction once performed was always valid, or, as they commonly say, the merit of Christ is valid backwards no less than forwards, this, I say, as it is most plainly signified in this place, Hebrews 9:26, so it must be most firmly opposed not only to the Socinians, but also to the Roman Catholics, who, although they do not entirely deny Christ's merits to the men who died blessedly before he was born, yet they opine that they did not perceive the fruit of them before Christ met death, and that in the meantime they were held as captives in some limbo and afflicted with the punishment of loss. From the same principle proceeds the argumentation against the Cocceians, who are in this heresy that Christ, the common sponsor of all men, is now at last in the N.T. an expromissor, but in the O.T. was not, except as a fideiussor, and therefore they think that ἄφεσιν must be defined differently from πάρεσιν, so that the former is a remission of sin, never to be vindicated; but the latter is a toleration of it for a time, by conniving and deferring the punishment, not yet taken away. They appeal primarily to Romans 3:25-26. Response: 1) The ἀνοχή τοῦ Θεοῦ is expressly distinguished from what is called πάρεσις, 2) this πάρεσις is nothing other than ἄφεσις, and this very ἄφεσις, or remission of sins, happened to David and those like him equally as to us in the N.T., is apparent from Romans 4:6-7, and Hebrews 9:15, coll. with v. 22.

revealed that, if it had not been for the negligence, malice, and contempt of the divine word by men, it could have been known to all at any time, is easily understood. For first, God foretold it to the first parents while they were still in paradise, when, by promulgating the proto-evangelion, he predicted that the seed of the woman would crush the serpent's head, Genesis 3:15. Then he repeated this prediction to the patriarchs, and afterwards through the holy prophets taught by him to the Israelite people from time to time, with more abundant declarations added, until that promised seed, born of the Virgin Mary, was actually exhibited. To this Peter refers, when he says that God sent the fore-announced Jesus Christ, Acts 3:20, and all the prophets from Samuel and those after him, as many as have spoken, have foretold those days, in which, that is, Christ was exhibited in the flesh, v. 24.

II. They urge the passages of scripture Romans 3:21; Galatians 3:23. To which we have responded above, Part I.

Question VIII. By what means does God justify the sinner?

Means of justification. The means that are δοτικά, or on the part of God offering the grace of God and the satisfaction and merit of Christ for obtaining the remission of sins and righteousness, are the word of the gospel a), and the sacraments b); the μέσον ληπτικόν, or on the part of the sinful man receiving the merit of Christ and the grace of God founded in it, is faith c).

Proof a. From 2 Corinthians 5:19: "that is, in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them, and entrusting to us the message of reconciliation." The Apostle teaches: a) That God, offended by the sins of men, out of immense grace, pitying the inescapable misery of men, procured the καταλλαγὴν, or reconciliation; b) That this reconciliation was acquired through Christ the mediator, who satisfied divine justice; c) That the actual non-imputation of sins flows from the reconciliation acquired through the satisfaction of Christ; d) That reconciliation and remission of sins are announced, promised, and offered through the word of reconciliation, i.e., the gospel.

Proof b. That the righteousness of Christ is offered and applied through the sacrament of initiation, or baptism, we learn from Galatians 3:27: "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ." The Apostle does not mean a legal putting on, or one of imitation; for in that way we could also put on St. Paul; but an evangelical putting on, or one of faith. Blessed Luther elegantly explains this putting on in this place: To put on Christ is to put on righteousness, truth, all grace, and the fullness of the whole law. That the Eucharist is an exhibitiv means of justifying grace is clear from the fact that the shedding of the eucharistic cup is said to be for the remission of sins, Luke 22:20. Observation: Through the sacrament of the Supper, justification is continued rather than begun; because no one partakes of the body and blood of the Lord with salutary fruit unless he has first examined himself, namely, whether he is in the faith, 1 Corinthians 11:28, and is therefore a believer, and was already justified and in a state of reconciliation beforehand; in the meantime, however, justifying faith is confirmed and preserved by the sacrament of the supper; and thus justification is continued.

Proof c. Faith justifies not through itself, by its own dignity or value, by moving God to justify the believing man; but because as an instrument, or a μέσον ληπτικόν, or receptive means, it apprehends the merit of Christ, in view of which God is impelled, so that He, saving His own justice, absolves the penitent sinner who believes in Christ from the guilt of sin out of grace, and reposes him just. For the ἐνέργεια, or internal power, of justifying faith is to λαμβάνειν, to receive Christ, the grace of God founded in Christ, which pardons sins, offered in the promise of the gospel, and the remission of sins dependent on this. This can be seen from the clearest sayings of scripture, John 1:12: "But to all who did receive (ἐλάβον) him, who believed in his name, he gave the power to become children of God." Here, to believe in the name of Christ is explained by receiving him, as the author of the divine νιοθεσίας. Romans 5:17: "For if, because of one man's trespass, death reigned through that one man, much more will those who receive (λαμβάνοντες) the abundance of grace and the free gift of righteousness reign in life through the one man Jesus Christ." Paul excellently describes faith, that it receives the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness. Galatians 3:14: "so that we might receive (λάβωμεν) the promised Spirit through faith." The promise of grace is received and applied to us by no other means than faith. Acts 10:43: "To him (Christ) all the prophets bear witness that everyone who believes in him receives (λαβεῖν) forgiveness of sins through his name." Faith accepts the effect of Christ's satisfaction, the remission of sins. From these celestial oracles, we gather that faith is the receptive means by which the satisfaction of Christ, and the grace of God obtained by it, is accepted.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Socinians, and Arminians, who deny that faith justifies by way of an instrument, or a means, that receives the merit of Christ. (*) The same rely on the following arguments:

I. If faith justifies instrumentally, it justifies as a work: The Evangelicals concede the antecedent; Therefore, also the consequent. The consequence of the major is proven; For if the causality of an efficient cause is an operation, but an instrument enjoys the causality of an efficient cause; then the causality of faith will be an operation, and thus faith as a work, or operation, will justify. Response: We distinguish between an active and a receptive instrument. Faith does not justify as an agent, but as a patient, or by passively receiving. To justify instrumentally, said of faith, denotes a passion, and so faith can be called an instrument of justification, but a passive one, as D. Osiander excellently says in his colleg. Systemat. part V, p. 3.

Instance: Faith considered formally is the trustful apprehension of the merit of Christ and the grace of God promised in the gospel: Therefore, Faith formally is an action, not a passion. Response: 1) Apprehension is an act, so to speak, that is passive. Dannhauer says that it is explained by an active voice (grammatically), but is in reality passive, which allows a benefit to be done to itself, Hodos. p. 1340. For as the hand of a beggar, the mouth of a sick person, a mirror, passively receives an alms, a medicine, an image; so faith is the organ of those who are spiritually begging, who spiritually receive the grace of God and the merit of Christ. 2) Faith justifies, not insofar as it is an apprehension and our act, but insofar as it embraces the justifying object.

II. Whatever consists in knowledge, assent, and trust, that is not an instrument; But justifying faith etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because knowledge, assent, and trust are acts of the intellect and will, which cannot be called instruments. The minor is conceded by the Evangelicals. Response: We distinguish between the faith which justifies, and the manner in which it justifies. The former consists in knowledge, assent, and trust. The latter is the means of receiving the satisfaction of Christ. Faith is called an instrument, not univocally and with philosophical rigor, but by analogy, insofar as an instrument denotes a means, or principle, by which an object is apprehended, or accepted.

III. Whatever action of God is immanent, immediate, and inorganic, that is not done through the faith of man, as a means, or instrument; But justification is an immanent, immediate, and inorganic action of God: Therefore. The major is established; because (*) According to the false and pernicious opinion of the Socinians, from whom the Remonstrants are not far off, faith in Christ consists of two parts, one of which they say is obedience to the commands of God, and specifically to new laws, which they imagine were only lately made by Christ; the other, they say, is indeed trust to be placed in Christ, but that not in him as meriting, but as promising, or in the divine promises, confirmed by the death of Christ. This is plainly against the opinion of the Apostle, who 1) distinguished the law, or doctrine, of faith from the entire law of works, Romans 3:27, and 2) commanded us to place our whole trust, which alone is able to make us just before God, in the blood of Christ, and in the ἀπολύτρωσις made through him, ibid. v. 24, 25.

Thus, however, where justification is attributed to faith in God, and the Father of Christ, as in John 5:24, Romans 4:5 and 24, it should be known that this faith in God is not general, but special, which pertains to faith in Christ itself. To be sure, there are three truths which trust placed in Christ contains within its scope. First; that our merits and those of other men are absolutely nothing before God. Second; that Christ alone offered an expiatory sacrifice to God for all. Third; that through that sacrifice, by which Christ rendered a vicarious and perfect satisfaction, pleasing and acceptable to God, God is placated, and reconciled to us. Our forefathers in the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, art. II, p. 69, excellently professed that in justifying faith three Objects are associated: 1) something gratuitous, by which our works are excluded, 2) the propitiation of Christ, 3) the promise of God.

an immanent and inorganic action is not done through an instrument. The minor is clear in itself; because justification is carried out within the very bosom of the deity, without the intervention of any instrument. Response: Faith is called an instrument, not as if the very act of justification is produced through faith as an instrument, but because it behaves in the manner of an instrument, by which that, on account of which we are justified, namely the merit of Christ, is apprehended and applied to us. But in the order related to the act of justification itself, faith in Christ behaves in the manner of a cause, or a less principal impulsive reason; because not through itself, not by its own force or value, but by the force of the merit of Christ, which it embraces, it moves God to justify the penitent sinner who believes in Christ. Cf. D. Musaeus in his dissertation on predestination, D. 75.

Question IX. Does faith alone justify?

Does faith alone justify? Faith alone is the divinely ordained means by which we apprehend and apply to ourselves the satisfaction of Christ, performed in our stead, and offered in the evangelical promise, in view of which we are justified by God; but good works do not enter the circle of justification.

Observation I. Nowhere in the sacred writings is faith in the nominative case said to justify, but it is always said in an oblique case: We are justified by faith, Galatians 2:16; a man is justified by faith, Romans 3:28. But God in the nominative case is said to justify, Romans 3:30; c. 8:33. Whence D. Osiander not in vain says in his colleg. System. P. V, p. 96: "If we wish to speak accurately and according to scripture, it should be said that God alone justifies (for it is an action of God alone); but man is justified by faith. For faith itself does not justify, for the very reason that it behaves merely apprehensively." However, because the manner of speaking has so prevailed that it is said, "faith alone justifies," it can be retained, if the manner of speaking is skillfully applied from scriptural usage. It is therefore explained in the Solid Declaration of the F.C., p. 684: "Faith does not justify because it is itself such a good work and such a noble virtue, but because in the promise of the gospel it apprehends and embraces the merit of Christ." Which D. Aeg. Hunnius explains more broadly in his commentary on Romans 3, p. 164: "Faith does not justify, when considered absolutely and in itself, as a certain virtue. For in this respect it is a work of only one commandment of the decalogue, namely the first; whereas for the perfecting of justification the fulfillment of the whole law is required. Then, because faith, considered in itself, is imperfect; whence it rather needs the mercy of God, by which its imperfection may be covered, than that it should merit that mercy of God. Thirdly, because, if it were most perfect, it would nevertheless be owed, because it is commanded in the law. But that which we are bound to by debt, merits us nothing before God. But faith justifies, insofar as it is considered relatively, i.e., insofar as it looks to Christ, and apprehends his merit. For in this way it diffuses itself through the whole decalogue, i.e., it includes the obedience of all the precepts of the decalogue, performed by Christ for us, and that perfect and un-owed, since Christ was not subject to the law for himself, but performed it for us." D. Musaeus in his disp. on justification §. 38: "When it is said of faith in the nominative case, that it justifies, the expression seems to be metonymical. For the sense is not that faith absolves a man from sins and reposes him just; but faith is said to justify because in view of it God reposes us just, or because faith (not by its own dignity, but by that of the merit of Christ) moves God to justify us."

Observation II. When faith alone is said to justify, the grace of God, the merit of Christ, the word and the sacraments are not excluded; because exclusive particles exclude that which is opposite. But the grace of God, the merit of Christ, the word, the sacraments, and faith are not opposites, but are subordinate and congruous. For the grace of God is the internal impulsive cause of justification; the merit of Christ is the meritorious and external impulsive cause; the word and sacraments are the offering means; faith is the receiving means. It remains, therefore, that faith and man's works are opposed to each other in the order of justification, and faith in Christ, but not good works, is said to justify before the divine tribunal.

Observation III. A distinction is made between faith considered with respect to justification itself, and then it is the sole instrument apprehending the merit of Christ, and alone justifies; and considered in the person of the justified, or after justification, and in this way it is never alone, that is, it is always accompanied by the other virtues, indeed it is the root and parent of them all. This the epitome of the F.C., p. 586, asserts: "We believe, teach, and confess, that although antecedent contrition and subsequent new obedience do not pertain to the article of justification before God; yet such a justifying faith is not to be imagined which can exist and stand together with an evil purpose, namely of sinning and acting against conscience. But after a man has been justified by faith, then that true and living faith is effective through charity, and good works always follow justifying faith, and are most certainly found together with it, if only it is true and living. For true faith is never alone, but always has charity and hope with it." Which words are explained by D. Musaeus in his lectures on the F. Conc., p. 177, in the following manner: "Good works follow justification not in respect of time, but in the order of nature. In the order of nature, justification is prior to renewal and new obedience, and so B.O. can rightly be said to follow justification; because they are by nature subsequent to justification and justifying faith; but in respect of time, faith is never without all good works, but always has some works, either external or internal, or interior movements of love, hope, etc., conjoined with it."

Proof. 1. From Romans 4:5: "And to the one who does not work but believes in him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness." Whoever, being ungodly, obtains righteousness through faith without the confluence of good works, is justified by faith alone; But the ungodly, believing in Christ, etc. Therefore.

2. From the denomination of justifying faith alone, Romans 3:28: "For we hold that one is justified by faith apart from works of the law"; and Galatians 2:16: "yet we know that a person is not justified by works of the law but through faith in Jesus Christ." Whoever is not justified by works of the law, but through faith without works, is justified by faith alone; But the sinner believing in Christ etc. Therefore.

3. From the exclusion of works, Romans 3:20: "For by works of the law no human being will be justified in his sight." You say: The apostle means the works of the natural and ceremonial law, by which no one is justified; yet we are justified by works proceeding from grace. Response: a) The Apostle is not dealing with the works of the ceremonial or natural law, but with the works of the moral law, from which comes the knowledge of sin, in the same verse (*). b) Works proceeding from faith and grace follow the justified, they do not precede those to be justified; for they are the fruits of righteousness, Philippians 1:11. c) Paul also removes the works of righteousness, Titus 3:5: "he saved us, not because of works done by us in righteousness."

