TO THE TRIUNE GOD,

TO GOD THE FATHER,
THE BEST AND GREATEST CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH,

TO GOD THE SON,
THE UNIQUE AND UNIVERSAL REDEEMER OF THE HUMAN RACE FALLEN INTO SIN,

TO GOD THE HOLY SPIRIT,
THE SANCTIFIER OF OBEDIENT SOULS, AND MOST EFFICACIOUS PARACLETE,

THIS SLIGHT OFFSPRING OF HIS VERY POOR TALENT WITH THE MOST DEVOTED SPIRIT
THE AUTHOR
OFFERS, DEDICATES, AND CONSECRATES.

*prostrate at Your feet, O TRIUNE DEITY,
I, as a suppliant, venerate Your eternal Majesty, and I give You thanks as great as my mind can possibly conceive for Your gifts, benignly conferred upon me, the least of Your servants. My whole self I owe to You, O most holy GOD. I owe to You the strength with which You have firmed my fragile body; I owe the light of grace with which You have illuminated my mind; I owe the love of truth with which You have inflamed my heart. With You as Author and Patron, I began this little book; with You as Leader and Guardian, I have finished it.
Wherefore, I lay the same before Your most glorious Face with the utmost humility. May this little work be dedicated and consecrated to You, Sower of all things, ETERNAL FATHER, and to You, Savior of the world, ETERNAL SON, and also to You, Sanctifier of faithful souls,
ETERNAL SPIRIT. May it serve the immortal glory of Your Name!
May it be a handmaid to Your afflicted church! May it be of use to Your ministers! For the rest, I commit myself to Your nod and to Your hand which moderates all things. Be and remain my shield, my support, my protection against the darts of envy!*

TO THE BENEVOLENT CANDIDATE OF THEOLOGY

THE AUTHOR'S
P R E F A C E

ADDRESS YOU IN a few words, most excellent candidate, so that both the plan of my undertaking may be clearer to you, and the utility I have aimed at in this work may be more fruitfully received by you. I would have you know that I first drew up and delivered the initial outlines of this Theological Examination to the studious youth when, supported by divine benevolence, I served as Rector of the Lyceum of Kolberg. At that time, it pleased me to see the assembly of most select young men surrounding me, inflamed and burning with a thirst for celestial doctrine. Therefore, it was my care and heartfelt concern to lead them to the streams of divine wisdom and to imbue them with the most salutary precepts. Now indeed, most of those who hung upon my words, attentive and teachable, having been appointed to public offices and recalling with a mindful heart my labor and industry with which I went about instilling in them the true knowledge of GOD, candidly confess that they have gathered no small fruits from it. Indeed, the same men have also wearied me with constant entreaties, and at last, though I was resistant, they prevailed upon me to have this little book, whatever its worth, committed to print, thinking that from it a great deal of utility would redound both to the universal church of CHRIST and especially to candidates of theology. Since I thought I should rise to their requests, having implored the aid of the eternal Deity and applied a second round of revisions, I have allowed this sacred work—revised, polished, and enriched by the addition of very many questions—to come forth into the public light of the learned world. Moreover, I was accustomed to form the youth entrusted to my faith through frequently repeated questions, through certain assertions, and through valid proofs, and from time to time to test the progress of my auditors. For the judgment of all right-thinking men confirms that method of teaching which proceeds by means of questions, arranged in a clear order and cohering in a series as if linked together, because it penetrates the mind more deeply, holds it more strongly, and sticks more firmly. But I thought that useless and thorny questions, with which Scholastic Theology abounds and swells, should be cut away; because time, than which nothing in human life is either more precious or more fleeting, should not be wasted on fruitless problems, but should be spent on certain, clear, and salutary doctrines. For this reason, I have chiefly aimed that those things in Theology which at first sight appear ambiguous, obscure, convoluted, and obstructed by difficulties, should be so lucidly unfolded that they may be perceived as plain, open, and for keen minds, accessible and easily traversed. To attain this set goal as desired, there are required accurate definitions of divine matters, solid distinctions, and clear declarations of causes and properties, with the annexed weights of pressing reasons drawn from the most limpid font of Holy Scripture; for when these are set forth, the shadow of empty opinion vanishes, but the sun of truth shines forth more splendidly. Furthermore, we learn from more than one experience that the enemies of celestial truth often cast thick darkness upon the worshipers of true Theology, with subtle arguments they have devised, which bear a deceptive appearance of truth, with which they proceed to overlay their weak opinions. Therefore, necessity itself prods us to inquire with solicitous investigation of the mind into the opinion of our adversaries, to strip from the arguments objected against us the color and paint with which they are adorned, and to cut their sinews completely. But whether in this arduous business of separating truth from falsehood I have always, as they say, hit the nail on the head, let the judgment and power of deciding be with the benevolent reader. I know that I am a man, from whom nothing human is foreign. This, however, I affirm for certain; that I am most zealous for orthodoxy (of orthodoxy). This is most clearly evident from my individual assertions, which I have fortified with perspicuous and classic statements from the divine letters, frequently adding the consensus of our Church, which our Symbolic Books exhibit. Since these things are so, I wish this Theological Examination to be commended to you, most gracious candidate. Favor this labor, turn it to salutary use, and fare well amidst the blandishments of fortune.

PREFACE OF B. ALBERTUS
IOACHIMUS DE KRAKEWITZ, D.
THEOL. AND FIRST PROFESSOR IN THE ACADEMY OF GREIFSWALD, PREFIXED TO THE SECOND EDITION.

Greetings to the kind reader. Twenty-eight years have passed since, by the authority of my blessed Father, and by the persuasion and exhortation of my Preceptor, who deserved the best of me, Dn. IAC. TRAMNITZIUS, who today by the grace of God most laudably serves the church of Wustrow in his pastoral office, I went to Kolberg, where it was my greatest pleasure to enjoy the instruction of DAVID HOLLAZIUS, who at that time presided over the Lyceum of that place with the highest celebrity of his name, and from the adjacent regions on every side won over the minds of the youth to himself. Every Lord's day I would hear my Rector preaching publicly in the sacred building, and discoursing on matters pertaining to the end and life of Christians with such success that most copious fruits redounded to all who were present; on the other weekdays, it was granted me to sit at the feet of a man most filled with every kind of learning, and, as much as my age permitted, philological, philosophical, and what constitute the greatest importance, theological matters were instilled in me with wonderful facility and delight. How much, therefore, I owe to this my preceptor, I cannot sufficiently testify with words. Would that it had been granted to me to hang longer upon the words of a man no less eloquent than most learned, and that my still weaker age had been able to value more rightly the felicity of that time! In the meantime, what I retained, having been most faithfully inculcated within a year and a little more, will not allow me for my entire life to be unmindful of the benefits received. And this was also the reason which chiefly moved me, that I in no way hesitated, when asked by the heirs and the bookseller, to prefix a preface to this theological examination, which in no other way needs commendation. Indeed, on this occasion, it is permitted for me to testify publicly my pious affection towards a man who has deserved exceedingly well of the whole orthodox church and especially of me. But whether this preface itself will have the same fortune as those which are found in the first book of the letters of DIONYSIUS PETAVIUS, which consists merely of prefaces, I not only doubt, but confidently deny; since prefaces of such a sort altogether require men of profound erudition and florid style; but I abundantly recognize the defect of both in myself. Lest, however, I should seem to have deserted this field of prefacing entirely without a contribution (without contribution), the question concerning academic responses, recently revived, comes to my mind. To say a few things about this here will be judged the less foreign to my purpose, the more certain it is that the prefaces of theologians should in their own way also be numbered among academic responses; since in them the judicious and sincere reader rightly and deservedly expects a judgment as to what should be decided about the works to which the prefaces are prefixed, whether they merit reading and purchase or not. Similarly, he who desires a preface to be prefixed to a certain book, if he wishes to proceed correctly, should have no other end than that a just price be set for that book. The prefacer, therefore, is bound to respond not only according to the powers of his intellect, but also according to his conscience, and with all emotion set aside, to explain what he thinks of the work itself, for the sake of which he writes the preface. It is by no means hidden from me what some today think of the theological responses of academics. There are those who clamor on every occasion that theologians arrogate to themselves a more than papal authority. There are those who declare that academic responses are to be considered human suffrages. There are those who, by cunningly distinguishing between theological faculties consisting of merely unregenerate theologians and colleges of impious doctors, create a deception. There are those who invent I know not what arts to escape the weight and force of academic responses. I would be too prolix if I were to adduce here the very words of our adversaries, or if, by attending to individual points, I intended to examine the things which are here objected with unbridled audacity. Let it suffice, for this occasion, if I shall have set forth in a few words, candidly, what I think. If there have been theologians who affect a papal authority, no sensible assertor of evangelical liberty will ever approve their intolerable arrogance; but scarcely one or two, or almost no example can be brought forward with foundation, by which the enemies of academic responses can verify their assertion. But if it were permissible to return like for like, we could with better right pronounce as guilty of papal authority those who, retracting all who subscribe to their opinions, hold as impious, unregenerate, barbarous, carnal, worldly, and, to embrace much in few words, diabolical theologians. We have known and to this day constantly defended that the word of no man, but of God alone, is the norm and rule according to which all controversies concerning matters of faith as well as of morals are to be decided; according to this norm, according to this rule, all utterances and responses of theologians are to be judged. And this also is the reason why in academic responses the foundations of assertions are sought from the immovable prophetic and apostolic word, which has God himself as its author, and in this alone the whole method of deciding is resolved. But if the application of biblical sayings is incongruous, which renders the proof weak, indeed null, the responses of academics are not binding, but are the clearest indications of human fragility; whence also responses are sometimes sought from several faculties, so that, the reasons of each having been examined, assent may be given to the firmer ones. But if any prudent person should admit pronouncements with blind veneration, he will furnish an occasion for anyone to reprove not the theologians, but himself.

In the meantime, when theologians, convinced in their conscience of the divine truth and of the efficacy of their arguments, refuse to yield to adversaries who admit no demonstration; indeed, when sometimes, necessity itself so demanding, they pronounce harsher sentences against them, after the example of Christ and the apostles, they do not use an affected papal authority, but they discharge their duty, commanded to them by the Holy Spirit, which if they refused to satisfy, they would incur the eternal punishment of the most just judge, Christ. The blessed IO. BENED. CARPZOV. in his theological dissertation on the right of deciding theological controversies p. 67, outlined the office of doctors and academic professors altogether correctly when he wrote: "to academic professors and doctors is committed a part of the spiritual and internal power, namely, the handling of the word, not, however, that popular, so to speak, exoteric handling, but the acroamatic, which consists in a more accurate exegesis of scripture, in a more solid evolution and vindication of the dogmas to be derived therefrom, in the elucidation of the symbolic books, and in the faithful custody of the analogy of faith and the form of sound words, in the refutation and confutation of erroneous and heretical opinions of whatever kind, in the diligent scrutiny of patristic books, ancient councils, and the whole of church history, in the solution of doubtful cases, and in other cares of this kind of higher investigation, so that they not only prepare future pastors of the church by their instruction for rightly performing the pastoral office, but also assist those already in office, and indeed any others, and the magistrate himself in ecclesiastical matters, as consultants of divine law, with their responses and counsels." That these things are conformable to the sacred letters, he himself proves in the following pages from Eph. IV, 11, 12; 1 Cor. XII, 28, 29; Acts XVIII, 24, seq.; 1 Cor. III, 5, 6; Tit. III, 13. The blessed GEIERUS also commented solidly on Proverbs I, 5, when concerning the words "and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels" (and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels) he observes: "It denotes a provident and perspicacious man, who thoroughly penetrates the causes of things, and thence can provide for himself and for others. The word קנה (to acquire) denotes both, to acquire and to possess the thing acquired. The sense therefore in this place is, such a prudent reader will profit in this way, and by his studies (as by a price), he will not acquire gold, but a thing more excellent than gold, indeed to be redeemed by all riches, that is, prudence, which he will also possess safely as a most constant treasure against all injuries. תחבלות (wise counsels) are said by Kimchi, according to Munster, to be reasonings and close considerations of sublime thoughts; which word besides Solomon in Proverbs, no sacred writer has used, except Job ch. XXXVII, 12, where it expresses the supreme skill of God in the wonderful governance of the clouds. Moreover, it is found in Prov. XI, 14, that without these a people falls, ch. XX, 18, XXIV, 6, that with them war should be begun, that in the multitude of counselors there is safety, ch. XII, 5, that the counsels of the wicked are fraudulent. And so, elegantly (the metaphor being taken from a shipmaster) it alludes to such skill and readiness, by which one rightly rules and governs both himself and others in the home, the state, the church, the school, so that he knows how to direct the various sails and ropes of his office rightly and expeditiously, now this way, now that, so that like a skilled shipmaster he may struggle out of various rocks and reach the desired harbor." If these things are applied to theologians living in academies, anyone who is not corrupted by heretical or schismatic depravities, and is not bewitched by any prejudices, will easily grant that their responses are by no means to be rejected or condemned.

I wish it to be well observed, however, that I am speaking here of a theologian who is prepared (prepared), who is provident, who is perspicacious, who has learned the word of truth from his boyhood or even from his very infancy, and in it has his senses well exercised, so that he may be "an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures" (an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures), cf. Acts XVIII, 24. For such a man, who has the treasure of the celestial word in his heart, so that from it he may be able to bring forth things old and new alike, whenever he must bring forth his opinions, whether counsels or responses, concerning matters of greater or lesser moment, weighs and ponders everything accurately according to the form of sound words, and responds nothing other than what, in the fear of God, he has known to be firm and right from the infallible code of the divine oracles. Who, therefore, would not hold in esteem the responses of academic theologians? Certainly I do not see what prevents those things from being approved, which not so long ago the most celebrated theologian in Holstein, Dn. DASSOVIUS, in his just animadversion on the empty loquacity of the so-called Cordate Evangelical, rashly poured forth on p. 12, professed: "Academic responses," he says, "retain their value and their dignity, whatever may be emptily objected, and I rightly and deservedly call them golden, just as Nazianzen used to call Athens golden. For although academies do not decide anything dictatorially in matters of faith, yet we can rely on them most safely, because they confirm their responses with the divine word, and they show forth splendidly the truth of the doctrine publicly sounding in the principal chairs." Since this statement is to be understood solely of those responses which are fortified by the divine word, I do not rashly assume, because the most pious theologian himself alleges this reason as the principal one why the responses of academics are in such esteem with him. And with this presupposed, it does not appear how they should merit to be designated by the title of human suffrages. Perhaps the patron or author of this assertion would say that he speaks only of those responses which enjoy no force of reasons or weight of arguments at all; but whether he can affirm this with truth safe and intact concerning the responses to which he points his finger, he will with difficulty prove. He who wished not so much to carp at, but plainly to suffocate, the counsels and responses of most deserving theologians in a dictatorial manner would have pleaded his case more rightly if, by solidly refuting the arguments of the responses themselves, he had given faith to the reader, than if he had desired blind assent from him to his bare words. But such, alas, is the condition of men still constituted in this mortality, that they are accustomed for the most part to contemplate with a sinister eye only all that which they perceive to be alien to their own hypotheses, when at other times they wish altogether rightly that things be estimated more carefully and judged incorruptly, far from love and hate. I should altogether wish to know what those who think thus would answer, if someone, with a mere clamor of words, should pronounce concerning the responses and counsels published on their part; that they are authorities and suffrages supported by no force of reasons or weight of arguments.

In my judgment, it should be left to the reader to pronounce what is to be thought of the responses published on either side concerning the recently disputed matters; but judgment concerning the unpublished ones should be deferred until they have been exposed to the light, and the eyes of those who see may be able to discern the true from the false. Meanwhile, this opinion stands firm, indeed most firm, with me; that academic responses, which fortify all and each of their assertions with the immovable foundations of scripture, are not to be held as mere human suffrages, because on account of the divine word and the authority of the supreme Deity, they can demand with all justice that faith be had in them. But if this reasoning is invalid, if less apt, then certainly all the sermons of the sacred prelates, all the writings of theologians, with whatever divine word they may have been fortified, will have a mere human authority, will be mere human suffrages. But they still have a sacred anchor, to which the more recent contemnners of academic responses have most artfully learned to flee and betake themselves. If a response is offered to them that favors their cause, or promises some patronage, they immediately kiss it, they praise it, they commend it. The author of such a response is to be held as an illuminated, regenerate, pious, and religious theologian. But if the responses of academics are manfully and intrepidly opposed to their dogmas, they think they have adduced sufficient reason why they cannot admit them, if they revile the authors as unregenerate, impious, and carnal. But granted that the authors of academic responses burn with no zeal for piety, are the things which they pronounce therefore false? Does not the devil himself profess the truth when he pronounces Christ to be the Son of GOD? Therefore, because the devil said it, is this statement to be reputed as false? But how empty this saying is has already been proven by many so copiously, so solidly, that I deem it superfluous to write an Iliad after so many Homers. I am indeed most persuaded that if those theologians who have hitherto opposed fanaticism, enthusiasm, indifferentism, pietism, and other noxious novelties, were to change their mind so far as to propose and defend the hypotheses of the parties adverse to us with mouth or pen, then all suspicion of carnalism or impiety would soon cease, and those responses would be held in great esteem which now, with whatever reasons they may come supported, are altogether despised and judged worthy of no reading. In the meantime, I most certainly trust that sincere theologians will also make their own the saying of Chrysostom, which is found in homily XXV on Matthew: "He is a traitor to the truth who does not freely pronounce it, or does not freely defend it. It is more expedient for the church to preserve the truth whole and inviolate than to labor in connecting friendships with detriment to the same. That is the chief thing, that is to be diligently cared for." Would that the dissenters would observe the same! Thus no more complaints would have to be brought forth about disturbed peace and irritated brethren, which cannot move us for so long as we are persuaded that to obtain peace with the loss of truth is against piety and the reason of our duties. For the rest, to what extent academic responses have the force of deciding controversies, the above-alleged CARPZOVIVUS has excellently explained on p. 70, discoursing in this manner: "Here one must distinguish accurately and exquisitely between the defense of the truth and the decision of a controversy. For although when controversies arise, when theologians defend the truth against the heterodox, the controversy is materially decided by them, with the supreme judge, the Holy Spirit, pronouncing the sentence, whose decisive voice they draw from scripture; yet formally it cannot be said to be so decided, because the right of deciding is delegated to the whole church, for the exercise of which the authority of the supreme magistrate, if he is a Christian, is required to concur. Insofar, therefore, as the doctors alone resist the adversaries and defend the truth, they are to be held thus far as only one of the contending parties; but insofar as they concur with the magistrate to form a sentence for the truth against them, they are no longer to be held as a contending party, but together with the magistrate they sustain the person of a judge, although in both cases they act according to an internal and spiritual power. To the former they are always bound by reason of their office, even if neither the magistrate nor any man requires it, and of these, too, no one can inhibit them from doing their duty. Acts V, 29. To the latter, however, they do not have power, except concurrently with the magistrate, just as conversely the magistrate does not have the power of deciding alone, even if he knows how to judge the controversy most excellently from the truth. If he requires an internal decision from the ministry, that is, either from academic theologians, or from pastors, or from both, these can never withdraw themselves from their office; if he does not require it, they are bound to explain the points of the cause to the magistrate of their own accord, and to exhort him to think in time about legitimately deciding the controversies and settling the disputes, and removing scandals from the church." And this is what all the saner theologians in the Lutheran church judge concerning academic responses, repeated here by me for this purpose, that I might publicly declare what my opinion also is. For the rest, if any theologian is unwilling to have responses or counsels as decisions binding in conscience, for verbindliche Aussprüche (binding pronouncements), but only as informational, which are to be entirely tested, and first compared with the cynosure of all doctrine, the Holy Scripture, he will not have me as a contradictor, if he wishes this to be understood of responses, insofar as they proceed from men, constituted in however great authority. For my mind will never recede from that opinion which the blessed FECHTIUS once piously and learnedly inculcated in his fundamental collection of manuscripts: "We must cast away the opinion concerning any other man, whoever and however great he may have been, and concerning his doctrine, judgment, Spirit, wisdom, and sanctity. We must not look to the multitude, fame, authority of those who think with us; not to the long duration of the opinions with which they are either involved or to be impugned. Ears are not to be given to those who praise, admire, or extol to the heavens either us or our writings, or our fervor. The affections must be contained from all these things no differently than if nothing of this sort existed. Finally, with every other hope and trust cast away, our minds must be fixed on the one GOD and His word, on that one alone we must depend." But if the arguments and weights of the responses have been recognized as divine, then they will be altogether obligatory, and whoever refuses to give assent to them, offends GOD as gravely as if he had spurned and contemned His own word. For wherever the word of GOD is found uncorrupted, it must likewise be attended to and venerated as divine. But lest I transgress the bounds of a preface, the principal scope of my writing must now be attended to, and so I must now freely and candidly declare what I think of the present acroamatic theological examination of the formerly very reverend and most excellent man, DN. M. DAVID HOLLAZIUS, Pastor of Jacobshagen and Praepositus of the neighboring synod, of blessed memory. I judge all this to be indeed superfluous, since the first edition of this work, made in the year 1707, was so pleasing and well-received that within a decade we see all its copies sold out. It is also agreed among the learned what the Authors of the Unschuldige Nachrichten (Innocent Reports), in the year 1717, p. 466, and that most celebrated star of the academy of Wittenberg, DN. D. WERNSDORFFIUS, in the preface prefixed to the Scrutiny of Truth of our blessed Author, have judged concerning this man and his theological labors. For the benefit of the studious youth, however, I thought it necessary to narrate here a little more specifically the main points or moments that render this book commendable. And so:

1. The methodical synopsis of the whole work, which appears immediately at the front of the book, is pleasing. Those who will strive to impress it firmly upon their memory will experience in practice how useful it is in theological matters to have rendered the connection of the whole compendium or system most familiar to oneself. For as often as the sacred pages of the Bible themselves are turned, or the writings of other theologians are consulted, so often will the student of theology be able to know to which part of theology, to which article, the things read are to be referred, by which method he can make not only his own compendium or system more extensive, but also the internal treasure of his own mind daily richer.

2. It is pleasing that the blessed Author has prefixed a definition in every article, and thereafter has subjoined a sufficient explanation of the same, which the formerly most consummate theologian, DN. D. IOH. AD. SCHERZERUS, esteemed very highly, thus addressing his reader in his system: "To prefix to every part or article of the celestial discipline a summary of all that is to be said, a definition, and to resolve it into its members, and into the individual viscera which are encompassed and with which it swells, was pleasing for a just reason. For from where can you more certainly promise yourself the knowledge of things, the discovery of truth, and the panacea of memory, than from such a method, which, serving things without command, draws all lines from the definition, as from a center, and in the final analysis gently leads them back to the same? So that, as if standing on a watchtower, you can contemplate the face, recesses, vastness, limits, compass, and outcome of the whole cause, at a single glance. Which things, evolved through the subjoined exegesis, and demonstrated roundly with domestic foundations chiefly, i.e., sought from scripture, against the antithesis of those thinking otherwise, render the reader's mind free from all doubt, altogether unswerving and unmovable (unswerving and unmovable)."

3. It is pleasing that the blessed Author has elucidated, by means of clear and perspicuous questions, those things which he contracted summarily in the definition. If any method is convenient and apt for treating and inculcating disciplines, this one, in my judgment, deserves to be considered the most convenient and apt of all. For as many as are the principal moments of things to be noted, so many questions are formed, which render the reader attentive, so that he may observe those things which otherwise, when proposed in a single series, would not be so easily noticed by just anyone.

4. It is pleasing that the blessed Author has not only selected and cited the classic passages, or principal proof texts, with singular care and study, but has also taken care to have them expressed verbatim; which not only alleviates the trouble of searching, but also greatly helps and strengthens the memory of learners. Whence also the blessed SEBASTIANUS SCHMIDIUSA in his compendium of theology wished to show himself pleasing to his readers in the same manner, as an ocular inspection of that most learned and useful book teaches.

5. It is pleasing that the blessed Author has treated not only the thesis, but also the antithesis, and has thus labored to instruct the candidate of theology so that he might correspond to the Pauline rule in the epistle to Titus I, 9, which desires that, holding fast the faithful word which is according to doctrine, he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine and to convict the gainsayers. To obtain this end, he has diligently sought out in this examination the weightier objections of our adversaries and has so discussed them that, with all doubts and obscurities removed, the most splendid and at the same time most efficacious ray of celestial truths may always remain. I cannot indeed conceal that sometimes in this examination a nominal refutation is lacking; since HOLLAZIUS lived in a place where it was perilous to censure or refute Calvinists or Pietists by name. Perhaps also he foresaw that to employ a nominal refutation against Calvinists or Pietists would hinder his whole work from quietly seeing the public light. In the meantime, the very reading of this examination will demonstrate to the eye that the blessed Author by no means sided with the aforementioned adversaries, but refuted their errors manfully and solidly. But if there should be those to whom our HOLLAZIUS commends himself the less for this reason, I kindly admonish them to consider that the blessed Author several times adduced and refuted the Calvinists under the title of the Reformed, and even ZWINGLIUS, MACCOVIUS, PAREUS, and others by name. To this is added that sometimes a real refutation obtains the same as a nominal one, especially among those who are not unaware of who those adversaries are whose doubts are overthrown, and whose names can easily be learned from the books of others. In the meantime, I most willingly confess that a nominal refutation of adversaries is by no means to be omitted at all times by all and every theologian.

6. It is pleasing that the blessed Author has added the best practical applications to each article of faith, since in this way he has striven to make his reader not only learned, but also pious. And so he has performed exceedingly well that which BERNARD once inculcated on the occasion of 1 Cor. VIII, 1, 2: "You see that the Apostle does not approve those who know much, if they have not known the manner of knowing; you see how he constitutes the fruit and utility of knowledge in the manner of knowledge. What then does he say? Except that you should know with what order, with what zeal, for what end you ought to know each thing; with what order, that you know that first which more readily moves to salvation; with what zeal, that you know that more ardently which more vehemently moves to the love of GOD and neighbor; for what end, that you know not for vain glory or

7. It is pleasing that the reader, by his own example in the sighs placed near the end of each article, has been shown by the blessed Author how everyone ought to apply the celestial doctrine to himself as an individual and to appropriate it to himself.

8. It is pleasing that the blessed Author did not esteem an ambitious style, but everywhere uses words that are plain, perspicuous, and most suitable for teaching. He has indeed employed terms received in our theology, yet by no means barbarous or useless, but only those which our theology today cannot do without on account of our adversaries, the understanding and right use of which he altogether presupposes in the formation of a candidate of theology.

This theological examination is therefore so composed that students of theology will find in it abundantly that which can satisfy their desires. Nor should it be omitted here that our once most celebrated FECHTIUS, in his disquisition on the true knowledge of sacred things, page 113 & 114, judged most excellently of this present work of my HOLLAZIUS, speaking thus: "In this most recent age there have come into my hands the writings of several theologians, in which all of theology is represented either in a brief compendium or in a larger deduction, which, in a manner previously unaccustomed, have set forth the locus on grace in its particular circumstances far more fully and carefully. Among whom I now name only the theological examination of DAVID HOLLAZIUS, a man indeed of excellent learning, which for the perspicuity of its treatment, the facility of its order, and the innumerable testimonies of the scriptures, briefly and lucidly set forth, indeed deserves all praise and encomium. How soberly and solidly after DANNHAVER, OSIANDER, QUENSTEDT, and others, he proceeds in proposing the doctrine of illumination and conversion, and in elucidating its natural and spiritual degrees, with the difference between them solicitously set forth and distinguished, the third book of the examination abundantly demonstrates." Above all, however, it is to be judged here that this second edition appears much neater and more perfect than the first. Neater, because he who provides the expenses for printing this book, I. H. RUSWORMIVS, a most famous bookseller, has taken such care for the paper and types, that by their very appearance, students of theology are invited to read and diligently peruse this book. This edition also appears neater, because, with all diligence applied, whatever faults had crept into the former have been expunged. This examination is presented more perfectly, however, because it is now seen to be adorned with necessary indices, and the Scrutiny of Truth, published separately in the year 1710, is now contained in this system itself, so that any question can be read and found inserted in its proper place. I trust, kind reader, that I have written nothing here that is alien to the truth of the matter itself, I have given nothing to my affections, although I venerate the name of my HOLLAZIUS with filial affection. If you are judicious, if you are a sincere estimator of divine gifts, you will yourself feel with me: But if anything in this book should come upon you that is not equally to your palate, remember that not even your things please everyone. For the rest, let those things which St. CYPRIAN left in Book III, epistle XIII to STEPHEN, be said to all of us: "Therefore, dearest brother, the body of priests is copious, joined by the glue of mutual concord and the bond of unity, so that if any of our college should attempt to create a heresy, and to tear and lay waste the flock of Christ, the rest may come to aid and, as useful and merciful shepherds, gather the Lord's sheep into the flock. Since therefore the Lord so threatens such shepherds, through whom the Lord's sheep are neglected and perish, what else ought we to do, dearest brother, than to exhibit full diligence in gathering and bringing back the sheep of Christ, and to apply the medicine of paternal piety to curing the wounds of the fallen." Given at Rostock, the 11th day of September, in the year 1717. B. ALB. IOACH. DE KRAKEWITZ, Doctor of Sacred Theology and First Professor, Senior of the Theological Faculty, Ducal Consistory Councilor, and Superintendent of the District of Mecklenburg.

PREFACE OF GOTTLIEB WERNSDORFF, PREFIXED TO THE SCRUTINY OF TRUTH OF THE BLESSED AUTHOR.

Although it is neither in itself praiseworthy, nor my own custom, to hunt for some empty bit of glory by transcribing the lengthy opinions of others, yet I cannot restrain myself from adducing here what the theologian, celebrated in his time and who underwent many difficulties and dangers for the defense of the truth, D. SIMON MUSAEUS, in his opinion on original sin, rightly and wisely thought one hundred and thirty-eight years ago concerning the three types of men who watch idly as controversies arise in the church. "With controversies and conflicts growing in the church," he says, "a threefold type of men chiefly tends to arise among the spectators, who abuse them to their own perdition and deserve just reprehension. The first type is that of the Neutrals, who, against the article of the Creed: I believe in the communion of saints, as if they were severed and dead members of the body of the church, think that conflicts arising elsewhere do not pertain to them, nor, having accurately examined and compared the writings, do they join themselves to either party, but sitting as if at a chorus of dancers, idle and secure, they laugh at and rail against the combatants, feigning empty wars of words (logomachies), even if the contention is about the most serious articles of faith. Against such shirkers and deserters of laboring truth, the Holy Spirit everywhere threatens horribly, as for instance in Judges V: 'curse ye the land of Meroz,' and Amos VI: 'Woe to them that are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph,' and Heb. X: 'not forsaking the assembling of the saints,' etc. The second type is that of the Respecters of Persons, who are so fixed in admiration of celebrated and illustrious persons who are accused and convicted of errors," "that they presume for certain that their gifts and past merits to the church are too great for them to be able to lapse and err. Therefore, in various ways they excuse them and cry out that an injury is being done to them. The Holy Spirit calls these back from respect for and fascination with persons to the foundation of scripture, both by testimonies and by examples of scripture, so that we may attend not to who says it, but what is said. The third type is the crowd of Donatists, imagining for themselves a church, tranquil and flourishing without any spots or disturbances. Therefore, when they hear the voice of the Son of God proclaiming of his spouse: 'Thou art all fair, there is no spot in thee,' but they look upon the external state of the church, how deformed it is by the cross, despised for its small number, oppressed by the violence and fraud of tyrants and heretics, obscured by the splendor of the world, squalid with tares, and turbulent with internal dissensions; they conceive a most bitter grief, and are shaken by waves of doubt, whether, according to the third article of the Creed, there exists any assembly on earth that corresponds to the aforesaid voice of the Son of God, truly worships the saving God, and is in turn loved by him above all sects, governed, and preserved unto eternal beatitude. But the Holy Spirit teaches that the perfect sanctity of the Church will shine forth in the kingdom of glory, etc." Thus that good and wise man spoke, concerning the three classes to which men are to be assigned who are occupied in estimating and examining controversies about religion. Although in what follows he accommodates these things to the conflict that was agitated between our Doctors and Flacius concerning Original Sin, yet they are so splendidly and excellently disputed that he seems to have regarded not so much the customs of his own age as of ours.

For to speak first of the third and last type, how many are there at this time, especially among those who have devoted themselves to civil affairs, who view all controversies that arise, even if they should be born of matters of grave moment, as a certain empty and superfluous zeal for quarreling, and a shameful lust for contention? If they would commend the peace of the church to the Deity with pious prayers, and would see to it that salutary doctrine suffers no detriment, and would admonish the custodians and vindicators of the truth not to exceed the measure either in imputing or in castigating errors, and finally, would inveigh against the authors of quarrels rather than those who assert and defend the truth; then indeed they would have contributed not a little to preserving concord among allies and to the felicity of a purer church. But that some think it is alien to piety to dispute with anyone over the heads of salutary doctrine, and cannot bear even necessary conflicts, and demand that those who note the errors of others more freely be charged with love of strife (love of strife) and heresy-making, and wish the seeds of discord not to be removed but tolerated, and finally view all controversies as empty, or as trifles about three goats, and obscurely permit the license of thinking and deciding anything about anyone, this indeed is what we rightly derive, on the one hand, from a Donatism reviving in the minds of men, and on the other, from the corrupt morals of the age. For since there is no citizen of the republic so negligent that he would not bear it ill if even a small particle were taken away from the borders of his fatherland; would it be right to connive if now this, now that not-to-be-despised portion of divine truth were extorted, as it were, from the hands of the assembly of believers? And truly, let us attend here to how perversely all things are treated in the world. For that lawsuits in court are drawn out without measure and end, for three or more years, over transient and empty fortunes, with injuries, calumnies, and arts not rarely sprinkled in, and not without the manifest inconvenience of the litigants, this indeed not only do some students of civil affairs not disapprove, but they even sometimes compel the unwilling to contest a suit. But that we move a controversy against this or that person on account of a corrupt head of doctrine, that we expostulate with him now publicly, now privately, that we call a spade a spade, that we strive to place the truth in safety, and deny that even the smallest particle of it should be taken away, that finally we sometimes address the pertinacious and refractory more severely, this they consider to be inimical to the zeal for peace, to the sanctity of morals, and to the interests of the church. How rightly, let others judge. This I remember, that the Apostle does not indeed condemn all litigations, but is the author to the Corinthians that they should rather digest injuries received than go to law about them in court; but a refutation against any enemies of the truth, to be instituted in season and out of season (out of season, in season), he commends, prescribes, and urges, once, again, and more often. For if someone cannot have his fortunes safe by any other means, it is lawful to implore the most noble office of the magistrate; but where salutary doctrine, which, as an inestimable good, has been entrusted to the faith of all, is corrupted in any way, it is then not only proper, but also necessary, to assert and defend it from corruptions.

Now, Respecters of Persons are not lacking either, who, when they are to judge of the proposed questions, look not to the opinion, but to the author of the opinion, and measure the dignity of the doctrine not by its own worth, but by that of the teacher; so that according as he is either accepted or disliked, so also is his opinion either received or condemned. And so there is no error so proven, indeed so absurd, that it does not find its applauders, provided it proceeds from a man of great authority and fame. When

PHILIP once flourished with the fatal grace of all, some did not hesitate to say that they would rather dwell with MELANCHTHON in the underworld than with LUTHER in the heavens; and when the conflict about original sin later arose, many, by the reverence for Flacius's name alone, preferred to defend a most putrid error tooth and nail, than to yield to MUSAEUS, HESHUSIUS, and others who taught saner things. Indeed, even at this time many indulge in Chiliastic, Mystic, Terministic, and other such insane opinions of that kind, not because they are convinced of their truth from the scriptures, but because they were once sown and disseminated by the guides of the Pietists, from whom nothing was ever so imprudently uttered, so meticulously asserted, so meagerly and lightly proven, that it was not adored by their admirers as if spoken from the tripod and incapable of being false, so that now at last I seem to myself to understand sufficiently what the Apostle means when he writes that the Galatians were bewitched by the persuasions of the Pseudo-Apostles. For those who wish to seem to attribute nothing to the authority of men, and who cry out even to hoarseness that one must abstain from prejudices, these indulge in prejudices to such an extent that they prefer to err with their guides than to think rightly with others, not rarely disapproving opinions which they have not even known, let alone explored.

Finally, in these times, Mediators also occur, who, addicted to neither party, sit at controversies as idle and mute spectators, and deign neither to inspect nor to examine what is written on either side, but rather leave everything in the middle, and meet the disputants with equal humanity and testimony of love; they neither assume nor can they bear to assume a judgment for themselves concerning the matters called into controversy, deeming it sufficient if they attend to their own affairs, and themselves abstain from errors, being little concerned about those of others. To these three classes you would rightly add a fourth, that of the Colluders, to be sure, who, although they dare not openly plot anything, either from diffidence in themselves or in their cause, yet they favor their adversaries inwardly, supply them with opportune counsels, conciliate the wills of the powerful where the matter demands, and assist them by whatever means they can. Nor, however, do they rashly reveal what they have in mind, or allow it to become known to others, but they take great care that they should not seem in any matter to favor their opinions. And so, they not only abstain from writing, but also, when asked for their opinions by others, they mutter and decline to judge, or, if a poorly dissembled favor can no longer be hidden, they pour forth the error openly under another's persona and the bile collected over a long time against most innocent men, to be quiet thereafter until a new occasion emerges for insulting those whom they wish ill. As there is scarcely anything more noxious than this type of man, because hidden evils are worse than manifest ones, so I approve with all the more vehemence the zeal of judicious men for defending religion, who not only, each in his own place, gravely and earnestly admonish the flock entrusted to them to beware of imminent wolves, but also, being solicitous for the salvation of others, uncover the snares of enemies in public writings, and show by what means they can be avoided. And among these, indeed, there is to be named by me in no last place the man most grave in age, doctrine, and merits to the church, Dn. M. DAVID HOLLAZIUS, Pastor of the church of Jacobshagen, and Praepositus to the neighboring Synod, who, inflamed with a great ardor for defending the truth, did not think it enough to have comprehended his own opinions on divine matters in a special system, which is extant, three years ago, but also took pains that in a special book he should not only here and there declare the same, but also render them safe from the cavillations of adversaries. Having taken into account, therefore, the circumstances of the time, he so uncovered the corruptions of the Fanatics and Enthusiasts that with one whitewash he covered two walls, and by noting the old, he at the same time solidly confuted the modern and more recent ones. For these do not dissent from those; but rather, nothing is said at this time by the innovators that has not been said before by the Mystics, Schwenckfeldtians, Weigelians, Anabaptists, and others. While, therefore, the censures are repeated against those old ones, the more recent ones, who do not invent new things but re-cook and overlay the old, are at the same time noted. This very thing the venerable HOLLAZIUS has performed in such a way that he seems to have made the palm in this genre of writing doubtful for all. Wherefore, this one thing I pray, that GOD may most benignly favor this work, and grant to the Author that the powers of his body and mind remain whole and unshaken, so that by the amplitude of his merits he may be able to profit true religion greatly! Wittenberg in Saxony, on the Ides of August, in the year of our salvation 1710.

TO THE READERS, GREETINGS FROM ROMANUS TELLER, R. F.

You know without a doubt, friendly Reader, for the fame of our most bitter grief is not obscure, that my most cherished Father, through whose effort this new edition of this book comes forth, was recently snatched from me and from all good men by an untimely death, alas! You will not, therefore, be surprised that the book, most diligently cared for by him, and augmented with new additions, is brought forth into the light without any address to you that would have proceeded from Him. For when my most excellent Father, whom I can scarcely bear the loss of, was on the point of devoting his effort, after his annotations were completed, to the writing of a preface, he was hindered for some time by the severity of his worsening illness, and at last, overcome by its persistence, he died. But will you grant permission that in this place, which the celebrated name of my Father, were he alive, would have occupied, my own, as yet ignoble on account of my age and distinguished by no merits, should appear? You will grant it, I am sure, nor will you begrudge this just grief whatever small comforts of solace.

Indeed, this I certainly know, that it is done neither against the will of my most loving Father, nor is it disapproved by men conspicuous for their authority and gravity of morals, if I should briefly set forth, in place of a preface, both the occasion which my blessed Father had for editing the work, and those things which I often heard him mention concerning the plan of this book and of the annotations which he added to it.

Some years have now passed since Godofr. Kiesewetter, a bookseller of Holm, a man in the first rank of honesty, signified by letters to my blessed Father that the perpetual work of holier doctrine, formerly written by the blessed HOLLAZIUS and already printed several times, was greatly desired in Sweden, and he asked him to take upon himself the care of editing it anew, and to add something of his own, if time permitted. He, however, although he did not approve of this book in every part—for he was often wont to reprehend its uncultivated and inelegant manner of speaking and the at times disordered arrangement of matters and arguments—yet because in most respects he judged it sufficiently clear and perspicuous and for that reason most apt for instructing those who devote their labor to the study of sacred things, he easily allowed himself to be persuaded and promised his labor to the bookseller; and although he had previously been distracted by other occupations, he finally in the past year undertook the matter with great alacrity, as was his custom.

And first, indeed, I remember that he acted with zeal to purge the very text of the book from the infinite errors of the workmen, which not rarely disturbed the very sense of the sayings, with which the prior editions of the book were filled, himself undertaking a thing having much trouble and little pleasure. But in order also to discharge his office with a worthier persona, and to render this book as useful as possible to students of sacred things, he furnished it with very many annotations, in which he illustrated, amplified, and emended things said by the Author that were either a little obscure, or briefer than was just, or even in some way unusual. Furthermore, he also added many things wholly omitted by the blessed Author, and especially, he expounded the heads of Christian doctrine which are had concerning the reserved divine matters, concerning the names of the Best Savior, and concerning the nature and kinds of divine grace so copiously and accurately that it seems to exhibit the form not so much of annotations, but of a proper book. He would have added more, without a doubt, and indeed would have proposed it in a different form and order, especially in those matters which the blessed Author, either led into the thickets of the Scholastics, disputed more contortedly and thornily than the elegant manner of our age would bear, or, fearing the wrath of the Reformed, among whom he lived, dissembled, or finally, more intent on routing his adversaries than on drawing up his battle line, proposed, bound by no certain law—all these things, I say, he would gladly have changed, as I remember him saying, had he not considered it a matter of religious scruple to invert another's labor. Finally, lest in any way His parts should be lacking, he also took care that new indices should be made, the utility of which I prefer to be known by use than by my commendation.

For the rest, it will be easy for anyone who reads this book through to see—for in a matter so clear and manifest, the love for my Father cannot move me to flatter his departed spirit—that my blessed Father, as in his whole life, so also in these his annotations, showed a mind most observant of the purer doctrine handed down from our ancestors, and in defending it, an outstanding fortitude and constancy tempered with the highest humanity; and now at last, unless I am mistaken, the brethren who are commonly called Herrnhutians will be ashamed—according to those things which they will find said about them in clear words here and there—they will be ashamed, I say, of the rumor once fabricated against my blessed Father, the injury of which he himself, while he lived, preferred to disdain with a great spirit, rather than to vindicate publicly, although he could have. These are nearly the things which I had to say for the present, having performed a most sad office. You, however, friendly Reader, pray well for my Father, summoned to the domiciles of the most blessed souls, and for me, imploring Your favor, until I myself, spurred by the example of my most cherished Father, begin to deserve well of letters, allow his memory to be a protection. Written at Leipzig, on the 13th day before the Kalends of May [April 19], in the year of Christ 1750.

OUTLINE OF THE WORK

THEOLOGICAL PROPAEDEUTICS is completed in three chapters, in which the prolegomena are dispatched.

Chapter I deals with the constitution of theology. II. With religion and the articles of faith. III. With sacred scripture.

Theological PAIDEIA is divided into four parts.

PART ONE

Considers in chapter I. God, as the objective end of theology. II. The Mystery of the Holy Trinity. III. The divine actions in general, and creation in particular. IV. Angels. V. Man. VI. Divine Providence. VII. The beatific vision and enjoyment of God, as the formal end of theology.

PART TWO

Examines the subject of theology, which is man fallen into sin. Therefore, it deals in chapter I. with the image of God, as the state from which man fell. II. With sin, into which he fell. III. With original sin. IV. With actual sin. V. With the defect of free will in spiritual matters.

PART THREE

Presents both the principles and the means of salvation, and is subdivided into two sections.

FIRST SECTION considers the principles of salvation; and therefore deals in chapter I. With the general benevolence of God. II. With the special benevolence of God, and with predestination. III. With the fraternal redemption of Christ. IV. With the applying grace of the Holy Spirit, and specifically with the call to the church. V. With illumination. VI. With conversion. VII. With regeneration. VIII. With justification. IX. With the mystical union. X. With renewal. XI. With the preservation of faith and holiness. XII. With glorification.

SECOND SECTION ponders the means of salvation, both causal and executive.

Accordingly, it treats in chapter I. of the means of salvation in general, and in particular of the word of the law. II. Of the word of the gospel. III. Of the sacraments. IV. Of baptism. V. Of the eucharist. VI. Of penitence in general, and of contrition in particular. VII. Of saving faith. VIII. Of good works. IX. Of the executive means of salvation in general, and specifically of death and the resurrection of the dead. X. Of the last judgment and the consummation of the age.

PART FOUR

Presents men collectively, as they are members of the church.

And so it deals in chapter I. with the church. II. With the ecclesiastical ministry. III. With the political magistrate. IV. With the economic state.

PRESENTING

A GENERAL PROLEGOMENON

ON

THE CONSTITUTION OF THEOLOGY

Question I. What is theology?

THEOLOGY IS AN eminently practical wisdom, which, from the revealed word of God, teaches all things that are necessary for the sinner, who is to attain eternal salvation, to know for true faith in Christ and to do for a holy life.

Question II. What does theology signify?

Etymology. Theology, by the force of the word, denotes a λόγος περὶ τοῦ θεοῦ (discourse about God), both speech and, above all, knowledge about God, or the habit of discoursing about God.

(*) Since it is evident that this definition specifically explains 1) the theology of travelers, which is distinguished from the archetypal, 2) that of men, for their theology is different from that of angels, 3) that of sinners, after their most sad defection from God, in which respect it is opposed to the theology, as it is commonly called, of paradise, in the state of integrity, 4) that of travelers, whose theology differs from that which is called of the consummated, 5) revealed theology, which is distinguished from natural; it would therefore have been suitable to the order of things, had it pleased the blessed Author to prefix a certain general definition, and all those divisions, which he himself afterward set forth, from question 7 up to no. 14. Which the blessed man himself seems to profess below, in question 12. Then, as to the definition itself, 1) for many reasons it seems to me that theology is more rightly called an efficacious, or practical, knowledge, than wisdom; certainly there was no need to add this supplement, practical, if indeed no wisdom can be other than practical, but knowledge, or science, is rightly divided into theoretical and practical (see what the blessed Author himself will argue later, at question 13, instances II and IV); 2) as for this, from the revealed word of God; I think it would indeed have been said more plainly and certainly; consigned to letters, or, in divine scripture. In which way we avoid all the ambiguity that lies hidden in the words. Thus, indeed, one of the chief properties of an accurate definition demands that nothing in it be said ambiguously. It is agreed among all that (α) FANATICAL men, despisers of scripture, interpret the revealed word of God either of the light which they invent, which is internal, or of the immediate illumination, which they fable to

The assertion is proven: Theology is an abstract noun, derived from the concrete θεολόγος (theologian). The word λόγος (logos), which constitutes the other part of the concrete noun, outside of composition signifies both the external speech of the mouth, namely an oration, or dissertation; and the internal concept of the mind, or reason, or the dictate of reason; but within a composition it denotes cognition, or science, so that a theologian is said to be one in whom ὁ λόγος περὶ τοῦ θεοῦ (the discourse about God) exists in the manner of a scientific habit, just as an astrologer is so called, who has acquired for himself the science of the motion of the stars, and possesses the habit of discoursing about the stars. Although the etymology of theology (ἔτυμον τῆς θεολογίας) can be explained by λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ (discourse of God), speech, or science of God, because it is from God as the efficient cause; or by λόγον πρὸς τὸν θεόν (discourse to God), by speech leading to God, as the ultimate end; Yet it is more rightly explained here by knowledge about God, as the primary object of theological consideration. For just as astrology is the science of the stars, cosmology of the world, chronology of time, anthropology of man; so theology is the science of God.

Question III. Is the word 'theology' ἔγγραφος (written), or expressed in the Sacred Code?

The word 'theology,' κατὰ τὸ ῥητὸν (according to the letter), does not exist in sacred scripture. The concrete noun θεολόγος (theologian) is indeed seen in the epigraph of the apocalypse of John; but that the same word was immediately inspired by the holy spirit is improbable.

Proof. To those who examine the codex of the sacred oracles, it is clear that the word theology does not exist in it. The concrete noun θεολόγος (theologian) is read in the epigraph of the apocalypse of John conceived in these words: Ἀποκάλυψις Ἰωάννου τοῦ θεολόγου (The Apocalypse of John the Theologian). AUGUSTINE gives the reason for this denomination in tractate 36 on John, because this apostle asserted the divinity of Christ with such emphasis as no one before him. From which THEOPHYLACTUS calls him θεολογικώτατον (most theological). The Complutensian exemplar has this inscription: Ἀποκάλυψις τοῦ ἁγίου Ἀποστόλου καὶ Εὐαγγελιστοῦ Ἰωάννου τοῦ θεολόγου (The Apocalypse of the holy Apostle and Evangelist John the Theologian). Which variation in the inscription leads us to conjecture that this epigraph is not θεόπνευστον (God-breathed); nor is it consistent that the very modest John would have designated himself with the name of holy apostle, as is found in the Complutensian exemplar.

Question IV. Who were the first to use the word 'theology'?

The Gentiles used this word long before the birth of Christ, which word the leaders of the primitive church transferred to express the true knowledge of God.

Proof. The word 'theology' exists in PLATO, book 2 of the Republic, and ARISTOTLE, book 3 of the Metaphysics, chapter 4. CICERO in book 3 of On the Nature of the Gods: "The theologians," he says, "count three Jupiters." CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA in book 4 of the Stromata calls it ἐπιδρομὴν τῆς θεολογίας (a survey of theology), which the Latins would call a theological course.

Question V. Is there a word in the sacred letters equivalent to 'theology'?

A word absolutely equivalent to 'theology' is not read in sacred scripture, but there are synonymous periphrases in it.

Proof. Theology is called the wisdom of God in a mystery, 1 Cor. II, 7. Hence by some it is called θεοσοφία (Theosophy). It is called ἐκθεσις τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ ὁδοῦ (exposition of the way of the Lord), Acts XVIII, 26. From this it is called ὁδοσοφία (Hodosophy) by the Blessed DANNHAVER. Theologians are called Θεοδιδάκτοι (taught by God), 1 Thess. IV, 9. Therefore it can be named θεοδιδασκαλία (doctrine taught by God). It is called the acknowledgment of the truth, which is according to godliness, Tit. I, 1. Thus it can be named θεογνωσία καὶ θεοσέβεια (knowledge of God and piety), taking these happen to certain few and select friends of God; (β) but the ROMAN-CATHOLICS, besides the written word of God, invent some other, equally divinely revealed, because, as they say, it was handed down by mouth. Few today are unaware that the JEWS also establish a twofold word of God, partly the writings of the divine prophets, and partly the traditions which they call Mosaic, in almost the same way that the Roman Catholics invent the Apostolic traditions.

words in a broader sense. Compare D. CALOV. in Systema Theologicum, Tom. I. p. 2.

Question VI. In how many senses is the word 'theology' taken?

Homonyms. In a fourfold sense. (a) Most generally, for any doctrine about God, even if it is false or mixed with errors. (b) Generally, for true theology, whether it be original or participated, whether of travelers or of the blessed, whether natural or revealed. (c) Specially, for revealed theology, leading man as a traveler to eternal salvation. (d) Most specially, for the doctrine of God one and triune.

Proof a. It was customary for the pagans to distinguish their very false opinion about God into mythical, political, and physical theology, about which D. HILDEBRAND deals at length in his Theologia Dogmatica, p. 2-3. But false theology is called theology καταχρητικῶς (improperly) and abusively, and should rather be called mateology from Tit. I, 10, or Pseudology from 1 Tim. IV, 2. For which reason we shall count it among the opposites of true theology.

Proof b. Not a few authors have distinguished theology into archetypal and ectypal, of the way and of the fatherland, natural and revealed, who have respected the etymology and force of the word theology, according to which it is the science of God and divine things. But, if we consider the use of the word, neither God, nor angels, nor the blessed in heaven, nor men following nature as their guide, are called theologians. Wherefore that loose signification of theology is not based so much on the common usage of speech, as on the derivation of the word, theology.

Proof c. Revealed theology is accurately and strictly called theology, and those who have drunk from the written word of God are, by the consent of all, called theologians.

Proof d. The fathers of the primitive church distinguished between theology and economy. Thus GREGORY NAZIANZEN says: ἄλλος ἐστὶ λόγος τῆς θεολογίας, ἢ τῆς φύσεως, ἄλλος τῆς οἰκονομίας (the account of theology, or of nature, is one, that of the economy another), cited in B. CHEMNITIUS, De Duabus Naturis in Christo, fol. m. 44. By theology the leaders of the first church understood the knowledge of God one and triune, by economy, the mystery of the incarnation, from Heb. III, 6. Whom D. WILHELM. LYSERUS seems to have imitated, who in his Systema Theologicum, p. 22, divides theology into theology strictly so called, anthropology, and christology.

Question VII. How is true theology distinguished?

Into archetypal, or original, and ectypal, or participated. Archetypal is the knowledge which God has of Himself, and which in Him is the exemplar of the other theology to be communicated with intelligent creatures. Ectypal is called the science of God and divine things communicated by God with intelligent creatures in imitation of His theology, as of an exemplary cause.

Obs. 1. An archetype is properly the first exemplar of an effect produced for its imitation, and by the force of the word it implies two things; 1. An exemplar, or form, which some effect may imitate by the intention of the agent; 2. The negation of dependence on another exemplary cause; so that archetypal theology, by the force of the word, is that which is the exemplary cause of another theology, and does not itself depend on another, as from an exemplary cause.

Obs. 2. Some theologians explain archetypal and ectypal theology a little differently. D. DANNHAY. in Hodosophia, p. m. 12. says: The distinction of theology into ἀρχέτυπον (archetypal) and ἔκτυπον (ectypal), received in the schools, is not entirely accurate. For the most sublime theology, by which God naturally knows himself, cannot be an imitable exemplar for our theology; Rather, that idea which the divine mind conceived, to be expressed in the external word by a certain and free measure of revelation, is archetypal theology. D. SCHERZER. in his Systema, p. 2, agrees with him.

We prove our assertion. (1) Man in his integrity was created in the image of God. But his image consisted in the knowledge of God, conformed to divine wisdom. Therefore, its ἀρχέτυπον (archetype) was the infinite wisdom of God. (2) Fallen man is renewed in knowledge according to the image of God, Col. III, 10. Therefore, its πρωτότυπον (prototype) is the divine theosophy. For the knowledge of God and divine things, which divine revelation generates in the intellect of men as travelers, is called by the apostle an acknowledgment according to the image of God, for no other reason than that it is expressed in imitation of the knowledge which God has of Himself and of all divine things.

You say: (1) Our theology is conformed not to the infinite theosophy, by which God knows Himself, but to the idea of the mind, which shines forth in the written word: Therefore, its πρωτότυπον (prototype) is not the infinite theosophy, by which God has known Himself from eternity, but the idea of the divine mind, expressed in the written word.

Resp. Archetypal theology, considered formally, does not exclude that idea expressed in the written word, but includes it. For archetypal theology is the knowledge which God has of Himself, conceived as the idea of the theology to be communicated with intelligent creatures, which idea is originally within the bosom of the deity, and is representatively in sacred scripture. Wherefore, by means of sacred scripture, our theology is conformed to the archetypal theology of God.

You say: (2) God did not communicate theology with intelligent creatures in imitation of His own. For it would follow that the theology which is in man after the fall is of infinite perfection, just as the knowledge of God of Himself is infinitely perfect.

Resp. I deny the consequence. For it is not necessary that the ἔκτυπον (copy) be of the same perfection as the ἀρχέτυπον (archetype), but it suffices if the former represents the latter in a certain way according to its capacity. This is clear from the example of man in his integrity, whose holiness was expressed after the exemplar of divine holiness, yet was not of the same perfection as the holiness of God.

Question VIII. Does archetypal theology also belong to Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπων)?

Archetypal theology belongs to Christ essentially and by nature, insofar as He is the eternal God: it belongs to Him personally and by the communication of idioms, by virtue of the personal union, according to His human nature. From which it is also called the theology of union.

Proof. (1) Because in Christ dwells all the fullness of the deity, Col. II, 9, in Him also dwells all the fullness of archetypal theology. (2) Because in Christ are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, Col. II, 3, it is validly concluded that that theosophy which is original and ἀρχέτυπος (archetypal) has been communicated to Him.

You say: Archetypal theology is incommunicable to a creature. The human nature of Christ is a creature. Therefore. The major premise is clear, since archetypal theology is the infinite and immense knowledge of God, by which God knows Himself, of which a creature is by no means capable.

Resp. I distinguish between a mere creature, existing outside of God, and one θεωθεῖσιν (deified), or hypostatically united with the deity. To the former it is incommunicable, to the latter it is truly communicated for possession and use.

Question IX. How many kinds of ectypal theology of men after the fall are there?

The theology of men after the fall is of one kind for the way, or of travelers, and of another for the homeland, or of the comprehenders. The former belongs to men who are pilgrims from the Lord in this world, and who know God imperfectly through certain means (a). The latter belongs to the blessed, who know God immediately and perfectly (b).

Observation. It is not pertinent here to consider the ectypal theology of the human nature of Christ, of angels, and of men in their integrity before the fall; because that doctrine pertains partly to the topic of Christ, partly to the topic of angels, and partly to the topic of the image of God.

Proof a. 2 Cor. V, 6-7. Therefore we are always confident, and know that while we are at home in the body we are away from the Lord, for we walk by faith, not by sight. The apostle's meaning is: since the holy spirit, who is the pledge of heavenly life, has been given to us, we do not lose heart, although the path of this life, beset as it were with the thorns of calamities, must be traversed by us not without many troubles, but we are of good cheer, as long as we dwell in the tent of this body, being away from the Lord, i.e., estranged from the beatific vision of God, and as it were absent abroad. For we spiritual travelers direct the course of our life and actions by the eye of faith, which is of things not seen, Hebr. XI, 1. But in the kingdom of glory we shall walk with Christ according to sight, that is, we shall have our Jesus visibly present, and we shall see Him face to face, 1 Cor. XIII, 12; 1 John III, 2.

Proof b. from 1 Cor. XIII, 12. For now we see in a mirror dimly, but then face to face; now I know in part, but then I shall know fully, even as I am fully known. The apostle indicates that the theology of men as travelers, compared with the theology of the blessed, is imperfect, indistinct, and joined with the difficulty of learning. For just as those who look at their images in a mirror see bodily things imperfectly; so in this life we have a certain faint knowledge of God and divine things, drawn from the revealed word, when it is compared with the much more perfect theosophy of eternal life. And as every enigma is an obscure, knotty, convoluted discourse, difficult to understand; so our theology, by reason of its object, is indistinct, comprising the most profound mysteries, and in this mortality most difficult to know. The theology of the fatherland, on the contrary, will be perfect, immediate, and intuitive. Just as God knows us most perfectly; so in the heavenly fatherland we in turn shall know God perfectly: He indeed with a divine and infinite perfection; we however not with an infinite, but a finite, yet in its kind complete perfection, as much as can fall to a rational creature.

Question X. Why is the theology of the blessed called of the 'comprehenders'?

The theology of the blessed is called the theology of the comprehenders, because the blessed have attained the desired goal of perfect knowledge of God.

Proof. The occasion for this denomination was given by the words of Paul, Phil. III, 12. Not that I have already obtained all this, or have already been made perfect; but I press on to take hold of (the Vulgate has: comprehend) that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me. The apostle is speaking of the saving knowledge of Christ. The pseudo-apostles arrogated to themselves a full knowledge of Christ, contending that it is enough to have known Christ, since no one is ignorant that Christ is the true Messiah, the expiator of past sins. To whom Paul holds the opposite opinion, who although he knew Jesus preeminently, yet denies that he has reached that goal of perfect knowledge, so as to need no further progress; but rather the apostle says that he will strive with all his might to embrace Jesus, who died and rose for him, with his whole mind, just as he was comprehended by Christ on the road to Damascus, that is, acknowledged, called, converted and drawn into the way of salvation. From which it is plain that St. Paul did not speak directly of the θεογνωσία

(knowledge of God) of the blessed; yet because he had asserted that he was striving to comprehend Christ, i.e., to know him perfectly, the scholastic doctors called the theology of the fatherland the theology of the comprehenders, because the blessed know God perfectly.

Observ. (1) Comprehensive knowledge of God is taken in a broader and a stricter sense. The comprehensive knowledge of God, more broadly speaking, is that by which God and whatever is in God, formally pertaining intrinsically to his essence and attributes, is known clearly, distinctly and immediately. It is also called the theology of vision, because by its power the blessed know God as he is in himself, as clearly and distinctly as bodily things are known when they strike the eyes and are seen, the denomination being taken from the words of Christ: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God, Matth. V, 8. The comprehensive knowledge of God, more strictly speaking, is that by which God is adequately known, and whatever is not only formally in God, but also virtually or eminently from him, or whatever can be produced by God, or in any way depend on him. Thus no creature comprehends God, who is plainly incomprehensible.

Observ. (2) Just as the theology of the blessed is called intuitive, because they know God immediately, as he is in himself; so the theology of travelers is called abstractive, because they know God not immediately in himself, but mediately in another, namely either in an effect, or in the revealed word, as in a mirror.

Question XI. How many kinds of theology of travelers are there?

The theology of travelers is twofold, natural and revealed. The former is that by which God becomes known both from innate notions and from the contemplation of created things. The latter is the knowledge of God and divine things which God communicates to men as travelers either through immediate revelation, or inspiration (a); or through mediate revelation, that is, the divine word, consigned to letters (b).

Obs. (1) Natural theology will be treated more accurately below in the section on God.

Obs. (2) It is called revealed theology, not from a general revelation, or any manifestation whatever, through the effects of God conspicuous in the kingdom of nature, about which Paul says in Rom. I, 19: Τὸ γνωστὸν τῷ θεῷ (what may be known about God) is plain to them, because God has made it plain to them; but from a special revelation, by which things not knowable by the power of nature are manifested, or things naturally knowable are declared in a supernatural way. Of this the savior says: Matth. XI, 27. No one knows the son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and those to whom the Son chooses to reveal him.

Proof a. To the prophets in the old, and to the apostles in the new testament, God immediately revealed or inspired theology. For as St. Peter testifies in his 2nd Epistle, c. I, 21, holy men of God spoke as they were moved (Φερόμενοι, impelled) by the Holy Spirit. Where you should note, (1) that the word φέρειν in the cited place does not mean to carry, but to act, move, impel, moderate. For among the Greeks, things that are driven by a certain impulse are called Φερόμενα. Whence φора denotes impulse. Compare CRAUSER, Phosphorum, p. 432. But that φора comprises both the internal illumination of the mind and the suggestion of those things which are to be said or written, and the external motion, so that not less the tongue or the pen, than the mind, acted by that impulse, whatever it did; and not only the matter or things were suggested, but also the words were placed in the mouth, or dictated to the pen of the prophets and apostles by the holy spirit. See D. CALOVII in Biblia Illustrata on this place, f. 1547.

Proof b. Because all scripture is θεόπνευστος (God-breathed), divinely inspired, 2 Tim. III, 16, by its means, God and divine things are revealed to us for salutary knowledge, worship, and use.

Question XII. In how many ways is revealed theology considered?

Habit. Revealed theology is considered (1) systematically, as it is the doctrine through which men become theologians; (2) habitually, inasmuch as it is a habit, from which theologians are denominated. Theology, viewed systematically and secondarily, is the doctrine of God, informing the traveling man, from the divine word, concerning the true worship of God through Christ, unto eternal life. Theology, considered habitually and primarily, was defined above in the response to question 1, and is now to be more exactly pondered.

Question XIII. Why do you define theology as 'eminent practical wisdom'?

Genus. Theology is wisdom, because it is the preeminent science of God and of divine things most worthy and most difficult to be known (a). It is eminent wisdom, because it is far superior to all human wisdom (b). It is practical wisdom, because all its conclusions, if not formally, certainly virtually and ultimately, tend toward practice.

Proof a. Wisdom, generally considered, is a preeminent science, which, since it deals with abstruse, arduous, and most excellent things, investigates with utmost diligence the first and highest principles of its domain, as defined by D. LEICHNER in De Vera Philosophia Bono, p. 16. We may also add the definition of wisdom given by D. CALOV in Metaphysica Divina, p.m. 147: Wisdom in common, considered precisely and abstractly, is a discursive habit, conjoining with the knowledge of principles at the same time the knowledge of conclusions, whatever those principles may be, whatever the conclusions (*). (He indeed adds τὸ θεωρητικὸν (the theoretical), saying: provided that one ultimately rests in that knowledge. But τὸ θεωρεῖν (to contemplate), or to rest ultimately in knowledge, we consider to pertain to the material reasons of wisdom, not to its formal reason.) But theology is a discursive habit, which investigates with utmost diligence the first principles of its domain, and from them accurately demonstrates its conclusions, and deals with the sublime and arduous mysteries of faith. Therefore, theology is wisdom.

(*) That definition, however, is of science. For this is the accurate knowledge of things interconnected among themselves, by which the human intellect is able to deduce certain consequences from certain and evident principles, and to perceive distinctly the necessary connection of these with those, and to communicate what is perceived with others. And so science, inasmuch as it is engaged in knowing and demonstrating things in their nature and properties, is usually called theoretical; but inasmuch as it ponders the right ends and uses of things, it is called practical. And this practical knowledge of things is designated by the name of wisdom. Wisdom, therefore, is the knowledge of good ends, and of the just means most apt for effecting those ends. Which practical knowledge, if it is perfected not by probable opinion and persuasion, but by necessary argumentation and consequence from certain principles, then at last it is called science, and that indeed a practical one. Cf. annotations to §. 1.

Proof b. Theology is eminent wisdom, because its principle is not self-evident and naturally evident, but exceeds the sphere of nature and reason, namely, divine revelation. With respect to this principle, revealed theology is called a habit θεόδοτος (given by God), not as if it were immediately infused, but because its principle is not human reason, but divine revelation. Therefore revealed theology is called wisdom, coming from above, Jas. III, 15. The wisdom of God in a mystery, and hidden, 1 Cor. II, 7, because it is full of arduous mysteries, and hidden to reason, left to itself.

Proof c. That theology is practical wisdom is evident (1) Because the intermediate end of theology is true faith in Christ, whose ἐνέργεια (activity) is twofold; internal, by which it apprehends Christ with His benefits; external, by which it brings forth good works, the fruits of justice. The ultimate end of theology is eternal beatitude, which consists not only in the intuitive knowledge of God, but also in the enjoyment of the same. (2) Because theology is concerned with man not theoretically, as a subject of demonstration; just as in physics affections are demonstrated of man; but as a subject of operation, or insofar as the sinner is to be freed from his misery and transferred to a most blessed state. (3) Because theology uses the most efficacious means of salvation, the word and sacraments, which are divinely ordained to promote the practice of faith and piety. (4) Because all the duties of a theologian are dispatched by spiritual practice, whether he teaches the divine word, or dispenses the sacraments, or exhorts to the exercises of virtues, or calls away from the baseness of vices, or soothes timid consciences with divine comfort. (5) Because St. Paul himself defines theology as the knowledge of the truth, which is according to godliness, Tit. I, 1.

The antithesis is (1) of the ancient Scholastics (2) of the modern Pontificians, some of whom define theology by doctrine, some by a theoretical habit, some by a mixed habit, whose arguments we shall examine.

(1) Theology is taught and learned. Therefore, theology is a doctrine or discipline. Resp. Theology, considered systematically and secondarily, is taught and learned. Therefore, considered systematically and secondarily, it is a doctrine, or discipline; I grant it. But the question is about theology considered habitually and in its primary sense.

(2) Not all the requisites of wisdom are suited to theology. For it is characteristic of wisdom to be concerned with all things, to be most apt for teaching, to command inferior disciplines, to confirm conclusions from the first principles of knowing, and to establish certain orders of things.

Resp. (1) Generally, I distinguish between eminent and common wisdom. Although not all the requisites of common wisdom suit theology absolutely and simply, it is sufficient that they suit theology, as an eminent wisdom, analogically.

(2) Specifically (a) theology teaches all things in the higher hemisphere, as metaphysics does in the lower hemisphere; it teaches all things contained in the law and the gospel; it teaches all things, because it considers generally the creator and creatures. (b) Theology is most apt for teaching. For it teaches from what principles the salvation of the sinner flows, and by what means he can become a partaker of salvation. (c) Theology, as a queen, commands inferior disciplines, bringing them together with the intellect of man under the obedience of faith and captivating every thought (πᾶν νόημα), 2 Cor. X, 5. From which it happens that true philosophy contains itself within the sphere of the light of nature and its proper object; but being humbly observant of theology, it is its faithful handmaid. (d) Theology refers its conclusions back to the first principle; Whatever the first truth has revealed, that is infallibly certain. (e) What orders you find in the humble house of metaphysics, the same you will also find, but far more sublime, in the vast kingdom of theology. Metaphysics hands down the order of substances and accidents; Theology hands down in just order the distinction of law and gospel, of faith and good works. Cf. D. SCHERZERI, Breviarium Theologicum, p. 5-7.

(3) Wisdom is a theoretical habit. Theology is not a theoretical habit. Therefore, theology is not wisdom. The major premise is established, because wisdom, intelligence, and science are commonly held to be theoretical habits. R. I deny the major. For wisdom in common and considered abstractly is an exceptional science about the most excellent things, referring its conclusions back to the first principles of its domain, whether those principles be theoretical or practical. There exists a moral σοφία (sophia), or φιλοσοφία (philosophia), which without doubt is practical. For what the ancient Greeks called σοφίαν, Pythagoras, the author of the Italic sect, called Φιλοσοφίαν. See LEICHN. De V. Philosophiae Bono, p. 30.

Instance I. If theology is a science, it is surely not wisdom, since they are distinct habits.

Resp. There is a distinction between wisdom and science that is not real, but formal, since wisdom is a species of science, as man is of animal (*).

Instance II. Practical wisdom seems to be an unusual manner of speaking. I respond in the words of D. WILHELM LYSER, an accurate theologian, in his Systema, p. 12, who says: "But if we wish to accommodate theology to the Aristotelian habits, different opinions occur there. For some call it a science because of its certainty; others wisdom because of its dignity; others intelligence because of its knowledge of principles; others, and most, call it practical wisdom, because it so renders a man wise, that he can also communicate it to others." Therefore, that manner of speaking is not unusual, but, in the judgment of the blessed Lyser, is used by most theologians. Compare D. IAC. MARTINI, De Constitutione Theologiae, p. 81 ff. & D. GERHARD, in the proemium prefixed to his Exegesis Theologica, p. 2.

Instance III. Theology can be defined generically by prudence, which by the consent of all is a practical habit. R. Prudence is concerned with particulars and contingents, as Aristotle testifies in Book 1 of his Ethics, c. VI. But theology is concerned with universals and necessities. For it considers any sinner whatsoever in general, insofar as eternal salvation is to be conferred upon the same through universal and necessary means.

Instance IV. To avoid all difficulties, theology can be defined by a practical habit. R. By a practical habit, the nature of theology is not declared sufficiently for what it is. For sometimes, by the usage of speech, a practical habit is understood as that which is the proximate principle of practice or operation, and which, with prior deliberation, prescribes in a particular case what should or should not be done here and now; sometimes, a practical habit is understood as that which is the remote principle of practice, and which, by means of universal conclusions, prescribes in general what should or should not be done. In which latter sense, theology is indeed a practical habit; but a practical habit is a remote genus, by which the dignity of theology is not expressed as is fitting. But if you have defined theology by practical wisdom, you immediately suggest that it deals with sublime and arduous things, and is therefore a far more excellent habit.

4. Whatever discipline is occupied in the knowledge of God, is not practical. But theology is etc. Therefore. The major is established, because God does not fall under human practice, but is known by man only speculatively. R. (a) I distinguish between the general object of the consideration of theology, and the special object of its operation. The former, and indeed the inadequate and primary one, is God; this is the sinner to be saved. (b) I distinguish between γνῶσις (gnosis), or knowledge, and θεωρία (theoria), or speculation. Ἰνῶσις is partly theoretical, partly practical. We know God not speculatively, but practically, so that we may fix all our trust in him, and be wholly carried into the love and worship of him.

5. In a practical science, all conclusions are practical. In theology, not etc. Therefore. The minor is proved, because in theology there are contemplative conclusions, e.g., God is good, omnipotent, etc. The world was created. There are good and evil angels. R. Theological conclusions are either formally or virtually practical. The former are those which formally and directly prescribe some operation pertaining to the worship of God, which man is obliged to perform. e.g., God is to be invoked, the needy neighbor is to be relieved. The latter are those which indeed do not formally prescribe an action pertaining to the worship of God; yet they do much within the scope of theology to infer practical conclusions. e.g., God is good. Therefore, He is to be loved. The world was created. Therefore, the creator is to be celebrated. There are good angels, guardians of men. Therefore, in their presence nothing evil is to be perpetrated. GERHARD says aptly in his Exegesis, p. 2: "All things that are treated in theology pertain to practice, if not immediately and directly, then mediately and indirectly."

6. Archetypal theology is speculative. Therefore, so is ectypal theology. The reason for the consequence is that the latter agrees with the former, as an image with its exemplar. R. Archetypal theology considered formally is practical; for it implies a practical act of the intellect, by which God conceives the knowledge of Himself, as the form of another theology to be communicated with creatures.

7. A practical discipline considers those things which are ἐφ' ἡμῖν (in our power). Theology does not etc. Therefore. The major is clear from ARISTOTLE, Book 1 to Nicomachus, c. 6. The minor is clear, because all of theology depends on the illumination of the holy spirit, Eph. I, 17. R. I distinguish between a human or common practical discipline, and a divine or eminent one. The object of the former are τὰ ἐφ' ἡμῖν (things in our power), of the latter are τὰ θεῖα (divine things), God and divine things.

8. The ultimate formal end of theology, namely the beatific vision of God, is not practice; Therefore revealed theology does not seem to be practical, since every habit has this appellation, that it is called practical, from its end. R. The ultimate end of theology is not only the vision of the intellect, but also the fruition, by which the will most fully perceives the goodness of God, and is most abundantly satisfied. But that fruition is practice.

9. Theology is concerned with things to be believed and things to be done. Therefore, it is a mixed habit, partly theoretical, partly practical. R. To believe does not mean to speculate, but to apply to oneself the grace of God procured by the merit of Christ. Therefore, there is a twofold practice, of faith and of piety. The former is the trustful application of the grace of God, founded on the merit of Christ, and promised in the gospel. The latter is the pursuit of good works, and it flows from the former, as a ray from the sun and a stream from a spring.

Question XIV. Is theology an infused or an acquired habit?

Theology is not an immediately infused habit (a), but it is an acquired habit, indeed by our acts, but elicited by the illumination of the holy spirit (b).

Proof a. Immediately infused habits are conferred all at once in a moment. Thus the apostles in a moment were made theologians for speaking the mighty works of God in various tongues, when on the feast of Pentecost the Holy Spirit was poured out upon them. Acts II, 1. But this gift was extraordinary, the state of those times so requiring it, when the gospel was to be promulgated through the whole world.

Proof b. Today doctrine, meditation, and assiduous labor are needed for the habit of theology to be acquired. But since it is not drawn from the principles of reason, but rests entirely on divine revelation, our intellect, being blind to spiritual things, needs divine illumination to know God and divine things. For that reason theology is called a habit θεόδοτος (given by God), not as if it were conferred on us immediately by God without any study of our own, but because both its principle is divinely given to us, and theology is acquired by the gracious illumination of the Holy Spirit.

Question XV. Who is the author of theology?

Efficient Cause. The author of theology is God (a) the Father (b), the Son (c), and the Holy Spirit (d).

Proof a. Theology is wisdom coming from above, Jas. III, 15. It is said to come from above, because it descends from the Father of lights, i.e., of all light, whether it be the light of nature, or the light of grace, or the light of glory, Jas. I, 17.

Proof b. The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, gives us the spirit of wisdom and of revelation in the knowledge of him. Eph. I, 17. God the Father for this purpose sends the Holy Spirit into our hearts, that he may impress upon our minds the revealed wisdom by which God is known, i.e., theology.

Proof c. No one knows the Father except the Son and anyone to whom the Son chooses to reveal him. Matth. XI, 27. No one comprehensively knows the Father except the Son of God on account of ὁμοουσίαν (consubstantiality), and no one aspires to the revealed θεογνωσίαν (knowledge of God) unless his mind is illuminated by the revelation of the Son of God.

Proof d. No one can say "Jesus is Lord" except in the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. XII, 3. No one acknowledges Christ as Lord, the foundation of all theology, and rightly worships him, unless he is taught by the Holy Spirit.

Question XVI. Of what does the whole system of theology consist?

Material Cause. The whole of theology, systematically considered, consists of theological truths, that is, of principles or conclusions, known or to be deduced from the supernatural revelation of God.

Proof. Every theological truth is either demonstrating or demonstrable. A demonstrating truth is a proposition more known and certain, from which another less known and doubtful is made known and proved, and is called in analytics a principle; a demonstrable truth is a question, or conclusion, which, since it is either not sufficiently clear, or is called into doubt, is to be made known and proved by a demonstrative argument. Now whatever is proposed in theology is either a question, and consequently a conclusion, or a principle of demonstration.

Question XVII. What does theology consider and teach?

Subject Matter. Theology generally considers God, and divine things, insofar as they have been revealed by the first truth to sinful man for believing and for doing (a). Specifically, it teaches by what principles and means man as a traveler, corrupted by sin, is to be led to eternal salvation (b).

Proof a. Whatever the entire scope of theology embraces, is either to be believed, as articles of faith; or to be done, as good works, to which evil works, or sins, are opposed as things to be avoided. What is to be done and believed is the material object of theology, or the object of consideration; for the reason that all theology is occupied in considering, explaining, and asserting them, and they are comprehended under the one name of the Christian religion. The formal object is sought from the revelation of the first truth, or of the most veracious God. For which reason, things to be believed and done are examined in theology, insofar as they have been revealed by the most veracious God, or made manifest by the light of supernatural revelation, which for the present state of the church is the θεόπνευστος (God-breathed) scripture, or divinely inspired, since it testifies of itself, with the Holy Spirit concurring, through its own inherent efficacy, and from it all theological assertions are deduced and confirmed.

Proof b. The special object of theology (which in practical disciplines is also called the subject of operation) is the sinner, insofar as he is to be saved eternally. For (1) in practical habits, among whose number is also theology, the subject of operation is that into which, through certain principles and means, the ultimate end of that practical discipline is to be introduced. But the man subject to sin is to be led to eternal salvation through certain principles and means. (2) To the saving of sinful man, all things which are treated in theology can be referred. For they either constitute sinful man, or they pertain to his end, or eternal salvation, as principles of salvation and means, or their consequences. (3) This special object distinguishes the theology divinely revealed to us sinners (a) from paradisiacal theology, whose object was man in his integrity, or immune from sin. (b) From contemplative philosophy, in which the nature of man is viewed according to natural principles and innate affections. (c) From practical philosophy, in which man is considered as to be made civilly happy. Revealed theology alone considers the sinner, to be led through supernatural principles and means to eternal beatitude.

Question XVIII. What is the end of theology, for the sake of which the theologian works?

End of theology. The ultimate objective end of theology is God, infinitely perfect and supremely good (a). The ultimate formal end is the beatific vision and fruition of God (b). The intermediate internal end is the leading of the sinner to saving faith (c). The intermediate external end is true faith in Christ (d). Which is followed by holiness of life with an inseparable connection (e).

Proof a. God, infinitely perfect and supremely good, most fully satisfies the appetite of man; since in His presence is fullness of joy, and at His right hand are pleasures forevermore. Ps. XVI, 11. And so God is the objective end of theology; because He is that object to which the sinner is to be led by the theologian.

Proof b. from Ps. XVII, 15. As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness. The holy psalmist joins satiety with the vision of God; because our appetite in the heavenly fatherland will perceive the most solid joys from the sight of the most glorious divine majesty, and thus will be fully satisfied with the supreme good. Which vision and fruition of God is called the formal end, because through it we enjoy, are satisfied, and rest in God as the supreme good.

Proof c. The internal end of theology is sought from the operation of the theologian, which is the leading of the sinner to saving faith; from which internal end the specific difference of theology is taken.

Proof d. (1) That which is the intermediate end of sacred scripture, is also the intermediate end of theology. For just as sacred scripture and theology have the same material and formal object; so also the end of both is one and the same. For what S. scripture teaches under divine revelation; that, theology teaches, explains, and defends under divine revelation, and for no other end than that for which the things themselves, with God revealing, were recorded in letters, and to which they themselves by their own nature, or by the benevolent will of the revealing God, tend. But the intermediate end of S. scripture is faith resting on the merit of Christ. This is what the two apostles, John and Paul, teach; the former indeed in his gospel history, ch. XX, 31, saying, these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name. The latter in 2 Tim. III, 15, where he bears witness to his Timothy, that from infancy he had known the holy letters, and he adds: which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus. Both God-breathed (θεόπνευστοι) men join together eternal salvation and faith in Christ, as two subordinate ends, and they attribute to the latter the character of an intermediate end, to the former that of an ultimate end.

(2) By the intermediate end of theology is understood that means of salvation by which we attain the ultimate end, or eternal beatitude. But we attain it through faith, which I show thus; By that means by which we miserable sinners are reconciled to God, and receive the remission of sins, so that we may have God as propitious, by that means we attain eternal beatitude. But by true faith, resting on the merit of Christ, we are reconciled to God, etc. Therefore. The royal Psalmist and Paul confirm the major premise in Ps. XXXII, 1-2 and Rom. IV, 7-8. Blessed are they whose transgressions are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom God will not impute sin. The apostles Peter and Paul establish the minor premise; the former in Acts X, 43. To Christ all the prophets bear witness, that through his name everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins. The latter in Rom. III, 24-25. We are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God put forward as a propitiation by his blood, to be received by faith. From which it is concluded that saving faith is the means of reconciliation with God, strictly called the intermediate end of theology, as the organic cause of attaining eternal beatitude.

Proof e. That the faith which has justified expresses itself through subsequent charity and the pursuit of good works, Paul teaches in Gal. V, 6. In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision has any value. The only thing that counts is faith working through love. Faith fixed in the merit of Christ, which availed to justify the sinner, does not remain sterile or idle, but works through love, sanctifies the justified man, and restores in him the image of God. Whence love toward God and neighbor, holiness of life, and the restoration of the divine image follow faith in Christ by an indivisible bond, and thus pertain to the consequences of the intermediate end of theology, but they are not causes of attaining eternal beatitude.

There are some authors who call holiness of life a concomitant intermediate end of theology, with D. IO. MUSAEUS in his Introductio Theologica, p. 135, or a secondary end with D. HILDEBRAND in his Theologia Dogmatica, p. 21, or a non-causal intermediate end with D. BAIER in his Compendium Theologiae, p. 39. With whom we will not quarrel, since they confess that they take the end of theology in a broader sense.

Question XIX. Who is a theologian?

Subject in which. A theologian in the general sense is said to be a man instructed with the theological habit, by which he is rendered ready to explain and defend the heavenly truth (a). In a special and more excellent sense (*) a theologian is said to be a reborn man, who gives unmovable assent to the first truth revealing the mysteries of faith, and adheres to it with a special trust, apt to teach others and to refute those who contradict (b).

Proof a. (1) From the theological habit one is called a theologian, just as from the logical habit one is named a logician. The apostle confirms this our assertion in Hebr. V, 14, describing a theologian as one who through habit has his senses trained to discern good and evil.

(2) A theologian in a looser sense is one who duly performs the office of a theologian, by explaining, confirming, and defending theological truths, although he may be destitute of sincere holiness of will.

Proof b. (1) In a more eminent sense, a theologian is one who in reality shows himself to be such as he ought to be according to the intention of the holy spirit. For if a civil orator is commonly described as a good man skilled in speaking aptly and ornately, whose moral virtues the most learned Dn. KIRCHMAIER recounts in his Synopsis Oratoriae, p. 36, why should not a theologian be defined as a man regenerated by the Holy Spirit, and renewed, apt to teach, and to refute contradictors? For in the definition, it is right to express the idea of a good and perfect theologian.

(2) Just as a bishop, so also a theologian ought to be irreprehensible. Tit. I, 7.

(3) A reborn theologian assents to the revealing first truth more readily and solidly than a privatively unregenerate theologian. For although the latter is not rarely imbued with a more distinguished knowledge of theological matters than the former; yet the regenerate gives a special and fiducial assent to the most veracious word of God, so that he rests in it entirely; but the hypocrite gives a general assent to the divine word, not a special and fiducial one. Compare D. QUENSTED. Theologia Didactico-Polemica, part. IV. fol. 284.

Obs. The unregenerate is a man devoid of true faith in Christ, and is either negatively or privatively unregenerate. Negatively and simply unregenerate is he who has never been led to conceive faith in Christ, neither through baptism, nor through the preaching of the gospel, such as is a Gentile, a Turk, a Tartar, a Jew neither baptized, nor reborn through the proposition and explanation of the divine word. Privatively and in a certain respect unregenerate is he who was truly regenerated, and endowed with saving faith, but through willful sins has made a shipwreck of faith; who, by feigning to be truly reborn, acts the hypocrite; he confesses that he knows God, but in deeds denies Him, Tit. I, 16. Compare D. SONTAGII Fanaticismus, pag. 37.

Question XX. Is piety to be cultivated by the theologian with the highest zeal?

Piety, a necessary requisite of a perfect theologian. A true theologian should cultivate piety with his whole heart, sincere and without pretense.

Proof. D. HILSEMANN says excellently in his Methodus Studii Theologici annexed to the method of preaching, p. 254: "Piety toward God and neighbor is necessary above all in a future theologian, 1 Tim. IV, 7-8. For this is the foundation upon which the whole structure is to be imposed. If anyone chooses to do the will of my Father, he will know about my teaching, whether it is from God, are the words of Christ, John VIII, 17. Cf. 1 John II, 3; Sir. XXXII, 20. For it is not to be thought that theology is only a habit of the mind, or an apprehension of knowable things, such as the devils have; but that it is a practical habit, which ought to be applied by the one who knows for the benefit of his own and others' souls. Such a thing does not enter a malicious soul, and a body subject to sin. Wis. I, 4. Those who are to handle sacred things ought to be washed clean in heart and body from the filth of sins. Exod. XL, 12, 31-32. For the word of God is a consuming fire for those who approach burning with a strange fire of desires. Lev. X, 1-2. And such jangling bells for others, but not for themselves, 1 Cor. XIII, 1, were long ago cursed by God. Ps L, 16 ff." D. QUENSTED. relates things similar to these in his Theologia Didactica, tom. 1, fol. 16: "Those who are theologians in fact and in name, i.e., who are not only instructed with the theological habit, as it were, but are also at the same time reborn, or faithful and pious, in them theology is not only from the Holy Spirit, but also with the Holy Spirit, and is conjoined with his gracious indwelling."

(*) How falsely M. LUDOV GERARDUS interpreted this, S. v. IO. GEORG. WALCHIUS notes, in his excellent book; Einleitung in die Streitigkeiten in der Ev. Kirche (Introduction to the Controversies in the Evangelical Church), P. III. p. 263.

Question XXI. What is the nature of the theological knowledge of a faithful and pious theologian?

Distinction between literal and spiritual theological knowledge. The theological knowledge of a truly reborn and renewed theologian is not merely literal, as is that of an unregenerate man, who through voluntary and reigning sins has fallen from the state of grace (a); but it is spiritual, applied to spiritual use, and conjoined with spiritual and pious motions of the heart (b).

Obs. The distinction of theological knowledge into literal and spiritual is of no small moment, provided it be skillfully explained. Far be it from us to state with the fanatics that spiritual theological knowledge proceeds either from the immediate illumination of the Holy Spirit, or from an internal light of the soul, or reminiscence, through introversion into the inner recesses of the soul, or that it knows only the mystical sense! We know that the literal sense of the biblical sayings (logically so called) is intended proximately and immediately by the God-breathed (θεοπνεύτοις) words of the Holy Spirit. For which reason, literal theological knowledge is so called when in investigation, development, and cognition it is not transferred to the use intended by the Holy Spirit. Spiritual theological knowledge is that by which the literal sense of the biblical sayings is transferred to the use intended by the Holy Spirit, and produces spiritual and pious motions of the heart.

Proof a. Christ says: love your enemies Matth. V, 44. A theologian burning with hatred for his enemy perceives the literal sense of the savior's words, but his knowledge is not translated into the living practice intended by Christ, nor is his heart affected with love for the enemy (which is a pious motion, or affection, of the heart). His knowledge is therefore merely literal, of which Christ says in Luc. XII, 47: That servant, etc.

Proof b. The spiritual knowledge of divine things is so called (1) by reason of its origin; because it is elicited from S. scripture through the full and perfect (for the state of this life) illumination of the Holy Spirit. (2) By reason of its object, because he has received τὰ πνεύματος τῷ Θεῷ (the things of the Spirit of God), 1 Cor. II, 14. (3) By reason of its subject, because it is in a soul reborn through the Holy Spirit. (4) By reason of the end, intended and obtained by the Holy Spirit, because it is translated to the use ordained by the Holy Spirit. (5) By reason of the spiritual and pious motions of the heart, of which it is fecund.

You say: Literal theological knowledge is also spiritual, because (1) its principle of knowing (the divine word) is spiritual. (2) It proceeds from an imperfect illumination of the Holy Spirit, since the light of the Holy Spirit is joined with S. scripture by an indivisible bond. From which SEB. SCHMIDIUS in his later Collegium Biblicum says on p. 164: "The natural man, considered absolutely, is such that he receives nothing, or grasps nothing of those things which are of the Spirit of God; meanwhile the φυσικός (natural man) can be subjectively spiritual, who understands something of those things which are of the spirit of God, not indeed as such, but as he is already imperfectly illuminated by the spirit of God." (3) By the intention of the Holy Spirit it is destined, or ordained, for a salutary use.

Resp. Spiritual theological knowledge, as contradistinguished from literal knowledge, is here taken in a stricter sense, as we have lucidly shown. But if anyone, for the reasons adduced, wishes to call the literal knowledge of S. scripture spiritual in a broader sense, and κατὰ τι (in some respect), according to something, or in a certain respect, we shall have no quarrel with him. But the knowledge of divine things is called strictly and simply spiritual, which is not only drawn from the word of God, but also arises from the full and perfect illumination of the Holy Spirit, sufficient for faith in Christ, and is not only destined for a salutary use, but is also actually applied and translated to it. This is conjoined with spiritual and pious motions of the heart, e.g., with trust in Christ, love and fear of God, charity toward the neighbor, desire for heavenly goods; flight from sins, contempt for the vanities of this world, etc. It is called by St. Paul σοφία καὶ σύνεσις πνευματική (wisdom and spiritual understanding), spiritual wisdom and intelligence, Col. I, 9. To which the candidate of theology, prevented by the Holy Spirit, should aspire and strive with the greatest contention of mind; for this is a living θεογνωσία (knowledge of God), apprehending Christ, the life of the soul, and showing itself to be alive in practice; this is salutary in the second complete act, because it brings salvation to the soul anxious about its sins and longing for divine grace; whence it is called γνῶσις τῆς σωτηρίας (knowledge of salvation) in Luc. I, 77, which before God makes all believers θεοδιδάκτους (taught by God), and not only wise, but also just. See Isa. LIII, 11; Jer. IX, 23; 1 Cor. I, 30; John VI, 44, 47. This is practical and efficacious knowledge, consisting more in affection than in cognition, of which Paul says, 1 Cor. VIII, 2-3: If anyone thinks that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know; but if anyone loves God, he is known by him. Cf. 1 John II, 4.

Question XXII. What is the nature of the knowledge of God and divine things in the intellect of an unregenerate man, who is imperfectly illuminated by the Holy Spirit through sacred scripture?

The knowledge of God, and of the divine mysteries in the intellect of an unregenerate man, imperfectly and as it were pedagogically illuminated by the holy spirit through sacred scripture, is not absolutely spiritual, but literal (a). Which literal knowledge is not natural, or carnal, but supernatural (b), and can be considered and called spiritual in a certain respect and according to something (c).

The antithesis is of (1) the Schwenckfeldians and Weigelians, who state that all knowledge of God and divine things drawn from the sacred letters, both by a regenerate and an unregenerate man, is literal, natural, and carnal. For thus writes SCHWENCKFELD in his tract on sacred scripture, fol. 7: "No one will draw the Spirit, nor spiritual wisdom, from the dead letters, no one will obtain the heavenly light from scripture, nor grasp the living truth from the image, just as no one can fetch heaven from the earth." WEIGEL in his Postilla, P. I, p. 130, says: "The knowledge of Christ, or saving faith, is not a written human science, since they learn their faith from men, whereas it must be learned from God." (2) Of other mystics. For HOBURGIUS in his Postilla Mystica, P. II, p. 287, says: "From an external conviction through the external word there follows only an external faith," which external faith he calls natural in P. I, p. 430: "See that the Pentecost Spirit come upon you, that he may dye your carnal heart, regenerate you, he can make your natural faith into a supernatural faith and trust." (3) Of the Quakers, who deny that spiritual knowledge of God is obtained from the meditation of S. scripture. BARCLAY in his Apology, ad Th. II, n. 1, p. 4, says: "We distinguish between a certain knowledge of God, and an uncertain one; between spiritual science, and literal; between the saving knowledge of the heart and the empty and airy knowledge of the brain. We confess that the latter can be acquired in very many ways; but we hold that no one can attain the former except by the internal, immediate manifestation, and revelation of the divine spirit shining in the heart, and illuminating the intellect." (4) Of the Socinians and Arminians, who assert that S. scripture can be understood salutarly without the illumination of the holy spirit. Thus OSTORODUS, Institutio Germanica, c. 1, fol. 3 & 4: "We hold that all those err very grossly and dangerously, who hold that the holy scripture can in no way work faith and obedience in men without a preceding internal enlightenment and special revelation of the holy Spirit." EPISCOPIUS, on the perspicuity of scripture I. 3, says: "Even any unregenerate person cannot but perceive the sense of scripture."

Exposition

Obs. I. The unregenerate man is also called ψυχικός (psychikos), or animalis (natural), 1 Cor. II, 14, and is described by D. SEB. SCHMIDIO in his later Collegium Biblicum, p. 176, as he who is left to himself and to nature; but the spiritual man is he who is not left to his own nature, but has the help and grace of the holy spirit.

Obs. II. The unregenerate, or natural, man, according to the same SCHMIDT, is considered either absolutely and in general, or in particular and subjectively. The unregenerate, or natural, man, considered absolutely, grasps none of those things that are of the Spirit of God; meanwhile, one can be subjectively natural, who understands something of those things that are of the Spirit of God; not indeed as such, but as he is already imperfectly illuminated by the Holy Spirit. We are not speaking at present of the unregenerate man as such, or viewed according to his natural powers, but considered according to the supernatural grace of the Holy Spirit, by which he is imperfectly and as it were pedagogically illuminated. By the grace of the Holy Spirit, however, we do not here understand inhabiting grace, but assisting, prevenient, preparing, and exciting grace.

Obs. III. The unregenerate man either was in a state of grace and regeneration, but through willful sins has fallen from it, and is called privatively unregenerate; or he has never been reborn through baptism and the divine word. This one either contemns and disdains the church of Christ, and is called negatively and absolutely unregenerate; or, prevented by the Holy Spirit, called to the church, and placed under the dispensation of assisting grace and divine impulse, he is constituted. This one tends toward regeneration. In the present question, we are asking partly about the privatively unregenerate as such, and partly about him who indeed has never been reborn, but is tending toward regeneration.

Obs. IV. The distinction of theological knowledge into literal and spiritual is customary in the orthodox church. D. LUTHER used it, tom. III, Altenburg, f. 167, PHILIP MELANCHTHON in his Loci Communes, and from him HEMMING in his Enchiridion Theologicum, Class II, c. 9, D. HOEPFNERUS, Loci Theologici, locus III, p. 73, D. HUNNIUS on 1 Cor. II, 24, D. FEUERBORN in Anti-Osterodo, disp. II, p. 18, D. BALDWIN on 1 Cor. II, 14, D. GERHARD in his Exegesis Locorum Communium, on sacred scripture c. 20, §. 434, and others.

Obs. V. The distinction of the knowledge of the creed into literal and spiritual must be skillfully understood. For we do not call that knowledge spiritual which is had from the immediate illumination of the Holy Spirit, or from an internal light immediately revealing, which the fanatics imagine, or from a mystical sense, which some call spiritual; but that which, drawn from sacred scripture concerning the divine mysteries, is rightly applied according to the intention of the Holy Spirit. Thus, literal theological knowledge is that by which a man knows God and the divine mysteries from the sayings of sacred scripture, rightly understood according to their true sense, although he may not always apply this knowledge to the salutary use intended by the Holy Spirit; but spiritual knowledge is the cognition of God and divine things drawn from the sacred letters, applied to the use intended by the Holy Spirit; and conjoined with spiritual and pious motions of the heart. The former is called theoretical by some, the latter practical.

Obs. VI. Literal theological knowledge is either external, by which one considers the words of scripture, insofar as they have an analogy with human words, according to the precepts of grammar and rhetoric, and from these investigates and elicits some sense of them; or internal, by which one duly weighs the words of scripture as truly divine, and δοχεῖα (receptacles), receptacles, or vehicles, of the mysteries of faith, and apprehends their true literal sense, conformed to the mind of the Holy Spirit, with a solid and certain concept. We assert that supernatural grace is needed not for obtaining external, but internal literal knowledge. Let us hear D. CALOVIUS tom. X of his Systema Theologicum, p. 131, distinguishing excellently, as is his wont: "A distinction must be made between the bare words themselves in themselves, outside the context, and the same viewed in context; between the divine words, insofar as they are truly divine, and are δοχεῖα of spiritual things, and of the divine, God-breathed (θεοπνεύστου) sense; likewise between some sense of the words, and the true sense, conformed to the mind of the Holy Spirit, or as the blessed HUNNIUS says, the solid and certain concept of the words of the Holy Spirit, which to wish to ascribe to a dark and blind intellect, such as that of the unregenerate outside the grace of the Holy Spirit is, what else is it than to attribute the vision of colors to the blind?" We do not deny that the external literal knowledge of the sayings of scripture can be acquired by the natural powers of unregenerate reason, and so it is of no use to dispute at length about it.

Obs. VII. We speak not only of simple literal knowledge, but also of approbative knowledge, or of the historical and literal assent, which the unregenerate man, imperfectly illuminated by the Holy Spirit, gives to the words of S. scripture, and indeed not of a human assent, but one divinely persuaded. Cf. D. HÜLSEMANN, De Auxiliis Gratiae, p. 206.

Obs. VIII. The hinge of the controversy turns on this: (a) whether the unregenerate man, not as such, but as imperfectly illuminated by the Holy Spirit, has a spiritual knowledge of the divine mysteries; (b) whether internal literal knowledge is natural or supernatural; (c) whether the same can be considered and called spiritual in a certain respect?

Confirmation

Proof a. That the literal knowledge of the articles of faith in the intellect of an impious man is not absolutely and simply spiritual, is proved: (1) because by the most accurate theologians the spiritual knowledge of the articles of faith is opposed to the literal; but opposites cannot be affirmed of themselves. (2) The literal knowledge of God and divine things differs not a little from the spiritual. (a) Because the former proceeds from an imperfect illumination of the Holy Spirit, the latter from a perfect one, sufficient for faith; the former is in a soul indeed prevented by the Holy Spirit, but not yet perfectly regenerated; the latter is in a fully reborn soul, which lives by faith in Christ, Gal. II, 20. (b) The former is indeed divinely ordained for a salutary use, but not yet translated to it in the second act; the latter is applied to the use intended by the Holy Spirit. (c) The former produces some spiritual motions of the heart (e.g., compunction of soul, detestation of sin, sorrow for what has been committed, etc.) but not yet pious motions, (of which kind there are none in an unregenerate man, since he is devoid of faith); The latter is conjoined with more abundant motions, both spiritual and truly pious, e.g., with trust in Christ, love and fear of God, charity toward the neighbor, peace of conscience, spiritual joy, hope of divine help, desire for heavenly goods, etc. From which it is also called efficacious knowledge, because it is fecund with holy affections; also living, because it apprehends Christ, the life of the soul, and shows itself living in practice itself; and also salutary in the second complete act; because it brings salvation to the soul anxious for its sins and longing for divine grace. Whence it is called γνῶσις τῆς σωτηρίας (knowledge of salvation), Luc. I, 77, which before God makes all believers θεοδιδάκτους (taught by God), and not only wise, but also just. Isa. LIII, 11; Jer. IX, 23; 1 Cor. I, 30.

The distinction between the literal and spiritual knowledge of the creed can be lucidly perceived from a certain biblical saying. Paul says in Gal. V, 6: In Christ Jesus neither circumcision has any value, nor uncircumcision, but faith working through charity. An unregenerate man, not of himself, but from the illumination of the Holy Spirit, can, when he reads and meditates on this oracle attentively, know its true sense, conformed to the mind of the Holy Spirit, with a certain and solid concept; but because he does not apply it to the use intended by the Holy Spirit, so as to truly believe, and to love God and his neighbor, his knowledge is not spiritual, but literal. But if, under the direction and special concurrence of the Holy Spirit, the application to the due use were to be added, he would be made truly regenerate from unregenerate.

Proof b. Internal literal knowledge (the question is not about external) is not natural, but supernatural.

(1) By reason of origin. For that knowledge whose principle of knowing is not the natural light, but the light of supernatural revelation, is, by reason of origin, supernatural. But the literal knowledge of God and divine things in an unregenerate man etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because cognition is rightly distinguished according to the principles of knowing. For natural knowledge is so called, which is kindled from the light of nature; but supernatural knowledge is that which is obtained from the light of supernatural revelation. But if an unregenerate man were to know the mysteries of faith from the principles of reason, such knowledge would certainly be natural. If Keckermann had been able to demonstrate the mystery of the Trinity from logical and metaphysical principles, which indeed he attempted, the cognition of so stupendous a mystery would have to be considered natural. But that his attempt was in vain, D. IO. MUSAEUS shows in Disputation I, adjoined to the tract on the use of the principles of reason.

(2) By reason of the object. Whatever knowledge has an object, both material and formal, far superior or more sublime than the principles of reason, cannot be obtained by the natural powers of the intellect. But internal literal knowledge etc. Therefore. The major is established; because there ought to be a certain proportion or congruence between the power of knowing and its object, so that the latter can be reached by the former. Why cannot my eye see a spirit? The reason is; because there is no natural proportion between the faculty of seeing and an immaterial object. The minor is proved; because the object of literal knowledge is the mysteries of faith. But what is a mystery, if not a dogma transcending the grasp of reason left to itself? The formal object is special divine revelation. For no one has ever seen God; except the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has explained him to us. John I, 18. No one knows the Father, except the Son, and he to whom the Son wishes to reveal him. Matth. XI, 27. Flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Matth. XVI, 17.

You object: A distinction must be made between the understanding of words and of things. Literal knowledge is immediately and proximately concerned with the words of scripture, taken from the customary usage of speech; which therefore the natural man can learn from usage without supernatural grace. Resp. External literal knowledge is concerned with the words of scripture, insofar as they have an analogy with human words, for which supernatural grace is not necessarily required; but internal literal knowledge knows the words of scripture, insofar as they are truly divine, and δοχεῖα (receptacles), or vehicles of divine things. Therefore he who does not understand these, does not grasp their true sense.

(3) That internal literal knowledge is supernatural due to the ἀδυναμίαν (inability), or impotence of the intelligent subject, we prove (a) from the saying of Paul in 1 Cor. II, 14. The natural man does not receive the things that are of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned. The apostle teaches that the ψυχικός (natural) man, who follows only the judgment of his reason, does not receive (οὐ δέχεται) the τὰ τοῦ πνεύματος (things of the spirit), the divine mysteries, or things of faith, which were handed down by the Holy Spirit through the prophets and apostles, with assent, or by judging does not approve, since he cannot even know (γινῶναι) them, and indeed for two reasons. The first is taken from the corruption of human nature; because the unregenerate man, as such, laughs at the divine mysteries as μωρίαν (foolishness), i.e., as most absurd. The second is taken from the condition of the divine mysteries, which far transcend the grasp of the natural man, and do not admit of a ψυχικὸν (natural) judge, because they are spiritually discerned (πνευματικῶς ἀνακρίνεται), i.e., they are discerned by the power of the spirit, or by an intellect illuminated by the Holy Spirit, and from principles dictated by the Holy Spirit. (b) These things can be confirmed by an induction of biblical sayings, which embrace divine mysteries. John says in his gospel ch. I, 14: The Word was made flesh. Can an unregenerate man, left to himself, perceive the genuine sense of these words intended by the Holy Spirit, and approve it with historical assent? By no means. Paul says in Acts XX,

28: God purchased the church with his own blood. Can the natural man, by the powers of unilluminated reason, apprehend this stupendous mystery, which the apostle inculcates upon us? Surely it is foolishness to him (μωρία αὐτῷ ἐστίν). What? Even the disciples of Christ themselves, occupied with a preconceived opinion of the earthly kingdom of the Messiah, did not understand the very clear words of Christ about the passion and death of the redeemer, then imminent. Luc. XVIII, 31. Therefore Christ, risen from the dead, opened their mind, that they might understand the scriptures. Luc. XXIV, 45. The meaning of Christ is not obscure (the words are of D. HÜLSEMANN, De Auxiliis Gratiae, p. 205), John III, 16: For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life. But that any pagan should thence gather, with certain knowledge, requisite for saving faith, that by God is to be understood God the father, by the only begotten son the son begotten from the essence of the father from eternity, by the world all mortals whatsoever, by believing, a fiducial certainty in his merit, etc., and that he should be necessarily compelled to understand this from the evidence of the object, is inconsistent (ἀνακόλουθον). But when the gentile afterwards reads, meditates, compares parallel places, in this reading, meditation, and comparison, and through this, the Holy Spirit is efficacious and impresses the native character of this sentence on the reader. (c) Upon the eyes of the minds of the unregenerate, a veil of ignorance and prejudiced opinion is imposed, which, unless it be removed by Christ, prevents the divine sense of the celestial oracles from being understood. Paul teaches this in 2 Cor. III, 14: Their minds were hardened; for to this day the same veil remains unlifted in the reading of the old testament (which is taken away in Christ). We conclude: Those upon whose eyes of the mind a veil is imposed, do not perceive the literal sense of even the clearest words of scripture without the supernatural grace of Christ. But upon the eyes of the minds of both Jews and gentiles etc. Therefore. The major is proved, because just as for vision is required both the perspicuity of the object and the removal of the veil; so for the understanding of the sacred letters the perspicuity of the object is not sufficient, but at the same time is required the removal of prejudices and of ignorance, effected by a certain divine power and supernatural grace.

(4) Literal knowledge is supernatural, because of the indivisible conjunction of the Holy Spirit and scripture. Hence the argument; If the internal literal knowledge of the articles of faith is not supernatural, the Holy Spirit will not be perpetually and indivisibly united with the sacred scripture. But the Holy Spirit is perpetually and indivisibly united with the S. scripture. Therefore, the internal literal knowledge of the articles of faith is supernatural. The consequence is evident; because the Holy Spirit indivisibly united with the divine word produces a supernatural effect. But it is most certain that the Holy Spirit is inseparably conjoined with the S. scripture. For Christ says; The words that I speak to you, they are spirit, and they are life, John VI, 63, because they are animated with spirit and life. But the words which Christ spoke exist in scripture. The apostle, when he proposed those things which are now read in the scriptures, professed that he was bringing what the Holy Spirit teaches, 1 Cor. II, 13. But if, when the apostle was teaching the scripture, the Holy Spirit was teaching, there must be a close union between the Holy Spirit and the scripture. Therefore, when an unregenerate man reads and meditates on the sacred scripture attentively, the Holy Spirit kindles a supernatural knowledge of the articles of faith in his intellect.

(5) The literal knowledge of the divine mysteries is supernatural, by reason of the end to which it is divinely ordained. For all knowledge of the sacred letters can make a man wise unto salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus, 2 Tim. III, 15, which end is undoubtedly supernatural.

Proof c. Although the knowledge of God and divine things is not absolutely spiritual (as was shown above), yet according to something and in a certain respect it can be called spiritual (a) by reason of the principle of knowing, because it flows from the God-breathed (θεοπνεύσῳ) scripture, 2 Tim. III, 16. (b) By reason of the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, which is indivisibly conjoined with scripture. (c) By reason of the object, because it is concerned with τὰ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ θεοῦ (the things of the spirit of God), 1 Cor. II, 14. (d) By reason of the end, because it is divinely ordained for spiritual faith, that a man may be converted, regenerated, justified, renewed, and saved, John XX, 31. From which arises the argument;

That knowledge which flows from a spiritual principle of knowing, is obtained from the illumination of the Holy Spirit, is concerned with a spiritual object, and is divinely ordained to a spiritual end; that knowledge is in every way spiritual according to something and in a certain respect. But the literal knowledge of the articles of faith etc. Therefore. D. IO. ADAM OSIANDER, a piously learned theologian, adds, as they say, a white stone to our cause, who in his Collegium Theologicum Systematicum, part. IV, p. 335, writes; "Although the powers of assisting grace (whose effect is the literal knowledge of the articles of faith) are new and spiritual; yet they are not such, except with respect to the efficient cause, the divine intention, and the end to be obtained, inasmuch as they proceed from the Holy Spirit, and are directed to a spiritual end; although they do not yet constitute a spiritually living man." Because literal knowledge does not yet constitute the sinner as spiritually alive, it is not called absolutely and simply spiritual. The same opinion is held by D. FECHTIUS, whose most memorable words are read in a manuscript collection; "Something is called spiritual in a twofold way (1) that which is from the Spirit acting, although He does not obtain everything that He intends through the action. And thus every sense of scripture, and its knowledge, is spiritual. It is taken thus in John VI, 63, where even those words of Christ are said to be spirit and life, which fall upon an unregenerate person, v. 64, which words, namely, although they are understood by him, and are even approved with assent, yet are not transferred to the use of true conversion and piety. (2) Then, that is called spiritual which has plainly admitted the operation of the Holy Spirit, according to his entire intention, and so is from the Holy Spirit both operatively and applicatively. And thus theologians have admitted a certain literal knowledge, i.e., consisting in the sense of the letter, and not tending to its use and application, and another spiritual, which namely has left room for the operating Spirit everywhere, in a sense, as is clear from the description itself, plainly different from the opinion of the fanatics."

Resolution of Objections

The dissenters object I. Literal knowledge cannot be called supernatural from a supernatural principle of knowing; because that principle (S. scripture) is outside of man.

But from a principle which is outside of man, knowledge, which is in man, cannot derive its denomination. Resp. Every principle of knowing, formally considered, insofar as it is actually applied, is in the intellect, and therefore in man. For the principle of knowing is a universal proposition, prior and more known than the thesis to be demonstrated, as defined by LEICHNER in his Synopsis Veritatis Apodicticae, p. 391. But whatever is known to man, that is in his intellect, and therefore in man himself. And how will he elicit a certain conclusion from a biblical saying, who does not comprehend it with his mind?

II. From a supernatural object, the knowledge which is occupied with it cannot be called supernatural. For a denomination is not made from the object; otherwise the science which is concerned with silver would have to be called silvern; that which is occupied with gold, golden, which is absurd. Resp. In the denomination of a science, one must look not only to the material object, but to the formal. Therefore, just as the cognition of silver, insofar as it is presented to the senses, is called sensual; so the cognition of God, insofar as it becomes known from supernatural revelation, is rightly called supernatural.

III. Whatever scripture is perspicuous, that can be easily understood without the supernatural light of divine grace. But S. scripture is etc. Therefore. Resp. I deny the major premise. And by the same reasoning I argue: Whatever star is most brilliant, that can be seen by every eye. But the sun is etc. Therefore, the sun can be seen by every blind, closed, or veiled eye. Since this is absurd (ἄτοπον), a distinction must be made between the perspicuity of the object and the capacity of the subject. Sacred scripture is perspicuous in itself; but through it the Holy Spirit removes the veil of ignorance when the reader or hearer does not maliciously and morosely resist, but admits the illuminating grace.

IV. Hypocrites know the literal sense of S. scripture without supernatural grace. Resp. Hypocrites have perceived the sense of scripture not of themselves, or by the natural powers of their intellect, but by the prevenient, preparing, and exciting grace of the Holy Spirit, not as hypocrites (because hypocrisy presupposes knowledge of that thing which one feigns to approve, or dissembles to disapprove), but as docile auditors, or readers of the divine word; under which reading or hearing the Holy Spirit is always efficacious, so as to instill the true sense of his word. See HULSEMAN, De Auxiliis Gratiae, p. 234.

V. Heretics, who are not illuminated by the Holy Spirit, understand scripture. Resp. Heretics are considered either reduplicatively, as they are heretics, or erring in the foundation of faith; to this extent they infer a sense into scripture, not elicit it from it; they do not grasp the sense which the words of scripture give forth of themselves, but they affix a foreign, non-analogous one to the biblical text; or the same are viewed specifically; insofar as they are docile, and sometimes elicit the true sense of scripture; thus the Holy Spirit does not deny them grace illuminating as it were pedagogically.

VI. Experience testifies that the nature of sacred discourse is the same as that of common discourse, since it is learned, understood, and treated by men in a plainly human way. Ergo. The unregenerate man can understand the literal sense of scripture by the natural powers of his own genius, without assisting supernatural grace. Resp. I distinguish between the external and internal literal knowledge of the articles of faith. The question here is not whether sacred discourse, insofar as it has an analogy or agreement with other discourses, can be understood without the assisting grace of God; for we readily grant this, and we give immortal thanks to the thrice-good God, that he has handed down the articles of faith to us in perspicuous discourse, which bears a common habit with other discourses; otherwise it would be of no use for converting unregenerate men. But this is the question: whether an unregenerate man can, from sacred discourse, understand the very mysteries of faith without the assisting grace of the Holy Spirit, and approve them with solid assent? This is what we deny and deny again. Which we prove with examples. A virgin shall conceive and bear a son. Isa. VII, 14. It is a perspicuous discourse and analogous to other common discourses. For almost all know what the word 'virgin' signifies, what 'to conceive' and 'to bear' mean. But the connection of that proposition, which contains the highest mystery, no one knows with a solid concept, and approves with firm assent, unless the Holy Spirit, with illuminating grace, has enlightened his intellect, and elevated it above its natural powers. Likewise; God was manifested in the flesh, 1 Tim. III, 16. What the words 'God,'

'was manifested,' 'flesh' denote, no one is ignorant, since they are taken from common discourse. But the admittedly great mystery (ὁμολογουμένως μέγα μυστήριον) which is exhibited by these words, no one understands, except a docile reader, whose intellect the Holy Spirit, who is indivisibly conjoined with the divine word and instills its true sense in readers who do not maliciously resist, pervades with supernatural light.

Instance. A man endowed with a perspicacious genius, imbued with the more humane letters, and applying due effort in all disciplines, philosophy, medicine, and jurisprudence, can perceive the most difficult things without the supernatural grace of the Holy Spirit. Why not also in theology? Resp. The reason is different. For those things which in other disciplines are handed down as difficult at first sight, are not beyond the sphere of reason left to itself; but in theology mysteries are proposed, which so transcend the grasp of the unilluminated reason, that they seem to it foolishness (μωρία), i.e., folly, or most stupid and absurd things. Justin Martyr judged the mystery of the Holy Trinity to be ὑπὲρ νοῦν, ὑπὲρ λόγον, καὶ ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν κατάληψιν (beyond mind, beyond reason, and beyond all comprehension). I would affirm the same of all the mysteries which revealed theology teaches. But whatever is above the comprehension of the intellect, the intellect does not perceive, unless it be elevated beyond its natural powers by divine grace.

VII. The knowledge of simple apprehension of things, signified by the words of scripture, is natural, and falls also to unregenerated men, gentiles and pagans, who indeed are knowledgeable in the language in which S. scripture is consigned, and have known the force of the words' meaning and their grammatical construction. For it depends on merely natural causes, namely on the native force of the words, by which, as in any other speech spoken aloud, or written, so in S. scripture, read, or proposed by the voice of a teacher, in a connatural way, with the intervention of the senses, they penetrate to the intellect; and being known in their signifying force, which they have from imposition, they move the intellect by their signifying force, again in a connatural way, to excite and rightly coordinate the pre-existing species of the things of which they are signs. Which species, by this very fact that they pre-exist in the intellect before the words of scripture are perceived, are natural. Resp. The intelligible species which the revealed word of God introduces into minds are not natural, but are supernatural, both by reason of their origin, being impressed by the Holy Spirit through the supernatural word, so that they may be proportionate to the spiritual things which they represent to the intellect, and by reason of the celestial truths which they express, and by reason of the end, intended by the Holy Spirit in their impression. Nor do the intelligible species of the divine mysteries pre-exist in the intellect before the words of scripture are perceived. What intelligible species, I ask, of the virgin birth, of the incarnation of the λόγος (Word), of one essence in three divine persons, pre-exists in the intellect before the words of scripture are perceived?

VIII. Most learned theologians, e.g., HOEPFNERUS, Loci Theologici, locus III, p. 13, DANNHAVER, Theologia Conscientiaria, part. II, p. 438, and others have asserted that the literal understanding of scripture can be obtained without special illumination. Resp. Those theologians spoke of the external and superficial understanding of scripture, not of the solid literal knowledge of the articles of faith joined with assent. They attribute this to the assisting grace of God. We cite as a witness D. IOANN. ADAM. OSIANDR. in his Collegium Systematicum, part. IV, p. 335, who says: "The first degree of prevenient and assisting grace is the objective illumination in the preaching of the word, or strictly so called, with the application of the special object revealed by grace to the individual. The second degree of the same is the actual inhibition and restraint of natural repugnance. The third, finally, is the dispensation of literal knowledge and historical assent to the gospel, not a general trust in God, and the production of contrition by means of the law." Nor do we pass over D. DANNHAVERUM, Phenomena IX, distinguishing excellently, as is his wont; "All actual grace, otherwise the actual help of grace, which is not an infused habit, but a motion, impulse, drawing, opening, Apoc. III, 20; Acts XVI, 14; John VI, 44, is (1) prevenient and incipient, drawing, exciting, inviting, impelling, knocking, by which it illuminates the intellect to the acknowledgment and detestation of sin, removes original repugnance; Eph. V, 14; Apoc. III, 20. (2) operating, opening, which besides excitation, produces assent, desire, the powers of believing, the purpose of conversion, Luc. VIII, 13; c. XIII, 17; Acts XIII, 48; c. II, 37, and opens the heart, Acts XVI, 14, to which, if a man does not resist, grace follows; (3) perfecting, Phil. I, 6." Let us also hear D. KOENIG in his Theologia Positiva, thus teaching: §. 503 ff. "Conversion happens successively, Mark IV, 27-28, and hence it has its degrees, in numbering and naming which the doctors vary greatly. For us the first degree is and is called the grace of the beginner etc. This grace is otherwise called prevenient, taking the term more strictly. The second degree is the grace of the preparer etc. The third degree is the grace of the exciter, which is the universal dispensation of divine affection, by which the Holy Spirit produces in man the literal knowledge of the articles of faith with historical assent, and the supernatural powers of acknowledging sin from the law, of assenting salutarily to the word of the gospel, and of believing in Christ, by means of the word." More fully does D. QUENSTED explain these things in his Systema Theologicum, part. III, c. VII, p. 45, and adds: "The literal knowledge of the Gospel can in no way be had without grace, much less therefore can anyone assent to it historically." We will not adduce more authors at present, but will conclude with the words of the Formula of Concord, p. 657: "Although human reason, or the natural intellect of man, has remaining a certain obscure spark of the knowledge that there is a God, and holds some particle of the law: yet that reason is so ignorant, blind, and perverse, that even if the most ingenious and most learned men in this world read or hear the gospel of the Son of God, and the divine promises of eternal salvation; yet they cannot perceive, understand, believe, and hold them to be true by their own powers."

Instance. Historical assent seems to be only human, since divine assent belongs only to the regenerate. Resp. Historical assent is not human, because it rests proximately not on the testimony of men, but on the divinely revealed word. That the regenerate, however, assent to the divine word with greater certainty, is placed beyond all shadow of a doubt.

IX. The unregenerate man perceives the grammatical and external sense, for which he does not need divine illumination, but not the spiritual and internal one. For D. QUENSTED teaches that a distinction must be made between the grammatical and external sense, and the spiritual, internal, and divine sense of the word of God. The former is the formal aspect of the word of God, insofar as it is a word; the latter insofar as it is the divine word; The former can be perceived by anyone, even the unregenerate; but the latter only by an illuminated intellect.

Resp. D. QUENSTED, in the cited place, considers the divine word in two ways (a) generally, and in a specificative sense, as it denotes a word, or discourse, common with any other discourse, whose individual words have their significations to be judged from the customary use of speech; (b) specifically and in a reduplicative sense, as it denotes the divine word, or the God-breathed (θεόπνευστον) means of salvation, supernatural by reason of its essence, and instructed with supernatural power. The sense of the divine word considered generally and specificatively, as it is a word common with any other word, is that which the words in their proper and passive signification produce, although it may not agree with the intention of the Holy Spirit. It is otherwise called the sense of the letter. But the sense of the divine word viewed specifically and reduplicatively is that which the Holy Spirit proximately intends by the God-breathed (θεοπνεύσεις) words, and is called logical and internal, in opposition to grammatical and external; literal, in opposition to the mystical sense; spiritual and divine, because it is proximately intended by the Holy Spirit. To know the grammatical and external sense, natural powers are sufficient; to perceive the internal, spiritual, and divine literal sense, the illumination of the Holy Spirit is needed, whether that illumination be imperfect, of which the unregenerate is capable, or perfect, which the regenerate enjoys. For D. QUENSTED does not by 'illuminated man' precisely understand a regenerate one, although he opposes him to the unregenerate; since opposites are not always of equal latitude. But beware lest you think that this author in the cited place understands by the spiritual sense the mystical sense; because he teaches in express words that the mystical sense is improperly (ἀκῶρως), and less accurately, called the sense of scripture, fol. 130. Moreover, that there is one genuine, literal, and divine sense of one biblical saying, intended by the Holy Spirit, D. QUENSTED proves with many arguments, fol. 132. Add that the sense of the words of scripture is one thing, and the knowledge of that sense, impressed on the reader's mind, is another. Although the literal sense (logically so called) is spiritual, i.e., intended by the Holy Spirit in the God-breathed (θεοπνεύσεις) words, yet the knowledge of that sense of scripture is either literal, and that both external and internal, or spiritual; for they are distinguished as an act of the mind and its object. He who confuses these very distinct things, teaches not perspicuously, but confusedly.

X. An unregenerate man, placed under the assisting and impelling grace of God (e.g., a Jew or gentile to be converted), cannot perceive and approve the words of scripture with a solid concept and assent; because he does not certainly believe in the θεοπνευσίαν (divine inspiration), or divine origin of scripture. And although this is proved by certain κριτήρια (criteria), yet they only produce opinion and human faith. Resp. A Jew certainly believes in the θεοπνευσίαν of the O.T., from which he can be convinced. As for the gentile man to be converted, he is prepared and moved by external κριτήριος to read and meditate on the sacred scripture with zeal and a desire to learn. When he reads and meditates on it attentively, he is convinced by internal κριτήριος, especially the inherent efficacy of S. scripture, to acknowledge its divine origin. This being presupposed, and the study of reading and meditating on scripture being continued, he elicits, perceives, and approves the genuine sense of the biblical sayings with solid assent.

XI. The light of knowledge, kindled by divine illumination, is an ardent light, and one that warms the will to trust in Christ, and love for God and neighbor. But the light of literal knowledge is not ardent, nor warming, etc. Resp. (1) to the major. The light of knowledge kindled by divine illumination is ardent and warming for the will, unless some impediment is placed in its way. It not infrequently happens that the efficacy of a burning fire is impeded, so that it does not immediately kindle wood, for the reason that it is too damp. (2) To the minor. The light of literal knowledge is not only illuminating, but also ardent and warming, because it proximately inflames the will to a desire and purpose of conversion, and consequently to a detestation of sin, to faith in Christ, to love of God and neighbor.

Question XXIII. How is theology divided, with respect to the method of treating it?

Special Division of Theology. Revealed theology, considered with respect to the method of treating it, is either exegetical, which is occupied in explaining the sayings of scripture, or positive, which proposes to a company of learners certain theses taken from scripture; and is both didactic, which elucidates and confirms the articles of faith proposed in a decent order, and moral, which hands down the precepts of morals; or it is historical, which recounts the history of the church, and explains how in it the doctrine of the gospel was propagated by the orthodox, impugned by heretics, and defended both by councils and by faithful doctors in voice and writings.

Obs. To exegetical theology can be referred homiletics, since it also explains a biblical text, with a special application added, so that the sacred assembly may receive salutary fruit from the exegesis of the biblical text. To didactic theology should be referred catechetical theology, since the catechism is also a small system succinctly and perspicuously embracing the things to be believed and done. To moral theology pertains casuistic theology, which resolves doubtful cases of conscience occurring concerning the morals of men, and politico-ecclesiastical theology, or of ecclesiastical government, which is concerned with ecclesiastical discipline, visitation, synods, consistories, etc.

Question XXIV. What is your opinion of scholastic theology?

By scholastic theology is understood either in a general sense the systematic theology drawn from the revealed word of God, and accustomed to be taught in the schools of Christians, in which both the dogmas of faith with the precepts of morals, methodically digested, are explained, and controversies that have arisen are ventilated and decided, which I hold should be diligently taught in higher and lower schools (a); or by scholastic theology is specifically understood the theology of those doctors who tried to explain the dogmas of faith and to raise curious questions not so much from the sacred letters as from the sentences of the fathers and the writings of philosophers, especially Aristotle, which I deem not to be necessary for a cultivator of theology (b), although it may be useful for the confutation of pontifical errors (c).

Proof a. In theological systems, the articles of faith deduced from the sacred letters are proposed in a fitting order to man as a traveler corrupted by sins, the knowledge of which is necessary for a man who is to attain eternal salvation. Therefore the Christian church has long used systems of theology. The Apostles', Nicene, Constantinopolitan, Chalcedonian, and Athanasian Creeds are brief systems of theology. In the 2nd century JUSTIN wrote an exposition of the faith, in the 3rd century Lactantius wrote books of divine institutions, in the 4th ATHANASIUS a synopsis of the whole of scripture, CYRIL of Jerusalem his catechesis, GREGORY Nazianzen on theology, likewise on the faith of the Nicene synod, in the 5th century AUGUSTINE his enchiridion, in the 6th FULGENTIUS on the faith to Peter the Deacon, in the 8th JOHN DAMASCENE on the orthodox faith; I pass over others in silence.

Proof b. Lanfranc, in the 11th century, laid the very ruinous foundation of scholastic theology compiled from the sentences of the fathers and the writings of philosophers, upon which in the 12th century Peter Lombard and Albert the Great built up their manner of teaching, more curious than fruitful; whom others followed in a dense crowd, vying with one another. This scholastic theology is rightly and deservedly disapproved by the orthodox church, because (1) having abandoned the proper, or domestic, and infallibly certain principle of theology (the divine word), it collects from the fathers sentences that are doubtful and by no means certain. (2) It mixes with theology the writings of Aristotle, which are human and filled with many errors. (3) It affects thorny subtleties, and raises curious, foolish, and unlearned questions, 2 Tim. II, 23. (4) It is split into various sects, by which the mind is not established, but distracted. (5) With barbarous and most inept words, it renders the very easiest things difficult to understand. (6) It omits dogmas necessary to be believed and precepts to be observed.

Proof c. Since in the Roman church the scholastic doctors possess distinguished authority, from them the errors of the pontificians can be confuted, which the most accurate theologians HÜLSEMANN, DORSCHAEUS, DANNHAVER, MUSAEUS, SCHERZER, and others have accomplished in their work. For Scotus suggests arguments against transubstantiation, Occam against the tyranny of the pontiff, Durandus against the merits of works, Nicolaus de Orbellis for the majesty of scripture against innovators, etc. Cf. D. IOAN. ADAM. OSIANDRI Theologia Positiva Acroamatica, part. 1, p. 67.

Question XXV. What is your opinion of mystical theology?

Pure and orthodox mystical theology, drawn from the most limpid spring of the divine word without the admixture of the dregs of gentile philosophy, is most useful to the Christian church, and is comprehended partly under didactic theology, partly under moral theology (a). But impure and heterodox mystical theology does not aid in establishing celestial truth, but hinders it (b). Yet the falsity of pontifical doctrine can to some extent be refuted from it (c).

Proof a. Pure and orthodox mystical theology is biblical, since it is sought solely from the word divinely revealed and committed to letters for the present state of the church, for the purpose that the human mind, abstracted from earthly things, may know itself more deeply, deny itself when known, place all confidence of salvation in Christ the mediator, be justified not by the merits of its own works, but by the most precious merit of Christ, be espoused to him, be united to the Holy Trinity, be adorned with the image of God, burn with love for God and neighbor, commend itself continually to the thrice-good God in pious prayers, grow in faith and piety, enjoy the peace and joy of the Holy Spirit, and receive a foretaste of celestial beatitude. Cf. D. SONTAGII Fanaticismus, p. 88. D. VALENTINUS ERNESTUS LOESCHERUS published an epitome of orthodox mystical theology.

Proof b. Impure mystical theology mixes with biblical theology the gentile philosophy of Hermes Trismegistus, Pythagoras, and Plato. Not in vain does M. GÜNTHER say in his dissertation De Quietistis, I. 7, p. 14: "The apostle Paul and the other apostles came, after the example of the savior, not in wisdom, but in the simplicity of the word, 1 Cor. I, 17, lest their conversion be considered a human work. But to many this simplicity was sordid, and they looked back to the ancient sages of the gentiles. The philosophy of these, confused with the Sacred dogmas, added to the simple theology unadulterated by paganism two others, the mystical and the scholastic, of which the one by a certain sanctity, which might strip the will of sins; the other by a subtlety, which might strip the intellect of ignorance, drew the unwary into love of itself. The former is a derivative of Platonic, the latter of Aristotelian philosophy." (2) Mystical theology is the mother of spiritual pride. For contemplating mystics look down upon others with a high brow, and they claim to progress to such a point of perfection that they are christified and deified. Detesting which pride, LUTHER wrote with consideration in tom. II, Jena, Latin, fol. 53: "The commentaries of Dionysius on mystical theology are everywhere circulated, both from Italy and from Germany, which are mere incitements to an inflated and self-ostentatious science." And in Genesis ch. XIX, fol. 134: "Gerson wrote on the speculative life, and adorns it with great titles; and the inexperienced, when they read such things, embrace them as divine oracles. But in reality, as the proverb says: a treasure of coals. Therefore, whether those vain speculators call you external or civil, let it not move you. You give thanks to God for the word and these external things, and leave those bombastic speculations to others."

Proof c. From mystical theology, even the impure kind, such as that of the monks in the papacy, one can argue κατ' ἀνθρώπον (according to man) against the merits of works, the opus operatum, the freedom of the will in spiritual matters, and the authority of the Roman pontiff. Cf. D. LOESCHER, appendix I to his Theologia Mystica, p. 863 ff.

Question XXVI. By what means, being supported, does the student of theology attain to a solid knowledge of divine things?

Means to be used by the theologian. By three means, prayer (a), meditation (b), and temptation/trial (c). Prayer begins the theological study, meditation continues it, temptation consolidates it.

Proof a. from Jas. I, 5. If any of you lacks wisdom, he should ask God, who gives generously to all without finding fault; and it will be given to him. Celestial wisdom is drawn from the fount of wisdom, God, who gives it ἀπλῶς (simply), i.e., candidly, not reproaching in the manner of the envious, but ready to give to those who ask for it with true confidence.

Proof b. It is for the theologian to search the scriptures (ἐρευνᾶν τὰς γραφάς), John V, 39. Miners of metals thoroughly investigate the innermost caverns of the earth, that they may obtain the desired gold; the student of theology explores the rich veins of sacred scripture, that he may seek for himself the precious gold of theosophy. Cf. Ps. I, 2.

Proof c. from Sir. XXXIV, 10. He that has not been tried, knows little. No one more deeply examines, and more solidly knows the power, grace, wisdom, and truth of God, than he who is frequently vexed by Satan and the world.

Question XXVII. What aids promote the theologian's meditation?

Aids to meditation. Two aids promote the theologian's meditation (a) knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages, (b) and a moderate study of philosophy.

Proof a. The chief study of a theologian is biblical, because the sacred codex is like a treasury from which the treasure of celestial wisdom is sought. The whole codex is divided into the writings of the old testament, which are consigned in the Hebrew idiom, and of the new testament, which are consigned in the Greek language. For investigating the sense of the writings of the O.T., knowledge of the Hebrew language is conducive; just as for the understanding of the N.T., skill in the Greek language is required. There are indeed various versions of the bible, yet the originals are necessary, (1) that anyone, especially a literate person, may be made more certain that the originals have it so, and not otherwise; (2) that concerning controversies that have arisen one may pronounce his opinion with a firm conscience, which will never happen unless the originals have been inspected; (3) because there will never be any version absolute in all its parts; (4) because for the solid explanation of dogmas it is necessary to know the phrases of the originals.

Proof b. Philosophy is a kind of culture of the mind, freeing it from innate rusticity, and preparing it for grasping more subtle things, and for vindicating true dogmas from the sophistries of adversaries. Philosophy provides distinguished utility for (1) exegetical theology. For some biblical sayings embrace mixed articles of faith, which become known not only from the light of supernatural revelation, but also to some extent from the light of reason, e.g., the mixed articles are concerning God considered absolutely, concerning the divine attributes, concerning creation and providence, concerning the parts of man, concerning the origin of the soul, concerning voluntary and involuntary sin, etc. (*) (2) Polemical theology. For the enemies of truth strive to destroy the highest articles of faith from the principles of reason, e.g., the mystery of the Trinity, of the incarnation, of justification by the merit of Christ, of the Holy Supper, etc. Which petty reasonings a theologian pre-cultivated in the philosophical disciplines discusses without much difficulty.

Let us be permitted to run through the philosophical disciplines briefly and strictly. Modal philosophy, or logic, shows the theologian the method of arguing, demonstrating, defining, dividing, and methodically proposing theological dogmas. Physics opens the book of nature, that from creatures we may acknowledge the creator, from the series of natural things, the governor. The same treats of not a few things concerning place, concerning the soul, concerning the human intellect, the knowledge of which is profitable for a theologian. Metaphysics teaches what is a principle, cause, effect, necessary, contingent, eternal, independent, infinite, exemplar, image, substance, person, accident; which technical terms are scattered through all the theological topics. Moral philosophy elucidates both the law of nature and the principles of moral actions, from which willful and involuntary sins are distinguished. It is also beneficial for the cultivator of theology to touch upon the mathematical sciences. Astronomy is useful for knowing the stars, of which the sacred codex makes mention; Chronology for computing times; Geography for observing the journeys of the patriarchs, Israelites, prophets, Christ, and the apostles. Knowledge of history commends itself by the fruits that redound from it to the theologian. For the old instrument is for the most part consigned in the manner of some historical writing. The new testament recounts the sayings and deeds of Christ and the apostles. To which if civil and ecclesiastical history be added, the knowledge of the old and new testament will be more abundant.

Question XXVIII. Is philosophy contrary to theology?

Philosophy is not contrary to or does not contradict revealed theology.

Proof. Philosophy is the science of truth. But just as true does not contradict true; so philosophical truth does not impugn theological truth.

You say I. Philosophy openly contradicts theology. For philosophy teaches that there are as many essences as there are persons, that from nothing nothing is made, that a virgin does not give birth. Theology teaches otherwise. Resp. I distinguish between a true and an apparent contradiction. The following enunciations are not truly contradictory: There are as many essences as there are finite persons, teaches philosophy; three infinite persons are in one essence, asserts theology. From nothing nothing is made, by the powers of nature; something is made from nothing, by the immense power of God. A virgin does not give birth according to the ordinary course of nature; the Virgin Mary gives birth on account of the supernatural and extraordinary ἐπιλευσιν (coming upon) of the Holy Spirit.

You say II. St. Paul warns in Col. II, 8; See to it that no one takes you captive through philosophy and empty deceit.

Resp. The apostle is not speaking of true philosophy, which is according to Christ; but of false philosophy, which is not according to Christ, and was sectarian, surviving Paul, and well-worn in the schools of the gentiles, which were frequented in Greece and Asia; such as was the Platonic, Aristotelian, Epicurean, Stoic, which the apostle calls vain and deceptive. And because the Jews, together with the pseudo-apostles, mixed the tenets of the Greek philosophers with their own traditions, St. Paul adds, according to the tradition of men, according to the elements of the world, which are the external ceremonies, Gal. IV, 3, 9. IACOB. MART. in De Constitutione Theologiae, p. m. 127, shows from the context that the apostle in that place censures the traditions and false opinions of the Pharisees, Essenes, and Sadducees concerning the law of God.

(*) Those parts of doctrine indeed pertain not so much to exegetical theology as to dogmatic and moral. But especially pertinent to exegesis are the general and common rules and laws of interpretation, to be drawn from that part of philosophy which is called logic, such as are: The true meaning of the words ought to be perceived in accordance with the author's plan, or, as is commonly said, the scope; That which contains in itself some open contradiction cannot be true; In any saying all the surrounding circumstances are to be accurately weighed; The text is to be wisely and diligently compared with the entire context, as also with other places in which the same meaning is found; Predicates cannot but be of the same kind as their subjects; And there are many more of this kind.

Question XXIX. What is opposed to true theology?

To true theology is opposed false theology, which is more rightly called mateology than theology. Such is the ethnic, Turkish, Jewish, Samaritan, heretical, schismatic, syncretistic, and skeptical mateology.

Ethnic mateology is a knowledge of God indeed drawn from the innate light of nature and the inspection of creatures, but due to the lack of the light of revelation, it is mixed with horrendous darkness and changed into fables, Rom. I, 25. It was threefold: the mythical of the poets, the civil of the priests, and the physical in the schools of the philosophers. This last is closer to our natural theology. Yet as it is found among the gentile philosophers, it is stained with grave errors. Turkish or Mohammedan mateology is a false doctrine of God and divine things, written by Mohammed, set forth in the Alcoran, and received by the Turks, who in a way acknowledge Christ, but blasphemously deprave his doctrine.

Note (1) the author of the Alcoran was Mohammed the Ishmaelite, who lived in the 7th century, whose assistants were Sergius the Arian, John the Nestorian, and a certain Jew. (2) Mohammed concedes in the Alcoran that the Messiah has come, was born of a virgin, that Christ was a holy man, and a great prophet. But he denies the deity of Christ, denies the mystery of the Trinity, says the Holy Spirit is a creature, and trifles that Christ is the soul of God. Furthermore, he urges circumcision, permits polygamy, and measures the felicity of eternal life by the pleasures of the flesh.

Jewish mateology is a false doctrine of God, which is chiefly contained in the Talmud, denies the advent of the Messiah, reproves the writings of the N.T., and with various fictions distorts the oracles of the O.T., especially those concerning the Holy Trinity wickedly corrupts what they say about the Trinity and the Messiah. A distinction must be made between the ancient theology of the Jews and that of today. The former was certainly divine; the latter is full of execrable blasphemies.

Samaritan mataology is an erroneous opinion, connecting the doctrine of the Jews with the infidelity of the ethnics. It gets its name from the gentiles brought to Samaria, who both worshiped their own gods and thought that worship should be rendered to the true God of Israel, mixing gentilism with the Jewish religion. 2 Kings XVII, 32, 33.

Heretical mataology is a doctrine about God, contaminated with errors that undermine the foundation of faith. Note (a): αἵρεσις (heresy) is derived from αἰρέω (I choose), and by force of the word, it is a certain choice that includes two acts: (1) an erroneous judgment of the intellect; for without the judgment of the intellect, there is no choice; (2) an act of the will, by which one thing is preferred to another. For in heresy, one opinion, but an erroneous one, is preferred to another, namely the true one. Heresy is therefore a voluntary error of the intellect, undermining a fundamental article of faith, asserted by one who professes to be a Christian. Note (b): Not every person who errs concerning the foundation of faith is called a heretic, but one who is contumacious and refuses to be converted. Note (c): One who has never been initiated into the sacred rites of the Christians, erring in the foundation of faith, is not called a heretic, but an infidel.

Schismatic mataology is a false doctrine about God and divine things, by which, although an article of faith is not overthrown, related questions of faith are nevertheless gravely offended against, and the unity of the church is disturbed. It is named from σχίζω (schizō), which means I split or I separate, and so schism by force of the word signifies a split or separation. The word schism is taken either in a general or a special sense. In the former sense, heresy can also be called a schism; in the latter sense, it is called an error concerning the faith, not against the faith. Note I. Separation is connected either with infirmity and ignorance, or with pride. The former makes an infirm brother, the latter properly a schismatic. II. Separation is made either from one or another person, or from the entire church. Paul and Barnabas separated themselves, Acts XV, 39, yet they were not schismatics. III. Separation is either just or unjust. Not the former, but the latter properly makes a schism. IV. Schism is considered either in respect to its youthful age, or in respect to its manly age, or in respect to its origin and progress. In the former way, it is considered here; in the latter way, it degenerates into heresy.

Syncretistic mataology is an erroneous opinion, advocating a coalition of parties dissenting in the very doctrine of faith and morals, so that they may enter into a fraternal and ecclesiastical concord, notwithstanding their dissent. Syncretism descends from σύν (syn, "together") and κρητιζῶ (krētizō, "to behave like a Cretan"). PLUTARCH, in his work "On Brotherly Love," says: "The Cretans, agitated by frequent seditions and civil wars, upon the arrival of external enemies, entered into peace and alliance." ERASMUS, in "Chiliades Adagiorum," I, century I, p. 27, says: "Syncretism was said by a Cretan proverb, whenever it happened that those who just now seemed to be the bitterest enemies were suddenly brought back into the greatest concord, which is wont to happen frequently, especially if some evil has befallen both parties in common." But such syncretism is wrongly introduced into the church. For the peace and concord of the Cretans was feigned, by which quarrels were not removed, but deferred; nor did it proceed from true charity, but only from fear of a common enemy and danger. But that which is not sincere, proceeding from a pure and unfeigned love, and which does not cut off or remove errors that overthrow the foundation of faith, but rather nourishes and retains them, does not deserve the name of ecclesiastical concord.

Skeptical mataology is that of the neutral or libertine, who establish or define nothing certain in matters of faith, but either suspend their judgment, or embrace now this, now that, as occasion or necessity brings. The Arminians incline to skepticism, who prefer to withhold judgment concerning the chief dogmas of faith, rather than to define anything with certainty.

Question XXX. In what way do theology and faith agree and differ?

Cognate theology and faith. They agree (a) because both theology and faith are God-given or divinely bestowed. See above p. 11. (b) Both are drawn from the revealed word of God, and on the same they immovably rest. (c) Both comprise the knowledge and assent of the intellect. (d) Both look to eternal salvation as the ultimate end of man.

They differ thus: (a) theology is a practical habit of the intellect; faith, if you consider trust, also resides in the will. (*) (b) Theology is the entire practical habit, including faith as a partial object, and even as an intermediate end. (c) From faith a man is denominated faithful, from theology a theologian. The number of the faithful, however, is far greater than that of theologians.

To know the true agreement of theology and faith, proof a. Theology is wisdom coming from above, James III, 15, descending from the Father of lights. James 1, 17. Faith likewise is from God, of whom it is called a gift. Eph. II, 8. Therefore, both agree in respect to their author.

Proof b. The sacred letters make a man wise, or a theologian. 2 Tim. III, 15. The same were written that we might believe. John XX, 31. Therefore, theology and faith flow from one principle of knowing.

The first degree of Faith. Proof c. Theology is defined by the knowledge of the truth. Titus I, 1. In like manner, it is the knowledge of salvation. Luke I, 77. Therefore, the seat of both is the intellect.

Proof d. That eternal salvation is the ultimate end no more of theology than of faith, Paul teaches when he writes to Timothy, the bishop of Ephesus, in his 2nd Epistle, c. III, 15: "Because from infancy you have known the sacred letters, which are able to make you wise for salvation, through the faith which is in Christ Jesus." Heavenly wisdom, i.e., theology, and faith in Christ look to one end.

To observe the distinction between faith and theology, proof a. Theology is the wisdom of God in a mystery, I Cor. II, 7. But faith, in respect to its final degree, is substance or trust. Hebr. XI, 1. The latter is in the will, wisdom in the intellect.

Proof b. Theology is concerned with God and divine things, of which class faith is one; Which, taken together, if we look at the subject of the theological operation, is the (*) Nor indeed can there be any practical habit, insofar as it is practical, which does not by its own force and efficacy excite in the will movements suitable to the sufficiently known truth. And that a firm confidence of the soul, joined with a true and certain cognition of divine things, is required for a theologian worthy of his name in every respect, the blessed Author himself has professed above, Question 19.

intermediate end of theology. Therefore, just as the including whole and the included part, the habit and its end differ, so do theology and faith differ.

Proof c. A greater light of cognition is required for theology than for faith. For faith, a simple and plain cognition of celestial truth suffices; but theology defends the truth when attacked, and settles controversies drawn from the canonical scripture.

Question XXXI. Is it the duty of every student of theology to make himself acquainted with theological controversies?

The study of theological controversies is most necessary for students aspiring to the higher offices of the church (a). It is fitting that those to be appointed to lower duties acquire some knowledge of controversies for themselves (b).

Proof a. It befits a bishop "to confute those who contradict," Titus 1, 9. But he who is ignorant of theological controversies will stand poorly.

Proof b. It is incumbent upon every minister of the church to exhort the auditors entrusted to his skill to beware of false prophets. Matthew VII, 15. For which reason it is necessary that he know their false doctrine; but he knows it from theological controversies. Moreover, even in the most contemptible places, the occasion often arises that one must enter into a dispute either with some sectarian or with an auditor seduced by others. There the minister of the church will prostitute himself and his religion, who has not touched theological controversies even with a light arm.

Obs. I. The end of theological controversies is indeed to be wished for, but in this militant church it is not to be expected. "For there must be heresies among you" (Christians), "that those who are approved may be made manifest among you," says St. Paul, I Cor. XI, 19. The apostle speaks not of a fatal, absolute, and consequent necessity, but of a hypothetical and consequential necessity, assuming, of course, the cunning of the devil, and the infirmity of men, their ignorance of spiritual things, perversity, inconstancy, pride, and proneness to novelties. These causes of heresies will exist in the church until the consummation of this universe. Wherefore it is the duty of theologians, with the Holy Spirit as their guide, to arm themselves for the wars of the Lord.

Obs. II. Useless, thorny controversies, and those arising from the dominion of depraved affections, are unworthy of theological inquiry or laborious discussion.

SUSPIRIUM

Dou, GOD THE FATHER, creator of things and source of all good, you, GOD THE SON, sun of grace and justice, you, HOLY SPIRIT, sanctifier of faithful souls, I humbly venerate and implore, that you may flood our infirm minds with the light of celestial grace, dispel the darkness of errors, hold forth a torch for us to investigate and find the truth in spiritual matters, so that our theology, as far as is possible in this weakness, may be conformed to the exemplar of your wisdom, supported by the most powerful protection of the sacred letters, a light of faith, a guide of life to heaven, a teacher of true piety, an expeller of vices!

CHAPTER II.
PRESENTING
PROLEGOMENON II.
ON THE GENERAL OBJECT OF THEOLOGY,
THINGS TO BE BELIEVED AND THINGS TO BE DONE, COMPREHENDED UNDER THE NAME OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

Question I. What is the Christian religion?

THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION is the way of worshiping God, with true faith in Christ, and sincere charity toward God, oneself, and one's neighbor, so that the sinner, torn away from God, being reconciled and reunited with God, may be renewed and eternally saved.

Question II. From where is the word "religio" derived?

Some wish the word religion (religio) to be named from religando (binding back) (a), others from relegendo (reading over again) (b).

Proof a. LACTANTIUS in book IV of his Divine Institutes, c. 28, says: "By this bond of piety we are constrained, bound back (religati) to God." From which religion itself received its name. And ISIDORE in his Origins, book VIII, c. 11, says: "It is called religion because through it we bind back (religamus) our souls to the one God for divine worship by the bond of service." You say: From "religando" descends "religatio," not "religio," just as from "obligando" is derived "obligatio." Response: In the opinion of BECHMANN in "De Originibus Linguae Latinae," p. 609, for the ancients, "ligere, ligui, litum" was the same as "ligare" today; from which obsolete word comes "licitor."

Proof b. CICERO in book II of "On the Nature of the Gods": "Those who diligently reconsidered and, as it were, reread (relegerent) all things that pertain to the worship of God, are called religious (religiosi) from rereading (relegendo); just as the choosing (eligentes) are from choosing (eligo), and the intelligent (intelligentes) from understanding (intelligendo)." For in all these words there is the same force of reading (legendi) as in religious (religioso). AUGUSTINE adds his white pebble, as they say, to CICERO in book X of "The City of God," c. 4: "He himself is the fount of our beatitude, he himself is the end of all appetite. Choosing him, or rather rereading him (for we had lost him by neglecting him); therefore rereading him, from which religion is said to be named, we tend toward him with love." According to the former derivation, religion is an obligation to the true worship of God, or a reason obliging man to his debt and duty. See D. SCHERZER'S "Breviarium Theologicum," p. 7. According to the latter etymology, religion is the diligent treatment of those things that pertain to the worship of God. The former derivation pleases most theologians.

Question III. How is religion designated in Greek?

To the Greeks, religion is called θρησκεία (thrēskeia), εὐσεβεία (eusebeia), λατρεία (latreia).

Proof. James 1:27. "Θρησκεία καθαρὰ καὶ ἀμίαντος" (Religion pure and undefiled) before God and the Father is this: to visit orphans and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world. The name θρησκεία (thrēskeia), as Plutarch, Suidas, and others observe, originated from the Thracians, since Orpheus taught the Thracians the rites and ceremonies by which he deemed God should be worshiped. Paul calls religion εὐσεβειαν (eusebeian), I Tim. IV, 8. "ἡ εὐσεβεία πρὸς πάντα ὠφέλιμος ἐστὶν" (Piety [religion] is profitable for all things). To which passage Chrysostom notes, "εὐσεβείαν εἶναι πίστιν καθαρὰν καὶ βίον ὀρθόν" (eusebeia is pure faith and an upright life), homily XII on this passage, fol. 1581. It is named by the same apostle "λογικὴ λατρεία" (logikē latreia). The Vulgate version rendered it in Latin as "rationale obsequium" (rational service), LUCAS OSIANDER as "rationalem cultum" (rational worship), SEBASTIAN SCHMID as "cultum secundum verbum" (worship according to the word). Let us listen to D. CALOVIUS commenting on this passage, fol. 203: "Some prefer it to be called λογικὴν (logikēn), with the Syriac interpreter, from τῷ λόγῳ Θεοῦ (tō logō Theou), the word of God, because λατρεία (latreia), if it is to please God, must be instituted not according to the guidance and norm of our reason, but according to the precept and form of the word of God, as in 1 Peter II, 2, according to them, λογικὸν γάλα (logikon gala) is the verbal milk. Which they observe against the Socinians, inasmuch as they from this word constitute human reason as the rule of divine worship and religion. But because it alludes to the levitical sacrifices, it is better to say the host is a λογικὴν λατρείαν (logikēn latreian) with respect to the matter, because it is made not through the offering of cattle, but of our bodies, than with respect to the principle, whether efficient or directing."

Question IV. In how many ways is the word "religion" taken?

Distinction of religion. Religion improperly denotes a false (a), properly a true way of worshiping God; which today we call Christian, because by true faith in Christ we are reunited with God (b).

Proof a. Paul, Col. II, 18, calls the worship of angels "θρησκείαν τῶν ἀγγέλων" (thrēskeian tōn angelōn, "worship of angels"). But the apostle disapproves of the religious worship of angels.

Proof b. The Christian religion is taken either μερικῶς (merikōs), partially, or ὁλικῶς (holikōs), totally. Taken partially, it designates primarily the immediate worship of God according to the first table of the law, Deut. VI, 13, and secondarily the mediate worship of God, by which offices of charity are rendered to the neighbor. James 1, 27. Taken totally and adequately, it embraces both faith in Christ and charity toward God, oneself, and the neighbor.

Question V. Which is the true religion?

Description of the true religion. The true religion is that which is conformed to the divine word (a). It is the most ancient, approved also by the fathers of the Old Testament (b), it illustrates the glory of God (c), it rightly teaches faith in Jesus the author of salvation (d), it diligently inculcates holiness of life (e), it tranquilizes the conscience (f), it procures a good death (g).

Proof a. The word of God is truth. John XVII, 17. That religion which corresponds to celestial truth is true.

Proof b. By whichever religion the fathers of the Old Testament were saved, by the same we too are saved, because there is one Lord, one faith, Eph. IV, 5. "Through the grace of Jesus Christ we believe we are saved, in the same manner as they," namely, the fathers, Acts XV, 11. (*)

(*) I fear, indeed, that a firm proof cannot be made from that saying. Clear arguments teach us that this word, "they", is better referred to the disciples than to the fathers; 1) The scope of the oration; for there was absolutely no doubt about the salvation of the Fathers, but the whole controversy then being debated was about the difference between the Jews and the profane nations in the age of the New Testament to be renewed, whether the way of obtaining salvation was different, or one and the same, v. 1, 7, 9. 2) The coherence of the discourse, and the force of the argumentation. If this were the sentence: We Jews trust that we will attain beatitude in the same way as our ancestors; Therefore do not impose upon the foreign disciples, now added to Christ, that yoke which our Fathers were almost unequal to sustaining! What, I ask, is the connection? But in this manner: The grace of Jesus Christ today is the one and common way for all, by which one goes to salvation; We therefore, born indeed of Jewish parents, are content with that one way, and so freed from that hard burden, we aspire to salvation; Therefore much less should so heavy a yoke, with which Proof c. 1 Cor. X, 31. "Do all things to the glory of God." The glory of God is the ultimate goal which true religion regards.

Proof d. That faith in Christ is the soul of religion is clear partly from the fact that eternal salvation is found in Christ alone: "For there is no salvation in any other; nor is there any other name under heaven given among men, by which we must be saved," Acts IV, 12; partly from the fact that faith, receiving Christ with his benefits, is, on our part, the only means of salvation; since he who believes in Christ does not perish, but has eternal life. John III, 17.

Proof e. Titus II, 11. "The grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men, teaching (παιδεύουσα) us, that we should deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, justly, and godly in this present age." The scope of divine teaching (τῆς παιδείας), and of the Christian religion flowing from it, is to instill in sinners to be saved that holiness of life, without which no one will see the Lord, Hebr. XII, 14.

they were never burdened, be imposed on others, as if necessary for salvation. Thus at last both the opposition and the argumentation are valid. cf. conclusion v. 17 & 19. But in the conclusion there should be neither more nor less, nor anything other, than what was in the premises and the proof. 3) Consideration of the words. "Grace" (Χάρις) in the scripture of the New Covenant denotes the antitypical grace, which is distinguished from the ritual and typical law, see John I, 17. And it is very significantly called the "grace of Jesus Christ" (χάρις Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ). Through Christ, and his merits, and no other way, access to salvation has always been open, in the Old as well as in the New Covenant. But through Jesus Christ we today obtain salvation, since this principal truth is proper to the New Covenant, which distinguishes Christian doctrine from Jewish; that Jesus of Nazareth, and no other, is the Christ; in which manner these very words of his must also be understood, John XVI, 24. 4) The thing itself speaks. For the Jewish fathers were not permitted to become partakers of salvation unless they sanctifiedly observed the sacred ceremonies, insofar as they were shadows and images, designating the Christ to come. But the decree in that council of the Apostles was entirely aimed at making it plain that that typical worship had now ceased, and that what had been its first part, circumcision, was now completely abrogated. I say no more.

But although this statement may not seem to pertain to confirming the thesis, the thesis itself is certainly most true, and of the greatest moment, and is to be constantly defended against the SOGINIANS. For there are other proving statements, among which one stands out above all, that of Hebrews IX, 26: "Otherwise Christ would have had to suffer often since the foundation of the world." The nerve of the proof will be this: The suffering of evils and the merits of Christ, the God-man (θεανθρώπου) (Hebr. I & II, 14), have infinite force and efficacy: Therefore, in respect to their virtue and power they are always present, always valid: Therefore, once performed, they are held as if always performed. But they pertain to the entire university of men; from that time when sinful men existed: Therefore, they are valid no less before than after they were performed: Therefore, it was not necessary for Christ to suffer often from the beginning of the world: But this would have been necessary, unless the future suffering of evils, on account of its infinite force, had been esteemed as if always present. Therefore, it could not happen that any mortal, who ever lived before Christ was born and suffered, could attain salvation otherwise than through his ransom (λύτρον) and merits: Therefore, in the O.T. the way to salvation was the same as it is today in the N.T., the same necessity on both sides of a saving trust, placed in Christ alone. These things are also clear, Acts XIII, 38, 39. Rom. IV, 6, 23, 24. 2 Cor. IV, 13. This truth, confirmed by the sayings of Sacred Scripture, also rests on certain principles, of which the chief are: 1) the common nature of all men, and the corruption of nature; 2) the common damnation of all; 3) therefore, the necessary and common reconciliation and conjunction with God for all, if any recovery of lost salvation is to be hoped for, from whom all have equally fallen away; 4) the necessary vicarious obedience of a certain Sponsor and Reconciler, whose pledge, fulfilled in all its numbers and parts, would pertain equally to all. Since 5) he is not, nor can be, other than the one God-man (θεάνθρωπον) (Rom. VIII, 3); it follows that to no one could access to salvation ever have been open in the O.T. any more than in the N.T., except through that one God-man. For where the reason is equal, there the consequence also cannot but be equal. See Rom. III, 23, 24. V, 18, 19. 1 Tim. II, 4, 5, 6.

Proof f. Rom. XV, 4. "For whatever things were written before were written for our learning, that we through the patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." As the written word of God, so religion, drawn from it, floods the conscience with living consolation, so that the religious man is not at all broken by adverse things, but is lifted up by the hope of celestial goods.

Proof g. John VIII, 51. "If anyone keeps my word, he shall never taste death." True religion teaches that Christians, keeping the word of God, will not taste the bitterness of death, but will exchange a temporal life full of misery for eternal rest, joy, and glory.

Question VI. Is the evangelical religion, which received its name from the ministry of Luther, true?

The truth of the Evangelical Lutheran religion. The evangelical religion, purified by the ministry of Luther, is in every way consonant with the divine word, approved by the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, universally aiming to illustrate the glory of God, to instill true faith in Christ and holiness of life, to tranquilize the conscience, and to procure a good death; therefore it is true. The antecedent will be most clearly proved through all and singular the heads of theology. The antithesis is that of all who dissent from the Lutheran religion, whose arguments are:

I. The Lutheran religion is new. Therefore, it is not true. R. The Lutheran religion is indeed renewed, but not new; since it is the same religion that was of the prophets and apostles.

II. The Lutheran religion is discordant. Therefore, it is not true. R. The Lutheran religion is concordant in the fundamental articles of faith, although certain doctors may disagree in questions that have arisen alongside the faith, or in certain circumstances.

III. Lutherans are schismatics, because they impose on themselves a distinctive name from D. Luther, just as the Corinthians did in 1 Cor. III, 4. R. The Lutheran religion is named after Luther as minister and organ of God, not as master and principal cause. The example of the Corinthians, however, is brought in impertinently, because the Corinthians agreed on the foundation of faith, and only led by love for their church doctors, they distinguished themselves by distinctive names. Lutherans suffer themselves to be called by a distinctive name, derived from the ministry of Luther, by the Pontificians and others who dissent on the foundation of faith.

Question VII. Can a man be saved in any religion?

Since there is one foundation of the Christian religion (a), one gospel (b), one faith (c), the mother of charity toward God and neighbor (d), it is validly concluded that there is only one Christian religion, in which eternal salvation is sought and found. But it is so far from being the case that a false religion is salutary to a man on his journey, that it is rather pestiferous to him (e).

Proof a. 1 Cor. III, 11. "For no one can lay any other foundation than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." The foundation of the whole Christian religion is Jesus Christ; whichever religion is rightly built upon this one foundation, that one is true and salutary. Several religions, and those contradictorily opposed to each other, cannot be built upon this one basis of piety. For if they agree on the foundation, they are not several, but one religion.

Proof b. The principle from which genuine religion is drawn, if you look to faith in Christ, is the word of the gospel, which is one. For St. Paul says expressly in Gal. 1, 8: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel to you than that which we have preached to you, let him be accursed." There is no gospel other than that which was announced by Paul and his brethren, the other apostles, from the hearing of which is faith, Rom. X, 17. The divine law, the norm of charity toward God and neighbor, is also one and immutable, since it is a certain expression of the invariable divine justice. Therefore, if religion is drawn from one true principle, it must certainly be one true religion.

Proof c. Eph. IV, 5. "One Lord, one faith." Just as there is one Lord redeemer of his human race and head of the church, namely Jesus Christ, who is the only way to heaven, John XIV, 6; so there is one faith, which like a spiritual bond unites the mystical members with the head Christ. It is therefore called one faith, not by reason of the subjects, or believing men, but by reason of the object apprehended, since the faith of all men to be saved is directed to one author of salvation. Paul says gravely in Gal. III, 26, 27: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither slave nor free; there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ." Whoever are united in Christ through faith, their religion is one, of which faith is the chief part.

Proof d. Gal. V, 6. "Faith works through charity." Faith precedes, charity follows. Faith works through charity, as the soul through its faculties. Whoever therefore are united in faith, they love one God in Christ. Indeed, their heart is one, and their soul is one through reciprocal love. Acts IV, 32.

Proof e. Unless a religion were pestiferous, erroneous, and heretical, our savior would not have ordered us to avoid false prophets. Matth. VII, 15. Paul would not have warned that we should watch out for those who cause divisions and offenses contrary to the doctrine which we teach, and avoid them. Rom. XVI, 17. John would not have called us away from their company with such singular zeal, saying: "If anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not receive him into your house, nor greet him," 2 John V, 10. The apostle depicts a fundamental error in faith as a noxious gangrene. 1 Tim. II, 17. "Their word will eat as doth a canker." As a gangrene gradually spreads wider, until it consumes the natural heat; so error in faith gradually gains strength, and is propagated, until it extinguishes the spiritual life, by which we live in the faith of Christ, Gal. II, 20. What then? error undermines salvific faith itself. From which it happens that heretics depart from the faith, 1 Tim. IV, 1, and make a shipwreck of it, 1 Tim. I, 19.

The antithesis is that of the Indifferentists, Libertines, Puccius, Weigel, Arminius, and others, by whose judgment a man can be saved in any religion, provided he strives for holiness of life, with the limitation added, however, that a sinner can ordinarily be saved in the Christian religion, extraordinarily in the Jewish, Mohammedan, and ethnic religion. Who rely on the following arguments.

I. Just as there is one catholic Christian church, so there is one Christian, catholic, and principal religion; of which the particular sects are the Pontifical, Lutheran, Reformed, Socinian, etc. which, although they participate in the catholic church, are nevertheless contaminated with particular blemishes, and are not in every respect pure.

Resp. 1. The catholic Christian church is that which is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, of which Jesus Christ is the cornerstone, through whom the whole building, being fitly framed together, grows into a holy temple in the Lord, Eph. II, 20. In whatever religion those dogmas of faith and precepts of morals are handed down and inculcated, which the prophets once handed down in the O.T., that religion is Christian, catholic, and without doubt true, which is not to be conceived in a universal idea existing nowhere outside the intellect, but is to be considered as it flourishes in a certain assembly of men embracing the true religion, which assembly of believers we call the church. (2) That the Lutheran religion is impure must be clearly demonstrated.

Instance I. It is not necessary that one should join the visible church; it is sufficient that one be a Christian and a member of the invisible church. Resp. The true church, by a different mode of consideration, is called visible and invisible. It is called visible when considered materially and subjectively as the assembly of men, which meets the eyes; it is called invisible, when viewed both formally, by reason of its internal form, or the mystical union with the head Christ, which spiritual union is effected through faith, Eph. III, 17, and comparatively, in so far as its splendor is obscured by persecutions or heresies that have arisen; just as the Israelite church was obscured in the times of Elijah, so that this most sharp-sighted prophet could scarcely see its face, 1 Kings XIX, 18. But it is not absolutely and simply invisible, as WEIGELIUS states, P. III. postill. fol. 92. But where there is the pure preaching of the word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments, there is the true visible church, and in this church the invisible, i.e., the small flock of true believers and the elect, to whom it has pleased the heavenly Father to give the kingdom, Luke XII, 32. Outside that true visible church of Christ, rashly neglected, there is no salvation. For to it have been entrusted "the oracles of God," Rom. III, 2. The Word and Sacraments are efficacious means of grace and salvation, John III, 5; 1 John V, 8.

Instance II. If a true Christian were held captive in Turkey, he would be saved, although he did not live in a pure church. Therefore, being led to or having access to the church is not necessary for salvation. R. A true Christian captured by the Turks is not in the true church in body, but he is in spirit, because he embraces with a sincere mind the celestial truth which the true church of Christ guards and propagates.

II. If in the pontifical religion there are true means of salvation, eternal salvation is not sought and found in the one religion of the Lutherans. But the former is true, as LUTHER concedes in tom. IV & VI. Altenburg. Therefore, the latter as well. R. No religion is so corrupt that some true dogmas, good and salutary in themselves, are not taught in it. On the other hand, in a false religion many erroneous, noxious, spurious, and foreign things are contained, for example, in the pontifical religion are taught human traditions, not conformed to the divine word, the infallible authority of the Roman pontiff, the merits of the saints, and their religious worship, trust in one's own works, the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the supper under one kind, by which false dogmas true faith in Christ is neither generated nor nourished, but extinguished. That a pontifical is saved, his salvation must be credited not to the pontifical religion, as such, but to the truth remaining in the papacy. For it can happen that a seduced pontifical, having cast aside trust in his own merits, flees solely to the merit of Christ, and rests in the same; this one is saved, not as a pontifical, but as a faithful Christian.

Instance III. But that pontifical does not enter the church of the Lutherans. R. He does not enter in body, indeed, but in spirit he embraces those salutary dogmas which are held in the religion of the Lutherans. He does not join their external society, but he acts with them, if you look to the internal consent of the soul.

III. The foundation of the Christian religion is repentance and faith in Christ, which is taught in every religion of those men who profess to be Christians. Therefore, in every religion of those who are distinguished by the name of Christians, there is salvation. The antecedent is proved, because the savior himself at the beginning of the N.T. proposed this fundamental dogma to men to be saved and seriously urged it: "Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matth. IV, 17. "Repent, and believe the gospel." R. We readily grant that at the beginning of the N.T. men were warned to repent, to believe the gospel. But indeed, many things are pardoned for beginners, which are required of the proficient. For beginners, a summary or brief epitome of Christian doctrine is sufficient; for the proficient, a distinct knowledge of the fundamental articles of faith must be instilled. Those whom Christ prevented with his grace, he prepared, informed, and illuminated more and more. This can be gathered from many of Christ's and the apostles' sermons, and especially from the lengthy sermon on the mount delivered to the people. Matth. V, VI, VII chapters.

IV. The Apostle Peter seems to favor indifferentism, saying in Acts X, 34: "In truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." R. The apostle does not say: in every religion, but in every nation, he who fears him and works righteousness is accepted by him. By which words he implies that no nation under heaven is absolutely excluded from converting and regenerating grace, since he ingenuously confesses that God has given repentance to the gentiles. Acts X, 28. Peter is therefore not speaking of the gentiles as such, or laboring under ethnic blindness, but of the gentiles admitting the means of grace and conceiving faith in Christ, which they testify and declare by fear toward God and by works of justice.

V. Not a few have been converted without the revealed word of God, which is clear from the example of the centurion Cornelius, Acts X, 2, who although he was a gentile, was nevertheless religious, fearing God with his whole house, beneficent toward the needy, assiduous in prayers. The same is clear from the example of the magi from the east, Matth. II, 1, who were led to Christ without the preached word. Resp. (1) To the example of Cornelius. This man was religious not by reason of his gentile origin, but by reason of his state, regenerated from the seed of the word, from which he had a general knowledge of the Messiah as the redeemer of the world, see Acts X, 36. He lacked the special application to a certain individual, namely to Jesus of Nazareth, so that he might know him salutarily, for which he was to be more fully informed by St. Peter. Resp. (2) To the example of the Persian magi. These knew the Messiah from the writings of Daniel, to seek whom they were excited by a new star of unusual magnitude and brightness. It is established that Daniel was educated in the school of the magi from Dan. 1, 6. On the occasion of this familiarity, he undoubtedly instilled the very doctrine of the Messiah in some. The same, in c. II, 44, explained some things to the Babylonian king about the future kingdom of heaven without end. To this is added that not all the Jews migrated back to Jerusalem from Babylonia, but many remained in those places, who had celebrated schools there. Confer Acts II, 9. We add that the sacred letters were translated into Greek not without the provident care of the eternal Deity, and so were communicated with the gentiles in a familiar language. Here there were many good men, whom scripture calls "devout" (ἐυλαβεῖς), who although they were not circumcised, nevertheless studied the prophetic books and venerated the God of Israel, as is read of the Ethiopian eunuch. Acts VIII, 28.

Question VIII. Is the truth of the Christian religion to be judged by the external sanctity of the men devoted to the religion?

The unfeigned sanctity of men devoted to the Christian religion is a very strong testimony to the truth and efficacy of the Christian religion (a). But since hypocrisy not rarely puts on the appearance of external sanctity, external sanctity is not the principal, perpetual, and infallible mark of the true religion (b). But the truth of religion is to be estimated principally and infallibly from its conformity with the revealed word of God (c).

Proof a. We have shown above in proof e. to q. V. that the scope of the "teaching" (τῆς παιδείας) of Christian doctrine and religion is to inculcate in us a way of living soberly, piously, and justly, from Paul's epistle to Titus II, 11, 12. And what the same apostle had taught there, v. 10, in particular, that it is the duty of servants to adorn the doctrine of God our savior in all things; this can be said generally of all Christians, that it is their duty to adorn the doctrine of Jesus with sanctity of life, so that the Christian religion may consist not so much in words as in deeds. For what religion exists in the whole world that renders men truly pious, abstracts them from vices, teaches them to tread on earthly things, commands and engenders virtues, except the Christian? Whence, as D. JOHANN ADAM OSIANDER testifies in his "Theologia Positiva," p. 76, Julian the apostate ordered the priests of idols to take care that the pagans should study virtue; for thus their worship would make progress, just as the Christian religion had made such great progress for that reason. The same most celebrated theologian adduces Justin Martyr speaking thus in his second apology: "We who once delighted in debauchery, now love only chastity; we who used magical arts, now consecrate ourselves to the good and eternal God; we who loved the fruits and revenues of money and possessions above all things, now even bring what we have into a common stock, and share with all who are in need; we who raged against each other with mutual hatred and slaughter, and by received custom did not have a common hearth with those who were of our tribe, now after the appearance of Christ live together familiarly, and pray for our enemies."

Proof b. If a life extrinsically good were an infallible sign of the true religion, all hypocrites would have the true religion; because they strive exceedingly that their external sanctity may strike the eyes and ears of men. The Pharisees boasted of singular sanctity, as Christ testifies, Matth. VI, 2 sq. Luke XVIII, 11. Indeed, even while Paul was alive, the false teachers, who crept into houses and captivated silly women laden with sins, had a form of godliness. 2 Tim. III, 5. And the angel-worshippers walked "in humility" (ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ), Col. II, 18. And the garments of the pseudo-prophets are, as it were, sewn together from continence, chastity, and fasting, according to the exposition of Jerome. See CALOVIUS' "Biblia Illustrata" on this passage. Today, monks and anabaptists display an appearance of external sanctity, whose religion is false.

Proof c. The truth of the Christian religion is to be estimated principally and infallibly from its conformity with the divine revelation. But divine revelation today is had in the writings of the prophets and apostles. Therefore, whatever religion acknowledges, observes, and perpetually follows the sacred scripture as an infallible principle, it submits itself to supernatural revelation, and agrees with the mind of Jehovah, and is therefore true and divine, reflecting the nature of its principle.

Question IX. Is the religion of the Israelites in the old, and of the Christians in the new testament one?

The unity of religion in the O. and N.T. The religion of the Israelites in the old, and of the Christians in the new testament, is one, as to its substance.

Proof (1) Generally, because the Israelites in the O.T. were justified and saved by faith in Christ no less than Christians in the N.T. St. Peter speaks with great emphasis about the justification of the Israelites by faith in Christ, Acts X, 43: "To him (Jesus) all the prophets bear witness, that through his name whoever believes in him shall receive remission of sins." You say: The prophets speak of the future, not of their own time; of the state of the new testament, but not of the old. Resp. Peter's words are unlimited and general. He implies that the Prophets, in the times in which they lived, did not prophesy, but bore witness to Jesus, that everyone who believes in him receives remission of sins. Therefore he is not speaking of a prophecy of future times, but of a present testimony borne to Jesus, who was present morally, if you consider the divine promises, which presented the coming Jesus with all his benefits and placed the efficacy of his merit before their eyes. Peter also discusses admirably the eternal salvation of the Israelites to be obtained through Christ, Acts XV, 10, 11: "Now therefore, why do you test God by putting a yoke on the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we (we) shall be saved in the same manner as they also." Obs. 1. By the "unbearable" (ἀβάστακτον) yoke, impossible to carry, is understood not only the ceremonial law, but also the moral, as being the "weightier" (βαρύτερα), Matth. XXIII, 23. It deals with circumcision indeed, but as obligating to universal obedience, Gal. V, 8. Obs. 2. When the apostle says: "in the same manner as they" (καθ' ὃν τρόπον κακεῖνοι), with these same words he refers to the fathers, whom he had mentioned in this verse, not to the disciples, about whom he was speaking in v. 10. This is validly gathered from the natural placement of the words, which being preserved, the relative word looks to the nearest subject, not the remote one. (*)

Proof (2) Specifically by the example of Abraham, whom Romans IV, 1 seqq. teaches was justified by faith. From which I argue: Abraham, the Father of all believers, both of the uncircumcised and of the circumcised, no less of those who lived under the old covenant than of those who live under the new, was justified and saved by faith in Christ. Therefore, all believers of all times are justified and saved by faith in Christ. You say: it is not licit to conclude from one example to all men. Resp. The example concludes by force of parity or agreement with the rest. Therefore, from a singular proposition a universal one is validly inferred, because of the equally necessary connection everywhere. Now indeed all believers with Abraham have obtained an "equally precious" (ἰσότημον), i.e., equally precious faith, 2 Peter I, 1. From which he is named the Father of all believers, of the uncircumcised and of the circumcised, Rom. IV, 11, 12. These things being thus established, we form a perfect syllogism. By which faith Abraham, the father of all believers, both of the uncircumcised and of the circumcised, was justified and saved, by the same faith all believers of the old and new testament are justified and saved. But Abraham was saved by faith in Christ. Therefore, etc.

The antithesis is that of certain Pontificians, Socinians, Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians, and Weigelians, who assert that in the old testament faith in Christ was not necessary for a sinner to be saved, nor was the doctrine of the mystery of the Most Holy Trinity necessary for him to believe; whose arguments we shall weigh.

I. Christ the mediator did not exist in the times of the O.T., nor was his satisfaction then performed. Therefore, the Israelites in the O.T. could not believe in Christ the mediator. Resp. (1) Christ, as God, is eternal; for he is the father of eternity, Isa. IX, 5. (2) The Israelites in the times of the O.T. believed in the Messiah to be incarnated and to be sacrificed for the sins of the world. Who, although he was not present in the O.T. with respect to his human nature physically, was nevertheless present morally. For this reason he is called the lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Rev. XIII, 8. Namely (1) by reason of the decree, (2) by reason of the promise, (3) by reason of the typical representation in the sacrifices of the O.T., (4) by reason of the efficacy and fruit of his merit, which is valid forwards and backwards.

II. Paul seems to indicate that the Israelites in the O.T. did not believe in Christ, Gal. III, 23: "Before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up for the faith which was to be revealed." Resp. There are those who understand in this passage the faith which is believed, or the doctrine of faith concerning Christ, which was revealed more clearly and more fully, and was more widely propagated in the new than in the old testament. But the blessed LUTHER in his last commentary on Galatians, fol. 91, and with him D. CALOV. in his "Biblia Illustrata" on this passage, understand Paul's words to be about the opposing state of any man under the law and under grace, in this sense: Before a man believes, the law must be imposed on him, so that under it as under a prison he may be confined, coerced, and contrite; but to the contrite man the evangelical doctrine must be inculcated, so that, lifted up by the promise of gratuitous mercy, he may flee to Christ, who is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone who believes. Rom. X, 4.

(*) But see the notes to question V. But that the relative pronoun, as it is said, is not always referred to the nearer, but sometimes to the more remote, is not unusual in the sacred letters. The blessed GLASSIUS has collected more examples in Philologia Sacra, L. III, tr. II, can. 10.

III. The apostle seems to imply that the righteousness of faith, fixed in the merit of Christ, was unknown to the Israelites in the O.T., Rom. III, 21: "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets, even the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ to all and upon all who believe." Resp. If the apostle had written: Now for the first time the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, there would be some nerve in the argument; but, that word being omitted, it is so nerveless that it can be inverted: That righteousness of God which is now manifested without the law of God, but was witnessed by the law and the prophets, was not unknown to the Israelites. For now indeed it is manifested more clearly and more fully, but it was witnessed long ago in the Pentateuch of Moses and the prophetic writings, although with a lesser degree of clarity.

Question X. Are men to be compelled to embrace religion?

To embrace religion, the human intellect can be logically and internally compelled by the force of the divine word and by stringent arguments derived from it (a), but it neither can nor should be compelled by force politically and externally to approve and embrace a religion which it deems to be false (b).

Proof a. The intellect is a necessary power, which, when all the requisites for acting are present, cannot not act. For if a truth is either very clear in itself, such as is the certainty of the most certain and most evident principles, or has been proved by the best consequences and is clearly proposed to the human intellect, the latter is so constrained that it cannot deny internal assent. For just as, when a visible object is present, illuminated by light at a proper distance, so that there is no defect in the visual organ or eye, it is impossible that the eye should not see white and distinguish it from black, nor allow itself to be persuaded that a crow is white, or a swan is black; so it cannot happen, if an object is clearly proposed to the intellect, that the latter should assent to the false, and dissent from the true. Now indeed, that the sacred scripture is the infallible word of God can be most clearly demonstrated from certain criteria, especially from the efficacy of the scripture. Therefore, if the intellect of man is convinced that the Holy Scripture is the word of God, it cannot but ratify everything that is either contained in the sacred letters verbatim, in terminating terms, or is deduced from it by a ready and manifest consequence, on account of the irrefragable authority of God speaking.

Proof b. (1) Because God alone is king of minds, and he alone has dominion over consciences, as GREGORY THE GREAT aptly says in book II, epistle 52. Therefore, they invade divine right, whoever command religion to consciences. (2) God is delighted by spontaneous, not coerced, religion. For which reason the royal prophet prophesies that the religion of Christians under the new covenant will be freely undertaken and practiced, Ps. CX, 3: "Your people shall be a people of readiness." The whole Psalm CX deals with Christ, cited by Christ himself in Matth. XII, 44, by Peter in Acts II, 34, by Paul in 1 Cor. XV, 25 and Hebr. I, 13. Namely, with the psalmist predicting, the Christian people will be eager and ready to worship the Messiah, to whom they will offer spiritual sacrifices not compelled by iron, club, or fire, but prompted by the internal impulse of the Holy Spirit. (3) As the will, so religion cannot be compelled; because nothing is so voluntary as religion, from which if the mind is turned away, it is already taken away, it is already nothing, as Lactantius judges in book V, c. 19. (4) Faith, which is the chief part of the Christian religion, is born not from coercion, but from hearing the preached word, Rom. X, 17. Thus by the divine word Jonah converted the Ninevites, Peter on the day of Pentecost three thousand souls, Acts II, 41, and Paul the Romans, Corinthians, Ephesians, etc. Whose weapons were not carnal, but spiritual, 2 Cor. X, 4. Nor did they ever intend to dominate the faith of their hearers, 2 Cor. X, 4.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians and Mohammedans, who state that men are to be compelled to embrace religion by iron and flames and that heretics are to be killed. Who strive to support their opinion with the following arguments.

I. The Savior himself says: "Compel them to enter," Luke XIV, 23. Resp. A distinction is made between logical or internal compulsion, and political or external, and that violent. In the cited passage, political and violent compulsion cannot be understood. For the savior addressed the inviting apostles with these words, to whom "compulsion" (ἀναγκασμός), or political compulsion, was denied, Matth. XX, 26: "But it shall not be so among you." Wherefore the ministers of the church compel guests to enter by proposing the word of Jehovah clearly, by persuading and beseeching with arguments drawn from it, not by threatening with iron or the wheel.

II. The magistrate is the custodian of both tables of the decalogue. Therefore it is also his duty to lead men to the true worship of God either by persuading, or by using compelling force. Resp. It is the magistrate's duty to lead not by force, but by the sinews of arguments to the external means, not immediately to the worship of God itself. This is rather the duty of the theologian and pastor, than of the political magistrate. Therefore the emperor Constantine was accustomed to say: "You are bishops within the church, I am outside the church."

III. It is the magistrate's duty to deter citizens from idolatrous worship by proposing capital punishments. This is clear from the divine command in Deuteronomy XII, 7, 8, 9, and the example of Jehu, who struck the Baalites with the sword, 2 Kings X, 35. Resp. In the O.T. there are express commands about killing idolaters, which we do not have in the N.T. concerning heretics. The commands of the old testament about killing idolaters were judicial, not moral. It is moral that the sincerity of religion is to be preserved with the highest zeal and defended from the corruptions of false prophets. It is judicial and forensic that capital punishment is to be inflicted on idolaters, to which we are not obligated in the N.T. For the forensic laws ceased in the N.T. But to us it was said: "Do you not know what manner of spirit you are of? For the Son of Man did not come to destroy men's souls, but to save them," Luke IX, 55, 56. Add that there is a great difference between idolatry and heresy. In the former, malice adverse to natural light (which recognizes that one God is to be worshipped) rages; in the latter, blindness not grasping the supernatural mysteries of faith deserves pardon. For the savior says, Matth. XIII, 30: "Let both grow together (the tares with the wheat) until the harvest." The tares are the heretics, of whom the Lord says: "Let them grow," because of the supernatural object of faith, because of the greater gentleness and leniency of the spirit of Zion compared to that of Sinai, because of the hope of future conversion. Take care only, lest the wheat perish by the cunning machinations of the heretics. By the conviction of heretics through invincible arguments the wheat does not perish, but is changed from darnel into wheat. Augustine certainly would have perished, if violence and slaughter had been used against the Manicheans. Confer DANNHAVER, "Hodosophia Spiritus Papae," phantasm. VI, p. 1382.

IV. The magistrate does not bear the sword in vain, Rom. VIII, 4. Therefore let him punish heretics, the disturbers of the church and of public peace, with a drawn sword against them. Resp. The magistrate bears the sword against evil works, which are morally, civilly, and externally evil; heresy, because it is theologically evil and an error of the mind concerning spiritual things, is not to be suppressed with a material sword, but with the spiritual sword of the divine word. But if a heretic is a disturber of the peace and manifestly blasphemous, he is to be coerced with a punishment afflicting the body, not as a simple heretic, but as a blasphemer and seditious person.

Question XI. What things are comprehended under the name of Christian religion?

Contents of the Christian religion. Comprehended under the name of Christian religion are the things to be believed and the things to be done by man the wayfarer, corrupted by sins, who is to attain eternal salvation.

Proof. Just as God is religiously worshipped by true faith and by the sincere pursuit of good works; so religion, which is the form or manner of worshipping God, embraces in its scope things to be believed and things to be done.

You say: That assertion, by which religion is said to embrace things to be believed and things to be done, does not seem to be accurate. For (1) things to be done are also things to be believed, because they have been divinely revealed. Whatever God has revealed is to be believed. (2) Things to be believed also include practice, since faith is not a bare theory of the mind, but a practice of the heart. (3) A third member is omitted, namely things to be avoided, or to be omitted, such as sins.

Resp. to I. We readily grant that things to be done, in a looser sense, are things to be believed on account of divine revelation; But here things to be done are taken strictly, in so far as they are works, to be directed to the glory of God with faith as a guide; but things to be believed are mysteries to be received with the assent of faith.

To II. Resp. The practice of faith differs from the practice of works. The former precedes, in the order of nature, the latter follows; faith directs good works; Works are directed by the preceding acts of faith, knowledge and trust.

To III. Resp. Under the name of things to be done are also comprehended things to be avoided. For in practical disciplines, he who flees from sins is in a certain way said to act.

Obs. (1) Things to be believed are spoken of in three ways: I. in a general sense, II. in a special sense, III. in a most special sense. In a general sense, things to be believed are said to be those which are revealed in the written word of God, e.g., physical, historical, moral, supernatural things, whether they respect the eternal salvation of men, or less so. In a special sense, things to be believed are called those which have been revealed in the word of God for the salvation of men, and are believed on account of divine revelation, although they may become known in some way from the principles of reason. In a most special sense, things to be believed are called mysteries, superior to the grasp of reason, and to be known for our salvation solely from divine revelation.

Obs. (2) Assertions, enunciations, or dogmatic theses concerning things to be believed, formed from the word of God, are by received usage of speaking called articles of faith.

Question XII. What is an article of faith?

Definition of an article of faith. An article of faith is a part of the doctrine revealed in the written word of God, concerning God and divine things, proposed to the sinner to be saved for belief.

Etymology. Obs. (1) The word "article" (articulus) is said to come from "artus" (joint), and this from "arctando" (binding tightly). It properly denotes the members of the body tightly connected, just as the parts of the fingers cohere tightly. By a metaphor, the word article has been transferred to the parts of the doctrine of faith, joined by the tightest bond.

Obs. (2) By faith here is understood the faith that is believed, or the doctrine of faith, with respect, however, to the faith by which one believes, or the trust itself fixed in the merit of Christ.

Question XIII. In how many ways is an article of faith taken?

Homonymy. An article of faith is taken either collectively or distributively. Collectively it denotes an entire head of Christian doctrine; distributively it designates any assertion or enunciation which constitutes a part of Christian doctrine.

Proof. Christian doctrine is distributed into heads or theological loci, and the heads are divided into certain theses. Both the heads of the doctrine of faith and the theses of the heads are called articles of faith, e.g., the theological locus on Christ is called an article of faith; and this proposition: "Christ, as to the flesh, sits at the right hand of God," is likewise named an article of faith.

Question XIV. What are the requisites of articles of faith?

Requisites of a true article of faith. For a true article of faith it is required that it be revealed in the written word of God (a), that it respect the salvation of man (b), that it be tightly connected with the other dogmas of faith (c), that it be un-evident (d).

Proof a. A true article of faith is said to be that which is conformed to the divine revelation, which at this time is had in the sacred letters; since in them it either exists expressly, or is elicited from them by invincible consequence.

Proof b. Every genuine article of faith respects the eternal salvation of men either directly, in so far as it explains the principles and means of salvation; or indirectly, in so far as it is a dogma removing an impediment to salvation, lest we fall from the hope of eternal life. For not all and singular articles of faith import an equal respect to eternal salvation; but some infer a proximate respect to salvation, some a remote one.

Proof c. The harmony of the articles of faith is elegant and like a sweet concert. Therefore faith is accustomed to be called one copulatively and is compared to a chain connected from many links. Take away a link, and you have broken the chain; remove one article of faith, and you have disturbed the harmony of faith. Because of this harmony, it cannot happen that one article of faith is contradictorily opposed to another.

Proof d. Just as that is called evident (in a stricter sense) which is known or investigated by the guidance of the light of nature (*); so that is un-evident which can be known or investigated not from the light of nature, but from the supernatural light of divine revelation (**). These things being well observed, it is to be stated that some articles of faith are un-evident by reason of their material and formal object, some are un-evident only by reason of their formal object.

Question XV. What is the object of the articles of faith?

The object of the articles of faith are "the things to be believed" (τα πιστα). But the things to be believed are God and divine things, in so far as they have been divinely revealed for the salvation of men.

Obs. From these things it is clear that the material object of the articles of faith is God and divine things; the formal object of which is the supernatural revelation divinely made and directed to the salvation of men.

Question XVI. How are the articles of faith divided?

Distinction of the articles of faith. The articles of faith are divided by reason of their object into pure and mixed; by reason of their habit or respect to the foundation of faith and salvation they are divided into fundamental and non-fundamental.

Question XVII. Which are the mixed articles of faith, and which the pure?

Mixed articles of faith are said to be the parts of Christian doctrine concerning those divine things which are both known to some extent from the light of nature, and are believed from the supernatural light of divine revelation (a). Pure articles of faith are the parts of Christian doctrine concerning divine mysteries, superior to the grasp of human reason left to itself, yet divinely revealed (b).

Proof a. The parts of Christian doctrine concerning the existence, power, goodness of God, also concerning the creation, conservation, and governance of the world are true articles of faith. This we learn not only from the first article of the Apostles' Creed, but also from the testimony of Paul, Hebr. XI, 6: "Without faith it is impossible to please God. For he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him." No one will worship God with true faith, no one full of trust will approach him, unless he believes both that there is an eternal Deity, omnipotent, omniscient, and that he takes care of human affairs, so that he is willing to render the best things to those who worship him. Yet also by the guidance of the light of nature the existence, omnipotence, and provident care of God become known, as Paul testifies in Rom. I, 19, Acts XIV, 17, c. XVII, 24. From which it has happened that some authors have taken the occasion to distinguish the articles of faith into pure and mixed.

(*) And so indeed, that we perceive its mode and reason clearly and distinctly; for there are many secrets even in natural things, whose causes and reasons we do not know with sufficient evidence, yet we do not doubt the truth of the thing, although we may be ignorant of the mode, see John III, 8, coll. Eccles. XI, 5.

(**) So that we know the thing indeed, but no one can ever comprehend with mind and thought the mode by which the thing can happen, which is known to God alone; wherefore they are called mysteries, above the mind, and not only the human, but also the angelic, Phil. IV, 7, add 1 Pet. I, 12. Therefore, the distinction, unknown indeed to a few, must be well observed, that there is one evidence of the thing, whose mode we are ignorant of, and another of the revelation, which we know clearly.

You say: There are no mixed articles of faith, because we are not permitted to mix those things which are of natural and supernatural light, just as it is not at all permissible for us to mix the highest with the lowest, heaven with earth. Resp. The distinction of the articles of faith into pure and mixed must be understood correctly. For no article of faith formally considered, in so far as it is an article of faith, is mixed; since all articles of faith depend on divine revelation, and are therefore un-evident by reason of their formal object. But they are distinguished into pure and mixed by reason of their material object. Namely, those divine things which are expounded in the articles of faith which they call mixed, consist partly of reason, partly of supernatural revelation. They consist, I say, of the principles of reason less well, and less safely and fully, but they become known from the revealed word far better, more certainly, and more fully for the salvation of man. Add that certain circumstances concerning things knowable from both lights are of mere faith and revelation. Let the creation of this universe, completed within a hexaemeron, be an example. Not without reason does the apostle say: "By faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God." Hebr. XI, 3.

Proof b. Pure articles of faith are occupied in explaining the mysteries of faith, which transcend the grasp of human reason left to itself. "Mystery" (Μυστήριον) is from "to close" (μύειν), which signifies to have the eyes closed, to compress the mouth, and consequently to be silent. From "to close" (μύειν) is "to initiate" (μυεῖσθαι), which signifies to imbue someone with honorable doctrine. "To be initiated" (Μυεῖσθαι) is the same as to be initiated into the sacred rites. "An initiate" (ὁ μύστης) is a man initiated into the sacred rites, who either with silence hears others and learns the sacred things; or, who is so imbued with the knowledge of those sacred things that he teaches the sacred things, to be heard with reverent silence. See Phosphor. Crauser, p. 906. "Mystery" (Τὸ μυστήριον), which descends from "to close" (μύειν) just as "the initiate" (ὁ μύστης), among profane authors denotes both every secret thing, not to be rashly uttered in speech, and especially the sacred rites of Ceres at Eleusis, enclosed in deep silence. Concerning which, consult, if you please, Alexander ab Alexandro, L. VI, D. G., c. 19, p. 364. In the sacred letters, "mysteries" (μυστήρια) denote divine and supernatural things, which are unknown and un-evident to reason left to itself, yet are divinely revealed for the sake of our salvation. In which way the incarnation of the son of God is called "admittedly a great mystery" (ὁμολογουμένως μέγα μυστήριον), in the "confessedly great mystery of godliness," I Tim. III, 16. The spiritual union of Christ with the church, Eph. V, 32. The calling of the gentiles, Eph. III, 3. The conversion of the Jews to the faith of Christ, Rom. XI, 29. The change of those who will be alive on the last day, 1 Cor. XV, 51. The final liberation of the church, Rev. X, 7; are called mysteries. To the Greek fathers, the sacraments are specially called mysteries, of which the sacred preachers are the stewards or dispensers, 1 Cor. IV, 1. Those parts of Christian doctrine which explain those mysteries are called pure articles of faith.

Question XVIII. Which articles of faith are fundamental?

Fundamental articles of faith.

Fundamental articles of faith are those parts of Christian doctrine so necessary to be known that, if they are ignored, the foundation of faith is not salutarily apprehended or retained by a person, and if they are denied by the same person, it is, as far as in him lies, undermined.

Question XIX. What is the foundation of faith and salvation?

The foundation of faith is either real or substantial; or dogmatic, or doctrinal. The substantial foundation of faith and salvation is Christ, in so far as he is the meritorious cause of obtaining from God the remission of sins and eternal life, promised in the gospel to all who believe in him through the efficacious influx of the Holy Spirit (a). The dogmatic foundation of faith and salvation is the complex of divinely revealed dogmas, by which Christ, the substantial foundation of faith, and the principles and means of salvation necessarily connected with him, are explained (b).

Obs. 1. The foundation is one of those things which infer a respect to another. A foundation, however, respects the thing which it founds, and is laid under for its support. It is defined by D. NICOL. HUNNIUS, "Diatribes on the Foundation," q.1, c. 1, p. 7: "The foundation is that which in any structure is first, and underlies the whole structure, and is not supported by another."

By D. J. MUSAEUS in his "Introduction to Theology," p. 166, it is described thus: "The foundation is that which in any thing is first, and which is the reason or cause why that which it founds is, or can be." Whence by analogy the foundation of faith and salvation is said to be that which is first in justifying faith and the salvation of men, and is the reason and cause why saving faith and the salvation itself of men is, or can be.

Obs. II. Although faith and the salvation of man differ, as two subordinate ends of theology, since faith is for the sake of men's salvation; yet the foundation of both is the same. For that on which salvation rests, on the same saving faith of men rests; since faith has from its foundation that it is saving, and on the same the salvation of men depends. Wherefore we deliberately join faith and the salvation of men here from time to time.

Obs. III. An organic foundation of faith is added by some theologians, by which is understood the sacred scripture, considered as the fundamental principle of knowing the articles of faith. Concerning which, in the following chapter.

Proof a. From 1 Cor. III, 11: "For no other foundation can anyone lay than that which is laid, which is Christ." St. Paul is speaking of the foundation of the church, which he had compared to a well-cultivated field and to an elegant building in v. 9. He had compared himself to a wise architect (ministerial) in v. 10. But Christ he calls the foundation of the building in v. 10. For the entire church, which is the house of the living God, 1 Tim. III, 15, rests on Christ, as on an immovable rock, so that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it, Matth. XVI, 18. Since, however, the church is the assembly of faithful and saved men, it is not invalidly concluded that Christ is also the foundation of faith and salvation. For the faithful and saved are built upon the foundation Christ, in so far as they are faithful and saved, or what amounts to the same thing, by reason of faith and salvation. St. Peter agrees in Acts IV, 12: "This Jesus Christ of Nazareth is the stone which was rejected by you builders, which has become the head of the corner. And there is no salvation in any other." As if to say: In the structure of salvation, Christ is that first thing from which salvation originates; for he is the reason and cause why saving faith, the remission of sins, and eternal salvation is, or can be.

Proof b. From Eph. II, 20: "Built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone." St. Paul is speaking of the dogmatic foundation of faith. For by the foundation of the apostles and prophets he implies the doctrine, handed down by the apostles and prophets, both by living voice and by writings, which is indeed the immovable basis, from which the structure of faith and salvation rises and is established. Moreover, the apostle teaches that Christ is the "cornerstone" (ἀκρογωνιαίον), or the cornerstone, to indicate that the prophetic and apostolic doctrine is a foundation in such a way that it itself rests on Jesus Christ, as on the lowest cornerstone and ultimate foundation, and the reason of the foundation ultimately returns to him. For as the cornerstone joining two walls projects, obvious and conspicuous to all; so Christ, connecting the prophetic and apostolic doctrine, eminently stands out in the same. Meanwhile, the indivisible connection of the mercy of God the Father and the applying grace of the Holy Spirit coheres with the foundation Christ. For the general and universal mercy of God laid the foundation Christ. Isa. XXVIII, 16; John III, 16. But the special mercy of God, remitting sins to believers, is founded on the merit of Christ. For that God can remit sins to sinners, his immutable justice being preserved, and that he has promised to remit the same to believers, all this is from the merit and satisfaction of Christ, performed for the sins of the whole world. For which reason we, reconciled to God, glory indeed in God, but through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the reconciliation. Rom. V, 1. In whom all the promises of God are "Yea and Amen," 2 Cor. I, 20. The applying grace of the Holy Spirit builds the saving faith, which it gives and strengthens by means of the word, upon the foundation Christ. For when in Eph. II, 20 the apostle had taught that Christ is the cornerstone of the prophetic and apostolic foundation, in v. 22 he adds: "In whom you also are being built together for a dwelling place of God in the Spirit." The apostle's meaning is: You Ephesians, gentile by origin, are built together with the Jews upon Christ, the cornerstone of the whole Christian doctrine, through the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit, by whom you are converted and regenerated, so that God may dwell in you by his gracious presence. From which it is concluded that the dogmatic foundation of faith is the catalog, series, and complex of all those dogmas by which the satisfaction and merit of Christ, the mercy of God the Father, and the gracious operation of the Holy Spirit are proposed and explained to man to be saved for belief.

You say: Of one thing there is only one foundation. Therefore, there is not a twofold foundation, namely real and doctrinal. R. The substantial and dogmatic foundation of faith and salvation are not two adequately contradistinct foundations, nor do they differ according to the thing, but according to our mode of conceiving because of different connotations. For Christ is the foundation on the part of the thing; the doctrine about Christ is the foundation on the part of our cognition. But the doctrine about Christ is nothing other than Christ known by the intellect, and proposed to others to be known by the written or preached word. Therefore, the dogmatic and substantial foundation do not differ, except as doctrine and the object of doctrine, which finally taken together constitute what is in reality one foundation, although our mind conceives it as twofold. Nor can one be separated from the other, but our faith is so borne to the doctrine of Christ, that through the same believed it tends to Christ himself, signified or represented by the doctrine, and thus apprehended and believed, it rests on him as on the lowest cornerstone.

Question XX. How are the fundamental articles of faith divided?

Primary fundamental articles of faith. The fundamental articles of faith are divided into primary and secondary. The primary articles of faith are the principal parts of Christian doctrine, a distinct knowledge of which is so necessary for obtaining faith and salvation, that if they are ignored, neither can faith be generated or conserved, nor can eternal salvation be obtained. They are subdivided into constituent, antecedent, and consequent articles of faith.

Constituent articles of faith. The constituent, or formal, articles of faith are those which explain the proximate causes of faith and salvation, and thus enter into the very causal definition of saving faith (a).

The antecedent articles of faith are those by which are expounded the so necessary presuppositions of saving faith, that, if they do not pre-exist, the very foundation of faith does not exist (b).

The consequent articles of faith are those which explain the consequences of saving faith, which being posited, the divinely bestowed faith is confirmed, conserved, increased, and exercised; not being posited, the ignited faith is extinguished and vanishes (c).

Proof a. The causal definition of saving faith can be conceived in the following words: Saving faith is a divinely bestowed means, by which a sinner, converted and reborn by the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit through the divine word, accepts the grace of God remitting sins, founded in the merit of Christ, and promised in the gospel, and with singular trust applies it to himself, that he may be justified and eternally saved. Whichever articles of faith enter into the given definition of saving faith, they are of the class of constituent, or formal, articles of faith. Which we shall enumerate in decent order.

I. It is concerning the triune God, the efficient cause of faith, justice, and salvation; although the bestowal of the strength to believe is appropriated in the sacred letters to the Holy Spirit, whom Paul calls the Spirit of faith, 2 Cor. IV, 13.

II. It is concerning sin and the sinner, inasmuch as he is the remote material cause, in which faith is ignited.

III. It is concerning the word of God, as the means of grace and salvation, by which the sinner not maliciously resisting is converted and regenerated, just as the object of faith is offered.

IV. It is concerning the conversion of the sinner, in so far as in the strictest sense it denotes the gracious action of God, by which he inhibits, breaks, and crushes the will and heart of man in the midst of the state of sin through the word of the law, so that he may be seriously sorry and contrite for his sins; the immediate effect of which is contrition. The contrite sinner is the proximate subject to whom faith is given.

V. It is concerning regeneration, which indeed is the gracious action of the Holy Spirit, by which to the contrite sinner both the strength to believe and faith itself are given.

VI. It is concerning the justifying grace of God, the effect of which is the remission of sins and the imputed righteousness of Christ.

VII. It is concerning Christ the mediator, and his satisfaction and merit, in which the justifying grace of God is founded. But the justifying grace of God founded in the merit of Christ, and promised in the gospel, is the object of saving faith.

VIII. It is concerning saving faith itself, in so far as it is an "apprehending instrument" (ὄργανον ληπτικόν), or a means on the part of the converted and reborn sinner, accepting with undoubted trust the grace of God, the merit of Christ, and the evangelical promise, and singularly applying them; in which fiducial acceptance consists the form of faith.

IX. It is concerning eternal salvation, as the ultimate end of saving faith.

Obs. 1. The enumerated constituent fundamental articles of faith can be comprehended in the following dogmatic thesis: God, moved by a most profound mercy for the fallen human race, converts and regenerates all miserable sinners who do not maliciously resist the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit, through his most efficacious word; the reborn, on account of the satisfaction of Christ the mediator, offered in the evangelical promise, and accepted and singularly applied by true trust of the heart, he justifies, and wills to save the justified eternally. The man, a wayfarer corrupted by sin, who is to obtain remission of sins and eternal salvation, rests on this foundation, and subsumes and concludes in the following manner: I am a most miserable sinner, not so resisting the operation of the Holy Spirit, that I rather willingly admit his word, devotedly hear it, assiduously meditate on it; I seriously acknowledge, grieve for, and detest my committed sins; with undoubted trust, given to me by the Holy Spirit, I accept the grace of God, which pardons sins on account of the satisfaction of Christ, and is offered in the evangelical promise, and I apply it to myself as an individual. Therefore I certainly believe that God remits my sins, imputes the righteousness of Christ to me, and will save me eternally. The major contains the very foundation of faith and salvation. The minor is confirmed by conscience, illuminated by the word of God. The conclusion therefore, resting on the foundation of faith and salvation, is most certain.

Obs. II. Although the commemorated articles of faith proximately respect the real foundation of faith and salvation, namely Christ the mediator; they do not, however, fully and plainly complete the total and adequate dogmatic foundation of faith and salvation, but for its consummation and consolidation on the part of our cognition, the antecedent and consequent fundamental articles of faith are also required. This we learn from Hebr. VI, 1, 2, where the apostle gravely says: "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment." From which words it becomes clearly known that the apostle counts not only the divine dogmas concerning faith in God and the conversion of the sinner, but also concerning baptism, and for the same reason concerning the Holy Eucharist, concerning the ecclesiastical ministry, concerning the resurrection of the dead and the last judgment, as part of the doctrinal foundation of faith. (*)

Proof b. Before a sinner who is to attain eternal salvation conceives justifying faith in Christ, it is necessary that he presuppose certain dogmas divinely revealed for the salvation of men. Presupposition

I. is concerning the existence of the best, most powerful, wisest, and truest God, the creator, preserver, and governor of this universe, the most benign remunerator of benefactors, the most just avenger of malefactors. This presupposition the apostle inculcates in Hebr. XI, 6: "He who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek him." For if there were no God, there would be no mediator. For Christ is the mediator of God and men. 1 Tim. II, 5.

II. For the foul deformity of sin and the misery of the sinner to be rightly weighed, the image of God must be foreknown, which shone most splendidly in the first-formed humans, and which being lost through the Adamic fall, sin deformed men by an immense amount.

(*) That his opinion on that passage is different, namely that it refers to the illustrious types of the O.T., signifying the future Christ, which were indeed "the word of the beginning of Christ" (ὁ τῆς ἀρχῆς τοῦ χριστοῦ λόγος), and of which we now see the "perfection" (τελειότητα), the complement and consummation in our Jesus, and that those types are therefore indicated by these words, I have demonstrated with clear arguments, especially from the scope of this entire epistle, as well as from other places near this one, in my tenth sacred dissertation, chapter VII.

III. The divine authority and infallible truth of the Word of God, considered as a means of grace and salvation, must be presupposed; unless it possessed this, it would not strike the heart of the sinner with a prevailing force, or penetrate it to detest sins and conceive faith in Christ.

IV. To the dogma of the conversion of the sinner must be prefixed the part of Christian doctrine concerning the lack of free will in spiritual things, so that the blinded and depraved sinner, having acknowledged his innate and maliciously contracted misery, may permit himself wholly to the grace of the Holy Spirit, who begins and perfects conversion.

V. Regeneration is preceded by the call to the church and to repentance, as well as illumination through the law and the gospel.

VI. The justifying grace of God is preceded by the celestial doctrine of the universal benevolence of God, by which, having mercy on all and singular sinners, he destined a mediator, whose satisfaction for the sins of the whole world he decreed to accept graciously; so that miserable sinners might make it their own, he willed to confer faith on all not maliciously resisting, to obtain which he ordained and proposed to all men most efficacious means. Unless this universal mercy of God pre-existed, neither faith in Christ, nor the remission of sins, nor eternal salvation would exist.

VII. To know Christ the mediator, the doctrine of the deity and humanity of Christ is prerequisite, and of the personal union of the two natures in Christ, that he is true God and true man, and free from sin and the power of sinning; if he had not been, he could not have atoned for sins with his blood. But immediately presupposed to the satisfaction and merit of Christ is its sufficiency and universality, as regards the intention of applying on the part of God, which is not indeed the proximate matter of trust, but the doctrine immediately underlying it; just as the universality of his merit manifestly follows from the universality of this divine benevolence which underlies faith. It cannot indeed happen that he who hopes for the grace of God on account of Christ's satisfaction does not think whether that satisfaction is so abundant that he himself can obtain it, or whether God also wills that he himself should enjoy it? But in the very act when someone trusts in the divine goodness on account of the merit of Christ, it is not necessary that it should happen that at the same time in one concept he should be solicitous about universality or sufficiency, provided he has firmly and undoubtedly presupposed it; these are the words of the blessed HÜLSEMANN in his dissertation "De Dogmatibus ad salutem creditu necessariis," p. 491.

VIII. The fiducial application of Christ's merit is preceded by the knowledge of Christ and the assent given to the evangelical promise.

IX. The sinner, believing that he will be made a partaker of eternal salvation by the grace of God on account of the satisfaction of Christ apprehended by true faith, presupposes the divine dogmas concerning death, in so far as it is a transition to eternal life, concerning the resurrection of the dead and the last judgment. Those parts of Christian doctrine now recited, which expound the presuppositions of faith, are commonly called the antecedent fundamental articles of faith.

Proof c. In the consequent fundamental articles of faith are explained those things to be believed which follow, confirm, and a posteriori certify, preserve and increase, exercise and declare justifying faith. Of which class is

I. the article of faith concerning the word of God, as a means of grace and salvation. For although we have referred it above among the proximate causes of generating faith, yet its frequent meditation, hearing, and reading stabilizes and increases faith. The apostle Peter teaches this, 1 Epist. II: "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby." The word of God is not only the seed by which faith is generated, 1 Pet. 1:23, but also the skimmed milk by which it is nourished, increased, and strengthened.

II. Concerning the sacrament of baptism, someone might perhaps count the doctrine of baptism among the constituent fundamental articles of faith, because infants are regenerated by it, John III, 5, and put on Christ, Gal. III, 27. But infants rather feel the efficacy of baptism than presuppose a knowledge of the efficacy of baptism, in the opinion of D. QUENSTEDT in his "Systema Theologicum," proemium, p. 9. The baptism of adults seals and increases the faith drawn from the word of God, since, like circumcision, it is today a seal of the righteousness of faith. Rom. IV, 1.

III. Concerning the sacrament of the supper. For it was instituted by the savior, so that the true and substantial body of Christ, taken in and with the bread, may certify every partaker that that body which he eats was given into death for him; that the blood which he drinks was shed for him in particular and as an individual, so that with firm and indivisible trust he may adhere to his Savior.

IV. Concerning the mystical union of the reborn soul with God, from which arises the confirmation of faith, and the sense of the same. The apostle speaks of the sense of faith, 2 Cor. XIII, 5: "Examine yourselves, to see whether you are in the faith; test yourselves." Or do you not know yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you? In whom Jesus Christ graciously dwells, they know that they themselves are ingrafted into Christ by faith, while they test and prove their faith by the purpose of living piously, by the peace of conscience, by internal joy, and by the living hope to which they have been reborn, through the resurrection of Christ from the dead. 1 Pet. 1:3. But he who proves his faith by accurate examination, has a sense and experience of it. Concerning the confirmation of faith the same apostle says, 2 Cor. 1:22: "God has sealed us and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." God, by sending his Holy Spirit into our hearts, has confirmed faith, righteousness, and the hope of the future inheritance.

V. Concerning renewal, or sanctification, the effects of which are good works, by which a living faith is brought forth and shown; and if these do not follow justifying faith, it is extinguished and vanishes. St. James warns us of this, c. II, 18, 20: "Show me your faith by your works." Do you want to know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? As the presence of works a posteriori demonstrates the presence of justifying faith; so the absence of good works is an indication of a dead faith.

VI. Concerning the church. For since Christ is the head and king of the church, to defend it, lest the gates of hell overcome it, Matth. XVI, 18, the trust of the reborn is greatly strengthened, because they are confident that they, as living members of the church under the rule and protection of Christ, will be defended no more from the snares of the devil and the allurements of the world, than from its rage and the predominance of the flesh.

VII. Concerning the ecclesiastical ministry, whose work the Holy Spirit uses to apply to the man to be saved the means of grace and salvation. Wherefore the apostle graphically depicts the office of the ministers of the church, 1 Cor. IV, 1: "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." He who is to be held and reputed as a minister of God, is to be esteemed by divine faith as a divine organ, which the Holy Spirit uses to excite and confirm trust in Christ.

Question XXI. Which articles of faith are secondary fundamental?

Secondary fundamental articles of faith.

The secondary fundamental articles of faith are those whose simple ignorance does not hinder salvation; but whose persistent denial or impugning undermines the foundation of faith. Such are the parts of Christian doctrine concerning the characteristic properties of the divine persons (a), concerning the communication of idioms in Christ (b), concerning original sin (c), concerning the decree of election in view of final faith (d), concerning the justification of the sinner by faith alone, excluding the merit of good works (e), etc.

Obs. I. The secondary articles of faith are not so much entire heads of the doctrine of faith, as parts and declarations of them. They are called articles of faith in a distributive sense, in so far as they are dogmas divinely revealed, cohering with the foundation of faith and salvation. They deserve and retain the name of fundamental articles, because the denial of any secondary article necessarily and always imports an error, indirectly adverse to the foundation of faith and salvation, and by which, through consequence, the foundation itself, or something without which it cannot be safe, is destroyed.

Obs. II. Although the simple ignorance of the secondary articles of faith does not hinder salvation, nevertheless, every effort must be made by the doctors of the church and schools, so that beginning Christians may from time to time make greater progress in knowing the salutary dogmas. For thus it will happen that they will offer a more ready and stronger assent to the primary fundamental articles, of which the secondary articles are certain declarations.

Proof a. Simpler men, initiated into the sacred rites of the Christians, believe with a simple faith in one God, who is and is called God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. They believe that God the Father is one, the Son of God is another, the Holy Spirit is another, and yet that there are not three Gods, but one true God, from whom are all things, and by whom they are conserved and governed. But it not rarely happens that the same people are ignorant of how a person differs from the essence? in what the personality of the Holy Spirit differs from the personality of the Son of God? or what is the proper and distinctive character of each? Which most simple ignorance, free from the opposite error, does not in itself condemn. But indeed if anyone should obstinately deny the eternal generation of the Son of God from the Father, and the eternal procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, he will either not venerate the Son of God and the Holy Spirit with the same religious worship with which God the Father is worshipped; or with the Sabellians he will confuse the three persons of the divinity, and consequently he will, as far as in him lies, overthrow the fundamental article concerning the one and triune God.

Proof b. A reborn man of duller intellect believes in Christ, true God and true man, the one mediator of God and men; but he does not grasp with his mind how the divine nature communicated its properties to the assumed human nature, and appropriated the idioms of the latter to itself; that simple ignorance does not hinder salvation. But if anyone should contumaciously deny the communication of idioms, flowing from the personal union of the two natures of Christ, he will consequently impugn the fundamental doctrine of faith concerning the hypostatic union of the two natures.

Proof c. To conceive faith in Christ, a knowledge of original sin derived from Adam to his posterity is not simply required; (for a sinner can seriously acknowledge, lament, and detest his own sins, who does not understand the original stain, especially acroamatically;) yet it is required to guard against the contrary opinion, which is the persuasion of perfect sanctity and the faculty of fully keeping the divine commands; if anyone is deceived by this, he does not arrive at a serious acknowledgment of sin and true contrition. But the proximate subject to whom saving faith is conferred is a contrite heart.

Proof d. You may find in the assembly of Christians simple people, firmly believing that they will obtain remission of sins and eternal salvation from God out of undue grace, on account of the merit of Christ, yet thinking nothing of the eternal decree of election made by God in view of final faith in Christ; the simple ignorance of election will not condemn these; but a malicious denial imports this consequence, that God in time does not save men in view of persevering faith in Christ; because the decree and its execution correspond accurately to each other.

Proof e. The justification of the converted sinner by faith in Christ is a constituent fundamental article of faith. But it happens that a sinner acknowledging and detesting his sins places all his trust in Christ the mediator, to whose memory the exclusion of good works does not occur. Who would condemn this person; but one who denies that a sinner is justified by faith in Christ alone, he impinges upon the primary fundamental articles concerning the grace of God and the merit of Christ.

Obs. A denial is made either by a pertinacious seducer, or by one who is seduced out of mere ignorance and simplicity, denying some dogma of faith. The denial of the former destroys the primary article of faith, which the ignorance of the latter leaves unharmed. The reason is, that the denial of a secondary article of faith is not adverse to the foundation of faith, except by consequence. But he who embraces that negative out of simplicity does not grasp the consequence. Therefore that denial can stand with the foundation of faith. On the contrary, a pertinacious denial brings with it an error contrary to the foundation of faith.

Question XXII. Are all fundamental articles of faith comprehended αὐτολεξεῖ or verbatim in Holy Scripture?

Some fundamental articles of faith are read ῥητῶς, or in express words, in the sacred letters (a). Some are contained in sacred scripture only διανοητικῶς and according to the sense, which are perceived from it by manifest and unmovable consequence (b).

Proof a. We read expressly written that there are three who bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one; 1 John V, 7. That Christ is true man, 1 Tim. II, 5; that the same is true God, 1 John V, 21; the one mediator of God and men, 1 Tim. II, 5; the only begotten son of God; John I, 14. That the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father; John XV, 26. That all nations are to be baptized. Matth. XXVIII, 19. By valid consequence we infer that God, one in essence, is three in persons; that God from eternity begot a son of the same substance (ὁμοούσιον); that Christ is one person consisting of two natures; that the Holy Spirit also proceeds from the Son of God; that infants are to be baptized, etc.

Question XXIII. Which articles of faith are non-fundamental?

Non-fundamental articles of faith. Non-fundamental articles of faith are parts of Christian doctrine that can be ignored and denied without loss of salvation.

Proof by examples. It is established that certain divinely revealed dogmas are debated on both sides. For example; Are the waters, divinely placed above the firmament, clouds, or super-celestial waters? Was the world created in the spring, or in the autumn? Was the first sin of the fallen angels envy, or pride? Will the future destruction of the world be substantial, or accidental? If a sinner, who is to attain eternal salvation, should be ignorant of, or deny, the super-celestial waters, he neither falls from the hope of salvation, nor will he destroy the foundation of faith, which indeed such questions or assertions do not touch.

Obs. In these extra-fundamental dogmas let us proceed cautiously, and not rashly embrace error, lest we sin against the very revelation of God. Especially let us teach nothing against conscience and with the seduction of others, nor let us impinge upon any fundamental article of faith.

Question XXIV. Are all articles of faith equally necessary to be known?

The necessity of the articles of faith. All fundamental articles of faith are necessary to be known, but with a different degree of necessity. For those articles of faith which both enter into the very definition of saving faith and immediately underlie the generation of faith are most necessary for a man to be saved to believe (a). Of the remaining articles of faith, some are positively and directly necessary to be believed, some negatively and indirectly (b). And if we consider believing men, the same measure of cognition is not required from all and singular (c).

Proof a. The divinely revealed dogmas, by which the proximate causes of saving faith are explained, can be neither ignored nor denied by any man who is to attain eternal salvation without the loss of eternal salvation; because they comprehend the dogmatic foundation of faith, on which the whole structure of faith and salvation rests. The immediate presuppositions have the closest connection with the foundation of faith: the universal "love for humanity" (Φιλανθρωπία) and grace of God, which destined and gave the mediator Christ, and is desirous of conferring faith on all men; and also the universality of the merit of Christ, so that the sinner, who is to attain eternal life, may descend under this universality to himself and subsume concerning himself as an individual: God wills to have mercy on me, who gave me the ordinary means, so that by my using them true faith may be conferred on me, by which I may believe without hesitation that Christ died for me, a most miserable sinner, not that I should perish, but that through him I may enter eternal life.

Proof b. The remaining articles of faith are either primary, contributing not a little to supporting and certifying faith in Christ, which are positively and directly necessary to be believed; or they are secondary, which are negatively and indirectly necessary to be known, since their denial by consequence undermines the foundation of faith.

Proof c. The necessity of knowing the articles of faith seems to be limited to some extent on the part of the believing subjects, of whom some converted men are simpler, others more perspicacious, some infants, others adults, some hearers, others doctors and pastors. Who would demand that degree of knowledge from a rustic which ought to be found in a lettered man? Talents vary, since God himself dispenses and distributes them unequally, giving to one a greater, to another a lesser measure of grace. States also vary, so that a man is now in a peaceful state, in which milk suffices him for the nourishment of faith; now in a turbulent state, where with the devil raging, tyranny growing strong, heretics spreading their poisons, there is need of more solid food, greater protections, and more medicines. To this is added that some are converted standing at the final rule of life; for some converted a greater space for living and thinking is left. To the former the doctrine of faith is to be proposed summarily, so that they may piously fall asleep in Christ the mediator; to the latter the same is to be more widely deduced and explained, so that they may grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and savior Jesus Christ, 2 Peter III, 18.

Obs. The sacred letters hand down the relationship of dogmas to salvation partly under the express necessity of believing for salvation; partly implicitly and by consequence. When the savior, in John XVII, 3, says: "This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent," he expressly signifies that the dogma concerning the true God is so necessary to be believed for salvation, that eternal life, that is, the way and manner of obtaining eternal life, consists in knowing and believing him. But the sacred scriptures hand down the relationship of dogmas to salvation implicitly and by consequence, when they reveal them, although not under the express necessity of believing; yet they so propose and declare them that they can be understood, from a deeper consideration of those dogmas themselves, to cohere with the foundation of salvation, Jesus Christ, by a necessary bond, and can be concluded by consequence. For from the consideration of them itself it will be clear that ultimately all things aim at faith in Christ, and by means of faith at obtaining salvation, as is expressly said in John XX, 31: "These are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name."

Question XXV. In which symbols is the sum of the Christian religion and articles of faith comprehended?

The more ancient symbols. The sum of the religion and articles of faith is contained in the more ancient and more recent symbols. The more ancient are the ecumenical or universal symbols, namely the Apostles' Creed (A), the Nicene (B), the Constantinopolitan (C), the Ephesian (D), the Chalcedonian (E), and the Athanasian (F).

Obs. (1) A symbol is so called from "bringing together" (ἀπὸ τοῦ συμβάλλειν), as if to say, contributed by many. To the Greeks, symbols were called tokens or signs, by which either soldiers in wars were distinguished from enemies (in German, a field sign, the watchword, the password); or by which other men in pacts and agreements, in place of tablets or written contracts, used. Confer Vossius, "On the Symbols," th. 9, 16, 17. Among Christians, therefore, symbols are confessions by which they testify both to their spiritual warfare, that they fight under the banner of King Christ against the devil and his associates, and to the pact entered into with God in baptism.

What are symbolic books? Obs. (2) More lengthy symbols comprehended in a decent order are commonly called symbolic books, which are public confessions, written in the name of the church by orthodox men concerning certain articles of faith with most serious counsel, so that the members of the orthodox church may be separated from the ignorance of the infidels and heretical depravity, and may be contained in a consonant profession of faith.

A. The Apostles' Creed is so called materially, by reason of the dogmas which are contained in that symbol, and which conspire perfectly with the apostolic doctrine comprehended in the sacred letters. But that it was consigned in as many words as it is recited today in the church by the apostles themselves cannot be clearly proved. For if it had been written with most serious counsel and handed down to the entire church by the apostles themselves after the miraculous effusion of the Holy Spirit, before they went out into the world to preach the gospel of Christ, as a universal epitome of things to be believed, certainly Luke, the most diligent writer of the Acts of the Apostles, would not have wrapped a matter of such great moment, and most worthy of narration above others, in silence. Who would believe that the Holy Spirit, who destined this symbol for the use of the catholic church, would have made not the slightest mention of the symbol throughout the entire canon of scripture? We nevertheless willingly receive that symbol, which, on account of the dogmas which it embraces, is called apostolic, and is approved by the entire Christian church. We receive it, I say, not because it contains all things to be believed explicitly, adequately, and specifically. For some fundamental articles of faith are passed over in silence in the Apostles' Creed. Nothing is explicitly handed down in it concerning the universal benevolence of God, concerning the satisfaction and merit of Christ, concerning conversion and regeneration, concerning the mystical union of the reborn with God, concerning renewal, concerning sin and penitence, concerning the word of God and the sacraments; although the apostle, in informing catechumens, laid the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith in God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of the laying on of hands, of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment. Hebr. VI, 1, 2. We receive it therefore, because it is an epitome of many, but not of all, articles of faith.

B. The Nicene Creed is named from Nicaea, a town in Bithynia, where in the year of Christ 325, with Constantine the Great, the Emperor, presiding, the first ecumenical council was held by 318 bishops against the heresy of Arius, who denied the true divinity of Christ. The fathers gathered in this council repeated and declared the Apostles' Creed with a few dogmas added.

C. The Constantinopolitan Symbol took its name from the most splendid city of Thrace, or Romania, Constantinople, where the second ecumenical council was celebrated against Macedonius, who had impugned the divinity of the Holy Spirit, in the year of Christ 383. 150 bishops attended it, who, having repeated the Nicene Creed, inserted a few things about the divinity of the Holy Spirit.

D. The Ephesian Symbol, approved in the year of Christ 431 by 230 bishops, is contained in the twelve anathemas of Cyril against Nestorius. It obtained its name from Ephesus, the most famous city of Ionia.

E. The Chalcedonian Symbol is named from Chalcedon, a city of Bithynia, and was subscribed in the year of Christ 453 by 630 bishops against the Eutychian errors.

F. The Athanasian Creed is commonly so called, although it is most uncertain whether it was written in as many words as it is read in the church today by Athanasius himself, in the opinion of D. CARPZOV in his "Isagoge in Libros Symbolicos," p. 72. This, however, is certain, that that symbol is very ancient, and that it sanctifiedly embraces and defends the faith which Athanasius, surrounded by the most present dangers, strenuously defended for the course of so many years against the Arians; so that even for this reason it can be called Athanasian with every right. It is numbered by some among the universal symbols by reason of its common approbation, since it was received with great consensus by the Roman, Constantinopolitan, Alexandrian, Bulgarian, and other churches, as BARONIUS testifies, tom. III, Annales, ad an. Christi 390, 559.

Question XXVI. Which are the more recent symbols?

The more recent symbols. The more recent symbols of our churches are the unaltered Augsburg Confession (a), the Apology of the Augsburg Confession (b), the Smalcald Articles (c), Luther's Minor and Major Catechism (d), the Epitome of XI Articles, and also the Solid Declaration, which is specially called the Formula of Concord (e).

a. The unaltered Augsburg Confession was exhibited in the year of Christ 1530 to Charles V, the Emperor, in the most solemn diet of the Roman Empire at Augsburg. It is called unaltered to distinguish it from the varied one, which was interpolated by Philip Melancthon on his own initiative and published at Wittenberg in the year 1540. The Augsburg Confession comprises XXI doctrinal articles and VII heads concerning abuses introduced into the church.

b. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession is that by which the confession itself was defended against the pontifical confutation, prepared at Augsburg, by order of the Princes and States, during the diet, with Philip as author. It was indeed offered to the Caesar, but was not received by him. It was printed at Wittenberg in the year 1531.

c. The Smalcald Articles were written by the blessed LUTHER in the year of Christ 1537, to be presented to the council, if any should be held, in the name of the evangelical church.

d. Luther's Minor and Major Catechism succinctly embrace and nervously explain the heads of Christian doctrine; to be esteemed very highly, as a notable jewel and treasure of our church, which we consider to be, as it were, the bible of the laity.

e. The Formula of Concord is taken in two ways, (a) generally and totally, for all the symbolic books of the evangelical church collected into one volume; (3) specially and partially, for the epitome of XI articles, and their solid declaration, about which controversies had arisen among the theologians devoted to the Augsburg Confession. The authors were D. JACOBUS ANDREAE, D. MARTINUS CHEMNITIUS, D. ANDREAS MUSCULUS, D. DAVID CHYTRAEUS, D. NICOLAUS SELNECCERUS, D. CHRISTOPHORUS CORNERUS. It was published in the year 1580.

Question XXVII. What is the difference between sacred scripture and the symbolic books?

The difference between sacred scripture and the LL. Symb. Sacred scripture and the symbolic books differ (a). Because 1) sacred scripture is immediately inspired by God to the holy men of God, moved by the Holy Spirit; The symbolic books are sacred writings, consigned by orthodox men, divinely endowed with the privilege of mediate illumination (b). 2) Sacred scripture is "worthy of faith in itself and indemonstrable" (αὐτόπιστος καὶ ἀναπόδεικτος), worthy of faith through itself, and not in need of a prior principle from which it may be demonstrated; The symbolic books are "consequently worthy of faith" (ἐπομένως ἀξιόπιστοι), that is, they consequently deserve faith, because they are conformed to the revealed word of God (c). 3) Sacred scripture possesses divine canonical authority, so as to be an infallible norm by which true dogmas of faith are discerned from false; The symbolic books have ecclesiastical authority, and are respectively called a norm, namely with respect to the external profession of faith, by which we testify to the unanimous consent of the church in the doctrine of faith (d). 4) Sacred scripture adequately contains all things to be believed and to be done; No symbolic book perfectly embraces all and singular dogmas of faith and precepts of morals.

Proof a. When Paul, in 2 Tim. III, 16, says: "πᾶσα γραφή θεόπνευστος" (all scripture is God-breathed), he expresses with singular emphasis "θεοπνοή" (theopnoē), or immediate divine inspiration. D. QUENSTEDT, intending to explain this in his "Systema," fol. 100, writes thus: "θεοπνοή (theopnoē)" in this passage does not denote the general concurrence of God with all creatures, nor the special or gracious one, by which God is present to all the faithful, but a most special and extraordinary one, a concurrence proper only to the sacred writers, which embraces (1) a certain "supernatural and extraordinary illumination" (ἐλλαμπιν) of the mind, which happened like some kind of flashing and irradiation, and indeed not in the manner of a permanent habit, but of a transient act; (2) a peculiar mode, instinct, afflatus, impulse, and dictation of the Holy Spirit to write this and not something else. To this, add that even the individual words of the original Hebrew text in the old, and of the Greek in the new testament, were dictated into the pen by the Holy Spirit. For if the individual words had not been suggested to the sacred writers through "θεόπνευσία" (theopneustia, "divine inspiration"), the sacred scripture would not properly, not absolutely and simply, but improperly and in a certain respect, and at least as to the concepts of the things signified, be, and could be said to be, "θεόπνευστος" (theopneustos), just as a scripture translated by human study into another language cannot properly, absolutely, and simply be called "θεόπνευστος" (theopneustos), because the formal words themselves, of which it consists, were not suggested by the Holy Spirit through inspiration, although in a certain respect it can be called "approximately God-breathed" (προσεγγίζοντος θεόπνευτος), namely as to the concepts of the things, once inspired in the sacred writers, which are signified by the words of the version, as D. MUSAEUS rightly teaches in his "Introductio Theologica," p. 258. In which strictest sense no symbol of the church can be called "θεόπνευστος" (theopneustos). For although orthodox men, illuminated by the Holy Spirit, conceived it in their mind and committed it to letters, they did not, however, write from a most special, extraordinary, and immediate inspiration of God, but were endowed and taught by God with an ordinary and mediate illumination. Nor were the individual words of the symbolic books dictated into their pens by the Holy Spirit, but with God assisting and directing, they themselves found suitable words and applied them to the divine dogmas.

Proof b. The word of God, revealed and committed to letters, is not only the word of truth, Eph. 1, 13, but also truth itself, John XVII, 17, and therefore deserves faith through itself and immediately. The Symbols of the Church are deduced by consequence from the written word of God, and are conformed to it, and thus "consequently" (ἐπομένως) and consequently they conciliate faith to themselves. D. LOBECK does not speak ill, in his work on the Augsburg Confession, p. 16: "We have faith in the Augsburg Confession on account of the scripture, because it was built from it."

Proof c. That the sacred scripture is an adequate norm for all those things which pertain to faith and morals is clearly established, since it is expressly called their

(the apostles') line or rule, Ps. XIX, 5, "canon" (κανών), Gal. VI, 16, Phil. III, 16. It obtained the name of norm or canon both because of direction, since the truth of faith and the honesty of morals are directed according to it, and because of correction, since the dogmas of faith and precepts of morals come to be accurately examined by it, so that whatever agrees with it is retained as right and pious, and whatever disagrees from it is rejected as erroneous or impious. But no symbol of the church is absolutely and simply the norm of faith and morals, but is called a norm in a certain respect and relatively, with respect to certain churches, which presuppose the truth and certainty of the symbols proved from scripture. For no symbolic book begets or prescribes faith, although a faith already begotten can be strengthened by it, and the external profession of faith can be determined by it for retaining the consensus of doctrine and avoiding dissensions. Conf. CARPZOV. "Isagoge in Libros Symbolicos," pag. 6. By D. QUENSTEDT, a symbolic book is called a tesseral and testimonial norm of the public doctrine which the church professes with great consensus, in his "Systema," fol. 46.

Proof d. No symbolic book is an adequate catalog of all fundamental dogmas of faith, but according to the reason of the time and occasion in which the symbolic books were written, account was taken of those dogmas which were controversial and most impugned. But Holy Scripture perfectly embraces whatever is necessary for a man who is to attain eternal salvation to believe and to do. This will be proved more fully and more clearly below.

You say I. Even the symbolic books are named "θεόπνευστοι" (theopneustoi, "God-breathed") by theologians. For D. GEORG. MYLIUS in his explanation of the Augsburg Confession, p. 2, says: "Because the Augsburg Confession rests on the most firm foundation of the Holy Scriptures, we can and ought to call it θεόπνευστον (theopneuston) with the best right." D. HUNTERUS in his explanation of the Book of Concord, p. 1, writes: "We constitute the primary author of the Book of Concord, or the 'principal cause' (αἰτίον κύριον), not any man, whether theologian or politician; but God the Holy Spirit himself, the fount and giver of all good; so much so that we do not hesitate to call it 'θεόπνευστον' (theopneuston), divinely inspired." Resp. Paul in 2 Tim. III, 16, names the Scripture "θεόπνευστον" (theopneuston) in the strictest sense, because both the concepts of the things and the words of scripture are immediately inspired by God. But the aforementioned theologians call the symbolic books mediately "θεόπνευστους" (theopneustous) in a broader sense. For D. MYLIUS gives a clear reason for the mediate "θεόπνευστία" (theopneustia), because it rests on the most firm foundation of the Holy Scriptures; and D. HUNTERUS in the same passage adds: "with this distinction being preserved, however, which exists between the holy scriptures and the symbolic or ecclesiastical writings." Which distinction he explains on p. 4. Namely, in a broader sense, the symbolic books are called "θεόπνευστοι" (theopneustoi) by some authors (1) by reason of their object, since they contain and expound the word of God once immediately inspired to the prophets and apostles, and whatever is elicited from the word of God by manifest consequence. Let us listen to our great CHEMNITIUS, distinguishing excellently concerning the Symbols of the church, part III, loc. theol. fol. m. 235: "They (the ancients) indeed confirm their interpretations with the testimonies of the symbols of the ancient church; but those symbols are not something outside of or against scripture, but are the very marrow of scripture." (2) By reason of mediate illumination; for we do not doubt that God with a special concurrence influenced the minds of the faithful doctors who wrote the symbols of the church, illuminated their minds, and bent their wills, so that they conceived the truest and most salutary dogmas in their minds and expressed them with the pen. Just as Job also says generally in chapter XXXII, 8: "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty gives them understanding." The LXX rendered it: "πνοή παντοκράτορος ἐστὶν ἡ διδάσκουσα" (the breath of the Almighty is that which teaches). Specifically concerning the Nicene Confession, ISIDORE of Pelusium says in book IV, ep. 99: "Divinely inspired, it handed down the truth of the dogmas."

You say II. The symbolic writings are divine, see CARPZOV, "Isagoge in Libros Symbolicos," p. 3. Therefore they possess divine canonical authority, and are simply the norm of things to be believed and done. Resp. D. CARPZOV in that passage expressly calls the symbols secondarily divine, namely on account of their mediate origin, which they owe to God. But it does not follow from this; Therefore, the symbols are eminent with divine canonical authority, and are absolutely the norm of faith and morals. For for a norm of doctrine of faith and morals, certainty and absolute infallibility is also required on the part of the words, which excludes all danger of error. But infallibility and absolute certainty on the part of the words is not given, except from the immediate dependence of the words on God inspiring them; which indeed does not have a place, except in the original text of sacred scripture in Hebrew and Greek. See D. MUSAEUS, "Introductio in Theologiam," p. 540. We do not deny in the meantime that the symbolic writings can be called divine in a sound sense, since they deal with God, are conformable to the divine word, and were written by the instinct of the Holy Spirit, nor are they destitute of peculiar documents of divine governing providence. In common usage of speaking, we call divine whatever is not only of immediate, but also of mediate origin from God. For we know that Lactantius also wrote books of divine institutions.