4. From the opposition of grace and works: "being justified freely by his grace," Romans 3:24. Whatever happens by grace, that can in no way happen through any work; But justification, etc.; Therefore. The Apostle proves the major in Romans 11:6: "But if it is by grace, it is no longer on the basis of works; otherwise grace would no longer be grace."

5. From the imperfection of our own righteousness. "All our righteous deeds are like a polluted garment," Isaiah 64:6. "For we all stumble in many ways," James 3:2. Whatever is unclean and imperfect, that cannot justify a man before God.

(*) In the letter written to the Galatians, the Divine Man argues by design about the ritual law, which entirely pertained to the ceremonies of the O.T.; but in those which he himself sent to the Romans, he discusses the moral law. But in each epistle I. the disputation proceeds from general principles, which are common to all divine laws: α) The law demands perfect obedience; β) No one has ever rendered this, nor can anyone ever render it; γ) The law denounces damnation on a man, if he should fail in even one word; δ) Since the law condemns every single person, it can make no one just and saved; Therefore, there is no justification from the law. Romans 3:19; 8:3; Galatians 3:10 & 21. II. The subject is justification before God, Romans 3:25, 29; 4:2, as also Galatians 3:6; 4:4-5. III. The subject capable of obtaining justification is said to be any reborn man, without any difference of nation or descent, whether it be Jewish or foreign, Romans 3:29, 30; 4:9, 10 & 11 entire, and likewise Galatians 3:8, 28. IV. The cause of justification is said to be trust placed in the merits of Christ, excluding any works of man, whoever he may be, not even excepting Abraham, Romans 3:28; 4:4, and no differently Galatians 2:16; 3:9, 13. V. The act of justification is defined as the remission of sins, on account of the vicarious righteousness of Christ, attributed to us, Romans 4:5, 6, 25, and in the same way Galatians 2:20-21.

6. From the example of Abraham, who was not justified by works, Romans 4:2-3. Abraham, when he received the testimony of imputed righteousness, had already long been received into grace (cf. Genesis 12:1; c. 15:6); yet he was not justified by the works of grace.

The antithesis is I. of the Pontificians, II. of the Anabaptists, III. of the Socinians and Arminians, who deny that we are justified by faith alone, as a means apprehending the merit of Christ. Their arguments are:

I. In the same way that Abraham was justified, in that way we are also justified (for Abraham is the Father of believers, Romans 4:11, and an example set forth for all to be justified); But Abraham was justified not only by faith, but also by good works. Therefore. The minor is from the Apostle James, c. 2:21: "Was not Abraham our father justified by works when he offered up his son Isaac on the altar?" Do you see that faith was completed by works? Response: a) We distinguish between the justification of a sinner before God, and the showing or notification of faith and righteousness received from God before men. (*) St. James is not speaking of the justification of a sinner before God, but of the showing and notification of faith and righteousness before men, through good works, as signs and testimonies of true faith and fruits of righteousness. For that reason he says in v. 18: Δείξόν μοι τὴν πίστιν σου ἐκ τῶν ἔργων σου, "Show me your faith from your works." The sense, therefore, is: Was not Abraham, our Father, justified, i.e., acknowledged and manifested as just, by works, especially those which shone forth publicly, when he offered Isaac his son upon the altar? b) The Apostle is speaking of the external profession of faith. For he says in v. 14: "What good is it, my brothers, if someone says he has faith but does not have works? Can that faith save him?" The external profession of faith is sometimes true, if it manifests itself through charity and other virtues; sometimes false, when it is destitute of the company of good works, and is commonly called a vain boasting of faith.

Instance I. But the example of Abraham, justified by works, is adduced. Response: It is adduced to the contrary, to refute hypocrites, who are content with only the external profession of faith, as if to say: you hypocrites, who boast of faith, can be refuted by the example of Abraham. He was discovered, held, and acknowledged as just by men not so much by the external profession of faith, as by works and the most humble obedience (of which the offering of his son for a sacrifice was an illustrious example), and was called the friend of God.

Instance II. Whatever faith cooperates with works for justification, that alone does not suffice for obtaining righteousness; But the faith of Abraham and of all believers, etc. Therefore. Response: Faith, comforting the heart of Abraham in his most humble obedience, cooperated in showing and making known his justification before men, not in obtaining it from God.

Instance III. The faith which is completed by works, that alone does not suffice for obtaining righteousness; But the faith of Abraham and of all believers, etc. Therefore. Response: Faith is completed by works not intrinsically, with respect to its own nature and essential perfection; but extrinsically, with respect to others and becoming known; thus the faith of Abraham became perfectly known to others from the offering of Isaac, as a stupendous deed.

II. Faith alone justifies; Faith alone is a dead thing; Therefore, a dead thing justifies. Response: In this paralogism there are four terms. For the word "alone" in the major premise excludes the confluence of good works into the ἀποτέλεσμα of justification, while in the minor it excludes the coexistence of good works and denotes a solitary faith. For the same reason, one might perhaps gather: The eye alone sees; The eye alone is a dead thing; Therefore, a dead thing sees.

III. Whatever faith is never alone, that never justifies alone; Justifying faith is never alone; Therefore. Response: Negative to the major. and a distinction between the existence of faith, and its office, or its ἐνέργειαν and justifying power. Faith justifies alone, even though it is never alone, but is conjoined with charity, hope, and other internal movements. Thus the intellect alone understands, although it is conjoined with the will; the eyes alone see, although ears and nose coexist with them; the flavor of the apple alone affects the taste, however much the odor and color of the same apple may accompany it. Cf. Dannhauer, hodos. phanom. XI, §. 1389.

(*) For Paul himself used this distinction, Romans 4:2. James, in this place, has handed down to us the explanation of the matter, and the definition of what it is to be justified before men, that it is indeed nothing other than to be known as just by declaration from certain signs.

IV. Faith justifies either without charity, or with charity: Not without charity; because, as Paul testifies, it always works through this, Galatians 5:6. Therefore, with charity, and consequently not alone. Response: Faith, viewed within the sphere of justification, justifies without charity, i.e., faith, but not charity, is the means apprehending the merit of Christ, in view of which God absolves the sinner believing in Christ from the guilt of sin and punishment. But faith considered outside the sphere of justification operates through charity as the queen of the other virtues. But indeed in this way faith does not flow into justification, but into sanctification, and the production of good works.

Instance: But the power of justifying is attributed to charity 1) by Christ Himself, Luke 7:47: "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven—for she loved much"; 2) by John, 1 Epistle 3:14: "We have passed out of death into life, because we love the brothers." Response: To 1): In the words of Christ, the particle ὅτι is not causal, but ratiocinative; for it denotes not the cause of the remission of sins, but an argument taken from the effect and an external sign, by which the remission of sins is proven a posteriori; just as we argue a posteriori: This woman was pregnant, because (therefore) she gave birth; in this house there is a fire, because (therefore) smoke ascends. The true cause of the remission of sins is expressed in v. 50: "Your faith has saved you." To 2): John says: "we know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brothers." From which words it is manifest that the love of the brothers is not the cause of the transition from spiritual death to life, but the principle of knowing it a posteriori.

V. The greatest virtue justifies the most: Charity is the greatest virtue, 1 Corinthians 13:13. Therefore. Response: No virtue justifies, whether it be small or great, because from the law, which is the norm of virtues, there is no justification, Romans 3:20.

VI. The fear of the Lord drives out sins; because he who is without fear cannot be justified, Sirach 1:21-22. Response: a) The fear of the Lord drives out future sins, so that we may avoid them; faith purges the heart from past sins by the benefit of the blood of Christ, apprehended by singular trust. b)

The Greek text is thus: οὐ δυνήσεται θυμῶδης ἄνθρωπος δικαιωθῆναι, "an angry man will not be able to be justified." A man who indulges in anger will be able to subsist neither in the judgment of this world, nor before the divine tribunal; he will be condemned everywhere.

VII. Faith is counted for righteousness, Romans 4:5. Faith is a virtue: for it is commanded in the first precept of the decalogue. Therefore, a certain virtue, and consequently a certain good work, justifies. Response: Faith is counted for righteousness not absolutely and in itself, insofar as it is a virtue, but relatively and on account of Christ, whom it embraces; just as a hand makes a beggar rich not by itself, but on account of the treasure, offered by a rich man, which it accepts.

VIII. Penitence is not faith alone; because it comprises contrition and faith; Penitence justifies; Therefore, something that justifies is not faith alone. The minor is proven from Acts 3:19: "Repent therefore, and turn back, that your sins may be blotted out." Response: Penitence justifies by reason of faith alone in Christ, although it is conjoined with contrition. For contrition is necessary for those being justified, not by the necessity of a means, but of order. Contrition does not concur positively in justification, but only removes the obstacle to the remission of sins, namely the malicious purpose of sinning.

IX. Certain good works seem to precede faith and justification, namely the acknowledgment of sins, their detestation, and sorrow for sins, which are necessary for the man being justified: Therefore, not faith alone justifies. Response: The acknowledgment of sins, their detestation, and sorrow for sins are indeed movements of the soul, excited by the Holy Spirit through the divine law, but they are not good works, strictly speaking. For good works proceed from faith, and are the fruit of righteousness. But those movements precede regeneration, faith, and justification, and pertain to the conversion of the sinner. But it is not one and the same thing to speak of the conversion of man, and of his justification. For not all those things which are required for true conversion also pertain to justification. For to justification are required and necessary only the grace of God, the merit of Christ, and faith, which embraces these very benefits of God in the promise of God, as the Formula of Concord says, p. 687. (*)

Question X. Does faith justify completely?

Does faith justify completely? Faith justifies not dispositively a), nor initially and imperfectly, but completely and perfectly b).

Proof a. Faith in the act of justification is not considered absolutely, as our quality or disposition, but relatively, as it beholds Christ the ἰλαστήριον, and rests on His blood, Romans 3:25, so that through His name it may receive the remission of sins, Acts 10.

Proof b. Faith is the sole means, embracing divine grace, and apprehending Christ with all His benefits. Therefore it justifies not initially, but completely and perfectly. This is clear from the most lucid sayings of scripture. For thus the Apostle says in Hebrews 4:16: "Let us then with confidence draw near to the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy and find grace to help in time of need." And John 1:12: "But to all who did receive Christ, he gave the power to become children of God, (namely) to those who believe in his name."

The antithesis is 1) that of the Pontificians, asserting that faith justifies only initially or dispositively, but not perfectly; 2) that of the Socinians, maintaining that in the future life sins will finally be perfectly remitted. Their arguments are

I. Whatever is described by access to the throne of grace, that is only the beginning of justification; But faith, etc., Hebrews 4:16. Therefore. The major is clear; because access is the first motion by which he who was far off begins to approach. Response: a) To draw near to God, or to come to Christ is the same as to believe, John 6:35. b) Faith not only draws near to the throne of grace, but also receives mercy, and finds help.

II. Whoever through faith only receives the power to become children of God, they are not actually made children of God by faith; the power of becoming differs greatly from actual existence; But those who believe in Christ, etc., John 1:12. Therefore. Response: Ἐξουσία in that place does not denote a power, opposed to the act or state of sonship, but the right of those who are already reborn of God, v. 13. The word γενέσθαι signifies not only to become, but also to be.

(*) There are certain principal truths, joined by the closest bond, to be laid as foundations, on which this doctrine rests: that trust, placed in Christ, alone is able to make us just before God, i.e., free from all guilt and punishment. I will present them all, drawn from Paul's letter to the Romans. I. The common knowledge of God, the Creator and Preserver of all, which is naturally instilled in all men, c. 1, v. 19-21, hence also the common obligation of all to render perfect obedience to the divine laws, II, 14-15 ff. II. The common and equal defection of all from God, c. 2:1, 3:9-19, not only by propagation and imitation, but also by the just imputation of the first sin of all, c. 5:12, 14, 15, 16. III. Therefore, the common and equal damnation of all, c. 2:2, 9 ff., 3:19-20. IV. The common and extreme lack of strength of all men, so great indeed that no single one is able to do anything to abolish his own guilt, let alone that of others, c. 3:20; 8:7, ἔδε γὰρ δύναται, with the reason added: τὸ γὰρ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς ἔχθρα εἰς Θεόν. V. The necessity of revelation, from which anyone can know in what way the reconciliation of God and men can finally be made, c. 1:16-17. VI. The benevolence by which God has had mercy on all men, c. 2:4; 3:24; 5:8. VII. The avenging justice in God is natural, necessary, and immutable, c. 2:2. VIII. The necessary sponsorship of a certain μεσίτης, who, by expiating the sins of all men, would fully satisfy the avenging justice, c. 3:25. (Δικαιοσύνη in this place is not that righteousness of God which he himself attributes to us, but is the natural justice in God, and indeed that judging and punishing, which God willed to declare by a singular example, for ἐνδειξις is a declaration; but he declared it in that he constituted Christ as an ἰλαστήριον, understand θῦμα, an expiatory sacrifice, indeed ἐν τῷ αἵματι αὐτοῦ, from which it is apparent that God is so just that he himself cannot, saving his own justice, pardon the offenses of men, unless satisfaction has been rendered; add c. 5:8 & 9). IX. The necessary properties and perfections of that sponsor, namely three: that he should be 1) one, making satisfaction for all, c. 5:18-19; 2) innocent, and contaminated by no sin, ibid. v. 15, 19; 3) one man, and the same true God, so that he himself might be able both to sustain the place of men, and to reconcile the placated God to men, c. 1:3; 8:3. X. The necessary imputation of the vicarious righteousness, performed by this sponsor, and its application, which cannot be done otherwise than by trust placed in him, c. 3:24; 4:24-25; 5:18.

Question XI. Does God in the justification of a sinner also use ministers?

Ministerial cause. In the business of justification, God uses sacred preachers, rightly called and ordained, who by the power of the absolving key remit sins.

Proof. The ministers of the word are called מצדיקי הרבים those who make many righteous, Dan. 12:3. The minister of the church not only declares who receives the remission of sins, but also, by applying the word of reconciliation to repentant sinners individually, he really, organically, and ministerially remits sins, in the name of the principal cause.

Question XII. In what act does justification formally consist?