You say III. The symbolic books are human writings. Therefore they are not even respectively a norm, namely under the respect of the external profession of faith in a consenting church. Resp. A human writing is said to be so either by reason of its external form, or by reason of the matter which it embraces. The symbolic books, if you respect their external form and composition, are not immediately from God, but from men; if you attend to the matter or doctrine which the symbolic books contain, that is certainly celestial and divine; in view of which it is dangerous to call the symbolic books human writings without an added declaration; since we call the vocation to the ministry, if peculiar signs of the divine will appear, not human, but divine.

Question XXVIII. Can a man be bound by an oath to subscribe to the symbolic books?

On the subscription to the Symbolic Books. No one who is not a member of that church which approves the symbolic books can be bound by an oath to the doctrine of faith which is contained in the symbols (a). But he who is a living member of the church, and intends to perform the public office of teaching in it, can be obligated by the superior magistrate to a sworn subscription to the symbolic books (b).

Proof a. An oath is taken for the confirmation of a truth acknowledged and approved in the conscience. Therefore no one is to be obligated by an oath to embrace a doctrine which he does not approve; for he would be compelled unwillingly to profess some dogma as true, which in the internal judgment of his mind he deems to be false.

Proof b. To the right of directing the external exercise of religion, which is in the power of the magistrate, pertains the demanding of a sworn approbation and subscription to the symbolic books, so that he who is to teach publicly in the church may be the more bound to the consonant confession, explication, and defense of the public doctrine. For we read that even the most pious princes of the old testament obligated the people under the formula of a covenant, so that they might amicably conspire in the harmonic observation and propagation of the Israelite religion. The examples of Moses are known, Deut. XXXI, 10 & seqq., of Joshua, c. XXIV, 25, of Josiah, 2 Kings XXIII, 3.

You say 1. An oath of this kind violates the liberty of consciences. Resp. The liberty of consciences would be violated, if a man not approving the doctrine comprehended in the symbols, and thus unwillingly, were compelled to a sworn subscription to the symbolic books; but we by swearing only externally profess what we internally knowingly and willingly believe.

You say II. The apostle warns in 1 Thess. V, 19: "Do not quench the Spirit." But it is quenched when the freer use of the gifts of the Holy Spirit is impeded by an exacted oath. Resp. Not the use, but the abuse of the gifts, which is noxious to the church, is impeded by a sworn subscription to the symbols.

Question XXIX. Are the symbolic books necessary?

The necessity of the Symbolic Books. The symbolic books are necessary not absolutely (a), but hypothetically, for the state of the church, moved by the gravest causes to publish symbols (b).

Proof a. There was a time when the church stood and flourished without written symbols. See D. CALOV, "Systema," tom. I, pag. 247, & D. CARPZOV, "Isagoge in Libros Symbolicos," p. 1136.

Proof b. The symbolic books are necessary by a necessity of expediency (1) for establishing a solid, lasting, and firm concord in the church of God, so that a certain compendious form and, as it were, a type approved by unanimous consent may exist; in which the common doctrine, which the churches professing a purer doctrine hold, collected from the word of God, may be contained. See Preface to the Solid Declaration, Formula of Concord, p. 631. (2) For rendering an account of the Christian religion, if it is demanded by the magistrate. (3) For distinguishing the true members of the church from its enemies, heretics, and schismatics. Conf. D. RECHENBERG, Appendix to the Symbolic Books, p. 3.

Question XXX. Since the Christian religion consists not only of things to be believed, but also of things to be done; it is not idly asked, what do we understand by things to be done?

Things to be done are the works of the reborn, with the Holy Spirit graciously concurring, to be performed according to the prescription of the divine law, from true faith in Christ, for the glory of God and the edification of the church.

Obs. Agendas can also be defined as the duties of Christians, to be performed according to the norm of the divine law from the powers of grace conferred by the Holy Spirit, with true faith showing the way, for the glory of God and the benefit of the neighbor.

Question. XXXI. What is opposed to true religion?

The opposites of true religion are both false religion and atheism, or irreligiousness.

Opposed to true religion. False religion is that by which either false Gods are worshiped, or the true God is not truly worshiped (a).

Irreligiousness is that by which impious men hold all religion in contempt, so that, having denied the providence of God and His vindictive justice, they take it upon themselves to perpetrate anything with impunity and security (b).

Prob. a. The gentiles worshiped false Gods, who, since they are ignorant of the true God, partly worshiped men, renowned for memorable deeds, as Gods, and partly attributed religious worship to other creatures. Paul, about to sketch their idolatry in Rom. 1:23, says: "They exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of an image of corruptible man, and of birds, and of four-footed animals and of reptiles." Various false theologians do not truly worship the true God, who do not honor Him in that way in which He has revealed both Himself and His will in His word; see their false theology delineated above on p. 32, 33, 34.

Prob. b. Ps. XIV, 1. "The fool has said in his heart; there is no God." The impious man, persisting in a state of sin, proceeds to such a madness that, if not the existence, he certainly denies the providence and justice of God, wishing from his soul that there existed no omnipresent, omniscient, and most just avenger of crimes.

SUSPIRIUM

Dou, GOD, thrice best, thrice greatest, with sincere and never-failing vows we ask and beseech You, that You may fill us all, united by the covenant of the Christian religion, with your most HOLY SPIRIT, fortify us with heavenly virtue, instruct us with the gifts of grace, so that we may worship You with our whole heart, burn with love for You, and all of us together commit ourselves to perpetual obedience to You, and express the sincerity of our religion through pious works and testify that our deeds correspond to our words. Moreover, You, most powerful governor of the church, restrain the petulance of the enemies of celestial truth, break their wicked attempts, dissipate all their machinations, so that true religion may not be crushed or utterly destroyed by them, but by Your protection may endure safe and sound, and among the most joyful growths may flourish, thrive, and triumph!

CHAPTER III.
PRESENTING
PROLEGOMENON III.
CONCERNING THE PROPER AND ADEQUATE PRINCIPLE OF THEOLOGY.

Question I. What do you understand here by the name of principle?

BY THE NAME of principle here is understood the principle of knowing, and that incomplex, which is the source of complex theological principles, upon which our entire theology rests.

Proved. Since every theological truth is either demonstrating or to be demonstrated; and indeed the demonstrating truth is called a principle, the one to be demonstrated a conclusion, by accepted usage of speaking: the laws of good method demand that in the light of theology the incomplex principle, or the source and primordial element, from which all reasons for proving in universal theology are sought, be foreknown.

Obs. I. Theophrastus, according to Alexander in his preface to the first book of the Topics, defined an incomplex principle as "a certain beginning or element from which we take the principles of each thing" (ἀρχή τις, ἡ σοιχεῖον ἀφ' οὗ λαμβάνομεν τὰς περὶ ἕκαστον ἀρχάς). It is commonly called the source of apodictic principles.

Obs. II. There is a threefold source of apodictic principles. 1. The source of reason. 2. The source of experience. 3. The source of authority worthy of faith. Philosophical and medical principles are derived from the source of reason and experience. Juridical principles flow from the source of imperial, royal, or princely authority, though at times the source of reason and experience is also joined. Theological principles emanate from the source of divine authority. Conf. D. LEICHNER'S Synopsis of True Apodictics, p. 392.

Obs. III. A complex principle is a prior and more known proposition, from which another, which is less known and comes into question, is validly proved. These complex principles are distinguished into primary and derived. Primary are called those which have no prior or higher principle from which their truth can be demonstrated. They are otherwise called principles "par excellence" (κατ' ἐξοχήν), because they never become conclusions. They are called by Aristotle, in Posterior Analytics, book 1, ch. 2, "immediate" (ἄμεσα), because they do not recognize a prior middle term; "indemonstrable" (ἀναπόδεικτα), that is, a priori; "infallible" (ἀνυπεύθυνα); "self-evidently trustworthy" (ἀντόπισα); "beyond controversy" (ἀναντίρρητα). For example: In metaphysics, the first principle is: it is impossible for the same thing to be and not to be at the same time. In physics, the first is: from nothing, nothing is naturally made. In ethics, the first is: moral good is to be loved, evil to be shunned.

Derived principles are called those which, with respect to the question to be demonstrated, are assumed as prior and more known, although they can be demonstrated from other principles and depend on them. They are otherwise named mediate, because they have a higher middle term; they are also specially called "demonstrable" (ἀποδεικτικά), because their truth is demonstrable from prior principles, e.g. An ethical principle is: one must live chastely, which is demonstrated from this: one must live temperately. This itself is proved, because one must live honestly. Which is notified from the first moral principle; Good is to be loved, and so progress is made to the first ethical principle.

Question II. On what principle of knowing does theology rest?

Christian theology rests on a most certain principle of knowing, namely divine revelation (a), and indeed, for the present state of the church, on mediated divine revelation, comprehended in the writings of the prophets and apostles (b). The principle of knowing theology is revelation. Whence the absolutely first complex principle of theology is; Whatever God has revealed is infallibly true. Its principle, first in a relative sense and for the present time, is; Whatever sacred scripture teaches is infallibly certain (c).

Obs. 1. The discussion here is not of general revelation or natural manifestation, by which God has revealed Himself both through the implanted light of nature and through the conspicuous effects in the kingdom of nature. See Rom. 1:19, ch. II:14-15. But we speak of special and supernatural revelation, which is twofold, immediate and mediate. The Holy Spirit immediately illuminated the prophets and apostles, and suggested to them the concepts of things and words concerning the dogmas of faith and morals. Today God reveals Himself and His will to the human race through the word written by the prophets and apostles.

Obs. II. Divine revelation sometimes, in the strictest sense which the force of the word itself implies, denotes the manifestation of hidden things latent under a kind of veil. Sometimes, in a broader sense, it designates the manifestation of any things, even those which can be known by the guidance of the light of nature, made by God in a supernatural way. The latter significance, as adequate, obtains here.

Obs. III. Divine revelation was made "in many portions and in many ways" (πολυμερῶς και πολυτρόπως). For one was made mediately, with the intervening ministry of angels and men; another immediately, without the intervention of other persons. Thus God revealed Himself I. by the address of an articulate voice formed in the air above the order of nature. That address was carried out by a sensible voice from God, appearing in a conspicuous form, or testifying to His presence by another sensible sign. Thus God appeared to the patriarchs in the form of a man, Gen. XVIII:2; XIX:1; XXII:24. He spoke to Moses from the burning bush, Exod. III:2. To the Israelite people from a dense cloud and smoking fire, Exod. XIX:10, seqq. He spoke with Moses very familiarly, or as scripture says, mouth to mouth, as a friend speaks face to face with a friend, Num. XII:6. II. Through a dream, when certain images were presented to those sleeping, their external senses being bound. Gen. XXVIII:12; Dan. 1:1. III. Through "ecstasy" (ἐκστασις), when images of things were presented to the imagination of waking men, with the external operation of the senses ceasing. Ezech. I:4; XXXVII:1; Dan. X:5. IV. To the priests, God revealed some things through Urim and Thummim, Exod. XXVIII:30; Lev. VIII:8; Num. XXVII:21. The Urim and Thummim were twelve gems inserted into the priest's breastplate, by which, when properly used, God, when suitably asked by the high priest, gave responses concerning hidden matters and uncertain events. D. PFEIFFER, vexing doubts, p. 276. V. Through an internal inspiration, by which the Holy Spirit, while the operation of the senses remained, immediately infused some light of knowledge into the intellect of the prophets and apostles. 2 Sam. XXIII:2; 2 Tim. III:16; 2 Pet. 1:20-21. VI. The most illustrious divine revelation occurred in the N.T. through the son of God, who "in His own person" (ἑαυτοπροσώπως), that is, in His own person manifested in the flesh appeared, and announced the will of God. John 1:18; Heb. 1:1.

Prob. a. That Christian theology is drawn from divine revelation, as from a source of theological principles, is clear from the fact that theology in its scope embraces the most sublime mysteries, in no way demonstrable or knowable from the principles of reason, which become known only from the supernatural revelation of God. From which the apostle of the gentiles in 1 Cor. II:7 calls Christian theology wisdom in a mystery: which the princes of this age do not recognize, v. 8—which God has revealed through his spirit, v. 10. Christian theology is full of the most profound mysteries, superior to the grasp of the princes of this age, revealed by God through the Holy Spirit. Therefore it rests on divine revelation as the most certain principle of knowing.

Prob. b. For the present time and the current state of the church, that H. scripture, in which the ancient divine revelations made to the prophets and apostles are had, is the proper, fundamental, and adequate principle of knowing God and divine things, is clearly demonstrated. I. From the words of St. John, chapter XX:31: "These things are written so that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God; and that believing you may have life in his name." Whatever scripture is divinely destined for this purpose, that all may believe in Christ through it to obtain eternal life, that must be a sufficient and saving principle of believing. But H. scripture, etc. Therefore. II. From the Pauline saying in 2 Tim. III:14-15: "But as for you, continue in what you have learned and have become convinced of, knowing from whom you learned it, and how from infancy you have known the holy scriptures, which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus." From which we argue: That which can make a man wise for salvation through faith in Christ, so that for that reason he must persevere in it, that is a sufficient principle of faith and theology. But sacred scripture is such. Therefore. III. From the saying of St. Paul in Rom. XV:4: "For whatever was written in former days was written for our instruction, that through patience and the encouragement of the scriptures we might have hope." From which arises the argument: That which is given for our instruction, and such that by it we may have hope of future salvation, is given to be a sufficient principle of theological doctrine and saving faith. But H. scripture etc. Therefore. IV. From the testimony of the same apostle, 2 Tim. III:16-17: "All scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, for rebuking, for correcting, for training in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, thoroughly equipped for every good work." Whatever scripture is so useful that it perfectly instructs the theologian for all parts of teaching, that is the fundamental and adequate principle of theology. But "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος) scripture is so useful etc. Therefore. The major premise is established, because that is the principle of theology from which the theologian draws all salutary knowledge for performing the parts of his office. The minor is Paul's, who openly asserts that H. scripture provides so much utility to the man of God, or doctor of the church, that through it he is rendered fit and well-instructed for every work of teaching: whether he meditates on teaching others celestial truth, or convincing the erring of their errors, or imbuing the ill-behaved with morals worthy of a Christian, or adding a spur to those running in the way of justice.

Prob. c. Although H. scripture, for the state of the present time, is the first principle of knowing the doctrine of faith, it is not, however, absolutely and simply the first principle, which is clear from the following syllogism: Whatever God has revealed is infallibly true. Whatever H. scripture teaches, that God has revealed (because it is "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος), 2 Tim. III:16). Therefore, whatever H. scripture teaches is infallibly true. In which syllogism H. scripture is principled, and its infallible truth is educed from another middle term. Yet it is rightly said to be the first principle of theology in a certain respect, namely for the present state of the church, to which for the present time no other equal, much less superior, principle of saving knowledge is to be considered. For after God willed that those things which are necessary to be known about revealed matters for salvation be comprehended in certain books; with new revelations ceasing, the habit of theology rests on those ancient revelations, made immediately to the prophets and apostles and committed to letters, as on a unique and adequate principle. Conf. D. HILDEBRANDVS in his theological institutions, p. 48, & D. BAIERVS in his compendium of theology, p. 70.

Question III. Is new and immediate revelation in the present time an ordinary principle of Christian theology?

After the completion of the canon of scripture, no new and immediate divine revelation is given which is a fundamental principle of knowing the doctrine of faith. Concerning new revelations. Prob. I. Because it has already been abundantly demonstrated by us that H. scripture, for the present state of the church, is the proper and adequate principle of saving knowledge, to which no other equal, much less superior, is to be sought anywhere, or expected. II. St. Paul gravely warns in 1 Cor. IV:6, "that you may learn not to go beyond what is written" (μάθητε τὸ μὴ ὑπὲρ ὃ γέγραπται φρονεῖν). As if he should say, let none of you presume to know about divine things beyond what God has revealed in the scriptures; since the apostle himself ingenuously and openly professes that he said nothing outside of what is written in Moses and the prophets. Acts XXVI:22. III. The apostle teaches in Heb.

1:1 that new and immediate revelations do not happen to mortals after the establishment of the canon of scripture: "In many portions and in many ways God of old spoke to the fathers in the prophets; in these last days He has spoken to us in His Son." Revelations in the Old Testament happened to the prophets "in portions" (πολυμερῶς), by turns, degrees, and as it were parts; and also "in various ways" (πολυτρόπως), diversely, by the address of a voice formed in the air, by a dream, by an ecstatic vision, by immediate illumination; but the most illustrious and most perfect manifestation of God and the divine will was made through the Son of God. He "explained" (ἐξηγήσατο) the gospel to us, and as a most learned exegete, declared it plainly and lucidly. John 1:18. Which evangelical doctrine was propagated by those who had heard the Lord Jesus, Heb. II:3, so that we need no new revelations. IV. A theological principle ought to be infallibly certain. But new revelations are fallacious, and subject to the tricks of satan; since this prince of darkness transforms himself into an angel of light, 2 Cor. XI:14, and a corrupt fantasy suggests to enthusiasts those things which they erroneously believe to have proceeded from God. Deut. XIII:1; Jer. XIV:14; XXIII:25 sq.

The Antithesis is that of the Enthusiasts, Anabaptists, Schwenckfeldians, Weigelians, and Quakers, who state that celestial wisdom is to be sought from the immediate revelation of the heavenly father, from the internal information of Christ essentially united with them, from the magisterium of the Holy Spirit speaking and teaching within, from dreams and raptures, from angelic conversations, whose arguments are:

I. St. John in his Epistle, ch. II:27, says: "The anointing which you received from him abides in you, and you have no need that anyone teach you." Those who do not need external information, but are fully taught by the anointing remaining within the soul, are immediately illuminated and informed by God. But the reborn etc. Therefore. Resp. That anointing commended by St. John is the Holy Spirit, the principal cause of faith, who informs us not immediately, but through the word. John II:14, 1 Thess. II:13, Rom. X:17. Nor do we have need that anyone teach us new and different things from what the prophets and apostles taught.

II. Joel II:28. "I will pour out of My Spirit on all flesh, and your sons and daughters will prophesy; your old men will dream dreams, and your young men will see visions." Resp. (1) St. Peter expressly refers the fulfillment of that promise to that time when the apostles visibly received the Holy Spirit. Acts II:16. (2) B. Luther simply understands by prophecy, vision, and dreams the knowledge of God through Christ, which the Holy Spirit makes to shine through the word of the gospel. But the prophet Joel speaks in a manner customary to prophets, who were accustomed to adumbrate the state of the new testament with figurative words, or with words suitable to the state of the Old testament. And so the sense is; God, most rich in mercy, seriously intends to pour out the grace of the Holy Spirit in the new testament upon all, so that they may know certainly and clearly those things which the men of God once knew through prophecies, dreams, and visions.

III. God in the N.T. instituted prophets, ennobled by the privilege of immediate illumination. Eph. IV:11; 1 Cor. XII:28. Resp. The apostle in the cited places speaks of the prophets of the N.T., to whom was divinely granted an extraordinary gift of prophesying in the constituted church; which, since it was temporary, did not remain perpetual in the church. For the gift of prophesying, or of speaking immediately by the spirit, just like the gift of healings and miracles, was for that reason temporary, because it was necessary for the church, at its beginning and in its first infancy, partly for preaching for the first time the mysteries of faith, which had been hidden for ages; partly for the easier progress of the preaching of the same doctrine, to be promulgated more and more throughout the world, and to be embraced in all places.

Instance I. Paul says; 1 Thess. V:19-20. "Do not quench the Spirit; do not despise prophecies," indicating that prophecies should never be condemned. Resp. By "Spirit" in this passage is understood the gifts of the Holy Spirit, by "prophecy" the interpretation of sacred scripture. But the Holy Spirit, most opulent in sanctifying and administrative gifts, is given from the hearing of faith, Gal. III:2. And scripture is to be explained by scripture. The apostle makes no mention of immediate revelation, which befalls the faithful today.

Instance II. If God today does not send prophets immediately illuminated by the Holy Spirit, certainly the evangelical church in our times will be in a worse state than the church under the old covenant, for which it was no less a great honor than a benefit that God from time to time raised up prophets, instructed with the gift of immediate inspiration. Resp. The happiness of the Christian church is to be estimated not by the abundant production of immediately illuminated prophets, but by the gospel preached by Christ manifested in the flesh, and most widely propagated by the apostles, and for the sake of "certainty" (ἀσφάλειαν), or certainty of knowledge, reduced to writing.

Instance III. If God from the foundation of the world revealed himself and his will immediately to the patriarchs and prophets, evangelists and apostles, then he also reveals himself immediately to holy men today. But the former is most true. Therefore the latter also. The consequence is clear, because we are joined with the patriarchs and prophets, evangelists and apostles by the covenant of one religion, and we have obtained a faith of equal standing with them, 2 Pet. I:1. But where there is one religion and one faith, there is one formal object, namely immediate divine revelation. Resp. (1) A distinction is made between the times preceding the completion of the canon of scripture, and those following it. Before the canon of scripture was completed, God revealed himself immediately to a few holy men, namely patriarchs and prophets, evangelists and apostles, but he manifested himself to a great multitude of men with the intervening ministry of divinely inspired men. From which Noah is called a preacher of justice, 2 Pet. II:5. Abraham commands his children to keep the way of the lord, and to do justice and judgment, Gen. XVIII:19. Jacob taught his family, Gen. XXXV. (2) There is one religion, and one faith, whose formal object is divine revelation, whether it be mediate or immediate. For revelation prescind from that which is immediate and that which is mediate; since he is said to reveal, who manifests some things, or the thoughts of his mind to another; this, however, not only he does, who speaks immediately to another, but also he who mediately, e.g., through a minister, a messenger, or through a secretary makes known to another what he wants him to know; now God partly immediately, partly mediately, has revealed himself and the decrees of his will. This the apostle teaches in Heb. 1:1. "In many portions, and in many ways God of old spoke to the fathers in the prophets." Where a twofold speaking, or a twofold revelation of God occurs, one to the prophets, which was immediate; the other through the prophets to the fathers, which was mediate.

Instance IV. God promised the faithful people in the N. Test. immediate illumination, Jer. XXXI:33. "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it on their hearts." Resp. What law God gave to His people to be read and heard, that He gave and inscribed on their hearts by the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit, not separated from the reading and hearing of the law, but most closely joined with it.

Instance V. Whoever's Spirit is in a man, and remains, to teach him all things, to suggest all things, to lead him into all truth, that Spirit reveals celestial truth immediately to the man. But the Holy Spirit etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from John XIV:16-17, 20; XVI:13. Resp. From the intention of Christ speaking, those promises primarily and proximately concern the instruction of the apostles for the function of the apostolic office, by which they had to serve all nations by preaching the gospel. Matt. XXVIII:19; Mark XVI:15. Therefore the disciples of Christ, since they were unlearned and illiterate, had to be fitted by the extraordinary benefit of immediate illumination to teach all nations, and to communicate to men new revelations about the Messiah manifested in the flesh, and about his office, and the other parts of Christian doctrine. Therefore, just as not all the faithful were to be apostles, 1 Cor. XII:28; so the promises which were made to the apostles do not pertain to all in the same way: nor, if anything was promised by Christ to be conferred on them immediately, is the same to be conferred on individual believers.

VI. The Holy Spirit makes us more certain of the state of grace by an immediate testimony, about which St. Paul says in Rom. VIII:16; "The Spirit Himself testifies with our spirit that we are children of God." Since this testimony is not rendered to external, bodily ears, it is internal and immediate. Resp. The "co-witnessing" (συμμαρτυρία) of the Holy Spirit with our spirit is indeed internal, but not immediate. For the Holy Spirit, through the doctrine contained in the sacred letters, and that perceived either by hearing or by reading, and retained in the mind, accomplishes this in the mind of man, that not only does it testify to the truth of the doctrine itself, but also, when the mind of man in a like manner of knowing is reflected upon itself, it testifies to the true and saving faith of the man and the state of grace in which he lives.

VII. The Holy Spirit teaches the reborn man internally and immediately; which Nehemiah hints at, saying in ch. IX:20: "You also gave Your good Spirit to instruct them." Resp. The Holy Spirit teaches the reborn man internally, but not immediately, which Nehemiah indicates in the cited chapter, v. 30: "You prolonged (your anger) over them for many years, and testified against them by Your Spirit; by the hand of Your prophets." If God testified against the Israelites by His Spirit, through the ministry of the prophets, it is easy to gather that He instructed them not immediately by the Holy Spirit, but through the doctrine and information of Moses and the prophets.

VIII. In whomever the Spirit of God is, always putting words in his mouth, the Spirit of God teaches him immediately and perpetually. But the Spirit of God under the new covenant is always in the seed of the just, and puts words in their mouths, and never departs. Therefore, the Spirit of God teaches the just immediately and perpetually. The minor is clear from Isa. LIX:21: "Jehovah says: As for me, this will be my covenant with them, says Jehovah; My Spirit who is upon you, and My words which I have put in your mouth, shall not depart from your mouth, nor from the mouth of your seed, says Jehovah; both now and forever." The major is established, because the Spirit of God dwelling in a just man, and so informing him as to put words in his mouth, teaches the man by immediate revelation. Resp. Jehovah promised that He would illuminate His people in the new testament, but the manner, whether He would inform them immediately or mediately, He did not express. Wherefore we state, that Jehovah promised that He would put His words in the heart and mouth of the apostles by immediate illumination, and through their preached sermon, or that related in letters, He would communicate them to others desirous of learning.

IX. Sacred scripture does not contain all things necessary to be known and done for saving a sinner. Therefore sacred scripture is not an adequate principle of things to be believed and done. The antecedent is proved, because (I) from sacred scripture no one can know certainly and infallibly that he truly believes, and is an heir of eternal life. (II) A minister of the church does not clearly perceive from the sacred letters that his vocation to the ministry is legitimate. (III)

The circumstances of actions, to be dispatched here and now for the salvation of a neighbor, are not determined in the scriptures. All of which must be revealed immediately by the Holy Spirit to the faithful man aspiring to certain knowledge.

Resp. to I. Every converted sinner knows certainly from the sacred letters that he truly believes. This can be deduced at length, but for now we argue briefly: Whoever accepts the testimony of God, he seals that God is true, and therefore truly believes and reflecting on himself knows that he truly believes. But a converted sinner accepts the testimony of God. Therefore a converted sinner truly believes, and reflecting on himself, knows that he truly believes. The major premise is revealed in the written word of God; for it is had in John III:33. It pertains, however, to the definition of faith to accept the testimony, or promise of God; to the certainty of knowledge it pertains to seal that God is true. For to seal signifies to establish something for certain and to hold it as ratified. In the acts of common life we seal those things which we want to be certain and ratified. The minor premise is of most certain knowledge, as AUGUSTINE says in book 13, ch. 1. Everyone sees his own faith in himself, and holds it with most certain knowledge. The minor is confirmed in the following way. When a converted sinner hears or reads the testimony of God concerning the gratuitous remission of sins, Isa. XLIII:25: "I, even I, am he who blots out your transgressions for my own sake, and remembers your sins no more"; then he eagerly accepts that comforting testimony of God, and seals, or establishes for certain, that this testimony of God, who is the first truth, is most true. Why then should not a converted sinner know and believe from the sacred letters that he truly believes? Conf. DANNHAVER, in hododsoph. p. 1361 seq.

To II. The certainty of a vocation to the ecclesiastical ministry is not had from a new, peculiar, and immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit, but from mediate revelation, comprehended in sacred scripture. For scripture teaches with what gifts a suitable minister of the church ought to be instructed, 1 Tim. III:1 seq. It likewise teaches that the church has the power of the keys of heaven, Matth. XVI:18, and therefore also the power of imposing the sacred ministry on certain persons. Therefore, since a candidate for theology knows (the spirit of man knows what is in man, 1 Cor. II:11) that he is divinely endowed with those gifts which sacred scripture requires in the ministry of the church, and sees with his own eyes the letters of vocation conferred by some church having the right of calling, he is certain of his legitimate vocation to the ministry without a new and immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit.

To III. H. scripture remains an adequate principle of things to be done, even if it does not apply or determine its universal precepts concerning Christian duties to the circumstances of actions. It is agreed among all that no universal rule applies itself. Therefore, the application of the precepts of scripture is made by the judgment of reason, illuminated by divine grace, which concurs with the doctrine of scripture sent down to the mind.

X. Although for the state of the present time new dogmas are not immediately revealed by the Holy Spirit, the interpretation of scripture nevertheless depends on a peculiar and immediate illumination of the Holy Spirit. The apostle indicates this in 1 Cor. II:14: "The natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God; For they are foolishness to him, and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned." If the proper and principal doctrine of scripture surpasses the grasp of human reason left to itself, it is necessary that a peculiar divine revelation precede, by which its sense may be made known. Resp. The Holy Spirit, whose illuminating power is joined to H. scripture by an indivisible bond, interprets scripture through scripture, and through the same reveals the will of God.

XI. The literal knowledge of divine things is sought from the sacred letters, but the experimental and sensible knowledge of God the Holy Spirit immediately infuses into man. From which the peace of conscience and internal joy of the soul are attributed to the Holy Spirit, Rom. XIV:17. Resp. Immediate knowledge of God, which is otherwise called intuitive, is not of this life, but of the future. But sacred scripture, with the Holy Spirit concurring, illuminates, tranquillizes, and gladdens the heart of man. The king of prophets sings excellently in Ps. XIX:8: "The law of Jehovah is perfect, refreshing the soul; the testimony of Jehovah is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of Jehovah are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of Jehovah is pure, enlightening the eyes."

XII. That immediate revelations of God did not cease with the apostles in the church, is testified both by the history of the times and acknowledged by orthodox theologians, B. LUTHER. Comment. in Eccl. tom. IV. Ien. lat. p. 807. D. DAVID RUNGIUS in Gen. p. 1280. D. BALDUINUS in 1 Tim. IV. p. 251, and others. Resp. Divine revelations concern either the doctrine of faith, or singular cases and events in ecclesiastical, political, or other matters. The doctrine of faith rests solidly on the word of God revealed and committed to letters. Revelations, however, concerning singular cases arise either from the full prophetic light, or from certain sparks of prophetic light. Theologians concede that after the passing of the apostles in certain holy men strictures or certain sparks of prophetic light have shone forth. Which, the rarer they are, the more accurately they are to be pondered, lest under the appearance of divine revelations, the suggestions of the devil, or of depraved fantasy, creep up on men eager for novelty.

Question IV. Is human reason the principle of theology?

Human reason either denotes the intellective faculty of man, which, illumined by the light of the divine word, is the receiving subject, or knower of theological truths, but is not the fundamental principle from which they are known (a); or it designates principles known by the light of nature, together with the discourse based on those principles; which principles of reason are either organic or philosophical. Is reason the principle of theology? The organic principles of reason are rightly applied to explaining and confirming the dogmas of faith and morals (b). From philosophical principles, mixed articles of faith become known to some extent (c). But pure articles of faith are demonstrated and known solely from sacred scripture, as from a domestic, fundamental, and primordial principle (d). Meanwhile, it is permissible to co-opt absolutely universal philosophical principles into theological discourses, as common, ministerial, and subservient principles for completing a fully expressed syllogism (e).

Obs. 1. Organic principles are called those which pertain to the instrumental disciplines, grammar, rhetoric, and logic.

Obs. 2. Philosophical principles are either absolutely and unlimitedly universal, which consist in an essential and simply necessary connection of terms, so that they cannot be undermined by any instance, not even from scripture, e.g., "It is impossible for the same thing to be and not to be at the same time. Whatever is, when it is, it is necessary that it be. Every spirit is immaterial," etc. (*) Or they are limitedly, or relatively universal, which in a certain genus, by hypothesis, or according to the sphere of natural knowledge, are indeed true, but yet admit of limitation, and can be broken by some instance, if not from nature, certainly sought from scripture, (**) e.g., "As many persons as there are, so many are the essences; Every human individual is by itself a person; Every begotten thing is numerically different in essence from the begetter."

Prob. a. Without the use of reason we can neither perceive, nor confirm, nor vindicate theological dogmas from the sophistries of adversaries. Certainly not to brutes, but to men using sound reason, God revealed the wisdom of eternal salvation in His word, and seriously enjoined upon them by command to read, hear, and meditate on His word. Deut. VI:6; John V:39. Therefore, the intellect is required as a receiving subject, or an apprehending instrument. For just as we see nothing without eyes, hear nothing without

(*) In almost all cases, however, a correct interpretation is needed, and even universal principles are circumscribed by certain terms, which if neglected would not make them beyond all exception. For example, this principle, which is commonly called of contradiction, is indeed true without any exception, provided that we apply all caution, lest we omit anything in discerning what is an open repugnance from that which seems to be one. I will offer another example: "The finite is not capable of the infinite." This is certainly most true, if it is understood of comprehension and adequation, not so of the closest conjunction and communion, as if the infinite could not receive the finite into itself and communicate its perfections with it.

(**) Nor can it be otherwise. For it would be a manifest repugnance if any supernatural effect of God, knowable from nowhere else than from divine revelation, were to be effected by the powers of created things, and so its reason could be explained from natural principles. And those which are called particular philosophical principles are indeed general, and without any exception extend most widely; but only in that genus of things to which they pertain. For it is agreed among all that the principles of the science of natural things, or physics, are different from those of moral philosophy, and different from those of civil prudence, and many are also proper to mathematics; each of which indeed obtains its force entirely in its own genus, but cannot be accommodated to another genus of things. But what is far different from another is not on that account contrary to it, and in no way repugnant. What then do the adversaries of revealed doctrines do? They always make a "transition to another genus" (μετάβασιν δι ἄλλο γένος), when they attack it with certain philosophical principles, and those indeed particular. Therefore, they must be met, both by limiting that principle and explaining its force and reason; and by opposing another, superior to it, namely a completely universal one, of which kind are logical and metaphysical principles. For example, those who deny that the eternal Son of God is entirely equal to the Father, abuse this principle: "Everything that generates cannot but be prior in order and time to the begotten." Response 1) by explaining this principle, which is entirely physical, it should be limited thus: "Every generating thing, whose nature is finite"; for where there is prior and posterior, there is succession; where this is, there is a beginning, order, and series. 2) By opposing another, much greater and more certain principle, inasmuch as it contains the very nature and definition of the thing: "Every generation, properly so called, is the communication of the same nature": Therefore, whatever the nature of the generating being is, such cannot but be the communication of the same, and the nature of the begotten; But God, and He indeed one, is an infinite, necessary, and eternal being; Therefore, divine generation, if there is any (and revelation teaches us that there is), cannot but be equally infinite, necessary, and eternal; Therefore, the one begotten of God cannot but be equal to the Father, and therefore neither in order nor in time posterior. The followers of SOCINUS, and all those to whom revealed dogmas seem to be contrary to reason, err vehemently in four ways. They are mistaken in that: they either confuse all reason with their own perception, or they assume false hypotheses as true principles of reason, or they usurp principles of reason that are indeed true, but neither rightly understood nor well accommodated, or they transfer particular principles to another, different genus.

ears; so we understand nothing without reason. Meanwhile, however, human reason is not the source or primordial element from which the proper and proximate principles of faith are to be derived.

Prob. b. Organic principles are used as aids for acquiring theological habit, since without them neither the sense or signification of words can be educed (which is grammar), nor figures and modes of speaking be weighed (which is rhetoric), nor connections and consequences be perceived, nor discourses be formed (which is logic).

Prob. c. Mixed articles of faith are called those which are established not only from revelation, but also from the light of nature; which are proved primarily and most safely up to the "full assurance" (πληροφορίαν) of faith from H. scripture, secondarily and less safely are deduced from the principles of reason. Thus philosophers go about proving the existence and attributes of God in metaphysics and pneumatics from the principles of reason.

Prob. d. Concerning pure articles of faith, reason left to itself knows nothing, but is blind and dim-sighted to the mysteries of faith. The apostle of the gentiles warns man of this spiritual blindness, in 1 Cor. II:14, saying: "The natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Here the genuine argument of the apostle is to be observed. The first is taken from the congenital corruption of the human intellect after the fall. Whatever the natural man (not illuminated by the word of God) grasps, but rejects with a certain natural disgust as absurd, that cannot be judged from the principles of reason. But the divine mysteries etc. Therefore. The latter is sought from the condition of the mysteries. Whatever is judged not except spiritually (by the light of the Holy Spirit), that is not to be estimated or decided by the judgment of reason. But the mysteries of faith etc. Therefore.

Prob. e. That philosophical principles can be rightly applied in theological discourses as ministerial and subservient to completing a syllogism is shown by the following theological discourse. If the truth of the human nature of Christ is to be proved against Marcion, the fundamental principle of the theological demonstration is drawn from H. scripture. Christ has a human body and soul. Matth. XXVI:27, 28; Luke XXIV:39. Therefore Christ is a true man. You say: Let the consequence or the connection of the antecedent and consequent be proved. I prove the consequence by applying a principle of reason: Whoever has a human body and soul, he is a true man. Christ has a human body and soul. Therefore Christ is a true man. In this discourse, the truth of the theological conclusion rests on the minor proposition sought from the revealed word of God, as the proper, fundamental, and primordial principle of demonstrating. The major proposition is an absolutely universal principle of reason, and concurs only as a common, secondary, and ministerial principle, flowing spontaneously, and superadded to complete the syllogism and to show the syllogistic "proof" (δοκιμασίαν). But it is not simply necessary, always and everywhere, to reduce a theological demonstration into a categorical and fully expressed syllogism. For the syllogistic expression, where one of the premises is supremely evident, is indeed easy, but yet truly superfluous and tedious. Wherefore there is no doubt that a demonstrative argument can also be proposed in an enthymematic, hypothetical, disjunctive, or dilemmatic form, according to the judgment of LEICHNER in his synopsis of true apodictics, p. 365.

The Antithesis is that of the Socinians, who measure the mysteries of faith by the ten-foot pole of reason, whose arguments are.

I. The Christian religion is a rational service, Rom. XII:1. Therefore, it is to be judged by the principles of reason. Resp. The Christian religion is called a rational service, not by reason of the principle from which, as from a source, it is to be drawn; but by reason of the subjects, or rational men, who are addicted to the Christian religion. For just as in the O.T. "irrational animals" (ζῷα ἄλογα), animals lacking reason, were sacrificed to God; So in the N.T. men partaking of reason consecrate their bodies to God. Therefore, it is called by the apostle a rational service, not that which is drawn from the source of reason, but that which is the worship of rational men.

II. Paul defers judgment concerning the doctrine of faith to the intellect of the Corinthians, 1 Cor. X:15; "I speak to sensible people; judge for yourselves." Resp. The intellect of the Corinthians was illuminated by the divine word. Wherefore the apostle permits them to judge not from the principles of reason, which he commands to be taken captive, 2 Cor. X:5, but from the word of God revealed and committed to letters. He permits them, I say, a judgment not "autocratic" (αὐτοκρατορικὸν) or supreme, not "canonical" (κανονικὸν) or normative, but a "discerning" (δοκιμασικὸν), disretive, and ministerial one. Confer D. JO. ADAM OSIANDER in his collection of systems, part I, p. 143.

III. If reason does not grasp the mysteries of faith, what then will it understand? Resp. Illuminated reason grasps the mysteries of faith as a receiving subject and a knowing organ, but it is not the primordial and fundamental principle from which a theological demonstration may be begun and constructed.

IV. Christ himself taught reasonably, whenever he used similarities and parables drawn from reason in his teaching. Resp. The savior illustrated the mysteries of faith through sensible things, but he proved the same from Moses and the prophets, Luke XXIV:27, and he deferred the normative judgment to scripture alone, John V:39, not to reason.

V. St. Paul requires from us in matters of faith a certain prudence, gravely admonishing, 1 Cor. XIV:20: "Do not be children, but be mature in prudence." But prudence is a habit active with right reason. Resp. The apostle speaks not of worldly prudence, drawn from philosophical principles; but of spiritual, drawn from the fount of Israel, sacred scripture.

VI. As reason judges of philosophical matters, so also of theological dogmas. For philosophical truth is not contrary to theological truth; and although in sacred scripture many things are above reason, yet nothing is contrary to reason. For just as there cannot be a conflict between truth and truth; so also, what right reason teaches cannot be contrary. Resp. (1). Although the mysteries of faith are not contrary to the principles of reason, yet it is not from these that one should judge concerning them. Medicine and jurisprudence are not contrary to each other; yet a physician does not show the method of curing a fever from a legal process, nor does a lawyer seek the way of settling forensic disputes from anatomy. The art of painting and shoemaking do not conflict with each other, yet the shoemaker does not go beyond his last. (2) Right reason, containing itself within the limits of its object, does not contradict the mysteries of faith; but it happens by accident that corrupt reason, having transgressed its sphere, enormous and unbridled, struggles against divine revelation.

VII. Every discourse is ultimately resolved into that principle: "It is impossible for the same thing to be and not to be at the same time": which is a principle of reason. Therefore, as the ultimate resolution is into it, so the ultimate judgment is deferred to reason. Resp. That principle can be considered in two ways, (1) as the common foundation of contradiction. (2) As it is appropriated to divine things, and is restricted to their nature. Although reason bears a formal judgment concerning the common foundation of contradiction; yet the real and normative judgment belongs to sacred scripture, insofar as that foundation of contradiction is appropriated to divine things.

VIII. Evangelical doctors not rarely use principles of reason in theological syllogisms. Therefore they cannot accuse the Socinians of abuse of reason. Resp. (1) Evangelicals in theological syllogisms use absolutely universal principles of reason, whereas the adversaries use particular principles, or at least limitedly universal ones, and restricted to the sphere of finite nature and entities. (2) Evangelicals use principles of reason, not as proper to theology, but as common to many sciences; not as ministerial and as it were instrumental, furnishing aid for understanding and deducing a conclusion; not as primordial, from which the principle of demonstrating is to be taken, but as superadded to show the syllogistic "proof" (δοκιμασίαν). Not attending to this, the adversaries stubbornly oppose themselves to the divinely revealed mysteries of faith. For example, they attack the mystery of the Trinity with this philosophical axiom: "As many as are the persons, so many are the essences." They assail the mystery of the incarnation with this principle of reason: "Every intelligent nature, and complete in its being, is a person." They go about removing the substantial presence of the body of Christ from the sacrament of the supper with this lemma: "Every natural body is in one determinate place." Since these principles of reason are restricted to the sphere of nature and of finite beings, they are wrongly sold as absolutely universal, nor are they applied to matters of mere faith without a "transition to another genus" (μεταβάσει εἰς ἄλλο γένος). Reason is not the leader of theology, but the follower. Let the handmaid Hagar serve the mistress, not command; if she affects dominion, let her be eliminated from the sacred house.

Question V. Is the consensus of the fathers of the primitive church the principle of theology?

The consensus of the fathers, who lived in the first five centuries in the church of Christ, whatever that can be had from their writings for the present time, is not an apodictic and fundamental principle of theology (a), Is the consensus of the fathers the principle of theology? nor is it accurately called a secondary principle of Christian faith (b); yet it is not to be held of little account, but to be esteemed greatly, as a motive of credibility, a topical and probable principle of certain theological conclusions, and a distinguished testimony that the ancient bishops of the catholic church understood and explained the sayings of H. scripture in the same sense as the modern evangelical church understands them (c).

Obs. The principle of proving is divided (a) into apodictic and topical. The former produces science, or accurate and certain knowledge, the latter opinion or verisimilar knowledge. (b) Into a principle "according to the thing itself" (κατὰ πράγμα), or valid in itself for demonstrating the thing, and "according to the man" (κατ' ἄνθρωπον), or held as valid with respect to a certain man, because it is conceded and approved by him.

Proof a. 1. Because H. scripture is the adequate principle of theology. See Question II. prob. a. II. Because the principle of theology must be "self-evidently trustworthy" (αὐτόπιστον) and infallibly certain. But the fathers of the primitive church were men not endowed with the privilege of infallibility, who just as individually they were not exempt from the danger of erring; so universally in transmitting the doctrine of faith they could deceive and be deceived. The errors of the fathers are demonstrated by D. CHEMNITZ, in his oration on the reading of the fathers, prefixed to his theological commonplaces, and also by D. GERHARD in his Catholic Confession, book 1, part II, chap. XIII, fol. 190. Nor do the fathers themselves deny this. For, as cited by Gerhard in the alleged place, Jerome writes in epist. 62 to Theophilus: "We ought to hold the apostles otherwise than the rest of the scriptural commentators. We should know that the former always speak the truth, the latter as men err in certain things." III. A universal consensus of the fathers of the church is nowhere to be found. For (a) there were many churches throughout the world from the times of the apostles, whose doctors, however, have not become known to us, nor do any testimonies exist concerning the doctrine transmitted by them. (b) Before certain contests were moved, the fathers spoke more securely and roughly. (c) In interpreting the sayings of sacred scripture, they differ by an immense amount. (d) Not a few writings of the fathers have been interpolated, castrated, and mutilated by the papists. IV. Every principle is prior to that which is principled from it. But the consensus of the fathers is not prior, but posterior to Christian theology. For after the apostles, for a whole century, not even one writer remains who wrote about all the dogmas of faith. There exist indeed certain epistles which are attributed to Ignatius, but some of them, in the judgment of the greatest men, are supposititious; others have been corrupted and mutilated by the wicked audacity of adversaries; those which are considered to be genuine can inform the reader about few articles of faith. There also exist certain writings of Justin, but most are spurious. For no genuine ones are had, except the paranetic oration to the gentiles, and the dialogue with Trypho the Jew. But what else was truly written by Justin has perished, so that besides the titles mentioned by Jerome and Eusebius, nothing remains. Irenaeus follows these, but of his writings, which were many, Erasmus in the previous century barely vindicated five books written against the Gnostics and Valentinians from destruction, and made them public, and indeed in the Latin idiom, into which they were inconveniently translated from the Greek language, in which they were written by the author. Tertullian not rarely deflects from the royal way, and taught otherwise than the church believed. From which Jerome, when he was pressed by his authority, said: "Concerning Tertullian I answer nothing else, than that that man was not of the church." See the above-cited oration of CHEMNITZ, fol. 3.

Prob. b. Although the consensus of the fathers of the primitive church, such as it is had today in their writings, can be called a secondary principle of some theological conclusions in the same sense in which it is otherwise called a topical principle; yet, speaking accurately, it is not a secondary principle of Christian faith. For Christian faith is a divine and immovable "substance" (hypostasis), Heb. XI:1, whose principle, on which it rests, can only be divine and supernatural. But the consensus of the fathers, such as is given for the state of the present time, is human. For that the testimony of any father is human no one will deny. But the testimonies of individuals collected into one cannot be of another kind than that of which the individuals are when considered by themselves. For although the degree of authority increases to some extent on account of the multitude, yet the species of authority is not changed.

Prob. c. The consensus of the fathers of the primitive church, such as indeed remains today, contributes much weight to the interpretation of the sayings of sacred scripture. For what man of sound mind would not be moved to approve the interpretation of the scriptures, which the very ancient doctors of the primitive church, near to the apostles, most well-instructed in the knowledge of divine things, renowned for the holiness of their life, have commended to posterity in their writings?

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, urging the consensus of the fathers of the primitive church as an infallible principle of theology, whose arguments we will weigh. I. The consensus of the fathers, those who lived and wrote in the first five centuries from the virgin birth, is the consensus of the catholic church, which is immune from error, because the church of the living God is the "pillar and foundation of the truth" (σύλος καὶ ἐδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας), 1 Tim. III:15. Resp. (a) The consensus of a few fathers of the church is not the consensus of the catholic church. (b) The consensus of the church is true, because it consents with sacred scripture. Therefore it is not a principle, or norm, but principled or normed. (c) It is called a "pillar" (σύλος) of truth, not in an architectural sense, as if it propped up celestial truth, or sustained it, lest it fall headlong, but in a political sense. For as columns exist in courts and before praetoriums, to which the laws and decrees of the magistrate are appended; so the church is a public column, to which are affixed the tablets of the divine word. The word "foundation" (ἐδραίωμα) however, properly denotes a seat, a chair or a repository, because the church is as it were a seat or repository, in which celestial truth is reposed. But by what tortures, I ask, can it be extorted from the Pauline saying, that the consensus of the fathers is the principle of theology? (*)

II. The fathers of the primitive church could not have erred, for the reason that by the force of divine promises the Holy Spirit led the fathers into all truth, John XVI:13. He remained with them forever, John XIV:16. Resp. The promises of the Savior "primarily" (πρώτως) and principally respect the apostles, whose minds the Holy Spirit immediately illustrated with the knowledge of celestial doctrine, so that they might not err in the doctrine of faith. For this reason the apostle asserts that the church is built upon the foundation of the apostles, Eph. II:20. "Secondarily" (Δευτέρως) they can be accommodated to all doctors of the church, insofar as they follow the voice of the Holy Spirit. But from this it is not permitted to collect; Therefore the doctors of the church are simply immune from the danger of erring.

III. That from which something is proved and known, is a principle of knowing. From the consensus of the fathers theological conclusions are proved. Therefore the consensus of the fathers is a principle of theological conclusions. Resp. (1) A distinction is made between an apodictic principle, and a topical one. If the major premise is understood of a topical principle, the whole argument is conceded; but if it is understood of an apodictic principle, the minor is denied. For from the consensus of the fathers we argue (α) "against the man" (κατ' ἄνθρωπον) against the Papists, in whose eyes the authority of the fathers has great weight; (β) "with respect to the matter" (κατὰ πρᾶγμα), because the universal consensus of the fathers of the primitive church, such as it can be given today, is not an invalid means of interpreting the scriptures. But most validly scripture is explained by scripture.

(*) They seem to think most rightly, who think that these words, "pillar and foundation" (σύλος καὶ ἐδραίωμα), should be referred not to "of the church" (ἐκκλησίας), but to "of the mystery" (μυστήριον). Concerning which opinion, fortified by firm supports, the interpreters are to be consulted. In which way, the entire argumentation of the adversaries collapses, and all its sinews are cut.

ON
SCRIPTURE,
AS THE PROPER AND ADEQUATE PRINCIPLE OF
KNOWING THEOLOGY.

Question VI. What is sacred scripture?

SACRED SCRIPTURE IS the word of God, consigned to letters by the prophets and apostles from divine inspiration, so that through it the sinner may be informed for eternal salvation.

Etymology. More fully it is defined: Sacred scripture is the word of God, consigned to letters by the prophets in the Old Testament in Hebrew, and in the New Testament by the apostles in the Greek language, from the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, instructing the sinner, so that he may conceive true faith in Christ, and being reconciled to God, may live holily, and at last attain eternal life by the benefit of God.

Obs. 1. It is called scripture from the external act of writing, performed by the sacred amanuenses, with God directing; who, by inscribing the letters of the law on stone tablets, made an august beginning of scripture, Exod. XXXII:16.

Obs. 2. It is called sacred, because it has God as its author, whose sanctity all creatures, and especially the angels, celebrate together, Isa. VI:3, it was written by the prophets and apostles, holy men of God, 2 Pet. I:21, it embraces holy mysteries of faith, holy precepts of morals, holy examples of pious men, it aims at the sanctity of the sinner, John XVII:17, and is even consecrated to eternity by divine providence.

Homonymy. Obs. 3. Sacred scripture is taken (a) "generically" (γενικῶς) and improperly, for all the books existing in the biblical codex, whether they be canonical and "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστοι), or apocryphal, consigned by human study, containing sacred matters and useful for the edification of the church. (b) "Specifically" (ειδικῶς) or specially and properly, for the canonical books, written by the immediate influx of the Holy Spirit. In which special sense it denotes (1) formally the sense of the divine word, which is its internal form and as it were soul; (2) materially it is taken for the letters, words, books; (3) it is taken complexly, as it embraces both the "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστον) sense, and the letters and words of which it consists. In which complexive sense it is used here.

Synonymy. Obs. 4. Sacred scripture is otherwise called "par excellence" (κατ' ἐξοχὴν), "the scripture" (ἡ γραφή), scripture, John II:22, "the scriptures" (αἱ γραφαί), scripture, Matth. XXI:42, "the holy scriptures" (αἱ γραφαὶ ἁγία), holy scriptures, Rom. 1:2, "the oracles of God" (τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ), oracles of God, Rom. III:2, "the sacred letters" (ἱερὰ γράμματα), sacred letters, 2 Tim. III:15, "the book of the Lord" (סֵפֶר יְהוָה), book of the Lord, Isa. XXXIV:16. The Greek fathers called them "the books" (τὰ βιβλία), as you might say the books, or a volume of books, which many, written in different places and times, are contained in one codex.

Obs. 5. The word of God is regarded here as the principle of knowing, from which all things to be believed and done become known; below in part III it will be considered as the principle of operating, insofar as it is the means of converting the sinner, regenerating, justifying, and saving him.

Question VII. Is sacred scripture to be accurately defined as the word of God, which is living and efficacious for producing spiritual effects?

Sacred scripture, accurately speaking, is the word of God, and that living and efficacious for producing spiritual effects.

The antithesis is that of the Quakers, who opine that H. scripture is not the true and living word of God, but only a witness concerning the word of God and a dead letter. For thus AMESIVS wrote concerning false prophets on p. 9: "They follow in the footsteps of the Baalites, who hold scripture for the true word of God." Thus also the Quakers trifle in the book which is inscribed: Der Stein, den die Bau-Leute verworfen haben (The Stone that the Builders Rejected), p. 2: "The Scripture was spoken of the light, but it is not the light, nor the Word, nor the Life, nor the Judge, nor the Rule, nor the Guide." And on p. 4: "Christ is the Word, but the Scripture is not; He is the Light, and not the Scripture; He is the Teacher and Judge, but by no means the Scripture. The same is only a narrative of him, and a co-witness of our teaching." FOXUS in his XXVII errors, p. 30, n. 22, says: "Scripture is and remains a dead letter." PENNINGTON in The way of life and death says on p. 14: "Scripture is not the living word, which was given by God for the rule of Christians." To these and other theosophical mystics add their white stone. WEIGELIUS in his postil, part III, p. 84: "The Scripture is a dead letter, and an ineffectual word, that only resounds in the air." CHRISTIANUS HOBURGIUS in his mystical postil, feria III, nativity, p. 115: "The Scripture is an old, cold, and dead thing, that only makes utter Pharisees."

Exposition

Obs. 1. H. scripture is taken either materially, for the jots, letters, and syllables of which it consists, or formally, for the "God-breathed" (θεοπνεύσῳ) sense, or finally complexly and completely, as it embraces both the letters, syllables, and words, as well as the "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστον) sense; the last signification is of this place.

Obs. II. The question is not whether scripture can be called the word of God metonymically or improperly, but whether it is accurately defined by the word of God.

Confirmation

Our assertion is proved (I) a word divinely inspired is accurately defined by a divine word. But H. scripture is etc., 2 Tim. III:16. Therefore. The major is clear; because just as a scripture which one man dictates to another into the pen is rightly called a human word related in letters; so a scripture inspired by God is most truly called the word of God consigned to letters. (II) The prophetic word is accurately defined by the word of God efficaciously illuminating. But the scripture of the old testament etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because God spoke by the mouth of the holy prophets, Luke I:70. "The Spirit of Jehovah spoke in me, and his word was on my tongue," says the royal prophet in 2 Sam. XXIII:2. "The lord spoke by the hand of Isaiah," ch. XX:2. "The word of the lord came to me," says Jeremiah in ch. I:4. The minor is clear from 2 Pet. I:19: "We have the prophetic word made more sure, to which you do well to pay attention, as to a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawns and the morning star rises in your hearts." The Christians, while the apostle Peter was still alive, had the prophetic word consigned to letters, and therefore the scripture of the old testament; since this is called a shining light, it cannot be a dead letter. (III) The oracles of God entrusted to the Jews are "accurately" (ἀκριβῶς) called the words of God. (For oracles are words which God has spoken.) The scriptures of the O.T. are the oracles entrusted to the Jews. Therefore. The minor is clear from the Pauline saying, Rom. III:1-2. But while Paul was living on this earth, the oracles of God entrusted to the Jews were comprehended in the prophetic writings. (IV) What word the apostles preached, that truly is the word of God. But what word the apostles wrote, the same they preached. Therefore, what word the apostles wrote, truly is the word of God. The major is clear from 1 Thess. II:13: "When you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God." The minor is confirmed from 1 John 1:3-4, 5: "What we have seen and heard we announce to you, therefore we write these things to you." The preached and written divine word differ accidentally, not essentially. D. DANNHAVER says excellently in hodods. phan. 1, p. 29: "As Caesar does not differ from himself, whether he be represented by a painter on a map, or by an engraver on bronze; so the word announced by mouth does not differ essentially from the written word." (V) By which word faith is conferred on man for eternal salvation, that is most rightly defined by the word of God. But H. scripture is that word etc. Therefore. The major is confirmed by Paul in Rom. X:17: "Faith comes from hearing; and hearing through the word of God." The truth of the minor becomes evident from the saying of John in ch. XX:31: "These things are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that believing you may have life in his name." Confer 2 Tim. III:14-15. (VI) Sacred scripture is the living word of God, Acts VII:38; 1 Pet. 1:23; Heb. IV:12; it is the word of life, Acts V:20; Phil. II:16; indeed life itself, John VI:63. Therefore, it is not a dead letter. (VII) Sacred scripture regenerates and vivifies man. Therefore, it is the living and efficacious word of God. The reason for the consequence is; because a dead letter cannot vivify; otherwise the effect would be more excellent than its cause. The antecedent is clear from Jas. 1:18: "It pleased God to generate us by the word of truth." Confer 1 Pet. 1:23.

Resolution. I. Against us the dissenters argue; Christ is not H. scripture. Christ is the word of God, John 1:1. Therefore, the word of God is not scripture. Resp. A distinction is made between the "substantive" (ὕποστατικόν), or personal, word, and the "enunciated" (προφορικόν), or declarative. We are now speaking of the latter; John, however, speaks of the personal word, which is Christ.

II. Whatever is a testimony about the word of God, and its declaration, that is not the word of God itself. But H. scripture etc. Therefore. The major is proved, because scripture testifies of Christ as the word of God. Resp. (1) The major and minor are denied. For the divine word is of such authority and efficacy that it testifies of itself. To this, scripture indeed testifies of Christ as the personal word, yet it itself is the enunciated word of God. (2) H. scripture is considered in two ways, (a) as a testimony, inasmuch as it testifies and declares what are the saving dogmas of the Christian religion, (b) as an efficacious means of grace and salvation, by which we are illuminated, converted, etc. The Weigelians and Quakers judge too crudely of H. scripture, thinking that it is only a witness.

III. External letters written on paper cannot act on the soul, and illuminate and regenerate it. H. scriptures are external letters etc. Therefore. Resp. External letters written on paper, and destitute of a "God-breathed" (θεοπνεύστω) sense and divine efficacy, cannot illuminate and regenerate the soul; but H. scripture is spirit and life, John VI:63, it is the seed of regeneration, 1 Pet. 1:23, it is a shining light, 2 Pet. 1:19.

IV. The true and living word of God is in us, Rom. X, and H. scripture is not in us. Therefore. Resp. The minor is denied. For H. scripture is in us, inasmuch as it is received by us; it is outside of us, inasmuch as it is proposed to us.

V. The sign of the divine word is not the word of God (for the sign and the thing signified differ). But H. scripture etc. Therefore. The minor is established; because H. scripture consists of letters and syllables, which are signs of the word. Resp. H. scripture taken materially for letters and syllables is a sign of the divine word, not "signifying" (σημαντικόν), or merely signing, but "exhibiting" (μεταδοτικόν), presenting the "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστον) sense, which is the formal aspect of scripture; complexly it is the written word of God, i.e., the divine sense expressed in letters dictated into the pen by the Spirit to the sacred amanuenses.

VI. Man is illuminated by Christ, John 1:9. Therefore, not by scripture. Resp. Man is illuminated by Christ, as the principal cause; he is illuminated by scripture, as the intermediate cause.

Question VIII. What is understood by the name of the word of God in the definition of sacred scripture?

In the definition of sacred scripture, the word of God formally denotes the sentence of God, or the concept of the divine mind, concerning the salvation of men, manifested immediately to the prophets and apostles, and through their ministry, to the entire human race.

Prob. 1. Just as the matter and external cortex, as it were, of a human writing are the letters, syllables, words, and periods, and the internal form and as it were medulla is the sense of the man writing or dictating: so the matter from which of "God-breathed" (θεοπνεύσει) scripture are the letters and words divinely dictated; the form is the divine sense, which is the concept of the divine intellect, communicated to us for formation concerning divine mysteries, as much as suffices for salvation, as defined by KOENIG in his positive theology, p. 12. Therefore, since the word of God is constituted in its being by this divine sense, and is distinguished from the human word, it itself is chiefly to be considered in the definition of H. scripture.

2. St. Paul in 1 Cor. II:16, expressly calls the word of God the mind of the Lord, saying: "but we have the mind of Christ." He speaks of the revealed mind of Christ, which the natural man does not grasp from the principles of reason. This the apostle implies, when in the immediately preceding words he asks: "Who has known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him?" just as if he were to say: What natural man, not illumined by the light of supernatural revelation, so knows the mind of the Lord, that he can teach, confirm, and judge the spiritual man? But to us apostles the mind of Christ has been revealed through the Holy Spirit, while the gospel of the Savior has been divinely inspired in us for this purpose, that by our ministry the mind of the Savior may also be made known to other men.

3. Just as divine speech formally consists in the manifestation of the divine concept (for God is said to speak when He declares His mind. See the prelections of D. GEIER on Ps. II, p. 34.): so the word of God is the declared concept of the divine mind, and manifested to intelligent creatures.

The Antithesis is that of the Schwenckfeldians, who consider sacred scripture only with respect to the external signs, letters, syllables, and words, of which it consists. Their arguments are:

I. The concept of the divine mind is the "internal word" (λόγος ἐνδιάθετος) of God. But H. scripture is not an "internal word" (λόγος ἐνδιάθετος), but an "enunciated" (προφορικὸς) one. Therefore, H. scripture is not the concept of the divine mind. Resp. The concept of the divine mind existing and remaining in God is the "internal" (ἐνδιάθετον) word of God; but the concept of the divine mind revealed to intelligent creatures, and (as for the present) expressed in the writings of the prophets and apostles, is the "enunciated" (προφορικὸν) word of God.

II. The "enunciated" (προφορικὸν) word of God, consigned to letters, is not the concept of the divine mind itself, but is its sign. For written letters are signs of words, but words are signs of concepts, and concepts of things, as Aristotle teaches in On Interpretation, ch. 1. Resp. Our discourse is of the "enunciated" (προφορικῶ) word of God considered not materially, with respect to the letters, syllables, and words by which the divine sense is signified; but formally, by reason of the divine sense signified by written words, or by words uttered with a living voice. In the former way of considering, H. scripture is called the word of God only "significatively" (σημαντικῶς) and improperly; but for the latter reason, "properly" (κυρίως) and truly it is the word of God, the wisdom of God, the mind of God. For just as a royal minister truly and with a certain emphasis asserts concerning the written command of his king: this is the mind, sentence, and will of my king; and would feel and say more meagerly: this is the sign of the sentence of my king; so we do not define H. scripture by a verbal sign, but by the sentence of God revealed in the writings of the prophets and apostles. Conf. D. SCHERTZER, in his system, p. 5, 6.

III. The divine sense is in H. scripture: Therefore H. scripture is not the divine sense itself. Resp. Just as I rightly say: God is in Christ, 2 Cor. V:19, and Christ is true God, 1 John V:20, so the divine sense is in H. scripture, and nonetheless H. scripture is the divine sense concerning our salvation, expressed by the sacred amanuenses and exhibited to men to be saved.

Question IX. Which is the principal cause of sacred scripture?

The principal efficient cause of H.S. The principal cause of sacred scripture is the triune God (a), the Father (b), the Son of God (c), and the Holy Spirit (d).

Prob. a. That God is the author of sacred scripture is abundantly clear from the fact that not only did He make an august beginning of writing, by inscribing His most holy law on stone tablets with His own finger, Exod. XXXI:18, but He also inspired the entire canonical scripture of both the old and the new testament in the sacred amanuenses. For this reason the whole scripture is called "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος), or divinely inspired, 2 Tim. III:16.

Prob. b. That God the Father is the fount of the revealed divine word, the apostle inculcates to us, Heb. 1:1-2: "In many portions, and in many ways, God of old spoke to the fathers in the prophets, in these last days he has spoken to us in the Son." Obs. (a) By God the apostle understands God the Father, inasmuch as He is said to have spoken in the Son. (b) He discusses the same concerning the "enunciated word" (λόγῳ προφορικῷ), or the external word of God; for God is said to have spoken to the fathers in the prophets. (c) Therefore a twofold divine speech is to be noted, immediate and mediate. Immediately God the Father spoke in the hearts of the prophets, in which, as in dedicated temples, He graciously dwelt, and revealed to them the concept of His mind concerning the restoration of the salvation of men; mediately He spoke to the fathers, i.e., the ancestors of the Hebrews, with the intervening work of the prophets. (c) The apostle alludes both to the diversity of times in which the divine revelations were made, and to the various modes of revealing, about which see above. (d) In the first place, he shows that in the last times, namely the times of the new testament, God the Father manifested Himself in the Son, the greatest of the prophets, Deut. XVIII:5. But just as the prophets taught the people partly by the proclamation of the voice, partly by published literary monuments; so God the Father is the author of the external word, both preached and written.

Prob. c. That the Son of God is the principal cause of the divine word, and its omniscient interpreter, the savior himself has indicated, John I:18: "No one has ever seen God; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, He has "explained" (ἐξηγήσατο), He has expounded to us." The sense is: The deepest counsels of God the Father neither angel nor any man has perceived as well as the only begotten Son of the Father, who since He is in His bosom, that is, co-essential, most beloved, and conscious of all the secrets which are as it were reposed in the bosom of God, has so expounded His decrees concerning the procurement of our salvation, as the most learned exegete of all by far, that no one could do so more clearly.

Prob. d. That the revelation of the divine word is attributed to the Holy Spirit "by appropriation" (κατ' ἰδιοποίησιν), and through a certain appropriation, is clear from 2 Pet. 1:21: "For prophecy never had its origin in the human will, but holy men of God spoke as they were "moved" (Φερόμενοι), impelled, by the Holy Spirit." In these words St. Peter teaches that prophecy, that is, the prophetic sermon v. 19, is not a human invention; since the holy men of God, namely the prophets, sanctified and consecrated to their office, and equally conspicuous for the holiness of their blameless life, spoke not moved by their own will, as they are accustomed to do who indulge their own inventions; but impelled by the Holy Spirit, illuminated, ennobled with the gift of interpreting and the privilege of infallibility. For "the impulse" (ἡ φορὰ) denotes both the impulse to speak and to write, and the illumination of the Holy Spirit; which is followed by the "power of interpretation" (δύναμις ἐρμηνευτική), by which they clearly elucidated the most sublime mysteries, and also the gift of infallibility, so that they were immune from the danger of erring. What St. Peter says of the prophets of the old testament, the same St. Paul asserts of the apostles of the new testament, 1 Cor. II:12-13: "We have not received the spirit of the world, but the Spirit who is from God, that we may understand what God has freely given us. This is what we speak, not in words taught us by human wisdom but in words taught by the Holy Spirit, explaining spiritual realities with spiritual words." The apostles did not receive the fallacious spirit of the world; whether you understand the demon, by whom the Pythonics of old were agitated; or the human spirit wholly occupied in acquiring worldly wisdom; but the most holy, most true, most wise Spirit, proceeding from God the Father and the Son, that they might most clearly know the benefits acquired by the merit of Christ, and most widely diffused throughout the entire human race; which they spoke in words not artfully composed, not bound by the flourishes of rhetoricians, but simple, but grave, and those immediately suggested by the Holy Spirit, so that they might accommodate a spiritual genus of speaking to explaining spiritual dogmas. Moreover, just as the preached word of God, so also the written word owes its origin to the Holy Spirit. This is evident no less from the testimony of Peter than from the suffrage of Paul cited above. For the former speaks of "the prophecy of scripture" (προφητεία τῆς γραφῆς), of the prophetic word related in letters, v. 21. The latter, however, openly appeals to scripture, v. 9. The reason is at hand; because the preached and written word of God do not differ really, but are the same with respect to the internal formal aspect.

Question X. What impelled God to instruct men with sacred letters?

The impulsive cause of sacred scripture. Internally, the most intense mercy impelled God to impart the written word to the human race (a); externally, the extreme misery of men (b).

Prob. a. He has made known to us the mystery of His will according to His good pleasure, which He purposed in "Himself" (ἐαυτῷ), says St. Paul concerning the gospel revealed to us, Eph. I:9. The gospel is nothing other than the revelation of the mystery of the divine will, concerning the redemption of the human race and the gratuitous remission of sins through Christ, v. 7. Since this salutary revelation of so great a mystery is attributed to the "good pleasure" (τῇ εὐδοκίᾳ), or divine good pleasure; it is not invalidly collected that God, constrained by no necessity, provoked by no merits of our works, but led by mere benevolence and mercy to reveal the ministry concerning the salvation of men through Christ, and to procure its writing, that those believing in Christ may have life in his name, John XX:31. You say: God indeed revealed the gospel, and caused it to be consigned to letters out of grace; but He did not for the same cause command the law to be written; which is a killing letter, 2 Cor. III:6, working wrath, Rom. IV:15. Resp. 1) God out of grace gave the law, the rule of a holy life. For the royal psalmist commemorates that God testified a special benevolence by this very distinguished pledge of love to the Israelite people, that He announced His words to Jacob, His statutes and His judgments to Israel; while yet He did not deign the gentiles with the same degree of favor in the O.T., Ps. CXLVII:9. 2) The law is called a killing letter and working wrath, not in itself, but by accident, through the fault of men, who stubbornly transgress it, to whom it denounces the wrath of God and death; but in itself the law is good and holy, Rom. VII:10.

Prob. b. The natural man, as long as he sojourns in this land, destitute of the viatic light of the divine word, wanders through trackless deserts, but does not know the way of the lord, Wisdom V:7. Wherefore God, being propitious, having pitied the sinner's lot, lit a lamp for his feet, His word, and a light for his path, Ps. CXIX:105. This His word God preserved and propagated by the tradition of the living voice, without the aid of scripture, for over 2500 years. See the chronology of D. CALOVIUS prefixed to his illustrated bible, fol. 38. But with the innumerable multitude of men growing, and the span of human life diminishing, God commanded the primary heads of divine revelations to be comprehended in writings, so that the imbecility of human memory might be consulted by the subsidy of sacred scripture, the perfidy of heretics might be repressed, and the corruptions creeping in through the less faithful tradition of the living voice might be averted. Conf. D. GERHARD in his Exegesis, fol. 15.

Question XI. What is the less principal cause of sacred scripture?

The less principal cause of sacred scripture. The efficient cause, less principal and ministerial, of sacred scripture were the holy men of God (a), the prophets under the old (b) and the apostles under the new testament (c), who, with the Holy Spirit inspiring, applied their hand to the pen, and adorned the scripture at different places and times.

Prob. a. The amanuenses, whose ministry the Holy Spirit used in consigning the sacred letters, are called with singular emphasis by the apostle Peter holy men of God, 2 Ep. 1:21. Who, just as they were otherwise holy both by the imputed sanctity of Christ and by the inherent sanctity of morals; so they were peculiarly and immediately called by God for this, segregated, consecrated, and instructed with the gifts of the Holy Spirit, to commit the divine revelations to letters.

Prob. b. The prophets were holy men of God, who before the Messiah was exhibited in the flesh composed the scripture of the old testament; most of whom functioned in the public office of a prophet. Observe that in the class of writers of the old testament are also contained David, Solomon, and Daniel, who did not hold a public office of teaching in the Israelite church. Wherefore it must either be said that the sacred writers of the old testament are denominated prophets by synecdoche from the greater part, because most of them sustained a public office of teaching in the church; or in a broader sense by prophet is to be understood any "divinely inspired" (θεόπνευτος) writer of the old testament. Concerning the prophets St. Peter affirms that they spoke (and wrote) impelled by the Holy Spirit, 2 Ep. 1:21.

Prob. c. What the apostles saw and heard, they not only announced with a living voice, but also wrote, that our joy might be complete, 1 John 1:4. They wrote the same not in words taught by human wisdom, but taught by the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. II:13. By the name of apostles here are designated the holy men of God who after the birth of Christ adorned the scripture of the new testament; although not all were from the college of apostles, chosen by Christ before the ascension to teach all nations; but after Christ was carried up into heaven they were numbered among the apostles, such as were Matthias (whose writings, however, we do not have) and Paul. Indeed, apostles in a broader sense are here named apostolic men, next to the apostles in office and dignity, such as were Mark and Luke, the evangelists. This broader signification of the word apostle is not unusual. For Paul in Rom. XVI:7 calls Andronicus and Junia distinguished among the apostles, and in Phil. II:25 calls Epaphroditus the apostle of the Philippians.

Obs. By some theologians the writers of the new testament are distinguished into apostles and evangelists. But that distinction is not adequate, as if no evangelist were an apostle, nor any apostle (strictly speaking) an evangelist. For Matthew and John were not only evangelists, but also apostles strictly speaking.

Question XII. Did the sacred amanuenses write from a command of God?

That an express command to write was divinely given to some sacred amanuenses, scripture openly testifies (a); from the same we validly collect that the rest wrote with God willing and commanding (b).

Prob. a. By an express command of God were excited to write Moses, Exod. XVII:14; Deut. XXXI:19; Isaiah, VII:1, XXX:2; Jeremiah, XXXVI:2; Habakkuk, II:2; John, Apoc. 1:11, etc. Twelve times in the Apocalypse we read that a special command to write was given to John by God.

Prob. b. (1) From the general command of Christ, Matth. XXVIII:19: "Go, teach all nations." The nations are taught not only by the living voice, but also by writings. Therefore the apostles had a general command of teaching either by proclamation or by the writing of the divine word. They had a command of teaching all nations even of the following times until the final old age of the world (as is established from the annexed promise in v. 20). But the apostles could not teach the nations of the following times by the living voice without writing. Therefore under the general command of teaching is also comprehended the command of writing.

(2) From the impulse of the Holy Spirit, which St. Peter teaches in 2 Epist. 1:21: "Prophecy was not brought by the will of men, but holy men of God spoke impelled by the Holy Spirit." Whatever prophecy was not brought by the will of men, but by the impulse of the Holy Spirit, that was published with God willing and commanding. But the "prophecy of scripture" (προφητεία τῆς γραφῆς), written prophecy (conf. v. 20), was not brought by the will of men, but by the impulse of the Holy Spirit. Therefore. You say: The internal impulse of the Holy Spirit is one thing, an external command another. It not rarely happens that someone is impelled to write, who is not commanded. Resp. The internal impulse of the divine Spirit is an internal command equipollent to an external command. The impulse of a master instigating a minister to write is a command of great weight. But the Holy Spirit is true God and the highest Lord.

(3) From the divine inspiration of the sacred letters, which St. Paul inculcates in 2 Tim. III:16: "All scripture is divinely inspired." Whoever dictates to another the things and words to be written, he directly commands the amanuensis, subject to him, to write. But God dictated to both the prophets and the apostles etc. Therefore.

(4) From the apostolic office, in which those holy men were legates of God, 2 Cor. V:20. Legates are bound by the command of the prince. Peter, a legate of God, did not sustain preaching the gospel to the gentiles without a divine command; Therefore he would have less dared to write an epistle, not being ordered by God. See Acts X:19, 26.

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, who deny that the evangelists and apostles wrote from a divine command; who rely on the following arguments.

I. If it had been the purpose of Christ and the apostles to contract and restrict the word of God to scripture, Christ would have especially commanded a matter of such great moment. But nowhere is it read that this was commanded. Resp. 1. He certainly commanded it generally, when he ordered the apostles to teach, Matth. XXVIII:19. We are taught equally by scripture as by the living voice. 2. Just as the apostle John was instructed and excited to write by a special command; so it is easy to conjecture that the rest of the apostles did not undertake the arduous province of writing without a divine command; otherwise they would have incurred the same crime which a secretary admits who writes a diploma to the citizens without his prince's order.

II. If the apostles received a general command to write from God, all the apostles ought to have written. But not all the apostles wrote. Therefore they did not receive a general command to write. Resp. The general command to teach was divinely given to the whole college of apostles; some of whom, with the Holy Spirit impelling, taught both by voice and by writings; some only by the proclamation of the living voice, who however approved the writings of others with their suffrages, and referred their hearers to the same.

III. Whoever wrote incidentally, on an offered occasion, or with a particular pressing necessity, they did not write from a divine command. But the apostles etc. Therefore. The major is established, because a minister ordered by his master to write does not compose letters incidentally. The minor is proved; the apostles were impelled to write on various occasions. St. Matthew, according to the testimony of EUSEBIUS lib. 3 of his history, ch. 24, took the occasion of writing the gospel from the fact that after preaching the gospel to the gentiles, thinking about his departure, he judged it good and useful to leave some memorial of his doctrine to those from whom he was departing, and this after many years had elapsed since the passion of the Lord. The same author in lib. II, ch. 15, says that St. Mark was incited to write not by his own motion, or from Peter's command, but by the request and sole solicitation of the Romans. Acting concerning Luke in lib. 3, ch. 24, he testifies that he was stimulated to apply his hand to the pen because not a few were intruding themselves to write many things which they did not know, so that he might oppose the splendor of truth to the uncertain and doubtful things gradually creeping in. Add that he learned the better part of what he wrote by hearing and tradition. As for what pertains to John, the same testifies that he did not write until he was weighed down by the years of extreme old age, and this when he was urged by the bishops of Asia to refute the Ebionite heresy. Resp. The occasion and other motives for writing were not fortuitous, or objected to the apostles by accident, but offered to them by the peculiar providence of God, by which they were made more certain of the will of God, by which they were invited to write. To this is added that, although from an occasion, or a particular necessity, they wrote some things to private individuals, yet all things were divinely directed to the common benefit of the catholic church. Wherefore the will and command of God remains the principal impulsive cause; the occasion and necessity are secondary motives, which are not to be opposed to the divine command, but subordinated to it, and composed with it.

IV. If the apostles, by divine command, had wanted to commit their doctrine to letters by profession, they would certainly have consigned a catechism to letters. But they did not consign this. Therefore. The consequence is clear, because a catechism is an epitome of things to be believed and done, necessary for a sinner tending to salvation to know. Resp. The consequence is null. For it was not necessary that the apostles should consign a catechism, in which things to be believed and done would be comprehended. For they are comprehended in the historical revelation of those things which Jesus and the apostles taught and did, and also in the epistles of holy men, from which it was easy to excerpt and methodically compose a catechism.

Question XIII. What is the matter from which, of sacred scripture?

The matter from which sacred scripture consists are the letters, syllables, words, phrases, periods, and canonical books of both the old testament, which were written before the Messiah was manifested in the flesh, and of the new testament, which were consigned after the birth of Christ.

Prob. This is common to sacred scripture with other writings, that it is said to consist of letters, syllables, and words, as of matter. Although matter, univocally or properly speaking, is not competent to it; for this is suitable only to substances composed of matter and form; sacred scripture, however, is one by aggregation; yet we attribute to it matter, from which, analogically.

Question XIV. What is the matter about which sacred scripture is concerned?

The object of sacred scripture. The matter about which sacred scripture is concerned is either general or special. The special and primary matter are the dogmas of faith and the precepts of morals (a). The general matter are all the things which are contained in the canonical writings of the prophets and apostles (b).

Prob. a. By the dogmas of faith, the things to be believed, and by the precepts of morals, the things to be done are set forth for the sinner to be saved, and therefore sacred scripture is primarily concerned with them.

Prob. b. Contained in H. scripture are historical, chronological, genealogical, astronomical, physical, and political matters; which although they are not simply necessary to be known for salvation, are yet divinely revealed, because the knowledge of them contributes not a little to interpreting sacred scripture and illustrating the dogmas of faith and the precepts of morals.

Question XV. What is the form of sacred scripture?

The internal form of sacred scripture. The internal form of sacred scripture is the "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος) sense (a, b), expressed in words dictated by the Holy Spirit (c).

Prob. a. The form of every word, whether uttered by mouth or related in letters, is the sense, or the significative power. Wherefore if sacred scripture is considered generally, as it is a written word, its internal form, and that a generic one, is the sense, or the signification of the words and phrases, which the holy men of God used in adorning sacred scripture.

Prob. b. If sacred scripture is regarded specifically, as the word of God, its internal form is the divine sense; for the reason that by this, as a reason a priori, sacred scripture is constituted in its specific being, and is distinguished from any human writing. See above Question VII.

Prob. c. Since by "God-breathing" (τῇ θεοπνευσίᾳ), or the immediate dictation of the Holy Spirit, the concepts of both things and words were suggested to the sacred amanuenses; the adequate internal form of sacred scripture is completed by the "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος) sense, expressed in words dictated by the Holy Spirit. For by this "determination" (προσδιορισμῷ), or addition, sacred scripture is distinguished not only from the writings of other men, kings, princes, philosophers, etc., but also from the versions of sacred scripture composed by human study; which indeed, if they are conformable to the original text, represent and bring to us the divine sense; but they are as distant from the scripture regarded in the original text as a "self-evidently trustworthy" (ἀντόπιστος) scripture, to which faith is owed in itself, is from a scripture which is not believed in itself, but only on account of another original one to which it is exactly conformable; or a norming scripture from a normed one; a scripture to which it is repugnant for falsity to underlie it, and a scripture to which it is not repugnant for falsity to underlie it. Confer D. MUSAEUS in his introduction to theology, p. 271.

Question XVI. Are the concepts of all things, which are had in the sacred letters, divinely inspired?

The concepts of all things, which are had in the sacred letters, were immediately inspired in the prophets and apostles by the Holy Spirit.

Prob. I. From the Pauline saying in 2 Tim. III:16: "πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος", all scripture is divinely inspired. Obs. (a) It is understood not indeterminately any scripture, but the legal, holy one, as is clear from v. 15. (b) "God-breathing" (θεοπνοίᾳ) or "God-inspiration" (θεοπνευσία) denotes both the antecedent divine motion, or the peculiar impulse of the will to write, and the immediate illumination, by which the intellect of the sacred writer is illumined by a supernatural, and that extraordinary, light of divine grace, and the concepts of the things to be written are immediately suggested to him by the Holy Spirit. This "God-inspiration" (θεοπνευσία), or divine inspiration, differs from divine governance. For by the latter it is only ensured that nothing be written which is not from the true, decorous, congruous; but by the former the concepts of the things to be written are suggested by the dictating Holy Spirit. The former can render a sacred scripture infallible, but not "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστον). From which we argue: If only the mysteries of faith, which are had in the sacred letters, depend on divine inspiration, but the rest, knowable by the guidance of the light of nature, only on divine direction, the whole sacred scripture is not "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος). But, as Paul testifies, the whole sacred scripture is divinely inspired. Therefore not only the mysteries of faith, but also the rest, knowable by the guidance of the light of nature, which are had in the sacred letters, were divinely suggested and inspired.

II. From the promise of Christ in John XIV:26: "The Holy Spirit will teach you all things and will remind you of everything I have said to you." The savior, about to depart to the Father, promises the apostles the Holy Spirit, who would most fully imbue their minds with celestial doctrine, and would recall to their minds all that they had heard from Christ, whether not yet sufficiently understood, or committed to oblivion, so that, with this internal doctor as guide and president, they might either hand down to the gentiles by living voice, or consign in writings, all things necessary to be known. From which it follows that the concepts of all things described by the apostles were immediately instilled in them by the Holy Spirit.

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, Socinians, and Arminians, according to whose mind the mysteries of faith indeed were divinely inspired in the sacred amanuenses; but things of lesser moment, knowable from the light of nature, were indeed directed by divine governance when they were being written, so that they might be reported from the truth, but not divinely inspired. We will weigh their arguments.

I. Whatever the prophets and apostles knew by natural reason, or by experimental knowledge, they did not need divine revelation to know. But historical, natural, moral, etc. things. Therefore. The major is established, because what one knows from the light of reason, he does not need the supernatural light of revelation to know. Resp. 1. Under the name of revelation lies a certain ambiguity now to be unfolded. Revelation is taken sometimes more narrowly, sometimes more broadly. In a narrower sense, it denotes the supernatural manifestation of latent and hidden things. For to reveal, in Greek "to uncover" (ἀποκαλύπτειν), by its origin is to uncover and manifest hidden things, as if under some veil. See 1 Cor. II:10; Gal. I:12; Matth. XI:25. In a broader significance, revelation is taken for the manifestation of any things, even those which can be known by the guidance of the light of nature, made in a supernatural way. In the former sense, the whole argument is conceded, in the latter the major is denied. 2. Things which were known to the sacred writers are considered either absolutely and in themselves, or respectively, inasmuch as they were to be written by the will of God. In the former way, they were already known to the sacred writers, but not in the latter way. For even though the sacred amanuenses had known certain things which were described by them before the actual act of writing, it was not known to them in itself whether those things were to be described by the will of God, with what circumstances, in what order, and with what words they were to be committed to letters. It not rarely happens that we dictate to an amanuensis things and words by no means unknown to him; yet it is not up to him to add or subtract anything, but to depend entirely on the mouth of the one dictating; so also the sacred amanuenses reported nothing to letters except what was suggested by the Holy Spirit.

II. There are found in scripture things of lesser moment hardly worthy to be attributed to divine revelation, e.g., Jacob's staff, Gen. XXXII:10; Paul's cloak, 2 Tim. IV:13. Resp. What things, even the smallest, God deemed worthy of creation, He did not judge unworthy of supernatural revelation. Meanwhile, no one reverently worshiping God will hold as trivial or vile in the scriptures what has been inserted in them by the most wise counsel of God.

III. Many impious deeds are recounted in H. scripture, which could not have been divinely inspired. Resp. Those impious deeds are reported from the truth, but not approved as good. Their historical narration is divinely inspired not for imitation, but for avoidance.

IV. Whoever confesses that he, and not the Lord, asserts something, he by this very fact confesses that not all things are inspired by the Lord. But the apostle of the gentiles, 1 Cor. VII:12. Resp. A distinction is made between a general, or implicit, assertion, and a special, or explicit one. Paul confesses that the Lord had asserted or sanctioned nothing explicitly concerning the perpetual cohabitation of a faithful husband with an unfaithful wife, and vice versa; but what is contained generally and implicitly in it, Gen. II:24; Matth. XIX:16, the apostle himself directs and applies specifically and explicitly to the present case; this he indicates when he says: "to the rest I say, not the Lord."

V. Whatever amanuensis received the deeds he describes from men, as "eyewitness"

(αὐτόπταις) witnesses, he did not receive the same from divine inspiration. But Luke, a sacred amanuensis etc., Luke 1:3. Therefore. Resp. What deeds Luke received from human witnesses before their description, in the very act of writing were divinely inspired in him, so that he might write them in a decent order, with suitable words, and with the necessary circumstances to be known added, without a lapse of memory or any error.

VI. John XIX:35 says that he writes what he saw, not what was revealed to him. Therefore, in his written testimony about Jesus, he appeals not to divine inspiration, but to the sense of his eyes. Resp. John appeals, as an eyewitness, to sight, not to exclude divine inspiration, but to establish it. For he alleges the word of God revealed and related in letters both by Moses, Exod. XII:46, and by the prophet Zechariah, ch. XII:10. Here concurs the testimony of the Holy Spirit and of the apostles, about which the author of our salvation says: "The Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father, he will testify about me. And you also will testify, because you have been with me from the beginning," John XV:26-27. The apostles testified, being moved by the Holy Spirit, 1 Pet. I:21.

VII. For the things seen by the apostles to be truly described, divine assistance and governance, preserving the sacred amanuenses from error, was sufficient, and divine inspiration does not seem to have been needed. Resp. H. scripture is a certain homogeneous whole, and so was not consigned partly by divine inspiration, partly by divine direction, but "πᾶσα γραφή ἱερὰ", the whole holy scripture, as great as it is, is called by the apostle "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος). But it is called "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος) not from mere assistance, governance, or direction, but from divine dictation, suggestion, and inspiration. Observe that we speak of mere governance, otherwise we do not at all exclude divine governance, but conjoin it with "God-inspiration" (θεοπνευσίᾳ). See DANNHAV. in his hodos., p. 36.

Question XVII. Were also the individual words, of which sacred scripture consists, divinely inspired?

All and individual words, which are read in the sacred codex, were inspired in the prophets and apostles by the Holy Spirit, and dictated into the pen.

Prob. I. Whatever scripture is entirely "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστος), not only its sense or the things signified, but also the words as signs of the things, are divinely inspired. But sacred scripture, 2 Tim. III:16. Therefore. The major is established, because (1) the apostle does not simply say: "Every word of God is God-breathed," for someone could in this way take the divine word formally for the divine sense; but he says: "πᾶσα γραφή" (all scripture), which denotes not precisely the divine sense, but also the written words. (2) The apostle does not say "πάντα γεγραμμένα θεόπνευστα" (all things written are God-breathed), but "πᾶσα γραφή θεόπνευστος" (all scripture is God-breathed), to indicate not only that the things contained in sacred scripture are divinely revealed, but also that the words themselves were dictated into the pen by the Holy Spirit. (3) The apostle speaks of that scripture which Timothy had read as a boy, and which, being created a bishop, he constantly turned over and explained to his hearers. But he read and explained H. scripture as it consists not only of things, but also of written words. Therefore the whole sacred scripture, as it consists not only of things, but also of written words, is divinely inspired.

II. Whatever has proceeded not from human will, as a principle, but by the special impulse of the Holy Spirit, that whole, composed of words and things, is of divine origin. But H. scripture, conceived in the Hebrew and Greek idiom etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because that is called a human invention or writing which proceeds from human will. The minor is proved from 2 Pet. 1:20-21: "All prophecy of scripture is not of one's own interpretation" (ἰδίας ἐπιλύσεως); "for prophecy was not brought by the will of men in old time, but holy men of God spoke impelled by the Holy Spirit." Obs. (1) The apostle Peter denies that the prophecy of scripture is of one's own interpretation, from this foundation; because it was not brought or proceeded from human will, but from the impulse of the Holy Spirit. But sacred scripture is to be interpreted as it is composed of words and things. Therefore no word of written prophecy proceeds from human will, but from divine inspiration. (2) Holy men of God are said to have spoken impelled by the Holy Spirit. Therefore not only the things, but also "the speech" (ἡ λαλιά), the speech, or the words of the apostles, as uttered by mouth, so also written, proceeded from the divine Spirit; for by "speech" (λαλίαν) indifferently both diction and writing are noted (since they do not differ really) by the force of the saying, Acts III:24. (3) Although St. Peter primarily speaks of the prophecy of the old testament, vindicating it for an immediate divine origin; yet by a ready and good consequence it is elicited from this Petrine saying that the scripture of the new testament, both as to words and as to the things themselves, was consigned from divine inspiration. Which consequence will be the more lucid, the more accurately the following argument is pondered.

III. What words the apostles in their apostolic office uttered with a living voice and consigned to letters, those the Holy Spirit taught them. But the words extant in the codex of the new testament the apostles in their apostolic office uttered with a living voice and consigned to letters. Therefore. The major is Paul's in 1 Cor. II:12-13: "We have not received the spirit of the world, but the Spirit who is from God, that we may know the things that are freely given to us by God; which we also speak, not in words taught by human wisdom, but taught by the Holy Spirit." See above Question VIII. prob. c. The minor is clear in itself. For example, the words extant in the epistle to the Romans are the words of Paul reduced to letters, and they are plainly conformable to the words which Paul spoke with his mouth in his apostolic office, on account of the most exact harmony of the divine word spoken by mouth and related in letters.

IV. God immediately taught Moses the words to be written, Exod. XXXIV:27-28: "Afterward Jehovah said to Moses; write these words for yourself; because on the mouth (tenor) of these words I have made a covenant with you, and with Israel." By these words to be written, some interpreters understand precisely the words of the decalogue, others the universal precepts of the Mosaic law, moral, levitical, and forensic. See D. CALOV. in his theological system, tom. I. p. 564. But what words Moses ought to write by divine command, God had immediately taught him. Confer v. 10 etc., XIX:3 seq. The reason for the Mosaic law in this part is the same as that of the other divine writers. Therefore so frequently in scripture is inculcated that: "The word of the lord; thus said the lord," to indicate that these words are not of human, but of divine origin.

V. If all and individual words which the sacred amanuenses use in scripture are not divinely inspired; (1) there will be no difference between the original text and the versions adorned by human study; provided these are conformable to the authentic text, since these also express a "God-breathed" (θεόπνευστον) sense, but not in "God-breathed" (θεόπνεύσοις) words; (2) nor will the emphasis, force, or value of the words of the authentic text need to be elucidated with singular care applied; which are "most absurd" (ἀτοπώτατα), no more to be said than to be thought of as nefarious.

The antithesis is that of Erasmus, Suarez, Episcopius, Beza, Vorstius, and others who deny that the individual words of H. scripture were divinely inspired in the prophets and apostles; who argue:

I. If all and individual words of sacred scripture were inspired by one Spirit of God, there would be one genus of speaking for all the sacred amanuenses, one and the same style. But their style is very diverse. Therefore not all and individual words of sacred scripture were divinely inspired in them. The consequence of the major is proved, because one author forms one style. The antecedent is clear; for Isaiah, born in an illustrious place and educated in court, wrote more polishedly, Amos the herdsman, more humbly, Luke, highly polished in Greek letters, more elegantly. Resp. (1) It happens in human affairs that one profane author, distinguished for praise of genius and eloquence, pours forth a varied genus of speaking. Certainly Cicero expressed and cultivated a grand, a mediocre, and a humble style in speaking and writing. The same happens in divine matters. St. John wove together the gospel, the epistles, and the apocalypse with a different genus of diction, moved by the diversity of the argument, to which the style had to be tempered. For the Johannine gospel expounds the divinity of Christ with gravity of words, the epistles the fosters of charity with sweetness of diction, the apocalypse the fates of the church with a character familiar to prophets, nowhere without a distinguished mark of "God-inspiration" (τῆς θεοπνευστίας). (2) The Holy Spirit gives to each to speak as He himself wills. Acts II:4, who doubtless respected the nature of the materials, and adapted the style to them. (3) The style of the O. and N.T. is uniform as to substance; although, as to the accidental conformation of the style, by a singular "condescension" (συγκαταβάσει) the Holy Spirit lowered Himself to the temperaments, studies, and nations of the "divinely-inspired" (θεόπνεύστων) men; just as in a musical organ the substance of the song, harmony, tone is one; but to other pipes, some sharper, others duller, the spirit which inflates the pipes accommodates itself. Conf. DANNHAV. in hodosoph. p. 58.

II. The knowledge of that which the sacred writers acquired for themselves by daily use and custom was not divinely revealed to them. But the sacred writers acquired for themselves the knowledge of the words and genus of speaking, by which sacred scripture is consigned, by daily use and custom. Therefore. The major is established, because revelation is the manifestation of the unknown, which lies under a kind of veil. The minor is clear, because the sacred amanuenses used words assumed from the customary mode of speaking, which they had learned by familiarly conversing with prudent men. Resp. 1. An ambiguity lies hidden under the name of revelation, unfolded in the preceding question. I now add a necessary distinction between revelation and divine inspiration. Revelation, strictly speaking by its origin, is the manifestation of the unknown; inspiration, however, is the action of the Holy Spirit, by which an actual cognition of things is infused into the created intellect, prescinding from prior knowledge and ignorance. (2) We do not state that all and individual words were divinely inspired in the prophets and apostles for knowing, but for writing. For some words unknown to the prophets and apostles before the act of writing, the Holy Spirit first revealed to them; but others assumed from the common usage of speaking He appropriated to Himself, and applied to divine things. But He dictated all and individual words into the pen for the sacred amanuenses, whether they were known to them beforehand, or less so: just as it daily happens that those who dictate epistles into the pen for an amanuensis use words taken from the common usage of speaking, whose force and signification have long been known to him. You say: The divine inspiration of words known from the common usage of speaking does not seem to have been necessary, but superfluous. Resp. It was necessary for rightly expressing the mind of the Holy Spirit. For it was not free for the prophets and apostles to cast the divine sense into those words which they themselves would choose according to their own will; but it was their part to adhere and to depend on the mouth of the dictating Holy Spirit, so that they might consign the sacred scripture in an order and context of words pleasing and approved by Him, by which it would turn out to be completely conformable to the mind of the Holy Spirit.

Question XVIII. Did divine inspiration preserve the sacred amanuenses from all error?

Divine inspiration, by which the things and words to be said no less than to be written were immediately suggested to the prophets and apostles by the Holy Spirit, rendered them immune from all error both in the preaching and in the consigning of the divine word.

Prob. I. Whatever has proceeded immediately from God, the first truth, must be most true. But the whole sacred scripture etc., 2 Tim. III:16. Therefore.

II. The word of God, preached and committed to letters by the prophets, is called "a more sure word" (λόγος βεβαιότερος), a firmer word, 2 Pet. I:19: "Καὶ ἔχομεν βεβαιότερον τὸν προφητικὸν λόγον" (And we have the prophetic word more sure). The apostle compares the scripture of the old testament with the voice of the Father brought down from heaven, vv. 17-18, and asserts that the former is firmer than the latter not simply; for nothing can be firmer than the voice of the Father heard from heaven; but insofar as it was confirmed by the testimony of Peter. Therefore, the prophetic word is firmer than the testimony of Peter, given concerning the celestial voice of the Father, with respect to the Jews converted to Christ. For these, the prophetic word was firmer and more certain than the apostolic testimony concerning the voice of the Father heard from heaven (*). For the authority of the prophetic word was

(*) The Jews, then devoted to Christ, did not value the authority of the Apostles less than that of the Prophets of the O.T. Nor does Peter say, "you have," but "we have," which is an indication that he is speaking of the greater firmness of that word in general, not excluding himself and his companions. He compared the sayings of the divine Prophets not so much with his own testimony as with his own sense, both of his eyes and of his ears. Therefore, that word, "more sure" (βεβαιότερον), indicates a comparison that pertains not corroborated by the length of time and the consensus of their ancestors; but the authority of the apostolic testimony concerning the celestial voice of the Father was more recent, and not yet approved by the vote of so many Jews. Wherefore, since the prophetic word is firmer than the celestial voice of the Father, insofar as it is asserted by that Petrine attestation; it is concluded that it is most firm and infallible, preached and written by the prophets, who could neither deceive nor be deceived.

III. The Spirit of truth led the apostles into all truth, by the force of Christ's promise, John XVI:12. The Holy Spirit was the most faithful guide of the apostles, who, just as a mother a boy, or a "hand-leader" (χειραγωγός) a blind man, taking him by the hand, leads him, led them into the way of truth, so that in proposing and explaining the doctrine of faith they never erred.

The Antithesis is that of the Socinians and Arminians, who state that the sacred writers sometimes, having lapsed in memory, erred slightly; and also of the Copernican and Cartesian philosophers, who assert that sacred scripture sometimes accommodates itself to the erroneous opinion of the common people; we will weigh their more important arguments.

I. Peter erred, not walking uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, Gal. II:14. Resp. Peter did not err in the doctrine of faith, but in a certain special deed; for he erred in "walking uprightly" (ὀρθοποδῶν), not walking rightly in the way of life or of morals; and so the sin of Peter was a fault not of preaching, but of conversation, in the judgment of TERTULLIAN.

II. John erred, about to adore an angel, Apoc. XIX:10. Resp. John erred in the person, whom he thought to be an uncreated angel; he did not err in the preaching, or the consigning of the divine word.

III. Matthew erred in ch. XXVII:9, alleging Jeremiah for Zechariah; which words cited by him concerning the weighing out of thirty silver pieces are read in Zechariah ch. XI:12. Resp. Matthew's words are: "Then was fulfilled what was said by Jeremiah the prophet, saying." Nothing is had in the text about the writing of Jeremiah. Whatever, therefore, Jeremiah said, Zechariah wrote for his disciples.

IV. Luke erred in ch. III:36, when he wrote that Sala was the son of Cainan; since, however, according to the testimony of Moses in Gen. XI:12, he was the son of Arphaxad. Resp. That Cainan is "spurious" (ὑποβολιμαῖος), supposititious or has crept in; since by some scribe of a book, from which many copies have flowed, from the penultimate verse of this chapter the name of Cainan was by some error placed in this v. 36, having improperly inspected the archetype, or by a hallucination of the one dictating. In the most ancient copies, Cainan is not read in v. 36. See HUGO GROTIUS on this passage, and cf. D. CALOV, illustrated bible, fol. 571.

V. Paul erred in Heb. XI:21, citing the erroneous version of the LXX interpreters: "προσεκύνησεν ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ" (he worshiped over the top of his staff); since, however, Moses testifies in Gen. XLVII:31 that he worshiped on the head of the bed. Resp. Paul does not contradict Moses; for each asserts that Israel bowed himself, about to exhibit political reverence to Joseph (or, in the mind of other interpreters, most humbly about to adore God himself). Moses indicates the place, Paul the instrument by which he, being infirm, supported himself, namely the scepter of Joseph. You say: Paul followed the LXX to that, "we made known to you," but to both of these, "having been eyewitnesses," and, "we heard." The senses, although they are apt for rightly perceiving things, yet sometimes are deceived and err, they can indeed be carried into error; but that Word is entirely most certain, without any exception. Therefore, that word was to be thought more certain than these senses. But that in that glory of Christ, which Peter had beheld with his own eyes, and in that voice, divinely pronounced, which he himself had heard with his own ears, a certain complement of the prophecies concerning Christ plainly appeared, this was finally a most brilliant argument, which placed the perception of the senses beyond all doubt. For prophecies to which the event entirely corresponds are a most firm foundation on which the whole Christian faith rests, and the Apostles themselves could not have not doubted the truth of what they had sensed, unless in the affairs of Jesus of Nazareth it had been permitted them to see and hear that very thing which had long before been predicted concerning Christ. See 1 Peter 1:11 & 12.

interpreters, who, having hallucinated in the translation of the word מִטָּה (mittah, bed), since they read מַטֶּה (matteh, staff), translated staff for bed. Resp. Paul did not approve the license of the LXX interpreters in translating, but the thing itself truly done, that Jacob bowed himself on the head of the bed, supported by the scepter of Joseph (if with some it is read αὐτοῦ (his own), he was supported by his own staff). See D. PFEIFFER, vexing doubts, p. 221, confer D. CALOV, illustrated bible on the cited place in Hebrews ch. XI:21, fol. 1360, add D. VARENIUS in Gen. decad. XII, loc. V, p. 569.

VI. Stephen seems to have erred twice. I. when he recounts that Joseph transferred Jacob to Egypt, and his whole kindred, consisting of 75 souls, Acts VII:14, when however Moses only numbers 70, Gen. XLVI:27. II. When the same asserts that Abraham bought a sepulcher for a price of silver from the sons of Hamor, (son of) Shechem, Acts VII:16, which not Abraham, but his grandson Jacob bought, Gen. XXXIII:19. Resp. to I. Stephen begins one number, Moses wove another catalogue. For the latter does not count the wives of Jacob; for he expressly writes in Gen. XLVI:26-27: "Every soul coming with Jacob into Egypt that came from his thigh, besides the wives of the sons of Jacob: every soul (I say) are sixty-six. But the sons of Joseph, who were born to him in Egypt are two souls: (whence) every soul of the house of Jacob who came into Egypt are seventy (if indeed Jacob the root of the family and Joseph are added)." Stephen, however, enumerates all who were summoned by Joseph with Jacob into Egypt, to whom certainly the wives of Jacob are to be counted; to whom if you add from the household handmaids or servants, the number 75 is easily completed. Moses, therefore, recounts the posterity of Jacob, Stephen his retinue. To II. The common Latin interpreter has translated the Greek words of Stephen badly, which D. SEBASTIANUS SCHMIDIUS has rendered more accurately in his Latin bible: "(partly)...(partly) they were placed in the monument which Abraham had bought for a price in silver, besides (that) of the sons of Hamor, (which is) at Shechem. Stephen asserts that some of the fathers were buried with Jacob in the field of Ephron, bought from Abraham, in Genesis 23:17, and some with Joseph at Shechem, in Joshua 24:32. Compare GLASSIUS in "Philologia Sacra," book III, tract 2, canon 2, page 503.

VII. The prophet Isaiah is ordered to write with a man's stylus, that is, in a popular manner according to the erroneous opinion of men, because most men judge only according to external appearances. Isaiah 8:1. Response: Isaiah is ordered to write with a man's stylus not precisely by conforming to the common custom of speaking, especially an erroneous one, or by a deformity from the divine sense; but by an accommodation to public use, and thus he is ordered to write with a man's stylus, that is, as men are accustomed, on some paper or open leaf, clearly, in distinct characters, so that anyone can read and understand.

VIII. If the apostles themselves accommodated themselves to the opinion of newly converted Jews, and allowed them the observance of circumcision, which was nevertheless abrogated by Christ in the New Testament (see Acts 16, Galatians 5:2-3), it follows that the Holy Spirit much more adapted Himself to the opinion of common men in those things where error is not joined with a danger to salvation, until this world, in which we know only in part, through a mirror and an enigma, is buried. But the first is true; therefore, also the latter. Response: 1. Circumcision, abrogated and yet permitted for a time, is poorly compared with an erroneous expression. For circumcision is a rite, considered absolutely, without a divine command or prohibition, that is indifferent, intrinsically including no reason for goodness or foulness; but with the addition of a divine command, it became morally good; with the addition of a divine prohibition, morally bad. But an erroneous expression intrinsically includes turpitude, and can in no way come from God, who is the first truth. 2. To concede circumcision for a time denotes only a permissive act; by this permission, the rite of circumcision is rendered neither good nor bad, nor is it appropriated by the one permitting. But to deliver something according to the erroneous opinion of the populace is a positive act, which, if traced back to God, would manifestly argue Him to be the cause of the error itself. Cf. D. IO. ADAM. OSIANDR. colleg. Systemat. part. 1. p. 75.

Question XIX. How many senses can a biblical statement have?

Of a single, simple biblical statement, there is one literal, and formal, sense, which the Holy Spirit intends to express immediately through the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσοις) words.

Obs. I. A single simple biblical statement is said to be one proposition, consisting of one subject and one predicate. But if in conglomerated and connected biblical statements there are different subjects and predicates, a double sense emerges, because it is not one, but a double biblical statement. For example, the prophet Joel, chapter 2, verse 13, gravely exhorts: "Rend your hearts, and not your garments." Here there are two biblical statements: "Repentant sinners should rend their hearts." "Repentant sinners should not rend their garments." The former is understood in a metaphorical sense, the latter in a proper sense.

Obs. II. The literal sense is so called either grammatically or logically. The grammatical literal sense is that which the words produce in their proper and native signification, even if it does not in the least agree with the intention of the speaker. It is more correctly called the sense of the letter than the literal sense. The literal sense of Holy Scripture is logically called that which the Holy Spirit Himself proximately intends by the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσοις) words, whether they be proper or affected by some trope. See KOENIG. in theolog. positiv. p. 12. How the sense of the letter and the literal sense (taken logically) differ, is easily apparent from the following biblical statements. In Luke 13:32, Herod is called a fox. In Matthew 5:29-30, the Savior orders to pluck out the right eye and cut off the right hand, if these members should scandalize us. In Psalm 91:13, the Holy Spirit says through the psalmist: "You will tread on the lion and the asp; you will trample the young lion and the dragon." These celestial oracles cohere badly according to the sense of the letter, but excellently according to the literal sense.

Obs. III. The literal sense is divided into the proper sense and the figurative or tropical sense. The proper sense is that which the Holy Spirit intends with words taken in their native signification. For example, "God is Spirit," John 4:24. The figurative or tropical sense is that which is proximately intended by the Holy Spirit with words affected by some trope. For example, "God is our shield, our exceedingly great reward." Genesis 15:1.

Obs. IV. The sense of a biblical statement is either formal, that is, immediate, or virtual, that is, mediate. The former is that which is immediately intended by the Holy Spirit with divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσοις) words, and is known from them directly without any consequence. For example, "You shall have no other God before my face." Exodus 20:3. The formal sense is: "I, the true God, alone am to be worshipped religiously by you, O man." The virtual sense is that which is elicited from the formal sense by consequence. For example, from the biblical statement just cited, I elicit various mediate senses: Angels are not to be worshipped religiously; St. Mary is not to be adored; carved things and images are not to be invoked; no man, Prince, King, Caesar, is to be equally loved and feared as the true God; Mammon is not to be served; our trust is not to be fixed in our wisdom, justice, strength, arms; our belly should not be our God. We state that of one biblical statement there is one formal sense, from which various virtual and mediate senses can be deduced by consequence.

Obs. V. The sense of a biblical statement is commonly divided into the literal and the mystical. The literal sense, logically speaking, was defined above in Obs. II. The mystical sense is said to be that which is not signified proximately by the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσοις) words, but which flows and is deduced from the thing signified by the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσοις) words. It is called improperly (ἀκύρως), roughly (παχυλῶς), and abusively the sense of the biblical statement, since it is not the immediate sense of the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσων) words; but because God, through the thing or deed described by those same words, wished to present another thing or another deed for the consideration of men's eyes and minds. Therefore, it is more accurately called the accommodation of the literal sense, or mystical application, than the mystical sense of scripture (*), for example,

(*) But caution must be applied, lest you think such accommodation to be of the kind which the SOCINIANS think, as also the REMONSTRANTS, namely one finally devised by the writers of the N.T. When certain Theologians, rightly thinking, like the blessed Author, prefer to call that sense, which most call mystical, accommodation, they always understand that accommodation which the Prophets of the O.T. wished to signify, and which the writers of the N.T. so brought forth, that it entirely corresponds to the mind and counsel of the in Jonah 2:1, the prophet Jonah is said to have been for three days and nights in the belly of the fish; there the literal sense proximately intended by God is that which the words present and immediately produce; but when this entire history or deed is transferred to signify Christ's stay for three days and nights in the tomb, Matthew 12:30, a new sense does not arise from this, but only an accommodation and application of that history to signify that Christ would be in the tomb for so many days and nights (although they were not complete days and nights, but their beginning and end are to be understood). Cf. D. QUENSTED. in systemat. theol. fol. 134.

Obs. VI. The mystical sense, roughly (Παχυλῶς) speaking, is divided by the pontificians into the allegorical, tropological, and anagogical sense. The allegorical sense is when the words of scripture, besides the literal sense, signify something in the New Testament that pertains to Christ or the church of Christ. The tropological, or moral, sense is when words or deeds are referred to signifying something that pertains to morals. The anagogical sense is when words or deeds are referred to signifying eternal life. For example, Jerusalem in the literal sense denotes the city of Palestine, in the allegorical sense the church militant on earth, in the anagogical sense the church triumphant in heaven. These different senses of sacred scripture are comprehended in the following couplet:

The letter teaches the deeds; allegory, what you believe;

The moral, what you should do; anagogy, what you should hope for.

But in truth, the papist distinction of the mystical sense is not so accurate. (1) Because all three species of the mystical sense, enumerated by the pontificians, are comprehended under allegory. (2) The moral sense is wrongly called tropological, because morals are not called manners/ways (τρόποι), but customs/morals (ἥθη). (3) Elevation in Greek is not called lack of discipline (ἀναγωγή) (which word denotes a defect of discipline, or a dissolute life) but elevation/uplifting (ἀναγωγή).

Obs. VII. Orthodox theologians distinguish the mystical sense into typical, allegorical, and parabolic. The typical sense (as defined by D. GLASSIUS lib. II. part. 1. tract. II. Sect.

II. p. 289.) is when under external deeds or prophetic visions, a hidden thing, whether present or future, is figured, and especially when deeds of the Old Testament prefigure or adumbrate deeds of the New Testament. The typical sense is subdivided by D. GLASSIUS in the same chapter into prophetic and historical. The prophetic or prophetic type is that which divinely inspired prophets frequently use in their sermons, partly admonitory, partly predictive. Namely, when by external symbols they figure and signify hidden things, whether present or future, through the Holy Spirit. It consists, then, in prophetic and typical 1. actions, 2. visions. Typical prophetic actions are when by those things which the prophets performed externally by divine command, something mystical and hidden was adumbrated, for example, Isaiah chapter 20:2, goes naked, that is, stripped of his prophetic garment, to adumbrate the disaster of the Egyptians and Ethiopians. Visions were offered either to those sleeping or to those awake. Typical visions offered to the sleeping were through divinely sent dreams, insofar as they are enveloped in figures and types, e.g., Jacob's dream of the ladder, reaching from earth to heaven. Genesis 28:12. See its typical application in John 1:15. Typical visions, offered to the awake, have a certain added interpretation of the type, the explanation of which must be educed from the context (συναρπεία) and circumstances of the text, for example, the prophet Jeremiah saw two baskets of good and bad figs. The former basket, full of good figs, prefigured the restoration of the Israelite church; the latter signified the deportation of Zedekiah and the Jewish people; which interpretation is found in Jeremiah 24:5, 6, 7, 8. The historical type, or historic, is the mystical sense of scripture, by which deeds of the Old Testament prefigure deeds done or to be done in the New Testament. For example, the paschal lamb was a type of Christ. Of the paschal lamb, Jehovah says, Exodus 12:46, "You shall not break a bone of it." Which words in the literal sense are understood solely of the paschal lamb, to be slain and eaten by the Israelites; by typical accommodation to Christ, prefigured by the paschal lamb, they are applied, John 19:36. The allegorical sense is when a truly occurred history of scripture is referred to a certain mystery, or spiritual doctrine, by the intention of the Holy Spirit. For example, cruelty to animals, especially to laboring oxen, the creator severely forbade; which interdict can be read in Deuteronomy 25:4, "You shall not muzzle the ox when it treads out the grain." In the literal sense, this biblical statement is understood of no other than the threshing ox; allegorically, the same is applied to the minister of the church, laboring intensely for the salvation of men. 1 Corinthians 9:9. The parabolic sense is when some thing, as if it happened, is aptly feigned and narrated, and is referred to designating something else spiritual. Thus, to no one initiated into the sacred rites of Christians is the parable of the householder unknown, who went out at early dawn to hire laborers for his vineyard, Matthew 20:1 sqq.

Obs. VIII. Mystical accommodation is either innate or inferred. The former is that which sacred scripture itself either expressly shows or in some way insinuates; The latter is that which sacred scripture itself does not show, but which has been devised by the doctors of the church. If this has been offered, not without a probable foundation sought from the literal sense, and analogous to faith, it is accepted by us not unwillingly; but if it has been forced, destitute of probable foundation, and deflecting from the analogy of faith, it is repudiated. The formal literal sense of each simple biblical statement, intended by the Holy Spirit, is proven to be not double, but one,

I. From the efficient cause of Holy Scripture, God, who since He is most truthful, best, and wisest, does not play with ambiguities, like that ambiguous spirit (λοξίας), who, when consulted by Pyrrhus, who was plotting against the Romans, ambiguously responded: "I say that you, son of Aeacus, can conquer the Romans." The impostor deluded with a twofold sense of the oracle; but every divine biblical statement exhibits a single divine literal sense.

II. From the nature of sense and signification. The form of Holy Scripture is one. But the literal sense is the form of Holy Scripture, and its soul, as it were. Therefore, the literal sense of Holy Scripture is one.

III. From the truth of Holy Scripture. Whatever is true, is one. (There cannot be more than one truth.) But the sense of Holy Scripture is true. Therefore, it is one.

IV. From the perspicuity of Holy Scripture, which is so lucid that even a child may grasp its sense. Timothy is an example for us, commended by St. Paul because he knew the holy letters from infancy. 2 Timothy 3:15. But scripture, implicated in various senses, involves itself in its own obscurity and distracts the mind of the reader.

V. From the purpose of Holy Scripture, which is to make wise (σοφισαί), or to make the unskilled and the little ones wise, Psalm 19:8, 2 Timothy 3:15. A multiple sense of a statement does not make a man wise, but wandering; for it begets equivocation, the fecund mother of errors.

VI. From absurdity. If Holy Scripture sustained many, and diverse, senses in one place, in one proposition, no firm argument could be sought from it; it would be a trumpet, giving an uncertain sound, and therefore useless, 1 Corinthians 14:7, it would not be a constant rule of faith and morals.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificians and the Socinians, who state that one biblical statement can have several literal senses; who, to fortify their opinion, adduce not a few biblical statements, which in their view possess a double sense, divinely intended.

I. Joel 2:13. "Rend your heart, and not your garments." Response; This biblical statement is not one proposition, but virtually double. We are speaking of one simple biblical statement. See Obs. I.

II. That statement; Exodus 20:3, "You shall not have strange gods before me," begets many senses. Response; It begets one formal or immediate sense, from which virtual and mediate senses are elicited by consequence.

III. There are biblical statements in which both a literal and a mystical sense are intended by God. For example, Exodus 12:46. "You shall not break a bone of it." Deuteronomy 25:4. Which are explained in a mystical sense by the Holy Spirit Himself, John 19:36, 1 Corinthians 9:9. Response; The mystical sense is more correctly called an accommodation, or application of the biblical statement, than its sense; since it is not intended by the Holy Spirit through the divinely inspired (θεόπνευστα) words, but is applied through a thing or deed, indicated by the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύσας) words, to another thing, or another deed by analogy, or some sort of agreement by the Holy Spirit. We speak of the sense intended by the divine words, not of the mystical accommodation of things or deeds.

IV. The words of Hosea chapter 11:1, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him; and out of Egypt I called my son," are to be taken in a double sense. 1. In a literal sense concerning the people of Israel, freed from Egyptian servitude. 2. In a mystical sense concerning Christ's going down into Egypt and returning. Response: 1) Nothing would be lost from our sentence if we were to say that those words are understood in the literal sense concerning the Israelite people, whose return from Egypt is mystically applied to Christ's return from Egypt. 2) The words of Hosea: "Out of Egypt I have called my son," are to be taken not mystically, but literally and immediately, concerning Christ in this way: When Israel was rude, precipitous in his actions, and shaking off the yoke; yet I loved him so much that for his sake I called my son Jesus out of Egypt, to instruct the ignorant, correct the petulant, and amend and strengthen the precipitous with celestial doctrine.

V. The words of Psalm 2:7, "I have this day begotten you," have a triple sense; for they are explained concerning the eternal generation of the son of God, Hebrews 1:5, concerning the resurrection of Christ, Acts 13:33, and concerning His priesthood, Hebrews 5:5. Response: The cited words of Psalm 2:7 are rightly expounded concerning the eternal generation of the son of God, Hebrews 1. Nor in Acts 13:33 is it about the resuscitation of Christ from the dead, but that Greek word "having raised up" (ἀναστήσας) is the same as exciting, presenting, bringing forth. The sense therefore is: God the father, mindful of his promise, excited, sent, and presented to the Jews his son begotten from eternity, whom he had addressed in Psalm 2: "You are my Son; This day I have begotten you." The resurrection of Christ from the dead is treated in verse 34. In Hebrews 5:5, the person is described by whom Christ was called to the priesthood. That person is God the father, the source and origin of the son, from whom, as he received his essence through eternal generation, so he received the honor of the great priesthood at the appointed time. From which it is clear that the words of Psalm 2, "I have this day begotten you," have but one meaning, and retain it everywhere.

VI. The words of Isaiah 53:4, "He has borne our infirmities," in 1 Peter 2:25 are expounded of sins, in Matthew 8:17 of bodily diseases. Response: Christ bore all diseases in general, of body and soul; for he bore sins, and their punishments, of which diseases are reckoned. Therefore, by removing diseases, as punishments, he demonstrated a posteriori that he bears and expiates the sins of the world.

VII. That memorable prophecy of Jehovah, 2 Samuel 7:14, "When your days are fulfilled, and you shall sleep with your fathers, I will set up your seed after you, which shall proceed out of your bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. I will be his father, and he shall be my son"; is understood of both Solomon and Christ. Response: This whole prophecy is to be understood in a literal sense of the Messiah; because I. here it deals with a seed to be raised from the bowels of David, after David's time; therefore not of Solomon, who was neither born nor placed on the royal throne after David's death. II. Nor was the throne of his kingdom established for Solomon forever, but for the Messiah, verse 13. III. David responds: "This is the law of the man, who is the Lord God," designating Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπον). IV. St. Paul testifies that this oracle was uttered concerning Christ, Hebrews 1:5. You say 1. Not all predicates of this prophecy apply to the Messiah. For it speaks of the builder of the Lord's house, who is Solomon. Response: The house of the Lord does not denote the material temple of Solomon, but the spiritual house, namely the church, whose architect is Christ. The reason is that a house is understood to be as perpetual as the eternal kingdom of this seed of David. You say II. The divine response speaks of the building of that temple which was discussed in David's council, which without a doubt was material in David's mind. Response: The divine response is partly negative, partly affirmative. Negatively the Lord responds: "Will you build me a house to dwell in?" Therefore the Lord does not desire a material temple. Affirmatively the same responds by inversion; "Jehovah (God the father) has announced to you that Jehovah (God the son, because the Lord speaks of the Lord) will make you a house." These words contain the proposal (πρόταση) and the sum of what follows; inasmuch as they indicate that not David was to build a house for the Lord, but the Lord was to build David a spiritual house and an eternal kingdom; which spiritual house and which eternal kingdom is the church, the house of the living God, 1 Timothy 3:15, which Christ founded, Matthew 16:18, the kingdom of Christ, of which there will be no end. Luke 1:33. You say III. The Lord speaks of that person who was not immune from a propensity to sin. For he says in verse 14:

"Who, when he has done something wrong, I will chastise him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the sons of men." Response: The Lord speaks (a) not of inherent sin; for the Messiah was never infected with it, but of imputed sin; because he willingly took upon himself the sins of the whole world to be expiated, 1 John 2:2. Which the sacred scripture graphically delineates, speaking of Christ as if he himself had sinned. Psalm 40:13; Psalm 31:15; Psalm 69:6. (b) Of the satisfactory passion of Christ. You say IV. This prophecy, joined with the sweetest promise, is expounded of Solomon by David himself, 1 Chronicles 22:9, and also applied to himself by Solomon, 1 Kings 5:5; chapter 8:17; 2 Chronicles 6:7. Response: The cited places are not parallel to the prophecy we have been discussing. For that promise in 1 Chronicles 22:9, which the other places refer to, is later in time than our prophecy. That one speaks of a son to be born to David; this one of a seed to be raised long after David's death; that one of a material house and the temple of Jerusalem; this one of a spiritual house and an eternal kingdom, and it is repeated in 1 Chronicles 17, following verses.

VIII. The words of Jeremiah 31:15, "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation, weeping of bitterness; Rachel is weeping for her children," are understood of the Benjaminites being led into captivity. But in Matthew 2:18, they are expounded of Herod's infanticide, and the lamentation of the mothers of Bethlehem. Response: It is not understood in that place of the lamentation of the Benjaminites (by whose name are also designated the Jews, united with them since the schism of the Israelite kingdom, 1 Kings 22:20) heard because of the abduction into captivity, of which the Holy Spirit never expounds that lamentation; but because of the Herodian infanticide Rachel is introduced weeping through prosopopoeia; by which is designated that Herod's tyranny would rage even to the borders of Benjamin, and in those confines, where Rachel closed her eyes and was buried, her posterity would be killed with detestable cruelty. Rachel's tomb, however, was in the field of Bethlehem, Genesis 35:19. Therefore, there is no double sense in that place.

IX. John 11:50. Caiaphas says: "It is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." "This he spoke not of himself; but being the high priest of that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation." Response: Of the biblical statement just cited, there is one literal sense, intended by the Holy Spirit; namely, that it would be for the benefit of the entire human race if Christ should suffer death to avert its eternal ruin, notwithstanding that Caiaphas conceived another sense in his mind. For our discourse is not about the human sense of a biblical statement, but the divine, which Caiaphas did not understand, but in uttering the prophecy he merely lent his mouth to the Holy Spirit, like Balaam's ass, and prophesied without understanding the prophecy.

X. When Moses in Deuteronomy 32:1 exclaims: "Give ear, O heavens, for I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth," by heavens, according to Cocceius, can be understood angels, the aerial and ethereal heavens; because scripture uses the word "heaven" in all those significations. Response: 1) Distinguish between words taken separately, and jointly in a whole phrase. If words are taken separately, they can be expounded in various senses; if they are taken jointly, the scope of the speaker must be respected, and the antecedents must be accurately compared with the consequents; in which way they produce one sense. 2) It is one thing that a word can be expounded in a different sense, and another that it must be explained in a varying sense. Luther: "It is one thing; it can be called that; it is another thing; it must be called that." 3) In the cited place, we understand metonymically by heavens, the angels, witnesses of divine deeds in the heaven of glory; by earth, men, inhabiting the terrestrial globe.

XI. Whatever is the word of God, that is fecund with many senses. But holy scripture etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because the word of God is a concept of the divine mind, and God by one mental concept can express infinite things. Response: We deny the major. To the proof we say that God adorned holy scripture, not according to the measure of His intellect, but according to His most benign will, and thus with a quantity pleasing to Himself, so that by a convenient condescension (συγκαταβάσει) He might descend to the grasp of our intellect. For since God in holy scripture speaks not for His own sake, but for ours, that is, to help and direct the concepts of our intellect, He did not express several senses in single places; otherwise, He would not help our intellect, but overwhelm it.

XII. Interpreters of holy scripture often educe a multiple sense from one biblical statement, for example, when the holy spirit through the psalmist exhorts in Psalm 2:12; נשקו בר (nash'ku-var), those words can be expounded in a fourfold sense, analogous to faith. 1) adore the son. 2) adore purely. 3) kiss the wheat. 4) apprehend discipline. Response: a) Distinguish between the inferred and innate sense of holy scripture. Interpreters, since they do not always attain the mind of the Lord, infer various senses for one biblical statement; although it itself has only one, as it were, innate and intended by the Holy Spirit. b) Although בר (bar) denotes son, wheat, pure (but never doctrine or institution) if taken separately; here, however, taken jointly in the whole phrase, it must be explained according to the scope of the speaker, and by a comparison of the antecedents and consequents. The scope of the second Psalm is the religious veneration of the Messiah. The most pregnant reasons are, because he is the king anointed by God the father, and set over the most holy mount Zion, i.e., the church, v. 6; a catholic king, v. 8; an omnipotent king, v. 9. Opposing the religious veneration of the Messiah is a hostile conspiracy against him, v. 1, 2, and contempt for his religion, v. 3, which obstacles must be removed. The manner of worshipping the Messiah is inculcated in the immediately preceding verse 11, namely, that he is to be served in fear, joined with spiritual joy; in the consequents, trust to be placed in this divine, catholic, and omnipotent king is commended. These things having been weighed, there is no doubt that the Hebrew words נשקו בר are to be rendered: "kiss the son," i.e., Christ the only-begotten son of God, the greatest of kings, full of trust, love, joy, fear, and submission, worship him submissively, in the manner of those who, about to venerate the most powerful kings, kiss their hands. Other senses inferred for this biblical statement by interpreters, although they are analogous to faith, are not, however, analogous to the text.

Question XX. What is the external form of Holy Scripture?

The external form of Holy Scripture is its style, the character of its speech, and its idiom; and that is Hebrew in the Old Testament (a), with the exception of a few certain parts, which, as the occasion arose, were written in the Chaldean idiom (b); but Greek in the New Testament (c).

Proof a. The Old Testament was written in the Hebrew idiom; (1) because the Hebrew language is primeval, and therefore most ancient. For indeed all the names, given to men before the universal cataclysm and the confusion of tongues (γλωττοσύγχυσιν), were taken from the Hebrew language. See D. PFEIFF. Diff. philol. de lingua protoplastorum assert. III. (2) The Hebrew language was familiar to all the Israelites, for whose benefit the scripture of the Old Testament was chiefly destined; and especially to the prophets, by whose ministry the writings of the Old Testament were consigned.

Proof b. A Chaldaic pericope is found in the codex of the Old Testament, Jeremiah 10:11, containing the Jews' response to the Chaldeans; and almost entire chapters in the books written after the Babylonian captivity; namely in the book of Ezra from chapter 4:8 to chapter 6:19 and chapter 7:10 to verse 27; letters written by the Chaldeans and to the Chaldeans are mentioned; and also in the book of Daniel from chapter 2 to chapter 8, where the king of Babylon's relation of a dream, consultation, acts, visions and some writings are woven in the Chaldaic style.

Proof c. The New Testament was consigned in the Greek idiom. For since, besides the Jews, the gentiles also, differing in languages and dialects, were to be drawn to the Christian faith through the preaching of the gospel, it was very fittingly written in the Greek language; because this was at that time most known not only to the Jews, but also to the gentiles everywhere, and therefore most convenient for the propagation of the evangelical doctrine.

Question XXI. Is the style of Holy Scripture, especially of the New Testament, idiotic, filled with barbarisms and solecisms?

The style of Holy Scripture, both of the Old and of the New Testament, is grave and worthy of the divine majesty, defiled by no grammatical fault, no barbarism or solecism.

Obs. 1. An idiotic style is rude, rustic, destitute of accurate connection and all ornament.

Obs. 2. The Stoics, according to Diogenes Laërtius book VIII, and from him Suidas, define barbarism as "a faulty expression contrary to the custom of the approved Greeks" (ἐκ τῶν κακῶν λέξεις παρὰ τὸ ἔθος τῶν εὐδοκιμούντων ἐλλήνων). Solecism, however, according to the same Suidas, is "an incongruously constructed speech" (ὁ λόγος ἀκαταλλήλως συντεταγμένος). To Donatus, a solecism is a fault in the construction of the parts of speech committed against the rule of art.

Proof I. The style of the most wise God should be called neither idiotic nor beset with barbarisms or solecisms. But the style of Holy Scripture is the style of the most wise God. Therefore. The major is clear, because a fault in speech cannot be imputed to God, the giver of languages and the most wise artificer of speech, without a great mark of blasphemy and impiety. The minor is proven from Matthew 10:19-20. "Be not solicitous how or what you shall speak; for it shall be given you in that hour what to speak. For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of the Father that speaks in you." But if the Holy Spirit inspired the apostles in their extemporaneous apologies not only the "what," the matter itself, but also the "how," the manner of speaking; much more did He suggest to them the manner of writing words that are fitting and convenient for expressing things; inasmuch as they were to endure for many ages by the will of God.

II. The rude and ignorant write in a faulty style. But the prophets were not rude and ignorant. Therefore. The major is clear; because, in the opinion of Quintilian, solecism is a name for ignorance and rudeness. The minor is clear, since the prophets and apostles were men moved and illuminated by the Holy Spirit, 2 Peter 1:21, to whom the Spirit inspired both the things and the words to be written, 2 Timothy 3:16.

The antithesis is that of Erasmus, Vorstius, Salmasius, and others, who think too abjectly of the style of Holy Scripture, asserting it to be idiotic, beset with barbarisms and solecisms; whose stronger arguments are these.

I. The apostles were unlettered and ignorant men (ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται), Acts 4:13. Therefore they wrote in an idiotic and rude style. R. The apostles are called unlearned and ignorant (idiotas) antecedently, i.e., before they were endued with virtue from on high, Luke 24:49, since they were not cultivated in the disciplines of either the philosophers or the Pharisees; but they were not unlearned and ignorant (idiotas) consequently, i.e., after the rudeness of their tongue was taken away by the fire of the Holy Spirit, so that they spoke in their own dialect to men of the most diverse languages present, Acts 2:6.

Instance: The Apostle Paul, illuminated by the Holy Spirit, calls himself an idiotas, 2 Corinthians 11:6. "But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge" (Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, ἀλλ' οὐ τῇ γνώσει). Response: a) The apostle argues in that place according to man (κατ' ἄνθρωπον); for he does not speak categorically, but hypothetically or by a hypothetical concession based on the opinion of the pseudo-apostles and the Corinthians adhering to them; as if to say: Granted, that to the braggart judges, clever with words (λογοδαιδάλους), I am an idiotas, or rude in speech; yet the lack of my simple oration is compensated by a knowledge of divine mysteries worthy of prophets and apostles. b) The apostle renounces for himself the glory of a painted, curled oration, sought from the schools of rhetoricians, which is often soft and effeminate; yet he did not lack a masculine eloquence, grave with the weight of its sentences, full of divine power (ἐνεργεῖα), so that by the force of the spirit he might draw the souls of men to Christ, not allure them with the blandishments of speech in the manner of flatterers.

II. Whoever in Greek writings uses Hebraisms, their writings are barbarous. But etc. Therefore. The major is established; because foreign words, such as Hebrew, used in the Greek language, as well as the idiotisms of the Hebrews sprinkled into the Attic language, make it barbarous. The minor is clear both from the Hebrew and Chaldeo-Syriac words: Korban, Talitha, Raca, Manna, Hallelujah, Hosanna, Mammon, etc., and from the formulas of constructing sentences, proper to the Hebrews, with which the scripture of the New Testament abounds. Response: (a) The major is not universal; for with the same form of argument one might conclude: Whoever in Latin writings uses Graecisms, their writings are barbarous. But CICERO, VIRGIL, HORACE, etc. Therefore. (b) With a foreign word received by use, sometimes urged by necessity, sometimes persuaded by elegance, we use barbarisms without fault. (c) A barbarism is not introduced when an inferior language borrows formulas of speaking from a superior, more excellent, and more ancient one (such as Hebrew) and transfers them into its own use. (d) It pleased the Holy Spirit to propagate the mysteries of faith in the same style and thread of discourse to show the harmony of the Old and New Testaments. Wherefore it is no wonder that the property of the Hebrew language, as the first, diffuses itself through both the Old and New Testaments, and flows into biblical Greek. Whence, what is considered barbarous in the Attic Greek language is not to be held as barbarous in the biblical, Hebrew-Greek language.

III. There is in the New Testament an incongruously written sentence; Therefore a solecism. The antecedent is clear from Luke 22:26. "...in the blood being shed" (ἐν τῷ αἵματι ἐκχυνόμενον); it should have been congruously said: ἐκχυνόμενον. Response: The Greek words are to be explained by ellipsis; "which is being shed" (ὁ ἐς τὸ ἐκχυνόμενον). D. DANNHAY. rightly warns in Hodos. Phan. I. p. 42. "What a profane person would call a solecism, a Christian would more rightly call a grammatical figure, syllepsis, ellipsis, enallage; for far be it from us to impute wickedness (κακίαν), or foulness, as Fabius calls it, to the Holy Spirit."

IV. SALMASIUS objects in his commentary on the Hellenistic language, p. 260, that certain fathers of the church called the apostles ignorant, rustic, unlearned, unlettered (ἰδιώτας, ἀγροίκες, ἀμαθεῖς, ἀγραμμάτες), whose diction is rustic, solecistic, barbarous & ignorant (ἀγροικισμένη, σολοικίεσα, βαρβαρίζεσα & ἰδιωτική). Response: (1) Not all fathers think so abjectly of the apostolic style, but they ingenuously and openly confess its gravity. (2) Some fathers spoke from the hypothesis of the gentile sophists, whom they did not wish to refute on this very point, but having conceded this, that the apostolic style is idiotic and unpolished, they refuted this objection in another way, partly by preferring the simplicity of biblical eloquence to the pomp of words, the allurements of rhetoricians, and the affected manner of speaking of the sophists; partly, leaving the character of the style, by appealing to the very majesty of the things contained in the sacred scripture, and by this very argument, as by a stronger battering ram, defeating them. Hence ORIGEN in Book IV, "On First Principles" (περὶ ἀρχῶν), ch. 1: "If the books of the new testament, written with rhetorical art or philosophical cleverness, were to entice men to believe, without a doubt our faith would be thought to consist in the art of words and in human wisdom, and not in the power of God." AMBROSE, letter LXIV: "The writers of the divine books, although they did not write according to art but according to grace, which is above all art; yet those who have written about art have found art from their writings." AUGUSTINE, book IV on Christian doctrine, ch. VI: "Just as there is a certain eloquence that better befits the age of youth, and another that befits old age, and it should not be called eloquence if it does not suit the person of the speaker; so there is a certain eloquence that befits men most worthy of the highest authority, and plainly divine. With this they (the apostles) spoke; and no other befits them, nor does this befit others; for it suits them; but to others, the more humble it seems, the higher it transcends not by windiness, but by solidity." CHRYSOSTOM, Book IV on the priesthood, thinks magnificently of the eloquence of Paul: "The lightness of Socrates, the swell of Demosthenes, the dignity of Thucydides, the height of Plato, the ornament of foreign eloquence are not to be sought in St. Paul; but there is not lacking in him a naked and simple oration, which has the weight of the greatest matters, and confirms all things most robustly; from which greatest ornament and highest praise he is not to be stripped."

Question XXII. For the benefit of which men were the sacred letters destined and written?

The sacred letters were divinely destined and written for the salvation of all men, possessing the full use of reason and capable of the external word (a), so that it is permissible and expedient for clergy and laity, learned and unlearned, men and women, to read them attentively, and to meditate on them devoutly for the sake of the goal (b).

Proof a. The end for which, or the subject for whose salvation the most merciful God destined His revealed word, committed to letters, is every man, corrupted by sin, to be saved by a serious divine intention. For God Himself wrote this law in letters on tablets of stone, and gave it to Moses, not that he should keep it locked in a chest, as a divine deposit proper to himself, but that he should communicate it to the people of God, and as a great prophet declare it. This we gather from Exodus 24:12. "And Jehovah said to Moses, 'Come up to me into the mount, and be there; and I will give you tablets of stone, and a law, and a commandment which I will write to teach them.'" Not only Moses, or another prophet, was to teach others the law written by Jehovah, but also the head of the family was bound to inculcate the same to his children and household; which Jehovah Himself seriously enjoined, Deuteronomy 6:6, seq. "And these words, which I command you this day, shall be in your heart; and you shall teach them diligently to your children, and shall talk of them when you sit in your house, and when you walk by the way, and when you lie down, and when you rise up. And you shall bind them for a sign upon your hand, and they shall be as frontlets between your eyes, and you shall write them upon the posts of your house, and on your gates<sup>1</sup>." The more literal Jews understand these words individually to the letter; therefore they make for themselves phylacteries for the head and hands, and at the time of prayers they bind them to the forehead and the left arm, thinking that in this way they have beautifully satisfied the divine command. See D. PFEIFF. antiquit. sacrae decad. II. posit. I. p. 29. But indeed some of them are more correctly explained by metaphor. Namely, in these words God commends to the Israelites the faithful custody of the law, that they may have it assiduously in their heart, mouth, and work. In the heart, as a most precious treasure never to be buried in oblivion; in the mouth, as the principal subject of daily conversation to be instituted with their sons; in work, as the norm of obedience to be rendered to God. Hence JEROME on chapter 23 of Matthew: "The precepts will be in your hand, that they may be fulfilled; before your eyes, that you may meditate on them day and night." Therefore the law written by God was destined for teachers, heads of families, their children, households, and consequently all men subject to God, who disposes all things. The word of the gospel was likewise written for all who would believe in Christ to obtain eternal life. John 20:31. The apostles wrote their epistles to entire churches and all the called, Romans 1:7; to all the holy brethren, 1 Thessalonians 5:2; to fathers, young men, little children, 1 John 2:13, that the word of God might dwell among all with all wisdom richly. Colossians 3:16.

Proof b. I. From the destination of scripture. Those for whose salvation Holy Scripture was divinely destined, ought to read it. But Holy Scripture was divinely destined for the salvation of all, as we have already clearly shown. Therefore.

II. From the general divine command, by which the reading of Holy Scripture is enjoined upon all men both in the Old and in the New Testament. The Holy Spirit speaks clearly through the mouth of the prophet Isaiah, chapter 34:16. "Seek ye out of the book of Jehovah, and read." By the book of Jehovah is understood the Mosaic scripture, which on account of its antiquity is called pre-eminently (κατ' ἐξοχὴν) the book of the Lord. The prophet exhorts the promiscuous multitude to read this book of the Lord, to indicate that Holy Scripture is a fountain closed to no one, but open to all for a salutary draft. No less clear is the Savior's command, John 5:39. "Search the Scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." Obs. a) The word search (ἐρευνᾶτε), whether taken from hunters seeking beasts in the woods with utmost zeal, or from miners seeking gold in the caverns of the earth with most intense care, is not of the indicative, but of the imperative mood; for Christ does not here praise the Jews as diligent readers of the sacred codex, but He reproaches them, because they did not read the scriptures in the way they ought, and so He exhorts them to apply greater diligence. b) The word you think (δοκεῖτε) does not denote the uncertain opinion of a fluctuating mind, but a certain and well-founded dogma, to be believed with certain faith. c) We have eternal life in holy scripture as a revelation and testimony, because it testifies of eternal life, and of its causes and the manner of obtaining it, and instructs us. Wherefore this sense emerges here: "Rummage more diligently than you have done hitherto, the goldmine of the Holy Scriptures; because you believe with certain faith that in them you have a doctrine more precious than gold concerning eternal life, and the causes and means of obtaining it. And they testify of me, as the meritorious cause of salvation. Wherefore you ought to have come to me, that through me you might obtain eternal life. But since you refuse, such is your blindness, to come to me, this is a most clear indication that you have not read the scriptures with the diligence you ought."

III. From the special command, by which it was commanded to the kings of the Old Testament to read the scripture, Deuteronomy 17:18-19. But kings, in the opinion of the pontificians, are counted among the laity.

IV. From divine commendation. All Readers of Holy Scripture are generally commended, Psalm 1:2; Revelation 1:3. Specifically, Timothy is praised, because from infancy he aspired to the knowledge of the sacred letters, 2 Timothy 3:15. The Berean Jews, more noble (ἐυγενέστεροι) than the Jews of Thessalonica; "who received the word with all readiness, daily searching the scriptures, whether these things were so," which Paul had taught. Acts 17:11.

V. From the end and effect of Holy Scripture, which is information for salvation, 2 Timothy 3:16. Therefore let everyone to be informed for salvation read it diligently and meditate on it devoutly.

The antithesis is of the pontificians, who debar most of the laity from the reading of the sacred letters, permission to read them being given to very few; who rely on the following arguments.

I. Whatever reading is dangerous and disadvantageous, it should be prohibited. (*) But the reading of the Bible by the laity is etc. Therefore. The minor is proven, because dangers to faith and morals are imminent for a layman reading the bible. From the reading of the bible, such a rich crop of heresies has sprouted; just as the lapses and vices, mentioned in the bible, easily provoke the laity to imitation. For if a layman reads in scripture of the incest of Tamar, 2 Samuel 13:14, of the prophet Hosea taking a wife of whoredoms, chapter 1:2, of the Israelites taking away the goods of the Egyptians by theft, Exodus 12:36, and more such things contained in the scriptures; he falls into the opinion that he too is allowed to perpetrate similar crimes. Response: (1) The minor is so false that it can be inverted; namely, from the omission of attentive reading and devout meditation of Holy Scripture, heresies and vices are born. CHRYSOSTOM excellently says in the preface to the Romans: "Infinite evils have germinated from the ignorance of the scriptures; hence the great plague of heresies has arisen; hence a life negligently lived." (2) Whatever reading is dangerous and disadvantageous in itself, it should be prohibited. But the reading of the books is salutary in itself; it is disadvantageous by accident and through the fault of the readers, while they do not use scripture rightly, but abuse it shamefully; for the occasion of erring is not given to the readers of scripture, but is taken by them; scandal is not given, but taken. If scandal were given to the readers of scripture, God would not have done rightly in ordering such things to be written, and so He would be the author of evil in Himself; which is blasphemous to say. (3) Readers of the bible should attend to the scope of the Holy Spirit, namely that vices are recounted in the scriptures for caution, avoidance, and amendment of life, not for imitation. For atrocious crimes are rarely mentioned in them without the subsequent punishments divinely inflicted on the delinquents being subjoined. For which reason, readers of the bible should not apprehend the deed of Tamar as legitimate, since it was disapproved by God; nor the deed of Hosea as evil, since it was good; for the prophet himself did not fornicate, but by the will of Jehovah he took a harlot as a wife, to adumbrate the spiritual whoredom of the people; nor the deed of the Israelites as theft; since they took with them their due wages, justly adjudicated by God, the supreme lord of all goods, to the Israelite nation for so many labors endured in Egypt.

II. Whatever reading brings no fruit to the laity, should be prohibited to them. But the reading of the Bible etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because Holy Scripture is difficult to understand; hence since it is not understood by the laity, it is read by them without fruit. Response: (1) to the major.

(*) This is especially worthy of notation; that this opposition, if it had any value, would certainly accomplish more than the adversaries themselves want. This namely is the most powerful refutation of all, if we can oppose the same argumentation to anyone opposing, so that he himself is finally forced to confess the weakness of the consequence, and what he answers to us, he has the same answer for himself. Nothing evil should ever be feared by us from laypeople, assiduous in reading scripture, but the same danger, and much more indeed, would have to be feared from men who are of the sacred order. There is danger, you say, lest they perversely interpret the divine letters, and misuse them for defending their errors. Consider, I ask, most heretics of all, and indeed their leaders, who are called heresiarchs, who and what kind they were? Certainly not laypeople, but clerics, nor of lowest rank, but indeed bishops, nor few among the highest pontiffs. But perhaps they will take enormous σκάνδαλον (skandalon / offense) from reading certain sayings? The matter is safe. If they approach with pious mind, nothing anywhere will offend them. But if otherwise; the wantonness and perverseness of many, who are stains and disgrace to the sacred order, is certainly no less than that of other men, of whatever condition they may be. Do you think therefore that the clerics themselves also ought to be kept from reading the sacred letters and prohibited?

Whatever reading is unfruitful to all who read it, should be prohibited to them. But the reading of the sacred letters is so far from being devoid of fruit for all the laity, that it makes the simple wise. Psalm 19:8. Therefore, just as the sowing of seed in a field is not to be prohibited, even though the seed sown in a rocky field, and one overgrown with thorns, bears no fruit; so the reading of Holy Scripture is to be forbidden to no one; even if a blinded, obstinate mind, imbued with preconceived wrong opinions, takes no fruit from the reading of the sacred codex. Moreover, even the preaching of the divine word and the listening to it is of little fruit to not a few hearers. Should that also be prohibited? (2) to the minor. Holy Scripture, in delivering the articles of faith and the precepts of morals, is not obscure, but is a light illuminating the eyes. Psalm 19:9.

III. It is for the laity to seek the law from the mouth of the priest. Malachi 2:7. Therefore it is not for them to handle the divine law with their hands. Response: To read the divine law and to seek it from the mouth of the priest are not opposites, but subordinate and compossible. Meanwhile, we descend more readily, more broadly, and more excitedly into assent to those things which we ourselves read.

IV. The judgment concerning matters of faith, revealed in the written word of God, pertains to the clergy. Let the laity observe that trite saying: let the cobbler not go beyond his last. Response: Distinguish between the prophetic (προφητικόν), or exegetical judgment, which belongs to the public interpreters of the sacred letters; and the discerning (δοκιμαστικόν), or disretive judgment, by which all things are tested and the good is held fast. This, in its own way, belongs to the laity; it is for them to test the spirits, whether they are of God, 1 John 4:1; to beware of false prophets, Matthew 7:15; to test all things, and to hold fast what is good. 1 Thessalonians 5:21. Wherefore they need a disretive judgment.

V. Whoever are dogs and swine, to them the holy word of God is not to be communicated. Matthew 7:6. But the laity etc. Therefore. Response: By dogs and swine are not understood all the laity; but the obstinate, the epicureans, the blasphemers, the stubbornly impious, who wallow in the mire of carnal pleasures, like swine; and like dogs have cast off all shame. To these the sacraments are not to be offered, as long as they remain beasts, dogs, and swine. On the contrary, there are laity who are docile, who mourn and detest their sins, who pant for the grace of God and the justice of Christ; to these the streams of the sacred letters are open.

VI. Catechesis is sufficient for the laity: images, which are the bibles of the laity, are sufficient. Response: The catechesis of the laity is composed from the sacred letters, and when they have learned it, by reading the bible may they grow in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, 2 Peter 3:18. For this reason let them strive that the word of Christ may dwell in them richly. Colossians 3:16. Since images are not to be tolerated in churches unless they have a foundation in the scriptures, they do not exclude these, but move the laity to the reading of the sacred codex.

VII. You may find not a few laity to whom it is not given either to read or to understand Holy Scripture, such as infants and the blind. Therefore, it is not permitted to all men to read through the sacred codex. Response: The end for which Holy Scripture is destined is every man possessing the full use of reason and capable of the divine word reduced to letters. Since infants have not yet reached the full use of reason, they enjoy the covenanted grace of God, and in the progress of time are imbued with catechetical precepts: The blind, the less they can read, the more diligently and frequently should they listen to the divine word.

Question XXIII. What is the end for which the holy scripture was adorned by the inspiration of God?

The end for which the word of God was related in letters is to be observed both with respect to God and with respect to men. With respect to God, the end of holy scripture is the salutary acknowledgment and veneration of the divine majesty (a). The ultimate end with respect to men is eternal life. The general intermediate end is true faith in Christ (b), which is accompanied by holiness of life (c). The special intermediate end of scripture, with respect to the ministers of the church, is didascalical, elenctic, epanorthotic, paideutic, and paracletic information (d).

Proof a. Without the guiding light of Holy Scripture, we do not know God as befits our salvation's interest. The eye of man does not behold the sun without the light of the sun; nor does the human mind salutarily acknowledge God without the light of the divine word. The king of prophets himself implies this, Psalm 119:18. "Open my eyes, that I may see the wondrous things from your law"; as if to say, "Take away, I beseech you, most merciful God, the innate veil of ignorance from the eyes of my mind, so that I may, with salutary effect, know, esteem most highly, and praise with full mouth the wonderful wisdom, inexhaustible goodness, most ardent love, most constant truth, immense power, stupendous works, your tremendous mysteries, shining forth in the mirror of your word."

Proof b. "These things are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing you may have life in his name," John 20:31. With these golden words, the theologian John subjects to our minds for consideration the intermediate end of the scriptures, which is faith in Christ; and the ultimate end, which is eternal life; therefore he asserts that all these things, which Christ taught and did, were written for this end, that wayfaring men, corrupted by sins, might, through faith in Christ drawn from the scriptures, be reconciled with God and obtain eternal life.

Proof c. Holiness of life follows faith in Christ by an inseparable bond, with which the Holy Spirit adorns the sinner reconciled with God, through the medium of Holy Scripture. The Savior teaches this in John 17:17. "Sanctify them in your truth; your word is truth." The word of truth, impressed and instilled in the heart of the sinner by the Holy Spirit, sanctifies him, frees him from the dominion and stains of sin, and restores the image of God in him. Wherefore, holiness of life is the end of Holy Scripture accompanying faith in Christ.

Proof d. The ends of Holy Scripture considered specifically in order to the ministry of the church are enumerated in 2 Timothy 3:16. "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, thoroughly equipped for every good work." The ministers of the church are rendered fit and suitable through Holy Scripture for teaching the truth, for refuting falsehood, for correcting distorted morals, for directing honest morals, so that those who have begun to live well may strenuously run the course of a just and pious life. These things aim at this, that the doctor of the church, who presides over the people in the name of God, may be perfectly instructed by the sacred letters for rightly performing all the works of the sacred ministry.

Obs. Although the apostle to the gentiles in that place made no mention of paracletic information, for which cause scripture is said to have been written, Romans 15:3, nevertheless exhortation/comfort (παράκλησις) can in some way be comprehended under teaching (διδασκαλία); (*) inasmuch as Holy Scripture teaches that the cross of Christians both originates from a propitious God and is directed by the same to the best end.

Question XXIV. What are the affections or properties of Holy Scripture?

The principal affections of Holy Scripture are: I. Its authority, II. Its perspicuity, III. Its perfection or sufficiency, IV. Its efficacy.

(*) In some way also to παιδεία (paideia / instruction), and also to ἐπανόρθωσιν (epanorthosin / correction), consolation must be referred. For consolation is nothing other than exhortation to that virtue which is commonly called patience, and is constancy of confidence placed in God, and fortitude of soul, in enduring calamities and adverse things. In exhortation there is always inherent reproof of vice, contrary to this virtue. But every virtue and exhortation undoubtedly pertains to παιδεία (paideia / instruction), just as every vice and its reproof is contained in the ἐπανορθωτικῷ (epanorthotikō / corrective) class. Then as it concerns the arguments and foundations of consolation, these must all be drawn from saving doctrine, or εὐαγγέλιον (euangelion / gospel), strictly so called. But that εὐαγγέλιον (euangelion / gospel), and all parts of this doctrine, pertain to διδασκαλία (didaskalia / teaching), escapes no one. This example of παράκλησις (paraklesis / consolation) will suffice for illustration, one for all, Matth. IX, 2. θάρσει τέκνον (tharsei teknon / take courage, child), behold! consolation itself, which is some exhortation, or παιδεία (paideia / instruction). Furthermore: ἀφίενται σοι αἱ ἁμαρτίαι (aphientai soi hai hamartiai / your sins are forgiven), behold! the argument and foundation of consolation, on which it rests, the principal part of saving doctrine, and therefore διδασκαλία (didaskalia / teaching).

Question XXV. What is the authority of Holy Scripture?

The authority of Holy Scripture is its eminent dignity, communicated to it by God, its most truthful and omnipotent author, clearly known and so esteemed by men, that it moves their intellect to assent, their will to obedience, discerns true from false, good from evil, and adjudicates controversies of faith that have arisen.

Obs. I. Authority in general is the dignity of an author, who accomplishes something rightly and without defect, known by others, and esteemed as is fitting. Therefore, two things are required for authority: (1) the perfection of the author, (2) the knowledge and estimation of others. For the dignity of an author is not called authority unless it becomes known to others for a fitting estimation. For example, a king in cognito stands out with royal majesty, but when surrounded by his guard, and appearing before his subjects with scepter and crown, he possesses authority.

Obs. II. What authority belongs to the author from himself, primarily and originally: that belongs dependently, participatively, and by communication to the writing published by the author. Hence, the more perfect, truthful, and powerful an author is held by others, the more distinguished is the authority of the writing adorned by him.

Obs. III. The authority of God, moving and obliging us to faith and obedience through scripture, consists both in his veracity, by which, on account of his infinite wisdom and goodness, he neither wishes nor is able to deceive or be deceived; and in the supreme right and power of commanding, by which he prescribes to men the norm of believing and acting. Wherefore, since Holy Scripture shines with the same authority with which God shines independently and originally, it shines dependently and participatively, it is easily understood that the authority of Holy Scripture is founded (1) in its infallible truth, by which it moves the intellect of man to give assent to biblical statements; which the Greeks call credibility (ἀξιολογία); (2) in the power of obliging the wills of men to obedience, to be rendered to the commandments contained in the sacred codex, to which corresponds the Greek word authority/power (ἐξουσία) or the power of commanding. Generally, however, the authority of scripture, both moving to assent and obliging to obedience, is called ἀνθεντία in Greek: just as among lawyers authentic instruments and writings are said to be those which have certain and just authority, so that they can oblige to assent, or even to obedience.

Obs. IV. The knowledge and estimation of men, by which the authenticity (authenticity) of scripture is truly acknowledged and decently esteemed, is not a constitutive part of the authority of sacred scripture, nor its foundation; but only a necessary condition on the part of men, whose minds are to be moved to faith and obedience by the dignity of scripture, known and esteemed. It is therefore clear that the authority of scripture is not its absolute property, but a respective one, related to men who acknowledge and highly esteem it. The dignity of scripture, considered absolutely, is called its majesty, but viewed relatively, inasmuch as it is acknowledged by all men and esteemed as is proper, it is called its authority.

Question XXVI. How many kinds of authority does sacred scripture have?

The authority of sacred scripture, as to the thing itself, is one (a): according to our mode of conceiving, it is distinguished into causative of faith and canonical. The former is that by which scripture generates and confirms assent to things to be believed in the intellect of man; the latter is that by which both authentic scripture is distinguished from other writings and versions, and true from false (b).

Proof a. The authority of scripture is one, by reason of its origin and internal form; for having proceeded from the one most truthful God through the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, it received the dignity and power equally of eliciting faith and of discerning true from false.

Proof b. Sacred scripture is considered partly as a principle of knowing, and the formal object of faith and revealed theology, partly as a norm for discerning writings, which contain divinely inspired (θεόπνευστα) words and concepts of things, from other writings, and for distinguishing true from false. In the former way, it is used in any language to generate faith in the intellect of an unbelieving man, and to confirm it in the mind of a believing man; in which respect it is called causative, or motive of faith; in the latter way, it is used only in the original text to distinguish versions from the divinely inspired (θεόπνευστον) scripture of the Hebrew and Greek sources, symbolic books, and all writings that deal with matters of faith and morals. Cf. D. MUSAEUS in introduc. in theol. p. 295.

Question XXVII. From where does sacred scripture have its authority?

Holy Scripture owes its authority to its author, God (a). It is known and esteemed with an equal weighing of souls by men who properly consider the following two most certain principles, the first of which is: Whatever scripture is consigned by the inspiration of God, that is certainly and infallibly true (b); the latter is: Sacred scripture is consigned by the inspiration of God (c).

Proof a. Just as the authority of any writing depends on the perfection, veracity, and power of the author, by whose writing or dictation it was composed; so sacred scripture has received its authority, both causative of faith and canonical, from God alone, its wisest, best, most truthful, and most powerful author.

Proof b. This principle: Whatever scripture is consigned by the inspiration of God, that is certainly and infallibly true, is evident, and pervious to every sound intellect and known from the very apprehension of its terms. For as no darkness proceeds from the sun, so from God, the first truth, no lies proceed; but whatever God, who cannot deceive or be deceived, says, reveals, and as it were dictates into the pen of his amanuenses; that is absolutely true, and for falsehood to underlie it is simply repugnant.

Proof c. This principle: Sacred scripture, both of the Old and of the New Testament, is consigned by the inspiration of God, is to true Christians a first principle, self-evident (αὐτόπικτον), worthy of faith through itself, most liquid, most firm, undemonstrable (ἀναπόδεικτον), not in need of a priori demonstration, to which they adhere with unshaken faith; but it is rejected by atheists and epicureans, called into doubt by tempted Christians, received by human faith by hypocrites and beginning Christians, who pass from the camp of the gentiles into the camp of the Christians. Wherefore it is fitting and necessary for the theologian to consolidate that principle with not invalid a posteriori arguments, so that atheists may be confounded, the scruples of tempted Christians concerning the authority of scripture, injected by the devil and their own flesh, may be torn out, and hypocrites and beginning Christians may be so convinced that they firmly accept it. We confess in the meantime that some arguments, proving the divine origin of the scriptures, only beget human faith, so that gentiles to be converted are in some way prepared; some arguments beget divine faith. From this it happens that these proving arguments are divided into topical and apodictic. Topical are those that induce, move, persuade, whose effect is opinion, which is probable and joined with a fear of the opposite; apodictic are those that compel, constrain, and move, whose effect is knowledge, which is certain and free from fear of the opposite.

Question XXVIII. By what arguments is the divine origin of the sacred letters proven?

The arguments by which the divinity of sacred scripture is proven, arise from the criteria (κριτήριος) or lucid signs of divine origin, by which the sacred letters are eminent; which criteria (κριτήρια) are commonly distinguished into external and internal. The former are assumed from elsewhere outside scripture; the latter are sought from the intrinsic nature of sacred scripture and its properties.

Question XXIX. By which external criteria (κριτήριος) is the divine origin of the scriptures made known?

The external criteria (Κριτήρια), signifying the immediate dependence of the sacred letters on God, are (a) the antiquity of the scripture; (b) the singular light of the sacred amanuenses, their zeal for knowledge and truth; (c) the clarity of the miracles, by which the celestial doctrine of the scriptures is confirmed; (d) the consenting testimony of the church, diffused throughout the entire world, concerning the divinity of sacred scripture; (e) the constancy of the martyrs; (f) the testimonies of other peoples given to the doctrine contained in the sacred codex; (g) the happy and sudden propagation of the Christian doctrine throughout the whole world, and its admirable preservation among so many persecutions; (h) the most grave punishments inflicted on the contemners and persecutors of the divine word.

Proof a. The divine origin of Holy Scripture is argued by (1) the antiquity of its doctrine; because the sacred letters accurately expound the origin of this universe, the beginnings of time, and their continued series, the primordia of the church, of polity, of economy, the first rudiments of the arts, the incunabula of sin, the proto-gospel, the origin of the written law made by God. (2) The antiquity of its ministerial cause. For Moses, the most ancient writer, precedes all the gentile historians, philosophers, orators, and poets. Before any book became famous, there existed an ocean of wisdom, the Pentateuch. (3) The antiquity of its external form; for the scripture of the old testament was conceived in the Hebrew language; which as it is the simplest, so it is the first. But the more ancient something is, the more true, excellent, and divine it is. We argue; What scripture is most ancient, that is most true and most divine. But Holy Scripture is most ancient. Therefore Holy Scripture is most true and most divine.

Proof b. There are two things which render the sacred amanuenses credible (ἀξιολογῆτες) and commend their writings as divine: 1) An excellent knowledge of the things to be transmitted. 2) A sincere love of truth without the study of affections or parties. Their incomparable knowledge shines forth partly from the fact that they taught mysteries of faith exceeding the grasp of reason left to itself, by living voice and in writings; which could not have become known to them except by divine inspiration; partly because they proposed dogmas knowable from the light of nature more fully and certainly than philosophers from the principles of reason; although before their extraordinary illumination most of them were rude in the disciplines. They openly testified their love of truth; because they preached and wrote the divine word, void of exorbitant affections. For they were not daunted by the most present dangers, nor inflamed by the desire for gain, nor did they pursue the shadow of vain glory, nor did they court popular favor, nor did they assent to any mortal. They did not cover their own and their kin's vices with silence or palliate them, as gentile writers are wont to do, but they ingenuously confessed them. Thus Moses suppressed neither his own diffidence at the waters of contradiction, nor the impious murmuring of his sister, nor the horrible idolatry of his brother Aaron. Jonah did not dissemble his disobedience, his unjust desire for the destruction of the Ninevites, however repentant, his immoderate impatience. King David, however, so revealed his crimes that he gave them to others to be sung, which are hardly obscure indications of a mind candid without deceit. We argue; Whatever scripture was adorned by men divinely illuminated and most upright, that is of divine origin. But Holy Scripture etc. Therefore.

Proof c. Miracles are effects of infinite divine power, rare and unusual, produced above the order of the whole created nature. God alone does them. Psalm 71:18; 136:4. Which miracles the creator and arbiter of things destined for confirming the mission and doctrine of his legates. For which reason God, when He was to send Moses, out of the ordinary, both to the Israelite people and to Pharaoh, king of the Egyptians, first instructed him with miracles, by which he might prove his divine mission, and in the words he was to speak in God's name, he might there win faith, before he sent him. Exodus 4:3; Chapter 7:9. Christ himself, when asked by the disciples of John whether he was the true Messiah promised to the fathers and sought with many sighs, appealed to the miracles performed by him. Matthew 11:5. The apostles, going forth, preached everywhere, the Lord working with them and confirming the word with subsequent signs. Mark 16:20. You say; Even false prophets are said to do signs and wonders. Deuteronomy 13:4. The magicians of Egypt emulated Moses in performing signs and portents, Exodus 7:11. Response; Distinguish between marvels and true miracles. The false prophets performed signs (אֵימֹת), and wonders (מוֹפְתִי) or portents, which produced a certain admiration in ignorant men, but they did not perform miracles, properly and strictly so called. For although all miracles are signs and wonders, not all signs and wonders are true miracles. They agree in this, that they are rare and unusual effects; they differ in that miracles strictly speaking are rare and unusual effects of infinite divine power, produced above the order of the whole created nature; but the signs and wonders done by false prophets are either diabolical tricks and delusions, or indeed real effects, but by the help of the devil through natural causes, disposed in an unusual manner in nature, and most swiftly agitated. The magicians emulated Moses the wonder-worker, but with unhappy success; for they were finally forced to confess that the miracles of Moses were performed by the finger of God, i.e., by divine power, Exodus 8:18-19. Wherefore we argue; The doctrine of any scripture which is confirmed by miracles performed by the finger of God, that has not mere men, but God himself as its author. But the doctrine of Holy Scripture etc. Therefore.

Proof d. The Israelite church of the old, equally as the Christian of the new testament; both the contemporary of the prophets and apostles, which saw these holy men of God, and frequently used their autographs with their own eyes, as well as the succeeding church, diffused far and wide throughout the whole world, comprising the flower of men most cultivated in doctrine and most adorned in the honesty of their life, testifies with a wonderful consensus, that the prophetic and apostolic writings have God himself as their best, greatest, wisest, most truthful author. Who would believe that so many thousands of men most widely dispersed conspired in one lie or error, by which a human writing is held to be divine? He who would oppose himself to so great a cloud of witnesses would be as absurd as he who, about to call into doubt the faith of all writers and letters in the universe, would doubt whether any Cicero or Aristotle lived; or whether Rome or America exists in the world. Therefore, this argument remains firm; To that scripture whose divine origin an innumerable host of men living in the bosom of the catholic church testifies, faith must be given. But concerning the divine origin of the sacred scripture testifies etc. Therefore.

Proof e. The martyrs testified to the immediate dependence of the sacred letters on God not only with words, but also sealed their testimony as it were with their shed blood. For such an unusual strength of mind was divinely conferred upon them, that they preferred to endure the most exquisite tortures and to face the most bitter death with a cheerful mind, than to recede even a nail's breadth from that doctrine which Holy Scripture teaches. For this, the most pious martyrs of both sexes, of all ages, everywhere, whenever by God's permission the storms of persecution were stirred up in the church of Christ, endured the most inhuman pains. Not without astonishment we read in NICEPHORUS, book VIII of his history, chapter VI, that when the persecution arose under Diocletian and Maximian, most dire tyrants, in Nicomedia, among twenty thousand and more Christians of all sexes, ages, and statuses, who had gathered in the temple to celebrate the Lord's birth, not even one was found who, fearing death, at the voice of the herald, so that whoever wished to live should exit the temple and burn incense at the nearby altar of Jupiter, otherwise, if he did not do this, he would be burned along with the house itself, preferred his life to death and left the temple. But rather, the one voice of all was: "We are all Christians, we believe there is one and only God and king, Christ, and we are prepared to sacrifice to him and to his father and the Holy Spirit, and to offer ourselves all together." This is a memorable example that the martyrs, through the Holy Spirit dwelling in their hearts, were most persuaded of the truth of the doctrine contained in the sacred letters, and were excited and erected to its intrepid confession. Whence arises the argument; For what doctrine the most religious martyrs of every sex, every age, everywhere, in coerced persecutions, have cheerfully and joyfully undergone the most bitter tortures and the most ignominious death, they have testified for that same doctrine not only with words, but also by the deed itself, that it has proceeded from God, the first truth. But for the doctrine in Holy Scripture, the most religious martyrs etc. Therefore. (*)

(*) Indeed much strength is inherent in this argumentation; But two things must be well observed. First in the history of Martyrs, things truly done must be accurately discerned from fictitious and fabricated fables, since indeed many are counted as Martyrs who were never even human beings. But while we must be cautious lest we increase their number, no less must it be provided that we do not diminish it, in the way that DODWELL erred in his commentary on the paucity of Martyrs. Then, as it concerns the definition, the nature and character of those who by their merit are to be proclaimed Martyrs must be examined, since there have been many ψευδομάρτυρες (pseudomartyres / false martyrs). Namely a Martyr, truly and properly so called, is a man of integrity in life and pure of crime, who so professes truth divinely revealed, which he himself has sufficiently known and approved with firmest assent, that on account of it he endures all injuries and most serious vexations with brave and constant mind. Therefore there are four properties by which a Martyr, worthy of his name, is distinguished from any Pseudomartyr: 1) Confession of truth, and of that indeed which must be learned from divine revelation, John XV, 27. & XVI, 13. He who is involved

Proof f. Peoples alien to the sacred rites of the Christians, and their capital enemies, have given a very honorable testimony to the sacred scripture. I will say nothing of the Jews, whom Augustine in Psalm 40 calls our book-carriers, who carry the codex for us students; since they acknowledge the divine inspiration (θεοπνευσίαν) of the old testament, and can be convinced from it that the new instrument, because of the harmony of both, was consigned by the inspiration of God. The Turks have excerpted many things from the sacred letters and transferred them into their Quran. The Gentiles have partly commended the monuments of the divinely inspired (θεοπνεύζων) men; As Longinus, the preceptor of the philosopher Porphyry, who in his book "On the Sublime" (περὶ ὕψους) says that Moses is to be compared with Homer: "Moses, the legislator of the Jews, was no ordinary man; since he made known the power of the Deity with dignity, and declared it immediately at the beginning of the poem of his laws, writing: 'God said; Let there be light!' and there was light; 'Let there be earth!' and there was earth"; and also Amelius, a Platonic philosopher, who accepts the exordium of John's gospel as consonant with Plato's principles; they have partly transferred sacred histories into their writings. For a fuller treatment, see IO. ADAM. OSIANDR. in theol. posit. acroamat. p. 294. and cf. GROTIUS on the truth of the Christian religion, book IV. Hence we are given an opportunity to argue; That scripture which the capital enemies of the Christian church esteemed so highly, that the Jews received the prophetic writings, with which the monuments of the apostles most amicably conspire, as divinely inspired (θεόπνευστα), the Turks inserted many things from them into their subject Quran, the Gentiles commended the same, and supplemented their histories from them, it is consistent with truth that that scripture is of divine origin. But the capital enemies of the church esteemed sacred scripture so highly etc. Therefore.

Proof g. The Christian doctrine, divinely communicated, by its efficacy like lightning suddenly drew many myriads of men into assent to it. At one sermon of Peter, three thousand souls were converted, Acts 2:42; at another sermon of this apostle, the number of believers grew to five thousand, Acts 4:4. The apostolic doctrine, having crossed the borders of the land of Palestine, quickly pervaded many regions, so that St. Paul testifies that in his times it had gone out into all the earth, and to the ends of the world, Romans 10:18. Against which the Jews struggled with fruitless effort, blinded by the inveterate error concerning the earthly kingdom of the Messiah; the pagans, fascinated by idolatry; the tyrants, threatening with iron, the wheel, and fire the sincere propagators of the divine word, who were instructed neither with arms, nor with feigned eloquence, nor with the apparatus of human doctrine. This sudden propagation of the apostolic doctrine was followed by its admirable preservation amidst immense persecutions. The world and hell conspired against the gospel of Christ, men and demons raged; but with no success. For sacred scripture, like a palm tree, always emerged superior, and persisted impregnable, so that one might say: "If this counsel or this work were of men, it would be dissolved; but since it is of God, it cannot be dissolved." Acts 5:38. We argue; Whatever doctrine, like lightning, suddenly drew human minds into assent to it, suddenly pervaded many provinces, and persisted impregnable against the machinations of the devil and the world; that was not invented by men, but has in error, and dares to defend it with most pertinacious zeal even to death, is to be judged plainly unworthy of the name Μάρτυρος (Martyros / Martyr), as are very many ψευδομάρτυρες (pseudomartyres / false martyrs) among all nations blinded by superstition. 2) Sufficient and certain knowledge of that truth, so that when questioned he may be able to give to each one a reason for the doctrine which he himself constantly professes, 1 Pet. III, 15. 3) Sincere purpose, so that he endures all calamities for the sake of truth itself; for it can happen that someone indeed professes truth, but not on account of truth, but indeed with far different mind, not so much with zeal for propagating truth, as with pursuit of his own glory, Phil. I, 12-15. 4) Constancy, and fortitude of mind, which is distant by a very long interval indeed from rash audacity. To cast oneself into dangers which, with truth indeed preserved, could be avoided, is rashness; but to undergo and endure (ὕπομένειν / hypomenein / to endure) those dangers which we can escape by no other means than by negation or dissimulation of truth, that finally is true constancy. Matth. X, 16. 17. compared with v.32.

proceeded from God himself. But, the doctrine contained in the sacred letters etc. Therefore.

Proof h. The most just God, the avenger of his word, inflicted punishments by far the most grievous on the enemies of the bibles. Antiochus, having burned many copies of the sacred codex, 1 Maccabees 1:56, was divinely struck with an incurable plague. 2 Maccabees 9:5. Theopompus the orator, and Theodectes the tragedian, when they had handled the sacred bibles with impure hands; the former, because he wanted to excerpt certain things for ridicule, was driven mad; the latter, because he had used it for a drama, was deprived of the light of his eyes. JOSEPHUS, book XII of Jewish antiquities. Herod of Ascalon, the most truculent enemy of the gospel of Christ, was eaten by worms. JOSEPHUS, book XV of Jewish antiquities, c. 16. Julian the apostate, the greatest hater of sacred scripture, surrounded in the Persian war and wounded by an arrow, when he had scattered the gushing blood into the air, adding the impious voice; "You have conquered, Galilean!" he breathed out his impure soul. THEODORET, book III, c. 20. When Diocletian and Maximian had committed to the flames the scriptures extorted from the Christians, the fire was suddenly extinguished, and a copious hail fell from the sky, so that all the elements seemed to conspire as if in a league for the authority of the sacred books. V. BONFRERIUS in the prolegomena to the Pentateuch, fol. 20. From these arises the argument; The contempt of that scripture which has been vindicated by the harshest punishments inflicted by God, is not a human invention, but a divine gift. But, sacred scripture etc. Therefore.

Obs. We have put the external criteria (κριτήρια) first because the minds of unbelieving men to be converted are prepared by them for reading the sacred scripture with zeal and a desire to learn and meditate. For since the entire race of gentiles, atheists, and epicureans does not believe that the sacred scripture has proceeded from God, they hardly deign to read it. Wherefore it is necessary that first of all, through the adduced external criteria (κριτήρια), or, as others call them, signs and motives of credibility, the unbelievers be moved, so that they may deem it not improbable that the sacred scripture derives its origin from God, and thus begin to esteem, read, and meditate upon it. For thus through the internal criteria (κριτήρια) of the divinely inspired scripture they will be more and more moved to give faith to it, and through the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit the unshaken full assurance (πληροφορία) or trusting assent, by which we adhere to the scripture, will be kindled, fostered, and confirmed.

Question XXX. What are the internal criteria (κριτήρια) from which the divine origin of the sacred letters becomes known?

The internal criteria (κριτήρια) or signs, from which the divine inspiration (θεοπνευσία) of the sacred letters becomes manifest, are (a) the majesty of God testifying of Himself in the sacred codex; (b) the simplicity and gravity of the biblical style; (c) the sublimity of the divine mysteries which the scripture unfolds; (d) the truth of all biblical assertions; (e) the sanctity of the precepts contained in the sacred letters; (f) the sufficiency of the sacred scripture for salvation.

Obs. These internal criteria (Κριτήρια), collected into one bundle and taken jointly, supply a more valid argument (just as united force is always stronger), than if they are taken separately and individually; therefore we shall later combine them into one syllogism.

Proof a. The sacred amanuenses gravely assert that they utter and speak the word of God Himself from His dictation. This is evident from the prophetic formulas; "Thus says the Lord," Isaiah 1:2. "The word of Jehovah came to me," Jeremiah 2:4. What's more, they not rarely introduce God Himself speaking, for example, Exodus 20:1-3. "Then God spoke all these words, saying: I am Jehovah your God," etc. Therefore, since God testifies of Himself in the sacred letters, that divine testimony must be approved with ready assent.

You say: In the Quran, God and the angel Gabriel are sometimes introduced speaking and testifying that what is handed down in that book is true and divine. Response: The internal criteria (κριτήρια) taken jointly conclude validly. (a) Join the majesty of God, testifying of Himself in scripture, with the truth of all biblical assertions, and you will have a firm argument for the divine inspiration (τῆς θεοπνευσίας) of Holy Scripture. (b) Who would not notice in the Quran the claws of the devil, appearing through lies and the plundering scimitar? Who would not notice the giddy, frantic spirit in its paradoxes? as DANNHAVER aptly remarks in hodosoph. phænom I. p. 45.

Proof b. The biblical style is worthy of divine majesty, since it is simple and grave. It is simple, because it is not smeared with the paint of human eloquence, not burned with the curling-irons of words to capture the minds of the crowd, but is chaste and full of virtue. The apostle to the gentiles aptly says: "My speech and my preaching were not with persuasive words of human wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," 1 Corinthians 2:4. It is grave, because by the same Holy Spirit things to be believed, even the most sublime, are proposed without demonstration; but things to be done and omitted are prescribed and prohibited to the highest and the lowest with distinguished authority. Thus God gives laws to every man, of whatever status or sex: "You shall not kill; You shall not commit adultery; You shall not steal"; Which simple and grave style is very worthy of the supreme arbiter of things. A certain atheist of hardened brow opposes us, in whose mind the style of Holy Scripture is not worthy even of a good human writer, let alone the most wise God. He tries to deceive us when he writes 1) that Holy Scripture is confused and mixed, which is apparent to one inspecting the proverbs of Solomon, in which, he says, it is not unusual, even in one chapter, for things of every kind to be mixed and confused like a hotchpotch. Response: 1) The atheist argues from the particular to the universal, and therefore improperly: Various things are mixed without a certain method in the proverbs. Therefore the whole of Holy Scripture is confused. 2) That book of Solomon is not occupied in explaining any determinate matter, but contains maxims of every kind, and brief and rounded sentences on various things, in the recounting of which a certain method is not required. 2) He writes that scripture is placed without connection, e.g., chapter II of Habakkuk, and indeed verse 1 does not cohere with the last verse of chapter I. Response: Again the atheist argues from the particular, and because of the stupor of his mind does not notice the connection of chapters I and II of Habakkuk. For in chapter I, the prophet had prophesied about the tyranny of the Chaldeans, with which they would rage against the Israelite people, and had solicited God with most ardent prayers to restrain the enemy and avert punishments from his people, or at least mitigate them. In chapter II, he indicates that he is awaiting a divine response to his prayers and complaints; to the one waiting, a promise is given of the coming Messiah to restore the afflicted people. Which things cohere lucidly, provided one inserts with SEBASTIAN SCHMIDT at verse 1 of chapter II of Habakkuk the particle (nevertheless). 3) He writes that the sacred codex was written without any color of words. He adduces chapters V and VIII of the Apocalypse, where he says that all the verses begin with the particle "And." Response: (1) The style of the Holy Spirit is not painted with the color of words, like that of some rhetorician; but is grave with the weight of its sentences, like that of a lord eminent in authority. (2) The particle "And" is repeated many times in the Vulgate Latin version, not in the Latin translation of SEBASTIAN SCHMIDT, which is more accurate. The Greek καὶ supports various meanings. 4) The bible-scurge writes that the order of sentences in the bible is often inverted, e.g., Luke 20:35, where eternal life is placed before the resurrection of the dead, which order the Christians themselves reject. Response: (1) If the truth of the resurrection of the dead and of eternal life is established, it matters little whether this or that is placed first; since in popular usage of speaking we are not precisely bound to the order of things. (2) In the cited place the order of things is not inverted. For the words of the text are: "Those who will be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead." To be accounted worthy of the other world is broader than to be accounted worthy of the resurrection from the dead. For in the number of those who are accounted worthy of the other world are also included the pious, whom the last day will find alive; who, as they will not die, so they will not rise again. But in the order of nature, the more general precede, the more special follow. 5) The same writes that some things in Holy Scripture are posited without sense, e.g., Ephesians 2:1. "And you, who were dead in trespasses and sins"; also John 8:25. "the beginning, because I say to you"; Response: In Ephesians 2:1, the verb "he raised" is omitted by ellipsis, which if it is repeated from verse 20 of chapter I, the sense is plain: "And you also (he raised) when you were dead in trespasses and sins." In John 8:25, HUGO GROTIUS seems to have expressed the sense conveniently: "I am this first thing, which I also say to you this very thing, that I am this very time, that is, the light of the world." For in verse 26, the Savior says: "I have many things to speak and to judge of you"; as if he were to say: "Of myself I say only this, which I have said; but of you I could say many things to mark you." 6) The author writes that some things in the scriptures are said without reason, as Exodus 20:18, where the people are said to have seen the sound of the trumpets, which however they heard, and Job 22:6, where Job is said to have stripped the naked of their clothes; Response: The Hebrew word רָאָה (ra'ah) does not always refer to sight, but often in general denotes sensual cognition, by which something is perceived by a sense. The learned BUXTORF observed in his Hebrew lexicon, page 785, that the verb "he saw" also pertains to the mind and other senses, and signifies to experience, to notice, to perceive, to enjoy. The words in Job are to be understood in a divided sense: "You stripped of their garments those who were previously clothed and now walk naked."

Proof c. Holy scripture everywhere hands down dogmas, impervious and hidden to human reason left to itself, which are called mysteries. Such are the dogmas of the trinity of divine persons in one divine essence, of the two natures and the unity of Christ's person, of the redemption of the human race through the passion and death of Christ, of the justification of the sinner by faith in Christ, of the resurrection of the dead, of beatitude on the part of the soul in the beatific vision and fruition of God, and on the part of the body in its glorification, etc. Since all these things far exceed the grasp of human reason by their sublimity, they could not have been devised by men, but became known from the supernatural revelation of God. This St. Paul openly confesses when, in 1 Corinthians 2:7 sqq., speaking of the divine mysteries, he says in verse 10: "But God has revealed them to us by his Spirit." Therefore, whatever scripture contains those sublime mysteries, which could only become known to men by God revealing them, and be committed to letters by them, that was consigned by the inspiration of God. There is no reason for the enemies of Christian doctrine, who try to measure the articles of faith with the ten-foot pole of reason, to object that these same dogmas or mysteries conflict with right reason; for below in its proper place, with God as our guide and president, we will demonstrate that these same mysteries are indeed superior to the light of reason, but do not contradict it, nor do they involve a contradiction.

Proof d. The truth of biblical assertions can be shown. I. By an induction of all the articles of faith revealed in the sacred letters and proposed to man for attaining eternal salvation; of which some are mixed, some are pure. Sacred scripture teaches mixed articles of faith, if you consider the matter proposed, in a way consistent with the principles of reason; but if you look at the mode of proposing, much more simply, certainly, and perfectly than human reason inculcates the same dogmas investigated from its own principles. See above prolegomenon II. p. 50. Pure articles of faith, as human reason cannot know them from its own principles, so it cannot convince them of falsehood from the same. II. From the wonderful harmony of the Old with the New Testament, of Moses and the prophets with Christ and the apostles. All things in the biblical corpus conspire; all things sing together far more sweetly than the diverse sounds in any musical organ. Reflecting on this admirable concept of the sacred letters, Zechariah says that God spoke through the mouth, not mouths, of the prophets, Luke 1:79. Paul presented the scripture of the Old Testament under the notion of one, not several books, Hebrews 5:7. What is claimed as a contradiction is apparent, not real. But that so many writers, so dissimilar in genius and morals, separated by the longest intervals of places and times, destitute of the opportunity to confer on the feelings of their minds, should have conspired so excellently in one opinion on a matter so grave and sublime, concerning the religion and salvation of all men, this is a lucid argument that sacred scripture depends immediately on God, the one and most truthful author. III. From the fulfillment of the prophecies contained in sacred scripture. Scripture abounds with prophecies about future contingent events, to occur after many centuries from the free will of God and men; of which we will review some. In the Old Testament are read prophecies about the Messiah, the redeemer of the human race, Genesis 3:15, and in many other places; about the servitude of the Israelites in Egypt, and their liberation, Genesis 15:13-14; about the Babylonian captivity of the Jewish people, and the restoration of Jerusalem, Isaiah 39:6, seq.; Jeremiah 16:13, seq.; about the second destruction of the city of Jerusalem, never to be repaired, Daniel 9:26; about the blinding and rejection of the Jewish people, Isaiah 6:9; about the supreme empires of the world, and their vicissitudes, Daniel 2:38, sqq.; chapter 7:4; chapter 8:3; about the calling of the gentiles to the church, Isaiah 60:3, and about innumerable other things, which besides God and the holy men of God, to whom God revealed them, no one could foreknow or predict. Concerning the fulfillments of these prophecies, both the entire scripture of the New Testament and experience itself testify more than enough. But may we not hence conclude that scripture, full of prophecies about future contingent events, to occur after many centuries from the free will of God and men, and proven by the event itself, was composed with God as its author, dictating it to the sacred amanuenses?

Proof e. By the judgment of all right-thinking men, scripture is held to be holy, whose precepts are conformed to the eternal law of God as to a measuring-rule. For indeed the infallible rule of all sanctity is the eternal and immutable law of God, consisting of two tables. The first orders man to the true acknowledgment and sincere worship of God. The second directs man to lead a life soberly and justly towards himself and his neighbor. On both parts, the prophetic and apostolic scripture is holy; because it prescribes to man the most exact conformity of the internal and external motions of the soul with the law of God, such as no codex of scripture, in which the religion of any nation is delineated, prescribes. On the part of the first table, it directs man to the worship of God, in every way perfect, according to that: "You shall love Jehovah your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might." Deuteronomy 6:5. On the part of the second table, it prescribes and demands charity towards one's neighbor, most pure without blemish, according to that: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself," Leviticus 19:18, where under the name of neighbor the enemy is also included, Matthew 5:44. On the other hand, it prohibits all inordinate motions of concupiscence, even indeliberate ones, which anticipate the judgment of reason and the consent of the will, Exodus 20:14; Romans 7:7. For which reason, Holy Scripture requires a greater sanctity in man than human reason, by the force of the law written in it, demands from him for this corrupt state of nature. For this latter subsists in any external acts, as well as in internal deliberate acts of the virtues pertaining to the first and second table of the law, but it does not exclude or prohibit the indeliberate motions of concupiscence, diffidence, hatred. But that scripture, which teaches a more perfect and holier religion than human reason by the force of the law implanted in it, for this corrupt state of nature, has not men, but God as its author.

Proof f. That doctrine fully and clearly shows the way of salvation, which accurately teaches how a sinner is to be reconciled to an offended God. But there is no doctrine under heaven that teaches the manner of reconciliation of a sinner with God, offended by sins, so certainly and clearly, as that which is contained in the sacred letters. This asserts that we have been reconciled to God through the death of Christ, when we were enemies, and being justified by his blood, are saved from wrath. Romans 5:9. From which it follows that the doctrine contained in the sacred letters is to be attributed not to human reason, but to divine revelation.

We shall combine the internal criteria (κριτήρια) that clearly notify the divine inspiration of the sacred letters into one syllogism:

Whatever scripture is conspicuous by the majesty of God speaking of himself in it, adorned with a simple, grave style, and therefore worthy of the supreme arbiter of things, full of mysteries far exceeding the grasp of reason, fortified by the perpetual harmony of amanuenses separated by many times and places, which contains most true dogmas of faith and prophecies, most holy precepts of morals, and is sufficient for showing the way of salvation, it is certain that it has proceeded immediately from God. But the prophetic and apostolic scripture, etc. Therefore.

The major is certain, because so many signs of divinity never fall into writings devised by men. We have demonstrated the minor above.

The antithesis is that of the pontificians, who deny that the divine origin of scripture is firmly proven by the adduced criteria; whose arguments we will weigh on the scales of truth.

I. Whatever criteria (κριτήρια) produce opinion and human faith, they do not firmly prove the divine origin of Holy Scripture. But the criteria (κριτήρια) adduced by the Lutherans, etc. Therefore. The major is established, because opinion and human faith are a weak knowledge, a feeble assent, joined with a fear of the opposite. Some Lutherans concede the minor, namely D. MYSAEVS in introd. in theol. p. 305. D. QUENSTED. in system. theol. part. I. c. IV. fol. 98. Response: Distinguish between external and internal criteria (κριτήρια). That the external criteria (Κριτήρια) concerning the divine inspiration (θεοπνευσία) of Holy Scripture beget only opinion or human faith, the Lutheran doctors teach with a certain consensus. But whether the internal criteria (κριτήρια) generate human or divine faith, they diverge. For D. IO. AD. OSIANDER in colleg. theol. system. P. p. 106. sharply contends that the internal criteria (κριτήρια) produce divine faith. The most celebrated theologian argues; What is the same as the divine word, that generates the same faith as the divine word. But the abstruse dogmas contained, the divine prophecies, the most holy precepts are identified with the divine word. Therefore. And how can an abstruse dogma about some supreme mystery of religion not beget a faith greater than human? How can prophecies and oracles not generate divine faith? How can the most holy precepts not demand a most holy mind? The internal criteria (Κριτήρια) are used either to confirm the languid faith of a tempted brother, or to convert an unbelieving man. Theologians do not deny that the internal criteria (κριτήρια) can be applied to a tempted Christian to consolidate weak faith. The most learned MUSAEUS writes well in introduct. theol. p. 456. "Some signs and motives are so constituted that when they are properly weighed with a mind for learning, through attentive consideration and meditation of them, they can move the human intellect to a supernatural assent; of which kind are, for example, the truth of scripture and Christian doctrine pure from all error; its harmony and exact agreement in all its parts; the truth of prophecies proven by the event itself, etc." which, as they do not really differ from Holy Scripture itself and the doctrine contained in it. (For the truth of scripture does not really differ from the true scripture; and the agreement of Christian doctrine or Holy Scripture in all its parts, as to the thing, is nothing other than the parts of scripture or doctrine agreeing among themselves); so while they are constituted in act by the reading or meditation of scripture itself, or by the preaching and explanation of the doctrine contained in it perceived by hearing, and are applied to the human intellect for manifesting the divine origin of Holy Scripture, they can and do exert themselves at the same time by their divine power, with which they are endowed, for kindling a supernatural assent of themselves and divine faith; unless perhaps an obstacle is placed by man to the grace of the Holy Spirit within, and its operation is checked. But in order to the conversion of unbelievers, the signs and motives of credibility are in no other way than as motives generating human faith, or an opinion about the divine origin of the scripture and sacred doctrine. Which, considered individually, although perhaps one may possess greater power of moving human minds than another, yet taken jointly, since they conspire from all sides for the divine origin of Holy Scripture and the Christian religion, and as if with one mouth cry out that it was not invented by men, but revealed by God himself to the human race, they generate a certain knowledge, superior to any other, whether human faith or opinion. But there is no need for these ambiguities if, with D. OSIANDER, we simply state that the internal criteria (κριτήρια) of Holy Scripture win a certain assent and divine faith; although there are degrees of certainty, since one is absolute and supreme, another middle, another lowest. See LEICHN. Synops. veræ apudit. p. 415. The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit wins the supreme certainty of assent for Holy Scripture.

II. The criteria (Κριτήρια) are either the same as Holy Scripture, or different from it. If the same, they cannot prove its divine inspiration (θεοπνευσίαν), otherwise the same would be proven by the same: If different, they will not beget divine faith; since the unique principle for conceiving faith is Holy Scripture. Therefore, the criteria (κριτήρια) are not suitable for proving the divine origin of scripture. Response: The criteria (Κριτήρια) are the same as Scripture really, or on the part of the thing, they differ from it formally, or on the part of the concept. They beget divine faith, because they really coincide with Holy Scripture; they prove the divine origin, because they differ formally from it; just as the divine attributes on the part of the thing are the same as the divinity, they differ on the part of the concept, and hence they notify the divinity of the Word (τοῦ λόγου).

III. To believe on account of an argument is at least human faith, not divine, acquired, not infused. Therefore, the criteria do not beget divine faith. Response: To believe on account of a topical argument, sought from the testimony of man, is human faith; I concede. To believe on account of an argument sought from internal criteria, is to believe on account of a topical argument; I deny. For it is apodictic, not begetting human faith, which is uncertain and slippery, but a solid and certain assent. Certainly the apostles everywhere propose arguments for this or that conclusion, which a Christian embraces with divine faith. See 1 Corinthians 15:13, seq. We observe in passing that because of ambiguity it is better to abstain from the term "infused faith," and to call the faith which is from hearing simply faith divinely conferred, divine, supernatural, as D. MUSAEUS thinks in intr. in theol. c. 11. p. 63.

IV. If the individual internal criteria (κριτήρια) are accurately weighed, they do not seem to be so valid as to move a man to give solid assent to the sacred letters. For I. The external divine attestation, adduced by a prophet or apostle in these or similar words: "The word of God was made to me; I have received from the Lord," consists in phrases and formulas of speaking, which can only offer a probable argument, and generate opinion, or human faith. II. The style of Holy Scripture is not uniform, but now humbler, now more sublime. Therefore, a certain indication of the divinity of scripture cannot be taken from it. III. Mysteries exceeding the grasp of reason are not read everywhere in all the biblical books; since historical and moral matters knowable by ocular inspection and the guidance of the light of nature are inserted here and there; nor are they found only in the biblical books, but also in Josephus, Philo, the Augsburg Confession. What's more, they retard the conversion of pagans the more often, the more they recede from reason. IV. The truth of dogmas and prophecies does not certainly argue for the divine origin of scripture; for gentile and Christian writers also teach true things. Prophecies and oracles are read everywhere in the writings of the gentiles, e.g., of the Sibyls. Besides, it is not unusual for a certain author to be consistent with himself everywhere, and to observe the harmony of dogmas.

V. Plato, Cicero, Seneca also gave holy precepts.

VI. Naturalists also show the way to perennial salvation, whose writings are not divinely inspired (θεόπνευστοι). Therefore, the adduced criteria (κριτήρια) do not win unshaken assent for sacred scripture, since they do not demonstrate its divine origin.

Response to I. The external attestation of God speaking of himself in scripture consists indeed in phrases, but dictated by the Holy Spirit, under which lie the weights of things; and it is joined with the truth of dogmas and prophecies. Therefore, it does not produce human, but divine faith. By the confession of all, the effect or consequent of divine testimony is divine faith.

To II. The biblical style is uniform as to its substance, in the body of both testaments, so that there is considered one mouth of all the divinely inspired (θεόπνευζων) men, Luke 1:70, although as to the accidental conformation of the style, it is at times attuned to the nature of the various materials about which it was necessary to write, at times accommodated by the most free condescension (συγκαταβάσει) of the Holy Spirit to the geniuses, studies, and familiar manner of speaking of the amanuenses. Cf. DANNHAY. hodos. phænom. 1. p. 58. Yet care has been taken that nothing should be detracted from the divine majesty. For the simple and grave style of scripture is everywhere worthy of the majesty of God. For it is not of man, but of God alone to oblige all men without exception to have faith in him, asserting without demonstration, or to render obedience to him, commanding or prohibiting without persuasive reasons.

To III. Although not in all, yet in most biblical books are read mysteries superior to the grasp of reason, which are sometimes also annexed to historical accounts. Mysteries are had in the sacred codex originally, in other writings derivatively. Josephus and Philo, Jews, derived them from the source of the bibles, but with a turbid guidance; especially Philo several times deflected from the truth of the mysteries to the tenets of Platonic philosophy. The more sublime the mysteries are, the more they are seized upon with admiration by the pagans. From which it happens that by admiring they are induced to read the scripture, and by the illumination of the Holy Spirit to understand it, by which progress of time they are converted.

To IV. The writings of gentile authors teem with errors; those of Christians are true only insofar as they are conformable to the norm of truth of the sacred scripture. Prophecies of future contingent things, depending on the free will of God and men, and proven by their event and fulfillment, are read nowhere outside the revealed and written word of God. For future contingent things, depending on the free will of God and men, to find their fulfillment only after many centuries have elapsed, God alone knows, Isaiah 46:9, and he to whom God has revealed it, Jeremiah 28:9. What prophecies are read in the writings of the gentiles were either doubtful, conceived in words generally obscure, ambiguous, and formed to render different senses, or foreseen by mere conjectures from causes. Besides, it happens that one author is consistent with himself in writing; but that so many authors, so different in genius, places, times, should have written with such consensus on matters of faith, on mysteries superior to the grasp of reason, that one never contradicted another, this is to be attributed to the one and only Holy Spirit, suggesting the words and concepts of things.

To V. Far from it that Plato, Cicero, Seneca and other ethnic authors gave holy precepts concerning the true worship of God, for when they knew God, they did not glorify him as God, nor gave thanks, but became vain in their thoughts, and their foolish heart was darkened; and while they said they were wise, they became fools. Romans 1:21-22. For God wishes to be worshipped not according to the whim of men, but according to the prescription of His will, which He has revealed in His word. To this is added that, since ethnic writers were ignorant of original sin, they did not prohibit the evil, indeliberate motions of the soul, which anticipate the judgment of the intellect and the consent of the will, and thus did not teach perfect sanctity.

To VI. Naturalists from the principles of reason do not attain the reason for reconciling a sinner with God, offended by sins. From an offended and unreconciled God, no salvation is to be expected. The only reconciler, the only way to heaven is Christ. Deviating from this way of salvation, the Naturalists open the way to hell, and enter it when opened. Wherefore it remains fixed and unshaken that the criteria (κριτήρια) mentioned above are proper to sacred scripture alone, and validly prove its immediate dependence on God.

Question XXXI. What is the principal and ultimate reason for knowing, and believing with divine faith, the divine origin of sacred scripture?

The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, certifying and sealing the human heart concerning the divine inspiration (θεοπνευσία) of the sacred letters, is the principal and ultimate reason for knowing and believing with divine faith the divine origin of Holy Scripture.

Question XXXII. What is here understood by the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit?

By the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit here is understood the supernatural act of the Holy Spirit, through the word of God attentively read, or perceived by hearing, by His divine power communicated to the sacred scripture, knocking on, opening, illuminating the heart of man, and bending it to the obedience of faith, so that the illuminated man truly feels from internal spiritual motions that the word proposed to him has proceeded from God Himself, and therefore gives it unshaken assent.

Obs. I. The principal and ultimate reason (into which the other motives of credibility are finally resolved, and which alone and ultimately moves us to acquiesce in it) for believing with divine faith that this written word, and what we read, hear, and believe from the bibles, is true and divine, is solely the authority of God both externally revealing, and internally, that is, sealing in our hearts and convincing the conscience; not the veracity, or presumption of the veracity of the ministerial cause, of the present church, or of the present doctor, here and now proposing it to us; nor conformity with the human intellect or sense; nor the notorious consensus of the church. Cf. D. HULSEM, in brev. theol. enucl. p. m. 20.

Obs. II. The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit concerning the authenticity of sacred scripture coincides, as to the thing, with the efficacy of sacred scripture viewed in its second act; inasmuch as sacred scripture, attentively read and intimately weighed, illuminates the intellect of man, so that he clearly recognizes the divine inspiration (θεοπνευσίαν) of the scriptures, and draws and allures his will into consent; The Holy Spirit operates the same through the word of God decently used. For the effective power which we attribute to the word of God in producing the effect of illumination, conversion, renewal, and confirmation is truly divine, Romans 1:16, and does not differ, as to the thing, from the power which is of the Holy Spirit operating in the hearts of men, although there is a disparity in the manner of having this power, inasmuch as it belongs to the Holy Spirit from Himself, and by Himself, as the principal cause; but to the word participatively, as an organic cause. Cf. KOENIGIUS in theol. posit. p. 195. For which reason sacred scripture, read, or proposed by the voice of a teacher, explained, and perceived by hearing, by the efficacy divinely communicated to it, moves the intellect of man to a supernatural assent of its dependence on God the revealer, by itself immediately indeed, without another revelation, or any motive of credibility, but with the supernatural concurrence of the Holy Spirit. From which it is concluded that the unshaken and trusting assent, by which the divine origin of the scriptures is believed, depends both on the scripture itself, and on the Holy Spirit Himself, concurring with it, as a formal motive, and thus on both together and jointly, but on neither separately and apart.

Obs. III. The entire most holy Trinity testifies most powerfully concerning the authenticity of sacred scripture; terminally the Holy Spirit. From this it happens that the faith, by which the divine inspiration of the scriptures is believed, is in the sacred letters sometimes attributed to the power of God, by theologians to the supernatural concurrence of God.

Proof I. from 1 John 5:6. "The Spirit testifies, that the Spirit is truth." By the word Spirit in the subject, we understand the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity; both because this word, posited absolutely, without a restricting condition, as analogous, is rightly taken in its more famous signification; and because immediately in the following verse 7, it is presented under the notion of a person, and indeed the third in the Trinity, with the epithet added, when it is called the Holy Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα ἅγιον), to whom, no less than to the father and the son, a celestial testimony is there ascribed; but by the Spirit in the predicate we understand the word of God, or scripture, the word Spirit being taken metonymically; because elsewhere the word of God is also called Spirit and life, John 6:63. The particle "that" (ὅτι) is not causal, but determinative, so that the sense is: The Holy Spirit testifies that the doctrine of the Spirit is truth, that is, most true, when he operates internally through the doctrine revealed by himself in the hearts of men, knocks on them, draws and moves them, so that they believe it to have proceeded from God, or to be truly divine. Hence in verse 10, John adds: "He that believes in the Son, has the testimony in himself; he that believes not God, has made him a liar; because he has not believed the testimony which God has testified of his son." He is said to have the testimony of God in himself, who believes; because the faith, by which one believes in the son of God, is an effect of the Holy Spirit, who operates in the heart of the believer through the doctrine revealed by himself, and effects the assent of faith. Therefore, from whom a man has it that he believes with divine faith that the doctrine revealed by the Holy Spirit is truth, i.e., most true, that is the principal and ultimate reason for knowing and believing by divine power the authority of Holy Scripture. But also by the testimony of the Holy Spirit, by which he testifies in the hearts of men that the doctrine of the Spirit is most true, a man has it that he believes with divine faith that the doctrine revealed by God is truth, that is, most true. Therefore, the testimony of the Holy Spirit, by which he testifies in the hearts of men that the doctrine revealed by him is truth, that is, most true, is the principal and ultimate reason for knowing and believing with divine faith the authority of Holy Scripture.

II. From 1 Thessalonians 1:5-6. "Our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Spirit, and in much assurance, as you know what manner of men we were among you for your sake. And you became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Spirit." The gospel which Paul had preached at Thessalonica with singular presence of mind, the Thessalonians had received amidst most grievous afflictions and dangers of life with great joy, excited in their souls by the Holy Spirit, because Paul's gospel was not a bare, empty, and fruitless speech, but a speech joined with the power of the Holy Spirit, who had illuminated, converted, and endowed them with faith. Wherefore, the principal reason moving a man to receive the gospel of Christ as truly divine is the power of the Holy Spirit, united by an individual bond with the word of God read or heard.

III. We subjoin the distinguished saying of the same apostle from 1 Thessalonians 2:13. "For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because, when you received from us the word of hearing, of God (namely), you received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, as the word of God, which also has worked in you that believe." Here Paul distinctly ascribes to God operating in the Thessalonians that they received the speech of the apostles, not as the word of men, but as the word of God. To receive the word from the mouth of the apostles as the word of God, is to receive that word as having proceeded from God, or as having been preached by the suggestion or inspiration of God. But the reason is the same for scripture divinely inspired, and for the doctrine preached by the apostles from divine inspiration. For although an accidental difference intervenes, inasmuch as the former consists of written words, the latter of uttered words; nevertheless, the power moving the intellect to assent is one and the same. For which reason, just as the Thessalonians were moved by the supernatural operation of God to believe that the speech of the apostles was not of men, but of God its author; so even now the hearts of men are moved by the supernatural operation of God to believe that Holy Scripture is truly divine, or has proceeded from God. We argue: By what motive the Thessalonians were moved to believe that the word of the apostles was truly the word of God, by the same men are still moved to believe that Holy Scripture has proceeded from God and is truly divine. But the Thessalonians were moved to believe that the word of the apostles was the word of God by God Himself acting in them through the very word preached, and testifying of the divinity of the word. Therefore, even now believers are moved to believe that Holy Scripture has proceeded from God and is truly divine, by God Himself testifying through it in the hearts of men.

IV. Whenever the divine word of the law and the gospel is attentively read or listened to, a docile man truly feels its heart-turning power, and concludes that God is speaking with him from the internal, supernatural acts and motions of the heart. Those acts are on the part of the intellect, the dawning light of supernatural knowledge, and an inspired holy thought; on the part of the will, the spiritual motions are; sorrow for sins, a desire to learn and to profit, a pious affection towards the revealing God, a sweet inclination to command the intellect, now illumined by some spiritual light, to an unshaken assent to the things to be believed, spiritual joy. Which acts of the intellect and motions of the will, excited by the Holy Spirit through the word of the law and the gospel in the hearts of those reading or listening, are more lucidly known from certain biblical examples. At the first sermon of the apostle Peter, which he delivered at the feast of Pentecost to the Jews who had crucified Christ, the hearers, as Luke relates in Acts 2:37, "were pricked in their heart" (κατενύγησαν τῇ καρδίᾳ). Which compunction of heart without doubt inferred on the part of the intellect an acknowledgment of sin, as well as a holy thought, inspired by means of the word of God, concerning the death and resurrection of Christ; but on the part of the will, that compunction of heart undoubtedly imported a most bitter sorrow for the most atrocious sin perpetrated against Christ, joined with a certain inclination of the will towards Christ, and a desire to obtain eternal salvation. Therefore they said to Peter and the other apostles: "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" To the eunuch of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, from the place of Isaiah 53:8, which he was reading, more fully declared to him by Philip from other places of scripture, on the part of the intellect so much light of salutary knowledge shone, and on the part of the will such an affection and readiness arose, that with a willing mind he both professed his faith in Christ and asked for baptism to be administered to him, saying to Philip: "See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?" And when Philip said: "If you believe with all your heart, you may," he answered: "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God," and he was baptized, Acts 8:36-37. To Lydia, a seller of purple, through the word preached by Paul, both a holy thought and a pious desire (both are indicated by the opening of her heart) were inspired by God, so that, led by a desire to learn, she attended to those things which were said by Paul, and being converted, received baptism, Acts 16:14, seq. The Thessalonians received the word of God in much affliction with joy of the Holy Spirit, 1 Thessalonians 1:6. These supernatural acts of the intellect and motions of the will, by the force of their dependence on God, incline the intellect to give assent to the divine word more validly than the living voice of a man worthy of faith, commemorating a matter difficult to believe, moves the intellect to assent to the deed done. For just as they were excited by the Holy Spirit through the word of the law and the gospel; so they argue God to be their author; just as elsewhere every effect testifies of its cause.

The antithesis is 1. Of the Pontificians, some of whom slander that Spirit, by whose infallible testimony we say the divine authority of the scriptures is established for us, with the name of a private Spirit, and thus they ridicule the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit as a human invention. 2. Of the Socinians, who, since they maintain that the divine origin of Holy Scripture cannot be infallibly demonstrated, silently pass over the attestation of the Holy Spirit. 3. Of the Arminians, who deny that the testimony of the Holy Spirit is necessary for understanding that scripture is of divine origin. We will weigh their arguments.

I. Whatever opinion introduces enthusiasm into the church, it is not to be approved. But the opinion of the Lutherans, who maintain that the divine authority of the sacred letters becomes known through the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, introduces enthusiasm into the church. Therefore, etc. Response; Distinguish between the attestation of the Holy Spirit concerning the divinity of the sacred letters, which occurs through immediate illumination, and that which occurs through mediate illumination. Enthusiasts boast of immediate illuminations of the Holy Spirit; but the constant opinion of the Lutherans is that the Holy Spirit testifies to the divinity of scripture through a mediate illumination of the mind, which for the state of the present time occurs through the written word of God.

Instance; The Lutherans say that they do not receive illumination from a assembly of men, such as the church. Therefore, they receive illumination immediately from the Holy Spirit. Response; The Lutherans exclude the personal medium of a human assembly, not the real medium of the divine word reduced to letters.

II. In which position, a sophistical circle is committed, that is not an effective argument. But, with the sealing of the Holy Spirit posited as a demonstrative means of the divinity of scripture, a sophistical circle is committed. The major is placed beyond controversy, because a sophistical circle is a petition of the principle running backwards. The minor is established from the nature of the circle. For if I ask; whence do you know that scripture is divine? The Lutherans respond; because the Holy Spirit in each one testifies and seals this through scripture. If, however, I ask; whence do you prove that that Spirit is divine? The same respond; because scripture testifies that he is divine, and the sealing and its signification is infallible. Response; 1) Lutherans do not appeal to a private spirit; rather, the Spirit who seals the authority of the divine word is the Holy Spirit common to all the faithful. 2) A distinction is made between a sophistical circle and a demonstrative regression. In a sophistical circle, an unknown is proven by something equally unknown; in a demonstrative regression, however, we proceed from a confused to a distinct cognition. To be sure, the divine dignity of scripture is proven by the supernatural effect of the Holy Spirit, who operates efficaciously through scripture, illuminating, converting, regenerating, and renewing. But if you ask; Is that Spirit divine, or malignant? Then from the effect, which is divine and salutary, we regress to proving that the Spirit testifying internally of the divine origin of scripture is divine, most holy, and most good.

III. Whatever testimony no one has in himself unless he is converted and reborn, that testimony does not produce the solid assent to be given to scripture as truly divine. But the testimony of the Holy Spirit, no one has in himself unless he is converted and reborn. Therefore. The major premise is proven, because the testimony that produces assent must necessarily precede faith. But a man who is converted and reborn already has faith; therefore, the testimony of the Holy Spirit follows and seals his faith. The minor premise is clear from 1 John 5:10: "He who believes in the Son has the testimony in himself."

Response; The attestation of the Holy Spirit is considered either in relation to converted and reborn men, or in relation to those men who are on the way to conversion and regeneration. For converted and reborn men, the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit seals, confirms, and enriches their faith in the divinity of scripture. But the efficacious attestation and operation of the Holy Spirit, through the word of God read or heard, knocks on, opens, and illuminates the hearts of men who are on the way to conversion, and enkindles faith in them. An example for us is Lydia, the seller of purple, in Acts 16:14, who, when she began to listen to the word of Paul, was not yet converted and reborn, but was on the way to conversion. For her, the Holy Spirit knocked on her heart, opened it, removed all the locks of ignorance, all the bolts of innate malice, so that she might pay attention to those things which were said by Paul, and make greater progress in the knowledge of spiritual things, until a full assent of faith was obtained.

IV. The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit does not seem to be a valid reason moving an unbeliever to believe that the prophetic and apostolic writings depend immediately on God. For if you say: "The Holy Spirit testifies in my heart that these writings were recorded by the inspiration of God," the unbeliever will deny that the Holy Spirit testifies this in your heart, and so you will not convince him with this motive. Dr. KROMAYER aptly responds to this objection in his Theologia Positivo-Polemica, p. 20. This internal testimony, although it is not valid πρὸς ἕτερον (for another), i.e., for convincing another—for example, ("You ought to believe that this writing is θεόπνευστον (God-breathed), because I am convinced in my heart that the matter is not otherwise")—it is nevertheless valid πρὸς ἑαυτὸν (for oneself), i.e., for convincing the very person who feels the testimony of the Holy Spirit in his heart on this matter. For just as while we live, we experience by the act itself that we are alive; while we believe, that we are believing; so while the Holy Spirit confirms the celestial truth in us, while He operates through the word, and testifies inwardly about the word, then we similarly experience by the act itself that He is operating and testifying.

Question XXXIII. Does the authority of Holy Scripture depend on the authority of the church?

The authority of Holy Scripture does not depend on the church. The authority of Holy Scripture, neither by reason of its divine and most eminent dignity, which it possesses, depends on the church (a), nor by reason of cognition does it need the testimony of the church as the principal and ultimate reason for knowing the divine authority of scripture (b), nor as a unique and absolutely necessary argument (c).

Proof of a: (1) All authority of any scripture depends on the author. The church is not the author of Holy Scripture. Therefore, the authority of Holy Scripture does not depend on the church. (2) Whatever is by natural and necessary order subject to the divinely inspired word, that thing possesses less authority than the divinely inspired word, and therefore cannot confer authority upon it. But the church, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear once the terms are understood. The minor is proven, because just as the law of a prince shines with greater authority than a subject bound by that law, so the dignity of the divine word outweighs the dignity of the church. It would have gone badly for the Israelites in the time of Moses if they had wished to be superior to the θεόπνευστον (God-breathed) word or the divine law, or if they had wished to say that the priests and Levites conferred authority on the divine law, when rather the law, as it constituted the priests, so also procured authority for them.

Proof of b: That the principal and ultimate reason for knowing and believing with divine faith the divine authority of the sacred letters is the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, or, what is the same, the efficacy of Holy Scripture, operating in our souls with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, has been shown in the preceding question. The same is confirmed if we carefully consider the nature of the church. For the church is viewed either as a multitude of men spread far and wide throughout the world, consenting in divine worship, or it is viewed as a multitude of believers built by Christ, and constituted the pillar and foundation of truth. The church, viewed in this latter way, has an authority that depends on the authority of Holy Scripture itself, and is subsequent to it. But it is contradictory that the authority of scripture should depend, as to us, on the authority of the church, and yet the authority of the church should not become known to us except from the authority of scripture, already previously known. The church, viewed in the former way, has a merely human authority, resting in this, that it is not probable that such a great multitude of men, testifying to the authority of scripture, that it truly and immediately proceeded from God, could conspire in one lie, and in testifying could have been deceived or could deceive.

Here it must be carefully observed that the force of the testimony borne by the church to the divine authority of scripture is not magisterial, but ministerial, because the church is not the mistress, but the servant of scripture; not the mother, but the daughter; not the author, but the custodian, witness, and interpreter; not the judge, but the index and vindicator. This can be illustrated by the example of the Samaritan woman, who is mentioned in John 4:7. This woman, having spoken with Jesus, from His most efficacious words and the wonderful knowledge of divine and hidden things, of which the Savior at that time most clearly poured forth rays from Himself, concluded that Jesus was not only a prophet, but the Messiah Himself, see v. 19, 20. Wherefore, full of joy, she entered the city of Samaria, invited its citizens, and led them as if by the hand to see and hear Christ, v. 29. Many of them believed in Jesus because of the word of the woman, confirming that Jesus was the Christ, v. 39. But when the same people had not only seen Jesus with their eyes but had also received His discourse with attentive ears, many more of them believed because of His own word, and said to the woman: "It is no longer because of your words that we believe, for we ourselves have heard and we know that this is truly the Savior of the world, the Christ," v. 42. The former faith of the Samaritans, arising from the word of the woman, was opinion; the latter, born from the word of Christ, was knowledge, i.e., an accurate and certain notice. In like manner, the church testifies concerning the authority of scripture, proposes it, and attracts and leads men to read it. When they have read scripture attentively, or heard it explained by the voice of a teacher, they do not believe scripture because of the testimony of the church, but they believe scripture with divine faith because of scripture itself, inasmuch as it, with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, exerts its heart-turning power, illuminates the intellect of the one reading or listening, and bends the will to the obedience of faith, so that a full and indubitable assent is given to scripture.

Proof of c: The testimony of the church is indeed a remarkable motive of credibility, by which we are led to know and believe with human faith the divinity of scripture, but it is not a unique motive, nor is it absolutely necessary. It is not unique, because there are many κριτήρια καὶ γνωρίσματα (criteria and marks), signs and motives, which have the same moving force as that of the church: such as the antiquity of scripture, the clarity of the miracles by which it was confirmed; the constancy of the martyrs who shed their blood for the authority of scripture; the sudden propagation of the doctrine which scripture delivers, and its admirable preservation amidst so many persecutions; the confession of the enemies of the church, and the punishments divinely sent upon the persecutors and contemners of scripture. What is more? The internal criteria of the divinity of scripture, such as the majesty of God testifying of Himself in the sacred codex, the singularity of the style, the truth of the dogmas and prophecies, and the sanctity of the precepts, possess a greater moving force than the testimony of the church. The testimony of the church is not absolutely necessary for believing the divine authority of Holy Scripture, because the authority of scripture can be, and often has been, recognized without the church's testimony. For the word of God, whether preached or written, by its divine efficacy, which it exerts with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit in converting men, reveals its divine origin, without the addition of the church's testimony. This is proven by examples, both biblical and otherwise. When the man of God Shemaiah, by the instinct and illumination of God, said to the army of Rehoboam, which was about to fight with Jeroboam over the Israelite kingdom: "Thus said the LORD: You shall not go up or fight with your brothers, the sons of Israel. Return every man to his home, for this thing is from me," they therefore obeyed the word of the LORD, and returned to go according to the word of the LORD, 1 Kings 12:24. When the prophet Jonah preached in the city of Nineveh, and said: "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown," the men of Nineveh believed in God; therefore they proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them to the least, Jonah 3:4-5. Behold the stupendous efficacy of the divine word! By which, as by a most penetrating thunderbolt, the holy men of God, Shemaiah and Jonah, instructed by no testimony of the church, struck a huge multitude of men and moved them to the obedience of faith. More examples could be adduced from sacred and profane histories, if it were necessary. The example of Christian Gerson, a converted Jew, is worthy of mention. He describes the occasion and manner of his conversion in the words of D. CALIXTUS, in his treatise De auctoritate scripturae, p. 36, as follows: "A certain poor Christian woman, my neighbor, gave me a copy of the New Testament in German, translated by Luther, as a pledge; to whom I lent eight shillings, so that I might gain interest in my usual way, and in the meantime I might peruse the book; not indeed because I doubted the truth of the Jewish religion, or believed any article of the Christian faith to be right, but so that I might learn what that so very effective error was, which seduced so many myriads of souls and sent them headlong to destruction. Therefore, in the presence of my two kinsmen, Lazarus and Simeon, I read through the whole thing, not without blasphemies. In the meantime, however, my heart was struck; and when I had noticed that the evangelists, and the apostles, and Christ himself so often appeal to the Old Testament, and repeatedly adduce places from it one after another; I was induced to read it again, and secretly indeed, with no one aware, not even my wife, and to compare the adduced place with the text of the Old Testament itself. When I did this, so great a light shone upon me, that for that reason I owe eternal thanks to God." D. DORSCHHEUS recounts more examples of those who, having by some chance fallen into the reading of the sacred letters, felt an incredible motion of the soul, and were most fully persuaded of their divinity, in Theol. Zachar. part II, disp. I, § 53.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, some of whom maintain that the authority of Holy Scripture, with respect to the thing itself, depends on the authority of the church; others assert that the authority of scripture becomes known to us from the testimony of the church, as if from a unique or principal argument, who rely on the following arguments.

I. From whatever, as from a solid pillar, the truth of scripture is supported and strengthened, on that its authority depends. But from the church, as from a solid pillar, the truth of scripture is supported and strengthened. Therefore. The major premise is clear: For just as the strength of a building depends on its pillars, so the valid authority of scripture depends on the pillar and foundation of truth. The minor premise is clear from 1 Timothy 3:15, where the church is called by the apostle στῦλος καὶ ἐδραῖωμα τῆς ἀληθείας (a pillar and foundation of the truth). Response: 1) D. SEBASTIAN SCHMID explains the words of Paul very conveniently in his Collegium Biblicum Posticum, p. 301. His opinion is that 1. the name στῦλος καὶ ἐδραῖωμα (pillar and foundation) refers to the pillars that were in Solomon's temple, 1 Kings 7; Jeremiah 52, just as it is commonly held that the name οἶκος (house) refers to Solomon's temple. But the function of these pillars was not to support anything, but they were in themselves a notable work and ornament of the temple. Hence it is not necessary that we say the church is called a pillar because it bears or supports something. 2) That the church is called the pillar and foundation of truth passively: partly because it has been built and erected by the celestial truth; partly because the same truth dwells in it, and the church believes and professes it, insofar as it is indeed true. The lauded author proves his interpretation from the purpose, because the apostle exhorts Timothy to conduct himself in the church of Ephesus according to the divine word, with this argument, that the church is a pillar of truth, built by it, and to be further built up by it. Hence the church is not considered by reason of the office it performs for the truth, but by reason of its edification through the ecclesiastical ministry, and therefore passively as to be built up into a pillar and foundation of truth, so that being built by the truth, it may hold this firmly. This interpretation is confirmed by a similar appellation in the context. Just as in this very place the church is called οἶκος Θεοῦ ζῶντος (the house of the living God), because it was built by God, and God dwells firmly united in it; so it is called the pillar and foundation of truth, because it is built by the truth, and holds the truth dwelling in itself. 3) Some theologians distinguish between a pillar of truth spoken of in an architectonic sense, and in a political sense. For just as pillars stand in courts and before praetoriums, to which the laws and decrees of the magistrate are appended; so the church is called στῦλος (a pillar), inasmuch as the tablets of the divine word are appended and affixed to it as to a public pillar. But the word ἐδραῖωμα does not primarily denote a foundation, as the Vulgate has rendered it, or a base (which the Greeks call θεμέλιον), but a seat, a chair, a repository, because the church is, as it were, a sacred seat or repository, in which the truth has been deposited. But in an architectonic sense, the church is not absolutely and primarily called a pillar and foundation of truth; as if it so strengthens and supports the celestial truth, as a pillar sustains a building; since this very pillar is sustained and strengthened by the celestial truth, as it is the base and foundation of this pillar and support; but only respectively, secondarily, and organically, inasmuch as it stabilizes or supports the truth by testifying, proposing, professing, interpreting, guarding, and defending it, not by conferring authority on the celestial truth, or by generating divine faith. Confer D. GERHARD in loc. de eccles.

p. 804. D. CALOV in system. theol. tom. I, p. 418. (*)

II. Whatever testimony is divine and infallible, that generates divine faith. But the testimony of the church concerning the θεοπνευστία (divine inspiration) of sacred scripture is etc. Therefore. The minor premise is proven, because the church is led by the Holy Spirit into all truth, John 16:13. Wherefore the testimony of the church concerning the authenticity of the sacred letters, as it proceeds from the Spirit of truth, so it is to be believed with divine faith. Response: From the intention of Christ speaking, that promise primarily and proximately regards the instruction of the apostles for the function of the apostolic office, by which they were to serve all nations by preaching the word of truth. The promise was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, where the Holy Spirit immediately illuminated the hearts of the apostles with the knowledge of celestial doctrine, so that they would not err in the doctrine of faith. Secondly, that promise can be accommodated to the universal church, which, insofar as it follows the guidance of the Holy Spirit, does not err, but is infallible. But thus infallibility will principally be referred back to the indwelling and directing Holy Spirit himself.

III. The church is older than scripture. Therefore scripture, as far as we are concerned, has its authority from the church. Response: A distinction is made between the material and the formal aspect of sacred scripture. The material aspect is the words committed to letters by the prophets and apostles; The formal aspect is the sense, comprising the divinely revealed dogmas. The church is older than scripture, if you consider its material aspect; it is not older, if you weigh the formal aspect of scripture, because it was gathered and built by divinely revealed dogmas. Instance: God communicated His word to the first parents when the church was already established. Therefore, the church is older than the divine word, even as to its formal aspect. Response: Our discussion is not about the first humans in the state of innocence (although it has not yet been proven that Adam and Eve in the state of integrity were a church, properly speaking; cf. JO. ADAMI OSIANDRI colleg. System theol. part. 1, p. 90) but about the Christian church, which was built up by the first proto-gospel, and propagated by the word preached by the prophets and apostles and reduced to letters.

IV. The Pontificians object to us with that well-worn saying of AUGUSTINE: "I would not believe the Gospel, unless the authority of the church moved me." Response: 1. Augustine is speaking of himself as an individual, and is not prescribing a rule of believing the authority of scripture for all. Wherefore it is wrongly inferred: Augustine did not believe the gospel, unless the testimony of the church intervened. Therefore, the situation is the same for all believers. 2. He is speaking of himself, not as he then was, a Christian and a bishop, but as he had been when he was being led from Manichaeism to the orthodox religion, namely that he would not have believed (he says, crederem (I would believe), using a phrase familiar to him in African style, for credidissem (I would have believed)), unless he had first been moved by the authority of the church. 3. The testimony of the church can, by reason of order, be the first means of believing, although in proving efficacy it is not the first, much less the only one. For which reason, Augustine's meaning is not that on account of the authority of the church he believed with divine faith and unshakable assent that sacred scripture had proceeded from God, but he speaks of a motive of credibility, by which he was moved and induced to read sacred scripture, as if to say: "If I had not been induced by the authority and testimony of the church to read scripture, I would not have believed," that is, I would neither have read scripture, nor would it have worked assent in me; but after I read scripture attentively, it itself, with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, by its own illuminating power, testified of itself in my heart, so that I believe with certainty that it depends immediately on God.

V. Whoever cannot believe without a preacher, they cannot believe without the church testifying: But, men cannot etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear, because every preacher is a member of the church. The minor is proven from Romans 10:14. Response: A distinction is made between the proclamation of the divine word, and the testimony of the church about the divine word. The former generates divine faith, the latter produces human faith. And although a preacher is necessary, one does not believe on account of the authority of the preacher or proposer, but on account of the authority of the word preached.

Question XXXIV. What is the canonical authority of sacred scripture, or the normative rule of faith and morals?

The canonical authority of sacred scripture is the most eminent dignity of scripture, by which, by reason of both its sense and its divinely inspired language, it is an infallible and adequate norm, to which all things to be believed and done by a man who is to attain eternal salvation are to be measured, all controversies of faith are to be settled, and all other writings are to be judged.

Obs. I. The causal authority of faith differs from the canonical authority of sacred scripture (a) in that scripture generates divine faith through its θεόπνευστον (God-breathed) sense, or celestial doctrine, which sense of scripture is one and the same, and remains so, whether it is expressed in the original language of scripture, or in some version that conforms to the original text. Therefore, the illuminating power joined to the sense of scripture exerts itself efficaciously to generate faith not only through the original scripture, but also through a version of scripture, provided the version is clear and conforms to the authentic text; such as is the biblical version of the Blessed Luther, which the faithful men in our churches use; which, when read or perceived by hearing, is as efficacious for causing the assent of faith as if they had read the Hebrew text of the Old and the Greek of the New Testament, or had heard it proposed and explained by the voice of a teacher, although the words of that version are not immediately inspired by God. But for scripture to have canonical authority, it is necessary that not only the sense, but also the words, have proceeded immediately from God. For a canon, or norm of doctrine and morals, requires also on the part of the words an absolute certainty and infallibility, which is not found except in the original text of sacred scripture, since it depends immediately on the inspiring God. Versions are composed by the study of men, who in translating scripture could have suffered something human and erred. (b) Sacred scripture exerts its canonical authority most of all when a controversy arises concerning the truth of doctrine and the truth must be confirmed, and falsehood refuted; but scripture exerts its motive authority of faith whenever either unbelievers are to be converted to the Christian faith, or the weak faith of believers is to be confirmed.

Obs. II. The word canon denotes a rule, or norm, and is defined by Varro: Κανὼν ἐστὶ μέτρον ἀδιάφρεστον πᾶσαν πρόθεσιν καὶ ἀφαίρεσιν μηδαμῶς ἐπιδεχόμενον (A canon is an infallible measure, admitting no addition or subtraction whatsoever). Properly, it is an instrument for measuring quantity. Analogically, the word canon, or norm, has been transferred to laws, which are called the norm of life; and to the principles of disciplines, which are the norm of dogmas; and to the principle of theology, scripture, which is called the norm of things to be believed and done. Conf. D. CALOV. metaphys. divin. p. m. 655.

Obs. III. The norm of cognition serves a twofold function, directive and corrective. For it directs the cognition of the human mind, so that it may contain itself within the bounds of truth, and it corrects errors, since what is right is the norm of itself and of what is crooked. Therefore, sacred scripture is called a canon, or norm, partly on account of direction; because according to it the truth of faith and the honesty of morals are directed; partly on account of correction, because controversies of faith are examined by it, and whatever is right and pious is retained; whatever is erroneous and impious is rejected.

Obs. IV. But this word, canon, is taken by Christian writers in three ways; 1) generally for every writing or book that has some force of a rule. In which general sense the decrees of the pontiffs, and canon law itself, arranged in a certain order, are called canonical, or regular; because, on account of the authority of the pontiff, those who are subject to his jurisdiction are held to follow it as a rule. 2) Specially for every book that is contained in the biblical codex; because it contributes to the edification of the readers, and in this respect is a certain rule, which the faithful follow for their own edification. In which sense Augustine, in book XVIII of The City of God, ch. 36, counts the books of Maccabees, Tobit, Wisdom, and others, among the canonicals; even though the Jewish church never had them in the canon. 3) Most specially for the divine rule of faith and morals, utterly certain and infallible, to which it is plainly repugnant for falsehood to be subject; in which most special sense the authority of scripture is called canonical; because sacred scripture is the infallible rule of things to be believed and done, depending immediately on God and communicated by the same to men, so that those things which agree with it may be admitted, and those which disagree may be rejected.

That sacred scripture is the rule of faith and morals is proven, because it is expressly called a line, a rule, a level, in Psalm 19, where the Hebrew word יָרֵךְ (line) is found. It is either the measuring cord of artisans or geometers, Jer. 31:38, Lam. 2:8, 2 Chron. 4:2, or the plumb-line of architects, Job 38:5, Isa. 44:13, or the line of scripture, Isa. 28:10, as GEIER notes on Ps. 19, p. 317. The Greek word κανών (canon) is found in Gal. 6:16. ὅσοι τῷ κανόνι τοῦτο στοιχήσουσιν, εἰρήνη ἐπ' αὐτοὺς καὶ ἔλεος (and as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy). By canon in that place, according to Paul's intention, is first and proximately understood the celestial doctrine which the apostle included in the epistle to the Galatians, concerning justification, spiritual liberty, and the new creation. But since the reason is the same for all θεοπνεύστων (God-breathed) writings, we rightly conclude that the whole God-breathed scripture is the infallible canon, or rule of right believing and pious living. Confer Phil. 3:16. Certainly scripture is very conveniently called a canon. For the church is a mystical building, whose cornerstone is Christ; The architects are the doctors, who use scripture as a norm to erect the spiritual house and to build up doctrine. Hence BASIL, in book 1 against Eunomius, calls scripture the canon of right and the norm of truth. CYRIL, in book IV of his dialogue, calls it the right and perfect canon of faith. CHRYSOSTOM, in homily 13 on 2 Corinthians: "We have the most exact balance and gnomon and rule in the assertion of the divine laws. And therefore I beg and beseech you, to leave aside what seems right to this or that man, and to inquire all things from the scriptures concerning these matters." AUGUSTINE, book II, ch. 6 against the Donatists: "Let us not bring to the examination deceitful scales, where we weigh what we want, and how we want, saying according to our own will; this is heavy, this is light; but let us bring the divine scale from the sacred scriptures as from the Lord's testaments, and in it let us weigh what is heavier, or rather, let us not weigh, but let us recognize what has been weighed by the

Question XXXV. Whence does the canonical authority of sacred scripture become known to us?

The canonical authority of sacred scripture requires infallible certainty both of the doctrine and of the words divinely inspired; absolute certainty of the words is not given, except in the original language. The canonical authority of scripture, considered by reason of doctrine, becomes known to us from both external and internal criteria, and especially from the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, illuminating the minds of men through scripture read attentively or perceived by hearing from the mouth of a teacher (a). But the canonical authority of scripture, considered by reason of the original language, or the authentic Hebrew text in the Old, and Greek in the New Testament, is distinctly known indeed by the testimony of the primitive church (b), but not by that alone (c).

Proof a: By the same signs and arguments by which the divine origin of the sacred letters is known, the canonical authority of scripture, viewed by reason of doctrine, is notified to us. For Holy Scripture is the infallible canon, or norm, of faith and morals for this reason, because it derives its immediate origin from God, and is destined by the same for canonical use. Wherefore, since the criteria adduced above certify to us that the sense, or doctrine, of Holy Scripture has proceeded immediately from God, it is of no use to prove at length here the canonical authority of scripture, if you consider the doctrine of the canon. But it is otherwise with the original language of the Old and New Testaments. For the Holy Spirit bears internal testimony to those who attentively meditate on the celestial doctrine, enunciated in some version, be it Latin or German, that it is from God, when yet the words of the version are from men, who could be deceived and deceive. Thus also most of the criteria, both external and internal, distinctly notify the sense, not the language, of scripture.

Proof b: When it is asked: Was the gospel of Matthew first written in Greek, or in Hebrew? that question is not dogmatic, but historical. For it is a question of fact, occurring to the senses, concerning which both the canonical writers themselves, by mouth, by subscription of hand, and by tradition of the autographs, and the autographs themselves, delivered to the church, and preserved in it with the greatest care, testify to the sense. The witness of this sensible fact is the primitive church, which militated under the banner of Christ on earth while the writers were living in the flesh, and received their autographs from their hands; and also the subsequent church, which flourished in the times immediately following, when the autographs of the canonical books themselves were still extant, were handled by hands, and were visible to the eyes of readers in whatever language they were recorded. But the more recent church cannot testify of itself concerning the canonical authority of Holy Scripture; but if it wishes to testify, it is necessary for it to recur to the primitive and subsequent church, and to borrow from it the testimony of the authentic text. Thus, from the Jewish church we seek the testimony of the Hebrew language in the Old, and from the primitive Christian church the testimony of the original Greek text in the New Testament.

Proof c: We willingly accept the testimony of the primitive church, but not that alone. We join to it the testimony of scripture, its long-term preservation for the salutary use of men, and the quality of its style.

(1) That the Old Testament was recorded in the Hebrew style, we gather from Romans 3:2, where Paul expressly writes: "the oracles of God were entrusted to the Jews." From which Pauline statement we argue: Whatever oracles were entrusted to the Jews, that through them they might be made wise for salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus, those were entrusted to them in the Hebrew language. But, the oracles of God contained in the sacred codex of the Old Testament, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established, because by no oracles, no sayings, can a man, or a whole nation, be made wise for salvation, unless the words or oracles are proposed to the man, or the nation, in a familiar and vernacular language, which that nation understands, and can therefore apply to itself for salutary use. The minor premise is clear from the cited Pauline saying, Rom. 3:2, compared with the statement of the same apostle, 2 Tim. 3:15. We apply the testimony of Paul to the Greek language of the New Testament, and we probably gather: Whatever oracles were entrusted to all nations, that through them they might be made wise for salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus, those were entrusted to them in the Greek language. But, the oracles of Christ and the apostles contained in the sacred codex of the New Testament, etc. Therefore. The connection of the major is shown. Just as God and the prophets entrusted their oracles to the Jews in their vernacular language, which all Jews understood, namely Hebrew; so Christ and the apostles entrusted their oracles to all nations most widely diffused throughout the whole world in the most common language, and most known to all nations, namely Greek, so that through it all nations might be made wise for salvation. CICERO says gravely in his Oration for the poet Archias: "Greek is read in almost all nations, Latin is contained within its own borders, which are indeed small."

(2) If a controversy arises concerning the original language of some sacred amanuensis, it cannot always be solidly resolved without the use of other arguments. This is evident from the question debated about the original language of the Gospel of Matthew: was it first recorded in Hebrew, or in Greek? For HUGO GROTIUS in his preface to the Gospel of Matthew reports that pious antiquity with the greatest consensus teaches that the πρωτότυπον (original) of the Gospel of Matthew was Hebrew, into which opinion he adduces PAPIAS, IRENAEUS, ORIGEN, PANTAENUS, JEROME, and EPIPHANIUS. Nevertheless, GROTIUS praises the Greek version, which is in frequent use today, saying: "I think it is a crime to doubt the authority and faithfulness of the Greek version, received from the very beginning of Christianity." D. CALOVIUS, fighting against him for the authenticity of the Greek text, refutes HUGO GROTIUS with an argument sought from divine providence, in his Biblia Illustrata, tom. I, on the New Testament, fol. 140. "GROTIUS says that one should not doubt the authority and faithfulness of the Greek version of Matthew; but if we do not have the very πρωτότυπον (original) preserved by divine providence, which was divinely destined for the canonical use of the church, how can we be certain, either of the faithfulness and authority of the translation, or of its perpetual and undefiled preservation? We believe that the word of God will not perish, and we securely place our faith in the word of Christ that not even a jot or an apex of it can perish, but we have no promise concerning the preservation of translations." Indeed, HOTTINGERUS also, in his Systema Theologicum, lib. 1, loc. 3, cited by CALOVIUS, urges this, that an authentic Hebrew Gospel of Matthew exists nowhere; But that the original text itself has perished is repugnant to divine providence.

(3) And if anyone possesses such sharpness of mind, and is so imbued with knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages, that he knows how to thoroughly inspect and meditate on the Hebrew text of the Old and the Greek of the New instrument, he will believe without any hesitation that both languages are original, authentic, and have proceeded immediately from the inspiring God. The conformity of the style of both, the simplicity, gravity, and singular emphasis of the words, will make faith for him.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians asserting that the canonical authority of Holy Scripture, as to us, depends uniquely on the authority and testimony of the church; whose arguments are:

I. The church has the power to establish the canon. Therefore, the canon of scripture depends on the church. Response: The canon of scripture either denotes the canonical books, or the catalogue or number of the canonical books. The church historically enumerates the latter. But the catalogue of canonical books is not an article of faith. Many have been imbued with true faith and saved, who were ignorant of this catalogue or number of canonical books.