Form of justification. Justification is accomplished in two acts, a privative, and a positive one. The former is the non-imputation, or remission of sins a); the latter is the imputation of the righteousness of Christ b). (*)

Observation I. Why our justification formally consists in a privative and a positive act, D. Hutterus excellently teaches in his loc. com. art. III. on justification, fol. 477. In the act of our justification there are two terms; one is of evil, from which we are freed, the other is of good, to which we are transferred. Thus there is also a twofold form of this imputation: one privative, by which that which is inherent is not imputed; the other positive, by which that which is not inherent is imputed. From this likewise emerge two parts of one and the same formal cause in justification: one privative, which is and is called the remission of sins, so that in the act of justification, iniquities and inherent sins are not imputed to those being justified; the other part is positive, which is called the donation, or imputation of the righteousness of Christ, so that to those being justified is imputed an alien righteousness, namely that of Christ, not that eternal and essential, but ἐπίκτητος, i.e., acquired by the merits of obedience. Of which two foundations are to be noted. The first is taken from the condition of that state, from which we are transferred by justification to a better state. For outside of justification we are in a state of corruption, in which a twofold evil lies upon us, one θετικόν, or positive, namely the damnable guilt of our sins, the other στερητικόν, privative, namely the defect of righteousness, which ought to have been inherent. The formal cause of our justification brings medicine to both these evils; for the remission of sins takes away the former; the donation, or imputation of Christ's righteousness, compensates for the latter. The other foundation is sought from the parts of the mediation, by which righteousness and salvation were restored to us by Christ. For this mediation consists of 1) the obedience of Christ, rendered to the divine law for us; 2) the satisfaction, by which Christ paid the penalties due to our sins by his passion and death. The former merited for us the imputation of righteousness; the latter, however, the remission of both sins and the penalties due to them. By both of which merits our justification is completed.

Observation II. The sinner appears before the divine tribunal not only naked, but also sordid. And therefore both the sordid garments must be removed, which is done through the death and satisfaction of Christ; and the white garments must be applied, which is done through the imputation of the obedience of Christ. This very thing was most elegantly expressed typologically in the act concerning Joshua the priest, exhibited in a vision to Zechariah, from whom first the unclean garments were taken away, and these having been taken away, clean garments were put on, Zach. 3:4.

Proof a. 1) From Rom. 4:7. "Blessed are those whose lawless deeds are forgiven, and whose sins are covered! Blessed is the man, (*) Justification itself is indeed the remission of sins (Acts 13:38-39), by which it happens that sins are not attributed to a man. But the cause and foundation is the imputation of the vicarious righteousness of Christ, on which account we are said to be justified for Christ's sake, through him, in his blood, in the way that it is written in the Apol. Aug. Conf. cap. III, pag. 125: To justify in this place, by forensic custom, signifies to absolve the guilty and pronounce him just, but on account of an alien righteousness, namely Christ's. So also in the declar. form. conc. c. III, p. 685: And since on account of this righteousness of Christ, attributed to us, our sins are not attributed to us; it follows that, what is wont to be said, the non-imputation of sins does not precede the imputation of the righteousness of Christ, but follows it. For a cause cannot but be prior to its effect. See 2 Cor. 5:14-15 & 19.

to whom the Lord does not impute sin!" The Apostle transferred these words from Ps. 32:1-2. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered! Blessed is the man to whom the Lord does not impute iniquity!" To King David and the Apostle Paul, to forgive transgression, to cover sin, not to impute iniquity, are synonyms. The sins of believers are covered from God, not as if they escape His knowledge, but because He is no more offended by them than if they did not exist. Augustine not badly in Ps. 32: "If God has covered sins, He has refused to attend to them; if He has refused to attend to them, He has refused to take notice of them; if He has refused to take notice of them, He has refused to punish them; if He has refused to punish them, He has refused to acknowledge them; if He has refused to acknowledge them, He has willed to forgive them." For the rest, to understand the remission of sins more deeply, it must be observed: In original sin there is a) an inherent root; b) a relation to the person, insofar as it denominates a certain person, and contracts for him the guilt of fault, for the reason that it is ἀνομία, or a habit discrepant from the divine law; c) the guilt of punishment, or the obligation to punishment. But actual sins are considered either physically, insofar as they are actions and depend efficiently on man; or morally, insofar as they are actions against the law, and concern the right of some third party. Considered in the former way they are transient acts; but in the latter way, after they have been committed, and have passed away as to their real being, they remain morally, as to the guilt of fault and punishment. The guilt of fault is that by which a man is held as if bound under the sin committed by a past act, in the way, for example, that he who once commits adultery is said to be guilty of adultery, i.e., as if bound under the sin of adultery, so that he truly is and is called an adulterer, even if he is no longer committing adultery. The guilt of punishment is the obligation to undergo punishment for the sin committed. Wherefore, in order that the bond of guilt by which the sinner is held bound may be relaxed, both contrition and faith in Christ are necessary for him. Contrition is necessary by the necessity of order, so that the sinner, his sins being acknowledged from the divine law, may morally retract, disapprove, and seriously with sorrow detest them. Faith in Christ is necessary by the necessity of a means; for the reason that faith is the sole means by which the satisfaction of Christ, performed for the sins of the whole world, is apprehended, and is applied and united to the contrite soul, so that in view of this God may be moved to take away the guilt of fault and punishment. The guilt of fault is taken away by the gracious estimation of God, so that the repenting David is not considered an adulterer before the divine tribunal, Paul is not held as a persecutor of the church, Peter is not judged a denier of Christ. The guilt of punishment is also taken away, so that God does not inflict punishment on the sinner who believes in Christ, as an angry judge.

2. From 2 Cor. 5:19. "in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them." The Apostle implies that the non-imputation of sins flows from the satisfaction of Christ, about which his words in v. 14-15 are to be understood: "For... one has died for all, therefore all have died; and he died for all, that those who live might no longer live for themselves but for him who for their sake died and was raised." As if to say: The death of Christ, performed in the vicarious place of all men, is in the judgment of God estimated or accepted in no other way than if all had died, i.e., had themselves expiated their sins by dying; since the death of Christ is entirely ours through faith, as he did not die for himself, but for us, indeed for all men, so that, bound by so great a benefit, they might hereafter for the sake of gratitude also conform themselves to the will of the redeemer. From which the Apostle in v. 18 concludes that God, through the satisfactory death of Christ, has been reconciled, so that, saving his own justice, he does not impute sins to believers for punishment, but pardons them, and receives them into grace.

3. That justification formally consists in the non-imputation, or remission of sins, is clear from Acts 13:38. "Let it be known to you therefore, brothers, that through this man forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you, and by him everyone who believes is freed from everything from which you could not be freed by the law<sup>2</sup> of Moses." The word, δικαιωθῆναι, to be justified, constructed with the preposition ἀπὸ, from, or by, has a forensic signification, and denotes to absolve someone in judgment from those things of which he is guilty and of which he is accused. Therefore, justification formally is absolution from sins, or remission of sins. For this reason also the penitent publican, having obtained remission of sins, is said to have gone down to his house justified, Luke 18:14.

Proof b. 1) From Rom. 5:19. "For as by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, so by the one man's obedience the many will be made righteous." Just as the posterity of Adam are constituted sinners by the imputation of the disobedience of Adam; so we are constituted just by the imputation of the obedience of Christ.

2. From 2 Cor. V, 21. "For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God." Whence this argument is born; In the same way that Christ was made sin for us, in that same way we are rendered the righteousness of God on account of Christ; i.e., perfectly just before God. But Christ was made sin for us not by inherence, but by imputation. Therefore, we too on account of Christ are rendered the righteousness of God not by inherence, but by imputation.

3. Gal. 3:6. "Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him as righteousness." St. Paul adds v. 13. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us." The faith of Abraham therefore looked to Christ the redeemer, who was made a curse for us, whose righteousness was imputed to him out of divine mercy.

4. From Phil. 3:9. "and be found in Christ, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which comes through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that depends on faith." Paul appears before the most rigid judgment of God, relying not on his own righteousness, but on an alien one, which is from faith in Christ, to whom, as a branch to the vine, he was grafted.

5. From Rom. 4:5. "And to the one who does not work but believes in him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted as righteousness." Faith is counted for righteousness, not because it is itself such a good work, and of such great value, but because it is directed to the merit of Christ, which it involves by way of its object. For neither faith alone, nor the merit of Christ alone is imputed for righteousness, but faith apprehending the merit of Christ, or, what, as to the thing, coincides, the merit of Christ, apprehended by faith. Only the mode of predication is different. For when I say: The merit of Christ, apprehended by faith, is imputed for righteousness, the effect is predicated of the subject, to which it belongs in itself, and flows from its intrinsic value. But when I say: Faith, resting on the merit of Christ, is imputed for righteousness, the effect is predicated of the subject, to which it accrues from elsewhere. For faith is not imputed for righteousness, insofar as it is our act; but solely, insofar as it receives the merit of Christ. All the imputability of faith, therefore, comes from nowhere else than from the object apprehended.

6. In whatever a man in this life is blessed, in that his justification formally consists: By the imputation of the righteousness of Christ a man in this life is blessed. Therefore. The major is proven; because the blessedness of man in this life is his justification. The minor is proven from Rom. 4:6. "So also David speaks of the blessing (μακαρισμὸν) of the one to whom God counts righteousness' without works." The righteousness that is imputed without works is not our own inherent righteousness, since this consists in works, but an alien one, which is none other than the righteousness of Christ, who indeed was made for us by God righteousness, 1 Cor. 1:30.

Question XIII. What is imputation, considered generally?

Definition of Imputation. Imputation, considered generally, is an act of the intellect and will of him who exercises judgment, by which the voluntary action of some person is known and esteemed to pertain, with the effect resulting from it, either to the acting person himself, or to another, in whose stead that action was undertaken. But imputation is made either from debt, or from grace. A voluntary action is imputed from debt when its effect is attributed to the acting person, as the moral cause, by the estimation and decree of the judge a). A voluntary action is imputed from grace when the effect is reckoned not to the agent, but to that person for whose benefit the action undertaken is directed, by the gracious estimation of the judge b).

Observation I. To impute in the article of justification is not taken in a physical sense, as to signify to insert, to implant, einpflanzen, oder einpfropffen, but in a moral, judicial and declarative sense, by which voluntary actions are said to be imputed to the agent, when he especially, who has disposed by law concerning them, declares the agent to be the author of the same, and at the same time decrees that the effects of them redound to that actor, or inhere in the same, as defined by Samuel Pufendorf in de I N & G c. IX. p. 125. To impute here signifies to adjudge, to reckon, to attribute, to transfer, derive, devolve the effect of a voluntary action to someone by one's own estimation and judgment.

Observation II. No one is imputed with an action that is impossible, unwilling, and purely natural, but a voluntary action, dependent on the agent's powers, and his intention. For this reason a moral cause is commonly described, as a cause, which concurs with an effective intention, on account of which the effect is imputed to it.

Observation III. In all imputation three things are certainly to be considered: 1) a voluntary action, 2) an estimation and judgment about the voluntary action, 3) the effect of the action, which is adjudged to someone. The voluntary action is the foundation of the imputation, in view of which the judge makes a judgment; if this foundation is true, certain, and real, the imputation is true, real, and just. But if no voluntary action was performed, no foundation is present, and therefore the effect cannot be imputed; or, if it is imputed, the imputation is vain, fictitious, false, and unjust, e.g., when guilt is imputed to the innocent. For the rest, the voluntary action which is imputed, passes away, but the effect resulting from the action remains.

Observation IV. A voluntary action is either good, or bad. The effect of a good action is praise, prize, reward; the effect of a bad action is guilt, offense to the judge, and punishment.

Observation V. A voluntary action, either our own, or another's, is imputed to us for grave and just causes. When our own action is imputed to us, the foundation of the imputation is in us; when an alien action is imputed to us, the foundation is indeed in another, but there are grave and just causes on account of which it may be imputed to us. For example, the first sin of Adam is imputed truly and really to the entire human race; because he is the head of all men, who are joined to him by the bond of blood; (*)<sup>236</sup>the vicarious fulfillment of the law by Christ is also imputed by the true and real judgment of God to all believers; because he is the head of all believers, who are united to him by the bond of faith.

Proof a. From Rom. 4:4. "Now to the one who works, his wages are not counted as a gift but as his due." To a hired worker, his own voluntary action is imputed for wages by the master, and therefore the foundation of the imputation is in the hired worker himself; but if a friend labors for a friend, and the master benevolently accepts that labor, the reward is imputed not to the one laboring, but to him for whose benefit the labor was undertaken, out of grace. Then the foundation of the imputation is not in the person who receives the reward, but in that person who labored for another. Therefore, there is imputation according to debt, the foundation of which exists in the worker himself, to whom the imputation is made. Imputation according to grace is that whose foundation is not in him to whom the imputation is made, but in another, who directed his operation for his benefit, the effect of which the master, or judge attributes to the same out of grace, e.g., the obedience of Christ is reckoned to the believing sinner for righteousness by God out of grace.

Proof b. A very clear example of gracious imputation is provided by Paul himself, who writes to Philemon, v. 17, 18, 19. "So if you consider me your partner, receive him (Onesimus) as you would receive me. If he has wronged you at all, or owes you anything, charge that to my account. I, Paul, write this with my own hand: I will repay it." Onesimus had done an injury to Philemon, and was his debtor. The mediator, satisfier, and intercessor was Paul, who asked that every injury which Onesimus had done to Philemon be imputed to him. Philemon acknowledged this satisfaction to be valid, and accepted it, and adjudged its fruit, or the remission of the debt and injury, to Onesimus, and thus received him back into grace. Thus the sinner, by violating the law of God, did injury to His majesty, and contracted the debts of sins. The mediator, satisfier, and intercessor is Jesus Christ, who willed that the debts of all sinners be imputed to Himself, offering the fullest satisfaction to God. God judges out of grace that this satisfaction pertains to the sinner (*) Adam is to be considered not only as the natural head of the entire human race, by reason of propagation, through generation, Acts 17:26; but most especially also as the moral, or federal head; for the covenant which God established with that common parent of all pertained equally to all, Romans 5:12.

who believes in Christ, and in view of this He absolves the same from guilt and punishment. There are also many other examples of gracious imputation. King Pharaoh imputed the merits of Joseph to his father and brothers for a comfortable habitation in Egypt, King David imputed the merits of Jonathan to Mephibosheth for enjoying the royal table. Indeed, even today we learn from many experiments that the merits of husbands are imputed to their wives, so that the latter may shine with the rays of the former, and the merits of parents are imputed to their sons for honor and dignity.

Question XIV. Can you now clearly explain the non-imputation or remission of sins, and the imputation of Christ's righteousness?

Fuller explanation. God, the most just but placable judge, so cognizes the cause of the sinful man—accused by the law, and convicted of sins, yet at the same time believing in Christ—that He indeed finds the same guilty of fault and eternal punishment, and destitute of his own righteousness, but judges the satisfaction and merit of the mediator Christ to pertain to him in such a way that, on account of the satisfactory passion of Christ, (*) apprehended by true faith, He absolves him from guilt and punishment, and on account of the fulfillment of the divine law performed by Christ in the stead of the human race, and applied by singular trust, He reputes and pronounces the same just by a gracious estimation.

You say: The remission of sins and the imputation of righteousness are equivalent terms for Paul, Rom. 4:6-7. Response: The remission of sins and the imputation of the righteousness of Christ are indivisible and intimately connected acts, yet formally distinct, since the former is privative, the latter positive; the former proceeds immediately from the passive obedience of Christ, the latter from the active obedience. We do not, in the meantime, deny that one is rightly inferred from the other; since there is no sinner for whom sins are remitted, and yet the righteousness of Christ is not imputed, and vice versa.

The antithesis is 1. that of the Pontificians, who by an infused habit of righteousness, II. of the Socinians, who by obedience rendered to the precepts of Christ, III. of the Arminians, who by faith, as our act or work, IV. of the Weigelians, who by the imitation of Christ, V. of the Osiandrists, who teach that we are justified by the essential righteousness of God. Their principal arguments are:

I. Whatever righteousness is alien, that cannot be ours; But the righteousness of Christ is alien; Therefore. Response: 1) The righteousness which is alien, cannot be ours by inherence; yet it can be ours by imputation. 2) That in human judgment the righteousness of one person is not esteemed, or reckoned as the righteousness of another, arises from the fact that in common life one person is not united to another, as believers in Christ not only receive this their mediator within the chamber of their heart, as a guest, John 1:12, but also put him on, Gal. 3:28, and through faith are as if agglutinated to him, 1 Cor. 6:17, so that they are found in Christ, not otherwise than as branches in the vine, Phil. 3:9, add John 15:1 ff. Hence it is that believers apply the righteousness of Christ to themselves, appropriate it, and make it their own through faith. 3) If the unrighteousness of Adam could be imputed to all, who were begotten of him; why could not the righteousness of Christ be imputed to those, who are spiritually born of him?

II. Whoever are denominated just by the intrinsic righteousness of Christ, they are not truly, but only putatively just; But penitent sinners are said to be just truly, and not putatively; Therefore. Response: 1) Extrinsic denomination is not opposed to the truth of the thing. A wall is said to be seen by an extrinsic denomination, and yet it is truly seen. Someone is called my friend from my love, which is in me, and outside of him. A debtor is said to be extrinsically freed from foreign debt, for which another has paid the debt. Which extrinsic denomination does not take away the truth of the thing. 2) Although in the very act of justification the extrinsic righteousness of Christ is imputed to the repentant sinner; that, however, is received by the believing sinner within the soul, so that in the justified man justification is and remains not by way of inherence, but of appropriation, and of union.

(*) On account of both forms of Christ's obedience, which he, both by doing and by suffering, rendered vicariously; for each has the power of making full satisfaction, the former indeed for the guilt of sin, the latter however for the punishment. But of this has already been said elsewhere.

III. Whoever is not as just as Christ, his righteousness cannot be the righteousness of Christ; But the penitent sinner &c. Therefore. The major is proven; because Christ is righteousness itself, Jer. 23:6. But the penitent sinner who believes in Christ, although he is justified on account of the merit of Christ, complains however with Paul, that nothing good dwells in him, Rom. 7:18. Response: We distinguish between the essential, habitual, and mediatorial righteousness of Christ. There is a great difference between the righteousness of Christ and that of the justified sinner; so that the latter is plainly not to be compared with the former. For Christ, as God, is essentially just, as man, he is habitually just, from the first moment of conception; which can by no means be asserted of the justified sinner. For the rest, if Christ, the mediator according to both natures, by his merit produced righteousness not for himself, but for the sinful man, it is terminally derived not into Christ, but into the sinner, who receives it by true faith; and this is the mediatorial righteousness of Christ. Whence, by the merited righteousness, not Christ is denominated just, but the sinful man who believes in Christ.

IV. Whoever are said to be truly just by the imputed righteousness of Christ, they are not only equally just among themselves, but also more just than the celestial beings; But not all Christians are equally just among themselves, nor more just than the celestial beings; Therefore. The major is clear; because just Christians are denominated from the one righteousness of Christ, which will cease in heaven; for the reason that knowledge (faith) will be abrogated there. Response: With respect to the imputed righteousness of Christ, one man is not more just than another; because the righteousness, obtained by the merit of Christ, admits of no degrees; but a man is said to be more just than another with respect to inherent righteousness. Then, the imputed righteousness of Christ will indeed not cover any sins in heaven, because there will be none; yet it will endure eternally, as the outstanding splendor of the celestial beings and the basis of all holiness, of all glorious rectitude.

V. If by the imputation of the righteousness of Christ we are truly just, Christ by the imputation of our sin will be truly a sinner; The consequent is false. Therefore, also the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven; because our sins are so imputed to Christ, as the righteousness of Christ is imputed to us, 2 Cor. 5:21. That the consequent is false is established; because a sinner is a son of the devil. Response: a) Chrysostom and other Greek Fathers called Christ the greatest sinner, imputatively so; because he was held in the divine judgment as the bearer of the sins of the whole world. "The LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all," says Isaiah, c. 53:6. b) A great difference remains between us and Christ. For Christ not only ascribes and imparts to us His own righteousness, but also endows us with inherent righteousness; we, however, do not infect him with the contagion of our inherent unrighteousness. Whence our sin does not inhere in him. c) He is called a son of the devil who, with a deliberate purpose of mind, commits sins against his conscience and indulges in them. For this reason not even the pious, in whom sin inheres, and who not rarely fall from human infirmity, are to be called sons of the devil; much less Christ.

VI. If by the inherent disobedience of Adam all men are constituted unjust, then surely by the inherent obedience of Christ all faithful men are constituted just; The antecedent is true; Therefore also the consequent. The consequence of the major is evident; because the reason for opposites is the same. The antecedent is clear from the testimony of Paul in Rom. 5:19. Response: The disobedience of Adam and the obedience of Christ are proper, personal, and individual acts, which cannot be common to others, unless they are imputed to them by divine judgment. Hence it is that although disobedience inheres in Adam, and obedience in Christ; yet the disobedience of Adam is reckoned to his posterity, and the obedience of Christ to believers, by divine estimation and declaration, so that the former are reputed guilty of death, the latter just and heirs of eternal life.

Instance: But the disobedience of Adam also inheres in his posterity; because it is instilled in them by carnal generation; Therefore, the obedience of Christ also inheres. Response: It is wrongly said that the disobedience of Adam inheres in his posterity. For the disobedience of Adam was the first and originating sin, which could not be attributed to his posterity except through imputation; but original, or originated sin, is a sin arisen from that, which indeed inheres in the posterity of Adam, but only consequently flows from the disobedience of Adam.

VII. Faith is not the righteousness of Christ (because they differ as the means, and the form of justification): Faith is imputed for righteousness, Romans 4:5. Therefore, something which is imputed for righteousness is not the righteousness of Christ. Response: In the major premise, faith is taken absolutely and abstractly, insofar as it is a receiving means, in the minor relatively and concretely, insofar as it is a means receiving the merit of Christ, which is imputed to the believer for righteousness by divine estimation. This different consideration of faith produces a quaternion of terms.

VIII. The satisfaction of Christ is either imputed before we have it, or when we have it; But not before we have it; because it has long since been rendered, so that we most certainly have it; nor when we have it; because what a man has, is not imputed to him; Therefore, it is never imputed. Response: We distinguish a) between the satisfaction, and its effect; b) between the satisfaction rendered by Christ, and applied to oneself by man. The satisfaction of Christ has long since been rendered; but its effect, which is the remission of sins, we do not have before we apply the universal satisfaction of Christ to ourselves, and make it ours by faith. For indeed, so that a gracious imputation may be rightly made, in the agent quidem there must be present the intention of procuring some good for another by his action; in the recipient the expressed or presumed will of receiving that from him. For the imputation of a work which is thrust upon an unwilling person is rightly rejected, says Sam. Pufendorf in L. de I. N. & G. p. 128.

IX. The righteousness which we lost through Adam, that has been restored through Christ; Inherent righteousness, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because whatever was lost through Adam has been restored through Christ, Rom. 5:15. Response: The conclusion can be granted in an inclusive sense; because the righteousness inherent in the regenerate is to be accepted by the merit of Christ. But if it is understood in an exclusive sense, that through Christ only inherent righteousness has been restored, we deny the major. For its proof we say that Christ not only restored that which was lost through Adam, but also acquired other goods, or benefits for us, e.g., penitential conversion, faith resting on the merit of Christ, imputed righteousness, confraternity with Christ, which were not lost. On the contrary, certain goods, lost through Adam, Christ did not restore, namely, immortality in this life, full dominion over living things, habitation in paradise, etc.

X. To whom the righteousness of God is given, and that eternal, so that they may become partakers of the divine nature, to them is conferred not the righteousness of Christ, but the essential righteousness of God; But to believers, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the eternal righteousness of God is not the righteousness of Christ, which indeed was obtained in the fullness of time, and through which we are not rendered partakers of the divine nature. Response: The imputed righteousness of Christ is the righteousness of God, because by the gracious estimation of God it is reckoned to those who believe in Christ; it is eternal, both by reason of the divine decree, and by reason of its value and efficacy; but we are rendered partakers of the divine nature through the mystical union, which follows justification.

Question XV. Is the doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ not only true, but also useful for piety?

Is the doctrine of imputation true and useful? The evangelical doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ is not only true and solid a), but also most useful for practicing a true piety, devoid of pretense b).

The antithesis is 1) that of the Pontificians, whose canon X in the Council of Trent, Session V, is as follows: "If anyone says that men are formally just by the righteousness of Christ, let him be anathema." 2) That of the Socinians, who deny that the righteousness of Christ is imputed to us. OSTORODUS in inst. german. c. XXXIV. fol. 304 writes: "Not the slightest little saying about the righteousness of Christ reckoned to us can be shown in Holy Scripture." 3) That of the Arminians, who contend that faith as our act, or work, not the righteousness, merit, or obedience of Christ, is imputed to us for righteousness, in Apol. f. 112. 4) That of the Weigelians, and Mystics, who, as much as is in them, undermine the imputed righteousness of Christ. For thus WEIGELIUS in part. III. of his postil, p. 15, says: "They must have the death, and the resurrection of Christ in them, and not impute it from without." Not better, but much worse than this, CHRIST. HOBURG says in his mystical postil p. 190: "If your imputation can accomplish everything, and justify us before God, what need do we have of union with Christ?" 5) The Quakers agree with these. ROBERT BARCLAY in his Apology on thesis 7, n. 7, says: "The imputative righteousness of Christ is not found in the sacred writings."

Exposition

The dissenters, traducing the most true doctrine of the Protestants concerning the imputed righteousness of Christ, labor either from the most shameful ignorance, or from a plainly detestable malice; since they judge concerning it no differently than the blind do of colors, and they attribute to the Protestants those things which have not even entered their minds in a dream. Wherefore this dogma, most well-founded in the sacred writings, must first be elucidated, then solidly proven, and finally transferred to the use of piety.

Observation I. But observe, benevolent reader, that for the present the sophistries of the Weigelians, Mystics, and Quakers are chiefly to be discussed; the objections of the Pontificians and Socinians we have examined in the preceding question 14 of this chapter VIII.

Observation II. The Protestants, with Holy Scripture as their guide, take the word, to justify, in a forensic, or judicial sense, so that it signifies to absolve a penitent sinner from the guilt of fault and punishment for certain reasons, and to esteem, repute, declare, and pronounce him just. This judicial signification of the word "to justify" we have proven above, question 2 of this chapter VIII.

Observation III. How the word, to impute, is taken here, see the preceding question XIII.

Observation IV. In all imputation, three things are certainly to be considered: a) A voluntary action or passion. For involuntary actions, or those which proceed from physical necessity, or which exceed our powers, are imputed to no one. b) An estimation and judgment about the voluntary action. But the master, or judge, who possesses the power of judging, estimates the goodness or malice of the action. c) The effect of the action, which is adjudged to someone. The voluntary action behaves as the matter, and is the foundation of the imputation, in view of which the judge makes a judgment; the effect behaves as the form, and redounds either to the acting person himself, or to another, in whose stead or for whose benefit that action was undertaken.

Observation V. Imputation is made either from debt, or from grace, a distinction which Paul uses, Rom. 4:4. "And to the one who works, the wage is not imputed out of grace, but out of debt." Each can be described, either with respect to the foundation, or with respect to the effect. Our CHEMNITZ primarily regarded the foundation in his loc. theol. part. II. p. 294. "There is a certain imputation which has and regards a foundation in the worker, to whom the imputation is made, and this is not made according to grace, but according to debt. But there is another imputation, which in him to whom it is made, does not have, nor regard a foundation, by reason and respect of which it may be imputed, but the foundation is in the grace, and mercy of God justifying the ungodly."

Observation VI. But if imputation from grace and debt is to be described with respect to the effect which results from the voluntary action, it can be defined in the following manner: Imputation from debt is when the effect of a voluntary action is attributed to the acting person, as the moral cause, by the estimation and decree of the judge. Imputation from grace is when the effect is reckoned not to the agent, but to that person for whose benefit the voluntary action is directed, by the gracious estimation of the judge. In which manner VASQUEZ, the most learned of the Jesuits, judged not badly of the nature of imputation, alleged by D. CALOVIUS in his bibl. illustrat. on c. IV of Rom. f. 73. "We concede that even some extrinsic things are imputed to us for some effect, like the merit and obedience of Christ; because not only those things which are in us, but also alien things, in view of which something is given to us, are said to be computed as ours for some effect, as if they were in reality ours."

Observation VII. So that a gracious imputation (about which we are presently treating) can be rightly made, in the agent quidem there must be present the intention of procuring some good for another by his action; in the recipient the expressed or presumed will of receiving that from him; for the imputation of a work which is thrust upon an unwilling person is rightly rejected, as PUFENDORF opines, de I. N. & G. c. IX, §. 128.

Observation VIII. The master, or judge, in making a gracious imputation, generally benevolently regards and esteems the union, whether natural or moral, which intervenes between the acting person and that person for whose benefit the voluntary action was undertaken. A natural union exists between a father and children; a moral one between a husband and wife, between friends, family members, and colleagues. Communion, or communication, follows union. Wherefore the judge in a gracious imputation, in view of a natural or moral union, gives and communicates the effect of the voluntary action, which the acting person performs, to another person, who is joined with the acting person by some bond of union.

Observation IX. Imputation is either privative, or positive. The former is when a debt, on account of the satisfaction rendered by the acting person, is not imputed, or is remitted, to another who is not acting, in view of his powerlessness and indigence. The latter is when a reward, on account of the voluntary action which the agent performed for the benefit of another, is given and communicated in view of a natural or moral union.