II. Nowhere in sacred scripture does it state which books are canonical. Therefore, the testimony of the church is a condition without which the canonical authority of the biblical books cannot be known. Response: The canonical books are Holy Scripture itself, which testifies to its own authority by its inherent efficacy, with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, operative in our hearts, no differently than the sun testifies of itself by its rays, fire by its heat.

III. The church alone testifies concerning the original language of Holy Scripture. Therefore, the canonical authority of Holy Scripture, by reason of its original language, depends on the church as to us. Response: Concerning the original language of Holy Scripture, not just any church testifies, but the primitive church; yet not alone. See proof c.

IV. Nowhere in the sacred codex does it state: This book is truly the gospel of Matthew; this epistle is truly Paul's. It might happen that someone could propose a false epistle to me, and assert that this very one is a Pauline epistle. Therefore, lest I be deceived, I need the testimony of the church. Response: A distinction is made between a historical and a dogmatic question. The question: Is the gospel of Matthew Matthew's? is historical; to resolve which the testimony of the church is by all means to be admitted. But the question: Is the gospel of Matthew a canonical writing? is a dogmatic question to be decided from the internal and external criteria of canonical writings.

Question XXXVI. How are the biblical books divided?

The biblical books are divided into canonical and apocryphal (*). The division of the biblical books. The canonical books are those whose doctrine and individual words were recorded by the prophets and apostles from the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and which were communicated by God to the church and received by it, to be for a man to be saved an infallible rule of faith and morals.

Question XXXVII. How are the canonical books divided?

(*) Some of those who think correctly indeed prefer to make a tripartite distinction of the books, namely canonical, ecclesiastical, and apocryphal, by which reason some of the most ancient doctors, namely Ruffinus and Athanasius, distinguished them. But, as to the matter itself, there will be no disagreement, provided that two classes of apocryphal books are established, in one of which are these very ones which others call ecclesiastical; in the other, those which the church has never judged worthy even of reading. To me also it seems that there are no more than two general parts, consistent with the laws of accurate division. For as many as are the genera, so many are the members of the general division. The books which are called ecclesiastical, and the apocryphal, are two species which are contained in one genus, in that this is distinguished from that of the canonicals. Therefore, all the books comprehended in the whole scope of sacred scripture are rightly divided into canonical and non-canonical, βιβλία κανονικά, καὶ ἀκανόνιστα (canonical books, and non-canonical), as is written in the Council of Laodicea, can. LIX.

The canonical books are some of the Old, others of the New Testament. The former are those which, from the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit before the birth of Christ, were written by the prophets in the Hebrew language, commended to the Israelite church, and received by it, to be an infallible norm of things to be believed and done. The latter are those which, from the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, were recorded by the apostles in the Greek language, commended to the Christian church, and received by it, to be a perpetual rule of faith and life.

Obs. I. The biblical books can be divided (a) by reason of the ministerial cause into prophetic and apostolic, from Eph. 2:20. (b) by reason of time into the books of the Old and New Testament, (c) by reason of the form and normal use into canonical and apocryphal. The last distinction is most worthy of note.

Obs. II. The canonical books of the Old Testament agree with the canonical books of the New Testament (a) by reason of the principal cause, God, from whom they proceeded, 2 Peter 1:21, 2 Tim. 3:16. (b) by reason of the primary object, which is Christ, John 5:39, Acts 10:43. (c) by reason of the canonical use, Luke 16:29, 2 Tim. 3:15-16.

Obs. III. The canonical books of the Old and New Testament differ (a) by reason of the ministerial cause. For the books of the Old Testament were written by prophets preaching of the Messiah to come; the books of the N.T. were recorded by apostles testifying of Christ manifested in the flesh. (b) By reason of the subject that received them. The books of the V.T. were entrusted to the Israelite church, Rom. 3:2; the books of the N.T. were commended to the Christian church gathered from all nations, John 20:31. However, the Christian church also received the canonical books of the V.T. on account of the most beautiful harmony of the prophetic and apostolic writings, their notable utility, and especially on account of the command of Christ, John 5:39. (c) By reason of language; because the books of the V.T. were written in the Hebrew language (and in certain small parts in Chaldean, which is a dialect of it), which the Jews understood as their vernacular; the books of the N.T. were written in the Greek language, as the most known and most used at that age. (d) By reason of perspicuity; because the N.T. is clearer than the Old Testament. There is a disparity with respect to the degrees of perspicuity; but not a diversity with respect to the object of revelation, as if other things necessary to be believed were explicitly delivered here than there; since the faith in both is the same. Eph. 4:16.

Question XXXVIII. How many kinds of canonical books of the Old Testament are there?

Canonical books of the Old Testament. Of the canonical books of the Old Testament, some are legal, some historical, some dogmatic, and some prophetic.

The legal books are the Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, namely Genesis, having 50 chapters; Exodus, 40 chapters; Leviticus, 27 chapters; Numbers, 36 chapters; and Deuteronomy, 34 chapters.

The historical books are the book of Joshua, having 24 chapters; Judges, 21 chapters; Ruth, 4 chapters; the first book of Samuel, 31 chapters; the second book of Samuel, 24 chapters; the first book of Kings, 22 chapters; the second book of Kings, 25 chapters; the first book of Chronicles, 30 chapters; the second book of Chronicles, 36 chapters. The book of Ezra, 10 chapters; Nehemiah, 13 chapters; Esther, 10 chapters.

The dogmatic (which are also called poetic) are the book of Job, 42 chapters; The book of Psalms, 150. The three books of Solomon; Proverbs, 31 chapters; Ecclesiastes, 12 chapters; Song of Songs, 12 chapters.

The prophetic are of the prophets, of whom some are called major, who published longer works; some minor, who published shorter ones. The major are four; Isaiah, having 66 chapters; Jeremiah, 52 chapters, whose also are Lamentations, 5 chapters; Ezekiel, 48 chapters; Daniel, 12 chapters. The minor are twelve; Hosea, 14 chapters; Joel, 3 chapters; Amos, 9 chapters; Obadiah, 1 chapter; Jonah, 4 chapters; Micah, 7 chapters; Nahum, 3 chapters; Habakkuk, 4 chapters; Zephaniah, 3 chapters; Haggai, 2 chapters; Zechariah, 14 chapters; Malachi, 4 chapters.

Question XXXIX. How are the canonical books of the New Testament divided?

Canonical books of the N.T. The canonical books of the New Testament are distinguished into historical, dogmatic, and prophetic.

The historical books describe either the life and deeds of Christ, as the four evangelists; Matthew, consisting of 28 chapters; Mark, 16 chapters; Luke, 24 chapters; John, 21 chapters; or the life and deeds of the apostles, namely the Acts of the Apostles, 28 chapters.

The dogmatic, or doctrinal, are the epistles written by the apostles. The epistles of Paul are 14: to the Romans, 16 chapters; the first to the Corinthians, 16 chapters; the second to the Corinthians, 13 chapters; to the Galatians, 6 chapters; to the Ephesians, 6 chapters; to the Philippians, 4 chapters; to the Colossians, 4 chapters; the first to the Thessalonians, 5 chapters; the second to the Thess., 3 chapters; the first to Tim., 6 chapters; the second to Timothy, 4 chapters; one to Titus, 3 chapters; one to Philemon, 1 chapter; to the Hebrews, 13 chapters. The epistles of Peter are two: the first having 5 chapters; the second, 3 chapters. The epistles of John are three: the first having 5 chapters; the second 1 chapter; the third 1 chapter. There is one epistle of James, having 5 chapters; one is the epistle of Jude, 1 chapter.

Finally, the prophetic book is the Apocalypse of John, which is completed in 22 chapters.

Obs. The books of the New Testament are distinguished by some into πρωτοκανονικές (protocanonical), about whose authority there was never any doubt, and δευτεροκανονικές (deuterocanonical), whose authority was called into question by some particular churches. Of this order are the second epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the epistle to the Hebrews, James, Jude, the Apocalypse. There are some who maintain that the pious ancients did not so much doubt their canonical authority as their secondary authors. See D. HILDEBRAND in Instit. Theol., p. 68. But since today all evangelical doctors assign divine authority to those deuterocanonical books, that distinction seems to be of minimal necessity.

Question XL. Which books are apocryphal?

Apocryphal books. The apocryphal books are those which exist in the codex, indeed, but not in the biblical canon, nor were they written by the immediate inspiration of God; and therefore they are read publicly and usefully in the church not for the proof of articles of faith, but for the edification of morals; and they are either entire books, or parts and appendices of the sacred books. The entire books are either historical or didactic. The historical are Tobit, having 14 chapters; Judith, 16 chapters; Baruch, 5 chapters; the first of Maccabees, 16 chapters; the second of Maccabees, 15 chapters; the third of Maccabees, 7 chapters; the third book of Esdras, 9 chapters; the fourth book of Esdras, 16 chapters. The didactic are the book of Wisdom, having 19 chapters; Ecclesiasticus or Sirach, 51 chapters. The appendices of the books are the epistle of Jeremiah annexed to Baruch, 1 chapter; the additions to Daniel, 3 chapters; the supplement to Esther, 7 chapters; the Prayer of Manasseh, 1 chapter.

Obs. I. The apocryphal books are called ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀποκρύπτειν (from hiding), from concealing or hiding, because their hidden origin was not clear to those by whose testimony the authority of the true scriptures has come down to us, AUGUSTINE, book II against Faustus, ch. 1. Their origin is called hidden, because by no κριτήριον (criterion), no clear sign or certain argument can it be proven that they were immediately inspired by the Holy Spirit. Rather, it can be shown that they are not of immediate divine origin, because 1) the canonical books of the Old Testament were written in the Hebrew language; but the apocryphal books appeared in the Greek language. 2) The canonical books of the Old Testament bear testimony to the coming Messiah, Acts 10:43; but none of the apocryphal books testify anything about the coming Messiah. 3) The θεόπνευστοι (God-breathed) authors were so immune from error that they were even exempt from the danger of erring, whereas the writers of the apocryphal books feared for themselves from errors, and prayed for pardon for them. Sirach does this in the prologue, and the author of the book of 2 Maccabees, ch. 15:39. Indeed, not insignificant errors are noted in them. In the book of Tobit there is the lie of the angel in ch. 5:18, ch. 11:3, and superstition in ch. 6:8. The book of Wisdom plainly treats of things that are from Platonic philosophy. And although it has the title of Solomon, it is nevertheless of Philo. It uses such a style of speech that smacks of the philosophy of Plato, according to the judgment of JO. ADAM. OSIANDER in his collection, system. theol. part 1, p. 119. An error is noted in it in ch. 16:21, compared with Exod. 16:31, Num. 11:8. In the book of Judith, ch. 9:2, the deed of Simeon is approved as praiseworthy, which however Jacob himself, on his deathbed, accused of disgrace, Gen. 49:5. The book of II Maccabees, ch. 14:42, 43, 46, commends the αὐτοχειρίαν (suicide) of Razis, etc. 4) The canon of the Old Testament contains twenty-two books, according to the testimony of JOSEPHUS, book 1 against Apion, as many as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet. This canon is tripartite, divided into the law, the prophets, and the hagiographa; which partition, as it was known at the time of Christ, so also it was approved by Him, Luke 24:44. In which tripartite division of the Jews, the books of Tobit, Wisdom, Judith, etc. are not found. (*)

5) The primitive Christian church

(*) It has not yet been confirmed by suitable testimonies that this division, which we still have in use today, is so ancient. I certainly do not deny that Christ referred to a certain tripartite distinction; but, I think, to that one of which JOSEPHUS made mention in his book against Apion: Moses, the Prophets, and the hymns, by which name, as the context teaches, he indicates these four: Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs. But yet even in that division none of those books are numbered which we rightly think are apocryphal. The Roman Catholics are very audacious when they wish the Jewish canon of the Old Testament to be different from the Christian one. Therefore, 1) they cannot but confess that these books, about which there is so great a controversy between us and them, were never in the number of those which the Jewish church venerated as divine and canonical. 2) Whence, we ask, did the Christians receive the scripture of the O.T.? Was it not from the Jews? since to them were entrusted τα λόγια του Θεου (the oracles of God), Rom. 3:2. It must be affirmed or denied that these writings were in the canon under the auspices of the N.T. If this is so, they were certainly in the Jewish canon, for there was then no other besides the Jewish; But if otherwise, by what right would it have been permitted for Christians, only now to attribute to them that authority which they always lacked? But they were not in the Jewish canon. This our adversaries grant us. If anyone should perhaps suspect that the Jews, at the time of Christ and the Apostles, or a little before, expunged these books from the canon, this would first have to be proven. It could not, however, be proven, except by the most reliable authorities, Christ and His Legates, who surely would not have passed over such perfidy of men without grave reprehension. Then the ancient canon, conspicuous for its integrity, would have to be produced. Finally, no one will be able to attain by conjecture any cause for this suspicion. Why could this have come into their minds? What profit would they have made from it? With what plan could they think of removing these books from the canon, which offer some support to the opinion of the Jews, who were vehemently erring in certain false signs of the Messiah (e.g., Sirach 48:10, 11, 12), and not likewise of others, in which there exist the clearest prophecies about Jesus of Nazareth? Augustine himself indeed seems to have approved the same distinction, if indeed he, in The City of God, Book XVIII, ch. 36, pronounces thus: "The books of the Maccabees are held as canonical not by the Jews, but by the church." But it is plainly apparent that he used the name of canonical book in a broader scope, namely, of an ecclesiastical book, which is accustomed to be read in sacred assemblies, and does not provide a rule of doctrine to the hearers for certain knowledge, but an example of life for imitation. He expressly adds: "on account of the passions of the Martyrs." Elsewhere, that great Doctor openly and plainly professes that he holds no other canon of the O.T. than the Jewish one, Book XVII of The City of God, ch. 20: "Those things are less firm," he says, "which are not written in the Jewish canon." In the same place, he manifestly discerns that authority which the church, especially the western, attributed to the book of Wisdom, as also to Sirach, from the canonical authority by which those three books, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs, were received by the church. In another place, Book XII against Faustus the Manichean, ch. 23, these are his words: "What else is the nation of the Jews today, but the librarians of the Christians, carrying the Law and the Prophets, for the testimony of the assertion of the gospel." And not even this should be passed over in silence, that by the custom of the ancient Doctors the apocryphal books were sometimes called sacred, and even divine. But they understood this name in the sense that sacred and divine are distinguished from human; but in that very way that profane are opposed to them. For this reason they were called sacred, and also divine, because they were used for sacred purposes, even at that time when they were engaged in the public exercise of divine worship. In this manner JEROME in his preface to Proverbs passed this sentence on the apocryphal books of the O.T.: that they are useful for the edification of the church, not for confirming the authority of dogmas.

enumerates and approves the biblical canon of the Old Testament in the same manner, order, and number as our church does. For the synod of Laodicea, gathered from various provinces of Asia around the year of Christ 364, protects in every way the biblical canon which we hold. Of the most ancient fathers, MELITO, bishop of Sardis, around the year of Christ 150, having set out to the east for the purpose of investigating this matter, could not find a canon different from ours, as EUSEBIUS reports in book IV, H. E., ch. XXV. Subscribing to Melito are ORIGEN in the proem to the Psalms, and JEROME in the prologus galeatus, as well as other Greek and Latin fathers. Conf. HILDEBRAND in instit. theol., p. 65.

Obs. II. There are also other apocryphal writings, which come under this name because they are to be completely hidden, and not to be read to the people in church, since they are fabulous, absurd, and impious; such as are the gospel of Peter, Thomas, Nicodemus, the apocalypse of Peter; the acts of Paul, the shepherd of Hermas, etc. See EUSEBIUS, book III, H. E., ch. 3.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, who maintain that the book of Tobit, Wisdom, Sirach, etc., should be numbered among the canonical books; who wish their opinion to be fortified by the following arguments:

I. The books of Maccabees are received by the Jews themselves. Therefore, they are canonical. Response: The books of Maccabees are received by the Jews as historical, not as θεόπνευστοι (God-breathed).

II. From which books dogmas of faith are proven, those are canonical. From the book of Wisdom, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear, because the immortality of the first man is proven from Wisdom 2:24: "By the envy of the devil death entered the world." Response: A distinction is made between apodictic and topical proof. The latter can be sought from the apocryphal books, which is added for the sake of abundant illustration to apodictic arguments. The immortality of the first man is proven apodictically from Gen. 2:17; Rom. 5:12.

III. The book of Wisdom is cited in the New Testament by Paul in Rom. 11:34, 1 Cor. 2:16: "Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?" Which words are read in Wisdom 9:13. Therefore, the book of Wisdom is canonical. Response: 1) A bare allegation does not make a book canonical. The writings of Aratus are cited in Acts 17:18, of Menander in 1 Cor. 15:33, of Epimenides in Titus 1:12. Would anyone dare to call them canonical? 2) The words of Paul are taken from Isa. 40:7-8.

IV. Whichever writer of the Old Testament testified of Jesus, he was endowed with the prophetic spirit, and his writing is canonical. But Sirach, etc. Therefore. The major is established from Acts 10:43. The minor is clear from ch. 43:25 of Sirach, where this author uses the following words: "In his word the wind was silent, and by his thought he placated the abyss, and the Lord Jesus planted it." Response: No light error has been committed in the common Latin version. Concerning this, HUGO GROTIUS on this cited place: "how much scribes sin through ignorance or a perverse study of religion, you may understand from this place. For some have written: καὶ ἐφύτευσεν αὐτὴν Ἰησοῦς (and Jesus planted it), which has crept into some Latin copies: plantavit illam dominus Iesus (the Lord Jesus planted it). The words of the Greek text are these: Sir. 43:24. Ἐν λογισμῷ αὐτοῦ ἐκόπασεν ἄβυσσον, καὶ ἐφύτευσεν ἐν αὐτῇ νήσους (By his word he calmed the abyss, and planted islands in it). It is clear therefore, that for νήσους (islands) was written by some through error: Ἰησοῦς (Jesus).

V. The Pontificians object that the biblical canon of the books of the O.T. received by the Roman church is most ancient. For this canon is found in the Council of Trent, Session IV, and the fathers of that council received it by tradition from Pope Eugene, in the Council of Florence, as can be seen in BARTH. CARANZA in his summary of councils. In turn, Eugene received it from Pope Gelasius in the Council of Rome, as is clear from tom. II of the councils, in the decree of Gelasius, near the end. Again, Gelasius from Augustine, book 2 of De Doctrina Christiana, ch. VIII, and Augustine from the Third Council of Carthage, which some call the fifth, others the sixth. Finally, the fathers of this council from Innocent, epistle III, to Exuperius, ch. VII. But Innocent lived in the year of Christ 402. From that time, therefore, of the primitive church, down to us, the same canon of scripture which the pontificians now hold and embrace has persevered through continuous tradition. Response: From this discourse of the pontificians it is gathered that they cannot produce any witness for their opinion from the first four centuries of the primitive church, since it is established that Pope Innocent I lived in the fifth century. But if the pontificians were to prove their canon from antiquity, it would have to be sought from the Israelite church contemporary with the prophets, which saw their autographs and approved and received them as θεόπνευστα (God-breathed). To this is added that in that discourse of the pontificians there are many things partly uncertain, partly false. For we reject the decree of the Council of Trent; since in it the Roman pontiff was actor, defendant, and judge. Nor does the Council of Florence possess authority; inasmuch as it was celebrated only in the 15th century by Eugene, who had been deposed from pontifical authority by a decree of the Council of Basel. The Council of Rome under Gelasius is too distant from the Council of Florence, namely by nearly ten centuries, so that the continuation of that canon seems openly gaping. The Council of Carthage has an older one, namely Laodicea, which fights for our canon. It is furthermore false that the pontifical canon was defined in the Council of Florence. Only Bartholomeus Caranza affirms this; Surius does not have it, nor Carolinus, nor the tomes of the councils; Antoninus himself, Archbishop of Florence, contemporary with that council, approves our canon.

VI. The Pontificians distinguish between the canon of the Jews and of the Christians, pretending that the controverted books are not indeed in the canon of the Jews, but are nevertheless in that of the Christians, who on account of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, which was promised to the church, could add them to the canonicals. Response: Christians neither can nor ought to accept other prophetic books than those which they have received from the Jews, to whom they were entrusted, Rom. 3:2. The Christian church does not make canonical books, but only testifies concerning them. The assistance of the Holy Spirit was promised to the church not absolutely, but hypothetically, inasmuch as it does not deflect from the means through which the Holy Spirit operates.

Question XLI. Is the biblical canon so perfect without defect that no canonical book has perished?

The integrity of the biblical canon. The biblical canon persists so whole and unharmed to this very day, that not even one book divinely destined for the normal use of faith and morals, and received by the primitive church, has perished.

Proof I. Divine providence has watched over the θεόπνευστοις (God-breathed) and canonical books so much, that it has not allowed even an apex of the law to perish, Matth. 5:17. Therefore, much less has it permitted that entire books should perish.

II. John the theologian closed and sealed the entire canon, so that under penalty of eternal damnation nothing can be added or diminished. Apoc. 22:19.

III. The church would not have been a diligent and faithful treasurer and guardian of the deposit entrusted to it, if it had not carefully seen to it that all the canonical books were propagated to posterity unharmed and whole.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians asserting that certain canonical books have perished. For according to their mind, there has perished I. The Book of Enoch, which St. Jude mentions in his epistle v. 14. II. The Book of the Wars of the Lord. Num. 21:14. III. The Book of the Just. Josh. 10:13, 2 Sam. 1:18. IV. The Book of the Judgment of the Kingdom. 1 Sam. 10:25. V. The Book of Solomon, 1 Kings 4:32. VI. The Book of the Words of the Days of Solomon. 1 Kings 11:41. Also the Book of the Sayings of the Days of Judah and Israel. 1 Kings 14:19. VII. The Books of the prophets Nathan and Gad. 1 Chron. 29:26. VIII. The Lamentations of Jeremiah on account of King Josiah. 2 Chron. 35:25. IX. The first Epistle to the Corinthians. 1 Cor. 5:9. For the apostle says: "I wrote to you in the epistle, not to associate with fornicators." X. The Epistle of the Laodiceans. Col. 4:16. Response: a) In general, by distinguishing between sacred and canonical books. Not all sacred books were written for the purpose of constituting a perpetual canon of faith and morals; these could perish with God permitting it. But the canonical books were divinely destined and commended to the church as a perpetual canon of things to be believed and done, which through divine providence could not be lost. The books which the pontificians claim to have been lost were either not canonical, or, if they were in the canon, we deny that they perished, but we believe they exist today in the biblical canon under other names.

Response: b) In particular, to I. St. Jude makes mention of the prophecy of Enoch, but does not assert that it had been committed to letters. Therefore, it became known to this apostle by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. To II. The Book of the Wars of the Lord was not a prophetic or canonical book, but a political one, in which the wars of the Lord waged by the Israelites were described; which perished without diminishing the biblical canon. To III. By סֵפֶר הַיֵּשָׁר (the book of the upright), some understand a political book on law and office; some, a book of forensic annals, which perished while the biblical canon was safe. To IV. The Book of the Judgment of the Kingdom is found in 1 Sam. 8. But if it was different from this, it was never in the canon. To V. Solomon is said to have uttered 3000 sentences. By these sentences are understood the proverbs of Solomon, all or the greater part of which are extant today. If anyone should contend that there were other sentences than these which survive, we say that they were never in the canon; just as the sentences of Solomon on physical matters were never inserted into the biblical canon. To VI. The book of the words of the days of Judah and Israel was either the book of chronicles, or was never received into the canon (*). To VII. Nathan and Gad recorded the books of Samuel and Kings. To VIII. In the place cited, mention is made of the lamentation of Jeremiah for king Josiah; but that it was committed to letters is not asserted. To IX. The apostle says: Ἐγράψα ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ (I wrote to you in this epistle); therefore, this very prior epistle is understood. To X. It is not said to have been written and sent πρὸς τοὺς ἐν Λαοδικείᾳ (to those in Laodicea), but written ἐκ Λαοδικείας (from Laodicea), which is the first to Timothy, whose subscription is: Ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Λαοδικείας (It was written from Laodicea) (**).

Question XLII. Is the biblical canon, or the authentic Hebrew text in the Old, and Greek in the New Testament, preserved pure and uncorrupted?

The incorruption of the biblical canon.

With the watchful care of a provident God, the biblical canon has been preserved so unblemished and pure in all and every word (a), that neither has the Hebrew text of the O.T. been depraved by the malice of the Jews (b), nor has the Greek text of the N.T. been falsified by the perfidy of heretics (c), nor has the original text in all copies been corrupted by the carelessness or ignorance of transcribers (d).

Proof a. From the words of Christ in Matthew 5:18: "For amen I say to you, until heaven and earth pass away, one iota, or one little horn will not pass away from the law, until all things are done." Concerning the Savior's words, we observe 1) the occasion. The Jews were accusing Christ, as if he were abolishing the law; but Christ protests that he has not come to dissolve, but to fulfill the law. As certain as it is, therefore, that the law was not abolished by Christ, so unharmed does the integrity of scripture persist. 2) Christ's assertion; who gravely affirms that no apex, no iota can perish. Therefore neither the letters, of which the smallest among the Hebrews is the iota, nor the vowel points, which are called κεραῖαι or little horns, can perish. Confer D. CALOV. in bibl. illustr., on this place, fol. 187. 3) The comparison of scripture with heaven and earth. Sooner will the great fabric of heaven and earth be dissolved, than there will be a place for a universal corruption of the sacred letters. 4) The certainty of the universal fulfillment of scripture. From which the following argument is sought: If we cannot be certain of the fulfillment of the divine word unless Holy Scripture is whole, it is necessary that it be kept whole. But the former is true. Therefore also the latter. 5) The reason of divine providence; which is the foundation of Christ's assertion, for if the word of God were not preserved whole, neither could the church stand, which rests on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Eph. 2:20.

(*) But as to that place, 1 Kings 11:41, it should be carefully observed that in the Hebrew codex it is not written סֵפֶר דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים (the book of the chronicles) but thus דְּבָרֵי שְׁלֹמֹה (the acts of Solomon). But by this name without that addition, the Chronicles, as they are commonly called, are never wont to be denoted. It is very likely that the book of Coheleth (Ecclesiastes) is signified, since its beginning is this דְּבָרֵי קְהֵלֶת (The words of the Preacher). To be sure, in the most ancient manner, the Hebrews were accustomed to derive the title of each book from its first word, just as they name Genesis סֵפֶר בְּרֵאשִׁית (the book 'in the beginning'). The matter itself certainly speaks. In this book, namely Coheleth, Solomon copiously commemorated his deeds, and at the same time published an illustrious document of his wisdom. That, therefore, is the book to which the sense of the words in that place, 1 Kings 11:41, best agrees.

(**) Although faith is not safely to be placed in the subscription, as its author is uncertain; yet it is not to be rashly solicited. The coherence of the words in Colossians 4:16 & 17 confirms it, which does not allow us to doubt that Paul signified letters of such a kind, whose subject matter was pastoral. But the first epistle to Timothy is entirely of such a kind. A doubt, not a light one, indeed arises from Coloss. 2:1. But what prevents us from thinking that Paul, having once stayed as a guest in that city, wished to remain unknown?

Proof b. The Jews could neither corrupt the Hebrew text, nor did they wish to. That they could not, is gathered both from the dispersion of the Jews throughout the whole world, and from the huge multitude of biblical codices transcribed in various places and transported most widely through very many provinces. For how could the Jews, dispersed through the most remote intervals of the earth, convene and conspire to deprave so many thousands of biblical exemplars found everywhere in this universe of things? Nor did the Jews wish to corrupt the Hebrew text, whether you consider the times before the birth of Christ, or number the centuries after Christ was manifested in the flesh. That they were motivated to be falsifiers of the scriptures before the birth of Christ is clear from the fact that they are commended as depositaries of good faith, to whom τὰ λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ (the oracles of God) had been entrusted, Rom. 3:2. From this it happened that Christ and the apostles stimulated us to the assiduous scrutiny of the prophetic scripture, John 5:39; Luke 16:29; Acts 15:21; 1 Tim. 4:13, and from it they proved the celestial doctrine; who surely would never have been silent about a falsification of the Hebrew text undertaken by the Jews. Nor did the Jews after the birth of Christ wish to corrupt the Hebrew codices. This is clear from the oracles concerning the Messiah published in the O.T., which are unharmed to this day. If the Jews had begun a plan of falsifying the Hebrew codex, they would certainly have attacked with headlong impetus the prophecies concerning Christ, and would have either stolen them from the Hebrew codex, or at least interpolated them. But the prophecies concerning Christ are still read in the Hebrew codex in the same words in which they are cited by Christ and the apostles. Therefore, the Jews never intended to deprave the Hebrew text of the Old Testament. PHILO, in his book on the departure of the sons of Israel from Egypt, and from him EUSEBIUS, book 3, H. E., ch. X, testify that up to their times, for a space of more than two thousand years, not even one word had ever been changed in the law of the Hebrews, and that any Jew would rather die a hundred times than suffer the law to be changed in anything.

Proof c. 1) That the Greek text of the New Testament was not corrupted by the perfidy of heretics is established from the fact that the church is built equally upon the foundation of the apostles as upon the foundation of the prophets, according to Eph. 2:20. But just as the foundation of the prophets, so also that of the apostles is firm and solid. But it would not be firm if the apostolic writings were corrupt; nor would the Greek scripture of the New Testament be an infallible norm of faith if it were falsified. 2) Because the industry of catholic doctors opposed the perfidy of heretics, never permitting the corruption of the sacred text.

Proof d. Amanuenses, transcribers, or librarians could not by a universal corruption deprave all the Hebrew exemplars, the universal corruption being averted by the Masora, which, as BUXTORF defines it in Tiberias, ch. II, p. 6, is a critical doctrine ingeniously invented by the ancient wise men of the Hebrews concerning the Hebrew text of Holy Scripture, by which its verses, words, and letters are numbered, and all their variety is noted, and indicated in their places with the recitation of individual verses, so that its constant and genuine reading may be preserved, and be eternally preserved from all change or corruption, and be validly fortified. Nor could the transcribers adulterate all the Greek exemplars. For the Christian church, which is the στῦλος καὶ ἑδραῖωμα τῆς ἀληθείας (pillar and seat of the truth), 1 Tim. 3:15, has always fostered and nourished in its bosom men most learned in Greek, who have fixed all their care and effort on vindicating the divine text from creeping errors or corruptions.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, with whom in part agree the Socinians, Arminians, and Anabaptists, asserting that the Hebrew and Greek text has suffered various corruptions, and that for this reason we should by no means appeal to turbidly flowing fountains; who rely on the following arguments:

I. Certain things seem to be lacking in the Hebrew text, e.g., Exod. 2:22. For the historical account of the other son of Moses is omitted, which in the version of the LXX Interpreters and the Vulgate, and also in the German version of Luther, is had in these words: "He also begot another, and called his name Eliezer, saying: The God of my father has helped me, and delivered me from the hand of Pharaoh." Response: a) Cajetan confesses that this verse is superfluous, the Louvainists note it with an asterisk, Robert Stephanus rejects it, D. Luther inserted it only in parenthesis. b) The Greek and Latin versions are not the rule of authentic truth in the Hebrew text. For judgment is not to be made concerning the fount from the streams, but on the contrary, judgment should rather be made concerning the streams from the fount. c) The Hebrew text has that verse in a fitting place, Exod. 18:4. For Gershom, the son of Moses, had preceded his brother Eliezer by many years; in which years the Israelites looked to God, and God in turn to them. But Eliezer was born towards the end of those years, and was still ἀπεριτομητος (uncircumcised) when Moses was preparing himself for the return to Egypt. See GERH. in exeg., § 332, & conf. D. GLASS. in Phil S. lib. 1, tract. I, p. m. 54.

II. The Jews have in Ps. 22:17 כָּאֲרִי (like a lion), when however the seventy Greek interpreters have the word ὠρυξαν (they dug), and the Latin Vulgate: Foderunt manus meas & pedes meos (They have pierced my hands and my feet). It is very likely that the Jews depraved this text so that there would not exist in the O.T. a prophecy concerning the crucifixion of Christ. This reading of the Hebrew text is genuine and immune from all error, and can be most conveniently explained by the participle: "piercing," as D. Sebastian Schmid has rendered it in his Latin translation of the bible. For כָּאֲרִי is from the root כּוּר, which indeed is not found in the sacred codex, but yet can easily be restored both from the collected roots כרה and כּוּר and from the Arabic root كار or from the conjugated voice כּוּר which denotes a basin or a metallic furnace, which can not inconveniently be said from digging. Furthermore, from בּוּר analogically in the Benoni participle is בּוּר, plural, בּוּרִים, by epenthesis בּוּרִים, conf. Ezech. 28:24, Zach. 14:10. Whence by apocope כּוּרִי, it is said לְכּוּרִי. Therefore כָּאֲרִי is a plural Benoni participle, for כָּאֲרִים with the epenthesis of א and apocope, to be explained: "piercing." Confer. D. PFEIFFER in dub. vex p. m. 673.

III. Psalm 19:5 has קוֹלָם (their line), when however St. Paul in Rom. 10:18, following the LXX version, has, φθόγγος αὐτῶν (their sound). Response: The psalmist by line understands a sonorous line, or that tract through which sound is heard. For in v. 4 he expressly says מְרִיָּקָם א (their speech), and in this explanatory verse is added מְלִיקָם (their words). Therefore, by line is understood that through which the voice is conceived to pass, be carried, and be heard; which is, as it were, the vehicle of the voice to the ears. For which reason it is the same in sense, whether it is said that the voice itself passes, or that the line carrying the voice is extended. St. Paul respected the sense, and cited the LXX version not as authentic, but because it was then most used and most received.

IV. Isa. 9:6, it is read in the Hebrew text יִקְרָא (he will call), but the Vulgate has: vocabitur (he will be called); as if formerly in the fount it was: יִקְרָא (he will be called). The form יִקְרָא is to be rendered impersonally: und man wird nennen (and one will call). A suitable nominative can also be added, in this manner: Every faithful person will call. Confer. GLASSIVS in philol. S. lib. III, tract. III, can. XXIII, p. m. 594.

V. Jer. 23:6, it is read: יִקְרָא (he will call him), which in the Vulgate is rendered: vocabunt eum (they will call him), as if in the fount it was: יִקְרָאוּ (they will call him). Response: It should likewise be rendered impersonally: man wird ihn nennen (one will call him). A suitable nominative can be added: every faithful person will call him.

VI. In the conflagration of the temple and the city of Jerusalem, excited by the Chaldeans, all the biblical books were consumed by fire; which Ezra, inspired by the divine Spirit, restored, and dictated to five men; by whom it was often erred, as Ezra dictated very quickly, see the book of IV Esdras ch. XIV, 14, seqq. Response: The book of Esdras, from which the proof is sought, is apocryphal in the highest degree. Therefore, we are not led by its testimony to believe that all biblical exemplars perished by fire. For this is opposed by a) the ever-watchful care of the eternal deity, which most wisely took care that not one iota or apex of the divine word should perish, Matth. 5:18. β) The multitude of biblical exemplars. γ) The testimony of Daniel, who read the scriptures during the Babylonian captivity, Dan. 9:2. δ) The purity of the Hebrew codex.

Ezra would certainly have dictated the codex in the language then in use among the people of God, namely Chaldean, or a mixture of the language of the Chaldeans and Hebrews; when yet the codex exists written in the purest Hebrew language. The Hebrew canon was preserved, while Antiochus raged, who zealously labored to have all the books of the Hebrews burned, 1 Macc. 1:56. How much more so in the Babylonian captivity? since the Chaldeans did not proceed with that savagery with which Antiochus was seized.

VII. 1 Cor. 15:47, in the Greek text it is read: Ὁ δεύτερος ἄνθρωπος ὁ Κύριος ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (The second man is the Lord from heaven); But in the Vulgate it is read: Secundus homo de caelo caelestis (The second man from heaven, heavenly). The Greek text seems to have been depraved by the Marcionites, who denied the human nature of Christ. Response; The Latin version seems to favor the Marcionites more than the Greek text. Certainly, the antithesis of earthly and Lord is stronger than that of earthly and heavenly; since there are many created celestial things; but Lord is said of him who obtains supreme dominion over all. The Syriac and Arabic versions agree with the Greek text.

VIII. Rom. 12:11, in the Greek text it is read: Καὶ ᾧ δουλεύοντες (Serving the time), when however in the Latin version it is read: Domino servientes (Serving the Lord), just as if it were written: Κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες (Serving the Lord). Response; Each reading is analogous to the faith; yet the connection of the text shows that it should be read: Καὶ ᾧ δουλεύοντες (Serving the time), because according to Paul's judgment, one should rejoice with those who rejoice, weep with those who weep, and therefore the circumstance of the time should be taken into account.

IX. In the Greek codex, that celestial oracle concerning the three persons of the divinity is not had. 1 John 5:7. "There are three that bear witness in heaven, etc." Response; That this celestial oracle concerning the three persons of the deity exists in the most ancient Greek codices, D. CALOV. lucidly demonstrates in his bibl. illustrat. on this place, fol. 1664.

X. To the Lord's Prayer, as an appendix, is added that clause, Matth. 6:13, "For thine is the kingdom, etc." which is not had in the Latin version. Response; a) that doxology is found in the most ancient Greek codices. It is read in the Syriac, Arabic, Persian, and Ethiopic versions. b) The Latins omitted it, as it appears, from error, because it is not had in Luke. But the Latin version cannot prejudice the Greek canon.

Question XLIII. Are the vowel points coeval with the Hebrew letters?

On the Hebrew vowel points. The vowel points in the biblical codex of the Old Testament are coeval with the Hebrew consonants.

Proof I. Because no language can be without vowels. Therefore, neither can the Hebrew language. The antecedent is manifest. For vowels are named from vox (voice), because they vivify and, as it were, animate it. From which, vowels are called the souls of voices. But who will believe that the prophets handed down to us a scripture destitute of life? You say: The vowels have always existed coeval with the Hebrew letters as to their value, but not as to their figures; inasmuch as they were added to the sacred text by the Masoretes. Response; We are speaking of written speech; whatever does not exist in this, is not valid. The value of vowels without figures so little helps interpreters that, because of the absence of points, so ambiguous a reading has existed for interpreters that one has read it this way, another that way, as each one was able to attain by conjecture.

Proof II. From the testimony of Christ, asserting in Matthew 5:18 that not one iota, nor one apex, will perish from the law. By which words he joins together both the smallest letter and the smallest point. Therefore, in the time of the visibly present Christ, the vowel points existed written beside the letters.

III. From the perfection of scripture, which is so absolute that it rejects addition no more than diminution, Deut. 4:2. But according to the hypothesis concerning the points being added by the Rabbis, it will necessarily have to be stated that some human addition has accrued to the divinely inspired scripture.

IV. From the Masoretic notes. The Masoretes weighed the existing vowels, and passed judgment concerning them. Therefore, the Masoretes did not invent or devise the vowel points.

V. From the absurd consequences. If the vowel points were not coeval with the Hebrew letters, for many centuries the scripture of the Old Testament was ambiguous and obscure. For with the points absent, the letters can be read in various ways. The LXX interpreters gravely erred in translating the Hebrew text, because, according to the opinion of many, they were destitute of a pointed codex.

The Antithesis is that of both the Pontificians and the Critics, Rabbi Elias Levita, Grotius, Erpenius, Ludovicus Capellus, Walton, and others, whose stronger arguments are:

I. What the LXX interpreters did not use, did not exist at that time. But, the LXX interpreters did not use a pointed codex. Therefore, a pointed codex did not exist then. The major is proven, because the LXX interpreters were men outstanding in honesty of life, age, and prudence in the laws, according to the testimony of Aristæus, p. m. 31, invited by King Ptolemy with most ample gifts to an accurate and concordant interpretation of the divine law; who would undoubtedly have used a pointed codex, and a most accurate one at that, if at that time vowel points had been written beside the letters. The minor can be proven at length; but on this occasion we will only adduce Gen. 47:31, where the Hebrew text has: וַיִּשְׁתַּחוּ שְׂרָאֵל עַל-רֹאשׁ הַמֶּטֶה The LXX rendered it: Καὶ προσεκύνησεν Ἰσραὴλ ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ. The Hebrew words are rendered in Latin: tum incurvavit se Israel super caput lecti (then Israel bowed himself upon the head of the bed). The Greek words, which Paul cited in Hebr. 11:21, are expressed in Latin: & adoravit super summum baculi ipsius (and he worshipped, leaning on the top of his staff). This translation of the LXX interpreters is a not obscure indication that they lacked a pointed codex. For the Hebrew word מֶטֶה, according to the different position of the vowel points, denotes both a bed and a staff; if you write מֶטֶה, a bed; if you write מֵטֶה, a staff. Since, however, in all pointed codices it is constantly read מֶטֶה to designate a bed, and nevertheless the LXX translated this Hebrew word by ῥάβδος (staff), it is easy to gather that they handled a Hebrew codex marked with no points. Response: 1) An invalid argument is sought from the version of the seventy Greek interpreters. For there are grave authors who state that the ancient version of the seventy interpreters has completely perished, among whose opinion are Pagninus, Vatable, Drusius, and others; others think that the ancient version of the LXX does indeed survive, but not purely flowing, but in many ways disturbed. The words of Cardinal BELLARMINE, book II of De Verbo Dei, ch. VI, fol. m. 82, are worthy of mention. "I think it probable that that version of the seventy interpreters survives, but so corrupt and vitiated that it seems to be entirely different." I add our own D. PFEIFFER, in Dubia Vexata, writing gravely on p. 41: "Which is not to be so understood, as if in the age of the seventy interpreters no pointed exemplars existed, or they did not have such; but because they sometimes deliberately neglected the present points, which the Talmudists also do from a wrong hypothesis concerning various literal senses nesting in the text itself (by slightly changing the points)." What if we should say that this version proceeded from ἀνεβραϊοῖς (un-Hebraic) men, but not from the seventy interpreters, since the version which is circulated under their name is so interpolated that you can now scarcely pronounce what is indubitably from them, and what is less so. 2) D. WASMUTH asserts other causes for the discrepancy of that version from the Hebrew text; namely, that the LXX used paraphrastic liberty, being little concerned about the words, and strove only to express a convenient sense; that their translation was chiefly made from the Samaritan codex; that pointed codices were rarer then on account of the greater difficulty of writing; or even if pointed codices could perhaps have been had, they nevertheless held that more abstruse doctrine of points and accents then as a part of the oral law received from Moses, which they considered a crime to reveal to foreigners and Gentiles. See WASMUTH. in vindic. hebr. I, p. 116.

II. The present-day unpointed volume of the law is in the highest esteem among the Jews, which they preserve with the greatest religion in their synagogues, and do not present it to be seen by the people without sacred horror. By which they wish to adumbrate the primeval Pentateuch of Moses, likewise destitute of vowels. I respond with the words of WASMUTH, 1. c. p. 135. This custom was introduced among the Jews only from that time, from which, through the discovered צירופים (multiple cabalistic combinations), the abuse of the Cabala and the perverse study of twisting scripture into various senses arose. This is manifestly detected from these words of R. Bechai on Num. 11:5: "For this reason we were ordered not to point the book of the law." By whom they were ordered, he does not add; but he subjoins the reason (not this, that Moses also wrote the law thus, but) because a pointed word admits only one sense; but from an unpointed word a man can understand and find many, and those admirable and excellent, senses.

III. Vowel points are not absolutely necessary for those reading the Hebrew codex, provided they accurately observe the construction and the servile letters. In other languages the variation of conjugation and declension resides principally in the vowels, but in the Hebrew language it depends on the servile letters. Wherefore it is consistent with reason that the Israelites read the prophetic writings without points. Response: 1. although vowel points are not absolutely necessary for reading some Hebrew writing, they nevertheless contribute not a little to the certainty and perspicuity of Holy Scripture. For with the points removed, the Hebrew text is rendered liable to ambiguity and obscurity. E.g., if one writes דבר, this Hebrew word can be understood as: my pestilence, my word, my words, and in regimen, words of. But if the vowel points are added, that ambiguity immediately expires.

Question XLIV. Does the power of judging belong to Holy Scripture?

The power of judging of Holy Scripture. The power of judging belongs to Holy Scripture, both inasmuch as it is the voice of the supreme judge, the Holy Spirit, who speaks through scripture, and through it adjudicates all controversies and pronounces His sentence (a), and inasmuch as it is the primary and adequate norm, which a lower judge, in discerning true from false, good from evil, is bound to respect and attentively observe (b).

Obs. I. Theologians distinguish between a judge judging αυτοκρατορικῶς (autocratically), κανονικῶς (canonically), and διακονικῶς (ministerially). The αυτοκρατορικῶς (autocratic) judge, supreme, absolute, and independent in all controversies of faith, is the triune God, Father, Son, and ιδιοποιητικῶς (by appropriation), the Holy Spirit. The κανονικῶς (canonical), or ὀργανικῶς (organic), directive and instrumental judge is Holy Scripture. The διακονικῶς (ministerial) judge is either public, namely the ecclesiastical ministry, to which belongs the prophetic judgment, or exegetical, of interpreting Holy Scripture; or private, namely every man illuminated and reborn by the word of God, to whom belongs the δοκιμαστικὸν (testing) or discriptive judgment. 1 Cor. 10:15, 1 Thess. 5:19.

Obs. II. The word judge in a stricter sense denotes a person judging; taken in a broader sense, it also includes the voice of the judge and the norm which he respects in judging. In which sense ARISTOTLE said in book 5 to Nicomachus, ch. IV: "To go to the judge is to go to the law." For a judge seems to be nothing else than animate law. And CICERO in book III of his Laws: "The law is a silent magistrate, just as a magistrate is a speaking law." Hence D. DORSCHÉUS in Thoma Confessore Veritatis, p. 29, says: "Holy Scripture judges as a canonical judge, and through it the Holy Spirit as a hypostatic judge."

Obs. III. Holy Scripture judges (a) directly, as a canon and norm, which a lower judge must respect, and to which, in judging, he is bound to confirm his sentence, which he pronounces concerning an arisen controversy of faith. In this sense Holy Scripture is called a canonical, normal, and directive judge, because it directs the lower judge, namely the minister of the church and every reborn man, lest he err in judging, like a norm and a level. (b) Definitively, because as the voice of the supreme judge it composes litigating parties, defines doubts of religion, and settles controversies. (c) Effectively, inasmuch as Holy Scripture is a most efficacious ὄργανον (instrument), medium, and sword of the Holy Spirit, by which it penetrates the heart of man, subdues the fierce soul, and convinces the consciences of the litigating parties.

Obs. IV. Although the canonical authority of Holy Scripture has been lucidly proven above; yet here the duty falls upon us of demonstrating that Holy Scripture is the primary and adequate norm for deciding controversies. For although those on the opposing side concede that Holy Scripture is a norm of things to be believed and done, they nevertheless deny that Holy Scripture is a universal, total, and primary norm.

Proof a. (1) Whoever is the author of sacred scripture, he judges best of all concerning its sense and all the dogmas contained in it. But God, etc. 2 Tim. 3:16. Therefore. (2) Whoever convicts the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, he is the supreme judge in spiritual matters. But the Holy Spirit, etc. John 16:8. Therefore. (3) Whoever was the judge of controversies at the time of the nascent Christian church in the apostolic council, he is today in all councils the supreme judge. But the Holy Spirit speaking through the scriptures, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Acts 15:28, where the apostles pronounce the decisive sentence of the apostolic council in the following words: "It has seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us." The ministerial judges in the apostolic council were the apostles and presbyters of the church of Jerusalem, and other pious men, Acts 15:6, 22, 23. The supreme judge was the Holy Spirit, speaking through the scriptures. For James confirmed the suffrage of Peter solely from the prophetic oracles, saying: "And with this the words of the prophets agree; as it is written (Amos 9:11)." Therefore, the Holy Spirit judged in the apostolic council through the prophetic scripture; this was the voice of the supreme judge, the Holy Spirit. (4) If God, the supreme judge, through scripture concludes men under sin, surely scripture is the voice of the supreme judge, by which men are convicted of sin. But the former is indubitably true. Therefore also the latter. The antecedent is clear from a comparison of the Pauline sayings, Rom. 11:32, and Gal. 3:22. For God is said to conclude all men in unbelief, that he may have mercy on all, Rom. 11:32. Of scripture it is likewise affirmed that it concludes all things under sin; that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe, Gal. 3:22. Let us hear the interpreter CALOVIUS in bibl. illustr. on Rom. 11:32, fol. 201: "God has concluded all under ἀπειθεία (disobedience), not ἐνεργητικῶς (effectively), by working or effecting unbelief; but ἐλεγκτικῶς (refutingly), by arguing, convincing, and condemning; not αἰτιατικῶς (causally), but δικαστικῶς and judicially, by which voice of the law, or legal and judicial sentence, all men are accused as guilty, are convicted of sin, and are condemned on account of sin, and as if confined in prison, are held captive, slaves of eternal condemnation," Deut. 27:26. (5) Christ himself assigns the parts of a judge to his word, John 12:48: "He who rejects me, and does not receive my words, has one who judges him; the word that I have spoken, that will judge him on the last day." In whatever way the word of Christ will judge on the last day, in the same way it judges in this age. But it will judge on the last day by convincing the consciences of sinners. Therefore, it obtains the same judicial power in this age.

Proof b. That Holy Scripture is the adequate and primary norm, according to which all dogmas of faith and precepts of morals are to be judged, is clear 1. From the Pauline statement, Gal. 6:16: "As many as walk by this canon, peace (will be) upon them, and mercy." On p. 136, we have shown that by this apostolic saying written to the Galatians, Holy Scripture, a compendium of which this epistle presents to us, is rightly understood. Now we argue: Whatever word suffices for obtaining grace and peace from God for all who run the right way of faith and piety, that is an adequate norm of things to be believed and done. But the word of God revealed, and by the prophets and apostles committed to letters, is etc. Therefore.

2. From the prophetic oracle, Isa. 8:19-20: "And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep, and that mutter: (I answer) should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead? (Therefore) to the law and to the testimony (shall they seek); if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Obs. (1) The prophet's scope was to forewarn the pious from the superstition and idolatry of those who went to consult pythons and soothsayers about doubtful matters. The prophet seriously exhorts the people of God away from this superstition, with an argument drawn from right and equity: Should not a people seek their God? as if to say: Is it not right that every people should consult their God, whom they are persuaded to foreknow the future. The prophet illustrates his argument by the contrary, saying: For the living to the dead? q.d. Is it not unjust and absurd, for the salvation of the living to consult the dead (whether you understand idols, or the spirits of the deceased) who know nothing, can help in nothing? (2) The prophet concludes: Therefore they shall seek the law and the testimony. The law and the testimony is the Mosaic law and the entire scripture, in which God could be consulted, so that the sense is: If you wish to be certain about doubtful cases and uncertain future events, do not go to pythons and diviners, but to the law and the testimony, in which you have clearly what you ought to do, what to omit, so that you can certainly expect salutary events. (3) The prophet subjoins a threat: If they do not speak this word, i.e., if the doctors, or your fathers, do not send the people away to the law and the testimony of God, and the people do not obey; then there will be no dawn for that people, or light of that salutary wisdom, and the good and felicity proceeding from it, whether temporal or spiritual. From the prophet's words thus explained we argue; To whatever alone the entire people is sent away and obligated in resolving doubts concerning salvation, that is the sole and adequate norm, according to which all doubts moved concerning the salvation of man are to be examined and resolved. But to the Mosaic law and the testimony of scripture, etc. Therefore. The minor can be more amply confirmed by the words of Abraham, with which he instructed the rich banqueter; "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them," Luke 16:29; exactly as if he were saying; the adequate rule for rightly performing penitence is the Mosaic and prophetic scripture.

3. From the apostolic testimony, with which Timothy is adorned, 2 Tim. 3:15-16, which see explained above! For it is easily applied to the norm of things to be believed and done, provided that in place of the adequate principle of theology is substituted the adequate norm of faith and morals.

4. What alone by Christ, the apostles, and other saints was held as the norm of controversies of faith, that even now is the sole norm of faith, and that a primary one. But sacred scripture is that, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because no other norm than that which was used by Christ, the apostles, and other saints for controversies can be used today. For just as at the time of Christ and the apostles and in our time the same things are to be believed and done; so also the same norm is to be used. The minor is proven by the example of Christ, disputing with the Pharisees and Sadducees from scripture, Matth. 19, and referring the Jews to scripture, John 5:39. The same is clear from the example of the apostles, Acts 25:12, where Paul asserts that he said nothing beyond the prophets and Moses. Similarly Stephen in Acts 6 disputes solely from the scriptures. The Bereans daily searched the scriptures, whether these things were so, which Paul taught, Acts 17:1.

The Antithesis is 1. of the Pontificians, opining that sacred scripture is a partial norm of controversies of faith, but not the judge. 2. of the Socinians, denying that sacred scripture is the sole rule of faith. 3. of the Arminians, conceding that Holy Scripture is the norm of controversies of faith, but not a judge judging effectively. 4. of the Quakers, denying that Holy Scripture is the primary and universal norm of faith and morals; since they state it to be the dictate of the spirit immediately speaking or revealing internally to each man; although they concede that sacred scripture is a partial, subordinate, secondary, and declaratory norm. Their stronger arguments are the following.

1. The norm of faith is not its judge. But Holy Scripture is the norm of faith. Therefore. Response; (1) The norm of faith is not its αυτοκρατορικὸς (autocratic) and personal judge; I concede; but it is indeed the κανονικὸς (canonical) and directive judge of faith. (2) Sacred scripture is not only the norm which a lower judge respects, but it is also the voice of the superior judge, the Holy Spirit, by which he settles controversies arisen concerning religion through Holy Scripture.

2. If Holy Scripture is not a personal judge, it will not be a judge properly so-called. But if it is not a judge properly so-called, it will not properly and truly judge. Response; If in a stricter sense a judge is said to be a person judging, we admit that sacred scripture is not a judge properly, but improperly so-called (by grammatical, not rhetorical, impropriety). Nor yet for this reason is it to be said that Holy Scripture does not truly judge. For what power of judging belongs to the Holy Spirit originally, that belongs to Holy Scripture participatively; because it is the voice of the supreme judge convincing the conscience, while the Holy Spirit exhibits the sentence so clearly and perspicuously, as certainly as a sentence written before a tribunal, by a visible judge and delivered to the litigating parties, is the voice of the visible judge.

3. Whoever truly judges, can compel the disobedient to obedience. (Otherwise a judgment without execution of the delivered sentence will be a bell without a clapper.) But Holy Scripture cannot compel the disobedient to obedience (because very many spurn the judgment of Holy Scripture). Therefore, Holy Scripture does not truly judge. Response; By distinguishing between external coercion of bodies, and internal of minds, or consciences. Scripture does not compel bodies, but convinces minds and consciences, so that they may submit themselves to the celestial truth; which you will obtain by no political machinations, more easily making a hypocrite than a faithful man. Nor is there reason for you to object that not a few spurn the judgment of Holy Scripture; which they would not do, if scripture judged coercively. For it is established that very many hardened men hold in contempt the judgment of Christ judging with the greatest force and power. Holy Scripture compels not violently, but supernaturally; not by irresistible force, but resistible.

4. Whoever is the judge of controversies of faith, he condemns heretics, so that they confess the sentence to have been passed against them. But the Holy Spirit speaking through Holy Scripture does not so condemn heretics. Therefore, the Holy Spirit speaking through Holy Scripture is not the judge of controversies of faith. I respond by denying the major, and by distinguishing between the λόγον ἔσω καὶ ἔξω (the inner and outer word), between the internal sense of the heart, and the external confession of the mouth. The Holy Spirit speaking through the scriptures condemns heretics, so that in their heart they feel the sentence to have been passed against them; although with their mouth they do not confess that they have been convicted. Add that the Holy Spirit condemns heretics not by name and individually, but generally and fundamentally, by supplying the general foundation of the condemnatory sentence, according to that of John 3:18: "He who does not believe is judged already."

5. A judge properly so called ought to be visible, who can be seen and heard by all who are to be judged. The Holy Spirit speaking through the scriptures is not visible. Therefore. Response: I deny the major, because visibility is not an essential and universal requisite of a judge, but an accidental and particular one. For a judge does not judge insofar as he is visible, but insofar as he is intelligible, or insofar as he issues a sentence which can be perceived. Visibility is required more from a lower than from a superior judge. Thus the Roman pontiff publishes his judgment not immediately, but mediately through heralds, legates, bulls, where yet the pope himself is not seen.

6. Whatever norm is universal for things to be believed and done, that has existed at all times. But Holy Scripture has not existed at all times. Therefore. The major is established, because a norm directing faith and morals not at all times, but only at a certain time, is not universal for all men, but only particular for some. The minor is clear, because Holy Scripture did not exist in the times of the patriarchs. Response: Holy Scripture is called a universal norm not by reason of time, nor by reason of the subject, or the men using that norm, but by reason of the object, because it directs all dogmas of faith within the limits of truth, all precepts of morals within the bounds of sanctity, and discerns them from all false dogmas, and all polluted and imperfect precepts of morals.

Instance: Just as the faith of the patriarchs and ours is one; so there ought to be one principle of faith, one norm of things to be believed. Response: Just as the faith of the patriarchs and ours is one; so there is one principle for generating faith, and one norm, namely the revealed word of God, but the mode of administering the divine revelation is different. For to the patriarchs God inspired His word immediately, and granted them the privilege of longevity, so that they might hand down the celestial doctrine by living voice, without writing, as if by hand to posterity; but because the imagination of the human heart is evil, the purity of the word was not faithfully preserved through the traditions of the living voice, but was corrupted and adulterated, indeed at last plainly lost. For which reason, at the time of Moses, God constituted and showed another way of teaching, namely that by writings approved and confirmed by divine authority and testimony, the purity of the celestial doctrine might be propagated and preserved; lest for questions or controversies, arisen concerning the ancient genuine and pure doctrine of the patriarchs, new and peculiar revelations should always have to be sought and expected; as our CHEMNITZ excellently warns in his examination of the Council of Trent, on the origin and use of the divine word, fol. m. 8.

7. The universal canon of things to be believed and done is infallible. The canon of sacred scripture is not infallible. Therefore, the canon of sacred scripture is not the universal canon of things to be believed and done. The major shines with its own light. The minor is proven, because 1. the church constitutes the canon of scriptures, whose testimony is human and fallible. 2. Certain councils, namely the Third of Carthage, Florentine, and Tridentine, relaxed the biblical canon, and inserted more books, such as the book of Wisdom, Tobit, Maccabees, into the biblical canon; certain councils restricted the canon of scripture, and did not receive the mentioned books into the canon, namely the council of Laodicea and the Sixth of Constantinople. All of which argues for the fallibility of the canon of scripture. Response: a) The biblical canon denotes 1) the rule of faith and morals. 2) The catalogue or series of canonical books. The church, not as a mistress or judge, constitutes the canon of faith, but as a minister, index, and interpreter, historically enumerated and declared by its testimony the catalogue of canonical books. Which testimony, although it is human, no more derogates from the infallibility of the biblical canon than the human testimony of the Samaritan woman borne to Christ detracted from His divine majesty and infallible truth. b) The dissent of the councils concerning the number of canonical books is more verbal than real. For a distinction must be made between the canon παχυλῶς and broadly taken, for the canon of ecclesiastical reading, on account of some edification of morals whatsoever; and the canon strictly and properly accepted, for the canon of confirmation of faith. Augustine, the third council of Carthage, likewise Gelasius and Innocent, Roman Pontiffs, in a looser signification called all books which are usefully read in the church for the emendation of morals, canonical; to which they contradistinguished those apocryphal books which, full of trifles and lies, are to be hidden and rejected. On the contrary, the council of Laodicea, and the Sixth of Constantinople, just as the most ancient fathers, Melito, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome in the prologus galeatus, and others, in a stricter sense called those books canonical, which were immediately, as to words and concepts of things, inspired in the prophets and apostles by the Holy Spirit, and therefore possess infallible canonical authority for segregating the true from the false, the pious from the impious.

8. If Holy Scripture is the infallible norm of faith and morals, it will have that norming power either in the autographs or in the apographs. But not in the autographs of the prophets and apostles; since those do not survive in the church today. Nor in the apographs; since it is not certain to us whether those agree in everything with the autographs, since there are very many variant readings. Response: What divine authority is in the autographs of the prophets and apostles originally, the same is radically in the apographs faithfully transcribed from them; because they contain not only the divine sense, but also those very words which the Holy Spirit inspired and dictated to Moses, the prophets, and the apostles; just as the autographs of the constitutions and recesses of the Romano-Germanic empire, of the Caroline constitution, of the instrument of peace, etc., which are preserved in the archives of the arch-chancellor of the Germanic empire, the elector of Mainz, have never been seen by us, indeed even by very many states of the empire; yet the authority of the apographs, printed by the will and command of the emperor, is so great, that they are held as the very decrees of the Germanic Empire, and disputes arisen in the empire are decided from them. The autographs and originals of the prophets did not exist at the time of Christ and the apostles, who nevertheless appealed to their apographs, and commended their reading to us, which they would never have done unless they had recognized their infallible truth. Nor can variant readings render the canonical authority of scripture doubtful; because it is easy to investigate and gather the genuine reading from the coherence of the text.

9. Every norm is perspicuous and sufficient for proving dogmas. But, Holy Scripture is not perspicuous, but in many places obscure; nor is it sufficient for proving dogmas of faith; otherwise so many books on cases of conscience would not have been written. Response: That sacred scripture, in those things which are necessary for the information of faith and life for a man tending to salvation, is perspicuous, and sufficiently delivers the chief heads of the Christian religion, will be proven below.

10. Every norm is continuous. Holy Scripture is not continuous. Therefore, Holy Scripture is not a norm. The minor is proven, because Holy Scripture is not perpetually occupied in explaining or confirming dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, but inserts into them chronological, genealogical, astronomical, physical, etc. matters. Response: Every architectonic norm is continuous; I concede. For a dogmatic norm it is sufficient that all that it delivers, it refers to one end, either by way of definition and confirmation, or by way of illustration. The chronological, genealogical, astronomical, physical matters which are had in the sacred letters contribute not a little both to interpreting scripture itself, and to illustrating the precepts of faith and morals.

11. Although Holy Scripture can be called a norm of faith, it is not, however, a primary, but a secondary, subordinate, and declaratory norm; since the principal norm is the immediate light or dictate of the Holy Spirit speaking in the heart of a reborn man, teaching him, and suggesting to him the things necessary to be known and done. Response: To call Holy Scripture, which is the word not of men, but of God Himself, 1 Thess. 2:13, the power of God, Rom. 1:16, the mind of Christ, 1 Cor. 2:16, Spirit and life, John 6:63, the seed of our regeneration, 1 Peter 1:23, a secondary, subordinate, and only declaratory norm of things to be believed and done, is a matter of religion for us. On the contrary, that an immediate light or dictate of the Holy Spirit, after the completion of the canon of scripture, can indeed be imagined, but does not really exist, has been lucidly shown above.

Question XLV. Is there a visible judge of controversies of faith in the church?

On the visible judge of controversies. A visible judge is said generally of every discretive judge, who, having applied the judgment of the intellect, distinguishes the true from the false. In which general sense all laymen instructed with aids for explaining Holy Scriptures and handling theological controversies (a), especially all doctors of the church, whose task it is to vindicate the purity of faith from corruptions and to rebuke dissenters (b), all synods and councils, which are for the most part gathered from bishops and doctors of the churches, are judges of controversies of faith (c). But a visible judge specially and strictly so called, namely authoritative and decisive, who would pass sentence by his authority, and by the force of the authority which he possesses, would oblige the litigants, so that they acquiesce in the sentence passed by him without further inquiry, does not exist in the church after the constitution of the canon of scriptures (d).

Proof a. That the discretive dogmatic judgment of faith is in the possession of every reborn man according to the measure of the spirit, is clear 1) from the honorific testimony of St. Paul, with which he adorns the faithful man, 1 Cor. 2:15: "The spiritual man judges all things, but he himself is judged by no one." By the spiritual man is not understood the Roman Pontiff, who certainly did not yet exist while Paul was alive, nor only the pastors of the churches, but every man illuminated by the Holy Spirit, converted, and reborn, who has the mind of Christ and understands the sense of Holy Scripture. He judges all things which Christ has revealed in his gospel, and which are necessary to be known for the worship of God and eternal salvation, i.e., he perceives by the light of faith, and discerns them from the inventions of men. But the reborn man is not judged by the natural man, who is ignorant of the sacred letters, that is, he cannot be convicted of error. For the natural man relies on the principles of reason; but the spiritual man follows scripture as his guide. But what is reason in sacred matters, if not delirium? 2) The same is clear from the general exhortation of Paul addressing all the Corinthians, 1 Cor. 10:15: "Judge for yourselves what I say"; and also the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. 5:21: "Test all things; hold fast what is good." 3) The same is gathered from the scrutiny of sacred scripture, commended to all men to be saved. For the Savior in John 5:39 invites all promiscuously to the diligent reading of scripture, when he says: "Search the scriptures." To whom it is not only permitted, but also seriously enjoined, to read and search the scriptures, it is their duty to weigh with an accurate balance of the mind all dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, whether they are consonant or dissonant with sacred scripture. But that scrutiny of the scriptures is enjoined not only on clerics, but also on laity. The Bereans proved this by their example, searching the scriptures daily, whether these things which Paul had preached about the passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus were so. Acts 17:11.

Proof b. Every doctor of the church ought to rightly divide the word of truth, 2 Tim. 2:15. He ought to be tenacious of that which is according to the doctrine, the faithful word, so that he may be able also to exhort in sound doctrine, and to convict the gainsayers. We argue: He whose it is to rightly divide the word of truth, to exhort the unskilled in sound doctrine, and to rebuke the gainsayers, to him belongs the judgment of the dogmas of faith, both δοκιμαστικὸν (testing) or discretive, and ἐξηγητικὸν (exegetical) or interpretative, and ἐλεγχτικὸν (vindicating) or vindicative.

Proof c. From the acts of the council of Jerusalem, Acts 15. In which council the ἀνυπεύθυνος (unaccountable) and infallible judge was the Holy Spirit. "It seemed good to the Holy Spirit," say the apostles in Acts 15:28. The interpreters of the divine judgment were the θεόπνευστοι (God-breathed) apostles, led into all truth by the Holy Spirit. "It seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us," say the apostles. The presbyters of the church of Jerusalem, and other pious men, were not only witnesses of the business transacted by apostolic authority, but also investigators of the Antiochene cause and ministerial judges. "Then it seemed good to the apostles and presbyters with the whole church," Acts 15:22, 23, who unanimously consulted, cast their votes, and decided, v. 25: "It seemed good to us, being assembled with one accord." Therefore, the decisions of councils, as to the consensus of doctrine and external order, are of great utility; but they do not bind the conscience, unless they are conformable to the norm of the divine word. For they are not praetorian edicts, but the counsels of the wise and the responses of the prudent, to be highly valued by equitable estimators of spiritual matters.

Proof d. (1) After the completion of the canon of Holy Scripture, there are no θεόπνευστοι (God-breathed) men, or instructed with the privilege of immediate divine inspiration. Therefore, after the completion of the canon of Holy Scripture, there is no visible judge in the church immune from the danger of erring. (2) Dictatorial authority in matters of faith neither God nor the church has conceded to any mortal. For if God had conceded it, scripture would testify of so great a height of dignity; or it would send us away to one αὐτόπιστον (self-believing) bishop. But it neither testifies of that, nor does it send us away to a universal visible judge in the church. That the church conceded to one bishop the authority of deciding all controversies of faith does not appear from ecclesiastical antiquity; nor does the church possess such powers that it can transfer the gift of infallibility to one bishop.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, maintaining that the Pope of Rome, viewed as the universal doctor of the church and pronouncing his sentence ex cathedra, is the infallible judge of controversies of faith; although according to their mind the Roman Pontiff can err, as a private person and a particular doctor. But they consider the Pope to pronounce sentence ex cathedra, (a) when he pronounces it with a general council; (β) if outside a general council, with due diligence having been taken beforehand, he pronounces a sentence, having used in support the common rules of faith, which they constitute in the sacred scriptures, apostolic traditions, approved councils, and the consensus of the fathers. The stronger arguments of the Pontificians are the following:

I. In the O.T. all legal controversies which were of greater moment were defined and settled by the high priest, and indeed with irrefragable authority, Deut. 17:8. Therefore in the N.T. also all controversies of faith are to be settled and defined by the Roman Pontiff with irrefragable authority. Response: The consequence vacillates. For (1) in the Old Testament, the high priest was instituted by God, and the power which he used in judging was expressly conferred by God on him and the Levites and priests. But the Roman Pontiff is not constituted by God as the high priest of the universal church, nor is the judicial power which he arrogates to himself above other bishops conceded to him by God. (2) The controversies, of which a judge is constituted in Deut. 17:8, were not controversies of faith, but controversies arisen between brothers, and more difficult practical cases, and that judgment was between blood and blood, leprosy and leprosy, cause and cause, as Deut. 17:8 clearly states. But it is not licit to argue from the legal controversies of the Israelites to the controversies of faith in the church of the N.T. (3) The antecedent is also false. For the judicial power in Deut. 17:8 was not precisely conferred on the high priest, but on the whole college, constituted of several persons. That judicial college consisted both of Levites and priests, over whom the high priest presided, and of a political judge and the elders of the people. That political judge, at the time when the Israelite people were not ruled by kings, but by judges, was the supreme magistrate of the Israelite people; but in the time of the kings, it was he whom the king had designated, so that as a political judge he might be present at the judgment in his name and place. (4) The high priest was not infallible in judging. For he was to be directed by the norm of the law, Deut. 17:11. But every norm norms him who is fallible. And the high pontiff, by condemning the most innocent Christ, erred most gravely.

II. For deciding civil questions a visible authoritative judge is necessary. Therefore, also for questions of faith. Response: The pontificians wrongly conclude from a political judgment to an ecclesiastical judgment, from the decision of civil questions to the decision of controversies of faith. In civil matters, the will of the prince is the supreme reason for deciding, in whose sentence the litigating parties are bound to acquiesce on account of the supreme authority and power which he possesses in the republic. But in matters of faith, there is no mortal whose will and judgment they are subject to; for matters of faith depend on the revealing God alone and His revelation comprehended in the sacred letters. Therefore, he is most vain who arrogates divine power to himself.

III. If there is no visible judge in the church, who with public and infallible authority decides controversies of faith, there will be no end of controversy. Response; Theological controversies either concern fundamental articles of faith, or non-fundamental ones. The fundamental articles of faith are either contained αυτολεξει (in the very words) and in conceived words, and those not ambiguous, in scripture, or are deduced by a good and proximate consequence from clear sayings of scripture. Controversies arisen concerning these can easily be finished, provided the state of the controversy is accurately formed and observed, just as the arguments of both parties are weighed by men who are pious, learned, and lovers of truth according to the norm of scripture. That they are not yet finished, happens by accident, and proceeds either from preconceived opinions, or from party spirit and malice of will. But controversies concerning non-fundamental articles of faith can be ventilated up and down, to and fro, without loss of salvation, provided we carefully beware lest, by rashly embracing error, we sin against divine revelation itself. Conf. above Question XXIII, proleg. II, p. 53.

IV. Peter, the first Roman Pontiff, was infallible. Therefore, his successors are also infallible. The antecedent is proven 1) from Matth. 16:18: "You are Peter; and upon this same rock I will build my church." Hence an argument is born. Upon whom the church was built, it is necessary that he be infallible. But upon Peter the church was built. Therefore, it is necessary that Peter be infallible. 2) From Luke 22:32, where Christ addresses Peter with these words: "But I have prayed (especially) for you, that your faith may not fail." Response to 1) by denying the consequence. For it is not licit to argue; Peter was infallible. Therefore, the Roman Pontiffs are infallible. For it is uncertain that Peter was the Roman Pontiff; more uncertain, that the Roman Pontiffs are the legitimate successors of Peter; most uncertain, that the infallibility of Peter is necessarily transferred and, as it were, derived to his successors. For a personal privilege does not necessarily pass to posterity; otherwise all the kings who succeeded David would have been immediately illuminated by God, just as king David was struck by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. For the rest, the cited words of Christ are to be understood not of the person of Peter, his primacy or privilege of infallibility, but of the confession and doctrine of Peter. For this apostle had published a very notable confession concerning Christ, when he had said: "You are that Christ, the Son of the living God," Matth. 16:16. The Savior responded: "Blessed are you, Simon, son of Jonah, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father, who is in heaven. And I also say to you; you are Peter; and upon this same rock I will build my church." Christ does not say: You are Peter, and upon you, Peter, I will build my church, but changing the name he says: You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build. Therefore, Peter is one thing, the rock another. Some of the most ancient fathers understand by the rock the apostolic doctrine of Peter concerning Christ (*), some Christ Himself, preached or celebrated by the doctrine of Peter (as of the other apostles). Each exposition comes to nearly the same thing. For the apostolic doctrine concerning Christ, and Christ preached by apostolic doctrine, do not differ according to the thing, but according to our mode of conceiving. Christ is the substantial foundation of the church, the doctrine concerning Christ is the dogmatic foundation of the church. See above p. 47, Question XIX, Proleg. II. Response to 2) the words of Christ, "I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail!" are not to be understood absolutely of immunity from every defect of faith; for Peter lost his faith, denying Christ three times; but of immunity from the final loss of faith, so that the sense is; for you, Simon Peter, I have asked, that you may not finally lose faith, that you may not persist in final unbelief, and be cut off from eternal salvation.

(*) That most all of the most ancient Doctors thought thus, our Symbolic books also commemorate in the Smalcald Articles, tr. on the power of the Pope, p. 345. And that this opinion is correct is won by many arguments, and especially Eph. 2:20-21; in which place 1) no preeminence and prerogative is attributed to Peter above the rest of the Apostles, 2) Christ alone is said to be that on which the whole building as it were rests. Conf. 1. to the Corinthians 3:11,12.

Instance I. When Christ in John 21:17 said to Peter: "feed my sheep," he granted infallibility and the regimen of the church without error to Peter and his successors, namely the Roman pontiffs. Response: I deny the consequence. For to feed the sheep of Christ belongs to all the pastors of the church. The apostle of the gentiles gravely addresses all the presbyters of the church of Ephesus: "The Holy Spirit has made you bishops to feed the church of God," Acts 20:28.

Instance II. Just as there was one high shepherd of the Old Testament, Eccles. 12:11; so there ought to be one high shepherd of the New Testament. Response: The one and high shepherd is the triune God, and by appropriation the Son of God, who is called the Ἀρχιποιμήν (Chief Shepherd), 1 Peter 2:25.

Question XLVI. Is sacred scripture an evident and perspicuous principle of Christian theology?

The perspicuity of Holy Scripture. Sacred scripture proposes the dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, necessary for men who are to attain eternal salvation to know and to do, in a lucid manner and with words so perspicuous, that it can be easily understood by a man who is docile, attentive, free from preconceived opinions, and knowledgeable of the language in which he reads the scripture.

Obs. I. A distinction must be made between the perspicuity of the words, and the evidence (strictly so called) of the things. The principal things comprehended in the sacred letters are inevident; for they are mysteries, which can be known neither by immediately apprehended terms, nor from other naturally evident principles. Therefore, sacred scripture is called clear not by reason of the things, but of the words; because even inevident things can be proposed with clear and perspicuous words.

Obs. II. The perspicuity of Holy Scripture is gradual; since it is greater in the N. than in the O.T.; and in the N.T. some sayings are clearer, some less clear, which are to be explained and illustrated from the clearer ones. But in those things which are necessary for men to be saved to believe and to do, Holy Scripture is sufficiently liquid and perspicuous.

Obs. III. The perspicuity of Holy Scripture is not absolute, but ordered; since for understanding it, the order divinely instituted must be accurately observed. For there is required 1) invocation of God, the father of lights. 2) Knowledge of the language in which Holy Scripture is read, whether in the source or in a version. 3) Attentive consideration of phrases, scope, antecedents, and consequents. 4) The rejection of preconceived opinions and of depraved affections, of ambition, hatred, envy, audacity, etc. Anyone who neither implores the help of the illuminating God, nor is attentive, nor free from preconceived opinions and inordinate affections, nor is knowledgeable of the language in which the scripture to be read is proposed, is not a suitable or disposed subject for investigating and grasping the sense of the divine word.

Our assertion is proven I. from the wisdom and goodness of the author of Holy Scripture, who is God. He, being most wise, was able; and being most good, He willed to enunciate the thoughts of His mind clearly. Hence He Himself says in Deut. XXX, 11: "This commandment that I command you today is not too hard for you, nor is it far off." "It is not in heaven, that you should say, 'Who will ascend for us to heaven and bring it to us, that we may hear it and do it?'" "Neither is it beyond the sea, that you should say, 'Who will go over the sea for us and bring it to us, that we may hear it and do it?'" "But the word is very near you. It is in your mouth and in your heart, so that you can do it." Concerning this heavenly oracle, observe: 1) that by the divine precept, given by Moses to the Israelite people, is understood not precisely the word of the law, but also the word of the gospel, as Paul teaches in Rom. X, 6: "This is the word of faith that we proclaim." 2) That not only is the nearness of place signified when it is said: "it is not far off, but it is near you." For since Moses on that day, on which he said these things, commanded them this precept, and set it before them, it was manifest that it was near in respect of place, and there was no need to say: "it is not far off, it is very near you." But it is also understood as the remoteness and nearness of knowledge and of evangelical fulfillment; where remoteness is the impossibility of knowing and fulfilling; as if it were said: It is not too wonderful for you, or so difficult that you cannot understand and fulfill it; but nearness is the facility of knowing and fulfilling. 3) This knowledge and fulfillment consists in the confession of the mouth and the faith of the heart; which Paul makes manifest in Rom. X, 8, 9, 10. Where indeed 4) the confession of the mouth requires knowledge of the words and sense; for there is no true confession of that which is not understood. Thus, of a parrot that recites the Apostles' Creed by chattering, no one would say that it is making a confession of the Christian faith. But 5) faith of the heart adds to the external confession an internal knowledge, assent, and trust. Therefore 6) both the knowledge and sense of the precept is easy, and the assent and trust of the heart is no less easy; not that 7) man can do all these things by the strength of nature, but by the strength of the promise; and the promise here is evangelical, Rom. X, 6, clearly made, not to be desired and awaited from heaven or from places across the sea.

II. From the description of sacred scripture. For this is described by Peter as a lamp or a light shining in a dark place, 2 Pet. 1, 19; cf. Ps. CXIX, 105. But if sacred scripture is a light shining in a dark place, it is necessary that it should shine with an inherent clarity. It is not for you to say that sacred scripture is called a light, not because it is easy to understand, but because, when understood, it illuminates the mind. For this is the same as if you were to say: The sun is bright not because it emits light from itself, but because, when it is seen, it illuminates the eyes.

III. From the end for which sacred scripture is to be proposed. Now, it is to be proposed to the learned and the unlearned, to adults and to little ones, capable of reading scripture. The apostles wrote their epistles to all who are called to be saints, Rom. 1, 9; to fathers, little children, and young men, 1 John II, 13. JEROME rightly says in Ps. LXXXVI: "The Apostles and prophets wrote not for a few, but for the whole people, that all might understand." But that scripture which is available and exposed to all must be so clear that it brings wisdom even to the little ones. Ps. XIX, 8.

IV. From the end for which the sacred letters were written. The apostle of the Gentiles excellently inculcates this end, 2 Tim. III, 15, 16: "Because from childhood you have known the sacred letters, which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus." "(For) all divinely inspired scripture is also useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for discipline, which (is) in righteousness; that the man of God may be complete, equipped for every good work." The sacred letters, as Paul teaches, are adorned for this end, that they may abundantly instruct the man of God, or the minister of the church, so that he himself may clearly know the heavenly doctrine, and conveniently instill it in others, refute false doctrine, correct distorted morals, and instruct men concerning righteousness both begun and perfected, that they may be made wise for salvation, which is in Christ Jesus. But none of these things can be properly and prosperously carried out unless the scripture uses clear words, so that the minister of the church may evidently know what things contribute some momentum to doctrine, reproof, and correction. The apostle adds the paracletic use in Rom. XV, 4: "For whatever was written in former days was written for our instruction, that through endurance and through the encouragement of the Scriptures we might have hope." But unless the fount of scripture is clear, no one will draw living solace from it.

V. From the principal parts of scripture, the law and the gospel. The divine law in Exod. XX and the gospel in John III, 16 are set forth in brilliant words. Therefore, scripture is perspicuous; for a thing is named from its better part.

VI. From the absurdities that accompany the contrary opinion. If sacred scripture is not perspicuous: a) the heavenly oracles will not differ from the oracles of Apollo; since both are equivocal and involved in perplexed senses, so that they do not so much teach as distract the mind or render it in suspense. b) Sacred scripture will be useless; just as a letter is of no use which is written in words so intricate that it deceives the sharpness of the intellect. c) Unbelievers will not lack an apology against the final judgment, complaining that they could not attain the will of God from such obscure scripture. d) The Holy Spirit will not be a good teacher. For it is the part of a good teacher to deliver his dogmas clearly and distinctly, and with prudent adaptation to descend to the capacity of his learners.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians, Weigelians, and Socinians, who deny the perspicuity of scripture; they rely on the following arguments: (*)

I. Whatever contains the most abstruse matters, and is remote from all reason, is without doubt obscure. But sacred scripture contains etc. Therefore. The major premise is established, because that is perspicuous which is suitable and proportionate to the intellect; on the contrary, that is obscure which is very remote from the intellect. Resp. Whatever contains the most abstruse matters is obscure as to the real object; I grant; as to the proposition of the object through words, I deny. For just as the easiest matters to understand can be obscured by words, so the most difficult matters can be proposed in the clearest words. And for this reason God uses the medium of letters, so that whatever we do not attain by investigation with nature as our guide, we may know clearly through the revelation of scripture, John XX, 31.

II. If sacred scripture could be understood without an interpreter, commentaries would not be necessary. But commentaries are necessary for the understanding of scripture (otherwise so many huge volumes of commentaries would not be written with the greatest labor on the sacred codex). Therefore, sacred scripture cannot be understood without an interpreter. Resp. Commentaries are necessary not with an absolute necessity, simply for being, but with a hypothetical necessity, for well-being. The first Christians understood the scripture before any commentaries were written, with the light of scripture alone irradiating their minds, and the Holy Spirit operating in their hearts. Therefore, commentaries are not necessary for all and every man for the simple understanding of scripture, but partly for an easier, more intense, and more accurate knowledge; partly for showing the salutary application and use, and for promoting the edification of faithful souls to a greater degree. But from this it does not follow; Therefore, sacred scripture is obscure. For the catechism and other very clear writings are explained by commentaries and are applied to living practice.

III. The disciples of Emmaus could not understand Moses and the prophets prophesying about Christ, but needed the explanation of Christ, Luke XXIV, 25. Therefore, sacred scripture is obscure. Resp. a) The disciples of Emmaus needed the explanation of Christ not because of the obscurity of scripture, but because of their foolishness and slowness of heart, being occupied with a preconceived opinion about the earthly kingdom of the Messiah. But just as the sun remains bright, although bats and owls are blinded by its splendor, and blind men do not see it at all; so sacred scripture remains perspicuous, even though man, blinded by the fascination of prejudice, does not notice its clarity. b) The disciples of Emmaus understood the clear words of Moses and the prophets, but they were ignorant of what matter was underlying them, or what person was conceived. Therefore, Christ applied the words of Moses and the prophets to himself. For this reason the evangelist says in v. 27: "And beginning with Moses and all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself." c) Interpretation argues the infirmity of the human intellect and the profundity of the mysteries, not the obscurity of sacred scripture. For interpretation is sought from scripture itself; since it shines with such clarity that it itself, through itself, reveals the sense of the words written down.

(*) To the state of the controversy, five distinctions are to be carefully observed. 1) Obscurity must be accurately distinguished from difficulty. For that is called obscure for the investigation of which we have no sufficient means, so that no one can attain the author's meaning, even if one were to apply the greatest diligence (which is unclear, 1 Corinthians XIV, 8). But that is called difficult to understand which we can perceive and know for certain, provided we are willing to apply thought and care to it, and to use suitable aids and means correctly (hard to understand, 2 Pet. 3, 16). 2) Obscurity is one thing of the matters, another of the words. Divine matters, which are called mysteries, far surpass all bounds of finite reason, and therefore no one will ever be able to perceive the manner in which they are performed, Phil. IV, 7. But yet the words by which those arcane truths are signified are sufficiently clear. Who is there who does not understand this saying, John III, 16? But who is there who can survey so great and immense a matter with all his thought? 3) We concede an obscurity of words, but not of the text. Words, viewed separately and out of context, are often very obscure, since they are ambiguous, and indeed have several meanings. But all ambiguity is removed if they are considered in context, with truly parallel places also being diligently compared. For example, in Zechariah III, 9, it is asked what a word (Hebrew: עינים) means. The word (Hebrew: עין) sometimes denotes an eye, at other times it designates a fountain. But yet, first the context itself determines the force of the word in this place; for the dual is never used of fountains, always of eyes. Then in another saying, very similar to this one, chap. IV, 10, it is added, (Hebrew: משוטטים), as something which befits not fountains, but eyes, see also Rev. V, 6. 4) We deny an obscurity, or rather a difficulty, of the whole scripture; of certain parts, we affirm it. For what is hidden in one place is open in another. 5) There is no objective obscurity in the words, but if there is any, it is certainly subjective in the mind of the interpreter. The scripture itself indicates this difference in 2 Corinthians IV, 3-4; 2 Pet. III, 16; Luke XVIII, 31, 32, 33; XXIV, 32, coll. with v. 45. From a comparison of these verses, it is plainly apparent that the entire cause of the obscurity was not in the words, but in the minds of men, whom a preconceived opinion prevented from being able to understand what was said openly and plainly.

Example: The entire college of Christ's disciples did not grasp the meaning of Christ's words about his imminent passion and death. Luke XVIII, 34. Therefore, sacred scripture cannot be understood without an interpreter. Resp. The disciples, infatuated with the prejudice of an earthly kingdom, and occupied with more vehement affections, namely fear and sadness, arising from the foretold death of Jesus, did not perceive with the eyes of the mind the final cause of Christ's passion, and the salutary fruit to be gained from it; but the words of Christ were so clear that even a seven-year-old boy could have grasped their meaning.

IV. That eunuch in Acts VIII, 32 did not understand the prophecy of Isaiah concerning Christ until it was explained to him by Philip. Therefore scripture, unless it is explained by teachers, is obscure. Resp. 1) That eunuch was unskilled in the Christian religion, a novice and a proselyte, from whose inexperience it is wrongly concluded that the Holy Scripture is obscure; just as if one were to conclude: An infant can neither read nor understand the words of the catechism; Therefore the words of the catechism are obscure. 2) The eunuch understood the words of Isaiah, but he was ignorant of what person they denoted, how and when they were actually fulfilled. Therefore the things contained in the prophecy were not evident to him, but the words were clear enough. 3) The question of the perspicuity of the sacred scripture is discussed between us and the papists for the present time, insofar as the scripture consists of the complete canon of the books of the Old and New Testament. For the eunuch, the light of the New Testament had not shone, whence he did not grasp the underlying matter and the fulfillment of the prophetic prophecy. But the prophecy of Isaiah is elucidated in John I, 29; 2 Peter II, 24, 25.

V. King David in Psalm CXIX, 18 asked God: "Give me understanding, that I may keep your law." Therefore, without the special concurrence of God, he did not understand the scripture. Resp. 1. We hold the perspicuity of the sacred scripture to be ordered, not absolute. 2. We distinguish between a literal and a salutary knowledge of God. God has established this order, that a man who is to understand the sacred scripture with salutary fruit, should implore divine aid. 3. David's prayer argues not the obscurity of the scripture, but the profundity of the divine mysteries, and the weakness of the human intellect; for he does not ask that light be poured upon the divine law, but upon himself from God.

VI. Saint Peter testifies in his 2nd Epistle, chap. III, 16, that in the Epistles of Saint Paul there are some things hard to understand, which the untaught and unstable twist. Resp. α) LORINUS, a papist, says not badly: "That phrase, 'in which,' does not refer to the epistles, but to those things which are treated in the epistles." For the pronoun δὲ is not a pronoun of the feminine gender, to which the noun ἐπιστολῶν belongs. Therefore, it is not the obscurity of the Pauline epistles that is noted here, but the lack of evidence of the things contained in them. β) If some things in the Pauline epistles are hard to understand, or difficult to understand, the rest will be easy to understand, easy to understand. γ) They are hard to understand to the unlearned, the unstable, the torturers of the divine word; yet they are understood according to the state of the way by teachable, attentive readers who modestly scrutinize the sense of scripture.

VII. From which principle an enigmatic knowledge of God is drawn, that principle must be obscure. But from scripture, as the principle of theology, an enigmatic knowledge of God is drawn. Therefore the sacred scripture must be obscure. The major premise is established; because as the thing derived is, so is the principle; an enigmatic knowledge flows from an obscure principle. The minor is proven from 1 Cor. XIII, 12: "For now we see in a mirror dimly, but then face to face." Resp. The Apostle's words are to be understood comparatively, because a comparison is instituted by him between the state of grace and of glory. For the theological knowledge of men on their journey, compared with the beatific vision of God, which the blessed enjoy in the heavenly fatherland, is imperfect, and thus comparatively enigmatic, specular, and obscure. But what knowledge of God is comparatively imperfect and obscure, for the state of this life is sufficiently clear; since it suffices for obtaining salvation. Wherefore, just as it does not follow: I see the image of a thing more obscurely in a mirror than when I behold it as it is in itself; Therefore the mirror is obscure; so it does not follow: The knowledge of God and of divine things here through scripture is not as clear as it will be in heaven, where we will see God face to face; therefore the sacred scripture is obscure.

VIII. Holy scripture is like a closed and sealed book. Therefore without the key of interpretation it cannot be understood. The antecedent is proven from Dan. XII, 4: "But you, Daniel, shut up the words and seal the book, until the time of the end." Resp. 1. The prophecy of Daniel is a part of scripture, not the whole scripture. We grant that Holy scripture is in some places less clear, but in delivering the dogmas of faith and the precepts of morals we assert that it is sufficiently perspicuous for the state of this life. 2. The question is debated between us and the Pontificians for the present time: Whether the sacred scripture, as it now consists of the books of the Old and New Testament, with the canon completed, is clear and perspicuous. Thus, not even the prophecy of Daniel is obscure. For Daniel is ordered by the angel to shut up the words and seal the book until the time of the end, for "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall increase." The angel therefore implies that the prophecy of Daniel is to be sealed not simply and for all times, but until the time divinely appointed, when many, taught by experience, will understand it from the outcome.

IX. Every credible thing according to the Lutherans ought to be perspicuous. But the whole scripture, down to the smallest jot, is credible. Therefore the whole scripture down to the smallest jot, according to the Lutherans, ought to be perspicuous. Resp. 1) Credible is said in two ways: a) generally, on account of the authority of the one speaking; b) specifically, because it is a dogma of faith and a precept of morals necessary for a man to know and do for salvation. There are in Holy Scripture chronological, onomastic, astronomical matters, etc., which can be safely ignored without loss of salvation. Wherefore we limit the major premise; every credible dogma of faith and precept of morals, according to the Lutherans, ought to be perspicuous; I concede; but that the whole scripture down to the smallest jot is a credible dogma of faith and precept of morals; I deny. 2) The Lutherans assert that the clarity of Holy Scripture is gradual, and that the less clear biblical sayings are to be illustrated from the clearer ones.

X. If the words of Holy Scripture were perspicuous, the most serious dispute concerning the genuine sense of the words of the Holy Supper: "this is my body," would have long since been settled. But that dispute is not yet settled. Therefore the words of scripture are not perspicuous. Resp. The words of the Holy Supper are most clear, but the underlying reality is most sublime; since the dissenters cannot grasp it with reason, they resort to tropes. From this it has happened that that dispute has been protracted for so many years, not without great detriment to the evangelical church.

XI. The words of Holy Scripture cannot be perspicuous (1) because there are many ambiguities in Holy Scripture, (2) many hysteron proterons, (3) many tropes and figures, (4) many apparent antilogies or contradictions, (5) many parables, (6) in the original Hebrew and Greek text, unique words, subject to various interpretations. From which an obscure style of speaking cannot but arise. Resp. (a) Generally. We do not deny that in some places of sacred scripture less clarity is found, but we urge this, that in those things which are necessary for a man on his journey aspiring to eternal salvation to believe and to do, the sacred scripture is sufficiently perspicuous. (b) Specifically to (1); Ambiguities pass into perspicuous speech if both the purpose of the speaker and parallel sayings are accurately weighed. To (2); although hysteron proteron (the latter put first) is sometimes committed in scripture, yet the true order of the biblical histories is elicited partly from the circumstances of the text, partly from the inspection of parallel places, as is especially wont to be done in composing a harmony of the evangelists. To (3): tropes and figures are not darkness, but the lights of speech. To (4): apparent contradictions are easily reconciled by a prudent collation of the places that seem to be in conflict, observing the laws of contradiction. To (5): most parables were explained by Christ; but when the Savior did not explain them, he wished the minds of the hearers and readers to be excited to a greater investigation of the hidden kernel. To (6): unique words occurring in the sacred codex have long since been explained, with so many versions and so many commentaries existing. Moreover, AUGUSTINE, about to give the reason why God did not wish all and every biblical saying to be expressed with an equal degree of clarity, says in de doctrina Christiana, book II, chap. VII: "Magnificently and salutarily the Holy Spirit has so modified the Holy Scriptures, that by the clearer places he might meet hunger, and by the more obscure ones he might wipe away disdain. For almost nothing is brought out from the more obscure places that is not found to be said most plainly elsewhere."

Question XLVII. Is Holy Scripture so perspicuous that an unregenerate man can grasp its true sense without the illumination of the Holy Spirit?

An unregenerate man, placing an obstacle to the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, does not grasp the true sense of the sacred letters (a). But the Holy Spirit illuminates the teachable unregenerate man, who attentively reads the sacred scripture, or hears it proposed by the voice of a teacher, through the scripture itself, so that he perceives the genuine sense of the divine word, and rightly applies what is perceived to salutary effects (b).

Obs. 1. Holy Scripture is called perspicuous (1) in itself, or objectively, (2) in relation to its readers, or subjectively. In itself, Holy Scripture is lucid, even if no mortal reads or understands it, just as the sun is luminous in itself, though no eye beholds it. But in relation to its readers or hearers, its perspicuity is not absolute, or irresistible, so that no impediment can be placed in its way, but ordered, requiring a capable and non-resistant subject. The sun illuminates every eye, but not a blind one, not a closed one, not one covered with a veil, not one hiding in a prison or a deep cellar; so sacred scripture possesses such clarity that it can illuminate every human intellect; but it does not illuminate the intellect of a resisting man, or one covered with the veil of prejudice.

Obs. 2. An unregenerate man is either teachable and corrigible, or unteachable and incorrigible. A teachable unregenerate man is one who does not reject Holy Scripture, but admits it, reads it attentively, meditates on it, and is not occupied by prejudice, nor by inordinate affections, nor by the cares of this world, and possesses a moderate judgment. An unteachable unregenerate man is one who either refuses to read Holy Scripture or to hear it proposed by the voice of a teacher; or if he reads it, he does not meditate attentively, he maliciously closes the eyes of his mind to the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, he stubbornly adheres to preconceived opinions, and, enslaved to wicked affections, or due to his age, is unfit for reading and understanding scripture.

Obs. 3. The illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, which is also called preparing grace, precedes the converting and regenerating grace of God in the order of nature, and is an action of the Holy Spirit not instantaneous or momentary, but successive and gradual; which the excellent Dr. FECHTIUS accurately explains in his theological dissertation on the order and manner of divine grace, aphorism IX, saying: "The illuminating grace, whether of the mind or of the will of man, does not flow into man immediately, does not complete the illumination in one moment, does not operate irresistibly in man, but acts by degrees, by turns, and by several and repeated acts, and thus over the course of time disposes and prepares man for admitting a greater light of truth from time to time; so that, if he repels the first degree of illumination, the second is denied to him; since it cannot have a place without the first."

Obs. 4. A distinction is made between the sense of Holy Scripture considered in itself and formally, and the sense of scripture rightly applied according to the intention of the Holy Spirit. A teachable unregenerate man grasps the formally considered sense of Holy Scripture through the prevenient and preparing grace of the Holy Spirit; but unless the converting and regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit is added, he does not rightly apply the sense of Holy Scripture according to the intention of the Holy Spirit to feel sorrow for sins and to conceive faith in Christ. To nearly the same thing amounts the distinction of other theologians between an external or literal knowledge of Holy Scripture, when one perceives its sense from the words of scripture, and an internal or salutary knowledge, when one understands what scripture teaches, so as to transfer it to salutary effects. A teachable unregenerate man, prepared by the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit, can attain to an external and literal knowledge of Holy Scripture; but unless he is converted and regenerated by the Holy Spirit, he does not attain to an internal and salutary knowledge of Holy Scripture.

You say: I. A man illuminated by the Holy Spirit is reborn, not unregenerate. Resp. An unregenerate man tending toward the state of regeneration is truly illuminated by the Holy Spirit through scripture in many things, before he fully and salutarily conceives faith. Eph. III, 9.

You say: II. The literal knowledge of scripture is also salutary, because it is drawn from the word of salvation and is divinely ordained for salutary operations. Resp. The literal knowledge of scripture is salutary in a certain respect and with a certain regard, namely by reason of its principle and the divine intention; but that knowledge is called simply salutary which is conjoined with salutary operations and spiritual movements of the heart.

Proof a. From the Pauline statement in 1 Cor. II, 13, 14: "We speak, not in words taught by human wisdom, but in those taught by the Holy Spirit, combining spiritual things with spiritual words." "But the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Obs. (a) The Apostle embraces both the words and the matters of sacred scripture in this remarkable utterance. He asserts that the words of scripture were taught by the Holy Spirit and dictated to the prophets and apostles, so that a divine and spiritual manner of speaking might be accommodated to divine and spiritual things. The things of scripture are the things of the Spirit of God—all things revealed by the Holy Spirit, both small and great, both sublime and less sublime, especially the divine mysteries transcending the grasp of reason, insofar as they are proposed in spiritual words. Conf. Dr. SEB. SCHMID. in colleg. bibl. post. p. 167. (b) The natural man (or soulish man) is opposed by the apostle to the spiritual man. Dr. AEGIDIUS HUNNIUS defines both in this place: "The natural man is he who is led only by and relies on the judgment of reason, which is the supreme faculty of the human soul; but the spiritual man is he who is governed by the Holy Spirit through the word." Dr. SEB. SCHMID. describes both in the same place: "The natural man is he who is left to himself and his own nature; but the spiritual man is he who is not left to his own nature, but has the help and grace of the Holy Spirit." Dr. SCHMID observed that the natural man may be considered either absolutely and in general, or in particular and subjectively. The natural man considered absolutely grasps none of the things that are of the Spirit of God; meanwhile, he can be subjectively a natural man who understands something of the things that are of the Spirit of God; not indeed as such, but as he is already imperfectly illuminated by the Holy Spirit. (c)

The apostle denies that the natural man receives, knows, or judges the divine mysteries. To receive is otherwise used of a guest who is not repelled, but admitted; for whom the door is opened, who is led into the house and treated well. Matth. X, 14, 40, 41. Thus, the reception of spiritual things is when the intellect apprehends and assents, the will chooses and approves, and the affections conceive them within themselves. The beginning of this reception, when legitimately done, is from the intellect; so that when the intellect does not grasp, the will and affections also cannot rightly admit. Whence the apostle excellently argues: The natural man does not accept or admit the things that are of the Spirit of God; because they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them. But if he cannot understand, much less will the will and affections admit them. (d) The apostle connects a twofold reason to his assertion. He takes the first from the natural disdain of blind reason repudiating the divine mysteries, saying: for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, as if to say: The natural man, relying only on the aid of reason, disdains, abhors, and laughs at the divine dogmas as false, absurd, and foolish; and therefore from his natural powers and the principles of reason, left to himself, he cannot know them. He takes the latter from the condition of the divine mysteries; which are so sublime that no one, unless illuminated, can judge them by the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the apostle says: because they are spiritually discerned, to indicate that no one, destitute of the supernatural light of the Holy Spirit, can pass an uncorrupted judgment on matters of faith. With the Pauline statement brilliantly expounded, we argue:

I. Whatever words the Holy Spirit has taught, no one rightly understands who has never listened to the heavenly teacher, the Holy Spirit, speaking in the scriptures. But the words of Holy Scripture were taught by the Holy Spirit. Therefore. The major premise is illustrated from a comparison. Just as no one understands human words who has never heard men speak, so no one grasps the words of the Holy Spirit who has never entered his school. This is confirmed by experience: What unregenerate gentile, placed outside the first impulse of assisting grace, will be able to understand this saying by himself, John I: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was made flesh"? If I ask a gentile: what does the apostle understand by the Word? what does it mean: made flesh? He will stand there astonished, and finally profess his ignorance.

We argue II. Whoever relies only on the aid of reason, neither receives, nor understands, nor rightly judges the divine mysteries, but repudiates them as absurd. But the unregenerate man, destitute of all light of the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore. The major premise is Paul's own, and is confirmed by examples of (1) the ancient Israelites, concerning whose blindness Moses complains in Deut. XXIX, 3, 4: "Your eyes have seen those great signs and wonders; yet the Lord has not given you a heart to understand." The divine word was revealed to the Israelites, supported by stupendous miracles; but they did not know it, because with the utmost malice and obstinacy they had impeded the supernatural illumination of the Lord. (2) the Jews surviving in the times of the N.T., about whom St. Paul says in 2 Cor. III, 15: "To this day, when Moses is read, a veil lies over their hearts." The Jews assiduously read the writings of Moses, but they do not understand them, a veil of malicious blindness having been placed upon their hearts, which no one but the Holy Spirit can remove; whose illuminating grace they place an obstacle to. (3) the Pharisees and scribes in the Jewish synagogue. It was their custom to constantly handle the codex of the heavenly oracles, Acts XV, and they were by profession teachers of the law and masters of the scriptures, Matth. XXIII, 2; Rom. II, 19, yet they are pronounced blind and leaders of the blind by Christ, Matth. XV, 14. (4) the disciples of Christ, occupied by a preconceived opinion about the earthly kingdom of the Messiah; to whom Christ had preached in words certainly very clear about his passion and death, now imminent, Luke XVIII, 31. "But they understood none of these things, and this saying was hidden from them, so that they did not know what was said." The disciples perceived what the simple words, passion, death, denoted, but they did not comprehend the complete propositions, and how such predicates agreed with the subject, with a full conception of the mind and a solid assent.

Proof b. (1) To the docile unregenerate man, who admits and rightly uses the word of God, the Holy Spirit opens the eyes of the mind, and illuminates them with divine light. This we learn from the sincere prayer of St. Paul, Eph. 1, 17, in which he prays that "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give us the Spirit of wisdom and of revelation in the knowledge of him, having the eyes of our minds enlightened." The Holy Spirit is called by the apostle the Spirit of wisdom, because to all who read the scriptures attentively and meditate on them deeply, he gives and increases the knowledge of God and of divine things: he is also called the Spirit of revelation not only because he has revealed the divine will in the word of God, but also because he removes the veil congenital to our hearts, for attaining the sense of scripture; for which purpose the Holy Spirit also gives enlightened eyes of the mind. For just as to see the light of the sun, healthy, pure, and open eyes are required; so to understand the Holy Scripture, eyes illuminated by the Holy Spirit are necessary. (2) The prophet king worships God in supplication: "unveil my eyes, that I may see the wonderful things from your law," Ps. CXIX, 18. For a long time he had prepared for himself a literal knowledge of the divine word by reading the scriptures; but now with earnest vows he desires a more abundant light of the Holy Spirit and an increase of fuller knowledge, that with unveiled face he may behold the stupendous works of God and the most sublime mysteries, and may know them more deeply, and may apply this same knowledge more and more to salutary effects, to penitence, to faith, to the pursuit of good works. (3) The same is confirmed by the examples of (a) the disciples of Christ, to whom the Lord Jesus himself opened their minds, that they might understand the scriptures, Luke XXIV, 45. The minds of the apostles were obstructed by the barriers of preconceived opinions about the earthly kingdom of the Messiah; therefore the Savior's words concerning his passion and death passed by the disciples, who were thinking all other things about Christ. But the Lord, externally proposing what was written about himself in the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms, by an internal supernatural operation removed the barriers of prejudice about a worldly kingdom, irradiated the minds of the disciples with spiritual light, and instructed them with the gift of interpretation. (β) Lydia, a seller of purple in the city of Thyatira, Acts XVI, 14, whose heart the Lord opened to pay attention to what was said by Paul. Lydia's heart was closed as if by the bolts of blindness and ignorance; which, as Paul preached the word of God, the concurrent Holy Spirit unfastened, by instilling a holy thought into Lydia's heart and exciting in her will a spiritual desire, by which she was stimulated to greater attention and to attaining from Paul's preaching a salutary knowledge of divine things. From which it becomes clear that a special light of the Holy Spirit and a divine power of persuasion are required for a solid knowledge of the sacred letters and for giving a firm assent to them.

The Antithesis is that of the Socinians and Arminians, who assert that Holy Scripture is so clear that there is no need of the special light of divine grace for its understanding; whose more important arguments are the following.

I. Whatever scripture is perspicuous can be easily understood without the supernatural light of divine grace. But Holy Scripture etc. Therefore. Resp. Holy Scripture in itself is lucid and clear, but this clarity is ordered to this grace, which moreover is not irresistible or irrefutable; since a malicious obstacle or veil can be placed before the eyes of the mind, so that they do not see the clarity of scripture. Wherefore, just as it would be wrongly concluded; The sun is most brilliant; therefore it illuminates a blind, closed eye, covered with a veil; so our adversaries wrongly conclude; Holy Scripture is most clear; therefore the unregenerate, indocile man, a hardened enemy of grace, a hater and contemner of heavenly truth, perceives its sense. Consider, says the apostle of the Gentiles, 2 Cor. IV, 3-4: "If our gospel is hidden, it is hidden to those who are perishing; in whom the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, so that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ should not shine on them." The apostle teaches that the gospel, perspicuous in itself, is veiled or covered by accident, through the fault of men laboring under a blindness, not only congenital, which is common to all, but also acquired and voluntarily contracted, and permitted by the judgment of God, when obstinacy is added, strengthened by Satan. 2 Pet. 1, 9; [1 John] II, 9.

II. The words of the prophets and apostles are taken from the customary use of speaking, the signifying force of which a natural man can learn without supernatural grace. Resp. The words of the prophets and apostles are considered either outside the context, or in the context of a biblical proposition. In the first way, they have an analogy with human words, and can be understood by an unregenerate person without the supernatural grace of the Holy Spirit; but if they are viewed in context, insofar as they are accommodated to the mysteries of faith, and are, as it were, their receptacles, containers, or vehicles, and are truly divine words, without the prevenient and preparing grace of the Holy Spirit, a solid concept of them, conforming to the mind of the Holy Spirit, cannot be formed. This is illustrated by an example. Every unregenerate gentile, Turk, Tartar, Jew knows what it is to exalt, what it is to draw. But if I were to propose for his consideration the oracle of Christ, John XII, 32: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself," he will not understand the Savior's statement, unless his intellect is first cultivated and illuminated by the Holy Spirit.

III. Hypocrites, destitute of the light of the Holy Spirit, understand the sacred scripture. Resp. (1) The knowledge of hypocrites, which they have sought from the reading of the sacred letters, is external and literal, not internal and effectively salutary, and (to speak plainly) spiritual, i.e., conjoined with spiritual motions, contrition, faith, and the love of God. The reason is that hypocrites do not apply the literal sense of scripture to living practice and salutary use. (2) The literal knowledge of hypocrites is from the imperfect and pedagogical illumination of the Holy Spirit.

IV. Heretics, without the illumination of the Holy Spirit, attain the sense of scripture, and dispute from it against the orthodox, etc. Heretics, when considered reduplicatively, insofar as they are heretics, i.e., erring in the foundation of faith, infer a sense into scripture, not draw it out of it; they do not grasp the sense which the words of scripture give of themselves, but they attach a foreign sense, not analogous to the text itself.

V. The devil, incapable of supernatural light, understands scripture, since he quoted its words in Matth. IV, 6. Resp. The devil is not the subject for whose benefit Holy Scripture was written; and therefore the prevenient grace of the Holy Spirit does not assist him, since it intends the salvation of man. Whatever the evil demon has snatched concerning divine things from the sacred letters, all of it he has stolen as if from another's coffers, not pertaining to him. Nor yet did he attain the genuine sense of scripture in the cited place, but he nefariously perverted its words and twisted them into a foreign sense.

VI. If an unregenerate man cannot understand sacred scripture without supernatural light, he is not to be punished for unbelief. But he is to be punished for unbelief. Therefore an unregenerate man can understand scripture without the supernatural light of the Holy Spirit. The consequence of the major premise is proven, because the Holy Spirit has denied to the unregenerate man the supernatural light, without which he cannot conceive faith. Resp. The Holy Spirit denies supernatural light to no one absolutely, but imparts it to every reader or hearer of the divine word, provided he does not morosely resist its operation, or impede the supernatural illumination by a voluntarily contracted veil of blindness placed before it. Therefore, the unregenerate is punished for the light of the Holy Spirit not admitted, but petulantly rejected.

VII. The illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit is either perpetually conjoined with the sacred scripture, or it is separated from it. If it is perpetually conjoined, all men who read scripture are equally illuminated, converted, and regenerated. If it is said to be separated, enthusiasm is brought into the church as if with full sails. Resp. 1) The illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit is indeed perpetually conjoined with the sacred scripture, but it does not illuminate the indocile and perseveringly resisting unregenerate. Nor does it illuminate in a moment, but by turns and degrees. He who repels the first degree of illumination does not receive the second and higher one. For a man to be converted and regenerated, a prior illumination of the Holy Spirit, continued through many repeated acts, is required, which in the order of nature the converting divine grace, which operates contrition, and the regenerating grace, which confers the powers of believing, follows. Aptly says Dr. SCHERZER in his breviar. Hulfem, elucidated p. 57: "The supernatural grace of the Holy Spirit is conjoined with the divine word, the hearing of which kindles faith, Rom. X, 17, and is by no means to be separated from it; to which we do not deny that another gracious operation of the Holy Spirit, who has already entered the heart through the word, is added for that purpose." 2) We do not introduce enthusiasm into the church, because we assert that the Holy Spirit, for the state of the present time, illuminates the minds of men, not immediately, but mediately through the Holy Scripture itself.

Question XLVIII. Is scripture to be explained by scripture?

On interpretation. Sacred scripture is the fundamental principle (a), from which, illuminated by the Holy Spirit, the supreme and infallible interpreter of the sacred letters (b), the inferior interpreter, whether he be public (c) or private (d), can accurately investigate, certainly elicit, and clearly declare the genuine sense of the biblical sayings through legitimate means of interpretation (e).

Obs. I. Primarily and principally, the interpretation of scripture is called an analytical act, by which the genuine sense of some less clear and more difficult to understand biblical saying is accurately investigated, demonstratively elicited, and brought to clarity. Secondly, the interpretation of scripture is called the demonstration of the true sense, comprehended in a very clear and very easy to understand biblical saying, by which it is either vindicated from the distortions of the heterodox, or accommodated to salutary use.

Obs. II. When we assert that scripture is to be explained by scripture, then in the subject, by scripture is understood some prophetic or apostolic statement, less clear, or controversial, to be explained by interpretation; in the predicate, by scripture are understood the clearer utterances of the prophets and apostles; for these are wont to explain scripture on that part which at first sight seems more obscure.

Obs. III. When we teach that scripture is to be explained by scripture, we remove (a) immediate divine revelation, on which we do not rely in expounding the sacred letters, since that is not given in the church after the establishment of the canon of scripture. (b) Human reason. For although this is the receiving subject and the cognizing organ of the sense of scripture, it is not, however, the fundamental principle from which, as from a fount, a solid exposition of scripture is to be drawn, nor the infallible rule to which the interpretation of the sacred letters is to be directed, examined, and by which true interpretation is to be discerned. They deceive and are deceived, who subject to reason those things which are above reason. For faith is not to be brought into subjection to reason, but reason is to be taken captive into subjection to faith. 2 Cor. X, 5. (c) All human writings, all commentaries of the doctors of the church, both the more ancient (who come under the venerable name of the Fathers) and the more recent; whose writings we use as external, probable, not to be despised aids of interpretation; but we do not rely on them as a fundamental principle, or as an infallible norm for expounding the scriptures.

Obs. IV. Scripture explains itself either in act or in potency. It explains itself in act when it immediately subjoins an explanation to the words, as when in John II, 21 it immediately adds of which temple Christ was speaking, namely of the temple of his body. It explains itself in potency when it supplies the means of interpreting the scriptures, the original text, the antecedents and consequents, the purpose of the speaker, parallel places, the analogy of faith.

Proof a. I. From the perspicuity of sacred scripture. Every perspicuous scripture pours forth its own sense from itself, and imparts and notifies the same to attentive readers. But sacred scripture is perspicuous. Therefore. The major premise is established. For just as a letter, not composed of obscure or ambiguous words, pours forth a certain sense from itself and instills it in an attentive reader; just as a decree of a prince intimates his will through perspicuous words; just as the testament of a father sets forth the sentiments of a paternal mind; so since scripture is nothing else than an epistle of the almighty to his creature, a promulgation of the legal and evangelical will, a certain testament, 2 Cor. III, 6-14, it certainly conveys a clear sense to its readers, and openly intimates the will of the testator. The minor is clear from the previously demonstrated perspicuity of scripture.

II. From the purpose of the sacred letters, which is to make men wise for salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus. 2 Tim. III, 15. Whatever scripture is written for the purpose of making a man wise for salvation through faith, fixed in Christ Jesus, that scripture opens up the sense comprehended under the words, and promptly insinuates it into the minds of the readers. But sacred scripture, etc. The major premise is evident, because a scripture from which, when attentively considered, a certain sense cannot be elicited, renders the reader not so much wise as doubtful and erring.

III. From the property of the interpretation of scripture. Every interpretation analogous, or consonant, to faith must be sought from the sacred scripture itself. Every solid interpretation of the sacred letters, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear, since, as defined by Dr. Johann Adam Osiander in his Theolog. posit. p. 334, the analogy of faith is the harmony of biblical sayings, or it is the type of doctrine, built upon the clear and perspicuous testimonies of scripture; which cannot dissent, because the prophets and divinely inspired men have one mouth without any dissonance, Luke I, 70. This in the Latin churches in the time of TERTULLIAN was called the rule of faith. According to the definition of Dr. CALOVIUS, the analogy of faith is the conformity of the doctrine of faith, lucidly exposed in the sacred scriptures; which was done primarily in those places where each doctrine has its proper seat, in Bibl. illustr. on Rom. XII, fol. 207. Therefore, if the doctrine of faith is collected and constructed from the perspicuous testimonies of scripture, certainly every interpretation consonant with faith must rest on the foundation of sacred scripture. The minor is Paul's in Rom. XII, 6: "Having prophecy, let them have it according to the analogy of faith." By prophets, interpreters of scripture, and by prophecy, the interpretation of scripture are understood. Conf. 1 Cor. XV, 1-3; 1 Thess. V, 20; 1 Tim. IV, 14. (*) The sense of the apostle

(*) Indeed, I align myself with those who hold a different opinion of this saying. To be sure, 1) as regards prophecy, these things are to be considered: First, it can hardly be therefore is: "Let those who are interpreters of scripture take care that their interpretation is analogous to the faith, that is, that it agrees with the fundamental articles of faith, or with the principal heads of the Christian faith, collected from the most lucid testimonies of scripture."

IV. On the contrary. Whatever scripture is not of private interpretation, because it was not brought by the will of men, the interpretation of that scripture is not to be derived from the will of men from the principles of reason, but from the scripture itself, as from a divine principle. But the prophetic scripture etc. Therefore. The major and minor are evident from the Petrine statement in 2 Epistle, chap. 1, 20, 21: "No prophecy of Scripture comes from someone's own interpretation; for no prophecy was ever produced by the will of man." By prophecy in this place some understand, by hypallage, prophetic scripture, others the interpretation of scripture; they differ only in their manner of speaking, because materially prophetic scripture and its sense and interpretation are the same. See Dr. CALOVIUS in bibl. illustr. fol. 1546. The apostle is about to argue: Whatever scripture does not depend on human will or the principle of reason, but on the impulse and illumination of the Holy demonstrated by any clear example that the interpretation of the sacred letters is designated by that name. Then, with no compelling necessity, we are not permitted to deflect from the meaning of the word, if not perpetual, certainly most victorious. In most places, and I would dare to contend, in all, prophet denotes an extraordinary person, namely that of a Doctor who, by divine instinct and inspiration, reveals arcane things, and specifically foretells future events. Finally, it is established that prophecy, properly and usefully so-called, necessary at the beginning of the New Testament church, was not only divinely given to the Apostolic company, but also in other places, close to this one, 1 Corinthians XII, 28; XIV, 1 sqq., it is expressly numbered among the extraordinary and miraculous gifts. 2) As for analogy, the whole series of words teaches us that by that name PAUL means the same thing that he had said a little before, v. 3, the measure of faith. Besides, it is certain that 3) the complex, consent, and concert of the fundamental doctrines of faith can very rightly be called the analogy of faith. For analogy in general is proportion, which is specifically seen either in the measure of things compared and aptly joined, or in the coherence of truths, all interconnected and fitting among themselves. It is also clear 2) that the coherence of the principal dogmas of faith, the pattern of sound words, is the sole principle of the interpretation of divine scripture, and it is to be so assumed that nothing entirely foreign to it, or plainly contrary to it, should ever be thought of as a true interpretation. Right reason certainly demands this. Would not one interpret falsely if one were to explain the words of some philosopher much differently than is consistent with the principles which he himself has laid down? And the argument which proceeds from the lesser to the greater is of very great weight: if in human writings no prudent author is ever believed to have thought anything contrary to the principal parts of his doctrine, interconnected among themselves: much less does so unjust a suspicion fall upon the divine letters. It can happen, and often does in practice, that a man, although wise, yet mutable, or at some time forgetful of himself, contradicts himself. God, on the contrary, is always the same, never not constant to you, free from all change and error. Therefore, it can never happen that the true meaning of even a single divine word is that which does not agree very well with the principal parts of the divinely revealed doctrine. I add this one thing: The principal dogmas of faith exist in many other places, but especially in the classic ones, in which there is the greatest perspicuity of words. Therefore, to explain the sacred scripture congruently with the analogy of faith is to interpret the more difficult places consistently with the clearest places, and indeed the dogmatic and principal ones. But this too is most agreeable to reason. Therefore, it is clear how unjustly our adversaries deal with us, when they indeed demand this rule, scripture is to be explained by scripture, of the circle, than which there is no fouler vice in argumentation. For the rest, few are ignorant of the distinction, and also the conjunction, of both analogies, both of faith and of scripture. The former exists in certain places of scripture, namely the dogmatic and principal ones; the latter in all, of whatever argument they may be, and this is wont to be signified by the name both of context and of parallelism. The former constitutes the sole suitable principle of interpretation; the latter pertains to the rules and means.

Spirit, that is not to be explained according to human will but from the principle of supernatural revelation. (For what is above reason and the powers of free will cannot be judged or expounded from reason). But prophetic scripture does not depend on the will of human reason, but on the impulse and illumination of the Holy Spirit. Therefore.

You say: The passage from Peter fights for the Pontificians against the Protestants: For if sacred scripture is not of private interpretation, it follows that it is of public and ecclesiastical interpretation, and that it is to be explained by the spirit of the church, not by a private spirit. Resp. Private interpretation here is not opposed to the interpretation of public men, but to the divine interpretation, or to the dictate and mind of the Holy Spirit speaking in and through scripture. Therefore every interpretation of Holy Scripture not drawn from the fount of scripture, but taken from one's own bosom, proceeding from one's own brain, established according to human will, and inconsistent with the mind of the Holy Spirit, is private interpretation. Our Dr. WILHELM LYSERUS says aptly in his system, p. 95: "Be they fathers, be they councils, be they pontiffs; if they do not bring forth the interpretation from scripture, but infer it into it through preconceived opinions, it is a private interpretation." What is objected concerning a private spirit does not touch us in the least; because we, aided by divine grace, strive that our interpretation of scripture be conformed to the mind of the Holy Spirit, who is not a private spirit, but is common to all the regenerate. On the contrary, whatever is brought forth in the articles of faith outside of scripture, that proceeds from a private spirit.

V. From the inseparable union of the internal sense with the external letter of scripture. For there are two things in scripture, the written words, and the sense enclosed in them. The words are like a sheath, the sense is the very sword of the spirit, as BELLARMINE confesses in book IV, de verbo Dei, chap. IV, § 7, fol. 171. To whom Gordon Huntly agrees, as cited by Dr. GERHARD in his confess. cathol., book II, art. I, chap. 111, fol. 420: "The letter alone without the true sense cannot properly and truly be called the word of God, just as a body without a soul is not truly and properly called a man." Therefore, those who strip the letter of its true sense do the same as those who deprive a man of his soul and life.

Therefore, if the divinely inspired sense is in the letters and words of Holy Scripture, like a sword in its sheath, a soul in its body, nowhere but in the letters and words of scripture is its genuine sense to be sought and found.

VI. From the absurd. If the true sense of scripture cannot be elicited from the scripture itself, but must be inferred from elsewhere, scripture will be a) an inanimate skeleton, or a mute statue, to be animated by the voice of the church; when yet the word of God is living and effective. Heb. IV, 12. b) It will not be clear and lucid, but filled with darkness; when yet Holy Scripture is a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawns, and the morning star rises in our hearts. 2 Pet. 1, 19. c) It will be of an inferior condition than human writings; for all princes, lawyers, philosophers, orators, declare their mind in their writings; but from the opinion of the dissenters it follows that God has so involved his scripture, by which he wished men to be informed for salvation, that, with pious prayers poured out and all diligence brought forth, we are unable to attain its genuine sense by investigation. d) It will be useless. For what is written cannot be understood, and as fruitless is neglected. e) There will be nothing solid in theology; since its every deepest moment resides in the demonstration of the true sense of scripture.

Proof b. Whoever is the author of scripture, he is its best and authentic interpreter. But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear because everyone is the best interpreter of his own words. The minor is established by 2 Pet. 1, 21: "Holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." We argue further: If the Holy Spirit interprets scripture best, he expounds it either by immediate revelation or by mediate revelation. Not by immediate revelation; since that has no place in the church after the completion of the canon of scripture. Therefore, by mediate revelation comprehended in Holy Scripture.

Proof c. A public interpreter is one who, instructed with sufficient gifts and legitimately called, expounds the sense of scripture, elicited by accurate investigation, in a solemn assembly of the faithful either by living voice or by published writings, for their edification. This public interpretation of scripture is divinely committed to the ecclesiastical ministry. For a bishop ought to be apt to teach, 1 Tim. III, 2, and to rebuke those who contradict, Tit. I, 9. The public office of teaching, however, embraces both the explanation of the scriptures and their application to salutary use. Both are sought from the scripture itself, as from a storeroom, or a most wealthy treasury. For all scripture inspired by God is useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for discipline, that the man of God may be complete, thoroughly equipped for every good work. 2 Tim. III, 16, 17.

Proof d. A private interpreter is every man imbued with a pre-cognition of the rudiments of heavenly doctrine, possessing a moderate judgment, and knowledgeable of the language in which he reads the scripture; who, for the confirmation of his own faith, or also for the edification of others, investigates the sense of the heavenly oracles, and declares it in private homes. That the interpretation of the sacred letters is divinely permitted to him is clear: 1) Because Christ commends to search the scriptures to all men on their journey towards eternal life. John V, 39. Private men would not be ordered to search the sacred scripture, as a rich gold mine, unless it were given to them by God to dig out gold, or as a deep sea, unless to extract a pearl, or as a vast forest, unless to track the morning doe, or to put it more clearly, unless to inquire into the sense of the Holy Spirit. 2) Because a discerning judgment concerning matters of faith is permitted to private men. "I speak as to sensible people; judge for yourselves what I say." 1 Cor. X, 15. Those who understand the words of the apostles so accurately that they can pass judgment on them, that they are truly divine, are not denied the faculty of attaining and enunciating the meaning of the divine word. 3) The Bereans would have searched the scriptures in vain every day to see if what Paul preached was so, unless God had granted them the gift of discretion and testing, to discern the genuine sense of scripture from a foreign one introduced from without.

Proof e. Sacred scripture interprets itself by supplying certain means of interpretation. Which hermeneutical means are, by some theologians for the sake of brevity, comprehended in two precepts. 1) The nature and construction of biblical words and phrases according to the custom of the holy language are to be diligently considered. 2) From the antecedents and consequents, from the occasion, scope, moving cause, and circumstances, the mind of the speaker is to be investigated. Dr. FRANZ in his treatise on the interpretation of scripture, pp. 5, 6, 599, and Dr. GLASS in his philol. sacra, L. II, P. II, pp. 352 sqq., have explained and illustrated these laws of interpretation more fully. Conf. Dr. BAYER in comp. theol., p. 271. By other theologians, however, the means of interpreting the scriptures are taken in such breadth that they embrace in their scope also the requisite conditions in the interpreter of scripture and external aids, by which the discovered literal sense is secondarily confirmed and applied to salutary fruits. Wherefore, for the sake of easier teaching, we shall distinguish the hermeneutical means into antecedent, formal, and consequent.

The antecedent hermeneutical means are the requisite aids in the interpreter of the sacred letters, especially the more learned one, by which he is instructed and made suitable for inquiring, eliciting, and explaining the true sense of the sacred letters.

I. The primary hermeneutical aid is the illumination of the Holy Spirit, to be sought from God with pious prayers. For prophecy is given by the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. XII, 10; by the same are given the enlightened eyes of the mind, Eph. 1, 18. But God gives the Holy Spirit to those who ask, Luke XI, 3, and confers wisdom through prayers to those who ask for it, James I, 5. Wherefore, ardent prayer should always and ever precede the interpretation of scripture, that the Holy Spirit himself may teach us; not by immediate illumination, which is no longer to be expected; but mediately through scripture, where the Holy Spirit has deposited his sense.

II. A prior knowledge of the fundamental articles of faith, since their uniform harmony is the analogy of faith commended by St. Paul, never to be unobserved by the sacred interpreter. Rom. XII, 6.

III. A solid knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages. For in these languages the Spirit spoke through the prophets and apostles; in these languages the canonical scripture was adorned and has come down to us, preserved by the provident care of God. An interpreter unskilled in these original languages is forced to see with another's eyes, to hear with another's ears, to consult and follow another's brain. Wherefore, for an interpreter who would understand the sacred letters solidly, usefully, and perfectly (for the state of this life), and expound them to others, a study of the Greek and Hebrew languages is most necessary for a full apprehension of the efficacy and forcefulness latent in the shell of the words, and also for vindicating the true sense of scripture from the distortions of the heterodox.

IV. The ancillary apparatus of the liberal arts, both instrumental and principal. Hebrew and Greek grammar teach the idioms of the Hebrews and Greeks; rhetoric inculcates the method of explaining tropical and figurative locutions; logic demonstrates the method of eliciting a consequent from an antecedent. The philosophical disciplines are especially conducive to the distinct explanation of both the mixed articles of faith and the physical and moral matters mentioned in the sacred letters. Indeed, they also serve the sacred interpreter for a fuller illustration of matters of pure faith which scripture teaches (by analogy, contrast, etc.): they serve, I say, they do not direct him as a norm.

V. A burning love for truth, along with a desire, purpose, and genuine study to seek out and clearly narrate the sense of any biblical text. For to handle the words of scripture without a sincere study and desire for the truth, to be drawn from its source, is more than often to handle them without understanding, and without an effort to calm one's own and others' consciences. We learn by experience, meanwhile, that the study of truth, as if by injecting a blast, holds back preconceived erroneous opinions. For by indulging these, one inserts a foreign sense into scripture, not drawing the divine sense from it. HILARY says most beautifully in his book I on the Trinity: "The best reader is he who expects the understanding of the words from the words themselves rather than imposing it, and who brings it back rather than bringing it with him; nor does he compel that to seem to be contained in the words which he presumed was to be understood before reading."

VI. A diligent and often repeated reading of Holy Scripture, and its intimate meditation, joined at times with solidly learned interpreters. For the reader, turning over the codex of the sacred oracles again and again, in the course of time becomes accustomed to promptly understanding the phrases of scripture, and makes the style of the Holy Spirit familiar to himself. The exegesis of interpreters before the exergasia, or the act of interpretation, when conjoined with the reading of scripture and weighed with an equal balance of mind, is a cheiragogia or a leading by the hand, for inquiring into the sense of scripture with sagacious investigation.

Formal hermeneutical means are the internal and proximate aids for skillfully accomplishing interpretation, supplied by Holy Scripture itself, by which the inmost viscera of the biblical text are searched, so that its internal sense, conformable to the mind of the Holy Spirit, may be investigated, elicited, and brought to clarity. Such internal and proximate means of interpretation are:

I. A careful scrutiny of the individual words and connected phrases found in the original text. For since words are symbols of things, and as it were the beds of the internal sense, the signifying force and emphasis of individual words must be weighed, and the native meaning distinguished from the tropical, or transferred, meaning. The sacred rhetoric of Dr. GLASSIUS elucidates the tropes occurring in the sacred writings. Lexicons and concordances teach the native meaning. If a word is of many meanings, or of diverse signification, both the connection of the text and parallel places will supply the determinate signification analogous to the text; to which lexicons, concordances, paraphrases, and versions will provide assistance. Connected phrases are to be explained according to the idioms of the Greeks and Hebrews, with the grammar of Dr. GLASSIUS providing the light.

II. Attentive consideration of the scope which the Holy Spirit intends in the biblical text. Paul speaks gravely of the seducers of the people in 1 Tim. 1, 6, 7: "From which some, having missed the mark, have turned aside to vain talk, desiring to be teachers of the law, when they understand neither what they say nor the things about which they make confident assertions." CHRYSOSTOM, OECUMENIUS, and others have noted that in the word having missed the mark, a metaphor is taken from unskilled archers who, by shooting their arrows, do not hit the fixed target. For those who shoot, a certain target is predetermined; if they deflect from it, they strike the air, and expose themselves to the ridicule of all; so those who wish to be teachers of the law, and turn their minds away from charity and its companion, or leader, unblemished faith, from the scope of the law, they err shamefully. Lest the same happen to an interpreter of sacred scripture, it is fitting that he, about to expound a biblical text, should gaze with un-averted eyes upon the scope intended by the Holy Spirit. The principal scope of sacred scripture is the glory of God, Ps. CXIX, 18. The intermediate scope is the didactic, elenctic, epanorthotic, paedeutic, and paracletic instruction of man for salvation, 2 Tim. III, 16. Therefore, that is not a legitimate interpretation of scripture which derogates from the praise of God's holiness, goodness, justice, and power, and which undermines the pursuit of piety, and obstructs the fountains of solace.

III. A diligent and circumspect consideration of the entire context, of the antecedents and consequents. In the text of the discourse, both the order and the circumstances must be weighed. Sometimes the members of a prophetic and apostolic discourse cohere in a lucid order, as if in a concatenated series, so that one flows from another, or can be deduced. To the interpreter who carefully attends to this synapheia and connection of the biblical text, a direct path to elucidating its true sense is open. JEROME teaches this in Matthew, chap. XXV: "I always admonish the prudent reader not to acquiesce in superstitious interpretations, which are called 'comatic' according to the whim of their inventors, but to consider the preceding, the middle, and the following parts, and to connect for himself all that is written; for from the antecedents and consequents the true sense is gathered." To which AUGUSTINE gives his white stone of approval in tract. 20 on John: "The words of the gospel are rightly understood if they are found to be in concord with what precedes; for the preceding should agree with the consequent when truth speaks." CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Strom. 7, complains that heretics pluck certain things from the sacred letters, "not as the context (the web of the discourse) and the body of the prophecy require." IRENAEUS pours out the same complaints about the Valentinians who twist the scriptures, book I, chap. 2: "They leap over and the connection of the scriptures, and, as much as in them lies, they dissolve the members of the discourse. For they transfer and transform; and, while they make one thing out of another, they deceive many with a wisdom ill-compacted from the sayings of the Lord, which they accommodate to their own error." The circumstances inserted in the context concerning persons, occasion, and moving cause, time and place, shed no little light on the biblical sayings. LYRANUS in chap. XVIII of Deuteronomy alleges the saying of HILARY: "the understanding of sayings is to be taken from the causes of the speaker." Concerning the circumstance of time, AUGUSTINE says in sermon XVI on the words of the Lord: "Distribute the times, and the scripture will agree."

IV. The perpetual observation of the analogy of faith. We have shown above that the analogy of faith is the conformity of the doctrine of faith, or the uniform harmony of the fundamental articles of faith handed down in the clear sayings of scripture. For the dogmas of faith and the precepts of morals have their proper seats in the sacred letters, in which they are treated not incidentally or in passing, but directly, accurately, and professionally, and are proposed in perspicuous words; which dogmas of faith the Christian church has comprehended summarily in its symbols.

Therefore, every interpretation of a biblical saying that is somewhat obscure must be weak if it is repugnant to a clear utterance of scripture, or to a fundamental article of faith contained in the symbolic books of the Christian church.

V. The assiduous collation of parallel passages of scripture. For the already mentioned analogy of faith requires that the more obscure and fewer be explained from the clearer and more numerous, from which they derive some light. AUGUSTINE commends the collation of parallel passages in book II, de doct. christ., chap. 9: "To illustrate the more obscure locutions, let examples be taken from the more manifest, and let certain testimonies of certain sentences remove doubt about the uncertain ones." Parallel sayings, which deal with the same matter, or the same dogma of faith, are some parallel in respect to the phrase, others in respect to the sentence, or the thing itself. The same phrase which the Holy Spirit uses in Is. VI, 10, "Make the heart of this people dull, and their ears heavy, and blind their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and turn and be healed," you will see repeated six times in the N.T., Matth. XIII, 14; Mark IV, 12; Luke VIII, 10; John XII, 40; Acts XXVIII, 26; Rom. XI, 8. Although in that repetition, for the sake of either exegesis or brevity, some variation occurs. As for the thing, or the sentence, the parallel sayings are Gen. III, 15: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent," and 1 John III, 8: "The reason the Son of God appeared was to destroy the works of the devil." Therefore, let the interpreter sedulously consider; 1) whether the sayings are parallel in phrase or in sentence; 2) let him beware lest heterogeneous things be sold for parallel, or homogeneous, places; 3) let him provide that darkness is not cast upon the clearer sayings of scripture from the less clear. For it is the part of a good interpreter to bring the sense of a more obscure saying to clarity; on the contrary, to render a clear saying obscure by a contorted explanation is the part of a malicious slanderer.

VI. The proper and native signification of biblical words and phrases is to be constantly retained, unless the greatest necessity presses the interpreter to descend to a figurative sense of the words. This theological canon is to be observed here; we must persist in the proper and usual signification of words, as long as neither the analogy of faith, nor clearer parallel places of scripture, nor the antecedents and consequents in the context, nor the scope of the saying, nor other circumstances most openly oppose the proper signification of the words. This rule is founded on the natural reason of understanding, which commands us to attend to that sense which all conceive according to the common use and signification of words; for otherwise there will be no certainty for our understanding. The blessed LUTHER says most rightly in his book on the Babylonian captivity, p. 277: "No violence is to be done to the divine words, neither by man, nor by an angel; but as far as possible, they are to be kept in their simplest signification; and unless a manifest circumstance compels, they are not to be taken outside of grammar, lest an occasion be given to our adversaries to elude the whole scripture."

Consequent hermeneutical means are aids of interpretation which the sacred interpreter uses after the act of interpretation to secondarily confirm the literal sense of scripture, or to acquire a salutary knowledge of scripture. These are two:

I. The commentaries of the ancient and recent doctors of the church, whose exegetical labor we use as an external aid of interpretation, we do not rely on as a divine principle. Our blessed GERHARD says excellently in his exegesis L. de scriptura S. fol. m. 204: "God is not to be thought to have preserved for us the testimonies of the former antiquity in vain, but that they might be a certain aid for investigating the sense of scripture, and that, the true sense from the sacred letters having been perceived, the minds of the pious might be more confirmed." Wherefore the interpreter of scripture uses the commentaries of the doctors of the church 1) before the act of interpretation, insofar as they lead him by the hand to elicit the true sense of a biblical saying. 2) After the exergasia of interpretation, to confirm the meaning of this or that prophetic or apostolic oracle, already drawn from the very fount of scripture.

II. The serious application of the literal sense to a salutary, and that a multiple, use. The public interpreter of scripture, under the guidance of Paul, 2 Tim. III, 16, transfers the literal sense of the divine utterances a) to teaching, to consolidate true doctrine, b) to rebuke, to confute the false dogmas of heretics, c) to correction, to correct the depravity of morals, d) to training, to promote the pursuit of piety, e) to comfort, to instill the most present solaces into anxious minds. The private interpreter of scripture applies the literal sense of the heavenly oracles, investigated and found by assiduous reading, to his own and his neighbor's edification, and thus to the exercises of penitence, faith, and piety, so that by reading the sacred letters he may learn and become accustomed to know his sins more deeply, to lament them more bitterly, to detest them more gravely, to preserve, increase, and stabilize the faith conceived in Christ more diligently, to love, fear, and venerate God more intensely, to deny himself, to keep a sober and chaste mind, and to love his neighbor more strongly. Which application produces a salutary knowledge of sacred scripture.

The Antithesis is 1) that of the Pontificians who maintain that the true understanding of scripture is to be sought from the consensus of the fathers, from councils, and especially from the Roman Pontiff, whose authority in explaining the scriptures is supreme and infallible. 2) That of the Socinians, who think that reason, or the innate and cultivated principles and axioms of philosophy, contribute most especially to the interpretation of scripture. 3) That of the Quakers and Enthusiasts, who for the interpretation of a more obscure biblical saying desire a new and immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit; whose arguments we shall weigh.

I. If scripture were explained by scripture, the same would be explained by the same, which seems to be absurd. Resp. 1) To explain the same by the same, considered in a different way or respect, is not absurd. Indeed, a prince's diploma is expounded by the same diploma, a father's testament by the same testament; just as the light of the sun notifies itself and presents itself to be seen. 2) The different way of considering consists in this, that a biblical saying is explained according to the antecedents and consequents, which differ from it to some extent; or if it is proposed in the vernacular tongue, its sense is elicited from the original language. 3) When we assert that scripture is to be explained by scripture, then in the subject, by scripture is understood a less clear divine utterance; in the predicate, a clearer statement of the Holy Spirit. But the natural reason of understanding requires that the more obscure be explained by the clearer.

II. Whatever scripture interprets itself, that is not to be interpreted by the doctors of the church; But according to the mind of the Protestant doctors, sacred scripture interprets itself. Therefore. Resp. 1) Whatever scripture interprets itself, that does not necessarily need to be interpreted by the doctors of the church; I grant. For sacred scripture teaches the dogmas of faith and precepts of morals necessary for a man to know for salvation so clearly and perspicuously that the interpretations of the doctors of the church are not simply necessary. They are, however, useful for an easier and fuller understanding of scripture, and also for showing the application of the literal sense to practice and salutary use, and thus for the edification of the faithful. 2) Scripture interprets itself not always in act, but in potency, by supplying certain means of interpretation, which the doctors of the church employ, so that what seems more difficult to understand may receive some light from what is easier and plainer.

III. The hermeneutical means adduced above are human and probable. Therefore, through them the sense of scripture is not certainly and infallibly elicited. Resp. The formal hermeneutical means are not human, nor probable, but most certain. For the clearer sayings, from which the less clear are elucidated, are divine sayings; The antecedents and consequents are the pronouncements of the Holy Spirit; The Hebrew and Greek words are receptacles, containers, and as it were the beds of the divine sense; The analogy of faith has the Holy Spirit as its author; Therefore the hermeneutical means are aids of interpretation not human, but divine, not extrinsic to scripture, but intrinsic, although their use comes extrinsically from men.

IV. Whatever scripture has proceeded from the Holy Spirit, that must be interpreted by the Holy Spirit, and not by the doctors of the church. But Holy Scripture, etc. Therefore. Resp. By distinguishing between the principal and the ministerial interpreter of Holy Scripture. The former is the Holy Spirit, the latter is the doctor of the church, following the guidance of the Holy Spirit speaking in and through the scripture. The ministry of the latter in declaring the scriptures is so far from excluding the Holy Spirit, that it rather requires from him to search the scriptures, John V, 39, to attend to the prophetic word, 2 Pet. 1, 19, and to teach the sacred letters, 1 Tim. III, 2.

V. Whatever means of interpretation are common to heretics who teach falsehood, the true sense of scripture cannot be elicited by them. But the means of interpretation adduced above are common to heretics. Therefore. Resp. 1) The Pontificians conclude against themselves. For the interpreters of scripture who are addicted to the Pontifical religion use the means mentioned above. Therefore, they too are unable to elicit the true sense of scripture. 2) We deny the major premise. For it is established that Holy Scripture itself is common to the orthodox and the heterodox, to true Christians and hypocrites; which nevertheless remains the true means of illuminating, converting, regenerating, and renewing men corrupted by sin. 3) It is no wonder that the hermeneutical means are common to heretics. For from them, as common and on both sides conceded means of interpretation, they can be convinced of their errors and finally, with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, be converted. 4) A distinction is made between the abuse and the legitimate use of hermeneutical means. Heretics abuse hermeneutical means to palliate preconceived opinions which they infer into scripture.

VI. The hermeneutical means listed above cannot be applied everywhere. Therefore, by them the sense of scripture cannot always and everywhere be investigated and found. For the collation of antecedents and consequents does not find a place where there is a non-continuous discourse, as in the proverbs of Solomon, or where the order is inverted by inversion. The collation of parallel places confers no utility for expounding unique words, which are read only once in scripture. Nor is the scrutiny of words, phrases, and style a universal means of interpreting the scriptures; since the biblical style is diverse. For those born in a court, like Isaiah, speak differently from those who came from a sheepfold, like Amos. Resp. 1) The hermeneutical means are not to be applied separately, but conjointly. If one cannot be applied, let us use another. 2) When the discourse is not continuous; let the sources be inspected, let every word be investigated and the whole phrase be considered, let parallel places be compared, let the analogy of faith be observed, nor should one recede from the literal and proper sense without the most urgent cause; and a way will be opened to find the sense of the non-continuous discourse. The signification of unique words is to be sought from the derivation of the word, from the paraphrase of others, and from lexicons. Inversions are put back in order, provided the circumstances are accurately weighed. Finally, the biblical style is uniform as to substance, diverse as to accidental conformation. See above, Question XVII, in the antithesis.

VII. The safest means of interpreting the scriptures is the consensus of the Fathers, who relied on the same means of interpretation. Resp. We venerate with a grateful mind the consensus of the Fathers interpreting the sacred codex, such as it exists today in the church, we receive it with a grateful hand, as an external means of interpreting the scriptures, a guide, a witness, a confirmation, but we do not receive it as a divine, fundamental, and infallible principle, from which as from a most limpid fount the true sense of the heavenly oracles is to be drawn. For we see that most of them dissent greatly in expounding the divine utterances, not rarely depart from themselves, infer a dissonant or incongruous sense into the scriptures, and use a style of speaking so obscure and perplexed that their writings need a new light, a new interpreter. What then? That very few of the most ancient knew Hebrew, of the Latins Greek, and thus they were destitute of a certain necessary hermeneutical means.

VIII. The protestant churches take ill counsel by permitting the interpretation of sacred scripture to common and unlearned men of both sexes, whose interpretation is a private interpretation, disapproved by the apostle Peter in his 2nd Epistle, c. I, 20. Resp. By distinguishing between a private interpretation and the interpretation of a private man. When a private man piously meditates on the sacred scripture for his own and his neighbor's edification, and investigates and elucidates its internal sense by comparing the antecedents and consequents and observing the scope of the speaker, that interpretation is not private or one's own, since it is sought from a divine principle that is available and exposed to all. On the contrary, when a hundred bishops and a hundred councils, from principles of reason, human authority, and preconceived opinions, infer a sense into scripture that is inconsistent with the intention of the Holy Spirit, then it is a private interpretation, since it is fashioned according to human whim and ingenuity. Moreover, we do not permit common men to interpret the scriptures in a solemn assembly of the faithful. It is sufficient for common men, who attentively and devoutly turn over the sacred codex, that the scripture by itself reveals and exhibits the sense of the Holy Spirit, so that they are allowed to apprehend it and apply it to salvation.

Example: The interpretation of scripture is numbered among the singular gifts of the Holy Spirit, which are not granted to all common people, 1 Cor. XII, 10 & XIV, 26. Resp. In 1 Cor. XII, 10, the apostle commemorates the extraordinary gifts, conferred in a peculiar manner and measure upon the doctors of the primitive church at the beginning of the nascent Christian church, of which some were renowned for these gifts, others for others. For the apostle writes: "to another various kinds of tongues, to another the interpretation of tongues (are given)." On which words Dr. CALOVIUS in his bibl. illustrat. fol. 380 thus comments: "There were those who spoke in tongues, and yet could not conveniently interpret what they said. And conversely there were those who had the gift of interpreting what others uttered in a foreign tongue, and were not so much instructed to lead as to interpret what was taught by others." The office of those who are called professors of languages in later ages succeeded this gift of interpretation. In 1 Cor. XIV, 26, Paul deals with public interpretation, which takes place in the solemn assembly of the faithful. The apostle's words are, v. 27, 28: "Let one interpret; but if there is no one to interpret, let each of them keep silent in the church and speak to himself and to God." We do not maintain that extraordinary gifts of interpreting the scriptures were given by the Holy Spirit to common people, nor do we permit public interpretation in the church to them, but we assert truly that to all men, even of the lowest condition, who read the sacred letters attentively, are knowledgeable of the language in which they read them, and sedulously consider the context, it is divinely given to attain the genuine sense of the proposed biblical saying and, when the occasion presents itself, to expound it to others in private homes for salutary edification.

ON TRANSLATION.

Question XLIX. Is it permissible and expedient to translate the Hebrew language of the old, and the Greek of the new testament into vernacular languages?

To translate the most holy word of God from the Hebrew font of the old, and the Greek of the new testament, into vernacular and commonly known languages for the salutary knowledge of the laity, is not only permissible (a), but also greatly expedient (b).

Obs. 1. A vernacular language is said to be that which is familiar to any nation, maternal, and commonly known.

Obs. 2. It is not only asked about the right of translating the original languages of the old and new testament into vernaculars, but also about the utility and hypothetical necessity of the versions.

Proof a. 1. Whatever things are preached in languages familiar to all nations, there is nothing to prohibit them from being written in vernacular and commonly known languages. But the mighty works of God are preached in languages familiar to all nations. Therefore. The major premise is established because the preached word and the written word do not differ in reality. Therefore, if the preaching of the divine word in various commonly known languages did not detract from its majesty, what will a multilingual writing, or one adorned with various vernacular languages, detract? The minor is evident from Acts II, 11, where the evangelist Luke records that the apostles on the day of Pentecost spoke in various tongues the mighty works of God. In which most august feast of Pentecost, the Holy Spirit dedicated the languages of all nations and consecrated them to propagating the glory of God and the salvation of men, that they might be, as it were, clear channels through which the streams of divine grace flowing from the sacred fountains might run down into the souls of men for obtaining eternal salvation. BELLARMINE attacks the major proposition in book II, de verbo Dei, chap. 16, fol. 123, thinking that it is wrongly concluded from the preaching of the divine word to its writing. The Cardinal's words are: "If the consequence from preaching to writing is good, why did the apostles only write in Greek, when they preached in so many languages? The word of God is rightly preached in the vulgar tongue because preaching contains an explanation which all easily grasp: But when it is written, it is written bare, and is not grasped by all." Resp. (1) BELLARMINE changes the state of the controversy. For we speak of versions, he of the original canon, which, since it was Greek, could be translated by the churches to which the apostolic discourse came into the vernacular languages of each church. But the reason why the apostles wrote everything in Greek is this, that at that time the Greek language was the most common of all, as M. TULLIUS testifies in his oration for Archias the Poet, saying: "Greek is read in all nations: Latin is contained within its own narrow borders, to be sure." (2) Holy Scripture explains itself either in act, or in potency, by supplying certain means of interpretation.

II. The perpetual practice of the church confirms the same. For (a) Moses and the prophets wrote their books in the vernacular language of the Israelites, Deut. XXXI, 11. (b) When after the return from the Babylonian captivity the pure Hebrew language was no longer vernacular to the Israelites, but was mixed with the Chaldean idiom, a Chaldean paraphrase provided help. Whence the threefold Targum came forth; the Babylonian, that of Onkelos, and the Jerusalem. (c) When under the rule of the Greeks the Greek language became known to almost all nations, under the auspices of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, the books of the Old Testament were translated into the Greek language by 72 elders sent from Judea. (*) (d) The evangelists and apostles wrote the books of the N.T. in the Greek language, which was at that time the language of almost all nations. (e) When on account of the vastness of the Roman empire the Latin language began to be familiar to many nations, various Latin versions followed. (f) When the gospel was propagated to all nations, and every tongue began to praise the Lord, vernacular translations, as many as possible, accompanied the evangelical light. THEODORETUS testifies to this in book V, de curand. graec. affect., tom. II: "The Hebrew books were converted not only into the Greek idiom, but also into the Roman language, the Egyptian, Persian, Indian, Armenian, Scythian, and indeed the Sauromatic, and once and for all, as I may say, into all the languages which the nations use to this day." AUGUSTINE agrees in book II, de doctrin. christ., chap. V: "The divine scripture, having proceeded from one language, being spread far and wide through the various languages of interpreters, became known to the nations for salvation."

Proof b. from 1 Cor. XIV, 6, 7, 8, 9, 14: "Now, brothers, if I come to you speaking in tongues, what good will I be to you, unless I speak to you either by revelation, or by prophecy, or by teaching? Even in the case of lifeless things that make a sound, such as the flute or the harp, how will anyone know what is being played unless there is a distinction in the notes? Again, if the trumpet does not sound a clear call, who will get ready for battle? So it is with you. Unless you speak intelligible words with your tongue, how will anyone know what you are saying? You will just be speaking into the air. -- For if I pray in a tongue, my spirit prays, but my mind is unfruitful." The apostle shows, I. that all divine offices (to which belong the preaching, reading, and meditation of the divine word, pious prayers, spiritual songs, the dispensation of the sacraments) performed in a foreign language, which the assembly of faithful souls does not understand, lack salutary fruit. For just as musical instruments, whether they be harps or trumpets, which do not produce a distinct sound, are of no use; so all preaching and reading of the divine word, which is in an exotic language, all public prayers which are recited in the church in a language unknown to the common people, are void of salutary fruit. Whence we argue: In whatever language the people are skilled, in that language it performs the divine offices with salutary fruit. But it is skilled not in the Hebrew, Greek, or Latin language, but in the vernacular. Therefore, not in the Hebrew, Greek, or Latin language, but in the vernacular language the people performs the divine offices (to which belongs the reading of the sacred scripture) with salutary fruit.

II. Whoever are commanded to search the scriptures, to them the scriptures should be proposed in the vernacular language. But all men journeying to eternal life are commanded by Christ to search the scriptures, John V, 39. Therefore. The major premise is established; because the scrutiny of an unknown scripture, whose sense cannot be investigated or grasped, is vain and void.

III. Most worthy of being impressed upon a mindful memory is the exhortation of Paul in Col. III, 16, saying: "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." The apostle exhorts the laity to the reading and meditation of the divine word committed to letters, and admonishes them to grant it a fixed seat in the church and in the inmost recesses of the soul, so that, like a most desired guest kindly received into a home, it may become domestic, familiar, and very well known to them. Nor does the apostle add without emphasis: "let it dwell richly in all wisdom"; as if he were to say: "not only a particle of scripture, but the whole of it also is to be turned over in repeated turns, meditated upon, and impressed upon the mind"; for which purpose it should be treated prudently, piously, and rightly understood, and accommodated to living practice, that you may mutually admonish and edify one another through psalms; so familiar should the word of God be to you, that from it you may compose hymns and spiritual songs to be sung not only with the mouth or a sonorous voice, but also with the most joyous affection of the heart, praising immortal God for the benefits conferred upon you. But how will the word of Christ dwell in the souls of (*) What should be noted regarding numbers b. and c. will be taught to you by those who have worked excellently on the Criticism of the Holy Old Testament, of whom the prince is undoubtedly the Holy Venerable JOHANN GOTTLÖB CARPZOV.

the laity abundantly; how will it be treated by them prudently; or what material for mutual edification through psalms will it provide, unless it is read in the vernacular language most known to all?

The Antithesis is that of the Papists, some of whom disapprove of all translation into vulgar languages, others concede it, but sharply contend that it is not for the good of the church that the laity should read the scripture in the vernacular language and perform the sacred rites in it. Their main arguments are:

I. In the times of Ezra, the Holy Scripture was not read to the Israelites in the vernacular language. Therefore, it should not be read in the vernacular language today either. The antecedent is proven because the Israelites, after the lapse of 70 years during which they were in Babylon among the Chaldeans, had forgotten their own language, Hebrew, and had learned Chaldean, which was then familiar or vulgar to them, as is clear from Nehem. VIII, 8, when the book of the law of the Lord, written in Hebrew, was read to the people, Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites interpreted it, otherwise the people would not have understood it. Resp. (1) Our adversaries do not deny that before Ezra, for a long stretch of time, the Bible was read to the people in the commonly known language, namely Hebrew. Wherefore it is our part to follow the custom of the flourishing Israelite church, rather than the declining one. (2) We are not induced to believe that the Israelites, within the course of 70 years, had completely forgotten the Hebrew language, of which Chaldean is a dialect, since many fathers were still living. If they had forgotten it, with what fruit could Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the last of the prophets, have preached or written in Hebrew? (3) It is a solemn practice for exegetes to interpret even the clearest biblical sayings by explaining them more fully and applying them to use, so that the minds of readers or hearers may be imbued with a saving knowledge of them.

II. To this day, in the synagogues, the Jews read the scriptures in Hebrew, although the Hebrew language is not vulgar to any nation at this time. Resp. The Jews from boyhood make the Hebrew language familiar to themselves, and so it is still in a way vernacular to them. Therefore, the Jews read in Hebrew because they understand Hebrew and honor the original language; they would not read it if they did not understand it.

III. The apostles wrote their epistles to peoples not in the language that was vernacular to them, but in the Greek language. Paul wrote to the Romans not in the Roman idiom, or Latin; Peter and James wrote to the Hebrews dispersed throughout the world not in Hebrew, but in the Greek language. Therefore, neither today should the bible be translated into the vernacular language. Resp. (1) The apostles wrote in Greek because at that time the Greek language was the most common. Therefore, because in Germany the German language is the most common of all, the scripture should be read in German. (2) Paul wrote to the Romans not only to those born in Rome, or endowed with Roman citizenship, but to all who dwelt in Rome, whether they were Greeks, or Italians, or Jews converted to Christ, who knew Greek.

IV. The unity of the church is to be preserved; Therefore, through one language which all understand. Resp. Therefore, the unity of the German church is to be preserved through the German language, which all Germans understand. Example I: The discussion is about the catholic church, whose unity is to be preserved through the Latin language, which all nations understand. Resp. Neither is the Roman church catholic, because it is not diffused throughout the whole world; Nor do all nations understand the Latin language; since it is unknown in Greece, is a stranger in Asia, is an exile from the great kingdoms of Africa; and what part of the west and the north is skilled in it? Example II: Yet all learned men understand the Latin language. Resp. It is the business not only of learned men, but also of any common people, to search the scriptures, John V, 39, which they would search in vain in an exotic language. Example III: But councils cannot be held except in a common language, because not all fathers have the gift of tongues. Resp. (1) Councils are extraordinary and rare assemblies, to which the ordinary, frequent, and almost daily assemblies of the faithful ought not to be accommodated. (2) Let fathers be called to councils who have the gift of tongues; or let a place be given to interpreters, whose use was made in the Council of Ephesus, in which the Latin letters of Celestine were translated into the Greek idiom. Conf. Dr. DANNHAVER. Hodomor. pap. part one, pag. 209.

V. Whatever language changes every century, scripture is not to be translated into

it. The vernacular language changes every century. Therefore. Resp. Neither does the whole language change every century, nor is the understanding of scripture disturbed by a slight change. But if it should happen that over the course of several centuries the vernacular language were to vary, the translation could also be varied without danger to the doctrine of faith: just as old monuments, written in monastic letters, have been interpolated with a recent and customary form of writing without any danger to the faith.

VI. Let us be content with the three most excellent languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, which the cross of Christ has honored. Resp. Pilate ordered the title of the cross of Christ to be expressed in three languages, so that the peoples who were present in Jerusalem, Jews, Greeks, and Latins, might read it; he would have written it, if Germans had been present, also in German. But the excellence of a language here is to be esteemed from no other source than its use, as far as we are concerned; for all languages have been sanctified by the divine spirit, Acts II, 11. A golden sword is more excellent than an iron one; yet a soldier prefers to use the latter in battle.

VII. There is no perfect version, free from all errors. Therefore we must not have recourse to versions. Resp. (1) Therefore let not even the Pontificians take refuge in the Latin Vulgate version, which teems with many errors, but let them inspect the sources themselves, namely the Hebrew and Greek text. (2) Divine providence has most wisely watched over the versions of the sacred scripture, lest they be so corrupted that one could not draw from them what is sufficient for saving information.

ON THE FINAL PERFECTION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE.

Question L. Is sacred scripture so perfect that it contains fully and sufficiently all dogmas of faith and precepts of morals?

Sacred scripture is perfect with a final perfection, so that there are no dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, necessary for a man on his journey towards eternal salvation to believe and do, which are not contained in it either explicitly, as to the letter, or implicitly, as to the matter and sense.

Obs. I. Sacred scripture is perfect (a) in respect to its matter; because no God-breathed book, related to the perpetual canon of faith, has been lost. (b) In respect to its form, because no error has crept into the authentic text through the negligence or perfidy of amanuenses. (c) In respect to its end; because it sufficiently hands down all the dogmas of faith and precepts of morals for a man to attain eternal salvation. From which this final perfection is called by some theologians the sufficiency of sacred scripture. See Dr. CALOV. in system. theol. tom. 1, p. 609. AUGUSTINE speaks aptly of this sufficiency of scripture in tract. XLIX on John, c. 20: "Those things were chosen to be written which seemed sufficient for the salvation of believers." (*)

Obs. II. When we assert that sacred scripture is sufficient for salvation, (1) we remove every co-principle required for obtaining eternal salvation, whether it be called tradition, or the consensus of ecclesiastical antiquity, or a decree of the Roman Pontiff; (2) we imply that sacred scripture is sufficient both for proving the dogmas of faith and for confuting the false dogmas of heretics.

(*) The perfection of Holy Scripture is altogether fourfold. 1) With respect to the books, that none of them has ever been lost; 2) with respect to the words and individual parts of each book, that certainly in no place has the authentic text suffered even the slightest corruption in such a universal way that, among so many and such variant readings, the true and genuine one has not always been preserved in approved codices; wherefore these two, corruption of the text and corruption of a codex, are not to be confused with each other; 3) with respect to the truths, that nothing false or unworthy of God is contained in the sacred letters; 4) with respect to the end, that all the dogmas of faith and morals, which pertain to the universal order of salvation, have been committed to monuments without any defect, so that nothing more can be desired. The first, as well as the second, is specifically called the integrity of scripture. The third is usually, although less latently, called certainty, or even infallibility. The fourth is called, as is customary, sufficiency, or as others express it, plenitude.

Obs. III. Some fundamental articles of faith are contained in the sacred letters explicitly, in the exact words, as to the letter, in express words and terminating terms; but some articles of faith are held in sacred scripture implicitly, according to the matter, as to the thing and sense, so that they can be deduced from sacred scripture by a ready, proximate, manifest, and necessary consequence. Thus the whole Apostles' Creed, as to the matter, is contained in the scriptures, although not in the same words, or in the same series of articles. (**)

That sacred scripture is perfect with final perfection, is proven I. from the classic passage Deut. IV, 2: "You shall not add to this word which I command you, nor take from it, that you may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you." God through Moses prohibits the addition of new dogmas, different from the Mosaic pentateuch; he also prohibits the diminution of the Mosaic doctrine, whereby anyone would dare to take anything from it, as if it were not (a) from God through Moses, or (b) as if it were not canonical, pertaining to the norm of the church. We may compare with this Mosaic oracle the parallel statement of the apostle John in Apoc. XXII, 18, 19: "For I testify to everyone who hears the words of the prophecy of this book; If anyone adds to these things, God will add to him the plagues that are written in this book; and if anyone takes away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part from the Book of Life, from the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book." We refer the words of John by right and merit to the entire Holy Scripture; because the apostle with this memorable saying has fortified the entire sacred codex as with a seal, most lucidly testifying that

(**) For the constitution of the case, when we dispute concerning the perfection of sacred scripture, with respect to its end, these three things pertain, to be held tightly: 1) We dispute concerning sacred scripture, and indeed the whole of it, and not concerning individual books, viewed separately. We concede that in one or another book all things sufficient for our end are not contained. For what need would there have been for more? PAUL says expressly, 2 Tim. III, 16, all, he says, scripture, the whole of scripture, and its universal parts. For what he had said before in v. 15, in the plural number, the holy writings, he now expresses in the singular number and with a collective name, all scripture, to signify that all parts of scripture, considered not separately, but conjointly, make the minister of God most instructed for every good work of doctrine. 2) The things which are sufficient for the end of scripture are precisely those which pertain partly to the means by which alone we attain salvation, and partly to the order of salvation, namely both things to be believed and things to be done. To the former pertain teaching and refutation, to the latter training and correction. 3) As to perfection, two things are to be accurately weighed. (a) Distinguish the times. The Pentateuch, when there was no other inspired book, was altogether sufficient, and therefore perfect, for that condition of times and men. In it were described certain signs of the future Messiah, but only those whose knowledge men could be content with before those things existed which thereafter gave occasion for more signs, e.g., that the Messiah would be descended from the family of David, before the second temple was destroyed, after the completion of the 70 weeks, which were finally determined by Daniel. Who is ignorant of the difference between the O. and N. Covenants? But for us in the N.T. it is necessary to know that the Messiah has already come, and that he is none other than Jesus of Nazareth. The same is the reason for this truth; that in our age we are not obligated by the ritual laws. The sacred ceremonies were indeed to be sacredly observed by the Jews in the O.T., but for us in the N.T. they are not only not necessary, but even pernicious, since that whole cult was an image, signifying the future sponsor, which was to come; therefore, if anyone were still devoted to that cult, he would by that very fact deny the present sponsor, whom we ought to profess, Gal. III, 23, 25; V, 2, 4. (b) Nothing can be perfect and sufficient for its end, unless it is clear and certain. But this cannot but be signified either by the clearest words, or by the most certain principles, from which an open and necessary consequence is effected. These things having been so posited, this is what we affirm with all asseveration: Sacred scripture, and indeed the whole of it (prop. 1) in all things both to be believed and to be done (prop. 2) for the condition of our N.T. times (prop. 3(α)), is so perfect and sufficient, that it contains all things perspicuously and certainly exposed, whether the explicit, or according to the implicit sense (prop. 3(β)).

the entire sacred scripture is so consummated and perfect that nothing should be added to it or taken from it. We argue; Whatever scripture nothing is to be added to or taken away from, that is perfect. But to Holy Scripture etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear, because that is perfect to which nothing is lacking, and to which nothing ought to be added. The Pontificians object (1) that Moses speaks of the word of God handed down by living voice; (2) of the pentateuch of Moses, which admitted the addition of many books; (3) of the addition of contrary dogmas repugnant to the Mosaic doctrine; (4) that the Apostle John prohibits the corruption of the apocalyptic book, but does not prohibit other books from being written, or other dogmas from being taught.

Resp. to I: To every word that Moses commands, he wills nothing to be added, nothing to be taken away from it. But the written word of Moses is every word that he commanded. Therefore. To II: In the pentateuch of Moses the sum of the doctrine of faith and morals is contained; to which the prophets and apostles did not add new and different dogmas, but explained the same dogmas in more words, and showed their fulfillment. To III: Addition is not of contrary things, for by them the prior is abolished and destroyed, but of different things, by which a place is conceded to the prior, but to it as to something imperfect something is superadded. To IV: The words of John are to be taken as much of the entire canonical scripture as of the apocalypse; since all canonical books, dictated by the same spirit, possess the same authority, and all are directed to the same end, eternal salvation, which end can only be attained by divine manifestation; for obtaining this, the sacred scripture alone suffices, and therefore it needs no addition, and is not to be diminished by any detraction.

II. From the very clear statement of St. Paul in 2 Tim. III, 15, 16: "Because from childhood you have known the sacred letters, which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus. (For) all scripture inspired by God is also useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for discipline, which is in righteousness; that the man of God may be complete, thoroughly equipped for every good work." From this apostolic saying a threefold argument arises; I. Whatever scripture can make a man wise for salvation through faith in Christ, that is finally perfect.

But the divinely inspired scripture etc. Therefore. II. Whatever scripture is useful for all ecclesiastical functions, that is perfect. But the divinely inspired scripture etc. Therefore. III. Whatever scripture renders the ministry of the church, upon which more things are incumbent in knowledge and in the administration of office than upon the faithful hearer, perfect, that abounds with final perfection. But the sacred scripture etc. Therefore.

The Pontificians object; (1) The expression all scripture is said not collectively, but distributively, because the individual parts of scripture are God-breathed, which however are not so perfect as to refuse addition. (2) The apostle speaks of the scripture of the Old Testament, which admitted the addition of the N.T. (3) This saying deals not with perfection, but with utility. Resp. to I: The apostle speaks of the whole scripture, which both with respect to the whole biblical canon, and with respect to its parts, is God-breathed and useful, contributing to the four uses mentioned by the apostle; nor is there any part of scripture which, though it does not contribute to all those uses, does not contribute to some use, and which rejects addition made by human authority. To II: If the scripture of the Old Testament contributes much momentum to producing those four uses; certainly the scripture of the N.T. will contribute more, which was added not by way of a partial norm, but by way of a clearer light. To III: This saying deals with that utility of sacred scripture which renders the man of God perfect.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificians who maintain that the word of God is not perfect with a final perfection, but that unwritten traditions must be added to it.

They rely I. on the testimony of John, John XXI, 25: "There are also many other things that Jesus did; were every one of them to be written, I suppose that the world itself could not contain the books." Resp. A distinction is made between the sayings and deeds of Christ, and between the necessary heads of Christian doctrine. Not all of the former, but the latter have been committed to the sacred letters.

II. They adduce the testimony of Christ, John XVI, 12: "I still have many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now." Resp. The savior does not speak of new and different dogmas from those which he had delivered to them, but of a fuller explanation and a more complete knowledge of the doctrine of Christ. For he adds in v. 13: "When the Spirit of truth comes, he will guide you into all the truth." The sense is; I have more things to say to you, but you do not grasp them at this time, both because of your preconceived opinions and because of your excessive sorrow of mind. Wherefore I will reserve them for the future miraculous outpouring of the Holy Spirit, who will more fully illustrate all the dogmas handed down by me, and will explain them to you more lucidly. (*)

III. The Pontificians go on to demonstrate that Holy Scripture does not contain all things necessary to be believed, by adducing certain things to be believed that are not comprehended in the sacred letters. I. According to their mind, no remedy is indicated in the Old Testament for females, by which they might be freed from original sin. (**) II. Nowhere in Holy Scripture is the biblical canon designated. III. Nothing is had in scripture about infant baptism. IV. The arduous article concerning the Holy Trinity is not perspicuously taught in Holy Scripture. (***) V. The number of sacraments is not found in it. VI. Nothing is read in it about the sacrifices of the Old Testament expiating sins by the power of the passion and death of Christ. VII. Scripture nowhere defines that Mary the God-bearer always remained a virgin.

Resp. to I: A corporal and external remedy for females in the Old Testament was not necessary. It is sufficient that they were born from circumcised fathers. What they lacked in the sacrament of circumcision, faith embracing the divine promise compensated for; "I will be God to your offspring," Gen. XVII, 7. Which promise was applied to the female sex through the prayers of the parents, through sacrifices and oblations. To II: the biblical canon either formally denotes the catalogue of biblical books, or materially designates the canonical books themselves. The catalogue of biblical books, since it is a historical enumeration, is not an article of faith necessary to be known for salvation. But the divinity of the canonical books is known from their efficacious and heart-bending power, communicated to them by the concurrent Holy Spirit. To III: although this proposition does not exist explicitly in scripture; infants are to be baptized, yet it is elicited by a valid consequence from this: "All nations are to be baptized," Matth. XXVIII, 29. To IV: the mystery of the Holy Trinity is perspicuously taught in the sacred scriptures, 1 John V, 7. To V: the septenary number of the sacraments has Peter Lombard as its author, not the Holy Spirit; and therefore it is sought in vain in the scriptures. The binary number of the sacraments will be lucidly proven by us below from the sacred letters. To VI: that the Jewish sacrifices signified the death of Christ, we read clearly in the scripture of the New Testament, Gal. III, 24; Heb. VIII, 5; c. IX, 9. To VII: the perpetual virginity of Mary, after she gave birth to Christ, is not an article of faith precisely necessary to be believed for salvation; it is, however, gathered probably from scripture, because her care was entrusted by Christ to John, John XIX, 26. If she had had other sons besides Jesus, they would have taken care of their mother. Epiphanius collected more arguments from the sacred codex, Heresies LXXVIII.

(*) These words of Christ are to be understood not of things to be believed, nor of things to be done, but altogether of things to be endured, as has been demonstrated both from the word bearing and from the coherence of the words with the antecedents, v. 1, 3, 4, and from other arguments in my tenth sacred dissertation, num. VI. And so by all truth Christ signifies that which is called paracletic, which pertains to perturbed souls, pressed by so great a burden of calamities, to be refreshed and confirmed with divine solace, since indeed by that doctrine the Holy Spirit, as the Paraclete (v. 7), would perform this very office of his. In which manner, all the nerves of the argumentation which the Roman Catholics try to extort from this saying of Christ are cut.

(**) But neither can our adversaries produce any tradition from which they themselves have known this, which they opine to be lacking in scripture.

(***) To III & IV we also argue according to the human manner. If traditions were necessary, because of a defect in scripture; sacred scripture would offer us no sufficiently suitable proof. But our adversaries themselves have been accustomed to demonstrate both infant baptism and the Holy Trinity with arguments drawn from scripture. Therefore, either they should impudently dare to say that they use weak arguments, or they should not be ashamed to confess openly that there is no need of tradition.

Question LI. Should unwritten traditions be added to the written word of God and be received with an equal affection of piety?

Unwritten traditions are neither to be added to the divine word (a), nor to be received with an equal affection of piety as it (b).

Obs. I. The word tradition, derived from tradere (to hand down), in its broadest sense denotes any act by which something is transferred to another and is given as if from hand to hand. In the present case, however, in a stricter sense, it denotes the act of informing, by which a certain doctrine is handed down and inculcated to someone.

Obs. II. Just as elsewhere the names of actions are often transferred to their objects, so here the word tradition is taken either actively, or passively or objectively. Taken actively, it signifies a fixed and pedagogical instruction, by which some part of doctrine, pertaining to faith, morals, or external discipline, is instilled in someone. Conf. DANNHAY. hodom. prior. Pap. phantasm. 1, p. 224. Accepted passively, it designates the doctrine handed down.

Obs. III. Tradition, taken passively for the doctrine handed down, denotes either generally any doctrine handed down by Christ and the apostles, whether it was later comprehended in writing or not. In which sense the vulgate interpreter used the word tradition, Acts VI, 14, for the law of Moses, which was comprehended in writing, and 2 Thess. II, 15, Paul calls the doctrine handed down by him both by word and by writing a tradition; or specifically, as it is contrasted with the doctrine handed down through scripture, and is the same as doctrine handed down only by voice, not written. This latter signification is of this place.

Obs. IV. But since something is said to be contained in the scriptures either expressly and explicitly, or implicitly, implicitly and by consequence; tradition also, contrasted with scripture, can be taken either for doctrine which is not written expressly and in so many words by the prophets and apostles, but handed down by voice and propagated, although it is contained implicitly and as to the matter in the scriptures; or for doctrine which is contained in the scriptures neither in express words nor as to the matter, but handed down only by voice, and preserved in the church by a continuous succession. In the former sense, the Apostles' Creed is sometimes called by the name of tradition by the fathers. Conf. Dr. CHEMNITZ in his examination of the Council of Trent, on traditions, fol. 63, where he alleges Irenaeus and Tertullian, who, reciting almost verbatim those articles of faith which the Apostles' Creed embraces, appeal to the apostolic tradition on account of certain heretics who either rejected, or depraved the scriptures, or complained that they were insufficient; although the entire Apostles' Creed, as to the matter, is contained in the scriptures, though not in the same words and in the same series of articles. For Irenaeus himself in books III, IV, and V, proluxly proves and confirms those articles of faith from scripture. Thus ORIGEN and AUGUSTINE called infant baptism an apostolic tradition. Conf. CHEMNITZ in the same place, fol. 69, which yet they prove and establish by manifest testimonies of scripture. In the present controversy, we are concerned with the Pontificians about traditions in the latter signification.

Obs. V. Orthodox theologians distinguish the traditions of the church into ritual, historical, exegetical, testimonial, and dogmatic. See Dr. KROMAYER in his theol. post.-polem. p. 52, and conf. Dr. CHEMNITZ, exam. conc. Trident. fol. 62 sq. Ritual traditions concern ceremonies and rites to be observed in the church, e.g., about feast days, about trine immersion or aspersion in the act of baptism, etc. By historical traditions are enumerated the canonical books of Holy Scripture, guarded by the church in an uninterrupted series of times and with a certain succession of connection, and faithfully transmitted to posterity; there are also commemorated the milder and harsher fates of the church, as well as the contests moved in the church concerning certain articles of faith. By exegetical traditions it is shown in what sense the doctors of the primitive church expounded this or that biblical saying. By testimonial traditions the consensus of ecclesiastical antiquity is exhibited, which bears a lucid testimony to the truth of the articles of faith. Dogmatic traditions are dogmas of faith and morals; which are contained neither in express words nor implicitly and as to the matter in the scriptures, but are said by our adversaries to have been handed down by living voice from Christ and the apostles, and preserved in the church by a continuous succession. Such dogmatic traditions are the dogmas concerning the invocation of saints, the cult of images, the celibacy of priests, the choice of foods, the sacrifice of the mass, the sacraments of penance, confirmation, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, communion under one species, purgatory, and indulgences. The controversy between us and the Pontificians is about dogmatic traditions. For we do not disapprove of all the ritual traditions of the church, provided the theological rule is observed, as observed by Dr. CHEMNITZ in his exam. conc. Trid. fol. 75: "Ceremonies in the church should be of an indifferent kind, few in number, be pious and useful for edification, order, and decorum; they should have free observance outside the case of scandal, so that according to the reason of edification, time, place, and persons, they can be instituted, changed, and abrogated." We admit the historical tradition concerning the canon of scripture as an argument, not infallible, but probable. We receive exegetical traditions with a grateful mind, if indeed the interpretation of the fathers does not disagree with the phraseology of scripture, the property of the words, the context, and the analogy of faith. We value testimonial tradition highly, and we confess with CHEMNITZ in the same place, fol. 71, that we dissent from those who invent opinions which have no testimony of any time in the church; as SERVETUS, CAMPANUS, the ANABAPTISTS, and others have done. We also feel that no new dogma, conflicting with all of antiquity, is to be received in the church. The question is debated about dogmatic traditions, concerning the very dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, which are neither proposed in express words in Holy Scripture, nor can be deduced and established from it by an invincible consequence.

Obs. VI. That we may more deeply inspect the mind of the Pontificians, it is to be well observed that they distinguish unwritten traditions 1) by reason of their authors, 2) by reason of their matter. By reason of their authors, the traditions of the old testament are divided into Mosaic and Pharisaic. The former are said to derive their origin from Moses and the prophets, the latter from the Pharisees. The traditions of the N.T. are divided by the Pontificians into divine, apostolic, and ecclesiastical. Divine are called by them those which were received from Christ himself, teaching the apostles, and are nowhere found in the divine letters. Such are those which pertain to the matter and form of the sacraments. For we have few things about these in the divine letters, and yet it is certain that the essence of the sacraments could not have been instituted except by Christ. For this reason the apostle in 1 Cor. XI, 23, speaking of the sacrament of the eucharist, said: "For I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you." Apostolic traditions are said to be those which were instituted by the apostles, not however without the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and nevertheless they are not extant written in their epistles; such is the fast of Lent, and of the four seasons, and many others. Ecclesiastical traditions are called certain ancient customs, initiated either by prelates or by peoples, which gradually by the tacit consent of the peoples obtained the force of law. By reason of matter, traditions are divided by the Pontificians into traditions of faith and traditions of morals; which in turn are either perpetual or temporary, and either universal or particular, necessary or free. A tradition of faith is that the Blessed Mary was always a virgin, that there are only four gospels, etc. A tradition pertaining to morals is that the sign of the cross is to be painted on the forehead, that on certain days fasts or feasts are to be celebrated, etc. A perpetual tradition is that which is instituted to be always observed; as in the examples given: A temporary one is that which is instituted for a certain time, as the observance of certain legal ceremonies; which were to be observed until the full promulgation of the gospel, so that the church might more easily coalesce from the Jews and Gentiles. A universal tradition is that which is delivered to be observed by the whole church, such as the observance of Easter, Pentecost, and similar great feasts; a particular one is that which is delivered to only one or several churches, such as in the time of Augustine was the fast of Saturday, which Peter had delivered to the Roman church, and was observed by it alone, and by some others, as Augustine teaches in epistle 86 to Casulanus. A necessary tradition is that which is delivered in the form of a precept, as the celebration of Easter after the fourteenth moon of March; a free one is that which is delivered in the form of a counsel, as the sprinkling of holy water and similar things. Concerning these, see BELLARMINE, book on the word of God, chap. II, fol. 163.

Proof a. That unwritten dogmatic tradition is not to be added to Holy Scripture as a principle of faith, necessary to be believed for salvation, is evident;

I. from the perfection and sufficiency of scripture. For the word of God, committed to letters, is so perfect and sufficient for salvation that no new, heterogeneous dogma, or one different from those which are written, is to be added by human authority, as Moses testifies in Deut. IV, 2, c. XIII, 1, and John in Apoc. XXII, 18. Conf. the preceding question. The consequence is manifest; because that is perfect which needs no substantial supplement. (*)

II. From the divine interdict most sacredly observed by St. Paul: "Learn not to go beyond what is written." 1 Cor. IV, 6. Whence it happened that Paul said nothing besides what Moses and the prophets said would come to pass. Acts 26:22. Just as Peter, according to CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata, book VI, wished to say "nothing without the Scriptures."

III. From divine commendation. "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed," Gal. I, 8. Since the Holy Spirit threatens with the thunderbolt of anathema anyone preaching a gospel besides that which was preached by Paul and the other apostles, the utmost caution must be taken, lest any principle of faith be added to the gospel preached and written by the apostles, which is not comprehended in the apostolic writings.

You say: I. The apostle speaks not of the written word alone, but of all the word, whether written or handed down. For he does not say: "If any man shall preach a gospel, besides that which we have written," but "besides that which we have preached." Resp. Paul speaks in general of the word preached by him. But he preached nothing beyond what was written by Moses and the prophets. Acts 26:22. Whatever he preached, he also wrote. 2 Cor. 1:13. c. XIII, 2. He wrote that gospel which he had preached to the Galatians.

You say: II. The Greek particle παρά (besides) signifies "against," Acts 18:13. Therefore, the apostle prohibits not new or different dogmas, but those contrary to the preached gospel. Resp. The particle παρά often signifies "besides." Compare the notable passage in 1 Cor. III, 11. In the Vulgate version, which is authentic for the Pontificists, the Latin "præter" (besides) is found here. Indeed, the apostle himself renders it by ἕτερον (another, different) in v. 6. Therefore, just as that minister not only sins who, in the name of the prince, issues a diploma that is repugnant to his statutes, but also he who promulgates something besides those statutes which is different from and foreign to the wisdom and counsel of the prince; so also that minister of the church not only sins who proposes dogmas of faith repugnant to the gospel of Christ preached by the apostles, but also he who proposes dogmas that are different from and foreign to the gospel of Christ.

(*) In the principal place, from 2 Tim. III, 16, there are several nerves of proof. It is to be considered, 1) that the written word is commended, and indeed as a means for obtaining salvation, and that the only one, since Paul praises it alone, in which also he commands his Timothy to remain, v. 14. But that in which one must remain and persist, cannot but be so perfect and sufficient that we may acquiesce in it, that we may require nothing beyond. Therefore, a means, uniquely commended, must be sufficient; if sufficient, therefore perfect. 2) That scripture is said to make a man perfect, and especially a minister of the church. For that name, man of God, just as the Hebrew, man of God, denotes one who functions in the office of teaching divinely mandated to him, conf. 2 Pet. I, 21. From which a twofold argumentation is effected. One: An effect cannot be nobler than its cause, by the name given, and as great as is the end for which a thing is so, and not otherwise, so great also cannot but be the constitution of the thing itself. Therefore, Holy Scripture is perfect and altogether sufficient. The other: If Holy Scripture is so perfect and sufficient that it supplies a minister of the church with all things useful for the function of his office, why should it not much more suffice for the members of the church? 3) That those things, of which a perfect knowledge is to be drawn from the divine writings, are called doctrines, both concerning things to be believed, and concerning the refutation of opposite errors (teaching and refutation), and concerning things to be done (training and correction). But besides these there is nothing which pertains to the end of scripture; Therefore, scripture is altogether sufficient for the proposed end. 4) That not only are all the kinds of saving truths enumerated, for teaching, etc., v. 17, but also an asseveration is specifically added concerning every single good work, v. 17. Therefore, Holy Scripture is perfect and sufficient not only in general, but also in species, so that it teaches us every single truth to be referred to any genus, with none omitted.

Prob. b. Whatever is to be received with that affection of piety with which the written word of God is received, it must be most certain and infallible, so that it can beget divine faith, and be believed with divine faith. Rom. 15:4. Luke wrote "accurately and for security." I, 3-4. Paul wrote "for greater certainty." Phil. III, 1. But from where can we be infallibly certain concerning unwritten traditions, that they are from God? From Scripture? But they are not written. From the testimony of the church? But this itself is not infallible, since its authority, being human, cannot beget divine faith. Indeed, our adversaries have never proven their traditions even from the testimony of the more ancient church. And if we examine the origin of unwritten traditions more deeply, they have flowed from Pharisaism. It is established concerning the Pharisees, partly from Scripture, partly from Josephus and others, that besides the written word they had many traditions foreign to the word of God, and rejected by Christ Himself. Math. 15:2-3. et seqq. JOSEPHUS in book XIII of the Antiquities of the Jews, c. 18. "Now," he says, "it must be indicated that the Pharisees have handed down to the people many constitutions received from their ancestors by hand, which are not written among the laws of Moses. And therefore the Sadducees derogated authority from these, saying that only those should be kept which are contained in writing; and from this a great controversy arose between them."

The Pontificists distinguish between Mosaic and Pharisaic traditions, opining that Christ rejected the Pharisaic but not the Mosaic traditions; but in vain. For they cannot prove that Moses handed down dogmas which were not consigned to letters, but preserved in the faithful memory of posterity. Christ never sends us to Mosaic traditions, but to the scriptures. John 5:39.

The antithesis is that of the Pontificists, who maintain that unwritten divine and apostolic traditions are to be received with an equal affection of piety as the written word of God. They rely on the following arguments:

I. Traditions are everywhere commended in the sacred letters, Exod. 13:8. Deuter. 32:7. Judg. 5:13. Resp. In the cited places, active tradition is understood, or the act of handing down, informing, catechizing; it is commonly called instruction, which is done by living voice, the foundation of which is the sacred scripture. There is no controversy about this; but the controversy is about tradition taken passively, or objectively, inasmuch as by it is understood a dogma handed down orally and not comprehended in the sacred letters, nor deducible from them by necessary consequence.

II. The doctors of the primitive church called the Apostles' Creed and infant baptism traditions, as CHEMNITZ confesses in his examination of the Council of Trent, fol. 63 & 69. But we retain the Apostles' Creed and infant baptism. Therefore, we retain unwritten traditions. Resp. The doctors of the primitive church used the name of tradition in a looser sense; because by it they understood all doctrine concerning God and divine things, which "according to the letter" and express words is not contained in the scriptures; today the controversy is ventilated concerning unwritten traditions so called in a stricter sense, which are contained in the divine letters neither in the words themselves, nor in the matter and meaning.

III. Paul sends us to traditions, 2 Thess. 2:15. "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle." Resp. The Apostle speaks of doctrine which is the same in substance, but handed down in different ways; as it was proposed to the members of the church then by living voice, then by writings. The disjunctive particle ἢ (whether/or) does not separate the dogmas handed down, but the different modes of handing them down. For before the canon of scripture was completed, God-inspired men handed down many things by voice, which they afterwards committed to writing. Today, with the biblical canon complete, it is not proper to have recourse to unwritten traditions.

IV. Paul commends traditions to Timothy, 1 Tim. 6:20. "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust" (doctrine handed down by living voice). By "that which is committed to thy trust" the Pontificists do not understand the written word, which does not seem to need anxious custody, since it is easily retained in its containers. Resp. By the name of "that which is committed to thy trust" is understood not tradition, but the whole celestial doctrine, first handed down by the teacher Paul to his disciple Timothy by living voice from Moses and the prophets, Act. XXVI, 22, and afterwards related in letters. For the deposit of doctrine from Paul is not opposed to the Holy Scripture as traditions are opposed to it, but (as is clear from v. 21) to profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called. Wherefore the mind of the apostle is: O Timothy, guard the celestial doctrine, handed down to you both by living voice and by writings; on the other hand, with the greatest diligence, avoid sophistic disputes, by which the evangelical doctrine is rendered doubtful to the simpler.

V. Paul attributes much to unwritten traditions, 1 Cor. 11:23. "For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you." He concludes the same chapter with these words: "the rest will I set in order when I come." Resp. Paul in the cited chapter v. 23. understands written tradition, for he deals with the institution of the Lord's supper, which was not only written here by Paul, but also by three evangelists. The apostolic disposition, which is mentioned in v. 34, pertains to ceremonies and rites, useful for edification in the church. But our discussion here is not about ceremonies, which can be learned from ritual traditions, but about dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, necessary for a man to believe and to do for salvation, which are learned solely from the written word.

VI. That there are unwritten traditions in the church is indicated by John, chapter XXI, 25. "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." Resp. We concede that not everything that Christ said or did was written by the evangelists, but we deny that anything of those things which are necessary for faith and morals was omitted by them. CYRIL says excellently in book XII on John, chapter 68: "Not all things that the Lord did were written, but what the writers thought to be sufficient, both for morals and for dogmas." And AUGUSTINE says no less cleverly in Tractate XLIX on John, c. 11. "Those things were chosen to be written, which seemed to suffice for the salvation of believers." (*)

VII. John approves of unwritten traditions in his 2nd Epistle, 12-13, & 3rd Epistle, 13-14. "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink; but I trust to come unto you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be full." Resp. 1) John is not speaking of the entire scripture, but of this very epistle of his, in which he did not write everything to the chosen lady. 2) Of what sort were those things that John says he did not wish to write in a letter, no one will easily guess. 3) If our adversaries will clearly show that those things which John handed down orally to the chosen lady were dogmas of faith and precepts of morals, necessary for all to believe and to do for salvation, we will take it upon ourselves to demonstrate each one from the written word.

VIII. The tradition of the church seems necessary both to prove the divine origin of sacred scripture and to elicit its genuine sense. Resp. The divine origin of scripture is known from both external and internal criteria, and especially from the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit. We willingly accept the testimony of the church concerning the divinity of scripture, as a distinguished argument, but not as the only, principal, and absolutely necessary one. We seek and find the true sense of scripture in scripture itself, just as a sword is found in a scabbard, a pearl in a shell, a soul in a body. A consenting exposition of the fathers, interpreting some biblical saying, is received by us as an external hermeneutical aid, guiding and secondarily confirming, but not as a fundamental principle, nor as an infallible norm of interpretation. (**).

(*) Permit me to add these two things: 1) If we compare these words, John XXI, 25, with those whose meaning is the same, XX, 30 & 31, John openly and clearly professes that the things which are written are sufficient for faith and salvation; 2) Do the Roman Catholics have all the deeds of Christ, which his Legates did not commit to memory, received from their Ancestors? How great, I ask, and how full of miracles must such a tradition be, which in its scope embraces all those things, which, if they had been consigned to letters, not even the world itself could have contained!

Question LII. What is the efficacy of sacred scripture?

The efficacy of the Sacred Scripture. The efficacy of sacred scripture is a supernatural power, communicated to it by God, by which it not only reveals and presents the will of God, and persuades the obedience to be rendered to it, but also by divine ordinance, as a most powerful means, with the concurrence of the Holy Spirit, it converts, regenerates, renews, and saves men corrupted by sin.

Obs. The difficult and salutary doctrine concerning the efficacy of sacred scripture is to be treated expressly in Part III of Theology, where the means of grace and salvation are to be discussed, among which is the word of God; here it suffices to have given a foretaste of it.

Question LIII. Is sacred scripture necessary to be known by all who aspire to eternal salvation?

Sacred scripture is a necessary principle of faith and morals, not by an absolute (a), but by a hypothetical (b) necessity. Sacred scripture is necessary not only by the necessity of command (c), but also of means (d), and so the scripture of both the old (e) and the new testament must be attentively read, or at least devoutly listened to when proposed by the voice of a teacher, and most deeply pondered by all men who are to attain eternal life, to whom an invincible impediment is not opposed.

Prob. a. That Holy Scripture is not necessary with an absolute necessity is clear, because there was a time when the sacred letters did not exist, namely from Adam to Moses. It happens that there may not be an opportunity to read them, if, for instance, a Christian is carried away into the captivity of the Turks, Tartars, or other barbarians. It can happen that, with war raging, there are no schools, no opportunities for a boy or girl to be imbued with the knowledge of reading. Indeed, it not infrequently happens that a man is by nature impotent, as for instance blind, an infant, etc., for whom no law is laid down here, because the kingdom of grace presupposes the kingdom of power, cf. DANNHAVER. hodos. phænom. I. p. 87.

Prob. b. The hypothetical necessity of Holy Scripture is evident both from the divine ordinance and from the neediness of men. For by the benefit of scripture the church, spreading most widely, is to be preserved until the consummation of the age; the allurements of corruptions and errors are to be averted, the infirmity of human memory is to be relieved, and the certainty of faith is to be established. For the word of God was written "for the sake of greater certainty," Luke 1:3.

(**) To settle this matter, an argument "according to man," and a twofold one at that, will contribute not a little. 1) The dissenters say, in the Council of Trent, session IV, decree 1, that they accept traditions preserved by continuous succession in the Catholic Church. But where on earth is that continuous succession in those matters in which the Roman church has manifestly departed from the ancient institution, and that by a perpetual, uninterrupted series? The examples are clearer than the sun, these two especially: the interdict on the reading of the Holy Scriptures and on the chalice in the most holy supper. Let them therefore produce a tradition, and one preserved by continuous succession, when they cannot produce even one reliable witness from all of antiquity, through the first XII centuries. Behold! their own confession, in the same place, session XXI, chap. 1 & 2. 2) The Greek and Eastern church likewise greatly accepts traditions, as a norm for things to be believed and done. Among them are some, very different from those which the Romans venerate, namely in those controversies in which the Greek church departs far from the Roman. Which therefore is the true tradition? Is it that which is preserved in the Greek church? or this, which the Roman Catholics think should be revered with the highest observance? What then is this continuous succession, about which the Romans boast so much? What finally? They are not ashamed to put this forward: that the Holy Scripture is very uncertain, ambiguous, and exceedingly doubtful. And why? Because, they say, heretics take refuge in scripture, and twist it to their own opinions. Is that therefore uncertain, to which the erring no less than the orthodox, appeal? If this consequence holds, it follows that traditions are likewise uncertain, since heretics, among whom they themselves number the Greeks, are accustomed to appeal to Apostolic traditions. What they will answer to us, they will have the same rendered to themselves.

Prob. c. That the sacred letters were consigned by an external and internal divine command, we have clearly shown above in question XII. p. 80. 81.

Prob. d. from John 20:31. "But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name." St. John teaches that Holy Scripture is a means, divinely ordained, for kindling faith in Christ and obtaining eternal life.

Prob. e. From the command of Christ, John 5:39. "Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." The Lord Jesus speaks of the scripture of the Old Testament (for at that time the writings of the apostles did not exist) and commands that men, tending toward eternal salvation, should diligently search the writings of Moses and the prophets. For which reason the scripture of the Old Testament is to be read 1) On account of the command of Christ; 2) On account of the foundation of the Christian faith, which is, that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, and the meritorious cause of eternal salvation; (*). 3) For a clearer understanding of the writings of the New Testament, in which the writings of the Old Testament are most frequently cited; 4) For the refutation of the Jews, Acts XVIII, 28; 5) For our solid hope and comfort, Rom. 15:4.

The antithesis is 1) of the Pontificists, who maintain that Holy Scripture is not so necessary that the church can be without it. 2) of the Schwenckfeldians and Weigelians, for whom Holy Scripture is a dead letter; hence they refer their disciples to the internal natural word and to immediate revelations. 3) of the Socinians, who deny the necessity of the Holy Scripture of the O.T.; their main arguments are:

I. The old church from Adam to Moses was preserved without the written word of God. Therefore the church today can be propagated without it. Resp. The condition of those times, in which the patriarchal church flourished, is different from that of subsequent times. For the patriarchs were "long-lived," i.e. they lived for almost a thousand years. Also, men at that time were fewer, and immediate divine revelations were frequent. Therefore, at that time the celestial doctrine could be conveniently transmitted by living voice from the long-lived fathers, who were immediately illuminated, to the assembly of believers, which was not very large. But when the human race increased, and the span of human life was diminished, God himself made the august beginning of writing, and commanded his word to be recorded "for the sake of certainty," to establish the certainty of our faith, Phil. III. 1.

II. From Moses to Christ for two thousand years, there were indeed scriptures, but they belonged only to the Jews, while the other nations, among whom not a few had the true religion, used only unwritten tradition.

For that very many men, besides the Israelites, truly believed in God, is testified by Job and his friends. Resp. It is false that religious people outside the camp of Israel lacked the written word; the contrary is clear from the example of the Eunuch, Acts VIII. Add the Babylonian captivity, and the dispersion of the Israelites, who carried the scriptures with them. Also consider more deeply the Greek version of the Bible, which was most widely propagated among many nations.

III. In the very people of God, although the scriptures existed, the Jews nevertheless used tradition more than scripture, as is clear from Exod. XIII, 8. Resp. In the cited place, active tradition is understood, i.e. the act of handing down, preaching, and catechizing, with dependence on the written law as a norm.

IV. Until the time of Ezra the scriptures were not reduced to order, so that they could be conveniently read, but were kept in various scrolls, and sometimes were not found for a long time due to the negligence of the priests, 2 Kings XXII, 8. Resp. Ezra indeed reduced the books of Moses and the prophets into one order and system; but the Israelites had the books themselves written successively. And although the public copy was kept rather negligently by the priests, the laity nevertheless read their own particular copies within their private walls. Besides, it is wrongly concluded: Before Ezra the order of the prophetic writings was not the same as it is today: Therefore scripture is not necessary. For the sacred letters were not so confused and disordered that they could not be read.

(*) For since 1) our Jesus is "the one who is to come," and the signs of Christ, most certain, from which it is shown that Jesus is the Christ, were all foretold by the Prophets of the O.T., Matth. XI, 3. et seqq. 2) The N.T. differs from the Old in this, that in the O. are prophecies, in the N. their fulfillments, which, if referred to one sum, all appear conjoined in Jesus of Nazareth, 2 Corinth. I. 20. so that not even the least thing is contained in the whole Christian religion that was not foretold in the O.T., Acts XXVI, 22. since finally it is certain, 3) that the fulfillment without the prophecy, to which it entirely corresponds, can neither be understood nor held as true; it is clear how necessary it is that the New Testament be perpetually compared with the Old.

V. From Holy Scripture various heresies have arisen: Therefore it would have been better if it did not exist. Resp. Heresies arise not from scripture, but from the distortion of scripture. Rather, Holy Scripture is the means of repelling heresies. 2 Tim. III, 16. Tit. I, 9.

VI. The new testament is to be inscribed not so much on paper as on the heart, 2 Cor. III, 3. "Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God." Resp. These are not opposed, but congruous. For scripture is necessary for this reason, that when it is attentively read, well understood, and rightly applied, the new testament may be inscribed on our hearts, since that inscription is not made immediately, but mediately.

VII. The reading of the old testament today does not seem necessary, because in it there are no promises of eternal life. For that reason Christ is said to be the mediator of a better testament, which was established upon better promises. Hebr. VIII, 6. Resp. In the cited place, the old and new testament are not taken for the books of the O. and N.T., but for the legal covenant, which is called the old, and the evangelical, which is called the new testament. The promises of the latter are said to be better not by reason of the good promised, but by reason of the condition required. For the old testament, or legal covenant, does indeed promise eternal life, Lev. XVIII, 5. Gal. III, 12, but under the condition of perfect obedience, which after the fall is impossible for us, Rom. VIII, 3. But the new testament, or evangelical covenant, promises eternal life under the condition of faith, Gal. III, 11, which is conferred on all who accept the means of grace. Add, that the evangelical promises excel the legal ones in efficacy; because the law only promises life to the obedient, but does not confer the strength to obey. But the Gospel not only promises eternal life to believers, but also bestows the strength to believe.

Question LIV. To what practical uses should the meditation of scripture be applied?

Practical uses and cases. The practical uses to which the reading and meditation of scripture are to be transferred concern both faith and life, or the morals of men. Faith is considered in different ways, namely as it is to be generated, or preserved, or defended. Faith is to be generated in the minds of unbelievers; for whom, attentively reading the sacred scripture, this itself is the seed of regeneration for kindling faith, 1 Peter I, 23. Faith is to be preserved in believers in a state of tranquility by the written word of God, as by the purest milk it is nourished, as by solid food it is strengthened, Hebr. V, 12. In a turbulent state, or an afflicted one, faith is to be defended by the sacred scripture, as by the sword of the Holy Spirit, Eph. VI, 17, from the assault of the devil, the perfidy of heretics, the afflictions of the world, and the allurements of the flesh, by which, like Christ, we defeat the devil and his satellites. Matth. IV. What more? for afflicted Christians, sacred scripture is a storeroom of all life-giving consolation. "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope." Rom. XV, 4. A life worthy of Christians is to be directed and conformed to the rule of sacred scripture, that they may live "piously," toward God, "temperately," toward themselves, "justly," toward their neighbor. Tit. II, 12. Wherefore, he who is about to read the sacred letters with salutary fruit, should pay close attention to which sayings of the Holy Spirit support faith, and which lead to a life lived piously, soberly, and justly, and he should inscribe them most deeply on the tablets of his heart.

Question LV. How should sacred scripture be read, so that we may achieve the uses already mentioned?

The sacred letters are transferred to salutary uses, if we read them (1) piously and with the imploration of divine aid, that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto us the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him and the eyes of our understanding being enlightened, Eph. I, 17. 18. (2) Attentively and with singular reverence, so that we not only know theoretically that sacred scripture is the word of God, but also practically, and with a solid assent of faith, we receive this as the true word of God. For sacred scripture is a letter of the omnipotent God to his creature, in which the words of God sound, and the heart of God is learned, as Gregory the Great says, L. IV, ep. 84. (3) Accurately, so that with solicitous investigation we may search the scriptures, John V, 39, and investigate their genuine sense. (4) Assiduously, so that we may meditate on the law of God day and night, Ps. I, 2. (5) Obediently, so that we may be not only readers or hearers, but also doers of the word. James I, 22.

Question LVI. How should the mind of a man be confirmed in the divinity of scripture?

To a weak brother, doubting the divine origin of the scriptures, arguments should be proposed drawn from external criteria, or motives of credibility, so that he may be induced to read the sacred scripture piously, attentively, and accurately. If he does this, he will be moved by internal criteria, and especially by the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit, to believe the immediate dependence of the sacred letters on God.

Question LVII. How are those to be uplifted who grieve and mourn because, having read the sacred scripture often, they have reaped little or no fruit?

They are to be (1) excited to pious prayers, by which a more copious grace of the Holy Spirit is obtained. The psalmist shines before us with a most praiseworthy example, Ps. CXIX, 18-34, sighing: "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." "Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart." (2) They are to be admonished to inquire into their life and morals, and if they indulge in any graver sins, to bid them farewell, and to extricate themselves from the cares of this world, by which they have been ensnared. These are the thorns by which the seed of the divine word is choked. Luke VIII, 14. (3) Intent on sacred meditations, they should await the hour of divine sweetness, until they taste this from the most free dispensation of God. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him," who is the health of my countenance, and my God, says the Prophet King, Ps. XLII, 12.

Question LVIII. How are those to be aroused who read the sacred bible unwillingly?

(1) The divine command should be impressed upon them, Deut. VI, 7. 8. John V, 39. (2) The example of Martha and Mary should be urged, Luke X, 40. et seqq. (3) It should be shown to them that the goodness and wisdom of God shine forth in the sacred scripture, as in a most clear mirror, Matth. XI, 25. 26. (4) The most abundant utility of scripture should be commended to them, 2 Tim. III, 16. What goods do they deprive themselves of, who fall asleep in such supine laziness, that they either never, or unwillingly, handle the sacred codex. On the contrary, the same are implicated in the foulest errors and many evils. Matth. XXII, 29. "Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures."

SUSPIRIUM

With the most fervent prayers I beseech You, O GOD, FATHER of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, FATHER of glory, that you grant us by grace, unprovoked by any merits of ours, the SPIRIT of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of You, and enlightened eyes of the mind for the salutary understanding of Your word, comprehended in the prophetic and apostolic writings! We cherish the scripture, consigned by Your inspiration. It is our love, our delight, our spiritual treasury, our storehouse, full of all comfort.

Your scripture is a most brilliant letter, sent to us from heaven, in which your words sound, from which Your heart is learned. You have opened Your heart, burning with love, O supreme arbiter of things, in Your divine letters You have revealed your mind, You have revealed Your counsel concerning the fallen sinner to be raised up, and led into the celestial fatherland, if he does not unwillingly admit the aids of your grace. Provide, O most MERCIFUL GOD, spiritual strength for us, that we may promptly follow Your counsel, be intent on the nod of Your will, impress Your word on the tablets of our hearts, and express it in good deeds, and thus at length be drawn by You to you!

PART I OF THEOLOGY

CHAPTER I, ON GOD

Question I. In what manner of consideration is God treated here?

OD IS TREATED here as the objective end of theology. Prob. Since theology is a practical science, its end must be treated first of all. Methodical reason. And since the end of theology is twofold, one indeed objective, which is God, infinitely perfect and supremely good, the other formal, which is the beatific vision and fruition of God; therefore, the objective end of theology, namely God, who most fully satisfies the appetite of man, is to be considered first.

Question II. What is understood by the name of God?

Nominal definition of God. By the name of God is understood the first being, which is from itself and is the cause of other things; and which preserves and governs all things.

Prob. All men as pilgrims experience in themselves that they do not and cannot conceive of God otherwise than in relation to created things, as the first being, which is from itself and is the cause of all other beings, and preserves and governs all things; or as the most excellent of all beings, than which nothing better, nothing more perfect can be or be thought. The gentiles, pressed by calamity, implored the help of God, and named him the best and greatest; conscious of their own evil, they feared him, as the most just and most powerful judge; thinking that nothing is prior to God, nothing more excellent.

Question III. Should a man strive with the utmost effort to know God?

It is fitting for a man to expend much effort in attaining the knowledge of God (1) on account of the dignity "of the knowledge of God" (a). On account of its greatest utility (b). Dignity of the knowledge of God.

Prob a. From the divine oracle Jer. IX, 22. 23. "Thus saith the LORD, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches; But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the LORD which exercise lovingkindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth." By as much as eternal things excel temporal, and immortal things mortal; by so much is the true knowledge of God to be preferred to all other sciences. JEROME says aptly in the epitaph of his nephew: "Without the knowledge of his creator, every man is a beast." And HILARY says excellently, in book VIII on the Trinity: "He who does not know God, does not know how to be wise."

Prob. b. "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent," says Truth itself, John XVII, 3. Since the true knowledge of the true God, with Christ as witness, is the cause of eternal life, and as it were the mother bearing everlasting salvation, it should be most commended to us all.

Question IV. From where is "the knowledge of God" (theoknōsia), or the knowledge of God, sought?

Natural knowledge of God. The knowledge of God is sought both from the light of nature, or of reason, and from the light of revelation. From which "the knowledge of God" is commonly distinguished into natural and revealed. The former is pedagogical, the latter is salutary.

Question V. What is the natural knowledge of God?

The natural knowledge of God is that by which man, from principles known by nature, knows to some extent the existence, essence, attributes, and actions of God; It is divided into innate and acquired. The innate natural knowledge of God is a perfection, connatural to man as a pilgrim and analogous to a habit, by which the human intellect, being aided, perceives the truth of self-evident propositions about God, upon apprehension of their terms, without discourse, and gives them indubitable assent (a). The acquired natural knowledge of God is that which is obtained both from the testimony of others and from the observation of creatures through discourse (b).

Obs. 1. By the light of nature here are understood the principles of nature and reason, on which the natural knowledge of God rests, as on a reason for knowing; which have obtained the name of light, because they are to the intellect a reason for knowing other things, and are related to it as light, which, joined with colors, is to the faculty of sight a reason for seeing and knowing colors, is related to the faculty of sight. PHILIP MELANCHTHON says aptly in erot. dial. p. m. 234. "as light is placed in the eyes for discerning bodies; so in the mind there is an innate knowledge, by which we are advanced to some knowledge of God."

Obs. II. The principles of nature and reason, from which God is known to some extent, are otherwise called innate knowledge, also common notions about God, and are certain, as it were, ruins or remnants of the divine image, about which AUGUSTINE dissertates excellently in book I of the spirit and the letter, c. XXVIII. "The image of God in the human soul has not been so worn away by the stain of earthly affections that not even the faintest lineaments have remained in it; whence it can rightly be said that even the impious, in the very impiety of their lives, do some things of the law, or have some knowledge of it."

Obs. III. The principles of nature, from which God in a certain way becomes known, are either theoretical or practical. The theoretical are: God is, God is one, true, good, omnipotent, most just, etc. God is the preserver and governor of this universe. The practical principle is: God is to be worshiped.

Innate natural knowledge of God. Prob. a. (1) The innate knowledge of God is gathered from the apostolic saying, Rom. II, 14. "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law (the written law of Moses), do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law (that one), are a law unto themselves; (For they) which shew the work of the law (not the letter) written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another." We argue: Whoever by nature do the things that are of the law, and by this very fact show that the work of the law is inscribed on their hearts, their conscience convicting them, they by this very fact testify that the knowledge of God, as the rewarder of good and the avenger of evil, is naturally innate. But, the gentiles not having the external law etc. Therefore. The major premiss is established, because (a) for those who naturally do the things that are of the law, the law of nature is in them, which they observe as a norm in acting. (b) If that law is written in the hearts of men, since it was not inscribed through regeneration, it must have been inscribed through creation, and still be a remnant from creation and connatural. But the knowledge and worship of God pertains to the inscribed law, as the principal part of the natural law. For not only the precept concerning loving one's neighbor, but also concerning worshiping God, pertains to the law of nature. (g) He who is convicted by his conscience of things done well or badly, necessarily supposes a first judge having dominion over consciences, and a supreme legislator forbidding and punishing evil, commanding and rewarding good.

(2) To this is added the consensus of all gentiles. For, in the judgment of M. TULLIUS, book I. Tusculan Questions, "there is no nation so savage, no one of all so fierce, whose mind has not been imbued with the opinion of the gods. Many think wrongly of the Gods; for that is usually brought about by vicious custom. Yet all believe that there is a divine force and nature. And indeed this is not brought about by the conversation of men, or by consensus: the opinion is not confirmed by institutions, not by laws. But in every matter the consensus of all nations is to be considered the law of nature." And in book II of the nature of the Gods, the orator says: "it is innate in all, and as it were engraved on the mind, that there are Gods." It is therefore established "that there is" or, the true existence of an innate knowledge of God; but "what it is" or its definitive reason, is not so clear. From which it happens that it is defined in different ways even by orthodox theologians. For some wish it to be defined by a proximate faculty, others by a disposition, others by a habit, others by a perfection, or a light connatural to the human intellect and analogous to a habit. Let us listen to D. MUSAEUS, accurately discoursing on the innate knowledge of God in his introduction to theology, p. 80. "Modern theologians do not assert that before the use of reason an actual cognition of God, or its impressed species, is in man. Indeed, some are found who expressly deny it. Nor are there wanting those who deny its impressed species. Whatever, therefore, it is that, according to their mind, can be said to be naturally in the intellect, or connatural to it, it is necessary that it be reduced to a certain innate perfection, or light of the intellect, by which, being aided, it immediately perceives the truth of common notions about God, upon apprehending their terms, without discourse. And in this they almost agree; although some call that innate perfection a habit, others something analogous to a habit, and some an imperfect habit and a disposition." He who adds to this the instinct, inculcated by the early Fathers, innate in man by nature, which adds weight to the intellect, and together with that perfection of whatever kind innate in it, determines it to give assent, both to other common notions about God, and especially to that which is of his existence, immediately and without discourse, will, in our judgment, have strayed in no way from the truth.

We, with due respect to the judgments of others, think that the innate knowledge of God is not a habit in the strict sense; for that consists in impressed species well coordinated and disposed among themselves. But the species of neither creation nor of creatures are properly impressed on us by nature. Indeed, experience being the witness, we do not conceive of God otherwise than in order to created things, as the first being, which is from itself, and is the cause of other things, preserving and governing all creatures. We do not, however, deny that the innate knowledge of God is a certain perfection, connatural to man as a pilgrim and analogous to a habit. This analogy consists in the following. (1) Just as the image of God in the first-created humans was a habit; so the remnants of the same, to which pertains the law of nature, dictating that God is to be worshiped, in a certain way approach its nature; since homogeneous parts are of the same nature as the whole. (2) Just as a habit is a certain perfection superadded to nature, facilitating it for operation; so also the natural knowledge of God is superadded to the cognitive faculty, inclining it to apprehend God in whatever way. (3) Just as a habit is difficult to move; so this natural knowledge inheres deeply in the soul, and cannot be entirely eradicated. For which reason HENRICUS NICOLAI does not contradict us, in his tract on natural knowledge, chap. II. p. 26, when he says: "The word habit is taken either in philosophical rigor, for a firm and stable quality superimposed on a faculty, rendering the subject easy and prompt to operate, or the word habit is taken more generally for any disposition, from which, if it is perfected by elaboration, a habit can be made and arise; and so in general, by way of a habit, natural knowledge can be said to be inherent; because that luminous disposition remains in the intellect, by which one can see the truth by the guidance of nature, and if he investigates it skillfully, he can, in the course of time, raise it into a habit." Nor does LEICHNER plainly dissent, in his synopsis of true demonstration, page 398. "Natural knowledge is in the intellect, which is ignorant of the terms, not indeed in an expressed act, much less habitually, but according to a natural disposition and proclivity."

Acquired natural knowledge of God. Prob. b. (1) That the natural knowledge of God is acquired from the testimony of others, experience itself speaks, as it were, all day long. For Christian parents, Turks, Tartars, Gentiles, from their children's tender nails instill the name and knowledge of God; God is invoked daily by both great and small; by God they swear; they appeal to God as a witness and judge, etc. By this more frequent mention of the divine name in daily life, the natural knowledge of God is acquired, and being acquired, is confirmed.

(2) To those who carefully observe creatures, a threefold way to acquire the knowledge of God is open; (a) The way of causality, by which from the effects we know the first efficient cause, from creatures the creator, from the most ornate and wisest governance of this universe the best, most powerful, and wisest preserver and governor. The argument here is taken from the most evident axiom: The effect testifies to the cause and its perfection. (b) The way of eminence, by which, whatever we find most perfect in creatures, we attribute to God in a most eminent way by virtue of the principle most known by nature: Whatever is in the effect, pre-exists in the cause. From which we infer that all perfections which are in creatures are in the creator either formally or eminently. (*)

Namely, certain perfections, absolutely and simply such, shine forth in creatures, which in their formal concept involve no imperfection, but are better than the creatures themselves. Thus we observe in men, the most excellent of visible creatures, the power of understanding and willing, wisdom, goodness, justice, &c. Which perfections are in God formally, and indeed in a most excellent manner. (c) The way of negation, by which we remove from God whatever in creatures implies imperfection, and attribute to it the opposite perfection, according to the principle of nature obvious to all: What is supremely perfect, in it there is no defect. Supported by this principle of nature, we call God independent, infinite, incorporeal, immense, immortal, incomprehensible. For to depend on another, to be included within certain limits, to bear a corporeal mass, to be terminated by a commensurate space, to be subject to mortality, and to be adequately comprehended by the human intellect, are imperfections of creatures, repugnant to the infinite perfection of the creator, and therefore to be removed from him as far as possible.

(*) But this is not to be understood without caution and distinction, but is to be circumscribed by the limits of art in such a way that both the principle which is assumed, and its application to the proposition, may be rightly perceived. I. This principle, whatever is in the effect, that cannot not be in the cause beforehand, is indeed most true, but is to be taken only 1) of a sole cause, certainly the principal one, governing all associates absolutely, 2) of a univocal cause, as it is called, whose effect is a partaker of the same nature, but not of an equivocal one, which produces something far different from its own nature. And in the former indeed, it is necessary that the same nature, properties, and perfections which are in the effect should be eminently in it; but in the latter, not the nature, properties, and perfections of the effect itself are in it, but the reason for them is contained. But God is indeed the sole cause of all things, but not univocally so called, by generation, but equivocally, by creation. II. The perfection of a thing must agree entirely with its own nature and ends. For that is finally called perfect, in which all the parts and properties, suitable to its nature and ends, are, as is fitting, sufficiently aptly composed and connected. From which it follows that what is perfect in one thing, if it were in another, would either have to be considered imperfect, or plainly foreign: just as a good and firm constitution of the body, and the apt placement of all the members and parts, is certainly a perfection of corporeal things, insofar as they are corporeal, but it ought to be far from pure spirits. The very definition and determination necessarily pertains to the perfection of all finite and created things, insofar as they are finite and created; otherwise their nature would not be finite, but utterly infinite. The nature of all created things is either entirely different from the nature of the Creator, or it is made in some way similar to it. In those whose nature is entirely different, not a single one of those perfections can be present which are proper to the divine nature, although in all and each of them the supreme perfections of the Creator shine forth, such as infinite power, goodness, knowledge, wisdom. But in these, which it pleased God to create similar to himself, moral perfections, but finite nevertheless, as are necessarily required for the nature of spirits, intelligent but also created and finite, we rightly conclude to be in God, the one most perfect Spirit of all, the one Creator and infinite, as altogether supreme and infinite.

To this threefold way of knowing God from the contemplation of creatures, the prophets and apostles in their God-breathed writings point, as it were, with a finger, in the places where they speak of the natural knowledge of God.

The way of causality is followed by the prophet king, Ps. XIX, 2, singing: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork." With these words the most pious king opens the school of nature, in which all men are instructed concerning the glory of the maker of nature. The heavens declare the glory of God, not by the proclamation of an articulate voice, but by the artifice of the work; just as every work praises the artisan, and every effect testifies of the cause, and its perfection. D. GEIER comments not badly on Ps. XIX, 2: "By prosopopoeia, speech is attributed to the heavens, inasmuch as they objectively perform the same thing that one who speaks articulate words otherwise performs; for they inform and convince the observer that their architect is the best, wisest, and most powerful."

The same way of causality St. Paul points out to us in Rom. 1:19-20. "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse." Concerning this apostolic utterance, you should observe: (1) that the apostle speaks generally of all men, subject to the divine wrath for impiety and injustice, as is clear from v.18. (2) that by "invisible things" he does not mean those hidden mysteries of which Christ speaks in Matth. XIII, 35, but, as the context teaches, the invisible power and divinity, which are known from the contemplation of creatures. (3) By "works" (poiēmata) Socinus wishes the miracles of Christ to be understood; but he deceives and is deceived. For "works" in the sacred letters never denote miraculous actions; nor were miracles performed by Christ from the origin of the world; nor is a special means of knowing God expressed by the apostle, such as the miracles of Christ are, but a general means of knowing, which could lead even nations given to idolatry to the knowledge of God, such as are the works effected by the creator. (4) "From the creation of the world" (Apo ktiseōs tou kosmou), in the opinion of many, is the same as "from creation" (ek ktiseōs), and so does not denote the beginning of time, but the means of knowing: just as in Matth. VII, 16 the Savior says: "from their fruits" (apo tōn karpōn) "ye shall know them." But grant that the beginning of time is understood, then the sense will be: From the very beginning of creatures God could be known from his works. We learn from this classic saying that by the natural light of reason can be known (a) the existence of God, (b) the eternal power of God, (c) his invisibility and spirituality, (d) the creation of this universe, (e) the glory of God to be perpetually proclaimed.

The apostle insists on the same way in his sermon at Lystra, Acts XIV, 17: "God left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." The apostle inculcates a) the catholic testimony of the divinity; because even to the gentiles, destitute of the testimony of the revealed word, God did not leave himself "without witness," declared by no testimony; b) The mode of testimony, that God made his goodness manifest by the benefits conferred on all nations, by sending rain from heaven, and giving fruitful seasons for the sustenance and recreation of man. For which reason, as fruits testify to the nobility of the tree; so the benefits of God are most brilliant testimonies, from the knowledge of which we rise to the knowledge of the most exuberant divine goodness.

The way of eminence is indicated by the psalmist, Ps. XCIV, 9. "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?" The man of God concludes; God planted the ear in man to hear, and formed the eye in him to see. Therefore he himself also hears and sees. No other reason for the consequence can be given than that the perfections of the effects must pre-exist in the cause, if not formally, then eminently, and through something more perfect. In imitation of the author of the psalms, we conclude; God gave man intellect, bestowed wisdom, indulged freedom of will, conferred the power of acting. Therefore,

God understands, is wise, and acts most freely and powerfully in the most perfect way.

The way of negation with the way of causality and eminence is joined by St. Paul in his sermon on the Areopagus, Act. XVII, 22. 23. 24. 25. Then the apostle, standing in the midst of the Areopagus, said: "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious. For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you. God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things." The Apostle, intending to lead the Areopagites, who had erected an altar "to the unknown God," and worshiped him in a temple made with hands, to the knowledge of the true God, convinces them, by concluding from the effect to the cause, from the fabric of the world to its lord, and showing that the author of life lives most blessedly, and the giver of all good things suffers from the lack of no good thing, just as if he had said: You must worship, O overly superstitious Athenians, the true and living God. The true God is he who, by fabricating heaven and earth, has abundantly testified that he is the best, most powerful, and wisest lord of this universe. He is living, who, by granting to all living things life, breath, and all the supports of life, has shown not obscurely that he lives a life indeed most blessed and devoid of all defect. But the lord of this universe is circumscribed by no place, is bound to no temple necessarily, since he is immense, infinite, and incomprehensible. And the author of life and of all good things is in need of no ministry that is of use to him, since he, abounding in his own resources, is "most self-sufficient."

The antithesis is 1) of certain Scholastics, who deny that this proposition, "God exists," is known to us through itself. 2) of the Socinians, some of whom deny the natural knowledge of God, both acquired and innate, while some deny only the innate knowledge of God. 3) of the Cartesians, who maintain that the idea of God, representing his existence, is innate in us. They rely on the following arguments.

I. Nothing is in the intellect which was not first in the sense. Therefore, there is no innate natural knowledge of God. The reason for the consequence is that God, who is a most pure spirit, does not fall under any sense. Resp. That "famous" maxim is not universal. For in the intellect of the intact Adam there was a habit of concreated wisdom, not drawn from sensual observation. After the fall, remnants of the divine image remained, which do not depend on the senses. Therefore, that axiom is to be understood of simple intelligible species, which after the fall are not naturally impressed on the intellect but are obtained by the benefit of abstraction, not, however, of concreated and connatural habits, which are in the intellect before abstraction. Therefore, before sensual perception there is nothing in the intellect, as to the ideal representation of things; there is, however, something in the intellect, as to habitual knowledge.

Instance I. This sentence seems to subvert itself. For no habit, no habitual knowledge is given, before the species of things are impressed, since, experience being the witness, the habit is constituted by the species of things firmly impressed on the intellect, and well coordinated and disposed. e.g. A physicist has transmitted the species of natural things through the intervention of the senses from objects to his intellect, and has firmly impressed them on it, and thus has acquired for himself a habitual knowledge of natural things. Resp. The word habit is taken either specially, and in philosophical rigor, for a quality of a natural faculty firmly added by impression, for promptness of action; we do not deny that for this strictly defined habit, impressed species are required; or it is taken analogically, for a certain perfection superadded to the cognitive faculty of man, in the manner of a habit deeply inherent in the intellect; and inclining it to recognize the truth. There is not indeed given after the fall in the human intellect a connatural species or idea representing the essence of God; there is however given in it a certain connatural light, by which the truth of common notions about God is perceived without discourse; there is given an innate proclivity to the human intellect, by which it is inclined to promptly give assent to self-evident propositions about God. D. CALOVIUS agrees with us, tom. II. syst. theol. p. 80. writing thus: "The natural knowledge of God is not properly called habitual, or a habit, but 'by analogy,' and so an imperfect habit, or a disposition is recognized, which is the way to a habit. Although therefore the knowledge of God is not in man before the use and exercise of reason, as far as an expressed species and some idea conceived in the mind; we do not think it should be denied, however, that there is in man either some disposition or something analogous to a habit, some 'perfection,' namely, of the intellectual faculty in man, remaining after the fall, by the benefit of which man can know God to some extent without a master."

Instance II. Man does not by nature understand the truth of the most common propositions about God before their terms are explained to him. Therefore, the most common propositions about God are not known to man by nature. The reason for the consequence is that the knowledge of propositions depends on the knowledge of the terms. If these are unknown, the propositions themselves are unknown. The antecedent is clear, because the terms of these propositions: God is; God is the best, greatest, God is the creator of the world, are not known by nature. Resp. If the terms of the common notions about God were known to man by nature, without any discourse, or information from others, the innate knowledge of God would be actual, not habitual. For the latter implies nothing other than a certain perfection, light, and proclivity, innate in the human intellect, by which the intellect, being aided, perceives the truth of self-evident propositions about God, as soon as their terms are explained and apprehended, and approves them with a ready assent.

II. The opinion of divinity is from faith. Hebr. XI, 6. Therefore it is not natural. Resp. These are not opposed. God is known from nature; he is salutarily believed from sacred scripture; just as the difference between just and unjust is established both from nature and from scripture.

III. The world by wisdom knew not God. 1 Cor. 1:21. Resp. The world did not know God with a special and salutary knowledge, but it knew him with a general and pedagogical knowledge.

IV. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned, 1 Cor. II, 14. Resp. The apostle speaks of the mysteries of faith, which transcend the grasp of reason left to itself, and are manifested to us for our salvation by the supernatural revelation of God; which we ingenuously confess can become known to us only from the light of scripture.

V. The Gentiles served them which by nature are no gods, Gal. IV, 8. Therefore they did not know the true God. Resp. A distinction is made between simple cognition, by which a gentile man knows God, and cognition applied to a certain object, or the true God. All gentiles formed for themselves this concept of God, that he is the first and most excellent being, by whom all created things are preserved and governed; but they did not rightly apply that concept. By the guidance of the light of nature they knew this major proposition: The true God is to be worshiped religiously. But they wrongly formed the minor proposition: the heaven, the sun, Jupiter, etc., is the true God. Therefore, the Heaven, the sun, Jupiter, etc., is to be worshiped religiously.

VI. Whosoever say in their heart; there is no God; in them there is no natural knowledge of God. But the wicked etc. Ps. XIV, 1. Therefore. Resp. 1) The psalmist speaks of a malicious affection of the heart. The wicked man wishes, wants, and desires that there be no God, who might see and vindicate his nefarious deeds. Therefore, a distinction must be made between simple ignorance of God and malicious denial of him. Although there may be those who, stirred by a malicious affection of the heart, deny that God exists, yet they are not entirely ignorant that God exists. Peter denied Christ, whom he did not ignore. 2) He speaks of those who deny the providence of God more than his existence. For so do wicked men conduct themselves in their life and morals, as if there were nowhere a God who inspects their morals. Tit. I, 16.

VII. If the natural knowledge of God were innate in man as a pilgrim, there would be no atheists. But there are atheists, as Paul testifies in Eph. II, 12. The consequence of the major premise is clear; because whatever is naturally innate, inheres necessarily and immutably. Resp. 1) Men are called atheists either absolutely and simply for lack of a general knowledge of God; or comparatively and "in a certain respect," for lack of a special and saving knowledge of God. The gentiles before the preaching of the gospel were atheists comparatively and "in a certain respect," because they did not know God salutarily in Christ. There was, however, in them a general knowledge of God, which by divine intention ought to have been for them a guidance to a further inquiry and knowledge of God, which is had in the church. 2) Certain atheists are not speculatively, but practically such, who by their deeds deny God.

VIII. Experience testifies that there have not only been those who have denied the existence of God, but also those who have attacked it with arguments; whose troop is led by Julius Caesar Vaninus, the Caesar of atheists, with XII disciples, spreading atheism through Gaul, an Italian by nation, burned at Toulouse. Therefore, there are atheists not only practically, but also speculatively such. Resp. There can be speculative atheists not by nature, but by the just desertion of God and the blinding of the devil; not by a total eradication of the light of nature, as to its habit, but by its suffocation, as to its act and exercise; not for the entire space of life and permanently, but only for a certain passing "fit," for some time. For the law of nature does not permit a firm and settled opinion to inhere in anyone, that there is no God. For although the mind of the impious man is, as it were, lulled to sleep by lethargy, so that he does not think of God; yet there can be no one in whom conscience does not at last vindicate itself and accuse him of the neglected God, even at death itself. Cf. HÜLSEM. brev. enucl. q. 11. p. 87. (*)

IX. If the knowledge of God were innate in men, it would certainly be found the same among all men. But many men are found who have absolutely no sense of divinity, as in the new world, Brazil etc. Resp. 1) CRELLIUS is not far from the truth in Book I. on God c. V. p. 47, saying: "Although peoples have been found, among some of whom there seems to have been almost no opinion of divinity; yet far more have been found in whom an opinion of divinity existed, although they were otherwise barbarians, and alien to the cultivation of humanity. Then histories testify that those very nations, in which there seems to have been no opinion of divinity, nevertheless have some demon whom they fear, and, lest he harm them, they revere. This is more than enough for us here. For this is also a trace of divinity and religion, although twisted in the opposite direction." M. T. CICERO saw this long ago, in book I on the laws, writing excellently: "There is no nation either so untamed, or so savage, that does not, even if it is ignorant of what kind of God it ought to have, nevertheless think it ought to have one." 2) Among the Indians and Brazilians, clear traces of an acknowledged Deity are seen. For they admit the immortality of the soul, they turn pale at thunder, which they call a trumpet, they have priests, and they celebrate annual assemblies. Some sacrifice to a cacodemon, some to the sun and moon, as LERIUS teaches concerning the voyage to Brazil, c. XVI. But here a careful distinction must be made between the natural knowledge of God, and its application to the due object. The barbarians indeed err gravely, bestowing divine worship on the sun, moon, demons; but by this very fact they betray an innate instinct of nature and a propensity to worship God.

X. The Cartesians argue: If no idea or image representing the essence of God were innate in the human intellect, God could in no way be known by man from the light of nature. But God is known by man from the light of nature. Therefore, an idea or image representing the essence of God is innate in man. The consequence of the major premise is proved, because God is an infinite Spirit, (*) This word, "being understood" (nooumena), Rom. I, 20, is especially worthy of note. For it is possible for a man to be inexcusable, if he indeed looks at created things with his eyes, but does not apply his mind to the nature, connection, order, and course of things, so that by consideration and contemplation he may know the first cause of all from its effects. It should also be noted what the difference is between ignorance of God and denial. There are two kinds of Atheists, in one of which are those who are ignorant of God, in the other, those who deny him. Ignorance arises from a defect of contemplation, which should be instituted with an attentive mind. Denial proceeds from repugnance against the open truth, when the will is the more obstinate, the greater the viciousness of the mind, given to pleasures; according to this axiom of moral philosophy: What and of what sort one wishes a thing to be, that and of that sort he thinks it to be. The impious man vehemently wishes that there were no God, the investigator and avenger of vices; therefore he also most easily persuades himself that there is none. This is what it is to say in the heart, Ps. XIV, 1. For by the name of the heart scripture designates not only thoughts, but also and especially pleasures and desires, and that these are also signified in this very place is apparent from the entire series of the words.

devoid of all matter, who cannot be known from the sight and contemplation of creatures. For there is no proportion, no agreement, from the finite to the infinite, and from a spirit to a sensible body. But when one thing is to be known from another, it is necessary that some agreement should exist between them. Resp. 1) After the loss of the wisdom concreated in our first parents, there are no innate simple intelligible ideas, images, or species in the human intellect, representing the essence of things to be known, but impressed species of things are transmitted from objects through the senses and the phantasm to the intellect. To which that trite saying points: Nothing is in the intellect, which was not first in the sense. Wherefore, an idea representing the essence of God, connatural to the human intellect, is a sweet dream of the Cartesians. 2) Although God, considered in himself and in his essence, is an infinite spirit, devoid of all matter sensible to the senses, yet the effects of God are exposed to the senses. Wherefore our intellect, through the species of sensible effects produced by God, transmitted to itself through the intervention of the senses and phantasms, is determined to elicit acts of knowing, which represent God and his perfections to some extent, by means of discourse and by consequence, based on this principle, most known by nature: The effect testifies of the cause, and its perfection. 3) There is no proportion of the finite to the infinite by reason of mathematical commensuration; there is, however, some sort of agreement between the creator and the creature, such as is between a cause and its effect, between the thing signified and the sign. For the effects produced by God are signs and, as it were, vestiges, representing the goodness, power, and wisdom of God.

Question VI. Is the natural knowledge of God true?

Truth of natural theology. The natural knowledge of God, considered in itself, is true (a), both as to its principles (b), and as to the conclusions which are deduced from the principles by manifest consequence (c).

Prob. a. Paul expressly testifies in Rom. I, 18, that all men considered outside of Christ, among whom are also the gentiles, hold the truth in unrighteousness. The apostle gives the reason why the wrath of God is revealed upon all the impiety and unrighteousness of men, because the truth is known to all, if not from the book of scripture, certainly from the book of nature, which truth they hold in unrighteousness. They hold, as if captive, the true knowledge of God, lest it exert its force. They hold the truth in unrighteousness; because the right of God requires that the innate knowledge of God be rightly used. For they were implanted by God for this reason, that we should not neglect to seek God, nor remain in impiety or unrighteousness. Acts XVII, 27.

Prob. b. The principles are most true and most certain: God is, God is one, true, good, most wise, most powerful. God is the creator, preserver, and governor of this universe.

Prob. c. Practical conclusions flow freely from the common notions about God through discourse. e.g. God is good, and the author of all good: Therefore God is to be loved most of all. God is most wise; Therefore he is to be venerated. He is most just; Therefore he is to be feared. He is the best and most powerful; Therefore trust is to be placed in him, and his help is to be implored in all harsh circumstances.

The antithesis was formerly that of Matthias Flacius, Daniel Hofmann, and others, according to whose opinion the natural knowledge of God is fallacious and full of many errors, whose main arguments are:

I. Whatever knowledge does not recognize the true God, that is false. But by natural knowledge the true God is not known. Therefore, the natural knowledge of God is false. The major premise is established; because it is fitting that true cognition be conformed to the object being known. The minor is clear, because the true God is one in essence, and three in persons, whom no one knows from the principles of nature. Resp. Whatever knowledge knows neither the true God, nor anything of the true God, that is false; I concede. But by the natural knowledge of God, although the true God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, is not distinctly known, yet something of the true God, namely his existence, goodness, wisdom, justice, etc., is apprehended, which cognition, although it is inadequate and confused, is not however false.

Instance: Jews and Mohammedans are said not to acknowledge and invoke the true God, because they do not acknowledge and invoke God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Resp. Jews and Mohammedans not only are ignorant of, but also deny the Holy Trinity; nor do they only conceive of God under a confused being as omnipotent and wise, but they also positively add a contrary concept, restricting the essence of God confusedly conceived to one person, and thus they adore an idol, or a figment of their own heart.

II. Because all men by nature are foolish, they deny God. Ps. XIV, 1. Rom. III, 10. Therefore, their natural knowledge of God is full of errors. Resp. The natural knowledge of God, considered in itself, is true, to which imperfection and a proclivity to errors adhere by accident, and does not take away its truth; for even the gentiles hold it in unrighteousness, Rom. 1:18.

Question VII. Is the natural knowledge of God useful?

Usefulness of natural theology. The natural knowledge of God promises a threefold utility, namely pedagogical, insofar as it induces man to seek that assembly in which the true God of Israel has manifested himself (a); didactic, because it contributes not a little to illustrating the revealed knowledge of God, if it is soberly applied (b); and disciplinary, for directing morals and external discipline in the church and outside of it (c).

Prob. a. Paul in his sermon on the Areopagus, Acts XVII, 27, admonishes the gentiles to "seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him." Just as groping is an obscure knowledge (the blind are accustomed to grope with their hands, cf. Is. LIX, 10); so finding is a full knowledge, and for the condition of pilgrims, perfect, which is had only from a supernatural light. Therefore let the gentiles seek God, so that they may not only grope, or know God confusedly from works that strike the senses, but may fully find him in a supernatural revelation, which divine grace denies to no one.

Prob. b. Whatever natural theology teaches about the divine attributes, infinity, independence, eternity, simplicity, etc., is not rejected in revealed theology, but is soberly applied, so that judgment is by no means deferred to reason.

Prob. c. Natural knowledge of God contributes to the celebration of God, as David testifies, Ps. XIX, 1, and Paul, Rom. I, 21. The law of nature prescribes certain things concerning the worship of God and the love of neighbor, Rom. II, 15.

Question VIII. Is the natural knowledge of God so perfect that it suffices for obtaining eternal salvation?

Imperfection of natural theology. The natural knowledge of God does not attain such a peak of perfection that it suffices for man as a pilgrim to obtain eternal salvation, but it is defective, mutilated, and for salvation, it is null.

Prob. I. By the natural knowledge of God, Christ is not apprehended, outside of whom there is no salvation. Acts IV, 12.

II. Not nature, but Holy Scripture is the principle of saving faith, Rom. X, 17. But, he who does not believe is damned. Mark XVI, 16.

III. Through the law of Moses eternal salvation is obtained by no one, Gal. III, 11. Therefore, much less through the law of nature, which is far inferior and weaker than the law of Moses.

IV. The gentiles, even supposing the natural knowledge of God, are said to be alienated from the life that is in God, Eph. IV, 18, not to know God (in a saving way), Gal. IV, 8, and indeed to be without God. Eph. II, 12.