Observation X. Although imputation, considered generally, is an act of the intellect and will of him who exercises judgment, by which the voluntary action of some person is known, esteemed, and judged to pertain, with the effect resulting from it, either to the acting person himself, or to another, in whose stead, or for whose benefit that action was undertaken; yet that imputation is not fictitious, or fabricated, but true and real; 1. on account of the true and real foundation, which is the voluntary action; 2. with respect to the true and real intention which intervenes between the acting person, and the one who receives the reward; 3. by reason of the true and real effect which follows the voluntary action.

Observation XI. This moral doctrine, most excellent and useful by far, since it seems difficult for the inexperienced to understand, must be illustrated with examples. In the sacred code, there are extant examples of gracious imputation. The king of Egypt, Pharaoh, imputed the good deeds of Joseph to both his father and his brothers, for a comfortable habitation in Egypt. King David imputed the merits of Jonathan to Mephibosheth, for enjoying the royal table, regarding the bond of natural union which was between the son and the father.

Philemon imputed the satisfaction offered by Paul to Onesimus, for immunity from debt. For the rest, in military and civil life, the outstanding deeds of a parent are not rarely graciously imputed by a prince to his children, so that, he having been ennobled, they too are considered noble; the merits of husbands are imputed to their wives, so that the latter may shine with their rays. It often happens that one colleague labors for another who is sick, and the reward from the bestowing master is imputed and conferred not on the one laboring, but on the sick one.

Observation XII. Having generally unfolded moral imputation, we now gird ourselves to consider, and piously to weigh, the much more gracious divine imputation; where we note a) The judge, who is the triune God. This judge is most just, a hater and most fierce avenger of all sin, of whom the royal Psalmist, Ps. V, 5, 6, 7 says: "For you are not a God who delights in wickedness; evil may not dwell with you. The boastful shall not stand before your eyes; you hate all evildoers. You destroy those who speak lies; the LORD abhors the bloodthirsty and deceitful man." b) His judgment according to the norm of the law is most rigid, of which Ps. 143:2 says: "Enter not into judgment with your servant, for no one living is righteous before you." c) The guilty party is every sinful man. For the whole world is held accountable to God, Rom. 3:19. d) The plaintiff, or accuser, is partly Moses the legislator, John 5:45, partly the devil, Rev. 12:10. e) The witness is conscience, Rom. 2:15, Col. 2:14. f) The condemnatory sentence is found in the law of Moses. "Cursed be everyone who does not abide by all things written in the Book of the Law," Deut. 27:26. g) But there intervenes the mediator, advocate, and sponsor Christ, who gave himself for all εἰς ἀντίλυτρον, as a ransom, 2 Tim. 2:6. He reconciled sinners by his death, Rom. 5:10, and fulfilled the law in their stead, Gal. 4:4-5, Matth. 5:17, Rom. 10:4. h) On account of his satisfaction, sin is not imputed to believers in Christ, 2 Cor. 5:18, and on account of his vicarious fulfillment of the law, righteousness is imputed to all who truly believe in him, Rom. 4:5. Because God regards the union of believers with Christ the satisfier and mediator, who labored for sinners by doing and suffering, Is. 43:24-25, that union is therefore made by faith, which not only apprehends Christ, John 1:12, but also puts him on, Gal. 3:27, adheres to him, 1 Cor. 6:17, and is found in him, as a branch in the vine, Phil. 3:9, John 15:5. Here one must accurately distinguish between the formal or relative union of faith, and the mystical or sanctifying union. The latter follows justification in the order of nature; for sins, unless they are remitted, impede the gracious union, by which God dwells and operates in the soul, Is. 59:2. But the formal and relative union of faith (which may also be called apprehensive, appropriative, and adhesive) precedes justification in the order of nature. That this is so, the most accurate Theologians confirm from the sacred writings. D. BROCHMAND, vol. II. of his system, p. 485, says: "But if regeneration is taken for that spiritual birth from God, which chiefly consists in our union, because we are of God, or, because we are in Christ, according to that of Paul, Rom. 8:1. 'There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus.'" D. QUENSTEDT agrees, part. III of his System, fol. 523, as he is about to elucidate the apostolic saying, Phil. 3:9: "and be found in Christ, not having a righteousness of my own etc." he says: "The sense of the words is: When God shall inquire into the righteousness of each and every one, and shall demand it according to the most exact and most severe norm of his judgment, that I may then be found grafted into Christ, as a branch in the vine, and a shoot in the olive tree, or, as in Gal. 3:27, clothed with Christ, joined with Christ by an intimate and most close union; for so it will happen through this conjunction, that what is Christ's, will also be mine." The same is asserted by D. WILHELMUS LYSERUS in his System, p. 1548: "Imputation is founded on the spiritual union of faith, by which we are made the flesh of the mediator Christ himself, and we find his operation, through the mirror of faith, communicating all his deeds and merits to us, so that we may be found in Christ, Phil. 3:9, and thus, as his members, we may be rendered partakers of all the labors accomplished for our sake." Cf. D. NEUMANN, disputation on the connection and order of the gifts of grace, §. XV.

Observation XIII. Gracious imputation is distinguished into privative, and positive. Privative imputation is that by which, on account of the spontaneous and satisfactory passion of Christ, which he underwent for us, sins are not imputed to believers for punishment. Positive is that by which, on account of the voluntary obedience of Christ, by which he voluntarily subjected himself to the law in the stead of the human race and fulfilled it, the righteousness of Christ is imputed, so that by it they may be constituted just before the divine tribunal. Each is real 1) by reason of the foundation, which is the real passion of Christ and vicarious fulfillment of the law; 2) by reason of the serious and real intention of Christ of procuring many goods for sinners; 3) by reason of the true and real union with Christ, which is made by faith; 4) by reason of the effect, which is the true and real remission of sins, the true and real imputed righteousness of Christ. Each, however, is not simple, by which the subject is considered in itself, and so an estimation is instituted; but permutative, by which the subject is considered in the vicarious sponsor and satisfier. Namely, the sins and punishments of men were imputed to the sponsor Christ. He himself paid the penalties in his passion, so that sins might not be imputed to believers for punishment; he transferred the sins onto himself, so that on account of the most complete obedience rendered to the divine law, the righteousness of Christ might be imputed to believers. Each imputation is to be confirmed in the present, and hereafter this doctrine is to be applied to the exercises of piety.

Confirmation

The privative imputation is proven 1) from 2 Cor. 5, 19. "in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them." The apostle implies that the non-imputation of sins flows from the satisfaction of Christ, about which his words in v. 14, 15 are to be understood: "For... one has died for all, therefore all have died," as if to say: The vicarious death of Christ, performed in the place of all men, is in the judgment of God estimated no differently than if all had died, i.e., had paid the penalties of their sins by a most bitter death.

2. From Rom. 4:7. "Blessed are those whose lawless deeds are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man against whom God will not count sin!" Compare Ps. 32:1-2. From these two classic sayings we argue: Whoever are considered blessed because through the death of Christ they have been reconciled to God, they are reputed just before the divine tribunal, and are therefore considered blessed; But those whose sins have been remitted, they for that reason &c; Therefore.

3. From Eph. 1:7. "In Christ we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins." Whoever have the forgiveness of sins through the blood of Christ the redeemer, they are justified before the divine judgment on account of the bloody passion of Christ; But believers in Christ &c. Therefore.

The positive imputation is also proven 1) from Rom. 4:6. "So also David speaks of the blessing (μακαρισμὸν) of the one to whom God counts righteousness without works." From which apostolic statement we gather: The righteousness which is imputed by God without works is not inherent in us, but is the imputed righteousness of Christ; But the righteousness which makes us blessed in the kingdom of grace is the righteousness which is imputed to us without works; Therefore.

You say: In the major proposition more is contained than in the apostolic statement. For the Apostle indeed affirms that we are blessed, through righteousness imputed without works, but he does not add that we are blessed through the imputed righteousness of Christ. Response: 1) The imputed righteousness opposed to the righteousness of works is the righteousness of faith in Christ, as Paul teaches, Phil. 3:9, who indeed was made for us righteousness by God, 1 Cor. 1:30. 2) What righteousness Paul intended, he himself explains Rom. 5:18. "Therefore, as one trespass (of Adam) led to condemnation for all men, so one act of righteousness (of Christ) leads to justification and life for all men."

2. From Rom. 4:5. "And to the one who does not work, but believes in him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is imputed for righteousness." Obligation. Faith is imputed for righteousness not absolutely, insofar as it is from the census of virtues, or works; for it is expressly opposed to works in this place, and elsewhere; but relatively, on account of Christ, whom it receives and contains; just as a hand makes a beggar rich not by itself, but on account of the treasure which it accepts. We gather: He to whom, not working, but believing in Christ, faith is imputed for righteousness, is considered just before the divine tribunal not on account of his own righteousness, but on account of the righteousness of Christ apprehended by true faith; But to the ungodly man not working, but believing in Christ, &c. Therefore.

3. From Gal. 3:6. "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness." Paul adds, v. 13. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, by becoming a curse for us." The faith of Abraham therefore looked to the redeemer Christ, who was made a curse for us, so that to us, redeemed from the curse, the righteousness of Christ might be divinely imputed. We argue: In the manner that Abraham, the father of all believers, was justified, in that same manner all believers are justified; But Abraham was justified because the righteousness of Christ was imputed to him; Therefore all believers are justified because the righteousness of Christ is imputed to them.

4. From 2 Cor. 5:21. "For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God." In the same way that Christ was made sin for us, in that same way we are rendered the righteousness of God on account of Christ (i.e., perfectly just before God); But Christ was made sin for us not by inherence, as if any sin had inhered in him; but by imputation, because in the divine judgment our sin was imputed to him; Therefore we too on account of Christ are rendered the righteousness of God not by inherence, as if a perfect righteousness of works inheres in us; but by imputation, because the most perfect righteousness of Christ is imputed and reckoned to us.

5. From Phil. 3:9. "and be found in Christ, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law (fit), but that which comes through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that depends on faith." Whoever appears before the most rigid judgment of God relying not on his own righteousness, but on an alien one, which is from faith in Christ, to whom he is grafted as a branch to the vine, him God most graciously esteems just with the righteousness of Christ, apprehended by true faith. But Paul, and every converted and reborn sinner, &c. Therefore.

6. From Rom. 5:19. "For as by the one man's (Adam's) disobedience the many were made sinners, so by the one man's (Christ's) obedience the many will be made righteous." I subsume; But by the imputed disobedience of Adam all men, connected by the bond of blood with Adam, are constituted sinners. Therefore, also by the imputed obedience of Christ all the reborn, joined to him by the bond of faith, are constituted just.

You say: The disobedience of Adam is not only imputed to his posterity, but also inheres in them. Response: The disobedience of Adam is a proper, personal, and individual act, which cannot be common to his posterity except through imputation. It is indeed the transgression of the paradisiacal law, and therefore the first and originating sin, which is imputed to his posterity; but original, or originated sin, is a sin arisen from the first, which indeed inheres in the posterity of Adam, but only consequently flows from the disobedience of Adam.

7. Τὸ τέλος νόμου, the end, or fulfillment of the law is Christ for righteousness to everyone who believes, Rom. 10:4. If Christ fulfilled the law for righteousness to everyone who believes, his vicarious fulfillment of the law is imputed to the reborn man for righteousness. The antecedent, according to Paul's testimony, is true. Therefore, also the consequent.

8. Two enormous absurdities press upon the hypothesis of our adversaries. For 1) they dare to appear before the rigid judgment of God relying on their own righteousness, which in the O.T. David, most adorned with virtues, did not dare to do, see Ps. 143:2, nor under the new covenant Paul, see 1 Cor. 4:4; Phil. 3:9, since the righteousness inherent in us is imperfect and impure, and cannot sustain the examination of divine judgment. 2) The same deny the satisfactory passion and death of Christ, as well as the fulfillment of the law, performed by Christ in the place of the whole human race, the effect of which cannot redound to the human race except through the most gracious imputation of God. But in denying this, they, as much as is in them, go about undermining the very foundation of the faith.

Proof b. That the evangelical doctrine of the divine imputation of the active and passive obedience of Christ for righteousness and the remission of sins is most useful for promoting piety, is easy to demonstrate. For 1) by privative imputation, on account of the satisfactory passion of Christ, sin is not imputed for condemnation, 2 Cor. 5:19. But immunity from condemnation, and holiness of life the Apostle Paul joins in Rom. 8:1. "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit." And the Apostle Peter teaches in his 1st epistle 2:24 that the twofold end of the satisfactory passion of Christ is the remission of sins, and holiness of life: "Christ himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, that we, having died to sins, might live to righteousness, by whose wounds you have been healed." Reborn men, to whom sins are not imputed for condemnation, do not indulge the desires of the flesh, but having obtained the Holy Spirit, they obey his movements, lest they fall from the blessedness of grace and glory. To this point are the words of the royal Prophet, Ps. 130:4. "For with you there is forgiveness, that you may be feared."

2. The fruits of imputed righteousness are generally good works, Phil. 1:11; but specifically a) Ardent love of God, and of the mediator Christ. For faith, in view of which the obedience of Christ was imputed for righteousness, works through love, Gal. 5:6. Surely the reborn and justified man is kindled with love for God, considering with himself the ineffable mercy of God, which imputes faith for righteousness even to the ungodly man, who is penitent and believes in Christ. He burns with love for Christ, whoever piously considers that he is adorned with the righteousness of Christ as with a garment, or is surrounded by it as by a most splendid light, Is. 61:10; Rev. 12:1.

b) Love toward one's neighbor, which justifying faith produces. "Everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ has been born of God, and everyone who loves him who begot him, also loves him who has been born of him," says John in his 1st epistle 5:1. A man is reborn of God who believes in Christ, who was made for him righteousness, 1 Cor. 1:30, but he testifies his faith by sincere love both toward God and toward his neighbor.

c) Obedience rendered to the divine precepts. Let Abraham be an example to us, who declared his faith by works and especially by the most ready obedience, obeying the divine command concerning the offering of his son for a burnt offering, Gen. 22:1; James 2:21.

d) True submission of the mind, and spiritual self-abnegation. For he who, after the example of Paul, is found in Christ, not having his own righteousness, which is from the law, but that which is from faith in Christ, surely does not swell with pride in the manner of the Pharisees, but conducts himself submissively, is not puffed up, but refers whatever he has of divine blessing to his Savior.

e) Spiritual joy, which the Israelite church, expressing it, sings: "I will greatly rejoice in the LORD; my soul shall exult in my God, for he has clothed me with the garments of salvation; he has covered me with the robe of righteousness," Is. 61:10.

f) The giving of thanks, to which both the non-imputation of sins and the imputation of the righteousness of Christ excite us, as Paul admonishes, Col. 1:12 ff. "giving thanks to the Father, who has qualified you to share in the inheritance of the saints in light. He has delivered us from the domain of darkness and transferred us to the kingdom of his beloved Son, in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins."