The antithesis is of Puccius, Zwingli, Herbert, Curcellæus, Pelagius, and certain Scholastics, who opine that the natural knowledge of God is sufficient for salvation. Edward Herbert of Cherbury, an English Baron, thinks that those things which are necessary for men for salvation are contained in five articles drawn from the common providence of God. Namely, it must be believed I. That there is some Supreme Being: II. That this Supreme Being is to be worshiped. III. That virtue, conjoined with piety, is the chief part of divine worship. IV. That we must repent of our sins. V. That there is reward and punishment, both in this life and after this life. Resp. Although it can be known by the guidance of the light of nature that there is some Deity, who is most to be worshiped, yet the manner of worship is not known from the principles of nature in this state of sin, in which we often offend God. Unless, therefore, satisfaction has been rendered for sins, by which an angry God may be reconciled, we can neither place our trust in God, nor sincerely love him, nor perform works approved by him. Nor are sins expiated by penitence, because this indeed concerns the sinner, who detests and, as it were, retracts the sins committed; but it does not satisfy God, the supreme offended judge. Not even in a civil court does a defendant satisfy the magistrate whose law he has violated by sorrow alone, by which he might wish the sins had never been perpetrated. Since, therefore, the natural "knowledge of God" does not teach the way in which satisfaction can be made to an angry God, its doctrine is insufficient, and for salvation, null. Add that, by the guidance of nature, man is not certain of a piety pure from pretense; for its author is the Holy Spirit inhabiting our hearts, it proceeds from faith in Christ the satisfier, and it must be directed to the glory of the true God.

You say: Such is the goodness of God, that he looks upon penitence, without the intervention of satisfaction, which goodness of God is known from the light of nature. Resp. Although God is most good, he is yet also supremely just, and a most severe avenger of sins that are contrary to his most holy law, and that by the force of his immutable justice. For which reason, unless satisfaction is made to the offended divine justice, the goodness of God, which does not abolish divine justice, cannot be so known from the light of nature, that the remission of sins and eternal salvation can be expected from it.

Question IX. Is there in the human soul some internal, universal, substantial, salvific light, immediately and objectively revealing all things necessary for salvation, so that every man, by turning to it, can be illuminated and saved by it?

With immediate revelations ceasing after the completion of the canon of holy scripture (a), there is not in the human soul a universal (b), substantial (c), and salvific (d) internal light, immediately and objectively revealing (e) all things necessary for salvation, so that every man can be illuminated and saved by it (f). In vain, therefore, is that fictitious light adorned with various honorary titles (g).

The antithesis is 1) of the Platonic philosophers, who maintain that some light was infused into the souls of men when they were first created, by which, being illustrated, they were able to know God and divine things. MARSILIO FICINO, a Platonist, clearly teaches this in his commentary on Plato's Symposium, oration 4, c. 2. "Men, i.e., the souls of men, once, i.e., when they are created by God, are whole, they are adorned with two lights, an innate and an infused one; so that by the innate they might perceive equal and inferior things, by the infused, superior things. They wished to make themselves equal to God, they reflected upon the single innate light. Here they were divided. They lost the infused splendor when they turned to the innate alone, and immediately fell into bodies." But the Platonists add that that light has been lost to this extent, that it is indeed obscured, but not entirely extinguished; since a reminiscence of it is given, provided that the mind, being purified, or abstracted from the senses and affects, turns itself into its own inmost center, and with its forces collected in itself, is borne upward, seeks celestial and divine things, and strives to return to its own principle. Three things, therefore, are required for receiving the light, "purification" (katharsis), "turning into oneself" (epistrophē eis heauton), and "ascent" (anodos), about which see SCHEFF, in phil. Ital. §. IX. p. 75. et seqq. and cf. MARSILIO FICINO, Comm. in conviv. Platonis, who says: "But for those things which are above nature, thinking that a more sublime light is needed, by a certain most exalted purgation of the soul they so prepare themselves, that the divine light may shine forth upon them again."

2) of the Mystics, following in the footsteps of the Platonists. Let us listen to WEIGELIUS, part II of his postil, p. 61, discoursing thus: "This is certain, we must be taught by the Holy Spirit, by the anointing within us (so he calls the internal light), otherwise everything is in vain that is taught and written externally: we must all be taught by God; from within the knowledge must well up into the object, and not be carried in from a book; for that does not stand the test: we see well what those accomplish in theology who deny the inner testimonies of the Holy Spirit in every single person. We are all gifted with this Spirit, with this anointing, only that we turn inward, and learn from him; then we will, with David, become more learned than all our teachers; he who can listen to him much, can also experience much. In one hour this Spirit promotes a peasant to a Doctor." Upon this dictate of the Holy Spirit speaking immediately in the heart, which they also call the internal light, the Quakers have built their entire matzology. For they assert that God reveals himself and his will through some internal light, which is the vehicle of God, and his celestial and invisible organ. Of which BARCLAY writes in his apology, th. 6. p. 86. "That light is the vehicle of God, in which God and Christ always dwell, and from which they cannot be separated, and as it obtains a place in the heart, and is co-joined with it, Christ is formed and arises."

Exposition

Obs. I. A careful distinction must be made here between natural and supernatural light. We do not deny that there is in the soul of man a natural internal light, by which the essence, attributes, and actions of God are known to some extent, of which the apostle of the gentiles treats in Rom. II, 14. But that light of nature is defective, mutilated, and for salvation null, since by the natural knowledge of God Christ is not apprehended, outside of whom there is no salvation, Acts IV, 12. But the Quakers opine that besides the natural light there is also in every man some supernatural light, of which ROBERT BARCLAY discourses in his apology to thes. 5 & 6 & 16. p. 88. "As God created two great lights to govern the external world, the sun and the moon, the greater light to rule the day, the lesser to rule the night; so he has given to men the light of his son, a spiritual and divine light to govern in spiritual things; and the light of reason to govern him in natural things."

Obs. II. Our churches teach that there is in regenerate men a light of faith, kindled by means of the divine word reduced to writing, from Matth, V, 16. Acts XXVI, 18. But the Quakers think that not only in the regenerate, but also in the unregenerate, there exists a spiritual light, immediately infused by the Holy Spirit into all men, although it shines more clearly in one man, and less clearly in another. "God has given to each one some measure of a salutary, sufficient, and supernatural light," says BARCLAY, loc. cit. p. 97. The light of faith is an accident; but the Quakers believe that the internal light is a real and spiritual substance, which the soul of man can feel and apprehend, according to BARCLAY, loc. cit. p. 84.

Obs. III. The discussion here is not about general revelation, or the natural manifestation, by which God has revealed himself both through the innate light of nature and through the conspicuous effects in the kingdom of nature. See Rom. 1:19. c. II:14-15. But we speak of special and supernatural revelation, which is either mediate or immediate. The latter is that by which God has revealed himself without the external written or preached word; the former is that by which God declares himself and his will through the external written or preached word. The internal light is said to reveal immediately, or to teach immediately.

Obs. IV. The internal light is said to reveal objectively, in opposition to subjective illumination. For thus BARCLAY writes in his apology, p. 22: "The Holy Spirit today not only inspires and leads on the part of the subject, by illuminating the intellect to believe the truth objectively declared in scripture, but also by presenting that truth objectively, or as an object." Where a careful distinction must be made between the material and the formal object of faith. The material object is the thing that is believed; The formal object is the cause, or formal reason for believing, or it is that to which one first believes, and on account of which one believes other things, e.g. A true Christian believes in the triune God, inasmuch as he has revealed himself by means of the external word. From which it is clear that for a true Christian the material object of faith is the triune God, the formal object is mediate revelation. A Quaker, however, believes in God, inasmuch as he has revealed himself through the internal light immediately, i.e. without the concurrence of Holy Scripture. For a Quaker, therefore, the material object of faith is God, the formal object is immediate revelation. For which reason, in the opinion of the Quakers, the internal light reveals God immediately and objectively, because without an external means, without Holy Scripture, it manifests, represents, and presents God, as the object of faith, to the minds of men.

Obs. V. The Quakers adorn the internal light with various honorary titles, or with equivalent words. For it is called by them Christ in us, the internal Christ, the Holy Spirit speaking immediately in the heart, or the dictate of the Spirit speaking in the heart, the seed of the kingdom, the seed of regeneration, the communion of the Spirit, the manifestation of the Spirit, the light that teaches immediately, the light that illuminates all men, the anointing that teaches all things, the light of conscience, the great mystery, the light of the gospel, the lamb of God, the divine aura, the divine tincture, &c. They maintain that these names signify the same thing, being distinguished only by their operations and manifestations.

Confirmation

Prob. a. After immediate divine revelations ceased, there is not in all men an internal light, immediately revealing God and divine things, which a man who is to be saved needs for salutary cognition, or for saving faith. But after the completion of the canon of scripture, they have ceased etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear; because when the end ceases (immediate revelation), the means by which it is to be obtained (the internal light immediately revealing) ceases. The minor is proved (1) from the apostolic oracle, Hebr. I, 1. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." From this apostolic utterance a twofold argument is born for us: The first is: Whosoever by his own revelation has closed and sealed all the modes of immediate revelations (made "in divers manners"), after his time immediate revelations have entirely ceased. But the Son of God in these last times has performed this, as the text has it. Therefore. The second is: Whosoever has added the final term of immediate revelation to all the times and intervals of revelations (made "at sundry times"), he has finished, closed, and sealed immediate revelations. But the Son of God, as the apostle teaches in the cited text, has to all etc. Therefore.

(2) From the divine command of Christ: for he, being about to be taken up into heaven, and instructing the apostles as the common doctors of the world, said, Matth. XXVIII, 20: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." If there were immediate revelations after the completion of scripture, the Savior would certainly have commended these to the apostles before his ascension into heaven. But he did not commend these, but commanded them to so inform men who are to be saved, that they should observe all things which Christ commanded them; which commands of Christ are related in the sacred letters, John XX, 31. But if Christ had said: teach men to observe all things, whatsoever shall be revealed to you inwardly and immediately: the apostles would certainly have used this method of teaching: turn yourselves, O men, who are to attain eternal salvation, into your hearts, and apply them to the internal light that teaches immediately. But they never and nowhere used this method of teaching. For which reason in the present time there are no immediate revelations, and so the internal light, which reveals immediately, is indeed imagined, but is proved by no reason.

(3) From the prophetic oracle of Daniel, chap. IX, 24. "To seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy." From which we gather: Whose office it was to seal up the vision and prophecy, by revealing all things necessary to be known for salvation, he has consummated and sealed the immediate revelations pertaining to our salvation. But it was the office of the Messiah speaking in the last times, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because vision and prophecy is immediate revelation, which he who fulfills is said to seal. The minor is clear from the cited prophetic oracle, to which add the testimony of the Samaritan woman speaking from the common opinion of the Jews: "When Messias cometh, he will tell us all things." (John IV, 25). Which Christ in reality performed. "For all things," he says, "that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." John XV, 15.

(4) From the Pauline testimony, 1 Cor. IV, 6. "that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written." They who ought not to think of divine things above that which is written, it is not for them to expect immediate revelations. But men who are to attain eternal salvation etc. Therefore.

You say: The words of Paul are to be understood of avoiding ambition, so that the sense is: learn that no one should think of himself more ambitiously than what is written. Resp. (a) The words of Paul are posited indeterminately and generally, by which false doctors are warned not to presume to be wise above those things which God has revealed in the scriptures. (b) The false doctors, who today boast of immediate revelations, are the most ambitious of all. (c) If there were an immediate revelation today, Christ and the apostles, and even the prophets, would have sent us away to observe, expect, and receive the internal light, which reveals immediately. But they never send us away to this, but frequently commend to us the reading and meditation of the sacred scripture. How gravely Christ exhorts us, John V, 39. "Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me." But if there existed an internal light infused into our hearts, and teaching immediately, Christ would doubtless have said: Search the light existing in the inmost recesses of your hearts, for in it you think you have eternal life. And it is that which testifies of me. But the assertor of our salvation said this neither in the cited place, nor anywhere. Wherefore the light infused into the minds of all men, and immediately teaching the mysteries of faith, is a chimera, a being of reason, and a figment of the brain.

The Quakers, for whom this oracle of Christ is a thorn in their eyes, make exceptions: (1) That Christ is not speaking in the imperative, as if he were commanding to search the scripture, but in the indicative, reprehending the Jews for searching. (2) That the opinion of the Pharisees, that they have eternal life in the scripture, was erroneous. Whence Christ said: "you think" (hymeis dokeite), not approving this opinion, but simply reporting it. (3) That the searching of the scripture hindered the Jews from coming to Christ. Resp. to (1): Both the nature of the Greek language and the context teach that the imperative is absolutely intended now; otherwise Christ would have said: "you search and you think" (hymeis ereunate kai dokeite). For the idiom of the Greek language does not permit that when two verbs of the indicative mood are joined, the pronoun "you" (hymeis) should be prefixed to the latter, but not to the former. The most learned interpreters have observed this, Chrysostom, Augustine, Theophylact, Euthymius, Lyranus, Carthusianus, Maldonatus, and others, with whom the Syriac version agrees, which rendered it, "search, inquire." Then, although the sense and use of the place is not completely perverted if it is read in the indicative; yet without doubt there is greater emphasis in the imperative. Furthermore, it is not credible that the common people of the Jews, with whom Christ here deals, applied such diligence in reading the scripture that it could be said of them universally, "you thoroughly search" (ereunate) "the scriptures." The Pharisees themselves and the scribes, as can be seen from many places of scripture, were men of supine negligence in investigating, and not just casually reading the scriptures, let alone the common people. The Jews therefore deserved to be rebuked rather for not reading the scripture, than for reading it too much. And how could readers of the scripture be reprehended, who are commended for this study elsewhere? 2 Peter 1, 19. To (2): the verb "you think" (dokeite) does not denote an uncertain and ill-founded opinion, but a certain and well-founded dogma: "you think" (dokeite), that is, you hold as a dogma, you have as a divine dogma, you believe with a certain faith. Thus Paul, when he says: "I think also" (dokō de kagō), "that I have the Spirit of God," certainly does not state an uncertain opinion, but a certainty of mind, or that which he knew and held with a certain faith. To (3): Not the scrutiny of the scriptures, but either the omission, or the neglect of the due scrutiny, i.e., a more diligent, more accurate, and more perspicacious one, by which the scope of the scriptures was to be perceived, hindered the Jews from coming to Christ, or believing in him.

The apostles direct us to the external light of Holy Scripture, Peter in his 2nd Epistle, c. I, 19. "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place." Peter speaks of the prophetic word, which the holy men of God spoke by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, v. 21, and which is preserved in scripture for perpetual use, 2 Tim. III, 16. and he says it is more sure than immediate revelation, not absolutely, but respectively, with respect to the apostolic testimony of the voice of the Father delivered from heaven, and with respect to the readers, or hearers. Now the apostle exhorts us to an attentive meditation of the prophetic word. For "to pay attention to" signifies to read the scripture, and to meditate attentively. Paul also urges this meditation of the divine word, reduced to letters, in 1 Thess. V, 27. "I charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren." Compare 2 Tim. III, 14. 15.

Indeed, even the prophets directed the Israelites to the assiduous meditation of Holy Scripture. Thus God through Moses commands the Israelite king to write for himself a copy of the law, that it may be with him, and that he may read in it all the days of his life, Deut. XVII, 18. The same is commanded to the Israelite leader Joshua, Josh. 1, 8. Thus also God ordered the written law to be read before the whole people, Deut. XXXI, 11. "When all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing." Joshua addresses the Israelites in c. XXIII, 6. "Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses." Isaiah seriously exhorts in c. XXXIV, 16. "Seek ye out of the book of the LORD, and read." Abraham sends the brothers of the rich man to Moses and the prophets. "They have Moses and the Prophets; let them hear them." Luke XVI, 29. He does not say: they have an internal light, which teaches immediately; by applying themselves to it.

(b) Man as a pilgrim, tending toward eternal salvation, has no need of an internal light that reveals immediately; because Holy Scripture manifests God and divine things sufficiently fully and perspicuously, and thus is a sufficient principle of saving faith. This is clearly demonstrated:

(a). From the words of St. John c. XX, 31. "But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name." Whatever scripture is divinely destined for this end, that all through it may believe in Jesus, to obtain eternal life, that scripture reveals the way of salvation so fully and plainly, that man as a pilgrim has no need of immediate revelation. But Holy Scripture etc. Therefore.

(b) From the saying of Paul in Rom. XV, 4. "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope." That divine word which was given for our learning, and such learning from which we may have hope of salvation, was given for this purpose, that from it we might draw as much salutary knowledge as is sufficient for obtaining salvation. But Holy Scripture etc. Therefore.

(c) From the testimony of the same apostle in 2 Tim. III, 14. 15. 16. "But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. For all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." From this classic saying we gather two things: (1) Holy Scripture generally can make every man wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus, so that one must persist in its salutary doctrine; (2) The same scripture specifically instructs the theologian perfectly for all parts of teaching. Therefore, Holy Scripture reveals the things necessary to be known for salvation sufficiently fully and perspicuously, so that man as a pilgrim has no need at all of an internal light that reveals immediately.

Prob. b. That there is no universal internal light is manifest, because the gentiles, to whom the external word of God was not known, are described by Paul as being darkness, Eph. V, 8. i.e. most dark, or immersed in the densest darkness of ignorance and vices; whom the apostle in chap. IV, 18. graphically depicts as being darkened in their understanding, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart; and also dead in sins, Eph. II, 1. without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. Eph. II, 12. We argue:

(1) Whatever men are immersed in the densest darkness of ignorance, darkened in mind, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, without Christ, having no hope of the promise, atheists, and dead in sins, in them there is not a supernatural light, which reveals God and divine things to them immediately and objectively. The major premise is clearer than the sun. For darkness is opposed to light by the apostle in the same place; those darkened in mind are destitute of light; those alienated from the life of God do not have the Holy Spirit speaking in their heart; those who are without Christ, in them there is no internal light, which is called the vehicle of Christ; atheists lack the anointing that teaches all things; in the dead there is not even a spark of light. Therefore, I cherish the words of the FORMULA OF CONCORD, p. 662. "Before man is illuminated, converted, regenerated, and drawn by the Holy Spirit, he can, of himself and his own natural powers, in spiritual matters and for his conversion or regeneration, begin, work, or cooperate in nothing; no more than a stone, a block, or mud." And p. 670. "It seemed good to God by this means, and in no other way, namely by his holy word, when it is either heard preached or is read, and by the legitimate use of the sacraments, to call men to eternal salvation, to draw them to himself, to convert, regenerate, and sanctify them."

The Quakers object; Paul testifies in Rom. II, 14-15 that the gentiles have the law of nature inscribed; because "they shew the work of the law written in their hearts." But the inscribed law of nature is the internal light that reveals immediately. Resp. The law inscribed on the heart by nature is, by reason of its proximate origin, natural, which does not reveal the mysteries of faith; otherwise they would not be mysteries. Now it becomes clear to us that the internal light of the Quakers is not spiritual or supernatural, but natural. Wherefore D. BAIERUS does not think in vain in his dissertation V. on the norm of doctrine §.19 that Naturalism lies hidden in Quakerism. We therefore continue by arguing:

(2) Whatever light is in all men from birth, that is natural. But the internal light of the Mystics and Quakers is in all men from birth. Therefore. The major premise is so firm that it can be broken by no instance, and is confirmed by this, that the work of generation is most natural, by which no supernatural gift is propagated, or diffused to posterity. For, properly speaking, a gift is called supernatural which is not in nature from its first origin, but is superadded by God from a special grace to supply its imperfection.

(3) In the hearts of those men who are without Christ, no light shines, except the natural one. But the gentiles, to whom the external word of God was not known, are without Christ. Eph. II, 12. Therefore.

(4) Whatever light, after the completion of the canon of Holy Scripture, is not kindled in the hearts of men by the external word of God, that is either the natural light, or the foolish fire of the devil. But the light of the Quakers etc. Therefore.

Prob. c. (1) The internal light, immediately revealing, cannot be a substance. For it would be either a complete or an incomplete substance. But it is not a complete substance, because it is not the whole man, nor is it a part of man, because it is neither the body nor the soul of man. (2) Whatever is in another, as in a subject, that is not a substance. But the internal light etc. Therefore. The minor is proved, because the internal light is in man not as a part of him, nor can it exist without him. The Quakers object; this light can also subsist outside of man. Resp. Let them show, therefore, where it subsists outside of man, in heaven, under heaven, or above heaven. (3) The internal light admits of more and less, as Barclay does not deny in his apology, p. 35. Therefore, it is not a substance.

Prob. d. That the internal light which immediately reveals is not salvific, we shall demonstrate with a single, but invincible argument. Whatever light does not manifest to us Jesus Christ, the author, assertor, or vindicator of salvation, that is not salvific. But the immediate internal light of the Mystics and Quakers does not manifest to us Jesus Christ, the author, assertor, and vindicator of our salvation. Therefore, it is not salvific. The major premise possesses invincible strength, because outside of Christ there is no salvation. Acts IV, 12. "This is eternal life, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." John XVII, 3. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." John III, 36. The minor is clear; because the gentiles to whom the external word of God has not been made known are without Christ, Eph. II, 12. i.e. they do not acknowledge Christ.

To this argument, by which the Quakers are struck as by lightning, they respond in various ways. Some contend that an explicit knowledge of Jesus Christ, who suffered and died for us, is not necessary for salvation; Others assert that many men have known Christ, to whom the external word of God never became known, among whom they count not only the patriarchs, Enoch, Noah, Abraham etc., but also the Sibyls and Hermes Trismegistus, to whom Christ was revealed without scripture. Resp. (1) That an explicit knowledge of Christ who suffered and died for us is most necessary for obtaining eternal salvation, the cited biblical sayings abundantly show. We therefore detest the dogma of the Quakers, to which they would never have fallen, if they believed Christ is revealed by their light, without scripture, as judged by D. SCHELWIG in his "Quakerism Confuted," Artic. I. §. 26. p.167. (2) A distinction must be made between the times before the completion of the scripture canon, and those following it. Before the scripture canon was completed, God sometimes revealed himself immediately to a few holy men, namely the patriarchs and prophets, but he manifested himself to a great multitude of men through the intervention of the ministry of God-inspired men. Whence Noah is called a preacher of righteousness, 2 Peter II, 5. Abraham commanded his children to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment. Gen. XVIII, 19. Jacob taught his family. Gen. XXXV, 2. And yet the patriarchs did not attain to the saving knowledge of God by internal revelation alone, without external means. For the word of the gospel concerning the seed of the woman, who would crush the serpent's head, was for that reason revealed not only to the minds of the first parents, but also to their ears, so that they might propagate it to posterity by teaching. Conf. Gen. III, 15. & IV, 26. Abraham also was informed by God by the external word concerning the seed, in whom not only he, but the rest of the gentiles were to be blessed, Gen. XII, 3, which word he transmitted to his sons. Gen. XVIII. (3) That the writings of the Sibyls and Hermes Trismegistus are suppositions, and were compiled by heretics, is demonstrated by M. COLBERG in his "Platonic-Hermetic Christianity," Part. I. c. I. p. 100. & c. V. p. 208.

Prob. e. That the internal light, which immediately reveals, does not manifest all things necessary to be known for salvation, is proved (1) because it does not reveal Christ the author of salvation, which we have already shown. (2) It does not make known the mysteries of faith; for they are hidden dogmas; and so sublime that they far transcend the sphere of natural light, and become known only from a special divine revelation, which, with the completion of the scripture canon, is ordinarily mediate. But that the internal light, in those things which it truly manifests, is the natural light, and in those things which it falsely seems to reveal, is the foolish fire of the devil, we have given proof above. (3) But if from the internal light, which immediately teaches all things necessary to be known for salvation, the whole economy of salvation could be learned, we earnestly ask the dissenters to render clear reasons why God commanded the patriarchs the external preaching of the word? why God sent prophets to teach the Israelite people? why he raised up a great prophet, and put his word in his mouth? why Christ brought forth the gospel from the bosom of the Father, and preached it himself with his own honey-sweet mouth? why the apostles went into the whole world to propagate the gospel of Christ, far and wide, by voice and by writings? why even today pastors and doctors are divinely given for the edification of the body of Christ? why they themselves teach in their assemblies? why they have published catechetical books, and other writings, if the internal light immediately teaches all things necessary for salvation? The adversaries object that the external preaching of the word testifies of the internal light, and declares and manifests it. Resp. If the internal light is the true light, it will declare and manifest itself; but if it cannot do this, it is indeed a miserable light, having more of darkness than of splendor. For the rest, the Quakers will one day have to render an account before the divine tribunal, for having thought so abjectly and contemptuously of the divine scripture; which we know to be "God-breathed," 2 Tim. III, 16, spirit and life, John VI, 63, the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, Rom. I, 16.

Prob. f. (1) Not the internal light, but the external word of God is the efficacious medium by which we are called to the church, 2 Thess. II, 14, illuminated, 2 Peter 1, 19, converted, Jer. XXIII, 29, regenerated, 1 Peter I, 23, justified, 2 Cor. III, 9, renewed, John XVII, 17, preserved, Ps. CXIX, 11, saved, James 1, 21. (2) The internal light is not the true medium of salvation, but the foolish fire of the devil; by which the Quakers, being enormously deceived, spread so many false dogmas. For it is false that there is a supernatural light in the gentiles; it is false that a sinner can be saved without an explicit knowledge of Christ; it is false that in the one essence of God there are not three persons; it is false that Christ did not assume his flesh from Mary, and from her blood, but brought it from heaven; it is false that a converted sinner is justified without the imputed righteousness of Christ, etc. Wherefore we must constantly persevere in this, that God does not wish to deal with us otherwise than through the vocal word and the sacraments, and that whatever is boasted of as spirit without the word and sacraments, is the devil himself, as the blessed LUTHER rightly says in Artic. VIII. Smalcald. pag. 333.

Prob. g. In vain is the internal light adorned with great titles by the Quakers; because we have most clearly demonstrated that it is a non-entity. But to adorn a non-entity with honorary titles is utterly inept. In vain (1) is it called Christ in us, from Col. 1:27. For in that place Paul deals with Christ who suffered and was crucified for us, in whose blood we have the remission of sins, v. 14. Whether these things can be said of the internal light, let the Quakers judge, if there is any grain of salt in them. (2) The Holy Spirit who teaches all things. John XIV, 26. For he is the third person of the divinity, who is certainly not the internal light. For the former is eternal, the latter begins with man. (3) The seed of the kingdom, from Matth. XIII, 19. By which is understood the external word of God, which is heard, and therefore, that it may be heard, is preached. (4) The seed of regeneration, from 1 Peter 1:23. For that seed is the external word, which was evangelized among us, v. 25. (5) The communion of the spirit, from Phil. II, 1. For in that place Paul teaches that Christians have received one and the same spirit of Christ, which communion of the spirit ought to incite them to cherish concord. They received the Spirit, however, from the communion in the gospel, which the apostle had mentioned above in c. 1, 5. (6) The manifestation of the spirit, which is given to every man to profit withal, 1 Cor. XII, 7. For the manifestation of the spirit, which pertains to the profit of the church, is made through the "God-breathed scripture," which is profitable for doctrine etc. 2 Tim. III; 16. (7) The anointing which teaches all things, 1 John II, 20. For by this is understood the Holy Spirit, who is true God. But the internal light is not God, and therefore cannot be understood in that place.

Refutation

The dissenters try to prove the internal light that teaches immediately I. from John I, 9. "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." They think that Christ for us is not understood in that place, but Christ in us. For the former did not illuminate all, but the latter is found in all, and therefore illuminates all who turn inward into themselves, expect, observe, and receive the immediate illumination with silence. Resp. 1) There is only one Christ, one mediator between God and men. 1 Tim. II, 5. 2) The cited words are understood of the person of Christ, who calls himself the light of the world, John VIII, 12, by reason of the prophetic office, which he performed by preaching the divine word, and performs even today by sending pastors and doctors into the church. 3) We distinguish with our D. HÜLSEMANN between intentional and actual illumination. CHRYSOSTOM explains the words of the Evangelist of intentional illumination. Christ by the preaching of the word illuminates every man, as far as is in him. But if some have not wished to direct the eyes of their mind to the rays of this light, they have persisted in darkness not from the nature of the light, but from their own malice. CYRIL, however, and AUGUSTINE wish actual illumination to be understood in a reduplicative sense; Christ by the preaching of the word illuminates every man who is illuminated. But no interpreter has expounded the saying of John of a supernatural internal light. Conf. D. HÜLSEMANN. de auxiliis gratiae p. 89. & 118.

II. The adversaries adduce the saying of Christ in John XII, 35. "Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you." The Quakers deny that the person of Christ is noted here, relying on the following argument. That which being removed, the Jews lost the time of believing, that is not the person of Christ. But the light, of which John makes mention, being removed, the Jews etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because they could have believed in Christ, and many did believe in him unto salvation, just as today all true Christians believe in him, although his person is removed. Resp. 1) The person of Christ is entirely understood, and it is indicated that the Jews, with Christ visibly present, teaching, and confirming his doctrine with miracles, had a most convenient opportunity for believing; which being taken up on the cross, and carried into heaven, no one would teach them with such a distinguished degree of love and candor. 2) We note the gross error of the Quakers, who maintain that, with the visible presence removed, the person of Christ is removed. Which infirm opinion is repugnant both to the celestial truth, Matth. XXVIII, 20, and to the Quakers' own hypothesis, asserting that the internal light is never separated from God and Christ, but where it is, there also are God and Christ involved and veiled in it.

III. The "implanted word" can save a man, James 1, 21. The internal light which teaches immediately is the "implanted word," i.e. the ingrafted word. Therefore. Resp. The "implanted word" is the external word, preached or read, which is called the "implanted word" because by external preaching it is inserted into the hearts of men, just as natural external seed is cast into the furrows of the earth.

IV. That word which is in man himself, that is internal. But the illuminating and regenerating word is in man himself. Therefore. The major is clear; because just as the external word is that which is outside of man; so the internal word is that which is in man. The minor is proved from Rom. X, 8. "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart"; also Col. III, 16. "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly." Resp. 1) The external word becomes internal when it is received by the heart of the hearer or reader. For the divine word is external, by reason of its writing and preaching; yet the same is also internal, by reason of its subjective inherence, inasmuch as it is received by the heart, and inheres in it. Just as philosophical doctrine is external, inasmuch as it is proposed by a teacher to a disciple; yet the same is internal, inasmuch as it is received by the disciple. 2) Paul in Rom. X, 8 expressly adds: "This is the word of faith, which we preach," to indicate that he is speaking of the external word.

V. In whom Christ is, in them is the internal light that teaches immediately. But in men etc. Therefore. The major is clear in itself, because Christ is the true light, John VIII, 12. The minor is clear from Col. 1, 27. "Christ in you." Conf. 2 Cor. XIII, 5. Gal. IV, 19. Resp. 1) Christ, as to his gracious presence, is not in all men; but the internal light that reveals immediately is said by the adversaries to be in all. 2) Christ is in those who keep his word, John XIV, 23, and therefore he teaches man not immediately, but mediately.

VI. In whom the kingdom of Christ is, in them is the supernatural light. But in men etc.. Therefore. The major is established; because to know the kingdom of Christ a supernatural light is required. The minor is clear from Luke XVII, 21. "The kingdom of God is within you." From which WEIGELIUS in his book "Know Thyself" p. 52, concludes that the kingdom of grace is in all men by nature, and does not first come into them through the preaching of the word; since it was already long since in the Pharisees, although they were unbelievers. Resp. The Savior teaches that the kingdom of God is not to be expected from elsewhere outside of Judea, Is. II, 3, but is already in the bosom of the Jewish nation. For Christ and his disciples preached the kingdom of God, Matth. IV, 17, although it was not in individual Jews; because the Pharisees here are considered not in themselves, and by themselves alone, but as if collected into one body with the rest. 2) Grant that the kingdom of God was within the hearts of the Pharisees, by reason of cognition, yet they had obtained that knowledge of the kingdom of grace not from an internal natural or supernatural light, but from the external word preached within Judea.

VII. In whose hearts God is manifested, in them is the internal Light. But in the hearts of the gentiles etc. Therefore. The major is established, because light is said to be that which manifests something. The minor is proved from Rom. I, 19. "that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them." Resp. In whose hearts God is manifested, in them is a supernatural internal light; I deny. For there is also a natural light, by which God and divine things are known to some extent. The context teaches that Paul in that place is speaking of the natural knowledge of God. But that is not sufficient for salvation.

VIII. There are immediate revelations. Therefore, today there is an internal light that reveals immediately. The antecedent is proved by this argument; Those who still receive the Spirit of God, that they may know the things of God, they still receive immediate revelations. But all faithful Christians etc. Therefore. The major is established, because the Holy Spirit is the spirit of wisdom and revelation. Eph. I, 17. The minor is clear from 1 Cor. II, 12. Resp. I deny the major. For where there is the spirit of wisdom and revelation, there is divine revelation, either mediate or immediate. The immediate formerly happened to the prophets and apostles, the mediate is enjoyed today by all true Christians, who ordinarily receive the Spirit of God through baptism, John III, 5, and through the written or preached word, John VI, 63, Acts X, 44. For the rest, a response has been given above to the remaining arguments by which "the opponents" try to establish immediate revelations, proleg. III. qu. 3.

Question X. What is the revealed knowledge of God?

Revealed knowledge of God. Revealed knowledge of God is that which is drawn from the supernatural divine revelation, comprehended in the written word, concerning the triune God in the church, and suffices for eternal salvation.

Obs. Revealed knowledge of God differs from natural knowledge 1) by reason of the principle, which here is not nature, or creature, but holy scripture. 2) By reason of the object; because although some things are also known by the light of nature, which the revealed "knowledge of God" embraces; this nevertheless contains many things unknown to nature, such as concerning the divine persons, concerning the evangelical will. 3) By reason of the knowing subject. The revealed knowledge of God is proper to the church, the natural is common to all men. 4) By reason of the end. The revealed knowledge of God is salvific, John XVII, 3. But the natural knowledge of God is not sufficient for salvation, but only pedagogical; because its end intended per se by the creator is "a leading by the hand" (cheiragōgia), inducing man to think and inquire about the assembly in which the true

God of Israel dwells. Acts XVII, 27. But its accidental end, or event, resulting from the abuse of innate knowledge, is "inexcusability" (anapologēsis), Rom. I, 20.

Question XI. Is the contemplation of God, and of divine things, which is said to happen either without species and discourse, or through new species, divinely infused, to be preferred to the meditation of the divine word?

The contemplation of God, and of divine things, for the state of this life, neither happens without a species (a), nor without discourse (b), nor through new species divinely infused (c), nor is it to be preferred to the meditation of the divine word (d).

The antithesis is of the Mystics, insisting on the footsteps of PLATO, who placed the highest good in the contemplation of God and divine things. See Theol. Myst. BALTHAS. KOEPKENII Part. I. c. I. p. 46. But the Mystics distinguish between meditation and contemplation, which distinction D. MICHAEL DE MOLINOS explains and inculcates in the preface of his spiritual guide, admonition 1 & 11. p. 19. et seqq. "Meditation is properly so called, when the intellect considers the mysteries of our holy faith with attention, to know their truth, discoursing on their particular heads, and pondering the circumstances, to arouse affections in the will. Contemplation, however, as defined by THOMAS, is the sincere, sweet, and quiet intuition of eternal truth, without discourse, or reflection." It is otherwise called the prayer of faith, the prayer of quiet, interior recollection. They distinguish contemplation into acquired and infused. Acquired contemplation is otherwise called active and imperfect, and is that which can be obtained by our diligence, with divine grace assisting us, however, when we recollect our powers, or faculties, and senses, and prepare ourselves for everything that God may wish. Infused contemplation is passive and perfect, in which (as St. Theresa says) God speaks to man, suspending his intellect, interrupting his thought, and (as it is said) taking the word from his mouth, so that if he should wish to the utmost, he can yet scarcely, and not even scarcely, speak. He understands without the noise of words, the divine master instructs him, suspending his powers, which would then harm rather than help, if they were to operate. They themselves rejoice, but how they rejoice, they do not understand. The soul burns with love, but how it burns, it does not perceive. It knows that it enjoys him whom it loves, but how it enjoys him, it does not know; it perceives well enough that that fruition is not that to which the intellect aspires. The will embraces him, nor does it understand how. p. 33. The same adduces the testimony of Bonaventure in these words: "St. Bonaventure teaches that no thing is to be thought of, not even of God himself, since it is an imperfection to hold forms, images, and species, however subtle they may be, of the will as well as of the goodness, of the trinity and unity, even of the divine essence itself; since all those species and images, although they may seem Godlike, are yet not God himself, who does not admit any image or form. There, says the Saint, one ought not to think of things concerning creatures, nor of angels, nor of the trinity, because this wisdom has to arise through the affects of desires, not through previous meditation. Here it is plainly of no account to think of creatures, nor of angels, nor of God himself, because that wisdom and perfection is not generated by subtle meditation, but by the desire and affect of the will." p.56. MOLINOS requires the knowledge of God and of divine things in the mystic contemplator to be not distinct, but confused: "Interior recollection is faith and silence in the presence of God. From thence you ought to acquire the habit of recollecting yourself in his presence, with a most loving attention, as one who gives himself to God, and unites himself with him with reverence, humility, and submission, beholding him within you, in the inmost part of your soul, without form, species, mode, or figure, with an intuition and a general knowledge full of faith and love, and obscure, without any distinction of perfection or attribute." p. 93. & p. 95. "Faith ought to be pure, without images and species, simple without discourses, and universal, without reflection on distinct things." For which reason he thinks that contemplation is not done through the second operation of the mind, which is judgment; nor through the third, which is discourse; but through the first and principal operation of the intellect, namely through simple apprehension, illuminated by holy faith, and aided by the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

To this Molinos we shall add the opinions of other Mystics concerning contemplation. BARTHOLOMEW OF THE MARTYRS in his compendium of spiritual doctrine writes: "If you ask what that darkness is, which contemplatives assert to be the supreme and ultimate goal, to which our intellect can arrive on the way in contemplation of the Lord (understand, however, without a special infused light), know that there are three grades of divine cognition. The first is called discourse or meditation, when anyone contemplates the divine perfections, or the attributes of the Lord, such as power, wisdom, and goodness, and progresses from one to the others. The second grade is called simple intelligence, when our intellect is so simply fixed on God, and the divine essence, that it considers nothing else besides God; but since this intellection, although simple, brings with it a positive concept of God, although it does not respect any special attribute of his, and it is held for certain by all that all positive concepts which the fragility of our intellect can form of God are imperfect, and cannot fully suffice for the true knowledge of God, but are certain media between God and our intellect; therefore a third, still more sublime grade of divine cognition is found, to which we then arrive, when our intellect entirely suspends both the acts and the concepts which it formed of God in meditation; or which it receives in the simple intellection of the divine essence, and then it is submerged in a certain ignorance, in which it confesses that it cannot sufficiently understand what the Lord is; and it is said to remain in darkness, which is the highest goal of all to which our intellect, while we live, can ascend." Whence Dionysius writes, the best knowledge of God is this ignorance. Wherefore the calamity of this life is deservedly to be deplored, whose highest felicity consists in ignorance itself and the darkness of God, when yet the clear knowledge of the Lord alone is the highest beatitude. What is denoted by that darkness, the author himself explains in the same place: "The intellect, existing in that darkness, does not remain entirely idle, but when it expels all positive concepts, it remains in a certain negative concept far more perfect than they, namely, incomprehensible, inconceivable, intelligible." He therefore deems him happy who with Moses enters the darkness.

Among the chief cultivators of mystic theology is counted Cardinal RICHELIEU, who in his treatise on the perfection of the Christian discourses in the following manner: "That those (species of mental prayer) may be better understood, four different means by which men can attain the knowledge of God seem to me to be proposed.

I. The first is common to philosophers and Christians, and depends on the senses and the vision of creatures, from whose existence the first cause, which is God, is necessarily inferred. By this means it is perceived that there is truly one first principle of all things; but what it is like is unknown, and in that way, being certain of its existence, we remain ignorant of the essence.

II. The other is particular to Christians, who by faith attain many things, and believe things that do not fall under the senses, and which even at first sight are repugnant to reason, and which also seem entirely impossible to their judgment, whence faith is called by the apostle the "argument of things that do not appear." By this second means, not only is it known that God exists, but also what He is like, although we are by no means able to conceive His essence and perfections as they are, with clarity.

III. The third is special to certain souls, which God desires to raise to a particular degree of sublimity, granting them to foretaste to some extent the celestial happiness of the blessed, although not by the same reason and way that they enjoy it. This happens in two ways: First, through the infusion of intelligible species, which are not derived from the senses, but are expressly formed by God in the mind of man, so that this agent, acting independently of the sensible species which it borrows from the eyes, ears, and other senses, may know its creator more perfectly than it is accustomed to do through ideas produced by revelation from created things, which must necessarily be imperfect, on account of the distance between the created and the uncreated, the defect and limits of the one, and the perfection and infinity of the other. Such species infused by God are called by contemplative people "Deiform" and "Deific," because they are more in agreement with the knowledge of the saints, who are united to God through God Himself in the heavens, than with the cognition of men, who on earth are not commonly brought to God, except through species drawn from sensible things. The other way in which this effect is produced consists not in the creation of a new form, species, or image, but only in the infusion of an extraordinary light bestowed by God upon the soul, that it may know Him better than usual, so efficacious that His same essence, previously imperfectly conceived for lack of clarity, is then better perceived, although through the same species by which the human mind was previously occupied in knowing Him. The truth of this can be apprehended by the example of one who, not having enough light from a single torch to perceive an image hidden in the dark, sees it much more perfectly when it is illuminated by three or four torches.

IV. The fourth means of knowing God is the rarer and more singular in that it grants not only a foretaste of the happiness of the blessed even here, but also to enjoy it in the same way that they enjoy it in heaven, that is, to behold God through the light of glory, with this distinction only, that in heaven the happiness and the manner of enjoying it are perpetual, but in these lower regions both are transient and momentary. Such were the visions of Moses and of the divine Paul; the former being the first doctor of the Jews, the other of the Christians.

Maximilianus Sandaeus, by no means the least of the mystics, in his Theologia Mystica, book I, commentary XIV, exercise 1, dissertation 1, § 3, calls infused and passive contemplation "supereminent," which the mystic enjoys when God communicates a fuller influx of intellectual light, either through the emission or infusion of certain new species, suitable for the most excellent knowledge of God, so as to represent God most clearly and accurately, or through a particular and most suitable disposition, connection, complication, or ordering of pre-existing species. For they are sometimes snatched away in a certain admirable manner to the inner recesses, as it were, of darkness, and there, as if in the sight of God, who is essentially light, they receive new and unusual illuminations; the will also so burns and seethes that by a certain impulse it seems to leap forth and be transformed and deified. Sandaeus delineates the manner in which such supereminent contemplation occurs in the following way: "The mystics express it quite obscurely, but I shall say it as clearly as I can in my own words, according to their sense. The contemplative soul having been admitted to the divine darkness, since the intellective and affective parts are in it; the former, which is also the intelligence, beholds in a certain way the beloved, but the beholding is so obscure that in beholding it does not behold. And so it is considered to lie before the door or the inner sanctum of the dark dwelling, and there with clamor, groaning, and sighs, with vows and repeated supplication, to demand that the face so often desired be manifested to it. While it pants to see this face, the affective part, which is also the will, is snatched away to the indwelling darkness, to a most familiar meeting, while the intelligence remains outside. Wherefore it is elevated by the loving assistance of God above the intelligence. There, the will, being established, begins in a new way to be carried toward God by a most excited affection, to be loved by Him as a bride, to love Him as the beloved, to be held by Him in a living embrace, to be deemed worthy of a kiss, to be joined to God in an ineffable manner, to be transfused into Him, to dissolve, to be transformed, in a single word, to be deified, not by a change of substance, but by the conversion of affection and most intense love; thus the will, united to God, conceives its beloved, tastes, and enjoys Him. Then indeed the intelligence itself is also called to the highest inner sanctums, and as it were enters the holy of holies of the dark temple, struggles through the densest cloud of incomprehensibility, is led to the very throne of majesty, is illustrated with new splendors; although every veil is drawn from the face of the divinity, yet it is borne with its gaze so fixed upon God, surrounded by inaccessible light, that only the thinnest curtain of translucent gauze or lantern paper seems to fall between it and the face of the beloved. This is that contemplation of the highest degree, sought by the vows of so many mystics, celebrated with so many encomiums, enveloped in the coverings of so many unknown names, designated by the symbols of so many various things, expressed or adumbrated by so many images, so often described, so often invoked with affection, voice, and tears." It is of no use to adduce more mystical authors, since from the four cited, we may clearly perceive the opinion of the mystics concerning contemplation.

Exposition

Obs. I. By contemplation (in German die Beschauung oder Beschaulichkeit), the mystics do not understand speculation, which consists and rests in the mere cognition of the object. For there are two ways, according to Molinos in book III of his Spiritual Guide, chap. XVIII, p. 373, which lead to the knowledge of God; one is remote, the other proximate. The first is called speculation; the second, contemplation. The learned, who follow scientific speculation and the sweetness of sensible discourses, ascend in this way, as far as they can, to God, so that by this aid they may be able to love Him; but none of those who follow this way, which is called scholastic, arrives by it alone to the mystical way, nor to the excellence of union, transformation, simplicity, light, peace, tranquility, and love, as he who is led by divine grace through the mystical way to contemplation arrives at the experience thereof.

Obs. II. The evangelical doctors do not wish all contemplation of God and spiritual things to be rejected. For reborn men, who have learned the true opinion about God and divine things from the words of scripture, and have given their assent to it, with this knowledge and assent standing, and thus retaining in their minds intelligible species, then look upon the things themselves, which, these things being supposed, they behold as they are presented to the intellect through intelligible species, and abstaining from carnal desires they lower themselves into a profound contemplation and admiration of spiritual things, and what is contained generally in the scriptures, descending under these things to themselves, they perceive some spiritual sense of the divine goodness, by which the soul is sweetly affected and finds rest. Cf. D. Baierus in his dissertation de praegustu vitae aeternae §. 58. p. 52.

Obs. III. The question is now asked: whether the contemplation of God occurs 1) without any species, whether derived from created things or impressed on the mind from the reading and hearing of the external divine word, 2) without discourse, 3) through new species divinely infused, or through an extraordinary light? 4) whether contemplation is to be preferred to divine meditation?

Confirmation

Prob. a. We demonstrate clearly that the contemplation of God and divine things in this mortal life does not occur without an impressed species:

(1) From the Pauline assertion in 1 Corinthians XIII, 12: "For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known." The apostle opposes τὸ βλέπειν δι' ἐσόπτρου (seeing through a glass) to τὸ βλέπειν πρόσωπον πρὸς πρόσωπον (seeing face to face); of which the former, taken from a mirror, which presents not the thing itself but its image to those who look, when transferred to designate the knowledge of God and divine things, is the same as to know God, and the things that are of God, not in themselves, but as in an image, by means of signs and impressed species; which indeed are either derived from created things, or come about through internal inspiration, or through the external word, whether of the living voice or of writing, by which God and divine things are represented to the intellect of man, and inhere in the intellect; but the latter, or τὸ (seeing) face to face, just as in proper speech it is the same as to see the thing itself, without the intercession of any image of it which, taking the place of the thing itself, is presented to our eye; so when transferred to the knowledge of God, it is the same as to know God through Himself immediately, and without an impressed species. Therefore, by force of the opposition between that which is now, and will at some time be done away; and that which is not now, but will only be then, after this life, when the imperfection of this life is abolished, it is necessarily gathered that the immediate and intuitive contemplation of God, by which God is seen without an image of Himself, is so reserved for the future life, that it has no place at all in this life. And since the apostle includes himself also in the number of those who know not face to face, but through a glass, darkly; with what audacity is a more sublime knowledge of God in this life attributed to any of the faithful? Is there any mortal who can be raised to such a sublimity as to reach the measure of Paul? says Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 29. From these established points, we form an argument: Whatever contemplation is so reserved for the future life that not even the apostles were capable of it in this life, no mortal attributes that to himself without a mark of signal rashness and impiety. But the immediate and intuitive contemplation of God, which occurs without any impressed species, is so reserved for the future life, etc. Therefore.

You say: Supereminent contemplation is intermediate between the abstractive and the intuitive knowledge of God; because it occurs through a supernatural light, equally infused, and new species divinely imparted. Resp. Paul denies that there is a middle knowledge of God between the abstractive, which occurs through an impressed species, and the intuitive, which occurs without a species. St. John agrees with him, in his Epistle, chap. III, 2: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." To see God as He is denotes the intuitive knowledge of God, which occurs without an intervening image or species. But when the apostle says that this has not yet appeared now, he at the same time says that contemplation which occurs without a species has not yet happened to anyone in this life.

(2) Whatever knowledge of God is confused and obscure, true Christians rightly and deservedly despise it. But the contemplation of the mystics, which occurs without an impressed species, is confused and obscure. Therefore, true Christians rightly and deservedly despise it. The major premise is established; because the θεογνωσία (knowledge of God) of true Christians is clear and distinct, it is ἐπίγνωσις (solid knowledge), Col. 1, 9; it is πληροφορία τῆς συνέσεως (full assurance of understanding), Col. II, 2. It is for true Christians "to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," 2 Peter III, 18. The minor premise is clear; because Molinos confesses that, "even if the intellect of the contemplator does not know distinctly through discourse, images, and considerations, it nevertheless understands and knows through an obscure, general, and confused faith," in the preface to his Spiritual Guide, p. 17. The contemplation of the mystics is so dark that Dionysius writes that "the best knowledge about God is this ignorance," as attested by Peter of Martos, in his compendium of spiritual doctrine, P. II, C. 11. But in the sacred letters, ἄγνοια (ignorance) is opposed to true faith, Acts XVII, 30; Eph. IV, 18. Indeed, I would dare to say that the contemplation of the pseudo-mystics is of the highest harm to the entire Christian religion. For not only heretics, but also Turks, Tartars, and gentiles know God obscurely, confusedly, and indistinctly. For which reason that confused θεογνωσία (knowledge of God) removes the distinction between the true and the false religion, and opens the way to skepticism, and to a universal syncretism with heretics, Jews, Turks, and gentiles. Cf. D. Andreas Kühnius, de mysticorum Quietismo contemplativo, c. II. p. 89.

(3) All true contemplation of the human intellect, as long as the soul dwells in this mortal body, occurs through the conversion of the intellect to phantasms, that is, to sensible species, from which the human intellect abstracts, elicits, and purifies intelligible species. From which Franciscus Suarez concludes, Tom. II. de Relig. l. 2. c. 14, that it cannot happen naturally for a man in this life to be rapt into a true contemplation of God through the intellect, with no cooperation at all from the senses, neither external nor internal. Therefore, the human intellect does not contemplate God without sensible or intelligible species, unless it is either separated from the body by death, or abstracted from the use of the external senses by ecstasy. The most skilled of the mystics seem to me to have acknowledged this. Bartholomew de Martyribus in his compendium of spiritual doctrine says: "Mystical theology is nothing other than ecstatic love, having attained a pure intelligence of the spirit, purified from the clouds of phantasms." Michael de Molinos numbers ecstasy, rapture, liquefaction, fainting, etc. among the degrees of contemplation, p. 358. Cardinal Richelieu, de perfect christ c. XXXII, says: "The first and most notable effect of this exalted contemplation is ecstasy." Indeed, this Cardinal calls supereminent contemplation "rapture," chap. XXXIV. "Rapture is the translation of any thing to a state either contrary to its nature, or at least superior to it. Thus a stone is lifted upwards, etc. Whence, when God, leading the soul out of its usual manner of operating through the imagination, raises it to behold His majesty without reflection, and without discourse, whether in intelligible species, which it fixes by effort, or in the proper divine essence, it ought to be considered rapt, inasmuch as it acts above itself, and in a manner not proper to its nature." From these things it is concluded that the contemplation of the pseudo-mystics, which they say happens to them without any phantasm, is to be esteemed as nothing more than ecstasy, through which the human soul is transferred from a natural state into a preternatural one. For ecstasy, as defined by Richelieu, is "a state of the soul operating in a manner exceeding the ordinary sensible and intellectual functions."

(4) The human intellect cannot know God better than through the images representing God to us in Holy Scripture, as a most powerful lord and king, a most just judge, a most kind father, a most merciful redeemer of the human race, a most efficacious sanctifier and paraclete, etc. Through these images or species God is known more rightly, clearly, and perfectly than without them.

You say: "We know God more perfectly (according to Dionysius) through negations than through affirmations. We think more highly of God by knowing that He is incomprehensible and superior to all our capacity, than by conceiving Him under some image according to our crude intellect. Therefore, greater esteem and love will be engendered from that confused, obscure, and negative mode, than from any other sensible and distinct one; because the former is proper to God, the latter common to creatures, and therefore imperfect." Resp. (I) We acknowledge, admire, and esteem God as incomprehensible. But the love of God is not founded on His incomprehensibility, as a negative term, but on His goodness, as a positive term; because nothing is appetible and lovable, unless it is good. (II) God is lord, king, Father, redeemer, sanctifier; He is likewise just, good, wise, merciful, properly, and these predicates are said of God more properly than of men, since they belong to God πρῶτως (primarily), but to creatures only δευτέρως (secondarily).

(5) The contemplation of the mystics entails no small absurdities. For since it is said to occur without any impressed species, Bonaventure states that "no thing should be thought of, not even of God Himself, since it is an imperfection to hold to forms, images, and species, however subtle they may be, of will, of goodness, of trinity and unity, even of the divine essence itself; since all those species and images, although they may seem deiform, are nevertheless not God Himself, who admits of no image or form at all." From this absurd assertion it follows that God is not to be invoked in the Lord's Prayer as a heavenly father, not to be feared as a lord and judge, not to be loved as the highest good. Which images or positive concepts, although they do not represent God adequately and fully, nevertheless represent Him inadequately and truly; since they represent not the whole of God, yet something of God. But Dionysius, in chap. V of his Mystical Theology, uses insolent and plainly monstrous ways of speaking, saying: "God is not one, nor wise, nor wisdom, nor virtue, nor omnipotent, etc." Who would not detest those ineptitudes, shall I say, or blasphemies?

(6) Paul seriously exhorts Timothy: ὑποτύπωσιν ἔχε ὑγιαίνοντων λόγων (hold fast the form of sound words), "which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. 1, 13. ὑποτύπωσιν (form) the Vulgate rendered as formam, Hugo Grotius as "an exemplar fixed in the mind," others as "an image and delineation." Those whose duty it is to always have the form of sound words in faith and love, it is their duty not to contemplate God without any species or image. But it is the duty of the faithful doctors of the church to always have the form of sound words in faith and charity. Therefore.

Prob. b. (1) True and salutary contemplation of God and of divine things is directed to the praxis of the will, and therefore occurs through discourse and a practical syllogism, if not formal and fully expressed, certainly virtual and implicit, if not verbal, certainly mental. For the true contemplator gazes upon and weighs with fixed eyes of the mind the independent, infinite, and immense essence of God, and concludes with himself: "Therefore, the majesty of God is to be admired"; he contemplates the most exuberant goodness of God, and concludes: "Therefore, God is to be loved"; and he even adds a more specific practical conclusion: "Therefore, God is to be loved by me also"; he contemplates the wisdom and power of God, and reasons: "Therefore, God is also to be venerated." A true contemplator, if anyone else, was the apostle John, who, when he had turned the eyes of his mind to the love of God, with which He embraces us mortals, concludes: "We love him, because he first loved us," 1 John IV, 19. You may find very many such virtual discourses in the monuments of the prophets and apostles. To what good would the contemplations of the thrice-best, thrice-greatest God be, if they did not elicit spiritual and pious motions in our souls through discourse?

(2) Contemplative mystics, thinking that contemplation occurs through the first operation of the mind, or simple apprehension, do not consider with themselves how great a sickness our intellect labors under, if you look at simple apprehension, necessary for intuiting the essences of things, about which let us hear the philosopher of most refined judgment, D. Leichner, accurately discussing in book I of de vera philosophiae bono, chap. XIV. p. 150: "Which original defect, if considered philosophically, consists in this, that the intellect of man is now by its nature entirely

NAKED (according to Aristotle, with respect to all actual knowledge), or (according to Plato, with respect to the knowledges which they call innate) a BLANK SLATE, on which nothing of science is actually inscribed, but neither can anything be inscribed, except through sensual perception, and thence further by means of ratiocination. By which two ways, indeed, the first operation of the mind (simple apprehension of essences) in itself, or intrinsically, can by no means be perfected, nor can it ever be imbued with any intellectual species, which represent the very essences of things, whatever vicarious sensible species and borrowed complex concepts (predicatively and argumentatively) may in the meantime offer assistance; otherwise, indeed, the matter stood with the still innocent first man, whose mind was by no means so naked or a blank slate that it held nothing inscribed, except what it first received by prior sense or by the discourse of reason, but from a concreated light it shone with impressed ideas and images of essences (like a living mirror), so that from this he also by a simple intuition (without affirmation and negation, and without discourse) truly knew them, or contemplated them; for otherwise he would have been just as blind and miserable as we are today. Therefore, the entire virtue of our genius, and the faculty of knowing, and all its vigor resides in composition and division (affirmation and negation), and likewise in argumentation, partly resting on the first and self-evidently known principles of any science, partly on the induction and experience of particulars, and as far as both that light extends, penetrating the complex truth of things as the case may be scientifically (ἐπιστημονικῶς). With these things established, I deny that the contemplation of God and divine things occurs solely through the first operation of the mind; I deny that it is a simple intuition of God without judgment and discourse.

Prob. c. But we utterly disapprove of and turn away from the passive, infused, and supereminent contemplation of the mystics, which occurs through the impartation of new species (which are not revealed), or the infusion of extraordinary light. For (1) Paul exhorts us in 1 Cor. IV, 6, μάθητε τὸ μὴ ὑπὲρ ἃ γέγραπται, φρονεῖν (learn not to think above that which is written). But the mystics presume to be wise above that which is written. They are not content with the species revealed in the word of God, but expect new ones. The light of Holy Scripture seems to them impure and too meager, and therefore they burn with desire for an extraordinary light; but by that very fact they fall into enthusiasm. For thus the enthusiasts in article VIII of the Smalcaldic articles, p. 351, are delineated: "In those things which concern the vocal and external word, it is to be constantly held that God bestows His spirit or grace on no one, except through the word and with the external and preceding word, so that we may thus fortify ourselves against the enthusiasts, that is, spirits who boast that they have the spirit before the word, and without the word."

(2) For doctors of truth, who are diligent for sincere piety, the sufficient light of the prophetic and apostolic word shines forth, which the apostle Peter commends in his 2nd Epistle, 1, 19. Indeed, the author of salvation Himself gravely warns, John VIII, 31: Ἐὰν ὑμεῖς μείνητε ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῷ ἐμῷ, ἀληθῶς μαθηταὶ μου ἔστε (If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed). On the contrary, "if any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; He is proud, knowing nothing," 1 Tim. VI, 3, 4.

(3) Mystics, by the supereminent contemplation which they boast, pervert the order of the soul's faculties, namely of the intellect and the will, thinking that the will of the contemplator is rapt to the darkness where God dwells, to a familiar meeting, while the intelligence remains outside, and thus is elevated by the loving assistance of God above the intelligence. But that well-worn axiom is known to everyone: "Nothing is willed, unless it is first known." And that pronouncement of Augustine: "As much as you know, so much you love," is most conformable to the truth.

(4) We by no means give our white stone of approval to the assertion of Cardinal Richelieu, who says that some of the reborn, exceptionally dear to God, are raised by a singular divine grace to a particular degree of sublimity, so that they behold God through the light of glory on earth, just as the blessed do in heaven, with this sole distinction, that in heaven the happiness and the way of enjoying it are perpetual, but in these lower regions both are transient and momentary. For by this assertion the state of travelers and of the blessed is confused. For the former now see God through a glass, darkly; but the latter face to face; the former know in part, the latter perfectly, 1 Cor. XIII, 12. For the former it has not yet been manifested what they shall be; but the latter are like God, and see him as he is, 1 John III, 2. The former, while they are at home in the body, are absent from the Lord; for they walk by faith, not by sight. The latter, while they are absent from the body, are present with the Lord, 2 Cor. V, 6, 7, 8. In this kingdom of grace, blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed. John XX, 29.

Prob. d. (1) Meditation on the divine word begets a knowledge of God and divine things that is salvific and beatific. Therefore, contemplation cannot beget a more perfect θεογνωσίαν (knowledge of God) than meditation. The consequence is solid; because in this life no greater and more perfect knowledge of God and divine things can be given than that which leads us to eternal beatitude. The antecedent is evident from many biblical sayings. King David proclaims him blessed who meditates on the law of the Lord day and night, Ps. 1, 2. Christ pronounces them blessed who hear the word of God and keep it, Luke XI, 28. James exhorts in chap. I, 21: "Receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls."

(2) From assiduous and attentive meditation on the divine word is born a distinct knowledge of God, of the divine persons, of the attributes and actions of God, of the principles and means of salvation. But from contemplation proceeds a confused, obscure, and general knowledge, according to Molinos, admon. I. n. 7. p. 17. But the more distinct knowledge is, the more perfect it is. For confusion in any matter is a mark of imperfection, distinction a mark of perfection, especially in knowledge. For this reason, the Protestant doctors, moved by grave causes, consider meditation on the divine word to be more important than the contemplation of the mystics, although they do not reject all contemplation.

Analysis

I. The mystics opine that experimental knowledge, which Paul calls αἴσθησιν (sensation or experience), and distinguishes from ἐπιγνώσει (knowledge), Phil. 1, 9, flows and is drawn from contemplation. Resp. (1) That αἴσθησις denotes an internal sense or experience of divine grace, love, and goodness is plain to everyone. This sense of divine grace is also called a taste of goodness. In Ps. XXXIV, 9, the Psalmist says:

"O taste and see that the Lord is good." Where both "to taste" and "to see" note an experimental and sensible cognition of the divine goodness. We subscribe to D. Geier, who neatly interprets the words of David: "טעמן (taste), that is, consider and experience with singular delight. The metaphor is drawn from the external animal sense to the internal intellect of man, and thus 'to taste' is the same as to understand, to experience, to enjoy, as in Proverbs. וראו (and see), that is, know abundantly and in many ways. Again, the metaphor is transferred from sensual cognition to intellectual cognition, in such a way that vision designates a more accurate cognition of something; for vision is also more accurate than the other senses. Indeed, to see is sometimes the same as to enjoy the thing known at the same time. Compare Eccl. 1, 16; Ps. IV, 7; XXVII, 13. Wherefore, both 'to taste' and 'to see' denote experimental knowledge, because in civil life we get experience of something no more through the taste of the tongue than the sight of the eyes." We note at the same time the error of the mystics who state that "to taste" designates practice, and "to see" designates theory, and from this they conclude that in mystical theology practice precedes theory. But the practice of the will is certainly blind if it is not preceded by a distinct cognition in the intellect. (2) Not only literal knowledge about God and divine things, but also experimental knowledge, is drawn from the word of God reduced to letters. This we learn (a) from the saying of Peter, 1 Ep. c. II, 2, 3: "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby; If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." Peter implies that we taste and feel the goodness of God in the sweetest milk of the gospel; for it presents to us the sweetness of the Lord to be tasted. (b) From the utterance of Paul; for the apostle Paul joins most closely the taste of the divine word and the taste of the powers of the world to come, Hebr. VI, 5, saying: "And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come;" because the word of the gospel not only reveals heavenly joys to us objectively, but also effectively works in us righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, Rom. XIV, 17. (3) We do not deny that genuine contemplation, by which reborn men gaze with fixed eyes of the mind upon the grace of God according to intelligible species, and embrace it with singular trust, contributes something of importance to the experimental knowledge of God. Yet it is certain that τὴν αἴσθησιν (the sensation) does not occur without intelligible species, impressed on the intellect by means of the external word.

II. Whoever tastes God dwelling in their hearts, knows Him immediately (without the concurrent external word of God). But true contemplators, etc. Therefore. The major premise is evident; because a man can perceive everything that is in his heart, if he descends into himself, without an external medium, and therefore immediately. For "the things of a man, knoweth the spirit of man which is in him," 1 Cor. II, 11. The minor is proven, because God (1) dwells in the reborn, 1 Cor. III, 16.; (2) the same ones taste the goodness of God, Ps. XXXIV, 9. Resp. Whoever tastes God dwelling in their hearts, and is illuminated by the light of glory, knows God immediately; I concede. But in this life the illuminating grace of the Holy Spirit informs and illuminates us through the prophetic and apostolic word, 2 Pet. I, 19; 2 Cor. IV, 6, and therefore we taste God not immediately, but in the milk of the gospel.

III. Whoever tastes the powers of the world to come, must be illuminated by the light of glory, so that they can behold God immediately. But pious contemplators, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the powers of the world to come are joys, which on this earth "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man," 1 Cor. II, 9. Wherefore, for their perception, the light of glory is required. The minor is clear from Hebr. VI, 5. Resp. By the powers of the world to come, following D. Sebastian Schmidt, comm. in h. l. p. 605, we understand justice, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, in which the kingdom of God consists, Rom. XIV, 17. They are called δυνάμεις (powers), because God also in these things singularly exercises his power within us; which δυνάμεις (powers) are common to the kingdom of grace and glory, although the degree of perception in the other life will be far more excellent. Indeed, peace and joy, and even inchoate justice, are most true goods, and are not different in substance in this life than in the future life. But why, you ask, did the apostle not rather say the powers of this age, than of the age to come? Resp. The chief reason is that the apostle was about to teach that certain charismata, or goods of eternal life, are conferred even in this life in a certain degree to those who have been illuminated, and have tasted the gospel of Christ with true faith; they would have been able to attain the most perfect degree of the same, if they had persevered in the faith. For this taste of faith, the light of glory is not required, but the light of grace suffices. (*)

Instance I. By that opinion, the beatitude of grace and of glory differ only in degree; which is known to be false, because the γνῶσις (knowledge) of this life will be abolished in heaven, 1 Cor. XIII, 8. Now, perfect cognition, differing only in degrees from imperfection, does not abolish it, but perfects it; just as a greater light does not remove a lesser one, but increases it. Resp. The beatitude of grace and of glory differs in degree with respect to certain charismata, or gifts common to this life and the future; but the beatitude of glory also differs from the beatitude of grace in kind, especially with respect to the beatific vision, which is the basis and most excellent good of eternal life. For "now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face," 1 Cor. XIII. But specular, abstractive, and mediate cognition differs from facial, intuitive, and immediate cognition not in degree, but in kind.

Instance II. Besides the common foretaste of eternal life, which belongs to faith tasting the goodness of God in the gospel, there is also a proper and rarer foretaste of future beatitude, which the ancients called a "rare gem" and a "brief delay"; and which is like a divine kiss, imparted in a moment, or a most sweet odor quickly affecting, quickly (*) From the scope of this epistle, and its entire sense, it can be understood without difficulty that by the name μέλλοντος αἰῶνος (the age to come) is indicated the age of the new covenant, which the divine man in c. IX, 26 calls συντέλειαν τῶν αἰώνων (the consummation of the ages), the consummation of the various periods of the Old Testament, just as the masters of the Jews of old were accustomed to make this opposition of ages, one indeed present, before the advent of Christ, the other future, after the expected one should have come, עולם הזה and עולם הבא (this age and the age to come). Therefore, καλὸν Θεοῦ ῥῆμα (the good word of God) is the Gospel, more strictly so called, by which we receive the most desired news that Christ has now come. Δυνάμεις (powers), therefore, are the miracles by which the divine truth and authority of the Gospel were declared and confirmed, as interpreted by Paul himself, in these very letters, c. II, 1, 4, & 5. Add Mark XVI, 20.

departing, and consists in a certain more sublime joy, about which B. Israel Murschellius treats in his aurora sue praegustu vitae aeternae, p. 72. Cf. the Tripolitan Ministry's apologetic writing, part I. p. 333, & D. Baier's Dissertation de praegustu vitae aeternae §. 60. Which rarer foretaste seems to imply an immediate and intuitive cognition of God. Resp. The foretaste of eternal life has certain degrees, according to which it can be distinguished into greater and lesser. And although some men, especially the dying, may have a more abundant sense or taste of certain gifts of eternal life; yet it must not be denied that this occurs through faith, which owes its origin to the gospel, Rom. X, 17. But the taste of faith does not imply an immediate cognition of God.

IV. God operates and concurs immediately with secondary causes in the kingdom of nature; why should He not also operate immediately in pious contemplators, who are in the kingdom of grace? Resp. One immediacy is of the operating subject, another is of the excluded operative medium. Just as God in the kingdom of nature concurs immediately, or proximately, with generating parents, but not with the exclusion of the parents' influx and their fertile seed; so God in the kingdom of grace operates immediately and proximately in pious contemplators, not with the exclusion of the external word, as the ordinary means of grace and salvation.

V. King David, contemplating the divine goodness, says in Psalm LXXXV, 9: "I will hear what God will speak in me." Therefore, a pious man in contemplation hears God speaking immediately in him. Resp. The words of the original text are badly rendered in the Vulgate version, for they should have been translated thus: "I will hear what Jehovah will speak; for he will speak peace to his people, and to his saints." Where it is not a matter of an internal and immediate address of God, but of the external word of promise, by which God through the sermons of the prophets promises peace, that is, all prosperous things, to his people.

VI. Whoever as a bridegroom speaks alone with the bride alone, speaks with her immediately. But God, as a bridegroom, speaks alone with the reborn soul, the spiritual bride, alone. Therefore. The minor is proved from Hosea II, 14: "Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her

(lit. upon her heart)." By which words God indicates that He will lead the pious soul into solitude, so that He may speak alone with her alone, and reveal Himself to her immediately. Resp. The passage deals with the gathering of the church in the New Testament, which, when it errs, God wishes to persuade to return to the way; He wishes to lead it into solitude, i.e., to separate it from the impious lovers of the world; He wishes to speak upon its heart (others render; to its heart), i.e., He wishes to address it kindly and console it through the gospel, which is full of consolation. For to speak to the heart, or upon the heart, signifies to console someone with gentle words, see Gen. XXXIV, 2. Wherefore, neither the major nor the minor premise of the argument stands on a firm footing. For (a) a bridegroom speaking alone with the bride alone does not always speak with her immediately (with the exclusion of an external medium), but sometimes through a letter. Thus God today speaks with the soul through scripture. Paul in Hebr. I, 1 says: "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." From which we argue: What speaking with the soul the Son of God has finished, consummated, and sealed in the last times, that is no longer to be expected. But the immediate speaking, etc. Therefore. (b) God, leading the church into the wilderness, speaks upon her heart, or to her heart, not always alone, but also through His ministers.

VII. Christ spoke immediately with the contemplative Mary of Bethany, Luke X, 39. Therefore, even today Christ speaks immediately with pious contemplators. R. Mary of Bethany was not so much a contemplator as a meditator; for she heard the word of Christ, who, visibly present on this earth, spoke with men personally (αὐτοπροσώπως); but having been raised into heaven until the last day, He speaks with the reborn through the mouth of the prophets and apostles, Luke I, 70; c. X, 16.

VIII. Paul seems to treat of the intuitive knowledge of God in 2 Cor. III, 18, saying: "But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." From which words the Mystics and Quakers conclude: Those who with unveiled face behold the glory of the Lord, know God immediately and intuitively. But the reborn, etc. Therefore.

The major is clear; because to behold the glory of God with unveiled face is the same as to behold the essence of God. Resp. 1) I deny the major. For in the source there is the Greek verb κατοπτρίζεσθαι, which properly signifies to see something in a mirror, and therefore denotes specular, or abstractive knowledge, not facial, or intuitive. 2) The apostle does not say that we behold the unveiled face of God, but that with unveiled face we behold the glory of God as in a mirror. To be sure, he opposes the faithful Christians to the blinded Jews, upon whom a veil of ignorance is placed, so that they do not understand that the end of the law and the fulfillment of the types and prophecies is Christ; but of himself and the faithful men of the New Testament he asserts that with unveiled face they behold the glory of Christ shining in the mirror of the gospel; which knowledge is certainly mediate.

IX. In the sacred writings there are examples of those who saw God immediately. For Paul, rapt into the third heaven, saw the Lord, Acts XXII, 18; 1 Cor. XV, 8. Which vision cannot be mediate; because Paul was rapt into the third heaven, where the angels behold God immediately. So also Stephen, looking up into heaven, saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God, Acts VII, 55. Resp. 1) In general. It has happened to no man in this life to behold God immediately, except to Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου). "No man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father," John VI, 46. Cf. John I, 18; 1 Tim. VI, 16. 2) Specifically. Paul did not see the essence of God in his ecstatic rapture; otherwise he would not have said: "whom no man hath seen, nor can see," 1 Tim. VI, 16 (and the epistle to Timothy was written after the epistle to the Corinthians), but he saw Christ in His glorious body, who revealed Himself to him in an extraordinary way. The same must be said of Stephen, who saw the glory of God, i.e., a certain splendor by which the majesty of God was represented; just as the glory of God is taken in Exod. XXIV, 17; Luke II, 9. He saw Jesus appearing in an immortal body and an august form.

X. The mystics, to prove their dark contemplation, assert that they enter into the darkness with Moses, Exod. XX, 21, when, having expelled positive concepts, they remain in a negative concept, namely, the incomprehensible, inconceivable, and unintelligible. Resp. The mystics are not lightly mistaken. For Mount Sinai was surrounded and covered with smoke, which was the cause of a thick darkness, Exod. XIX, 18. But the mystics, interpreting that darkness allegorically, understand by it the incomprehensibility of God. But it is agreed among all that allegory is not argumentative, nor is a negative concept in itself quieting, since it satisfies neither the aspiration of the intellect nor the desire of the will. For a pure negation is a non-being, but a mixed negation is founded upon an affirmation, and presupposes it, as Victor Gelenius says, P. I. dec. 8. art. 6. p. 8. The intellect therefore rests not in negation, but in affirmation. The will, however, is carried toward the good, which is positive. So let the mystics fare well with their dark contemplation! The true disciples of Christ, by meditating on the revealed word of God, seek and find the knowledge of salvation.

Question XII. What does the revealed knowledge of God comprise?

Existence of God. The revealed knowledge of God comprises, 1. the existence of God, 2. the essence and attributes of God, 3. the divine persons, 4. the divine actions and works.

Question XIII. Is the existence of God to be supposed here, as known from the light of nature?

Since the knowledge of God drawn from the fount of reason is confused, weak, and languid; for the generation of indubitable faith (a), and the solid confutation of atheists (b), the existence of God must be more fully and clearly demonstrated here from supernatural revelation, contained in the sacred writings (c).

Prob. a. The chief article of faith is that God exists; inasmuch as all others rest upon it, as upon a foundation. "For he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him," as the apostle teaches, Hebr. XI, 6. But indubitable faith is generated from the seed of the divine word, John XVII, 20.

Prob. b. Although atheists can be confuted from the principles of nature and reason; yet, that they may believe by faith that God exists, the word of God reduced to letters fully deserves to be called in for support. For faith is not kindled, except from the light of the divinely revealed word, Rom. X, 14.

Prob. c. From the fount of Holy Scripture, through which a solid demonstration is drawn, by which the existence of God is evinced. For 1) in general, all and every letter of the written divine word speaks of God's existence; since the whole scripture is θεόπνευστος (God-breathed), consigned by the inspiration of God, 2 Tim. III, 16. But what scripture is divinely inspired, argues God as its author. 2) In particular, the existence of God is gathered a) from the names which are attributed to God in the authentic writings of the prophets and apostles; b) from the divine attributes, which, since they belong to God alone in Himself, cannot exist, unless God Himself exists; c) from the works of God, which are creation, the preservation of the whole world, especially the governance of the church described in the sacred writings, stupendous miracles, benefits conferred upon the pious, punishments inflicted upon the impious, prophecies proven by events. All of which, since they testify quite clearly of the existence of God, are to be most deeply fixed in our minds, and are to be opposed to our doubts about God no less than to the impiety of atheists who deny God; since it happens that even to the pious, tossed by the heat of temptations, a doubt arises whether God exists.

Question XIV. By what names is God designated by the prophets in the Old Testament?

Divine Hebrew Names. The names by which God is designated by the prophets in the Old Testament, some express the very essence of God, like יה (Yah), יהוה (Yahweh), אהיה (Ehyeh); some denominate God from power, אל (El), שדי (Shaddai); some from dominion, אדון (Adon) and אדני (Adonai); some from religious worship, אלוה (Eloah) and אלהים (Elohim).

Prob. a. The sacrosanct name יהוה descends immediately from היה (he was/existed). It is expressed in Greek by St. John as ὁ ὢν, καὶ ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος (who is, and who was, and who is to come), Apoc. I, 8. It is rendered by Junius as autoon (self-being), by Scaliger as autautos (self-same), by the blessed Walthero as antautotatos (most-self-same), in Latin as essentiator (essentiator), or as D. Varenius renders it, essentians (the essencing one). Vid. Decad. V. in Exod. p. 99. By this name is noted 1) the independence of the divine essence, because God is from Himself and not from another; 2) the immutability and eternity of the divine essence: What is mutable does not necessarily exist; but God is an eternal and necessary being, who cannot not be; 3) the eminence of the divine essence. Creatures, in the judgment of Plato, have more of non-being than of being. For example, a man has one being, namely human; he lacks infinite other beings, like the being of an angel, a stone, a star, etc. But God, just as He is the fount and origin of all essence, so He contains all beings in Himself either eminently, or virtually and effectively. Whence by Damascene, book I of orthodox faith, ch. 11, he is called πέλαιος τῆς οὐσίας ἀπειρον καὶ ὁρίστον (an infinite and indeterminate sea of essence). 4) The constancy of the divine promises. To this can be referred the passage in Exod. VI, 3, where God says: "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty (באל שדי), but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them." These words cannot be understood absolutely; for Abraham invoked the name of Jehovah; Gen. XIII, 4. But they are to be understood respectively, namely, with respect to the fulfillment, by which the promise receives its existence. To Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, God declared His power, that He could stand by His promises (for He had promised them the hereditary possession of the land of Canaan and full dominion); but they had not yet experienced the fulfillment of the promise, by which God gives being to His words. To indicate this, God says that He had not yet been known to them by the name Jehovah.

This name, the tetragrammaton, consisting of four letters, is the proper name of God grammatically and logically. Grammatically, because all the requisites of a proper name suit it exactly. For a) from the beginning it has an initial yod, the preformative letter of a proper name. b) It lacks a plural number. c) It never takes an emphatic article at the beginning. d) It receives no suffix. e) It is never placed in the construct state. An obstacle to this last criterion of a proper name seems to be Ps. XXIV, 10, יהוה צבאות (Jehovah of hosts), where the name יהוה governs the name after it, and thus is placed in the construct state. Resp. Before this name Zebaoth, אלהי (God) is to be supplied from other places; thus this complete expression is found in Ps. LXXXIX, 9; Jer. XV, 16; Hos. XII, 6; Amos III, 13. Wherefore, in this elliptical formula of speech, it is not the name יהוה that is placed in the construct state, but that word which is understood between the name Jehovah and Zebaoth. (*) Logically, the name יהוה is proper, because when placed in the nominative case alone, outside of composition and without a restricting addition, it belongs to no one except the one eternal God, and is therefore incommunicable to creatures. This is evident a) from its etymology. For it descends from היה (to be) to represent the independent, immutable, and eternal essence of God. b) Because from the participation of this name all creatures, all idols are excluded. Is. XLII, 8: "I am Jehovah; that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another." Ps. LXXXIII, 19: "That men may know that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art the most high over all the earth."

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who contend that the name יהוה is also attributed to creatures in the sacred writings. To strengthen their opinion, they argue:

1. Whatever name is attributed to idols, that is not the proper name of God. But the name יהוה etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from Exod. XXXII, 5: "To morrow is a feast to Jehovah," i.e., of the golden calf. Resp. I distinguish between the general concept of God, who is called Jehovah, and the special application of that concept. Aaron had a true concept of Jehovah, but he applied it badly. Aaron's sense was that through that idol, divine worship could ultimately be referred to the supreme deity.

2. The name יהוה is attributed to angels, Gen. XVI, 8, 9; Exod. III, 2; Mal. III, 1. Resp. The cited passages, and other similar ones, are to be understood not of created angels, but of the uncreated angel, the Son of God. This is evident from the predicates that are affirmed of that angel in the text. By the angel who appeared to Hagar in Gen. XVI, a created angel cannot be understood, because in v. 10 he addresses Hagar thus: "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude." Surely this multiplication of seed and posterity presupposes omnipotence, and can in no way be attributed to a created angel. Nor was the angel who appeared to Moses in the burning bush a created angel, because he expressly calls himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, v. 6. Which denomination belongs to God alone. Moreover, by the angel of the covenant in Mal. III, 1, no one can be understood but Christ; for He was to confirm the new covenant with his blood.

You say: "The name Jehovah can be attributed to a created angel, insofar as he performs the office of a legate. For it is permissible for a legate to assume the name of the one who sent him." Resp. John the Baptist was a legate of Christ, and yet he denied that he was the Christ. The legate of Caesar does not dare to say: "I, Leopold, emperor of the Romans."

3. The name is attributed to men, Deuter. XIX, 17: "They shall stand before Jehovah, before the priests and the judges." Resp. By Jehovah, the priests and judges are not understood, but these are subordinated as instrumental causes to God, as the principal cause. Cf. 2 Chron. XIX, 6.

4. Certain inanimate creatures are honored with the name Jehovah: 1) The altar erected by Moses, Exod. XVII, 15. 2) The ark of the covenant, Num. X, 35. 3) Mount Moriah, Gen. XXII, 14. 4) Jerusalem, Ezech. XLVIII, 35. Resp. a) In general. The consequence from compound to simple things is not valid. For a word that has entered into a composition signifies one thing, and another when placed outside of composition. Thus Constantine is one thing, Constantinople another; God is one thing, Theophilus another. The name יהוה, placed alone, without an addition, or outside of composition, always denotes the divine essence. In the cited places, the tetragrammaton is placed with an added noun, verb, or adverb. Resp. b) In particular, regarding 1) The name יהוה joined with the name נָסִי (Nissi) in Ex. XVII, 15 denotes the protection of God, of which the erected altar was a perpetual memorial. To 2) There is no force in the consequence: "When the ark set forward, Moses said: Rise up, Jehovah: Therefore, he called the ark Jehovah." When an army sets forward, the emperor can say: "Rise up, Jehovah, and scatter our enemies." Who, unless insane, would conclude? "The emperor called the army Jehovah." To 3) Mount Moriah is not absolutely called Jehovah, but "The Lord will provide." Mount Moriah was to be a memorial sign of divine providence, not Jehovah himself. To 4) There is no sequence. "The Lord is there. Therefore, the city of Jerusalem is called the Lord or Jehovah." Just as if you were to conclude:

(*) That this is so is also demonstrated grammatically by the fact that the construct state requires the change of the letter ה to ת, and therefore it would have been necessary to write יהות, not יהוה, if it were indeed to be considered placed in that state.

"Lycurgus is in Sparta. Therefore, Sparta is Lycurgus."

Instance. Jerusalem is called: יהוה צדקנו (the Lord our righteousness), Jerem. XXXIII, 16. Resp. The words of the text are: "In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely; and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, The LORD our righteousness." It is clear from the text that they will call not that Jerusalem, but him, namely, for Jerusalem. The sense is: This is the name of the branch of David, which Jerusalem will call, i.e., name, announce, preach: "Jehovah our righteousness." This is a title of the Messiah, not of Jerusalem. Cf. Jer. XXIII, 6. 5. If the name Jehovah is incommunicable, it cannot be communicated to the Son of God and the Holy Spirit. But it is communicated, etc. Therefore. Resp. The name Jehovah is said to be incommunicable to creatures existing outside of God, not to the divine persons.

Instance. Therefore, the name Jehovah cannot be attributed to the human nature of Christ. Resp. The human nature of Christ does not exist outside of God, but has been exalted to the throne of the deity.

Prob. b. The divine name יה (Yah) agrees with the name יהוה and is significant of the independent and immutable divine essence. It is rendered by the LXX as κύριος (Lord), by Theodotion as τὸ ὄν (the being), or "ens." It occurs chiefly in hymns, and is used as a proper name of God, Ps. LXVIII, 5: "Sing unto God, sing praises to his name; extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH." To some, this name seems to be a contraction of the name Jehovah, by the syncope of the two middle letters; to others, it is held to be shortened by retaining the two anterior letters, since the first He in the tetragrammaton is mappiqated or mobile, not the latter. But the opinion of those who consider it to be primitive is to be preferred here, because it is joined with the name Jehovah in Is. XII, 2; c. XXVI, 4.

Prob. c. The name אהיה (Ehyeh) is a peculiar divine name, not so much different from Jehovah in sense as in form and mode of signifying. God Himself designated Himself by this name in Exod. III, 14, when He wanted to send Moses into Egypt, He commanded that he should say to the Israelites: "Eieh (I AM) hath sent me unto you." This word is otherwise the first person future of היה (he was). But that future has migrated into a noun; for it is constructed as a noun in the nominative case, preceding the verb and constituting the subject of the sentence. It is rendered in Greek by the LXX interpreters as ὁ ὢν (the being), by Jerome in Latin as Eriturus (He who will be). It can be conceived as the most essential and most proper name of God, not only of Him who is denominated by others (which יהוה seems particularly to import), but also of Him who denominates Himself, under the radical notion of the highest and, in the completion of a most special act, operating being, according to the opinion of D. Varenius, Decad. Exod. V, p. 98, and D. Pfeiffer in dub. vexat p. 245. It designates the independent immutability of the divine essence, its indivisible eternity, the firmness of the covenant and grace, and the most certain truth of the divine promises.

Prob. d. The name אל (El) denotes the divine essence with the connotation of infinite power. For אל is from איל, which signifies strength or fortitude. It is used of the true and living God, when it occurs in the singular, and is taken absolutely without a diminishing or alienating condition, and indeed substantively and concretely. "Who is God (El) save Jehovah?" 2 Sam. XXII, 32. The Socinians think it is a common name, and they object: 1) Daniel, XI, 36: God is אלילים (God of gods). Resp. אלילים is plural, which is used of strong men and the gods of the gentiles; but אל placed in the singular denotes the supreme Deity. 2) אל placed in the singular in Ezekiel. XXXI, 11 does not denote the supreme Deity. Resp. In the cited place it is placed with an addition and is taken adjectivally for "the mightiest among the heathen."

Prob. e. The name שדי (Shaddai) likewise denotes the divine essence with the connotation of infinite power. For, in the opinion of the most learned philologists, it is derived from the root שדד, "he laid waste," and "he permeated or penetrated in the manner of a thunderbolt." It is attributed to God in Jerem. XXV, 38; c. XLVII, 4, so that by this name is expressed the divine omnipotence, by which He permeates all things, and alone at His pleasure can destroy and reduce to nothing all that He has made. In which sense it is rendered by the LXX interpreters in Job V, 17 as παντοκράτωρ (almighty), in c. VIII, 3 as ὁ ποιήσας τὰ πάντα (he who made all things); by Aquila as ἄλκιμος (mighty), by Aben Ezra as שדד (destroyer), by Schmidt as "fulminator" (he who strikes with lightning); by the blessed Luther and the Jews in the German translation it is rendered allmächtig (almighty). Nor is this origin destitute of reasons. For α) The Dagesh in the middle letter not obscurely indicates that this word derives its origin from a geminate Ayin verb. β) In the cognate Arabic language, شَدِيد (shadid) is "strong." γ) To express the power of God, לֵא is added exegetically. δ) The prophets seem to refer to this origin of the word in Is. XIII, 6, 7; Joel I, 15. There are, however, those who derive this divine name from דָּשׁ, "breast," adding a pious reason for the etymology, that just as a mother her infant, God graciously nourishes and sustains us. There are others who wish this divine name to be derived from the relative pronoun וְ and דִּי, which word denotes sufficiency, because God is self-sufficient, and in need of nothing. Hence in Greek he is called αὐταρκής (self-sufficient), or in the Platonic phrase ἀνευδής (without need). We acquiesce in the first derivation given. Cf. D. Pfeiffer, diff. Philolog. VIII, "de nominibus diuinis."

Prob. f. אָדוֹן (Adon) denotes the divine essence with the connotation of sustenance and divine dominion. For it is derived from אָדָן, a foundation, and therefore by the force of the word it denotes a sustainer, preserver, and lord of all things. It is used of the independent and eternal God, when 1) it is placed absolutely, and is not limited by any restriction. 2) When it is uttered with a demonstrative. 3) When it is placed with an addition that dilates, amplifies, and extends it to a universal subject. 4) When it occurs doubled, as Adon Adonim (Lord of lords) in Deuter. X, 17. 5) When it is found in the same case joined with Jehovah, Elohim, or another divine name. 6) When such attributes are connected to it that can belong to no one but Jehovah. Cf. D. Dorsche, pentadec. differt. theolog. disp. XII. §. 34.

Prob. g. The name אֲדֹנָי (Adonai), since it is of the same origin, retains the signification, and denotes the sustainer and ruler of this universe. This name with a Qametz at the end, and that native, not arising from a pause, is proper to God. For it is never placed in the construct state, nowhere has a prefixed emphatic article, admits no suffixes, and is always uttered in the same way with a singular verb or adjective; which are the criteria of a proper name. There are those who wish its form to be plural with a first-person suffix; others prefer it to be simply plural in the form of גִּבּוֹרִי (locust), שָׂרִי (princes), חַלּוּנִי (window), Jer. XXII, 14.

Wherefore, since this divine name is of the plural number, an argument for the plurality of divine persons can be derived from it. Cf. D. Calov. in system. theol. tom II. p. 125.

Prob. h. The divine name אֱלֹהִים (Eloah) some derive from the Hebrew root אָלַה, "he swore," "he cursed"; either because one must swear by the name of God alone, or because God alone can effectively bless and curse. But the mappiqated He seems to stand against this origin; for the same reason we do not accept the derivation from אָלַה; since an unmappiqated He can never be servile or Heemantic. The princes of philology, Erpenius, Amama, Ludovicus de Dieu, Glassius, Pfeifferus, establish its root today as unused among the Hebrews, but most used among the Arabs, for whom اَلٰه (alaha) is "to serve," "to worship," and, according to the object, "to adore." Therefore, this most august name designates God who is to be religiously worshiped and adored, or as D. Varenius explains more fully, it denotes the supreme God of infinite majesty, to be feared and venerated by angels, men, and all creatures whatsoever. See Dec. I. in Gen. p. 10. When placed absolutely, it is vindicated for the true God alone, never for creatures or for idols, unless an express limitation is made, as in Dan. XI, 39, where mention is made of אֱלֹהֵי נֹכַר, "a strange God." Otherwise, it remains a name proper to the independent and eternal God. "Who is God (Eloah) besides Jehovah?" Ps. XVIII, 32, where the affirmative question implies a negative categorical statement.

Prob. i. The personal name אֱלֹהִים (Elohim), plural of the singular אֱלֹהִים (Eloah), is likewise significant of the divine majesty to be religiously venerated, implying a plurality of persons. This is the first name of God in the sacred writings, and is read in the very beginning of scripture, Gen. I, 1, to which finally in c. II, 4, the name Jehovah is joined. Indeed, the Jewish authors are commonly of the opinion that the word Elohim denotes "judge," and many of the Christians, ancient and more recent, follow them; with no foundation at all, to be sure; except that the Jews seek a refuge, lest they be forced to concede the mystery of several persons in God. For they can validly prove, neither from the origin of the word, nor from the usage of the language, that the word Elohim in its proper sense designates "judge." For no place in scripture can ever be shown in which it treats of a created judge or judges by design, and the name Eloah or Elohim is attributed to them simply. The consequence is inept: "Elohim is transferred to judges by a trope. Therefore, it properly signifies judge." For the name of Achilles is also tropically attributed to a brave man, and yet it does not follow: "Therefore, by itself it denotes a brave man." Cf. D. Schmid, colleg. bibl. prior, p. 115. We, relying on the origin of the word, which we gave above, and on the usage of the language, state that אֱלֹהִים, when placed properly, perpetually, without an alienating or diminishing condition, designates God to be religiously worshiped and adored, under a notion of a plurality of persons. This Moses implies, Deut. IV, 35: "That thou mightest know that Jehovah he is Elohim; there is none else beside him." As if to say, Jehovah alone is the God to be religiously venerated. Metaphorically and κατ' ἀναλογίαν (by analogy), on account of a certain similarity of honor with God, angels, Ps. VIII, 6, collated with Hebr. 1, 6, and also magistrates, Ps. LXXXII, 6, are called Elohim. Μιμητικῶς (by imitation) and κατὰ δόξαν (according to opinion), the false gods or godlings of the ethnics, because the gentiles worshiped them in the place of the true God, are expressed by the name Elohim, Exod. XXIII, 24; c. XXXII, 4.

Meanwhile, it remains fixed and settled that the divine name אֱלֹהִים is plural not only in formation and termination, but also in sense and signification, and thus implies a plurality of persons (indefinitely as such, not precisely a trinity), or at least imports a certain respect to the same. We give credence to this assertion because 1) the word Elohim has its regular singular number of the same signification and frequent use. But every word of the plural number, whose singular of the same thing is in use, signifies a certain plurality outside of enallage. 2) Because the name Elohim is constructed with both a plural noun and a plural verb. See Gen. XX, 13; chap. XXV, 7; Josh. XXIV, 19; 2 Sam. VII, 23; Ps. LVIII, 12. 3) Because several Elohim are introduced consulting or conferring, Gen. 1, 26: "Let us make man in our image." In which manner no one in the Hebrew language speaks of himself as one person.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that a plurality of divine persons is implied by the word Elohim, to whom some of the pontificals join, whose arguments are:

I. The name Elohim is constructed with a verb of the singular number in the very frontispiece of scripture: בָּרָא אֱלֹהִים (Elohim created). Therefore it does not imply a plurality of persons. Resp. 1) It is also constructed with a plural verb to express plurality. 2) There is no Jew who does not marvel at the unusual construction of this name, as Hornbeck testifies, Disp. V. antiqu. Judaic. "If this speech had not been written, it would not have been permissible to say: Bara Elohim," says R. Hunna, cited by Gerhard, in exeges. loci III. §. 145. 3) The name Elohim is constructed with a singular verb to signify the unity of the divine essence and the plurality of the persons; otherwise, no reason can be given why Moses used the plural name Elohim in the work of creation, since it is not destitute of a singular number. It can be most conveniently explained: "Each one of the persons created in the one deity common to the three persons." Compare Varen. decad. I. in Gen. p. 15.

You say: I. The name Elohim is a name of dominion, and therefore to amplify the honor of God it is used in the plural number, but with a singular sense. Resp. The name Eloah is not a name of dominion, but of glory, expressing in itself the highest honor of adoration. Therefore, to use its plural number to amplify the honor of God is of no avail.

You say: II. God speaks of Himself in the manner of magnates in the plural number, Gen. I, 26. Resp. 1) The style of magnates speaking of themselves in the plural with singular authority is alien to the most simple Hebrew style. There exist in the sacred writings rescripts and mandates of kings speaking of themselves in the singular number. See Ezra VII, 13; Dan. IV, 3; c. VI, 20. 2) Magnates speak of themselves in the plural number to signify that they decree something with the votes or aids of counselors and nobles. But God has no counselor, Is. XL, 13. 3) Princes who speak of themselves in the plural never express their proper or appellative name in the plural. For they do not say: "We, the Leopold emperors of the Romans, command," but "We, Leopold, emperor." But God also expresses His name in the plural, where it is said: Jehovah Elohim. 4) If it had pleased God to speak of Himself in the plural to declare His majesty, He would have spoken in the plural either always, or for the most part, or certainly in the promulgation of the Sinaitic law. But the contrary is evident from Exod. XX, 2. Indeed, God rather considers the unity of His essence a matter of highest praise for Himself, Is. XLIV, 6, and elsewhere commonly.

You say: III. The words in Gen. 1, ברא אלהים (Elohim created), are to be explained from the idiom of the Hebrew language, and indeed from the analogy of Adon, Baal, etc., through an enallage of number, where the plural is used for the singular. That senior servant in Gen. XXIV, 9 calls Abraham his masters (אדניי); Potiphar is called the lords of Joseph in Gen. XXXIX, 20; Joseph is called the lords of the land in Gen. XLII, 30; Shemer is called the lords of mount Samaria in 1 Kings XVI, 24. Resp. 1) From the name אדון, which signifies dominion, to the name אלוה, which designates religious worship, an invalid argument is sought. 2) The Jews themselves do not deny that a certain respect of plurality is inferred in the cited places, the foundation of which they place in a plurality of virtues and honors. (3) Although in the cited places one is expressly named who is first respected, yet several are understood. In Gen. XXIV, 9, Isaac, the son of Abraham, is connoted. In Gen. XXXIX, 20, not only Potiphar is understood, but at the same time also Pharaoh, whose Eunuch Potiphar was. In Gen. XLII, 30, the officials of Joseph are connoted, or even Pharaoh himself: "The man, who is the lords of the land, spake," i.e., each one of the lords of the land. In 1 Kings XVI, 24, mount Samaria had not one, but many lords in order, and perhaps those very ones who made up Shemer's family, whence the mountain's name; and therefore not without relation either to predecessors, or to kinsmen, and by equal right of birth, are they called the lords of mount Samaria.

II. The name Elohim is said of one God, Deut. VI, 4. Therefore it implies no plurality. Resp. The name Elohim is said of God, who is one, but not inasmuch as He is one, but inasmuch as He consists of several persons. In the cited place, יהוה אחד (Jehovah is one) denotes the unity of the divine essence, אלהינו (our Elohim) denotes the plurality of the divine persons.

III. If there are several Elohim, there are several gods. But there are not several gods. Therefore. The consequence is clear, because Elohim is rendered in Latin as Deus. Resp. The Latin name, Deus, is an essential divine name; but the Hebrew, Elohim, is a personal divine name. It is improper to conclude from a personal name to an essential one. There is no Latin name that corresponds exactly to the Hebrew Elohim.

IV. Moses is called Aaron's Elohim in Exod. IV, 16. Resp. Moses is not called absolutely and in the nominative case Aaron's Elohim, but לאלהים (as God), "in the place of God," "for God," because he interpreted the will of the true and triune God to Aaron.

V. The name Elohim does not always imply plurality because it is used (1) of one idol, Jud. XVI, 23; Exod. XXXII, 4; (2) of one angel, Jud. XIII, 22; (3) of the person of God the Father alone, Ps. XLV, 8. Resp. To (1): An idol is not called Elohim, except in a confused relation of the idolatrous concept to that which in reality is plural. For idolaters worship their idol as if it were the true God, who is one in essence, three in persons. For example, Dagon was to the Philistines κατὰ δόξαν (by opinion) and μιμητικῶς (by imitation) the same as the triune God was to the Israelites. Which is also the reason why the Israelites spoke of the calf in the plural number: "These are thy Elohim!" Exod. XXXII, 4, because they represented in it the same Elohim who had delivered the Israelites from Egypt. To (2): The angel whom Manoah saw was not a created angel, but uncreated, namely the Son of God, because he is called Jehovah, who received the burnt offering, v. 23. To (3): When the word Elohim is used of one divine person, it is signified that that one person is from the number of several, or that that divine person is not God solitarily, but one with the other two persons, to whom He has a perpetual respect. Cf. D. Gerhard, exeg. loc. III, p. 365.

VI. If Elohim by force of its number insinuates plurality into minds, the Holy Spirit is the spirit of Himself. But the Holy Spirit is not the spirit of Himself. Therefore Elohim by force of its number does not insinuate plurality into minds. The consequence of the major is proved; because that plurality is a trinity, which the Holy Spirit constitutes together with God the Father and the Son. Resp. From the word Elohim we prove a plurality of persons indefinitely, not precisely or determinately a trinity. It suffices that the plural name Elohim signifies several, and that formally; but that that plurality is a trinity, that it is of persons in one essence by number, this is added materially to the signification of the name Elohim. Nor is it necessary that a word signifying several should always be taken for several conjointly; especially where one of those several persons is distinguished from the rest. Wherefore we most firmly assert that the Holy Spirit is the spirit not of Himself, but of the Father and the Son.

Question XV. By what names is He designated by the apostles in the New Testament?

Divine Greek Names. The Greek names by which God is designated by the apostles in the N. T. are Θεός (a), Κύριος (b), Δεσπότης (c).

Obs. I. Some wish the name θεός (theos) to be derived from θέω (theo), "I run," because he permeates or penetrates all things; others from αἶθω (aitho), "I burn," because he is like a consuming fire (of vices), Deut. IV, 24; others from θεάομαι (theaomai), "I contemplate," because God sees and contemplates all things; others from τιθημι (titheimi), "I place," because God placed, made, prepared, founded all things; others from τὸ δέος (to deos), "from fear," because God is to be feared above all things; others from the Hebrew דַּי (dai), "sufficiency," because God is αὐταρκέστατος (most self-sufficient), in need of nothing, but most perfectly sufficient for Himself; which allusive derivations we indeed admit, but we consider the word itself to be rather primitive, not unlike the Latin word, Deus. Allusions can be given more easily than the true reasons of denomination.

Obs. II. The name Deus is used in three ways, as Basil the Great teaches in epistle 141 to Caesarius: (1) Κατ' οὐσίαν (according to essence) the supreme and eternal God is so called. (2) Κατὰ χάριν (according to grace) they are called gods to whom some divine office has been committed, like magistrates, Ps. LXXXII, 1, 6. (3) Κατὰ ψεῦδος (according to falsehood), those who pass themselves off or wish to be passed off as God, like idols and the God of this world, 2 Cor. IV, 4. To wit, the word Deus κυρίως (properly) and properly denotes the independent God, who is from Himself, and from whom are all other things; μεταφορικῶς (metaphorically) and on account of a certain similarity with God by nature as such, it is said of gods by dignity and office as such. Μιμητικῶς (by imitation) and by catachresis, on account of the vain and erroneous opinion of men, idols and the devil have obtained the appellation of God.

Prob. a. That the name θεός, whether placed absolutely, or distinguished by divine attributes and operations, is significant of the independent divine essence, is evident (1) from the common concept of all nations; for upon hearing the word, God, they forthwith conceive of a first being, which is from itself, and the cause of all other things. (2) Θεότης (Godhead), Col. II, 9, and θειότης (divinity), Rom. 1, 20, primarily designate the divine nature and essence. Therefore, θεός primarily denotes him who has an independent divine nature. (3) Holy Scripture distinguishes between θεὸν φύσει (God by nature), and θεοὺς λεγομένους (gods by name), not in reality or nature, as such, 1 Cor. VIII, 5; Gal. IV, 8. Therefore, the name θεός primarily denotes God by nature as such.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who, in order to elude the arguments sought from the divine names by which Christ is designated in the sacred writings, state that the name θεός is significant of power or dignity rather than of the divine essence, and to fortify their assertion they argue:

1. Moses is called God to Aaron on account of the power granted to him, Exod. IV, 16. Therefore, the name God is not a name of essence, but of power. Resp. God addresses Moses thus: "Thou shalt be to him (Aaron) instead of God." Just as a pro-king is never simply called a king: so he who is in the place of God is not absolutely called God. We assert that the word, God, placed absolutely and without a diminishing condition, designates the supreme and independent God.

2. Angels in Ps. VIII, 6, and also judges or magistrates in Ps. LXXXII, v. 1, 6, bear the name of God, who are not gods by nature. Therefore, God is not always a name of nature, but also of power. Resp. (1) Angels and magistrates are indeed called Elohim in the plural number; since there are many θεοὶ λεγόμενοι (so-called gods); but no judge or magistrate, no created angel is absolutely called Eloah, or God, in the singular number. (2) Magistrates and angels are called gods metaphorically; properly He is called God who has an independent essence.

3. A magistrate obtains the name of God either truly or falsely. Not falsely, because thus idols, Acts VII, 43, the Devil, 2 Cor. IV, 4, the belly, Phil. III, 19, have obtained the name of God from the false opinion of men. Therefore, a magistrate is truly honored with the name of God on account of a similarity with God that is not fictitious, but true. I respond with the words of Gerhard in his exegesis of locus III, fol. 228: "Distinguish between these phrases, 'to be true God,' and 'to be truly called God.' To be true God belongs only to the one and eternal God, who is such by nature and essence; because each thing is called true from its own nature and essence. Thus true gold, a true man is so called from the true essence of gold and of man." Cyril, book XII of his Thesaurus, chap. 13: "If Christ is true God, He is this substantially, not by participation, like a creature." But "He who is true God is God by nature. But to be truly called God belongs also to men, who on account of a similarity and a certain participation of divinity are improperly called by that name," for there it is only a matter of the truth of words taken metaphorically. Thus the apostles are truly called the light of the world, the salt of the earth; because although they are improperly and metaphorically called light, yet, because they truly provide spiritually what light, salt, etc., do corporally, they are therefore truly so called. In like manner, magistrates, judges, etc., are called gods, and are truly so called, because they are so called on account of the participation of a divine office; meanwhile they are not that true God, who is such by nature and essence.

4. God is called El Elohim in Ps. L, 1, Elohei Elohim in Deut. X, 17, because the word God also signifies him who has sublime power from the one God. Resp. (1) The Greek word, θεός, and the Hebrew names אֱלֹהִים and אֵל, are not in every respect synonymous and equivalent. For El denotes a strong God, Elohim a God to be worshiped under a notion of plurality of persons. The Greek θεός simply designates him who has a divine nature. Therefore, it is invalid to conclude from the Hebrew divine names, El and Elohim, to the Greek θεός. (2) The eternal and independent God is called the God of gods, both metaphorically and catachrestically so-called, not only on account of greater power, but also on account of independence and eternity; because God is prior to all so-called gods (such as magistrates are) and putative gods (such as the idols of the gentiles are), and also on account of greater wisdom, goodness, truth, etc.

Instance I. It cannot be denied that magistrates are metaphorically called Gods on account of their dignity and power. Therefore, God is also properly so called on account of dignity and power; otherwise there would be no foundation for the metaphor. Resp. It is wrong to conclude from a metaphorical signification to a proper one. For a metaphor arises from a similarity that is not absolute, but respective. Wherefore, although magistrates are metaphorically called gods, with respect to the power communicated by God, yet the true and supreme God is properly and primarily called God on account of the divine nature and essence, of which the divine power is a consequent in our way of conceiving.

Prob. b. The divine name κύριος (Lord) is derived from τὸ κύρος (to kyros), which word designates authority, right, or dominion. It is used in the N. T. for the true God, in place of the divine names of the Old Testament, Jehovah, El, Adonai. Thus the Savior repeats from Deut. VI, 4 that memorable saying: "Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God, κύριος εἷς ἐστὶ (the Lord is one)," Mark XII, 29. It is therefore to be carefully observed that the name κύριος placed absolutely in the N.T. without restricting conditions imports the most eminent and most absolute dominion, befitting God alone.

Prob. c. The name δεσπότης (Despotes) properly signifies a master, (*) and is used in the N. T. for God in Luke II, 29; Acts IV, 24; 2 Tim. II, 21; 2 Pet. II, 1; Jude v. 4. The reason for the denomination is that God most powerfully and wisely presides over the world which He created, and governs it, furnished with the highest authority, as if it were a most spacious house.

Question XVI. What is God?

Description of God. God is an independent Spirit. He is more fully defined: God is an independent spiritual essence of three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Obs. 1. The given description of God is not a logically perfect definition. For (1) a logical definition, strictly speaking, consists of a genus and a difference. But in God nothing is found that has the character of a genus and a difference. For a genus has the manner of a passive potentiality, which can be perfected. But nothing perfectible falls into the most perfect God. A difference includes neither the species which it constitutes, nor the genus of that species; as can be

(*) And indeed, him who is supreme, who depends on the power and will of no one, but by His own judgment moderates and governs all things. But since there are many Rulers who possess singular power, yet in such a way that all supreme Rulers must obey the command of the one God; for this reason God is called δεσπότης, with this addition, μόνος (only), in Jude v. 4, just as for the same reason he is called the εἷς νομοθέτης (one lawgiver), James IV, 12.

illustrated by the example of rationality; for it is neither man nor animal. But there is nothing in God that is not God Himself. (2) A logically perfect definition is of those things that are in the predicaments. But God is in no predicament. For He is not a genus, since He is not predicated of many species of Gods; Nor is He a species; because a species is multipliable through several individuals, but it is repugnant for there to be several Gods; Nor is He an individual, because this is immediately subject to a most special species. But Spirit is immediately predicated of God, which is not a most special species; since it has some species under it, namely, a finite Spirit. It is therefore clear that God is directly in no predicament.

Obs. 2. God can be defined by an imperfect description, which consists of a common and a proper concept, and is reciprocal with its definitum. For God agrees with creatures in this, that He is an immaterial essence subsisting by itself, which we call a Spirit. He differs from creatures; because He did not receive His being from another, as creatures did, but has it from Himself, and is therefore independent.

Obs. 3. In natural theology, God is defined as an independent Spirit, or as subsisting by Himself. That God is a Spirit becomes known to some extent from the light of nature. For (1) The first Being, existing from itself, which is the cause of all other things, cannot be a body, consisting of matter and form. For in order that matter and form be united and composed into one body, an efficient cause composing the matter and form is prerequisite. But God has no prior efficient cause. (2) Matter has the mode of a perfectible passive potency; form has the mode of a perfecting act. But into God, who is the purest act and perfection itself, no perfectible passive potency falls. (3) If God were corporeal, He would not be infinite. For a body cannot be infinite. (4) Since God is both invisible and most wise, the preserver and governor of all things, reason concludes that God is a Spirit. That God is independent is also in some way established by the guidance of the light of nature. For, observing the admirable structure of this universe, we easily conclude that the world is not from itself, but from some first cause, since in efficient causes there is no progress into infinity. But that first cause, depending on no prior cause, is God.

Obs. 4. Revealed theology, from divine revelation contained in the sacred writings, proves far more solidly that God is an independent Spirit; but it adds the mention of the three persons of the divinity; without which the definition of the true God is not complete; because he is not the true God who is not one in essence and three in persons. D. Calov says gravely in tom. II of his Systema theologicum, p. 182: "Those who do not add the mention of the three persons in the description of God, by no means present a genuine or complete one; since without them it is not yet established who the true God is. The ethnics and pagans do not have the true God, not acknowledging God as three in persons; nor the Mohammedans, who deny the mystery of the Holy Trinity; nor modern Jews, nor Samosatenians, Arians, Photinians, and other Anti-Trinitarians, who deny three persons in the divine essence."

Obs. 5. That God is an essence, we have the clearest testimony in Exod. III, 14, where, when Moses asked about the name of God, He Himself responded with these words: "I AM THAT I AM." Similarly, in Apoc. I, 8, God is called ὁ ὢν (He who is), who was, and who is to be. Since, therefore, God gives Himself a name from being, it is validly inferred that the essence of God is most perfect, most simple, and most pure; on account of which purity and simplicity of essence, God is His own deity and essence.

Question XVII. Is God a Spirit devoid of all corporeal mass?

God is a most pure and most simple Spirit, devoid of all matter, of all corporeal mass.

Prob. 1. Because it is the most explicit sentence of sacred scripture: "God (is) a Spirit. Therefore, they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth," John IV, 24. Obs. In that proposition: πνεῦμα ὁ θεός (God is a Spirit), God is the subject, and Spirit is the predicate; Because (1) The article is usually prefixed not to the predicate, but to the subject, and thus is placed at the beginning of the proposition. (2) Because πνεῦμα (spirit) is broader than θεός (God). For everything that is God is indeed Spirit, but not every Spirit is God; since angels and the human soul are Spirits, and yet not God. But that which is broader sustains the character of a predicate; that which is narrower, the character of a subject. From which it follows that God is devoid of corporeal mass. For "a spirit hath not flesh and bones," Luke XXIV, 39.

2. Because God is invisible, Deut. IV, 12, and likewise most wise, Prov. III, 19, it is gathered that He is a Spirit, free from all corporeal concretion.

3. Because they are charged with idolatry who attributed the likeness of corruptible man to God, Rom. I, 23.

The antithesis is that of the Audaeans, or Anthropomorphites, who attributed a human body to God; and also of Crellius, Vorstius, and others, who state that God is called a Spirit, not only as angels and souls are, but also as air and other bodies similar to it are called spirits. They rely on the following arguments:

1. Corporeal members are attributed to God everywhere in sacred scripture, hands, arms, eyes, ears, feet, etc. Therefore, God is corporeal. Resp. These things are said of God ἀνθρωποπαθῶς (in a human manner), and are to be understood θεοπρεπῶς (in a manner befitting God). By the arms of God is understood omnipotence, by the hands operation, by the eyes omniscience, by the feet omnipresence.

2. God has been seen. Therefore, God is not a Spirit. The reason for the consequence is; because a Spirit is invisible. The antecedent is clear from Exod. XXXIV, 5; Is. VI, 1. Resp. God was seen not in His essence, but in an external symbol, or an assumed corporeal form. Augustine says aptly in Ep. CXII: "God, who by the proper nature of his deity is invisible, could be seen and could have appeared through an assumed creature, or by the disposition of some assumed visible matter."

3. He in whose image man was created is corporeal. Man was created in the image of God. Therefore, God is corporeal. The major is established; because an image agrees with its exemplar, or prototype. The minor is clear from Gen. I, 26. Resp. The image of God was located πρῶτως (primarily) in the soul, namely in the knowledge of the intellect and the holiness of the will, Col. III, 10. Δευτέρως (secondarily) in the immortality of the body. But it was not by reason of corporeal mass or external figure that the whole man was like God, but by reason of immortality.

4. Certain Fathers, among whom is Tertullian, in his book de incarnat. c. XI, attributed a certain body to God. Resp. The holy fathers understood "body" not in its proper sense, in which it denotes a material, quantitative, divisible substance, but they took "body" in a catachrestic sense, inasmuch as it designates a true and solid substance, as opposed to an empty phantasm, and also to a shadowy accident.

Question XVIII. How are Spirit, substance, being, and essence predicated of God and of creatures?

When Spirit, substance, being, and essence are predicated of God and of creatures, that predication is not improper and equivocal (a), but proper, yet not univocal, but analogical, according to the analogy of intrinsic attribution (b).

Prob. a. Whatever things are said only equivocally, of them only the name is common, but the definition of the name is diverse. But for the creator and creatures, not only the name of being, essence, substance, and Spirit, but the thing itself, signified by the name, is fitting. Therefore. The major is clear from the definition of equivocals; the minor is shown by induction, e.g., a man truly is, a stone has its essence, a lion exists by itself, every angel is a Spirit. Thomas Aquinas accurately concludes in P. I. q. 13. art. 5: "If these were predicated equivocally of God and creatures, nothing could be known of God from creatures, but the fallacy of equivocation would always arise. And this is against both the philosopher, who proves many things demonstratively about God, and also against the apostle, Rom. I, 20."

Prob. b. Whatever names are indeed common to several, yet in such a way that one of them, of which they are said, participates in them primarily and independently, but the others participate in them secondarily, on account of dependence; those are predicated analogically and unequally. But being and essence, substance and Spirit, are common to the creator and the creature, yet in such a way that God participates in them primarily and independently, and creatures participate in them secondarily on account of dependence. The major is clear from the definition of analogicals. The minor is established; because God is being, substance, Spirit, independently; but all creatures depend on God.

The antithesis is (1) of the Platonists and some Scholastics who assert that being and essence, substance and Spirit are predicated equivocally of God and creatures; (2) of the Scotists who state that those predicates are said univocally and equally of God and of creatures. The primary arguments of the former are:

1. Between which there is an infinite distance, a common concept cannot be formed of them. But between God and creatures, etc. Therefore. Resp. I limit the major. Between which there is an infinite negative distance, so that plainly no agreement intervenes between them (such as is between being and nothing), a common concept cannot be formed of them, I concede. But between God and creatures there is an infinite positive distance; because God exceeds creatures infinitely in most eminent perfection. But from this it is not permissible to conclude that they do not agree in any perfection or in any common concept; for since God, supremely good and perfect, is communicative of Himself, He has communicated some rivulets of His goodness, some rays of His perfection to creatures, so that they may agree in a certain perfection, although in an unequal manner.

Instance; The Holy Spirit testifies in the sacred writings that creatures, when compared with God, are as nothing, Is. XL, 17; "All nations before him are as nothing; and they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity." Resp. Those comparative expressions are not destructive, but extenuative. The essential perfection is not removed by them, but the most eminent prerogative and majesty of the creator over creatures is indicated.

2. Whoever states that the name יהוה is incommunicable to creatures, must also state that being is incommunicable to creatures. (For יהוה, which derives its origin from being, walks step by step with being.) But the Lutherans, etc. Therefore. Resp. The name יהוה denotes the independent and immutable essence of God; which does not walk step by step with essence considered generally.

3. Whatever at some time was not, and at some time can cease to be, is to be numbered among non-beings rather than beings. But every creature, etc. Therefore. Resp. I distinguish between past, present, and future. In past time, a creature at some time was not; in future time, it can also at some time cease to be; since it can be annihilated by the absolute omnipotence of God. But in the present time, in which it exists, it is necessarily a being. There are some creatures that in the present time move, live, praise God, some in heaven behold His face of glory. Who of sound mind would call them non-beings?

4. From the first being, a prior being, common to God and creatures, cannot be abstracted. But God is the first being. Resp. I distinguish between the priority of predication, or of our concepts, and real priority. Being, abstracted from God and creatures, is called prior not really, but according to our mode of conceiving.

5. The Scotists argue; Whatever concept the inferiors participate in equally, is univocal. But inferiors participate in the concept of being equally. Therefore. The major is manifest in itself. The minor is proved; because we conceive of being universally, as really existing. But God really exists; and a creature really exists. In this most abstract concept no inequality is detected, but inequality is given in the inferiors, not in being universally considered. Resp. The inequality that founds the analogy is to be understood not by reason of the common and abstract concept, but by reason of the mode of participating in that common concept; which mode of participating is unequal and arises from dependence. Namely, creatures participate secondarily and by a lesser reason in the nature of being, because their whole essence and all their perfection depends on the creator. But God is in the most eminent reason a being, substance, and Spirit, since He is not only existing from Himself, but also the first cause and author, preserver and governor of other beings.