Wherefore we agree not with the enemies of truth, who deny that the imputed righteousness of Christ contributes anything of moment to the pursuit of sincere piety, but with Paul, who gravely says: "But now that you have been set free from sin and have become slaves of God, the fruit you get leads to sanctification," Rom. 6:22.

Resolution

Weigelius objects in part. III of his postil, p. 15, 16. "A notable error is among the false Christians, that they let another do the Law, suffer, die, and they want to help themselves with the Imputativa without repentance." Response: This is a most virulent and plainly diabolical calumny, by which Weigelius, a man of hardened front, and his accomplices strive to defile and denigrate the religion of the Protestants. (*) But indeed our symbolic books refute that malicious calumny. Let them read, I ask, the epitome of the Formula of Concord, p. 586, where these most memorable words are found: "We believe, teach, and confess, that although antecedent contrition, and subsequent new obedience do not pertain to the article of justification before God; yet such a justifying faith is not to be imagined, which can exist and stand together with an evil purpose, namely of sinning and acting against conscience." Let them also read the declaration, p. 688. "Wherefore a true and saving faith is not in those who lack contrition, and have the purpose of continuing and persevering in sins. For true contrition precedes, and justifying faith is in those who truly, not feignedly, repent." With what front, therefore, do the Weigelians attribute this profane opinion to the Evangelical doctors, that they teach that justifying faith is that which neither serious contrition precedes, nor new obedience follows? I call God to witness that the Protestant doctors utterly abhor and abominate that monster of an opinion. Let us hear the apologist of the Augsburg Confession, defending the celestial truth with very memorable words: "When we speak of such a faith, which is not an idle thought, but which liberates from death, and brings forth a new life in the hearts, and is the work of the Holy Spirit, it does not stand with mortal sin, but as long as it is present, it brings forth good fruits," p. 71.

II. Weigelius continues: "It helps you nothing from without, jump high, or low, the life of Christ in you must do it, Christ inhabiting, not remaining outside. Now the true faith brings, which is the life of Christ in us, with it without any contradiction the being co-baptized, the co-suffering, the being co-crucified, the co-dying, the being co-buried, and the co-rising. The essential union must do it, that we have him spiritually and bodily in us. Where do you now stand with your imputativa? You will not be able to cover yourself from the wrath of God with it. Put on Christ, put on the new man, then what Christ has done for you will be imputed to you out of grace, otherwise you will remain eternally damned with your imputativa." Response: Weigelius proposes everything confusedly and preposterously. For a) he opines that the mystical union in the order of nature precedes the imputed righteousness of Christ; but he deceives and is deceived. For our iniquities, unless they are remitted on account of the satisfaction of Christ, divide between us and God, Is. 59:2. 2) Weigelius confuses the mystical union and sanctification with the formal and relative union of faith. Through the former, Christ inhabits, lives, and operates in us; through the latter, we apprehend and put on Christ, and appropriate to ourselves the fruit of his satisfactory passion and vicarious fulfillment of the law. That this distinction is solid is apparent from Gal. 2:19, 20. "I have been crucified with Christ. It is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me." The Christian through faith is so closely united with Christ that he certainly appropriates the fruit of the crucifixion to himself, no differently than if he had hung on the cross in his own person with the Savior. Deinceps Christ lives and operates in the justified man. 3) Weigelius foolishly calls the mystical union essential. For a) for this it is required that two incomplete substances come together into one complete substance. But indeed in the mystical union God and man are complete substances; nor is one changed into the other. b) God dwells in us as in temples, 1 Cor. 3:16. But the inhabitant and the temple are not of one essence. 4) Weigelius errs most gravely by placing renewal before justification, contrary to what Paul teaches, Rom. 6:22.

(*) Fanatical men, almost all of them, are adversaries of this doctrine. Among the more recent, the masked CHRISTIST DEMOCRITUS, and most recently EDELMANN, have surpassed them all in impudence, than which two no one has ever dared to speak more slanderously and contemptuously against this principal part of the Gospel. The Socinians themselves indeed confess imputed righteousness, for they cannot deny, or take away the force of the word, λογίζεσθαι, Rom. 4:6, 22, 23, 24 & 2 Corinth. 5:19. But they are unwilling to bear the imputed righteousness of Christ, as being vicarious. They openly oppose the Legate of Christ, Rom. 4:22, 23, 24, coll. with v. 25, & 2 Cor. 5, 18, 19, add. v. 21.

III. CHRIST. HOBURGIUS in his apology for Pratorius, p. 202, says: "Today's preachers do not want the merit and the death of Christ to be alive and powerful in their listeners, but only hold it for a work of imputation, and lay it over all persistent wickedness like a plaster, and therewith whitewash the carnal, wanton nature of their listeners as with loose lime." On page 204 HOBURGIUS says: "It is by no means a shadow or lip-service, with which one only whitewashes from the outside, while the damage inside becomes worse and greater." Response: 1) HOBURG has inflicted a most atrocious injury on the Protestants, alleging that they teach that the righteousness of Christ is imputed to the ungodly man who remains in ungodliness, which they have never asserted, but teach with great consensus that the subject of the gracious imputation of Christ's righteousness is the penitent man who believes in Christ. 2) HOBURGIUS labored under such gross ignorance that he did not even understand the force of the word, to impute, opining that it means the same as to incrust. But he ought to have known that "to impute" denotes a moral act, while "to incrust" denotes a physical act. The confusion of a moral and a physical act cannot but produce a gross error. 3) Through conversion and regeneration the sinner is intrinsically changed, so that he becomes justifiable, or so that, saving divine justice, he can be absolved from the guilt of his sins; but through justification he is changed extrinsically, yet most truly, insofar as he is transferred from a miserable state to a more blessed one.

IV. The Quakers object: The righteousness which we lost through the lapse of Adam, that Christ restored; But inherent righteousness, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because whatever we lost through Adam has been restored through Christ, Rom. 5:15. Response: 1) The conclusion can be granted in an inclusive sense; because the righteousness inherent in the regenerate is to be accepted by the merit of Christ. But if it is understood in an exclusive sense; namely that through Christ uniquely and only inherent righteousness was restored, we deny the major. For its proof we say that Christ not only restored that which was lost through Adam, but also acquired other goods, or benefits for us, e.g., penitential conversion, faith resting on the merit of Christ, imputed righteousness, confraternity with Christ, which were not lost. 2) Inherent righteousness is so imperfect and impure that before the divine judgment it either blushes, or melts away like wax.

Instance: But the righteousness of Christ is a) external and alien; b) it seems to be only imaginary; Therefore, we cannot be denominated just by it before God. Response: a) The imputed righteousness of Christ is indeed external and alien, with respect to the meriting cause; yet it is also ours, both by reason of the intention of Christ, by which he merited it not for himself, but for us, and by reason of the fiducial appropriation, by which we apprehend and put on Christ the satisfier, and thus appropriate his righteousness to ourselves, and make it ours. b) The imputed righteousness of Christ is real, on account of the real foundation, which is the satisfaction of Christ, and on account of the true and real intention of Christ of procuring it for us. And therefore also the estimation and judgment of God by which the imputation is made, is true and real.

Question XVI. Can the righteousness, inherent in the regenerate, stand before the tribunal of God?

Can inherent righteousness stand? Since the righteousness inherent in the regenerate is not perfect, nor pure in every part, it cannot sustain the rigorous examination of the divine judgment.

Proof. 1) From 1 Cor. 4:4. "For I am not aware of anything against myself, but I am not thereby acquitted." The apostle proves by his own example that no one is justified by innocence of life before the censorial judgment of God. 2) From Ps. 143:2. "Enter not into judgment with your servant, for no one living is righteous before you." David, most adorned with virtues, did not want to rely on these before the divine judgment; since God is far more perspicacious than man in judging.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Anabaptists, and Socinians, who teach that man is justified in the sight of the celestial judge by his own virtues. Their more important arguments are:

I. "Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness," Ps. 7:8. Response: We distinguish between the righteousness of the cause, and of the person. King David means the righteousness of the cause, or of the deed, that in the case against Saul, by whom he was accused of seeking the kingdom, he was innocent; for the rest, the person of David was not immune from sins, as he confesses and prays against them in various places in the psalms.

II. "Remember now, O Lord, I pray, how I have walked before you in faithfulness and with a whole heart, and have done what is good in your sight," Is. 38:3. King Hezekiah seems to appear before the divine tribunal relying on the innocence of his life. Response: The cited passage does not deal with the justification of a sinner before God, but with a corporal benefit, namely liberation from sickness and the danger of death. In dispensing corporal benefits, God certainly regards holiness of life, Ps. 41:2.

III. 1 John 3:7. "Little children, let no one deceive you. Whoever practices righteousness is righteous, as he is righteous." Whoever are righteous by doing righteousness, they are justified by inherent righteousness before God; But the regenerate, etc. Therefore. Response: Negative to the major. Because doing righteousness is not the cause of justification before God, but its effect, sign, and testimony. St. John is not dealing with the formal cause of justification, but only explains who is righteous, not by what a man is constituted just before the tribunal of God, which is done solely through the obedience of Christ, Rom. 5:19. The Apostle is therefore occupied in the article of sanctification. And so we do not deny that he who does righteousness is called intrinsically just; especially, because it is added: "as he is just." For those who have been justified before God by faith in Christ, they both do righteousness, and on account of the pursuit of righteousness are rightly called just. But the perfection of those just ones is not such as is required before the divine tribunal.

Instance: They are said to be just, as he is: Christ is perfectly just; Therefore, they are perfectly just. Response: The particle, as, does not designate equality, but similarity, and that not absolute, or in every way, but respective and fitting. We need remission of sins, Christ does not. We are justified as sinners, justification is not fitting for Christ.

Question XVII. Are sins in justification completely eradicated?

Are sins completely eradicated? In justification the guilt of fault and punishment resulting from sin a), not the stock, or root of sin b), is taken away.

Proof a. From Rom. 4:7. "Blessed are those whose lawless deeds are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man against whom God will not count sin." God remits sins, when out of grace, in view of the satisfaction of Christ apprehended by true faith, he absolves the repentant sinner from the guilt of fault and punishment. He absolves from the guilt of fault, when by a gracious estimation on account of Christ the mediator, whom the sinner embraces by faith, he imputes his righteousness to this one. He absolves from the guilt of punishment, when his anger being laid aside on account of the imputed passion and death of Christ, he does not think of inflicting punishment. God covers sins with the cloak of mercy, and the garment of the imputed righteousness of Christ, lest he see them with a practical and judicial vision. He does not impute sins, by abolishing the obligation to punishment.(*)

(*) And so the perfection of justification pertains entirely to the guilt of sin, as it is said, both of fault, and of punishment. It is therefore perfect, and indeed for a twofold reason. 1) As to the Object, or the sins not to be imputed, they are all remitted, without any exception of even one, even if it were the greatest of all, provided that the guilty one has truly repented, and truly trusts in his sponsor, Ps. 103:3; Ezech. 18:22; Mich. 7:19; Matth. 18:32; 1 John 1:7; 1 Tim. 1:13, 14, 15, 16; Rom. 5:20. 2) As to the act of remission, God remits sins, without any reservation of vengeance to be exercised in the future, so that it is a perpetual

Proof b. 1 John 1:8. "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." The justified have original sin with the concupiscences and inordinate motions springing from it; but they do not commit sin with a deliberate counsel against conscience. Whence they pray daily: "Forgive us our debts," Matth. 6:12.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who maintain that sins are eradicated in justification. They urge that God blots out sins, Is. 44:22; washes them away, Ps. 51:4; cleanses the sinner from all filthiness, Ezech. 34:25. Response: God in justification blots out sins, by abolishing the guilt of fault and punishment contracted from them; by the benefit of renewal he blots out the same, by taking away the dominion of original sin, and by diminishing, not eradicating, the remnants of the old man.

Question XVIII. How is the sinner changed by the benefit of justification?

Terminus a quo & ad quem iustificationis. The sinner is changed by the benefit of justification extrinsically, with respect to his state, inasmuch as he is transferred by God the most just judge, but reconciled through Christ, from the state of sin and wrath to the state of grace and righteousness.

Observation I. Through conversion and regeneration the sinner is intrinsically changed, so that he becomes justifiable, or so that, saving divine justice, he can be absolved from the guilt of his sins; but through justification he is changed extrinsically, yet most truly, inasmuch as he is judicially transferred from a miserable state to a more blessed one.

Observation II. The terminus a quo of this extrinsic change is the state of sin and wrath, or the guilt of fault and punishment; because through the guilt of fault and punishment the sinner remains in the state of sin and wrath. The terminus ad quem is the state of grace and righteousness; because God, having remitted his sins, receives the sinner who believes in Christ into grace, and imputes the righteousness of Christ to him.

Proof. Justification is a judicial and gracious act, by which God, reconciled by the satisfaction of Christ, absolves the sinner who believes in Christ from the crimes objected against him, and esteems and declares him just. Since this action is outside of men in God, it cannot change man intrinsically. Therefore, just as a debtor, for whom another has paid the debt, so that he is considered free from the debt, is changed not intrinsically, but extrinsically, with respect to his state; so the sinner, who on account of the satisfaction of Christ, applied by true faith, is reputed and pronounced free from sins, is changed not intrinsically, but extrinsically, with respect to a better state.

Question XIX. How is justification distinguished?

Division of justification. Justification is distinguished into first, and continued. The former is the act of grace by which God first absolves the sinner, guilty of eternal death, but converted and reborn, from his sins and their punishments, in view of the merit of Christ apprehended by true faith, and by a gracious estimation reputes and declares him just. The latter is the act of grace by which God preserves the penitent man, who constantly seeks the remission of sins by true faith in Christ, in the state of righteousness.

Proof. From Rev. 22:11. "Let the one who is righteous be righteous still." Which words of John are to be understood of the preservation of justification, lest we fall from the same, which happens through heresy, and sins against conscience, and therefore ἀποστασιν from the faith; in the way that the particle ἔτι signifies "still," so that the sense is; let him be righteous further through perseverance in faith and not admitting the contrary, let him remain and persevere in the state of justification; Cf. CALOV. bibl. illustr. in this place, p. 1923. (*) ἀμνησία. Five sacred expressions indicate this perfection very significantly: α) to cover sins, Ps. 32:1; β) to blot out, Ps. 51:3, 11; γ) not to remember, Ezech. 18:22; δ) to cast into the depths of the sea, Mich. 7:19; ε) to hide and turn away the face from sins, Ps. 51:11.

(*) This distinction, rightly explained, is separated by a very long interval indeed from that false one which the Roman Catholics have devised, when they distinguished the first justification from the second. First, they err vehemently in this, that they understand justification not as forensic, but as physical, or rather moral, namely the renewal of the soul, or, as they barbarously say, an infused habit of righteousness. Therefore, they say the first justification is the beginning of piety, when the impious becomes pious, the second

Question XX. What is the end of justification?

End of justification. The end of justification on the part of men who are justified is their eternal salvation a); on the part of God who justifies is the glory of his mercy and justice b).

Proof a. From Rom. 4:6, 9, where justification itself is called μακαρισμός, or beatification; namely that it happens to men for the sake of eternal salvation, the inheritance of which it also confers. For having been justified by the grace of God we are heirs according to the hope of eternal life, Tit. 3:7.

Proof b. God has blessed us with every spiritual blessing (and therefore also with the benefit of justification), in Christ, Eph. 1:3, that the glory of his grace might be praised. Paul commends the justice of God, Rom. 3:24, 25. "and are justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as a propitiation by his blood, to be received by faith. This was to show God's righteousness." God demonstrates his justice when he does not pardon sins without satisfaction, but punishes them most severely in his son, made a surety for sinners.

Question XXI. What are the effects of justification?

Effects. The effects of justification are adoption as sons of God a), our mystical union with God b), peace of conscience c), the certain hearing of prayers d), renewal and sanctification e).

Proof a. From Gal. 4:4. "But when the fullness of time had come, God sent forth his Son, born of woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons." Observe a) that what is understood by the Apostle is εξαγορασμός, or a satisfactory and meritorious redemption. Christ redeemed us from the law, not with respect to the obligation of rendering obedience, but with respect to the curse, which he transferred onto himself, Gal. 3:13. b) Since Christ is the lord of the law, he voluntarily subjected himself to the law, so that his active obedience might be imputed to us for righteousness, Rom. 10:1. Which imputed righteousness of Christ is followed in the order of nature by adoption as sons of God with the usufruct of all the goods which depend on spiritual sonship. By the benefit of regeneration, there is indeed granted to us εξουσία, the right and power, that we may become sons of God, but by means of justification we are actually sons of God:

they think is the increase of piety, when the pious becomes more pious day by day. Then, those who wish to seem more moderate than the rest, do indeed admit the forensic signification of the word, nor do they dare to deny outright the remission of sins, on account of the imputed righteousness of Christ. But yet they mix this with the renewal of the soul, and with righteousness infused into man, as they say, and in such a way that in the first justification indeed, they concede that sins are freely pardoned for Christ's sake to a man hitherto utterly impious, and void of all good works, but now sorrowful; but the second they opine happens to him through good works, after the pious man has devoted himself to good works. But this error is also plainly contrary 1) to these principles; that the righteousness and probity of morals, which the renewed man most earnestly pursues, although true, is yet never perfect; that the law demands perfect obedience, without any defect, which is the righteousness of the law; that the law, as long as it condemns, so long does not justify, but it condemns every single one who has deviated from the norm in even one word, Gal. 3:10, add James 3:2; that Christ is our perpetual sponsor, even in the state of justification, Heb. 10:14; Phil. 3:8-12, where PAUL speaks not only of his past condition, but also of that which was his now, having long since been reborn and renewed. Not less contrary is the opinion of those, which we repudiate, 2) to the clearest sayings, among which these two stand out, Psalm 143:2, David, who and what was he? Certainly pious; Yet he himself frankly confesses that neither he, nor any other, even if like himself, is just in the divine forum. 1 Corinthians 4:4, in which place PAUL expressly professes concerning himself, that he, most zealous for true piety, and not conscious of any voluntary sin, does not think so arrogantly of himself as to persuade himself that he is justified before God by his own piety. What? That those works are not even truly good, which the adversaries think have the most power to make a man just before God. Arbitrary worship is most of all that to which they think such great dignity should be deferred.

Before justification no one is called a son of God, but in justification itself a man rises to so great a fortune, says DANNHAVER in hodos. phanom. IX, §. 924.

Proof b. From Gal. 2:19, 20. "I have been crucified with Christ. It is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me." Observe: a) The faithful are crucified with Christ, insofar as by faith they appropriate the crucifixion of Christ to themselves, lest the punishment, which the crucified one devolved upon himself, be imputed to them. b) From this flows a spiritual union, through which Christ, the author of life, lives in the justified.

Prob. c. Therefore, having been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:1). By peace is understood both reconciliation with God, because πρὸς τὸν θεὸν is added, and the rest and tranquility of conscience, which consists in the sense and certainty of that reconciliation; which peace the justified have through the Lord Jesus Christ, who by his merit reconciled peace for them, and through faith in Christ, by which they possess and enjoy (*) the peace reconciled through Christ.

Prob. d. From Rom. 8:32: He who did not spare his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? He who, unasked, gave the greatest good, his own son, as a victim for our sins, will surely, when asked, give the lesser benefits that depend on the merit of Christ. Wherefore, let us ask in faith, nothing doubting, Jas. 1:6.

Prob. e. From Rom. 6:22: But now having been set free from sin, and having become slaves of God, you have your fruit to holiness.

For those freed from the guilt of sin, the fruit is sanctification.

Question XXII. Can a converted and reborn man be certain of his justification before God?

Certainty of justification. A converted and reborn man is absolutely certain of his present justification a), but he is certain of future and persevering justification with a hypothetical certainty, if he constantly employs the means of salvation and avoids deliberate sins b).

Prob. a. 1) On God's part, the divine promises concerning the remission of sins are universal, Acts 10:43; John 3:16; Mark 16:16, confirmed by a divine oath, Ezek. 33:18, sealed by the sacraments, as by seals, Rom. 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:21. Which universal promises the penitent sinner, believing in Christ, applies to himself with undoubting faith. 2) Every truly reborn person, or one who believes in Christ, feels and experiences in himself the testimony of the Holy Spirit, that he is a son of God, Rom. 8:15. He is certain that he cannot be separated from the love of God by any creature, Rom. 8:38. He knows in whom he has believed, 2 Tim. 1:12. He knows that he has passed from death to life, 1 John 3:14. He has peace with God, stands in grace, and glories in the hope of the glory of God, Rom. 5:1-2. Therefore, he is certain that he has been established in the present state of justification.

Prob. b. From Rom. 8:13: If you live according to the flesh, you will die; but if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live. They fall from salvation in whom the works of the flesh reign, since these cannot coexist with true faith. Whence

(*) The peace of man and concord with God is the end of hatred, by which both God abhors the impious man (Ps. V, 5. 7. Eph II, 3) and that impious one shrinks from God, θεοστυγής (theostyges / God-hating), (Rom. I, 30. VIII, 7.) now the mutual benevolence of the reconciled, by which both God wishes to confer all benefits upon man, and man is accustomed to render all duties to God with great pleasure and highest zeal. From certain persuasion of soul, placed beyond all doubt concerning forgiveness of sins now obtained, arises peace of conscience, which is the end of conflicting thoughts, partly excusing, partly condemning, Rom. II, 15. 1 John III, 21. and is called πεποίθησις (pepoithesis / confidence), Eph. III, 12. From both these forms of peace is brought about 1) access to God by no means difficult, Rom. V, 2. Hebr. IV, 16. This προσαγωγή (prosagoge / access) brings with it παρρησία (parrhesia / boldness), which two things, although joined, are distinguished in some way, Eph. III, 12. Hebr. IV, 16. Namely προσαγωγή (prosagoge / access) is freedom and confidence in access to God, παρρησία (parrhesia / boldness) is freedom in speech and prayer, for the sake of which we approach God. 1 John III, 21. 22. V, 14. 2) Tranquility of soul, which restrains vehement motions of the soul, and conquers every sorrow, terror and fear, John XIV, 27. XVI, 33. 3) Consolation and joy, amid the most serious dangers. Rom. VIII, 33.35. to the end.

the certainty of future salvation is hypothetical.

Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who maintain that no one is infallibly certain of his justification before God. They contend against us with the following arguments:

I. Ecclesiastes 9:1-2: Man does not know either love or hatred. Resp. The author of Ecclesiastes speaks of an ignorance of love and hatred that is not absolute, but limited or respective, insofar as love and hatred are estimated from external events, common to the pious and the impious. For in verse 2 he says: the same event (happens) to the just and the wicked, to the good and clean, and to the unclean. From this, however, it is not permissible to conclude:

Therefore, a converted and reborn man is certain of justifying grace from no other causes or signs.

II. Prov. 20:9: Who can say, 'My heart is clean'? Resp. No one can boast of inherent cleanness, because it is imperfect, 1 John 1:8; 1 Kings 8:46. Yet one can be certain of imputed cleanness, because he has been cleansed by the blood of Christ.

III. Many penitents were uncertain of their justification. Job says, chapter 9:20: If I justify myself, my own mouth will condemn me. Paul says in 1 Cor. 4:4: I am conscious of nothing to myself, yet I am not justified by this. David, in Ps. 19:13, asks: Who can understand his errors? Resp. These sayings prove the imperfection of inherent righteousness, by which a sinner cannot stand or subsist before the rigid judgment of God; otherwise, these holy men were certain of the gratuitous remission of sins. Job, in temptation, was unwilling to bring the righteousness of works to divine examination, relying solely on the divine mercy founded in his Redeemer, ch. 19:25. Paul was conscious to himself of fidelity rendered in his apostolic office, yet he did not pronounce himself immune from all defect, if he were to be placed before the tribunal of the omniscient judge, but he found his righteousness in Christ, Phil. 3:9. David complains of sins not occurring to his memory, for which he seeks pardon; by seeking, he is made certain of the remission of sins, Ps. 32:4.

IV. Sacred scripture teaches us to doubt the remission of sins, Joel 2:4: Who knows if He will turn and relent? Dan. 4:24: Perhaps God will forgive your offenses. Resp. The prophets Joel and Jonah speak not of the remission of sins, but of the removal of temporal chastisement, which in the justified is not τιμωρία (punishment), but παιδεία (discipline). God pardoned David's adultery, yet He chastised him with the death of the son born from it, 2 Kings 12:18. The words of Daniel are badly expressed in the Vulgate version; in the original text, they are as follows: if there might be a lengthening of your tranquility. The Chaldaic word never signifies "perhaps."

Instance: But the Apostle Peter taught Simon Magus to doubt the remission of sins, Acts 8:22: Repent of this your wickedness, and pray God if perhaps the thought of your heart may be forgiven you. Resp. In the Greek text there is the particle ἄρα, which is not always of one who doubts, but often of one who asserts. Whence it is rendered by D. SEB. SCHMID as assuredly. Besides, the question is about that certainty by which a penitent sinner is certain of his own, not another's, justification. Simon was a malicious man, whom St. Peter was exhorting to serious repentance.

V. Whoever are always fearful and work out their salvation with fear and trembling, they are not certain of their salvation; But the faithful men etc. Therefore... The major is established: because fear and trembling cannot coexist with certainty. The minor is clear from Prov. 28:14: Blessed is the man who is always fearful, and Phil. 2:14: Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. Resp. A distinction is made between servile and filial fear. The former, not the latter, is repugnant to certainty. Filial fear is opposed to carnal security, not to the πληροφορία (full assurance) of faith. It is a fear of vigilance, prudence, and caution, lest the celestial Deity be offended by sins, and the hope of future salvation, of which we are not absolutely, but hypothetically certain, be lost.

VI. Whatever we hold by divine faith, that is revealed: That I, or he, believe with a firm faith, is not revealed: Therefore... Resp. Limiting the major: Whatever we hold by divine faith, that is either revealed αὐτολεξεῖ (in the very words), or deduced by valid consequence from revelation. Thus the minor is denied. For this is revealed: To everyone who believes in Christ, sins are remitted, Acts 10:43. I subjoin: I believe in Christ: Therefore... I prove the minor from all the κριτήριους (criteria) of true faith, about which below.

VII. That certainty of justification begets pride, or torpor in the exercise of good works.

Resp. If we were to rely on inherent justice, we would certainly be proud; but we rely on the justice of Christ, which we receive with the begging hand of faith, and so we are obliged to the most humble thanksgiving. Besides, true faith, which justifies, is not torpid in working, but living and efficacious; since it works through love, Gal. 5:6.

SUSPIRIUM.

I place myself at your tribunal, O ETERNAL GOD, most high judge! Since you are an omniscient judge, nothing is closed to you, nothing hidden, nothing veiled. Since you are also a most just judge, before your sight nothing stands but what is holy, pure, and refined. Wherefore, our imperfect inherent justice blushes before the rigor of your law and melts like wax. Remembering this from time to time, I do not hide my sins in silence, or dissemble, but openly confess that I am guilty of many crimes, guilty of eternal death. But as a suppliant, I flee to the altar of mercy, and I embrace the throne of your grace! Look, O most MERCIFUL FATHER, upon the most precious blood which your only-begotten SON shed for me; behold his death, which he suffered for me to satisfy your offended justice! This death of my mediator, as a most valid ransom, I apprehend with the hand of faith, I claim it for myself, and I present it to you, most excellent and GREAT FATHER, most humbly beseeching that you would most clemently grant its fruit to me! Erase, I beseech you, my debts from your account book, and obliterate them with the red of the redeemer's blood: derive upon me the justice of CHRIST, which he procured for me by most exactly fulfilling your law, so that, freed from debts, free, clothed in the justice of CHRIST, just, received into grace, I may be considered your friend, your son, and an heir of heaven by your most gracious estimation!

CHAPTER IX.
ON INDWELLING GRACE, AND
MYSTICAL UNION OF THE
JUSTIFIED WITH GOD.

Question I. What is the Mystical Union of the reborn with God?

THE MYSTICAL UNION is the spiritual conjunction of the triune God with a justified man, whereby He dwells in him as in a consecrated temple with a special, and that substantial, presence, and operates in the same with a gracious influx. It is more fully described: The mystical union is an act of applying grace, by which the triune God, out of special love, in view of the merit of Christ apprehended by true faith, dwells in a reborn and justified man, as in a consecrated temple, with a substantial presence, fills him with all fullness of gifts, and operates in him by a special concursus, so that, certain of present grace and future glory, he may persevere in communion with Christ and the church, be sanctified, and be eternally saved.

Obs. I. The moment of mystical union is altogether the same as the moment of regeneration, justification, and renewal; for all these ἀποτελέσματα (effects) happen at once and in an instant; for as soon as a man is regenerated and justified, by that very fact he is also joined to God and united with him. And yet one is prior to the other, as to our mode of conceiving on account of different connotations. Thus regeneration and justification are prior to that union, since it comes from faith and after the faith received in regeneration; and sins, unless they are remitted, impede a gracious union, Isa. 59:2. But mystical union is prior to renewal; for from the effects of the latter, namely good works, as from what is posterior, I can know the existence of the former, 1 John 3:6, 23-24; c. 4:12-13, 16. See KOENIG, theol positiva, p. 212.

Obs. II. Although mystical union, by which God dwells in the soul as in a temple, follows justification in the order of nature according to our mode of conceiving, it must nevertheless be confessed that the formal union of faith, by which Christ is apprehended, put on, and united with us, as mediator and author of the grace to be obtained and the remission of sins, is prior to justification in the sign of reason. For faith is imputed for righteousness, insofar as it receives the merit of Christ and unites it with us, that it may become ours. Confer. D. QUENSTED. part III. system fol. 524. D. BROCHMAND teaches this clearly, T. II. system p. 485. For if regeneration is taken for that spiritual birth from God, which chiefly consists in our union with Christ, it differs from justification as a cause from its effect. For we are justified because we are of God, or because we are in Christ, according to that of Paul, Rom. 8:1: There is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. The righteousness of Christ, as the spiritual head, is imputed to believers, who are most closely united with him and who are found in him as members, Phil. 3:9. Conf. D. LYSERUS in syst p. 1548.

Question II. How many kinds of union of God with men are there?

Homonymy. The union of God with men is twofold: a) general, by which all men, faithful and unfaithful, live, move, and have their being in God; b) special, and that either gracious, by which God dwells with a substantial presence in the reborn still living in the church militant, and operates in them with a special concursus, c), or glorious, by which God fills and satiates the elect in the church triumphant with the fullness of his grace.

Prob. a. From Acts 17:28: In him we live and move and have our being. As fish in water and birds in the air, so all men live, move, and are in God, because he himself gives to all life and breath and all things, v. 25.

Prob. b. From John 14:23: If anyone loves me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him. In the phraseology of scripture, God does not dwell in the unfaithful or the impious, but in the reborn and justified, who love Christ and keep his word. For God, reconciled to man, joins himself as a friend to a friend, and converses with him intimately and familiarly. Whence Abraham is called by God himself אברהם, my friend, Isa. 41:8.

Prob. c. In the church triumphant, God will be all in all. For in eternal life, God will not deal with the blessed mediately, he will not illuminate them through the word and sacraments, not teach them through ministers, not rule them through princes, not defend them through angels, but will do all in all immediately. There God will be to the intellect a most splendid light, to the will the highest good, to the appetite the sweetest joy; he himself will be the teacher, king, protector of the blessed, in knowing and celebrating whom they will be entirely occupied. Apoc. 21:3-4; 22:5.

Question III. Why is this union called mystical and spiritual?

This union is called mystical because it is a stupendous mystery that the immense and infinite God dwells in the human heart a). It is called spiritual because it is perfected through the Holy Spirit graciously inhabiting the reborn, not in a carnal or corporeal, but in a spiritual and supernatural manner b).

Prob. a. From Eph. 5:32: This mystery is great; but I speak concerning Christ and the church. It is called a great mystery because the specific mode of this union is inscrutable.

Prob. b. From 1 Cor. 6:17: Οἱ δὲ κολλώμενοι, But he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit. The Apostle had said, v. 16, that everyone who joins himself to a harlot becomes one flesh with her; now, however, v. 17, he asserts that he who joins himself to Christ is one spirit with him, i.e., he is joined to the Lord through one and the same Holy Spirit, is moved and ruled by one and the same Spirit.

Question IV. In how many ways is the name 'mystical union' taken?

Synonymy. The term mystical union sometimes denotes the transient act of applying grace, by which God is mystically joined with the faithful; sometimes it designates the state, or the permanent bond of God, graciously united with the faithful. We observe the former signification here especially.

Prob. In the present, we are occupied in explaining the acts of the applying divine grace; And therefore union here has the same meaning as uniting, or the act of union, which is transient and momentary, and happens in the same moment as regeneration and justification, although both are posterior in our mode of understanding; but the state of union, which is properly and specifically called union, remains whole, as long as the justified man avoids deliberate sins.

Question V. By what synonymous words is mystical union described in the sacred writings?

There are elegant periphrases in sacred scripture by which mystical union is described. For it is called the betrothal of believers with Christ a), the mystical marriage of Christ and the church b), the conjunction of the members with the head c), the grafting of spiritual branches into the spiritual vine, Christ d), the dwelling of the whole Holy Trinity with the reborn man e).

Prob. a. From Hos. 2:19: I will betroth you to me forever. This is a spiritual and evangelical promise, by which God promises that he will be joined with us by the bond of betrothal. God the Father arranges the betrothal, Matt. 22:2. The Son of God is the bridegroom, John 3:29. The pledge and earnest of love is the Holy Spirit, 2 Cor. 1:22. This spiritual betrothal can therefore be attributed to all three persons of the divinity; however, it is appropriated, or claimed in a special way, for the Son of God; because as bridegroom and bride are united in body and soul, so that they are one flesh and one soul; so the Son of God willed to be joined to us both by reason of the flesh, when he assumed our flesh into the unity of his person and joined it to himself, and betrothed himself to us through the incarnation; and by reason of the Spirit; because he communicates his Spirit to us, and unites and joins ours to his, that we may be one Spirit with the Lord, 1 Cor. 6:17. This betrothal was made forever; for this reason, that it is indissoluble on the part of the bridegroom, Christ; on the part of the bride, or our soul, it ought to be perpetual.

Prob. b. From Eph. 5:32: A man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh. This mystery is great; but I speak concerning Christ and the church. Corporeal marriage adumbrates the mystical union of Christ with the church. For as the conjugal bond is most close, and greater than that which exists between parents and children, to be dissolved only by the force of death; so Christ has associated the church to himself with so firm a covenant that for its sake he came forth from the Father and came into the world, putting on our flesh. And as marriage implies a communion of name, honor, and goods; so the church is called Christian from Christ, a queen from this king, and becomes a partaker both of the grace of Christ in this age, and of glory in the age to come.

Prob. c. From Eph. 5:23: Christ is the head of the church, and he is the savior of the body. The members of the body are connected with the head by the intervention of certain ligaments; so the members of the church are joined with Christ by the ligaments of the word, sacraments, and faith. Just as sense, life, and motion flow from the head into the members; so spiritual life, the salvation of the soul, the sense of faith, and all good motions descend from Christ into Christians.

Prob. d. From John 15:5: I am the vine; you are the branches. He who abides in me, and I in him, he it is that bears much fruit. The branches are in the vine in such a way that they do not confer upon the vine, but receive from it that by which they live; and the vine is in the branches in such a way that it supplies vital nourishment to them, not receives it from them, as AUGUSTINE says, tract. LXXXI on John. In like manner, Christians are in Christ, not to impart any good to him, but to receive from his fullness grace for grace, John 1:16. And Christ is in Christians in such a way that he gives them of his Spirit, 1 John 4:13, i.e., that he fills them with the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

Prob. e. If anyone loves me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him, John 14:23. Which words FULGENTIUS explains concisely, l. II. ad tr. reg. c. 3: The Father, Son, and Holy Spirit know how to come and go in such a way that they neither come to a place locally, nor depart from a place locally. The Trinity fills all things, contains all things; it is said to come to him to whom it deigns to manifest itself, and it departs from him from whom it hides the light of its love; yet it is not made locally absent when it justly leaves the unworthy; nor is it made present in a place when it mercifully visits him whom it has made worthy. Furthermore, the Holy Trinity abides with us by a special presence, illuminating us more and more, justifying us from sins from time to time, sanctifying, protecting, and helping us in every necessity.

Question VI. Who perfects the mystical union?

The efficient cause of mystical union. The efficient cause of mystical union is the triune God, the Father a), the Son of God b), and the Holy Spirit c).

Prob. a. From Eph. 1:17, 22: The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory... gave him to be head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills all in all. God the Father is the fount and root of the mystical union; since for this end he constituted Christ as the head of the church, that he might not only govern it in the manner of a prince, but, like a head connected with its members, he might be joined with it, be most present to it, and diffuse spiritual life with the powers of operation into the whole mystical body and its true members.

Prob. b. That the mystical union takes its origin from the Son of God is clear from the fact that the Son of God betroths the church to himself, Hos. 2:19, is joined with it as a husband with his wife, Eph. 5:31, is connected with it as a head with its spiritual body, Eph. 1:23. Christians are in him as a branch in the vine, John 15:5. And together with the Father, he makes his dwelling with them, John 14:23.

Prob. c. From 1 Cor. 3:16; Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you? The temple of Solomon was filled with the glory of the LORD, 1 Kings 8:11. The faithful are living temples of God, inaugurated by the regenerating and justifying grace of the Holy Spirit, filled by the indwelling grace of the Holy Spirit.

Question VII. What impelled God to unite himself most closely with the reborn?

Impulsive Cause of Mystical Union. God was moved to be joined with the reborn by the bond of mystical union, internally by the special love with which he embraces them a), and externally by the merit of Christ, apprehended by them with true faith b).

Prob. a. Jer. 31:3; I have loved you with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness I have drawn you. The most benign Deity allures and draws the hearts of the faithful to himself with cords of love, Hos. 11:4, with which he binds himself to them. It is an argument of the highest love that God is joined to the reborn man as a friend to a friend, and dwells in him just as the soul dwells in the body.

Prob. b. Eph. 2:20-21; You are built on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, with Christ Jesus himself being the chief (ἀκρογωνιαίος) cornerstone, in whom the whole building, being fitted together, grows into a holy temple in the Lord. Obs. a) that the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets is the dogmatic foundation of faith, exhibiting the substantial foundation of faith, Christ; who is called the cornerstone, for this reason, that the spiritual temple, which is the church, and in it every reborn soul, rests upon his merit. This cornerstone connects the converted, not more Jews than Gentiles, so that they become one holy mystical body in the Lord, i.e., a dwelling consecrated to the inhabiting Lord. Obs. b) When in Holy Scripture Christ is called the cornerstone, respect is had to the passion and death of Christ, Ps. 118:21; Matt. 21:42; 1 Pet. 2:7. For which reason, therefore, the merit of Christ is the foundation of regeneration; in the same way it is the basis of mystical union. CYRIL says aptly, book XI, c. 27 on John; Christ is the nexus of our union to God; united to us indeed, as man, but to God the Father, as God, naturally. For it was not possible for the corrupt nature of man to ascend to immortality, unless the immortal nature, by communion and participation of itself, raised us, reformed, from the limits of our mortality to its own good. Therefore, we have been perfected and brought back to the union of the Father by the mediation of the Savior.

Question VIII. By what means is the mystical union of God with a reborn man perfected?

Means. The means on God's part, effecting and confirming the mystical union, are the word of the gospel a), baptism b), and the Lord's supper c). The means on man's part, receiving and embracing God, is faith d).

Prob. a. From John 14:24; He who loves me will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him. To the one who keeps Christ's word, i.e., embraces the word of the gospel, is promised both the advent and the constant inhabitation of the whole Holy Trinity.

Prob. b. From Gal. 3:24; As many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. Baptism is the means of putting on Christ. The garment that is put on is united externally with the body; Christ, having been put on, is united internally with the soul and body.

Prob. c. From 1 Cor. 10:16-17; The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body; for we all partake of the one bread. Since Christians, partaking of the one eucharistic bread, are made one spiritual body, they are certainly united with Christ himself by means of that bread, which is the communion of the body of Christ. For although even before the salutary use of the supper Christ is united to the faithful by faith, received from baptism and the preaching of the word, and therefore the communion of Christ is brought to the Lord's supper, nevertheless the same communion is increased, confirmed, and sealed by the Lord's supper, and the union itself with Christ is made closer by it. To which the words of the Savior in John, chapter 6:56, refer; He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. Although chapter VI of John does not describe the substance of the sacrament of the supper, yet the fruit that redounds from the spiritual eating of the sacrament of the supper is explained. Concerning which HILARY dissertates excellently, L. VIII on the Trinity: These things, taken and drunk, cause us to abide in Christ, and Christ in us. And CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA says aptly, Book VI on John, chap. 17: Just as if someone were to pour melted wax on other wax, he mixes the one entirely with the other; so it is necessary, if anyone receives the flesh and blood of the Lord, to be joined with him, that Christ may be found in him, and he in Christ.

Prob. d. From Eph. 3:17: That Christ may dwell in our hearts through faith. Which words CHEMNITZ explains clearly, de D.N. in Christo, cap. 30: Faith is the medium, organ, or instrument, by which we apprehend, receive, and retain Christ in the word, so that he may not pass by as a stranger, or lodge with us only as a guest for a night; but that by the grace of inhabitation he may abide, and dwell in us perpetually, so that we may always be and remain of the household of God. GREGORY OF NYSSA also says elegantly, Orat. VI in Cantic.: By faith we receive God, so that he may come within the chamber of our heart, and having received him, we may retain him by faith.

Question IX. By what ministers does God arrange the mystical union?

Ministerial Cause. God arranges the mystical union by the ministry of sacred heralds, who are certain, as it were, groomsmen, bringing the bride to Christ, so that she may be joined with him in a spiritual marriage.

Prob. From 2 Cor. 11:2: I have betrothed (ἡρμοσάμην) you to one husband, that I may present you as a pure virgin to Christ. Christ is the bridegroom of the church and of every reborn soul; the minister of the church is the groomsman, striving with all his might in his office that the bride may be brought to the bridegroom, be, as it were, handed into his hands, and be bound to him in a spiritual marriage.

Question X. What are the extremes that are joined in mystical union?

Extremes. On the one part is the substance of the entire holy Trinity a), and also the substance of the human nature of Christ b). On the other part is the substance of the reborn man, considered according to body and soul c).

Prob. a. From 2 Pet. 1:4: By which have been given to us exceedingly great and precious promises, that through these you may be partakers of the divine nature (κοινωνοὶ τῆς θείας φύσεως), having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. Where obs. a) that the communion of the divine nature presupposes or infers the union of the divine substance; because no communion is given without union. b) The communion of the divine nature infers some participation in the divine gifts according to the condition of the mystical union. For it cannot happen that the most holy Triad joins itself to the soul and body of the faithful, without filling them with all divine fullness of justice, peace, holiness, Eph. 3:18, according to the measure, Eph. 4:7. HULSEMANNUS says outstandingly in brev. c. XIV, S. 4: The communion of the divine nature denotes the gracious inhabitation of the divine essence in us, and the faculty received from it of striving for divine innocence and purity.