Question XIX. Is independence the quidditative, contracting, and as it were, differential concept of God?

The differential concept of God is independence. Prob. 1. That concept of God is contracting and differential which belongs first to God, and is the root of all the attributes which are said of God. But independence belongs first to God, and is the root of all the attributes which are said of God. Therefore. The major is established; because every difference belongs first to the thing which it constitutes, and is the root of all its properties. The minor radiates with its own light; because all the attributes of God acknowledge the independence of God as a root, in our way of conceiving, for example, God is therefore infinite, because His essence does not depend on another, by whom it could be limited. God is eternal, because He is independent, consequently He has a beginning from no other, nor can He be destroyed, etc.

2. By which a creature is first constituted in the being of a creature, by its opposite God is first constituted in the being of deity. But a creature is first constituted in the being of a creature by dependence. Therefore, God is first constituted in the being of deity by independence.

The antithesis is of certain Theologians, to whom the first contracting concept of God seems to be either infinitude, or intellectual life, whose chief arguments are:

I. That by which the divine nature according to its proper formal reason is first constituted in its proper being, and is distinguished from any finite nature, that is the first quidditative concept of God. But by infinitude, etc. Therefore. Resp. I deny the minor; because independence is prior to infinitude. For independence denies an origin to the divine essence, infinitude denies an end to it. But just as origin is prior to end; so according to our mode of conceiving, independence is prior to infinity.

II. Whatever embraces every other reason in God; which being posited, nothing of the perfection of divinity is lacking, that has the character of a concept that determines quidditatively. But infinitude, etc. Therefore. Resp. I limit the major. Whatever in the first mode of conceiving embraces every other reason in God, which being posited, nothing of the perfection of divinity is lacking, that has the character of a concept quidditatively determining. Thus the minor is denied. For he who conceives of God, at the first moment of consideration, conceives of Him as a being existing from Himself; at the second moment he observes that, since God is from Himself, limits or ends cannot be placed upon Him by anyone.

III. If all the attributal perfections of God are infinite, by reason of the identity which they have with the divine essence, the essence of God will be formally infinite, and God will be formally constituted in the being of deity by infinitude. But the former is true. Therefore, the latter also. Resp. I deny the consequence of the major. For the same argument can be formed concerning eternity, simplicity, etc. If all the attributal perfections of God are eternal, by reason of the identity which they have with the divine essence, the essence of God will be formally eternal, and God will be formally constituted in the being of deity by eternity.

IV. Whatever is a mode of the divine essence, is not its differential concept. But independence, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because a mode indeed affects a thing, but does not first distinguish it. The minor is clear; because in metaphysics, independent and dependent are enumerated among the modes of being. Resp. I distinguish between an affecting and a contracting mode. Independence is a contracting mode; because it contracts the common concept, namely the spiritual essence of God, first constitutes it, distinguishes it from creatures, and pours forth the remaining perfections of God from itself.

Instance: But independence is a negative term, positing or importing no perfection. Resp. Independence formally and as to the mode of signifying is a negative term, materially and as to the mode of being, it notes the highest perfection of God.

V. Independence acknowledges a perfection in God prior to itself. Therefore, it is not the first quidditative concept of God. The antecedent is proved; because independence presupposes the intellectual life of God. Resp. Independence does not suppose life, except insofar as it supposes a spiritual essence; which pertains to the common concept of God. If, however, by life is understood the eternal life of God, this certainly supposes the independence of God; since God is conceived as independent before as eternally living.

Question XX. Whence is the independence of God proved?

The independence of God can be proved both from scripture (a) and from nature (b).

Prob. a. 1) Is. XLIV, 6, "Thus saith Jehovah: I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God." Cf. Is. XLI, 4; Apoc. I, 17. But He who is the first does not acknowledge a prior, on whom He depends as on a cause. 2) When God says; Exod. III, 14, "I am that I am," He indicates that He does not exist from another, but from Himself, and in such a way that His nature involves necessary and immutable existence. (*)

(*) Among the many arguments to be drawn from the sacred writings, this one from John V, 26 stands out. That this expression, ἔχει ζωὴν ἐν αὐτῷ (to have life in himself), can denote nothing other than independence, is established 1) from the conjunction of the predicate with the subject; for it is necessary that something utterly singular and excellent be signified, by which God is discerned from all things endowed with life. To have life in oneself subjectively, this is certainly neither anything singular nor preeminent; for the life

Prob. b. In nature all dependent beings are referred back to a first and independent being, lest there be a progression into infinity, which nature abhors.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES

Question XXI. What are the attributes of God?

Divine Attributes. The attributes of God are the perfections of God, which in our mode of conceiving follow the divine essence by themselves, and are predicated paronymically of God.

Obs. 1. The attributes of God are called perfections, because they declare the divine essence most perfectly. (**).

Obs. 2. Essence is otherwise called the first concept of a thing, than which none is prior, but which is the root of the other concepts. Thus, for example, God is first conceived to be an independent being. The attributes of God are called second concepts, because they follow the first concept of God by themselves, and as it were flow from it voluntarily. They are also called inadequate concepts; because they do not express the whole essence of God, on account of its infinite perfection, but they set forth something of God.

Obs. 3. Attributes are predicated of God paronymically and in the concrete, insofar as they are considered formally. Thus, for example, God is said to be immense, eternal, in the concrete. But in a sense of identity, God can be called immensity, eternity, etc., because the attributes do not differ really from the divine essence; but only in the order of our conceiving.

Obs. 4. Perfections are some simply such, others such in a certain respect. The former imply no imperfection, like to be wise, true, good, etc., which are formally in God; otherwise God would not be absolutely perfect; for an absolutely perfect being lacks no perfection. The latter involve certain imperfections, and belong to God eminently or virtually; inasmuch as He has something more excellent than them, and embraces them by virtue, and can exercise their acts by Himself, e.g., to reason, to hear, to see, etc.

of any Spirit, and indeed of an animal, is not external, but internal, and whatever lives, has its life within itself. Therefore, that which is asserted of God alone cannot but be understood, so to speak, more principally, that He Himself has life, not given to Him from elsewhere, and therefore independent. This is apparent 2) from the scope of the words; for thus a reason is given why there should be no doubt that God bestows life on men, long since dead, to whomsoever He Himself wishes, V. 21 & 25. The whole force of the argumentation is placed in this; He who has life in Himself in such a way that He has not received it from any other, that He does not depend on the will of any other, so that He Himself is the one and only cause of all life, He is also able to impart life, to whomever and whenever it pleases Him. It is also known 3) from the opposite, if we compare with these words those of Acts XVII, 28: ἐν αὐτῷ ζῶμεν (in him we live). To have life in another, that is, to have it as received from another, add v. 24, 26. Therefore, to have life in oneself, is to have received it from no other. What one has received from another, in that he needs that other, and depends on his will; Therefore, he who has given life to all others by his free will, but has himself received his own from no one, also needs no one, v. 25. Never to need anyone, is what is called independence. Therefore, it is declared both by opposition and by interpretation, what it is to be ὁ ἔχων ζωὴν ἐν ἑαυτῷ (he who has life in himself). This Paul indeed interprets thus: "Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things."

(**) There is a certain distinction of divine perfections and properties. To wit, perfections are those attributes which can indeed be communicated with created and finite things in a certain measure, but belong to the one God alone in every way and in the highest degree, such as; intellect, will, knowledge, wisdom, justice, power, blessedness. I call properties those attributes which are to be asserted of God alone in every way, and in no way fall upon any created things. Of these properties, some indeed are natural, equally common to the three persons of the divinity, namely independence, absolute eternity, infinity, immensity, immutability; others, however, are personal, by which either the individual persons differ among themselves, or one or the other is discerned from the third, namely eternal generation and spiration, both either active or passive.

Question XXII. Are the divine attributes accidents?

The divine attributes are not accidents.

Prob. 1. Because God is most perfect, into whom no imperfection, and thus no accident, falls. For this cannot even be conceived without imperfection; since every accident exists dependently on a substance.

II. If an accident were to inhere in God as a subject, He would be composed of a subject and an accident. But God is in no way composite, but most simple.

You say: 1. Every property is an accident. The divine attributes are properties of God. Therefore. Resp. Every predicamental property, and strictly speaking, is an accident. But the divine attributes are not predicamental properties, but transcendental, since by their eminence they transcend the classes of the predicaments, and differ from the divine essence not really, but only formally. They are called properties analogically; because they follow the essence of God according to our rational concept, are predicated paronymically of it, and are reciprocal with it.

You say: 2. Certain divine attributes are affections, e.g., love, mercy, etc. But affections are accidents. Resp. Certain affections are said of God figuratively, improperly, and ἀνθρωποπαθῶς (in a human manner), e.g., desire, sadness, repentance, etc. Certain are predicated first of God, second of creatures; which although in creatures they are accidents, are not so in God. For the names of the affections must be purged of imperfections, and what remains pure and perfect is to be attributed to God.

Question XXIII. How are the divine attributes distinguished from the divine essence and from each other?

The divine attributes are distinguished from the divine essence, and from each other, not nominally (a), nor really (b), but formally, according to our mode of conceiving, not without a certain foundation for the distinction (c).

Prob. a. The divine attributes infer distinct concepts. Therefore, they differ more than nominally. Gregory of Nyssa says pointedly in book XII against Eunomius, to reduce him to absurdity: "If you are asked what is signified by the name of judge, you will interpret the disposition by responding; or if it is necessary to give the reason for justice, you will have ready the name of the incorporeal. But what does incorruptibility signify? The same as mercy, you will say altogether, or what the notion of judge sets forth. In the same way also all things will pass over into each other individually; just as no peculiar signification may separate one from the other. But if Eunomius proclaims these things as some legislator; why does scripture in vain call the divine nature by various names, when it names God judge, just, strong, patient, true, merciful, and other things of that kind?"

Prob. b. I. The divine essence is most simple, devoid of all real composition. But it would not be most simple, if the divine attributes differed really from the essence of God, and from each other. For the essence of God would be composed of those many essential predicates, or those positive concepts, distinct from each other by the nature of the thing.

II. The independent and infinite essence of God is supremely perfect, containing all perfections simply in itself. But if the divine essence differed really from the divine attributes, it would be perfected by these, and therefore would not be supremely perfect.

III. In the divine, all things are one, where the opposition of relation does not obstruct. But the divine attributes are not opposed relatively either to the divine essence or to each other. Therefore, the divine attributes are the same as the divine essence; because each attribute implies the divine essence itself, and represents it with an inadequate concept.

Prob c. The foundation of the distinction, by which the divine attributes are distinguished from the essence of God and from each other, is provided to our intellect by diverse extrinsic connotata. 1) Diverse effects, e.g., divine mercy saves, divine justice condemns. Therefore, they differ. 2) The agreement of the perfections of creatures with the divine perfections; which are first in the creator, second in creatures, e.g., goodness, wisdom, power differ really in creatures, so they differ formally in the creator. 3) The negations of imperfections, which are found in creatures, e.g., dependence and death in creatures differ in respect of the thing; independence and immortality differ in God in respect of our concept. But when we assert that mercy and justice, wisdom and goodness of God do not differ really in the creator as they do in creatures, but only formally, the foundation of our assertion is the supreme simplicity and perfection of God, by which it is not permitted to distinguish the divine attributes from the divine essence and from each other really. For although certain divine attributes produce really distinct operations and diverse effects; yet the attributes themselves remain simply one; because even from a simple virtue, with respect to distinct subjects, a diverse operation proceeds, and not always one effect results. This is clearly established from the heat of the sun, which hardens clay and liquefies butter. Then, although by certain divine attributes really distinct imperfections are denied; yet because this is done only on account of the imperfection of our intellect, really distinct perfections are not for that reason affirmed in God. Furthermore, although certain attributes belong to both the Creator and to creatures; yet that agreement does not infer a real difference; because they are not in the Creator and in creatures in the same way. In the former they are eminently, in the latter imperfectly. For God by His essence is merciful and just, good and wise; creatures are merciful and just, good and wise, through qualities really different from their essence.

The antithesis is of some Scholastics, especially the Scotists, who state that the divine attributes are distinguished by the nature of the thing; who fortify their opinion with the following arguments:

1. Whatever things have contrary effects, differ really. Certain divine attributes have contrary effects. Therefore. Resp. 1) The major is not universal. For one cause not rarely produces diverse effects. 2) Diverse effects generally acknowledge diverse principles in creatures, in which substance differs from qualities, and one quality from another; but not in God, who by one and most simple essence not only is whatever He is, but also effects all things that He does.

2. Whatever things differ in definitions, differ really. The divine attributes differ in definitions. Therefore. The major radiates with its own light; because of one thing there is one definition; but diverse definitions are formed of different things. The minor is clear; because wisdom is defined differently from the omnipotence of God. Resp. Definitions are either of things as they are in themselves, or as they are conceived by us. If the wisdom and omnipotence of God are defined as they are in themselves, they do not have different definitions, but are God Himself, wise and omnipotent; but something else must be said, if they are defined as they are conceived by us.

3. Whatever things cannot be predicated of each other, are really distinct. But the divine attributes cannot, etc. Therefore. The major is established, because things that agree among themselves are affirmed of each other; like Peter and man, man and animal. The minor is clear; because the mercy of God is not His justice; nor is the justice of God the divine essence itself. Resp. I distinguish between the formal and the identical sense. If the mercy and justice of God are considered in the identical sense, as they are ταυτό (the same), one and the same thing in God, that proposition is true: "The mercy of God is the justice of God." But if they are looked at in the formal sense, as they are in our concepts, that proposition is false: "the mercy of God is the justice of God." For the mercy and justice of God, on account of the distinct effects they produce, are represented by distinct inadequate concepts. But predication follows the concept of the mind; for as we understand, so we name and predicate; since names are symbols of concepts.

Instance: If the divine attributes are not in God as we conceive them, but in another way, they are falsely attributed to God; for when what is most perfect is conceived with imperfection, there must be an error in that concept. Resp. Something is said to be conceived with imperfection in two ways: 1) as to the object, when the thing itself is conceived as imperfect. And thus he errs, whoever conceives God with any imperfection; for He is devoid of imperfection; 2) As to the mode, when only the mode of conceiving is imperfect, or when the thing is not conceived as imperfect, but only in an imperfect mode; and in this way God, who is most perfect, is conceived with imperfection; and this without any error.

4. Whatever can be separated, are really distinct. But the divine attributes, etc. Therefore. The major is clear in itself; because the clearest indication of a real distinction is the separation of one from another. The minor is proved; because the human nature of Christ is rightly called omniscient, but not eternal. Therefore, eternity can be separated from the divine knowledge. Resp. The communication of the divine attributes is considered either as to possession (Thus all the divine attributes are communicated to the flesh of Christ; since the whole fullness of the divinity dwells in Christ as in its own temple, Col. II, 9) or it is considered as to denomination and use. (Thus not all the divine attributes, but only those are communicated to the flesh of Christ which are required for carrying out the mediatorial office, namely the ἐνεργητικά (energetika), or operative ones.)

Question XXIV. How are the divine attributes divided?

The divine attributes are divided (1) into negative and positive. The former are those by which imperfections, which are found in creatures, are removed from God. The latter are those by which perfections are simply affirmed of God. (2) Into ἀνενέργητα (anenergeta), quiescent, or immanent, which describe the divine essence absolutely and in itself, without respect to operation, and thus are not ordered to any act; and ἐνεργητικά (energetika), or operative and extending themselves ad extra, which describe the divine essence respectively, with respect to operation, and thus are known to be ordered to certain acts.

Obs. 1. The negative divine attributes are infinity, immensity, immortality, immutability, incomprehensibility, invisibility; which are considered partly formally, partly materially, or fundamentally. In the former way they only deny and remove some imperfection from God; in the latter way they connote some positive perfection of God. Thus when I say: "God is immutable"; I indeed deny that God is subject to any change, but in such a way that I connote that He is most constant both in being and in willing.

Obs. 2. The quiescent, or immanent, attributes of God are also called absolute; because they declare the divine essence absolutely, without respect to operation, and they are: Unity, simplicity, truth, goodness, infinity, eternity, immutability, immortality, immensity, incomprehensibility, invisibility, blessedness, and the majesty of God.

Obs. 3. The operative attributes of God are also called respective; because they infer a respect to ἐνέργειαν (energeian), or a divine act, and they are: life, omniscience, omniwisdom, omnipotence, grace, justice, veracity, omnipresence of God.

ON THE ABSOLUTE, OR IMMANENT, ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.

Question XXV. What is the unity of God?

Unity of God. The unity of God is the attribute of God by which we conceive the most singular divine essence not only as undivided, but also as indivisible, and, through a certain multiplication of itself, incommunicable.

Obs. God is called one, not in species, but in number; because He is a most singular being, not only undivided in Himself, but also indivisible, on account of the supreme simplicity of the divine essence; because in God there is no composition. Some Fathers prefer to say God is one by simplicity of existence, or by perfection, rather than by number, whom you may see cited by D. Calov, syst. tom. II. p. 278. But a distinction must be made between predicamental and transcendental number. Predicamental number is a discrete quantity, not suitable for God; but transcendental number is the difference of singular things. God is said to be one not only absolutely and internally, but also exclusively and externally, because He is the only God. He is unique not only as monadic species are, the sun, the moon, etc., which are called species because, although not more individuals actually exist, it is not repugnant for there to be more suns or moons; but it is simply repugnant to the divine essence for there to be more individuals of the same, to which it might be communicated by a multiplication of itself, since nothing is so contrary to deity as a plurality of essence.

The unity of God is proved both from nature and from scripture. The latter teaches the unity of God, 1) Assertively, Deut. VI, 4: "Hear, O Israel: Jehovah our God (is) one Jehovah." As Moses is about to exhort the Israelites to love God with all their heart, with all their soul, and with all their strength, he gives the reason, because God is one, the unique treasure of the heart, the unique spouse of the soul, the one cause of all human strengths, to whom by most just right the heart, soul, and all strengths are to be devoted. 2) Negatively: "That thou mightest know that Jehovah he is God; there is none else beside him," Deut. IV, 35. 3) Exclusively: "That all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art Jehovah God, even thou only," 2 Kings XIX, 19. Following the guidance of the light of nature, we gather the unity of God 1) from independence; because all dependent beings are referred back to one, which is from itself, and from which all things are. 2) From infinity; because two infinite beings cannot be posited without contradiction. For as two beings are circumscribed by a certain number, so they differ by a certain limit of essence. 3) From the most eminent perfection of God. There cannot be two most perfect beings; because one would possess a perfection which the other would lack; otherwise they would not differ. 4) From the omnipotent governance of this universe. If there were several gods, none of them would be omnipotent. For if one were to create something and strive to preserve what was created, the other either could destroy his work, or could not. If he could, the other would be impotent and weak; for he would not possess the strength to preserve and protect the work he had made. If he could not destroy the work of the other, he would not be omnipotent, and therefore not the true God. Wherefore it can in no way happen that there be two omnipotent rulers of the world. Οὐκ ἀγαθὸν πολυκοιρανίῃ, εἰς κοίρανος ἔστω ("The rule of many is not good; let there be one ruler"). 5) From the love of God, which is incommunicable to many. The true God is to be loved above all things. But He who is not one cannot be loved above all things. (*)

The antithesis is 1) of the Gentiles, who most foully erred from the way of salvation by worshiping many Gods. 2) Of the ancient heretics, among whom in the first century were the Valentinians, who posited thirty aeons, or ages of generation, in God, and invented generating, being born, and marrying Gods. In the second and third centuries, the Cerdonians and Marcionites, who blasphemously asserted that there was one God of the Old Testament, the creator of the world, and another God of the New Testament, the father of Christ; that the former was just and cruel, but the latter merciful, clement, and good. In the third century, the Manichaeans, who posited two first principles of all things, co-eternal, but diverse from each other, namely, good, which they called God, light, and evil, which they called the devil, darkness, about whom see

(*) When we follow nature as our guide, she teaches us that there neither are nor can be more gods than one. I. That there is no more than one God, or, if we wish to speak accurately, only one, is elucidated by this argument; We know God naturally from no other source than from His effects; The effect of God, and that indeed which nature shows us, is the world; The parts of the world are both various and many and innumerable; yet all are aptly and connectedly joined among themselves as if by the tightest bond and in a wonderful order; This continuous series and coupling of all parts constitutes the entire universe of things; Therefore, the world is one; And God is also one. You will perhaps say: There can be several associate causes of one thing, consenting into one; and so the argumentation will have to be limited; Where there is one effect, considered universally, there it is necessary that there be either one cause, or several associated, carrying out their business with common counsel. I concede, indeed. But, since a cause is to be known in no other way than from its effects, and in these nothing is detected which cannot be attributed to one and the same efficient cause, then there is no reason why we should posit several efficient causes; Therefore, the natural knowledge of God is of none other than the one God. II. But that there cannot even be more gods than one, we demonstrate thus by the force of the principle of contradiction; God, if He exists, cannot but be a necessary, supreme, and independent being. This indeed is what we first think of God, and by which we discern Him from all things that have ever existed, nor do those who confess that God exists deny this. He who dares to deny it, denies God altogether, and so will not be able to dispute about His unity, and to fashion more gods. But 1) The supreme cannot be but one. Where there are two in all things equal, there neither of them is supreme. 2) Independent is that which has never been effected or determined by any other, and which, with no one prohibiting, is able to effect whatever it wishes. It therefore can have no other, neither superior to itself, to effect and determine it, nor equal to itself, to restrain its effects, and to resist its will. Therefore, if there were two or more gods, none would be independent; Therefore, no God. Therefore, this is self-repugnant; that there be more gods than one. Isaiah indicates this line of argument not obscurely, in chap. XLV, 5, 6, where he himself testifies that Jehovah is one, and there is no other, and he adds this reason; v. 7: because God is an independent being, that is, acting with most free will, in effecting all things.

Irenaeus, Haeres. LXVI. (**) 3) The Socinians, who opine that there is one supreme true God, and another subordinate one.

1. God is a name of power. Therefore, one who has true power (e.g., an angel, a magistrate) is a true God. Response: The name God formally designates him who has the divine nature, of which power and dominion are a consequence, as we have demonstrated above. Surely, if neither the Greek name, θεός (theos), nor the Latin, Deus, denoted the divine essence and nature, neither in the Greek nor in the Latin language would there be a divine name signifying the divine nature, which seems utterly absurd.

2. A magistrate is called God either truly or falsely. Not falsely; for the objects of idolatry and the devil are falsely called gods because of the erroneous opinion of men. Therefore, truly, on account of a true and not a feigned similitude with God. But he who is truly called God is a true God. Response: 1) A magistrate is not called God in the singular number, but judges and magistrates in the plural number are named gods. Ps. LXXXII, 1. 6. For there are many so-called (in Greek, λεγόμενοι) gods, titular, who are such by participation in the name alone, not in the divine essence, 1 Cor. VIII, 6. 2) It is one thing to be truly called God in a figurative and metaphorical sense, and another to truly be God in the proper and native signification. In a metaphorical sense, magistrates may be truly called gods, but the true God is He who has an independent and infinite nature.

3. Christ is the true God, 1 John V, 20, and yet at the same time God made, Acts II, 36. Therefore, one true God is independent, who is not made, and another true God is dependent, who is made. Response: St. Peter does not say that God the Father made Christ God, but that he made Jesus, the son of Mary, Lord and Christ, i.e., that He elevated him to the use of the fullest dominion and royal power through the exaltation to His right hand. For although Christ received the possession (in Greek, τὴν κτῆσιν) of royal dignity according to his human nature from the hypostatic union, yet by the elevation to the right hand of God he was made Lord and Christ, by which is meant the use (in Greek, χρῆσιν), or the fullest and unceasing exercise of divine omnipotence in governing this universe, especially in gathering and defending the church as the kingdom of grace. For indeed the word Christ (in Greek, χριστός) here denotes the king of the people of God, as Hugo Grotius observes on this passage. Cf. 1 Sam. XII, 3. Ps. XX, 7. Is. XLV, 1.

Question XXVI. What is the simplicity of God?

The simplicity of God is a divine attribute by which the essence of God is devoid of all composition.

Proof I. From the divine names Jehovah, "I Am That I Am," Exod. III, 14. These divine names, as they derive their origin from being, so they infer and signify the most absolute simplicity of the divine essence, that there is nothing in God but being, and that God is His own being.

II. From abstract predicates. That is the most simple being of which predicates in the abstract are verified, because this has a simple mode of signifying. But of God, etc. Since we are reasoning in this way, we easily understand that evil is mixed with good in one world and even in each individual person. Therefore, either there are two contrary gods who have agreed in one purpose by eternal counsels and decrees, and have operated with combined forces in creating one effect; or one of them, and indeed the good one, was not able to prevent the other from making that effect, in the very perfecting of its nature and constitution, depraved and mutilated. Both of these are such that nothing more absurd can be imagined. This is to take away all of God's independence and supreme perfection, and thus God Himself.

(**) It is agreed among all that the Manichaeans, and many philosophers long before them, were supported and sustained chiefly by this defense; that in the entire universe of things there are goods mixed with evils. Hence they opined that there are two eternal Deities, and indeed in such a way that one of them is contrary to the other, and one is the effector of all good, the other the author of evil. Which, although it seemed so probable to Peter Bayle, otherwise a most acute man, that he thought the origin of evil could not be conveniently explained, except by assuming this principle; is yet in reality most absurd ordered; that one is independent, the other dependent. Their main arguments are:

The minor premise is proven, because God not only has life in Himself, but is also life itself, John V, 26; c. XIV, 6. He is in the light and is the light itself, 1 John 1, 5, 7. God so loves that He is charity itself, 1 John IV, 16.

You may say: Abstract expressions do not always infer simplicity of essence; for Paul addresses the Ephesians, that they are "light in the Lord," Eph. V, 8. Response: Abstract expressions are either absolute, or they are limited by restricting and diminishing conditions. God is absolutely called light, but the Ephesians are called "light in the Lord" with an added restriction, and thus dependent on the illuminating grace of God.

III. From the spirituality of God. Whoever is the highest and most perfect spirit, his essence is simple. But God, etc. Therefore, the major premise is clear; because spirit is contradistinguished from body, which is composite. The minor is evident from John IV, 24.

You may say: Angels are spirits, and yet they are composed of essence and accidents. Response: 1) From the spirituality of God, we conclude that He is not composed of matter and form, and of integral parts. 2) The case of God and angels is different. He is the highest and most perfect spirit, in whom no accident can be found. Angels are lower and more imperfect spirits.

IV. From the independence of God. Where there is composition, there is something prior that joins and composes the components. But God is the first and independent being, acknowledging no prior cause by which He could be composed.

V. From the perfection of God. For the simpler a thing is, the more perfect it is.

VI. From the immutability of God. In every composition, there are diverse principles, which as they come together, so they can in turn be divided, and thus infer change. But God is subject to no change.

VII. By induction, removing all and every composition from God. Physical composition from matter and form, and from quantitative parts, is alien to God. For that is the composition of natural bodies; but God is the purest spirit. Nor is logical composition from genus and species, from subject and accident, to be attributed to God. For genus relates as potentiality, and difference as actuality; but God is the purest actuality. Genus is multipliable into several species, and a species is multipliable into several individuals; but nothing is so repugnant to God as plurality, since He is singularly one. Accidental composition, however, implies imperfection. Nor does metaphysical composition suit God (1) from essence and existence. For our intellect conceives through essence a thing actually existing, but which was at one time possible; but through existence, the act of existing is added to the essence. But it is not permissible to conceive of God as possible, because He is a necessary being, of whose essence it is to necessarily exist. (2) Nor from nature and suppositum, or essence and subsistence. For every composition in its own way is founded on the principle of act and potency, or if the parts do not relate to each other as act and potency, they nevertheless tend toward the integrity, increase, and perfection of the whole. But in God, both the act of essence and of subsistence are independent of all potentiality and are most pure, since neither exists in potency to the other. Therefore, the act of essence and subsistence creates no composition in God.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, Vorstius, Burgersdijk, and others, who maintain that God is not devoid of all composition, and they go on to support their opinion with the following arguments.

I. In whatever a distinction of reason has a place, in it a composition of reason finds a place. But in God, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established because distinction presupposes composition. The minor is clear because the attributes are distinguished from the divine essence by reason. Response: I deny the major premise. For that there are many concepts of God; that a distinction of reason can be admitted; that the divine essence itself provides a foundation for it; all this is not from a prior composition, but from the most eminent perfection of God. For because God is a sea of innumerable perfections, He therefore provides a foundation for considering God inadequately, now under this perfection, now under that, and for distinguishing one perfection from another. But it is far otherwise with composition, which always involves imperfection. Cf. D. Osiander, System P. 1. p. 272.

II. Whatever essence consists of three persons is composite. The divine essence, etc. Therefore. Response: Whatever essence consists of three persons essentially distinct, that is composite; I grant it. The divine essence consists of three persons essentially distinct; I deny it. The three persons of the Godhead differ indeed really, on account of real oppositions, yet they do not differ essentially, because they do not have a different essence, but the same one.

Instance I. But because the persons differ really, they are really composed. Response: Distinction is one thing, composition another. The former is a sign of perfection, the latter a sign of imperfection. The former denotes the diversity of the extremes, the latter their union.

Instance II. Union also applies to the three persons of the deity, because they are united in one essence. Response: They are not united, strictly speaking; because for a true union, different substances are required. But the three divine persons have one essence, or substance. Besides, in a true union, one of the united parts has the nature of potentiality, the other the nature of actuality. Thus in man, who is really composite, the soul has the nature of a perfecting act, while matter is like a perfectible potentiality. Since these things cannot be said of the divine persons, it is truly concluded that they are not, strictly speaking, united.

Instance III. The three divine persons are either united or not. If the former, there will be composition, because there is union. If the latter, the divine persons will be diverse in essence, and thus a threefold essence must be admitted. Response: The divine persons are neither united, nor diverse in essence, but in essence they are one. 1 John 5:7.

III. In whatever there is essence and a real relation, in it there is a real composition. But in God, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established, because relation adds a particular respect to the essence, with which it is composed. The minor is clear, because in divine matters, according to the testimony of scripture, there is one who is really the Father, and one who is really called the Son. Therefore, there must be in God a real paternity and a real sonship, which are relations. Response: The hypostatic relation in God does not inhere as an accident in the divine essence, nor does it differ really from it. Therefore, it does not make a real composition; it indeed distinguishes one person from another, but it does not compose them.

IV. In whatever there are accidents, it is composite. But in God there are accidents. Therefore. The minor is proven, because in God there are decrees, which are accidents. Response: I deny the minor; because decrees in God are not in an imperfect manner, but eminently, i.e., the divine decrees are not accidents, but the divine essence itself decreeing.

Instance I. The divine essence is one. The decrees of God are not one, but many. Therefore, the decrees of God are not the divine essence itself. Response: The decrees of God, considered in themselves (in se), without relation to their objects, or connotata, are the divine essence itself decreeing; viewed in relation to different connotata, or objects, they are many outside of God. Therefore, there is a multitude of divine decrees, not on God's part, or in God (in Deo), but on the part of the connotata, or objects.

Instance II. The decrees are effects of the divine will. Therefore, they are not the divine essence itself. Response: The divine decrees are not effects, but immanent acts of the divine will, which, existing within the bosom of the deity, are the divine essence itself perpetually active. For within God, to be and to be able to act do not differ.

Instance III. The divine essence is necessary. The divine decree is not necessary. Therefore. Response: The divine decree is considered either with respect to its principle according to its existence in God, or with respect to its term, insofar as it terminates in creatures. The divine decrees are free with regard to their free termination in created objects; they are necessary insofar as they are intrinsic to God, since He decrees not by some accident, but immediately through His own essence. (*)

Instance IV. The divine decrees include a respect to creatures. The divine essence does not, etc. Therefore. Response: (a) Divine omnipotence also includes a respect to creatures, and this notwithstanding, it is the same as the divine essence. (b) I distinguish between a real respect and one of reason. In the sense that a divine decree includes a respect of reason to what is external, in the same sense the divine essence decreeing includes such a respect; although it is certain that creatures are more referred to God than God is to creatures.

V. God swears by His soul. Jer. LI, 14. Amos VI, 8. Therefore God is composite. Response: Properly speaking, God does not have a soul; and therefore He is said to swear by His soul when He swears by Himself.

VI. Burgersdijk, a Dutch philosopher, argues: Wherever one is made from those things that are distinct, there arises some composition. In God, one is made from distinct persons. Therefore, in God, there is some composition. Response: Sacred scripture does not say that the three divine persons become one, but that they are one. 1 John V, 7. They are, however, not a composite one, but a most simple one; since one divine person is not related to another in the manner of a passive and perfectible potency. For true composition, however, it is required that the component parts relate to each other as a perfectible potency and a perfecting act.

Instance: Passive generation is attributed to the Son of God. Therefore, passive potency applies to him. Response: The generation of the Son of God is called passive, not because passive potency, or passion properly speaking, real, or physical, applies to the Son of God, but because in the absence of another suitable word, necessity bids us to use this one in so sublime a mystery. It is called passive generation grammatically, because He is said not to generate, but to be generated; although it is a most pure act, inferring no composition, namely, a most pure emanation of the Word (τε λόγος) from the Father.

Question XXVII. What is the truth of God?

The truth of God is the conformity of the divine essence with the divine intellect.

Obs. I. The sense of the definition is: The truth of God is that by which He is really such as He is known to be in His own nature and essence by Himself.

Obs. II. God is true both inwardly (in Greek, κατ' ἑσώ), or simply and in Himself, because He Himself by essence is the true God and the first truth; and outwardly (in Greek, κατ' ἑξώ), because He is true in His words, promises, and threats. Therefore, both essential and moral truth belong to God. Our discussion here is about the essential truth of God. (*)

Obs. III. Truth is either primary and independent, or derived and dependent. The former is the conformity of the divine essence with the speculative and knowing intellect of God; the latter is that by which a created being corresponds with the practical and measuring intellect of God. Therefore, God is true both entitatively and independently; indeed, God is self-truth (in Greek, ἀυταλήθεια), the first, highest, and independent truth; and also exemplarily, inasmuch as He Himself is the archetype, idea, and norm of all truth that exists in creatures. Therefore, created things are true (*) Truth, generally speaking, is the agreement of things, which, as they are, and insofar as they are, or can be. Specifically, there are five kinds of truth altogether: 1) in being, as is the custom to speak, and this is called metaphysical truth; 2) in understanding, which is logical; 3) in willing, or 4) in decreeing, 5) in acting, and in speaking; these three species are comprehended under the one name of ethical, or moral, truth. Let us define each, all of which are in God most perfectly. I. The truth of God in essence is the agreement of all those things which pertain to the nature of the most perfect being, and constitute it entirely; by which reason God is opposed to fictitious and imaginary things, Jer. X, 8, 10. 1 John V, 20. II. The truth of God in intellect is the agreement of thoughts with the object, whether truly existing, or truly possible, insofar as it is possible. It does not befall God to err, nor to be ignorant. Job XI, 7. Acts XV, 18. Sirach XXII, 28. III. The truth of God in will is the agreement of every efficacious decree and purpose with the reasons properly known and judged in the intellect, Rom. XI, 33. IV. The truth of God in deeds is the agreement of actions with the purpose and decree, consonant with right principles and moving arguments, Ps. XXV, 10, in which place the ways of the Lord are proclaimed to be goodness and truth; but ways are works, or actions, as means most suitable to the purpose. Cf. Ps. XXXIII, 4 in the source & Eph. I, 11. V. The truth of God in words, which is usually called veracity, is the agreement of all words with right thought and the sentiment of the mind, and with the efficacious decree and purpose of the will, Num. XXIII, 19. 1 Sam. XV, 29. Tit. I, 2. Heb. VI, 18. This is seen 1) in doctrines, John XVII, 17; 2) in predictions, promises, as well as in threats. Num. XXIII, 19.

The essential truth of God is proven I. from the prophetic oracle "the LORD God is truth" (in Hebrew, יהוה אלהי ם אמת). The Vulgate rendered it: "The Lord God is true"; Pagninus: "The Lord God is truth." Seb. Schmidius: "Jehovah is God in truth." Observe therefore, that God is called by the prophet not only true, but also truth itself, not with respect to faithfulness, because God cannot deceive, but with respect to His very essence, because He is not a fictitious God, as the idols of the gentiles are mere fabrications, but He is the true God by an independent, eternally living, and all-governing essence. Wherefore the prophet distinguishes the true God from idols in v. 8, 9, and in v. 10 adds: "He is the living God and the everlasting king."

II. From the apostolic statement. 1 John V, 20, 21. "And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life. Little children, keep yourselves from idols. Amen." That this deals with the supreme God who has the true and independent divine essence is clear from the context, because (1) He is called absolutely and in the nominative case "the true God" (in Greek, ὁ ἀληθινὸς θεὸς). But he is not the true God unless he possesses true deity, and therefore the true divine essence; just as he is not a true man unless he consists of true humanity, that is, a true human nature. (2) Because this true God is opposed to idols. But He is not opposed to idols and to "those who by nature are not gods" (in Greek, τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὐσι θεοῖς), as the true God, unless He is God by nature (in Greek, τῇ φύσει), and therefore that one supreme God. (3) Because that true God is called "eternal life," i.e., the author of eternal life. It is clear from this apostolic utterance that both the eternal Father and the co-eternal Son are the true God. For when St. John asserts that "the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true (God)," he indicates that God the Father is the true God, because he immediately adds: "And we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ," so as to distinguish the person of the Father, who is the true God, and at the same time to indicate that the Son of God is also the true God. For this reason, he appends the most memorable words: "This is the true God, and eternal life." These words are undoubtedly to be understood of Christ. For (a) the demonstrative pronoun "this" (in Greek, ὁτοῦτος) ordinarily refers to and demonstrates the immediately preceding noun, which here is Jesus Christ. (b) It is peculiar to John to call Christ "eternal life," partly in this same epistle, ch. 1, 1; ch. V, 12, 13, and partly in his gospel, ch. I, 4; ch. XI, 25; ch. 14, 6. (c) If the demonstrative pronoun "this" (in Greek, ὁτοῦτος) is said to refer to the more remote noun, "the true one" (in Greek, τὸν ἀληθινόν), a very inept tautology would emerge: This true one God is the true God. It remains, therefore, firm and fixed, that both God the Father and the Son of God are by nature the true God. The apostle did not exclude the Holy Spirit, because in the same chapter, v. 7, he had asserted that the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit are one.

Question XXVIII. What is the goodness of God?

The Goodness of God. The goodness of God is the conformity of the divine essence with the divine will.

Obs. I. The sense of the definition is: The goodness of God is that by which the divine essence so pleases the will of God that it loves it in an ineffable manner as the most perfect and most lovable good, and takes the sweetest delight and rests in it.

Obs. II. The goodness of God is either essential, which we have already defined, or moral, by which God is devoid of all moral vice, and it is called the holiness of God.

Obs. III. Transcendental goodness is either original or participated. The former is that by which God is good independently and by essence; the latter is that by which creatures are good dependently and by participation.

The goodness of God is proven from the saying of Christ, addressing a certain Pharisee who had called him a good master: "Why do you call me good? No one is good except God alone." Matthew XIX, 17. With these words, the Savior sought to convince the young man—who was instructed in the schools of the Pharisees, believed Christ to be a mere man, and while indeed asking about the way to attain eternal life, was fascinated by the perverse opinion that he could attain it by his own doing (in Greek, ποιῆσαι), or by his own works—of his error, arguing in the following manner: You cannot with equal right call singularly good him whom you do not believe to be the true God, the author of eternal life. But you do not believe me to be the true God; Therefore, you can by no right call me singularly good.

God is called singularly good because (1) He is originally and independently good; creatures are good dependently and by participation, insofar as they participate in the goodness of God by a certain mode of assimilation. (2) Efficiently, because God is the fount and origin of all good. (3) Exemplarily, because the goodness of God is the idea and measure of all goodness that is in creatures. (4) Finally, because He is the simply supreme good, towards which, as the ultimate end, whatever is good tends. The Greeks beautifully called God "good" (ἀγαθόν), "good in himself" (αὐταγαθόν), "all-best" (πανάριστον); the Latins, "thrice best"; the Germans, "GOtt," as if "Gut" (Good).

Since, therefore, God is the first and supreme good, it follows: (a) That God is the most communicative of all goods. The communication of divine goodness is either free or necessary. The latter takes place in personal actions. Thus God the Father, by begetting, communicates His whole essence to the Son, John V, 26, and the Father and the Son, by spirating, communicate the same essence in number to the Holy Spirit, John XVI, 14. The former respects creatures, to whom God communicates Himself freely, either through creation, conservation, concurrence, and universal presence, Acts XIV, 17, or through grace, 1 John III, 1, or through glory, 1 Peter V, 10, Rom. VIII, 30, or through the incarnation of the Son, John III, 16. (b) That God is a good to be enjoyed, to whom we adhere in love for His own sake; we do not enjoy the world and other things, but we use them, and we refer their use to God as the ultimate end.

Question XXIX. What is the holiness of God?

The Holiness of God. The holiness of God is a divine attribute by which the most pure and most upright essence of God is devoid of all moral vice. (*)

Proof from the song of the most pious Hannah, 1 Sam. II, 2: "There is none holy as the LORD." No intelligent creature, no angel, no reborn man in the kingdom of grace, no blessed soul in the kingdom of glory, attains that summit of holiness by which the thrice-holy God excels. For (1) God is holy independently and by essence; creatures are holy dependently and by a quality superadded to their essence. (2) Immutably, since the holiness of God cannot fail or undergo change, unlike that of a creature. For with the Father of lights "there is no variation or shadow of turning." James 1, 17. The natural sun rises, sets, and returns, and has its parallaxes (in Greek, παραλλάξεις); but God, the sun of holiness, is unchangeable (in Greek, ἀπαράλλακτος), always the same, superior to every conversion of light and darkness, shining with incommutable holiness. (3) Efficiently, because He is the author of all holiness, 1 Thess. V, 23. (4) Exemplarily, because the holiness of God is the exemplar of all holiness, which the holy sons of God should perpetually behold and imitate. The celestial Father demands this imitation from them, Lev. XI, 44: "I am the LORD your God; you shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and you shall be holy; for I am holy." Cf. Lev. XIX, 2; 1 Peter 1, 16. The holiness of the reborn corresponds to the divine holiness in likeness, not in equality. (5) Objectively, because the holiness of God is to be acknowledged and celebrated by us in a holy manner. The head of our prayers is: "Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name!" The choir of angels sings most sweetly: "Holy, holy, holy is the LORD of hosts!" Is. VI, 3.

Question XXX. What is the infinity of God?

Infinity is a divine attribute by which the essence and perfections of God have no limits.

Proof I. from Ps. CXLV, 3. "Great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised; and of his

(*) If we ask in general: what is holiness? It is the separation of a certain thing, distinct from the rest, with notable pre-eminence and excellence. For such is the force of the words (in Greek, ἀγιάζομαι). See especially Lev. XX, 26; 1 Pet. II, 9; & 2 Corinth. VI, 17. The holiness of God, therefore, considered generally, is the divinity itself and all its properties and perfections, by which the one God is discerned from all things. To it also pertains the necessary will in God, by which He always decrees to act suitably and congruously with all His supreme perfections. Thus Isaiah in c. VI, 3 interprets that the holiness of God is His glory. But the divine glory is all of God's properties and perfections, declared by effects suitable to them. John XVII, 4 & 6. It is also called the divine decorum, in Heb. II, 10. Specifically, however, moral holiness is nothing other than moral goodness, 1 Pet. 1, 15, 16.

greatness there is no searching out." The Vulgate indeed rendered it: "of his greatness there is no end"; but the word (in Hebrew, קָדַח) properly denotes a searching or investigation. The king of prophets extols the greatness of God, and he understands not the greatness of mass, which, since it has matter as its root, does not apply to God, but the greatness of perfection. Therefore, the sense is: All labor is spent in vain that is expended on circumscribing the essence of God and setting limits to the divine perfection. For no one by searching will find an end where the majesty of Jehovah ceases and fails. Therefore, the essence and perfection of God are absolutely infinite, because His greatness is unsearchable.

II. From the independence of God. Whatever essence is independent, it acknowledges no cause by which it can be enclosed within limits. But the divine essence is independent. Therefore.

III. From the absolute perfection of God. Whoever is of such perfection that He is the purest act, excluding all passive potentiality, He does not suffer limits to be placed on His essence and perfection. But God, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians and Arminians, some of whom doubt the infinity of God, while others deny it, to whom Vorstius is added. We will consider their more important arguments.

I. That from which nature abhors, is nowhere to be found. But nature abhors the infinite; Therefore, the infinite is nowhere to be found, and consequently, God is not infinite. Response; Nature abhors an infinite that is such by reason of quantitative extension, not that which is infinite by reason of essence and perfection.

II. Whoever can be seen is not infinite, because he is terminated by sight. But God, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven, because God has often been seen by men in this life, Is. VI, 1; Dan. VII, 13. In the heavenly homeland, we shall see God face to face. 1 Cor. XIII, 12. Response; God was seen by men in this life not in His essence, but in the economy of His manifestation; how we shall see Him in the homeland, the celestial school will teach.

III. Whoever is absolutely infinite is not knowable. God is knowable. Therefore, God is not infinite. The major is proven, because between the knowing faculty and the knowable object there must be a proportion, which does not exist between the infinite and the finite. Response; I distinguish between a mathematical proportion in being and an intentional one in knowing. Although between the finite intellect and the infinite God there is no mathematical proportion in being, there is nevertheless an intentional proportion in knowing, which, although not adequate, is sufficient for us to know the infinite God to the extent that He has manifested Himself to us.

IV. The power of God is not infinite; Therefore, neither is the essence of God. The antecedent is proven because the power of God does not extend to impossibilities. Response; For the infinity of divine power, it is not required that it extend to impossibilities; for it is sufficient that it extends to infinite possibilities. No power is concerned with the impossible, since it respects only the possible.

V. If God is an infinite good, there will be no evil in the nature of things. The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven; because if one of opposites is infinite, it will completely destroy the other opposite, due to its infinity. Response; I deny the consequence. For this only follows, that just as God is infinitely good, so in God there is no evil. For infinite goodness in God excludes all evil from Him.

VI. If God is of infinite perfection, all creatures will be equally perfect. The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven because a creature is said to be more or less perfect according as it is more or less distant from the perfection of God. But if the perfection of God is infinite, all the perfections of creatures will be infinitely distant from it, and therefore equally so. Now, if all the perfections of creatures are equally distant from the perfection of the creator, they will be equal. Response; The perfections of creatures are not only judged by their general distance from the infinite perfection of God, but also by the more or fewer degrees of perfection that each creature has received from God; with respect to these degrees, one creature approaches God more closely than another.

VII. God is "this something." Therefore, He is not actually infinite. The reason for the consequence is that "this something" (in Greek, τὸ τι) is a singular thing, distinguished by a certain peculiar perfection that is not found in others. But whatever is of infinite perfection contains all perfections in itself, and therefore cannot be distinguished from others. Response: It is not contradictory to be "this something" and yet to contain all perfections in oneself. For by His very infinitude, God is distinguished from creatures, and He contains some of their perfections formally, and some eminently, or virtually, in Himself.

VIII. God is defined. Therefore, He is not infinite. The consequence is proven because definition is derived from "finishing" or "bounding," and thus denotes the limits of an essence. Response: The consequence is denied. For a logical definition or description, which is called a "definition of the essence" (in Greek, ὁρισμὸς τῆς ἐσσίας) because it presents the nature of a thing to our mind, is one thing; but a description of an essence made with certain bounds and limits, by which a being is called physically finite, and is opposed to an infinite being, is another. God is indeed described logically, but He is not defined physically.

Question XXXI. What is eternity of God?

The Eternity of God. Eternity is the unending and permanent duration of the divine essence.

Obs. The word "eternity" is polysemous (in Greek, πολυσημος), sustaining different significations. (1) It denotes a temporary duration, not interrupted by the course of many years, which is also called periodic eternity. Thus circumcision is called an eternal covenant, Gen. XVII, 13. (2) The word "eternity" designates a duration that indeed has a beginning, but no end, in which way the life of the blessed and the death of the damned are called eternal; which eternity is not absolute, but restricted and limited. (3) It denotes absolute eternity, i.e., an unending duration, devoid of beginning and end, at once and permanent, or continuous, which excludes all succession whatsoever of present, past, and future. Three things are therefore to be proven: (a) that God is eternal; (b) that of divine eternity there is neither beginning nor end; (c) that absolute eternity excludes all succession or vicissitude of time. (*).

Proof a. (1) Because in scripture God is called "the God of eternity" (in Hebrew, אֱלֹהֵי הָעוֹלָם), Gen. XXI, 33, cf. Is. XL, 28; "the one who inhabits eternity," Is. LVII, 15; "the eternal God" (in Greek, αἰώνιος θεός), Rom. XVI, 26; "the king of the ages, incorruptible" (in Greek, βασιλεὺς τῶν αἰώνων), 1 Tim. 1, 17. (2) Whoever is not eternal, at some time was not. But God was not at some time not. Therefore, God is eternal. The minor is clear; because he who at some time was not, was produced by another. But God was not produced by another, because He is the first and independent being.

Proof b. (1) God is called the first and the last, Is. LXI, 4; the beginning and the end, Rev. XXI, 6; the Alpha and the Omega, Rev. I, 8. The mercy of God is said to endure from everlasting to everlasting. Ps. CIII, 17. (2) That God, from eternity past, is without beginning, Moses teaches in Ps. XC, 2: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God." That He lacks an end, the psalmist asserts in Ps. CII, 28: "Thy years shall have no end."

Proof c. That absolute eternity is permanent, or continuous, is clearly established (1) because eternity, since it is a divine attribute, is in reality God Himself, who does not change, Mal. III, 6; with whom there is no "shadow of turning," James I, 17. Therefore, eternity is not subject to the change of time. (2) A thousand years could not be as one day, Ps. XC, 5; 2 Pet. III, 8, if the eternity of God were successive. (3) The whole duration of God is a perpetual "today," or a "now" (in Greek, νῦν) and a motionless and immutable instant, Ps. II, 7. From this, Boethius, in book V of "The Consolation of Philosophy," section VI, defined eternity as "the whole, simultaneous, and perfect possession of unending life." Eternity is said to be "whole simultaneously," not by reason of parts, which it does not have, but to negate the succession of moments.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, with whom Vorstius agrees on most points, who maintain that: 1) not only is God eternal, but 2) eternity is successive, and therefore consists in a flux of prior and posterior. They rely on the following arguments:

(*) To express the same thing a little more plainly: Eternity, by the usage of sacred language, denotes 1) a long and continuous duration, in such a way that the thing continues for a long time (a) in an uninterrupted series, (b) it remains stable, with no other of the same kind and nature succeeding it; 2) perpetual, without end; 3) infinite, and devoid of all change, in which (a) there is no beginning, (b) likewise no end, (c) also no succession. This must be attributed to God alone, besides whom nothing is infinite.

I. Whoever inhabits eternity has a co-eternal dwelling. But God, etc. Is. LVII, 5. Therefore. I respond with the words of Augustine on Ps. CXXII: "Someone says: Before God made the saints, where did he dwell? God dwelt in himself, he dwelt with himself, and God is with himself."

Instance: God is said to inhabit inaccessible light. 1 Tim. VI, 16. Therefore, some light, surrounding God, was co-eternal with him. Response: Inaccessible light is the incomprehensible majesty of God. But the majesty of God is God Himself. From which God Himself is called light. 1 John I, 5.

II. Whatever is not made is eternal. Time is not made. Therefore, time is eternal. The major is clear; because whatever is not made is uncreated. But an uncreated being is eternal. The minor is proven; because if time were made, the present also would be made. But if the present had been made, it would have been made in the present, and thus there would have been time before time, and a process ad infinitum would occur. Response: Creation, with respect to its term, is a substantial action, and therefore it terminates in the creation of a substance, not of an accident, such as time is. Meanwhile, the present time was co-created with the first body, and began to be with it.

III. All duration has a prior and a posterior, and therefore parts succeeding one another. But eternity is a duration. Therefore. Response: I distinguish between a defective duration, which has parts succeeding one another, and an indefectible one, which, as to the thing itself, is the divine essence itself, devoid of all parts.

IV. Whatever duration is not like a moment is not indivisible into differences of time. But eternity is not like a moment. Therefore. The major is established because only a moment is indivisible into differences of time. Response: I distinguish between a fixed moment and a flowing one, or a standing one and a fluid one. Eternity is conceived as a moment, because it is indivisible, and it is conceived entirely at once as a standing, or fixed moment, because it does not have parts succeeding one another. You might say: whatever lasts for a moment is not constant. Response: Eternity does not last for one moment, but for every moment.

V. Whatever duration contains all the differences of time in itself is not permanent.

But eternity, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven because the eternal God is described as "He who is, and who was, and who is to come" (in Greek, ὁ ὢν, καὶ ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος), Rev. I, 4. Response: 1) Eternity contains all times in itself not formally, by admitting a succession of prior and posterior in itself, but eminently, or by excess; because it is not constituted by times, but exceeds and surpasses them, although it coexists with them. 2) St. John indeed describes the eternal God by the differences of time, in a human-like manner (in Greek, ἀνθρωποπαθῶς), because the Holy Spirit accommodates Himself to the understanding of men, who can scarcely conceive of any duration without parts succeeding one another; but the words of scripture are to be understood in a God-befitting manner (in Greek, θεοπρεπῶς). Cf. Ps. XC, 5; 2 Pet. III, 8. 3) If the differences of time described by John are taken collectively, the continuity, or permanence of the divine duration, is delineated by that scriptural phrase. For whatever being is wholly at once in the present, past, and future, has a continuous duration.

VI. If eternity is all at once, and coexists with all the differences of time, namely the present, past, and future, all these differences of time will coexist with each other, and there will be no distinction of time. The latter is false. Therefore, so is the former. The consequence of the major is proven; because if all of eternity at once coexists with all the differences of time, and these coexist with all of eternity, they surely meet in the point of eternity, and therefore are co-eternal and perpetually coexist. Response: I deny the consequence. For all of eternity coexists with all the differences of time not jointly, but taken separately, or severally, e.g., All of eternity at once coexists with today, and will coexist with tomorrow. But from this, it is not permissible to infer that today and tomorrow coexist. For just as the whole heaven coexisted with Abraham, likewise the whole with Isaac, and also the whole with Jacob, and the whole with their descendants; and yet it does not follow from this that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob coexisted with each other; so it does not follow that because the differences of time meet in the point of eternity, they therefore meet with each other. Certainly, lines meet in the center, and yet they differ on the periphery; the center is at rest, while the lines are successively drawn.

VII. If the eternity of God exists wholly at any moment, everything that does not exist for a moment will be eternal. The consequent is false. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The reason for the consequence is that in this respect it agrees with eternity, that it exists in a moment. Response: I distinguish between that which coexists with eternity adequately and commensurately, and that which coexists inadequately and in a more imperfect manner. Whatever exists in one moment, it coexists with eternity, but inadequately; for the latter exists wholly at once in every moment.

VIII. If in eternity there is no prior or posterior, in the same moment that God created the world, He will destroy it. The latter is absurd. Therefore, so is the former. Response: God created the world not in eternity, but in time, in which there is a flux of prior and posterior.

Instance: When the world was first created, there was no time, but eternity. Response: When the world was being created, time did not pre-exist, but co-existed, since it was co-created with the world, and began to be with the first origin of the world.

IX. The space of time in which the eternal God has endured has passed; and that in which He will endure has not yet come. Therefore, in the eternity of God, there is a prior and a posterior. Response: Those vicissitudes of prior time are in our intellect, which considers eternity according to its coexistence with the differences of time, but they are not in God (in Deo), who is devoid of all vicissitude or change (*).

Question XXXII. What is the immensity of God?

The Immensity of God. Immensity is a divine attribute according to which the essence of God cannot be circumscribed by the limits of places, but is understood to exist everywhere.

Obs. I. God is called immense not locally, because He is not contained by any spaces of places, but illocally, so that He is within all things, but not enclosed, outside all things, but not excluded, as Isidore says in book I, ch. II of his Sentences on the Supreme Good. God is called immense not extensively, as air is most widely extended; not inclusively, as the heavens include sublunary bodies; not commixtively, as in the atmosphere effluvia are mixed with the air; not diffusively,

(*) When it is disputed whether in the eternity of God there is no succession, and indeed cannot be any, and when the followers of Socinus grant us these three postulates: 1) That God had no beginning, nor will He ever have an end; 2) that God is a necessary, infinite being, and, as to His nature, immutable; 3) That reason is utterly opposed to a regression ad infinitum; from these premises, therefore, we produce a threefold proof of our position: 1) Where there is succession, there is a prior and a posterior. Therefore, in a long succession, there cannot but have been at some point a first moment of time. Therefore, what has a succession of duration must have had its beginning at some point. But in God, there was never any beginning (by postulate 1): Therefore, nothing is prior, nothing is posterior. Therefore, no succession befalls God. 2) In every succession, there cannot but be three things: past, present, and future. Therefore, there must have been something that has now ceased to be, and also something is happening that has not yet been. Therefore, there is both decrease and increase, or addition. Therefore, that whose duration is successive never remains as much as it already was, nor as much as it is yet to be. Therefore, it is contingent, finite, and mutable. But God is a necessary, infinite being, and, in His nature, immutable (by postulate 2): Therefore, in God there is no time, no vicissitude of time, therefore no succession. Finally, 3) All succession of time is the continuation of the duration of some finite and determinate thing. And there can be no succession without a continuous progression from one point of time to another. However great the progression from an antecedent point of time to a consequent one, just as great must be the regression from the consequent to the antecedent. Therefore, if there were any succession in that being which never took a beginning, the consequence would be that there would be a certain regression ad infinitum, which all reason opposes (by postulate 3). It is therefore evident that not our opinion, but that of our adversaries, is contrary to the principles of reason, although they trust too much in their reason, i.e., in their own perception. Their "first falsehood" (in Greek, Πρῶτον... ψεῦδος) is that they compare the properties of finite things with the properties of the infinite being, and measure this infinite being by the grasp of the human mind, which is far removed from all reason.

through a diffusion conformable to a body, as the sea is most widely diffused (although it is explained by some theologians through a diffusion of the divine essence conformable to spirit. See Osiander in his Systematic Collection, part 1, p. 329), but through an unending ubiety.

Obs. II. The immediate consequence of divine immensity is the power to be present illocally in all "wheres" whatsoever, which belongs to God as an essential attribute from eternity. The remote consequence, however, is actual omnipresence, by which God is actually present to all creatures.

Obs. III. Divine immensity and the power to be present (which is also called the majesty of omnipresence) differ: 1) As antecedent and consequent. 2) The immensity of God is a negative attribute, the majesty of omnipresence is an affirmative attribute. 3) Immensity is an inactive (in Greek, ἀνεργητικόν) attribute, the majesty of omnipresence is an active (in Greek, ἐνεργητικόν) attribute. 4) Immensity, according to our mode of conceiving, flows from the spirituality and infinity of God; the power to be everywhere present emanates from the immensity and omnipotence of God.

Obs. IV. Divine immensity and actual omnipresence differ. 1) Immensity is a divine attribute; actual omnipresence is the effect of certain divine attributes (Immensity, the power of being present, omnipotence, and the most free will of God). 2) Immensity is an absolute property; omnipresence, however, involves a respect to creatures, to whom God is present. 3) Immensity formally implies no operation; omnipresence, however, is always operative. 4) Immensity is eternal; actual omnipresence began at that time when heaven and earth were first created. 5) Immensity is one; but of omnipresence there are several degrees and modes. 6) Immensity is absolutely necessary; omnipresence is free, and necessary only on the hypothesis, that is, once creatures are posited, to each of which God is present as long as He wills. For if God were to command creatures to return to nothingness, He would not be present to them. 7) Omnipresence is restricted to creatures that are contained within the complex of this world; immensity extends beyond the world, beyond the highest heaven, and into infinity. Cf. D. Calov., System, vol. 2, p. 613.

Proof. The immensity of God is proven 1) from the royal utterance of Solomon, 1 Kings VIII, 27: "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded!" From this, we argue; He whom neither the earth nor the heaven of heavens contains is absolutely immense. But God, etc. Therefore. The major premise is clear, because in the phraseology of scripture, "earth and heaven," whenever they are joined, designate the entire fabric of the world. Whatever truly exists and is not contained by the fabric of the world, but exceeds the ambit of heaven, is absolutely immense.

Vorstius objects: 1) This saying does not validly confirm the immensity of God, because King Solomon asks: "Will God indeed dwell on the earth?" This question has the force of a negation, and so Solomon denies that God dwells on the earth. But if God does not dwell on the earth, He is not everywhere, and if He is not everywhere, He is not absolutely immense. 2) The word (in Hebrew, יִכְלֹלֶה) does not mean "contain or comprehend," but "will sustain." Luther himself rendered it in German as "provide for" (versorgen), and so not immensity, but the all-sufficiency, or beatitude of God, is expressed by that word. Response to I: God does not dwell on the earth locally, so as to be comprehended by it. To II: The primary signification of the root (in Hebrew, כּוּל) is "to contain" or "to comprehend." Cf. 1 Kings VII, 26, which meaning the same word retains here, since it is clear from the antecedents and consequents that the discourse is about the indwelling or habitation of God. Therefore, the wisest of kings meant to indicate that not even the vast structure of the world is equal to containing God.

2. From the spirituality and infinity of God. No infinite spirit can be defined by the limits of places, or of any "where." But God is a spirit, John IV, 24, and infinite, Ps. CXLV, 3. The major premise is proven, because 1) only a quantitative body, but no spirit, neither created nor uncreated, is circumscribed by the limits of places. 2) Created spirits are in a determinable "where," and are thus defined due to the finitude of their essence. But since the spiritual essence of God is infinite and unending, His ubiety is also unending; for it is the same as the divine essence in reality.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, some of whom utterly deny the immensity of God, while others doubt it. Since their arguments are so composed that they properly and directly attack divine omnipresence, we will consider them below, where we are to deal with the presence of God.

Question XXXIII. What is the immutability of God?

The Immutability of God. Immutability is an attribute of God by which He is subject to no change, neither physical (a), nor moral (b).

Obs. I. Physical change, according to Aristotle, is fourfold: a) It occurs according to substance, such as generation, which is from non-being to being, and corruption, which is from being to non-being. b) According to quantity, such as augmentation, by which a body is made larger, and diminution, by which it is made smaller. c) According to quality, such as alteration, by which a quality is introduced and corrupted, e.g., cooling. d) According to place, such as local motion.

Obs. II. Moral change is that by which the will is changed in executing, omitting, or inverting its decrees.

Proof a. God is not changed physically, as to substance, because He is from Himself, and cannot be destroyed by another. "Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end," says the psalmist in Ps. CII, 28. Nor as to quantity, of which matter is the root. But God is a spirit devoid of all matter, John IV, 24. Nor as to quality; for this, since it is an accident, does not apply to the most perfect God. St. James aptly says in c. 1, 17: "With the Father of lights, there is no variation, or shadow of turning." Nor as to local motion; because the immense God is not included within the limits of places, but fills heaven and earth with His presence, Jer. XXIII, 24.

Proof b. God is not changed morally; because a change of will proceeds either from inconstancy, or from ignorance, or from an inability to act. But from the most perfect God, all inconstancy is very far removed; from the omniscient, all ignorance; from the omnipotent, all inability to act. Therefore, the purpose of the divine will remains ratified, fixed, and invariable: "I am the LORD, I change not," says the most true God. Mal. III, 6.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who assert the mutability of the divine will, relying on the following arguments.

I. He who repents of a deed is changed. But God repents of a deed. Therefore. The major is established, because in repentance a prior decree of the will is retracted. The minor is proven from Gen. VI, 6; 1 Sam. XV, 11. Response: Repentance is not spoken of God properly, inasmuch as it is a grief of mind over deeds committed from a defect of knowledge or power, but in a human-like manner (in Greek, ἀνθρωποπαθῶς), improperly and with respect to us; because repentance, attributed to God, designates either the denunciation and execution of divine judgment, which befalls the impious, or the declaration of mercy towards converted sinners. Therefore, the change occurs not in God, but in the objects, namely in creatures placed outside of God, in sinners converted or not converted.

Instance: God retracts a decree of His will, Jonah III, 10. Therefore, repentance is spoken of God not in a human-like manner (in Greek, ἀνθρωποπαθῶς), figuratively or improperly, but truly and properly. Response: God does not retract or revoke a decree of His will, but establishes and confirms it. The reason is: because the sentence of the decree is conditioned, not absolute, although the external form, or the mode in which the decree is conceived, may seem absolute at first glance. God is therefore said to be moved by repentance when He does not execute a conditioned threat or promise, because the annexed condition has not been fulfilled.

II. Every free will is mutable. The will of God is free. Therefore. The major is proven, because a free will is capable of turning to opposites. Response: I deny the major. For freedom is one thing, mutability another. The former is opposed to necessity, the latter to constancy. The former is a perfection, the latter an imperfection, since it argues for inconstancy of the will. The will of God is called free, not because it is capable of turning to opposites, but because it freely terminates upon objects.

III. God can either suspend a free act, or He cannot. If the former, then that act will be mutable. If the latter, God will be a being acting not freely, but necessarily. The consequence of the major is proven, because between contradictories there is no third option. The first member is proven, because when a certain act is suspended and later performed, there is some delay, according to which it can be said that that act is not. The latter member is proven, because whatever act cannot be suspended is necessary. Response: It is falsely supposed that one act is elicited in God after another, because in God, with respect to time, there is no prior or posterior. That an act is suspended is done with a connotation to a creature, and therefore can only be admitted of an extrinsic act. But an intrinsic act of God is neither suspended nor can be suspended, and so immutability remains in the divine acts, insofar as they are identified with the divine essence.

IV. God, in justifying a sinner, from being wrathful becomes propitious. Therefore, He is changed. Response: God in Himself is not changed by justifying a penitent sinner, but the change is in the objects and effects; just as the sun remains the same, although to a healthy eye it is pleasant, to a sore eye it is harsh and troublesome.

V. Whoever becomes a creator from being a non-creator is changed. But God became a creator from being a non-creator. Therefore, God has been changed. The major is proven, because change occurs between an act and its negation. Response: I deny the major, because all change occurs in the creature, not in the creator. Therefore, creation is spoken of God by an extrinsic denomination; for although it is from the Creator, it is not in the Creator, but terminates in creatures.

VI. Whoever has intrinsically united a creature to himself has been changed. But the Son of God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, because to be changed is the same as to be otherwise. The minor is established, because "the Word without flesh" (in Greek, ὁ λόγος ἄσαρκος), through the incarnation, intrinsically united human nature to Himself, so that He became "enfleshed" (in Greek, ἐνσαρκος). Response: Whoever has intrinsically united a creature to himself in the manner of a subject passively receiving it, is changed. With the major premise thus limited, the minor is denied. "The Word" (in Greek, ὁ λόγος) did not unite human nature to Himself as a passive subject, but only terminates it, not indeed by a mere sustentation, but by the infinite communication of His hypostasis. He who terminates a thing is not changed, but he who suffers.

Question XXXIV. What is the immortality of God?

Immortality is a divine attribute by which it is simply repugnant for God to die.

Proof. from 1 Tim. VI, 16: "God alone has immortality." God alone is called immortal, because 1) not by the will or grace of another, but by His own nature, devoid of all corruption, He is immortal. Enoch and Elijah did not die, by the special grace of God, although otherwise by the force of their nature they were mortal. 2) God alone is immortal independently and by essence; angels and our souls are immortal dependently and by participation, since they refer their immortality as received from God.

Question XXXV. What is the incomprehensibility of God?

Incomprehensibility is a divine attribute by which the essence of God cannot be adequately known by any creature.

Proof. 1) From the testimony of scripture, Ps. CXLV, 3: "Great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised; and his greatness is unsearchable." Since the greatness of God is unsearchable, we conclude that His essence is incomprehensible. 2) From the light of reason. For comprehensive knowledge, so exact a proportion is required between the knowing faculty and the knowable object, that there is as much perfection in the knowing intellect as there is in the knowable object. But there is no proportion between a finite intellect and the infinite God, since the intellect of creatures (angels, men) is infinitely surpassed by the perfection of God.

You might say: The blessed are called "comprehenders," Phil. III, 12. Therefore, their "knowledge of God" (in Greek, θεογνωσία) is comprehensive. Cf. König, Theol. Positiv., p. 3. Response: The intuitive knowledge of God by the blessed is also called comprehensive, taking this word in a broader sense. See above p. 6, qu. 5, prol. I.

Question XXXVI. What is the invisibility of God?

Invisibility is a divine attribute according to which the divine essence cannot be seen by the natural faculty of corporeal eyes.

Proof. From the celestial oracle, Exod. XXXIII, 20: "Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me, and live." v. 23: "thou shalt see my back parts." With these words, God openly declares that His essence and majesty (which is indicated by the name "face") cannot be discerned by corporeal eyes. The reason added indicates that man, as long as he is in this life, which is subject to material changes, cannot gaze upon the essence of God. But whether in the celestial life we shall see the divine essence with glorified bodily eyes, we neither stubbornly deny nor assert as apodictic, but we think it should rather be reserved for future experience. Meanwhile, we see "his back parts," as the works and benefits of God are daily before our eyes.

You might say: God has often been seen, Exod. XXXIV, 5; Is. VI, 1. Response: With Augustine, ep. XI: God was seen by the fathers through the assumed disposition of some visible matter, with His own invisibility remaining intact.

Question XXXVII. What is the beatitude of God?

Beatitude is a divine attribute by which God is not only free from all evils, but also most cumulatively abounds in all goods, and is most fully sufficient for Himself.

Proof. St. Paul calls God "blessed" (in Greek, μακάριον), 1 Tim. I, 11; c. VI, 15. The beatitude of God consists 1) in the absence of all evils, 2) in the affluence of all goods, 3) in the most pleasant sense of Himself. From these results the communication of beatitude, which God pours out copiously upon the faithful. For God is indeed both essential beatitude itself, and the fount and source of all beatitude.

Question XXXVIII. What is the majesty of God?

The Majesty of God. The majesty of God is a divine attribute from which God is not only called glorious, but also religious worship is due to Him alone.

Proof. On account of His most eminent majesty, He is called by St. Stephen the "God of glory," Acts VII, 2; by the royal prophet, the "most high," Ps. VII, 17; by Moses, a "great and terrible God," Deut. VII, 21; of whose glory the whole earth is full, Is. VI, 3. God is therefore glorious, not only because of the benefits with which He heaps upon us, but also because of the incomparable perfection of the divine nature, wisdom, power, and goodness. For sound reason dictates that honor is due to each according to the excellence of his nature. God is glorious, not only on account of His very great glory, but also His incommunicable glory. "My glory I will not give to another," says Jehovah, Is. XLII, 8.

CONCERNING THE OPERATIVE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES, WHICH INDICATE BOTH THE ORIGIN OF ACTING AND THE MANNER OF ACTING.

Obs. According to our way of conceiving, the life of God is the principle indicating the origin of acting; the other divine attributes, which refer to "activity" (in Greek, ἐνέργειαν), designate the divine manner of acting.

Question XXXIX. What is the life of God?

The Life of God. Life is a property essential to God, by which the essence of God always demonstrates itself to be active.

Obs. I. God lives not a vegetative life, like plants; nor a sensitive one, like brute animals; but an intellectual life, and that not an imperfect one, like men on their journey, nor a finite one, like angels, but an infinite and most perfect one.

Obs. II. The intellectual life of God is viewed either in the first act or in the second act. In the first act, it is the intellect and will itself; in the second act, it is intellection and volition, which, however, in God are not actions really produced, but are only conceived in the manner of actions.

The life of God is proven because 1) in Holy Scripture God is called "living," Jer. X, 10: "the Lord God is truth, he is the living God." 2) God is said to swear by His life, Ezek. XXXIII, 11. 3) God is called life itself, John XIV, 6. And "eternal life," 1 John V, 20. 4) God is the "fountain of life," Ps. XXXVI, 9. Acts XVII, 28.

Question XL. What is the intellect of God?

The Intellect of God. The intellect of God is the very essence of God, inasmuch as it is conceived by us in the manner of an intellectual power.

Obs. I. The intellect of God is said to be the divine essence itself; for just as God is a most simple being, and is not composed of a plurality, so His intellect does not really differ from His essence.

Obs. II. In intelligent creatures, intellect and intellection differ in reality as power and action. In God, intellect and intellection are distinguished not in reality, but from the perspective of our concept; For we conceive the intellect of God as the first act, and the intellection or cognition of God as the second act.

Question XLI. What is the omniscience of God?

The divine intellect is proven from the divine omniscience and omni-sapience.

The Omniscience of God. Omniscience is an active (in Greek, ἐνεργητικὸν) divine attribute, by which God knows all things that are, were, will be, or can be in any way, by one simple act, immediately and most perfectly.

Proof. I. Because Jehovah is the "God of knowledge," 1 Sam. II, 3, that is, possessing all knowledge. God knows all things, 1 John III, 20. "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do." Heb. IV, 13.

II. God alone "knows the hearts of all the children of men," 1 Kings VIII, 39. He "tries the hearts and reins," Ps. VII, 9. Hence he is called the "knower of hearts" (in Greek, καρδιογνώστης), Acts XV, 8.

III. That God knows even future contingent events is proven (1) from the royal utterance of David; Ps. CXXXIX, 2: "Thou understandest my thought afar off," i.e., before it arises in my heart. (2) Because by this very fact the true God is distinguished from idols, that He foreknows and foretells even future contingent events, Is. XLI, 22-23: "'Produce your cause,' saith the LORD; 'bring forth your strong reasons,' saith the King of Jacob. 'Let them bring them forth, and shew us what shall happen; let them shew the former things, what they be, that we may consider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things for to come. Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods.'" From this divine utterance, we learn that he is not the true God who neither foreknows nor foretells future contingent events. (3) The same is confirmed by very many examples. The repentance of the Tyrians and Sidonians, as well as the betrayal of David, were only futuribles; yet God did not ignore them, Matt. XI, 21; 1 Sam. XXIII, 12. God predicted many future contingent events determinately, even evil ones, which He Himself was not to effect, but at least to permit, e.g., the hardening of Pharaoh, Exod. III, 19; the betrayal by Judas, Ps. XLI, 9; John XIII, 18; the Passion of Christ, Ps. XXII; Is. LIII; the fall of Peter, Matt. XXVI, 34; the impiety of men at the end of the world, Luke XXI, 20 ff.; the advent and duration of the Anti-Christ, 2 Thess. II, 7.

Obs. I. The primary object of divine science is God Himself, who adequately, and therefore comprehensively, knows His own essence, His perfections, hypostases, actions, 1 Cor. II, 10. The secondary object is all things that are, were, or can be in any way outside of God, whether they be good or evil.

Obs. II. With respect to its mode, the science of God is (1) continuous and eternal, not successive or variable; because God knows all things by one simple intuition; for He does not discourse or reason by collecting the unknown from the known, since to God all things are most known, Heb. IV, 13. (2) Immediate, because God does not need intelligible species. We humans understand through species, or images, which, abstracted from things perceived by sense, are impressed upon the mind, like seals on wax. God does not understand through such species, because He is a most simple being without any passive potentiality; therefore, He cannot receive images as something passive, and have a science originating from an extrinsic principle. We need intelligible species to unite and approximate an absent object to the knowing intellect; but to God, all things are most present; wherefore He does not need representative species.

Obs. III. The science of God is distinguished (1) into general and special. The general extends to all things, and the causes of things, even to sins. By special science are known only the elect. For God has known from eternity who will finally believe in Christ, and whom He has chosen for life. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate," Rom. VIII, 29. (2) The science of God is distinguished into simple, approbative, and permissive science. Simple science, or that of mere knowledge, is that by which God knows all things speculatively. Approbative science is that by which He knows good things; permissive, that by which He knows evil things. (3) The science of God is distinguished into natural, free, and middle. Natural science, which is also called the science of simple intelligence, is that by which God knows possible things as they are possible. The free science of God, which is also called the science of vision, is that by which God knows all things that are, were, or will absolutely be future, whether they be necessary or contingent. Middle science is said to be that by which God knows those things which are future under a condition, i.e., which are not absolutely future, but would be future if this or that condition were fulfilled, although due to the lack of that condition they often do not happen. To understand this distinction, which is most used in the schools, more solidly, a knowledge of the terms is necessary. Namely, it is called natural science because it is necessary; for "natural" here is opposed to "free." For just as possible things are necessarily such, so the science of God, by which He knows things as possible, is necessary or natural, so that God cannot not know possible things as they are possible. It is also called the science of simple intelligence because it precedes every decree of the divine will. It is also called abstractive science, because it is as if abstracted from created things. But the science of God by which He knows what is, was, and will absolutely be future, is called free, because with respect to creatures it is not absolutely necessary, but only from the positing of a present or future object. It is also called the science of vision, or intuitive, because God beholds the equal existence of things. But middle science, by which God knows things that are future conditionally, is distinguished by the formal reason of its object from the natural and free science of God; for the former knows possibilities, the latter knows absolute futures, while middle science knows futures under a condition; from which, by the same reason of its object, it is called hypothetical, or conditioned.

With these premises, we prove the middle science of God with the following argument. Besides possible things and absolutely future things, God also knows those things which are future under a condition. Therefore, in God, besides natural and free science, there is also a middle, or conditioned, science. The reason for the consequence is that middle science is distinguished from the natural and free science of God by a peculiar formal object. The antecedent is proven from certain examples, taken from sacred scripture. (1) From 1 Sam. XXIII, 9 sqq., where David consulted the Lord, whether, if he remained in the city of Keilah, Saul would come; and if Saul besieged the city, whether the men of Keilah would deliver him up. To both, the Lord answered: "Saul will come down," and "they will deliver thee up." But when David fled from that city, neither did Saul come down, nor did the men of Keilah deliver David up. Therefore, God predicted, and thus foreknew, that which was not absolutely future, but future on a hypothesis. (2) From Matt. XI, 21. Where the Savior says: "If the mighty works, which were done in you (Chorazin), had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes." Christ, as the true God, foreknew the future repentance of the Sidonians and Tyrians under a condition, namely, if such stupendous miracles had come to their senses. (3) Without the presupposition of God's middle science, election by foreknowledge of faith cannot be conveniently explained, since God wills men to be saved not absolutely, but under the condition of persevering faith.

The antithesis is (1) of the Socinians, who deny that God knows future contingent events with certainty. (2) Of certain theologians from the Reformed and our own, who deny the middle science of God. The arguments of the Socinians are:

(1) Whoever knows things as they are, does not have certain science of contingent things. But God, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established; because true cognition is analogous to its object. From this it follows that no certain and determinate knowledge corresponds to a contingently future thing. Response: Future contingents can be viewed in two ways: (1) insofar as they can be produced by their cause, and not be produced, be, and not be, in which respect they are called contingent; (2) insofar as they will certainly be produced by their cause, which will freely determine itself to production; in which sense they are called future. Future contingents are presented to be known by the eternal infinite science of God, according as they are determinately to exist, or not to exist, through their free causes.

Instance: Future contingents do not exist from eternity. Therefore, they could not have been known by God from eternity. Response: Future contingents do not exist from eternity with respect to their real, or actual, being; they do exist from eternity, however, with respect to their objective, or intelligible, being with respect to the divine intellect. For the determinate truth of future contingents, it is not required that the contingents themselves exist actually and in reality; for then they would not be future, but present; nor that their causes actually be in the nature of things; but it is sufficient that they themselves, together with their causes, were so objects to the infinite science of God from eternity, that in time they were determinately to exist through their causes.

(2) That which, if posited, removes the contingency of things or the freedom of human will, is not to be affirmed of God. But if the determinate science of future contingents is posited, all contingency of things and freedom of human will is removed. Therefore. The minor is proven; because if God foreknows all things infallibly, all things will happen necessarily; if they were to happen otherwise, the science of God would be deceived. Response: The prescience of God does not impose upon things a necessity of existing, because it is not the cause of things, neither proximate nor remote. Not proximate; because otherwise all foreknown things would be necessary, and sin itself would have God as its author. Not remote; for things are not future because God foreknows them; but because they are future, it cannot be but that God foreknows them. The effect of divine prescience is not that a thing should happen thus, but to see that it happens thus. Therefore, just as a physician does not impose a necessity of dying upon a patient whom he foresees will shortly die, so God, foreseeing future contingents, does not impose upon them a necessity of existing. We distinguish, meanwhile, between the necessity of the consequent and the necessity of the consequence, or absolute and hypothetical necessity. Because God has infallibly foreknown future contingents, they are not necessarily future with the necessity of the consequent and absolute necessity, which cannot coexist with the contingency of things; although they are necessarily future with the necessity of the consequence and hypothetical necessity, which does not take away the contingency of things and freedom; just as Sempronius runs freely, even if it is necessary for him to run, given that you see him running and your sight does not deceive you.

(3) If a determinate knowledge of future contingents in God is admitted, many places of sacred scripture can neither be solidly understood nor rightly explained; such as (a) Gen. VI, 6, where Moses asserts that "it repented the LORD that he had made man." Therefore, He did not foresee the future impiety of men. (b) Gen. XXII, 12; "Now I know that thou fearest God." Therefore, it seems God did not fully know the piety of Abraham before. (c) Num. XIV, 23, where God says that He had sworn that He would bring the Israelites into the land of Canaan, and yet because of their sins He would not do it. But no one swears he will do something which he foreknows he will not do. (d) Gen. XVIII, 21, where God says: "I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me." Therefore, God did not foreknow that cry. Response to (a): When repentance is attributed to men, it implies two things; first, an internal motion of the soul, or grief; second, a decree to destroy what has been done, or not to commit it again. Repentance is attributed to God not with respect to the former, because due to His immutability, no grief, no mode of the soul, befalls God. Therefore, repentance applies to God with respect to the latter, namely, with respect to the decree to destroy what has been done. Such a decree does not take away prescience. For nothing prevents someone from having foreknown something which he has decreed to destroy. To (b): The science of God is considered in a twofold way: now as knowledge of the future, now as proof of a fact. In the former way, God has known all things from eternity, Acts XV, 18. In the latter way, God approves certain facts, and clearly declares them to be proven to Him. God says to Abraham: "Now I know," i.e., now that you were willing to sacrifice your son, I have known from the greatest sign and experiment of piety, and have proven, that you fear the Lord. Moreover, the piety of Abraham was already most known to God before. See Gen. XVIII, 19. To (c): The promise concerning the bringing of the Israelites into the land of Canaan was not absolute, but conditioned, if they would render obedience to the divine commandments. But God never promised or swore to bring the disobedient into the land of Canaan. To (d): When the Lord is said to have gone down to know, this is said figuratively and in a human-like manner (in Greek, ἀνθρωποπαθῶς), to be explained judicially and exemplarily, after the example of judges, whom it behooves to know first, before they decree. Cf. Dannhauer, Hodos p. 223.

Middle knowledge of God is attacked by the following arguments.

I. If the science of God is adequately and sufficiently distinguished into natural and free science, no necessity urges us to establish a third science of God, which may be called middle. But the former is true. Therefore, so is the latter. The antecedent is proven; because just as between being and non-being, no middle is given, so between the natural and free science of God, no middle science intercedes. For the object of the natural science of God is every possible thing, under which is also comprehended non-being, i.e., what does not actually exist. The object of the free science of God is every being actually existing in some difference of time. Wherefore no residual object remains to be known by a middle science of God. Response; by denying that the distinction of divine science into natural and free is adequate. For the former is concerned with possibles, as such, while the latter is concerned with absolute futures. What remain are futures that are conditionally such. Therefore, it is rightly called middle science, because its object lies between things viewed precisely under the aspect of possibility, and things absolutely future.

Instance 1: The conditions appended to the middle science of God are either future or not future. If they are not future, they pertain to the object of the natural science of God. For this embraces all possibilities, even those that will never be future. If they are future, they pertain to the object of the divine free science; for this considers all things that are, were, and will be. Response: The conditions appended to the middle science of God are neither absolutely future, nor simply not future, but are indifferent to future existence and non-existence. For sometimes they are fulfilled, sometimes they fail. The reason is that they have a connection with the effect that is not necessary, but contingent, and therefore they can be and not be.

Instance 2: Conditionally future things, when the condition is lacking, remain in the sphere of possibilities, and are therefore known by God with the science of simple intelligence. Response: There is no small difference between possibilities and conditionally future things, as is evident even from the future betrayal of David under this condition, if he remained in the city of Keilah, 1 Sam. XXIII. Indeed, the words of the Lord mean more when He said: "Saul will come down, and they will deliver you," than if He had said: "It is possible that Saul will come, and the Keilites will deliver you to him." The betrayal of David was then (so to speak) futurible, not merely possible. For Saul had taken counsel to surprise the unsuspecting David; the Keilites by prior deliberation had conspired for the betrayal of David; God had decreed to permit the betrayal and oppression of David, if he tarried in the city of Keilah. But about possibilities that will never exist, neither does God form a decree, nor do prudent men consult. Therefore, although conditionally future things, which are never brought into act, agree with possibilities materially and in part, they do not agree formally and in all respects.

II. The science that is called middle is conditioned. But no science of God is conditioned. Therefore, no science of God is middle. The major premise is clear, because by accepted usage of speech, middle science is called conditioned. See Hildebrand's Institutes of Theology, p. 105. The minor is proven, because God knows all things absolutely. For just as He knows successive things without succession in His cognition, so also He knows conditioned things without a condition that affects the divine intellect. Response: The middle science of God is called conditioned not subjectively, as if God knows something conditionally, but it is conditioned objectively, because it is the science of conditioned futures.

III. Whatever science rests on a predetermining decree is not to be affirmed of God. But middle science, etc. Therefore. The major is proven, because a predetermining decree overthrows the freedom of the human will. The minor is established, because God by middle science foreknows those things which are future under a condition. But since that condition has a contingent connection with the effect, it can be and not be. Therefore, in order to be fulfilled, it must be predetermined by an efficacious decree of God. Response: The middle science of God does not rest on a predetermining decree, but is conjoined with a hypothetical decree of God, which, since it is not irresistible, does not predetermine causes that are free in their acting.

IV. Whatever is foreknown by God is known by Him determinately. But things future under a condition are not known determinately. Therefore. The minor is proven, because conditionally future things are not of determinate truth, but are indifferent to future existence and non-existence. Response: I deny the minor. To the proof, we say that conditionally future things, just like future contingents, are considered in two ways: (1) insofar as their cause is indifferently related to either of the opposites, namely, to the fulfillment and non-fulfillment of the condition. (2) Insofar as their cause is about to determine itself to one of the opposites. God foreknows to which side the human will is going to incline and determine itself. The response of D. Calovius pertains to this: The object of middle science is indeed indifferent, but not as an object or formally, but only materially. For what is objected to divine science is certain and determinate, since the science of God is not doubtful and indeterminate. Cf. D. Calov., vol. II, System, p. 523, and Synopsis Contr., p. 107.

Question XLII. What is the wisdom of God?

The Wisdom of God. Wisdom is an active (in Greek, ἐνεργητικὸν) divine attribute, by which God, with the highest counsel, has created all things, preserves them, disposes them, and ordains them to certain ends, so that the divine glory may be illustrated and the salvation of men promoted.

Obs. The wisdom of God, although in reality it is the same as the science of God, nevertheless implies more than science. For besides science, it also implies the most exquisite counsel of God and the admirable disposition of all things, says D. Friedemann Bechmann in his Institutes of Theology, p. 120. Cf. D. Baier's Compendium of Theology, p. 212. (*)

Proof I. From the sacred letters. St. Paul in 1 Tim. I, 17 calls God alone wise. God alone is wise by essence, from Himself, immutably, and most perfectly. The Apostle marvels at the abyss of divine wisdom in Rom. XI, 33. The wisdom of God shines forth especially from the work of redemption, in which God, "great in counsel," Jer. XXXII, 19, devised an admirable tempering of justice and mercy, so that the wisdom of God, hidden for ages, is to be most highly praised. 1 Cor. II, 7.

II. The wisdom of God becomes known from the light of nature (a) by way of causality, to those contemplating the most ordered system of the world. From which the most pious of kings sings: "How manifold are thy works, O LORD! In wisdom hast thou made them all." Ps. CIV, 24. (b) By way of eminence. Angels and men are wise; God is all-wise and wisdom itself.

Question XLIII. What is the will of God?

The Will of God. The will of God is the divine essence itself, inasmuch as it is conceived in the manner of a power desiring the good known by the intellect, and turning away from evil.

Obs. 1. Will is spoken of in three ways: (a) it denotes "the willing faculty" (in Greek, τὸ θελητικὸν). It is so used in Eph. I, 11: "God worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." (b) "the act of willing" or volition (in Greek, τὴν θέλησιν), which the psalmist expresses in Ps. CXV, 3: "Our God is in the heavens; he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased." (c) "the object willed" (in Greek, τὸ θελητὸν). Paul takes it thus in 1 Thess. IV, 3: "For this is the will of God, even your (*) Hebrew חכמה (wisdom) and תבונה (understanding), just as Greek γνῶσις (knowledge) and σοφία (wisdom), are predicated distinctly, Job XII, 13; Rom. XI, 33. Knowledge (γνῶσις) is the cognition by which the mind perceives the nature and properties of things. Wisdom (σοφία) is that cognition which is concerned with ends and means, in discerning between good and evil, and in comparing and judging the degrees of each. For wisdom, to which not only foolishness and rashness, but also cunning is opposed, five acts of the mind are required: 1) that ends be established, and if several pertain to the matter, all of them, tightly coupled, be placed in a just order; 2) that they be weighed by judgment, whether and to what extent these ends are good; 3) that means be found and also a selection made, and that a right use of the chosen means be finally applied; 4) that they be good and just; 5) that they be sufficiently apt for obtaining the end. God is altogether powerful in wisdom, and indeed that which is (a) most perfect, without any defect, (b) most certain, without any danger of error, (c) immense and infinite, without succession of thoughts, deliberation, reasoning, which is the condition of a finite intellect, (d) most free, without necessity of means, which man indeed never lacks, since God is always able, if He wills, to conduct and perfect His business without employing any means. This supreme wisdom, which is in God, presents itself for our contemplation, 1) in the constitution of ends, with an admirable order, conjunction, and continuous succession of many things interconnected; 2) in the choice of means (just as these two differ, "thoughts of purpose" (in Hebrew, מחשבות), and "selected ways" (in Hebrew, דרכי, דרכי), most rightly accommodated to those ends, Is. LV, 8, add Gen. I, 20, Jer. XXIX, 11. The same is the difference of the words, "counsels" (in Greek, βουλήματα), and "ways" (in Greek, ὁδοί), Rom. XI, 33); 3) in the goodness of the ends, always "for good" (in Greek, εἰς ἀγαθόν), Rom. VIII, 28; 4) in the goodness, nay, and excellence of the means, from which the "wisdom of the Lord" (in Hebrew, חכמה) shines forth everywhere, Ps. CXXXVI, 5 ff.; 5) from the suitability of the means, congruent with the purpose, always both effective and sufficient, both in the kingdom of nature, Ps. CIV, 24, and in the kingdom of grace, 1 Corinth. I, 20-24.

sanctification." The last signification does not pertain here; the first two are of this place.

Obs. 2. The essence of God, His will, and the act of willing, or volition, do not differ in God really, but only formally, or according to our mode of conceiving. For God does not will anything by a faculty superadded to the divine essence, or by an act really produced; for these are accidents, most alien to the perfection and simplicity of God; but by His own essence. The will of God is therefore the divine essence, conceived with a connotation of inclination towards the good.

Obs. 3. The object of the divine will is only the good, and that not apparently (in Greek, Φαινομένως), but truly (in Greek, ἀληθῶς); because God does not will evil, nor can He will it, being supremely good. Ps. V, 4. The good, however, about which the will of God is concerned, is either the supreme good, which is God Himself, or a derived good, which are created things. From which it follows that God Himself is the primary object of His will, and creatures the secondary object. God wills Himself primarily, as the ultimate end, and all other things for His own sake. Prov. XVI, 4. (*).

The Distinction of the Divine Will He desires and loves His own essence and goodness, not with an appetite of desire, which is an affection for having that which is not yet present, but with an appetite of complacency, which denotes acquiescence in the good that is possessed.

Proof. The will of God is proven (1) from the testimonies of scripture, adduced above in obs. I. (2) From the light of reason. For the will follows the intellect, since these two faculties never exist separately. In man, the will is a perfection by which he excels the brutes; therefore, the will is in God in a most eminent manner. God created creatures freely; but freedom is an attribute of the will.

Question XLIV. How is the will of God distinguished?

The will of God is distinguished (a) into natural and free. The former is that by which God, by nature, so wills and loves Himself as the supreme good, that He cannot not will and love Himself. The latter is that by which God wills all things outside Himself in such a way that He can not will them. (b) Into secret and revealed. The former is that by which God wills many things which, because it is not necessary for us to know them, He has not willed to reveal. The latter is that by which He has willed to set forth candidly in His word those things which make for our salvation. (c) Into absolute and conditioned. The former is that by which God wills something without a condition. The latter is that by which God wills something under a certain condition. (d) Into absolute and ordained. The former is that by which God wills something to be effected by His absolute power, i.e., not tied to secondary causes. The latter is that by which God wills something to be effected by His ordained power, tied to secondary causes and a certain order of means instituted by Himself. (e) Into antecedent and consequent. The former is that by which God wills something without consideration of a cause or condition foreseen on the part of creatures. The latter is that by which God wills something with consideration of a condition which He Himself requires on the part of creatures. (f) The distinction of the divine will into the will of the sign and of good pleasure also occurs. The former is when God shows by a certain sign that He wills or does not will something. The latter is the internal act of the will, by which God wills the good and is averse to evil.

Proof a. God wills and loves Himself necessarily, because in Him every reason for good appears, without any defect. When the will loves something in such a way that it can not love it, or even regard it with hatred, this happens because either some evil or some imperfection is proposed to the will in that object, on account of which the will ceases from love and is moved to the opposite act, namely hatred. But in God no evil, no imperfection can be found, and so no cause can be given why God should not love Himself, or should wish or be able to regard Himself with hatred. God, however, wills creatures freely, so that He can also not will them. For He does not need the company of

(*) In this particular passage, both from the grammatical reason of the word למענו (lema'anhu / for his sake), and from the coherence of the words, we are taught that this is the meaning: God brings it about that all things, aptly connected, correspond best to himself, even the unhappy day prepared for the wicked man. But there are other things that pertain to this, namely supporting sayings of this kind, which testify that God turns and directs all universal things to his own glory, e.g. Ps. 19:2, 9:17, 11:36, Col. 1:16.

creatures, since He is most self-sufficient (in Greek, ἀταρκέστατος), being most fully sufficient for Himself. From which God is said to work all things according to the counsel of His will, Eph. I, 11, and to distribute His gifts as He wills, 1 Cor. XII, 11.

You might say: 1. The necessity of willing and loving Himself seems to be a certain imperfection in God, both because it is similar to the mode of operation of natural agents, which is imperfect, and also because freedom is a greater perfection than necessity. Response: There is a threefold necessity in acting. One is violent, which is from an extrinsic source. Another is natural, which is indeed from an intrinsic source, but is inanimate, or at least irrational. Both are imperfect. The third is natural, vital, and supremely voluntary. This is a great perfection. And such is the necessity of willing and loving in God with respect to the supreme and infinite good. Indeed, this necessity is more perfect than the opposite freedom.

You might say: 2. The natural will, by the very fact that it is necessary, is not a will properly so-called; for the will ought to be free. Response: The will of God, considered in itself and radically, is the divine essence itself. And just as this is necessary, so also is the will of God. But if it is considered objectively with respect to an extrinsic object, namely creatures, it is most free. (*).

You might say: 3. If God necessarily wills and loves Himself, He also necessarily wills creatures; because He is the end of creatures; and he who necessarily wills the end, necessarily wills also the means leading to the end. Response: I deny the consequence. For creatures do not have the nature of means simply necessary for the ultimate end. For God would be most blessed even if creatures did not exist.

You might say: 4. Freedom of choice implies a certain mutability, or flexibility of the will, since it consists in indifference to both opposites, and therefore cannot be attributed to the immutable God. Response: Freedom of choice does not imply mutability of the will, but the election of diverse things, with the prior light of directing science; which belongs to God in a most perfect manner.

Proof b. That there is in God a secret and a revealed will, scripture teaches: the former indeed, Prov. XXV, 2: "It is the glory of God to conceal a thing: but the honour of kings is to search out a matter," and Rom. XI, 33, where Paul exclaims: "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?" The latter, however, when the prophet king says, Ps. CXLVII, 19, 20: "He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He (*) Liberty, truly so called, which differs greatly from license and lust, since the former is a certain property and perfection of a spirit using reason, is therefore the faculty of the will to decree, in a manner consistent with reason, without any prevailing impediment, whether internal, which is a certain defect of reason, or external, namely violent coercion, by which not so much the effect of the will as the effect itself can be prohibited. Therefore, true liberty is opposed 1) to necessity that is internal and moral indeed, but so called in a bad sense, which is the corruption and defection of a mind unable to use reason, for it is a necessary consequence that a mind so thoroughly corrupt and deficient cannot but either will and decree nothing, or will and decree evil, just as it thinks and perceives: 2) to the coercion and force of external impediments, if someone is able to prohibit another from his attempt. It is not likewise contrary to necessity that is internal and moral, but so named in a good sense, which is namely the perfection and right operation of a mind, which is engaged in proper use, inasmuch as from that right operation of the intellect, a right determination of the will also arises. For the conjunction of the intellect with the will is necessary, from which it then follows by a necessary consequence that, as the intellect has known and judged, so likewise the will chooses and decrees. In God, there is the most perfect intelligence, with both knowledge of things and wisdom, to such an extent that He is never deceived or fails, and indeed can never be deceived or fail. Therefore, in God there is a moral necessity by which it cannot but happen that God always chooses and decrees the good, indeed the best, since God can do nothing that is not consistent with Himself and His perfections, 2 Tim. II, 13. But no valid impediment can ever stand in God's way to prevent Him from executing His own counsels and decrees, Rom. IX, 19. Therefore, God also enjoys the highest liberty.

hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for his judgments, they have not known them." The apostle supports this, Eph. I, 9: "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself." Here it must be properly observed that the secret and the revealed will of God are not concerned with the same, but with a different object. For whatever is hidden in the secret will of God, as such, is not the object of the revealed will. And therefore, no conflict should be imagined here, as if God wills one thing by His secret will, and another by His revealed will. For then the wills of God would be contrary, and the revealed will of God would not be indubitable and infallible.

Proof c. The absolute will of God is shown to us by the most pious king, Ps. CXV, 3: "Our God, who is in the heavens, hath done whatsoever he hath pleased." And Jehovah Himself says: "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Is. XLVI, 10. By His conditioned will, God wills us to be heaped with very many goods. Hence He promises His blessing, under the condition of sincere obedience, Deut. XXVIII, 1 sqq.: "If thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God,... Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field." Thus God wills all men to be saved under the condition of persevering faith in Christ, 1 Tim. II, 4; John III, 36.

You might say: I. If God wills all men to be saved, under the condition of persevering faith, He either wills that condition to come about, or He does not will it. If He does not will it, He will be frustrated in His end, which is alien to divine wisdom; if He wills it, all men will believe. For what God wills, He does, Ps. CXV, 3. Response: God wills that condition to come about, but not with a precise, peremptory, and irresistible will, but with an ordained will, by which He has certainly dispensed the means; whoever uses these rightly, to them are divinely supplied the powers to fulfill that condition.

You might say: II. An inefficacious will is not to be attributed to God. A conditioned will is inefficacious. Therefore. The major is proven, because the will of God is omnipotent. The minor is established, since a conditioned will is not always fulfilled. Response: A conditioned will is efficacious with respect to its intention, although the event does not always correspond to it. For God seriously intends the end (e.g., the salvation of men) to be obtained through the most powerful means which He has ordained. A conditioned will is also always fulfilled, once the condition is posited. For by the very fact that it is called conditioned, it does not tend to the end, except through the positing of the condition.

Instance: Thus God will be frustrated in His end, since that condition is not always fulfilled. Response: God always obtains the general end, namely the glory of His goodness and offered grace; the special end, which tends to the benefit of man, man himself impedes, by petulantly rejecting the offered means by which the prefixed condition is brought into act.

You might say: III. Whatever will presupposes a condition in man depends on, or is determined by, the will of man. But the will of God does not depend on, nor is it determined by, the will of man. Therefore, the will of God presupposes no condition in man. Response: I deny the major; because dependence is from causes. A presupposed condition is not a cause, nor the norm of the divine will, but pertains to the order freely established by God.

You might say: IV. Nothing is prior to the divine will. Therefore, it presupposes no condition in man. Response: Nothing is prior to the divine will with respect to real existence; although God has most wisely pre-established that condition, and respects that reason a priori in conferring the effect out of mere grace.

Proof d. When the will of God is distinguished into absolute and ordained, then the absolute will is so called from the law, order, or course of nature, or of secondary causes. Thus God willed, when Joshua was fighting with the impious enemies, the sun to stand still in the midst of heaven, Josh. X, 13. The ordained will, however, takes its name from the order which, since God established it out of His inscrutable wisdom, He applies Himself to in acting out of mere grace. Thus God in the kingdom of nature wills the life of men to be preserved by certain foods and nourishment; in the kingdom of grace, He wills to save men through the word and sacraments, as the most efficacious means of grace and salvation. From which it is also clear that the conditioned and ordained will do not entirely coincide, although at first glance it might seem so. By His conditioned will, God wills to save men, if they believe; by His ordained will, He wills that they should believe, i.e., that from the means of grace, rightly used, they should conceive and establish faith (*).

Proof e. We will confirm the distinction of the divine will into antecedent and consequent below and vindicate it from objections.

Proof f. The distinction of the divine will into the will of the sign and of good pleasure is found both among the scholastics and among our own theologians. Lombard used it in I. Sent. dist. XLV, ch. III sqq.; Thomas in I, quaest. XIX, art. XII; Balthasar Meisner in Anthropol. disp. XII, quaest. I; Gerhard, Exeg. Libr. de Deo, § 269, and others. Concerning this distinction, you will observe a) that the will of the sign, taken formally and abstractly, is not properly a will, but is only called so by an extrinsic denomination, because of its relation to the will of good pleasure, of which it is a sign (**). The will of good pleasure, however, denotes the very act of the divine will by which He wills something. From this it is clear that this distinction is only analogical, since the will of the sign is called a will improperly, while the will of good pleasure is called a will properly. b) The scholastics, under the name of the will of good pleasure, include not only the will to do good, but also the permission of the reprobation of the unfaithful and the decree of their damnation. Since, however, the word εὐδοκία, or good pleasure, is extended rather too widely in this mode of signifying, D. Henricus Müller in his Theol.

Scholast., p. 137, distinguishes the divine will into the will of the sign and of pleasure. He subdivides the will of pleasure into the will of good pleasure, of permission, and of punishment. The first is that by which God is inclined to do good to the pious; the second is that by which God permits the unfaithful to fall into sins, and finally to be given over to a reprobate mind; the last is that by which God wills the impious to be punished. The will of the sign, however, is when God shows by a certain sign that He wills or does not will something; they make such a sign fivefold: precept, prohibition, counsel, permission, and operation, according to the much-recited verse of Durandus: He commands and prohibits, permits, counsels, fulfills. c) That there is a perpetual harmony of the will of the sign and the will of good pleasure, we prove 1) from the nature of the sign and the signified. The will of the sign is nothing other than an external sign of an internal will. Therefore, just as every true sign refers to its signified, and represents it, and does not indicate something different from or opposite to it, so the will of the sign truly notifies the will of divine good pleasure, and does not manifest the contrary to it. 2) From the veracity and holiness of God. He who utters one thing with his mouth and holds another in his heart acts the hypocrite. This does not befit a truthful man, nor an honest man, much less the most truthful God. 3) From the unity of

(*) To define it briefly and clearly: Order is the divine prescription of means, with the whole series of antecedents and consequents. Condition is the human use of means, as is fitting, not neglecting the antecedents and consequents, just as in the kingdom of grace, the saving trust placed in the merits of Christ, which alone makes us just and saved, cannot but be preceded by a true knowledge and detestation of sins, and be followed by a correction of morals and the exercise of all virtue. Order, therefore, is established by God; the condition is of man, who in observing that order rightly performs what is his duty.

(**) It is more correctly called a sign of the will, nor in the sacred letters is it called the will of good pleasure (in Greek, εὐδοκίας), or, as they barbarously speak, of "beneplaciti," but it is written thus: "the good pleasure of his will," Eph. I, 5. Our doctors, however, apply this distinction in various ways. 1) They indeed call the will of the sign a divine temptation; but that of good pleasure, a vocation. So Hildebrand in his Dogmatic Theology, ch. 3, § 40. 2) They refer the will of the sign to those things which God has enjoined us to do; that of good pleasure, they say, pertains to works of such a kind that God Himself has decreed to do. In this manner, Carpzovius has interpreted it in his Isagoge to the Symbolic Books, p. 1053. 3) Most of our theologians understand the will of the sign to be that which is revealed and made known, Eph. I, 9; by the name of good pleasure they designate those secret counsels of God, which God has reserved to Himself to be investigated by no one, Rom. XI, 33; Acts I, 7. We see them joined in Eph. III, 9, 10; Col. I, 26. Those who rightly think thus, when they use this distinction, are very far from those of the Reformed group who opine that the revealed will of God itself is one of the sign, another of good pleasure, as if there were two contrary acts, as if God decreed one thing, and signified something completely different.

the divine will. There are not in God contrary or contradictory wills. But if God by His word commanded all men to repent, to believe in Christ, to pursue a life of piety, and yet by a secret good pleasure did not will these things to be done by all, the will of the sign would be contrary or contradictorily opposed to the internal good pleasure. 4) From the absurd consequence. If what God testifies He wills by the will of the sign, He does not always will, it is all over for the truth of scripture. For although Holy Scripture clearly asserts what God wills to be done by us, we would nevertheless always have to doubt whether the assertions of Holy Scripture truly agree with the internal good pleasure of the divine will.

The Grace of God. The harmony of the will of the sign and the will of divine good pleasure is impugned by Beza, Zanchius, Piscator, and others, relying on the following arguments.

I. God signified to Abraham by His word that he should slay his son, yet He did not will that slaying with an internal affection, Gen. XXII, 11. Therefore, the will of the sign does not always agree with the will of divine good pleasure. Response: God was not saying one thing to Abraham with His mouth and feeling another within His mind, but He only willed this, that he should offer his son as a burnt offering. When Abraham performed this, the exploratory precept was fulfilled. But that God would compensate for the sacrifice in another way was unknown to Abraham. For it was a testing (in Greek, πειρασική) action, in which the whole will of God does not shine forth at once. But God has manifested the way of salvation most openly.

II. God announced the death of Hezekiah, Is. XXXVIII, 1 sqq., which nevertheless He did not will. Response: Just as God had announced the death of Hezekiah, so he certainly had to die, if you consider the ordained decree of God, conforming to the course of nature; life was preserved for the praying Hezekiah for 15 years, by an extraordinary decree of privilege. God indeed established the order of nature, but He reserved for Himself the freedom of acting outside or above this established order.

III. God threatened the Ninevites with destruction, Jonah III, 4. Yet He did not carry out that threat. Therefore, the will of the sign did not accord with the will of good pleasure. Response: I distinguish between the absolute and the conditioned will; the latter includes an "unless." God willed to destroy the Ninevites, unless they repented. The threat is understood with the exception of repentance.

IV. God commanded Pharaoh to let the people of Israel go, and yet He hardened his heart. Exod. VII, 2, 3. Therefore, the will of the sign was not conformable to the will of divine good pleasure. Response: The precept given to Pharaoh about letting the people go was most serious. For God willed from His soul that Pharaoh should let the people go. But when he resisted the divine will, God, as a punishment for his preceding sins, hardened him with a just judgment by permitting that he, who would not allow himself to be softened, being left to himself, should remain hard to his own perdition.

Question XLV. What is the grace of God?

The grace of God is an active (in Greek, ἐνεργητικὸν) divine attribute, by which God loves all creatures, and especially intelligent creatures, angels and men, and is inclined to do good to them.

Obs. 1. The affection of God, benevolently inclined towards creatures, is marked by different names according to the rationale of different connotations. For inasmuch as it is provoked by no merit, it is called grace, since it is opposed to merits, Rom. XI, 6. (*); inasmuch as He wills some good to be communicated to creatures, it is called love, charity, affection, John III, 16, for to love signifies to will good to someone, according to Thomas, P. I, Q. 20, art. 2; inasmuch as He promotes the advantages of creatures by benefits conferred, it is named kindness, in Greek χρηστότης, from χρησός (useful), Titus III, 4; inasmuch as He is moved by the sight of the miserable to drive it away, it is called mercy, Titus III, 5. These are the same thing in God; they are distinguished by us by reason of their objects and effects.

Obs. II. The grace of God, benevolently inclined towards all creatures, is proven from Ps. XXXIII, 5: "The earth is full of the goodness of the LORD." In the source, it is (in Hebrew, רַחֲמִים), which is rendered: kindness, grace, mercy. D. Geier rendered it as "grace,"

(*) Grace, by which God regards man guilty of sin, is not only opposed to the merits of men, but is also discerned from divine wrath, or vindicating justice. Both oppositions are written in Eph. II, 3, 8.

by which God imparts benefits to all creatures that are in the entire globe of the earth. For which reason, here, in the most general sense, is understood all grace of creation, conservation, cooperation, redemption, sanctification, salvation.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that mercy is an essential attribute of God, who rely on the following arguments:

I. Whatever does not perpetually belong to God is not an essential attribute of God. But mercy does not perpetually belong to God. Therefore. The minor is proven, because there is no place for mercy where there is no misery. But this did not afflict man in the state of innocence. Response: I distinguish between the first and second act of mercy, or between the attribute of mercy and its exercise. The attribute of mercy always belongs to God; the misery of man provides the occasion for the exercise of mercy.

II. If God were merciful by nature, He would punish no sin. But God punishes sin. Therefore, God is not merciful by nature. The consequence of the major is proven, because He acts against nothing that is naturally in God, e.g., He acts against nothing of His wisdom, holiness, veracity. But if God punished sin, He would be acting against His natural mercy. Response: I distinguish between absolute mercy and ordained mercy, or that tempered by justice. The mercy of God is not absolute, excluding all satisfaction, but it always respects justice as its individual companion. Therefore, by punishing sin, God does nothing against His essential mercy, since He neither punishes unmercifully (**), nor pardons unjustly, but wisely tempers justice with mercy.

III. He in whom there is no compassion of the heart, in him there is no mercy. But in God, etc. Therefore. The major is established, because mercy is compassion for another's misery in our heart, as Augustine defines it in book XIX of The City of God, ch. 5. The minor is proven, because God is the purest act, devoid of all passion. Response: I distinguish between the precise, or formal, reason of mercy, and its material, or determinate, reasons. Mercy, viewed precisely and formally, denotes grace towards the needy, or favor towards the miserable. In this sense, mercy is truly and really in God, although it is in Him eminently, i.e., in a most excellent and perfect manner. Mercy, viewed materially and determinately, involves some imperfections, because 1) in man it is an accident; 2) it includes compassion of the heart and a certain sadness. In this more imperfect manner, mercy is not in God.

Question XLVI. What is the justice of God?

The Justice of God The justice of God is an active (in Greek, ενεργητικὸν) divine attribute, by virtue of which God wills and does all things that are conformable to His eternal law, (a) prescribes fitting laws to creatures, (b) fulfills the promises made to men, (c) remunerates the good, (d) and punishes the impious (e).

Obs. I. By the justice of God here is not meant the justice from God, by which He justifies us, which is twofold (*), evangelical, consisting in the remission of sins and the imputation of the justice of Christ, Rom. III, 22; and legal, consisting in conformity with the law, which in this life is inchoate, and will be consummated only in the future life; but here justice is predicated of God, inasmuch as it is a property essential in God.

(**) But after the kingdom of grace is entirely consummated (1 Corinth. XV, 24), the wicked and contumacious man, a contemner of the richest compassion, lenity, and slowness to anger, then finally adjudicated to eternal damnation, will experience the most just judgment of God, without any mercy to be expected anew. James II, 13, add Rom. II, 4, 5. This must be held firmly against those who imagine that there will someday be an end to punishments.

(*) Justification, as it is usually called, by the custom of sacred discourse, is attributed solely to the trust placed in the merits of Christ, Rom. III, 28; IV, 5; and therefore is only evangelical, and is opposed to the justice of the law, since that requires not only true, but also perfect obedience. Rom. X, 4, 5, 6, 10. As to the efficient cause, the remission of sins, by which God pronounces us freed from all guilt and punishment and just, with respect to Christ is indeed an effect of divine justice—for it would be unjust if God were to demand from us again a vicarious satisfaction, fully rendered and also accepted, and attributed to us, see 1 John I, 9, add v. 7—but with respect to men, it is an effect of grace and mercy, Rom. III, 24.

Obs. II. The justice of God is either universal, which is the immutable rectitude of the divine will, by which God wills, approves, and does all things that are good and right, conformably to His eternal law, which coincides with the holiness of God; or it is particular, which is exercised towards creatures in their most upright governance, and in the retribution of good and evil.

Obs. III. The justice of God, which is exercised towards creatures, is either dispositive or compensatory. The former is that by which God governs the life of intelligent creatures (angels and men) by laws given that are suitable for them. The latter is either remunerative, by which God is moved to confer rewards on the pious, or vindictive, by which God is moved to inflict punishments on the impious.

Obs. IV. Commutative justice (which equates thing for thing, mine for yours, good for good, damage for damage) cannot intercede between God and fallen man, whether placed outside or inside the state of grace. The reason is that fallen man can merit nothing which can be exchanged in justice for a divine reward and the relaxation of punishment. But between God and an upright man, by a special divine covenant, commutative justice could have interceded. For a man persisting in the state of integrity could have performed as much as divine justice required in order to the obligation of giving, not of adequately meriting. But excluding a covenant and a special obligation of God, commutative justice cannot intercede between any created act and the uncreated goodness, because there can be no equality, or proportion, or obligation by itself; but on the part of God, there is always an infinite excess, and the noblest act of a creature is only finite. Between God and Christ the satisfier, there is a perfect commutative justice, because the merit and satisfaction of Christ for the sins of the whole world is of infinite value and preciousness. Distributive justice between God and man would have found a place in the state of integrity if, assuming the equality of the divine image and the inequality of operations, without sin, a promise of God had intervened that He would distribute the degrees of glory among men according to the proportion of their operations. But inasmuch as after the fall unequal degrees of glory are given to the faithful in eternal life according to the measure of their works, this is done, properly and strictly speaking, not out of distributive justice, even assuming a divine promise, but out of grace and mercy. For in distributive justice, labors are not only the measure which is regarded in the distribution, but at the same time the cause and reason, moving by its own dignity to distribute in such a way and not otherwise. But the labors of the pious saints cannot be such a cause and reason, because they do not attain the perfection fully conformable to the divine law, nay, out of divine justice they are reproachable on account of the sinful contamination which is "easily besetting" (in Greek, εὐπερίστατος). Absolutely speaking, therefore, between God and fallen men, neither commutative nor distributive justice is given, because man receives more of a reward than he has labored for, whether actively or passively. Rom. VIII, 18; 2 Cor. IV, 17. Cf. D. Dorsch, Theol. Zachar., part II, fol. 163, & D. Scherzer in Syst., p. 50.

Proof a. Ps. XCII, 15: "The LORD is upright; he is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him." The royal prophet, with affirmative and negative words, describes the rectitude of the divine will, to indicate that not even a trace of injustice is found in God.

Proof b. Since God is a most just legislator, whose law is perfect and whose commandments are right, Ps. XIX, 7, 8, by the force of His dispositive justice, He instructs intelligent creatures with fitting laws.

Proof c. Is. XLV, 23, Jehovah says: "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return." To fulfill promises is indeed a matter of veracity and faithfulness; but since veracity is contained under universal justice, and is the foundation of particular justice, in the sacred letters it comes under the name of justice. It is called by theologians the justice of promise. See Gerh., Exeg. loc. II, fol. 299.

Proof d. Rom. II, 5, 6, 7. It is referred to the "righteous judgment" (in Greek, δικαιοκρισίαν) that God will render to every man according to his deeds; to them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life. And 2 Thess. I, 6, 7, it is said to be a "righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you; And to you who are troubled rest." In which words is indicated remunerative justice, founded on the goodness and promises of God. Whence man has no right in relation to God by virtue of which the Lord owes him any good, but God crowns His own good works in us. For whatever good is in us is from the grace of God, Dan. IX, 18. For which reason, remunerative justice, properly speaking, is not commutative or distributive justice, but is only called justice by a certain analogy.

Proof e. Holy Scripture most clearly teaches the vindictive justice of God. For 1) God judges the impious according to His justice. "Righteous art thou, O LORD, and upright are thy judgments." Ps. CXIX, 137. The "righteous judgment of God" (in Greek, Δικαίωμα) is that they which commit such things are worthy of death, Rom. I, 32. To the "righteous judgment" (in Greek, τῇ δικαιοκρισίᾳ) is attributed the rendering to every man according to his deeds, "tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil." Rom. II, 5, 6, 9. The last day of judgment will be in justice, Acts XVII, 31. 2) The infliction of punishments is ascribed to the retributive (in Greek, ἀνταποδοτική) justice of God, 2 Thess. I, 6: "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you." 3) The condemnation of the impious is called just. Rom. III, 8. 4) The punishment for our sins, which God took from Christ, according to the prophet Isaiah in ch. LIII, 5, is a document of divine justice, as Paul testifies in Rom. III, 25: "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness." From this apostolic oracle, we argue: Whoever, by inflicting the punishment of a bloody death, demonstrates his justice, in him vindictive justice has a place. But God, by inflicting on Christ the punishment of a bloody death, etc. Therefore. The major is proven: where someone proceeds by justice to the point of afflicting unto blood, there indeed vindictive justice has a place, as is clear from the example of a magistrate who punishes the wicked with death. That this vindictive justice in God is essential and necessary, not arbitrary, is clear: a) because God excels in natural holiness, so that He does not will sins, but hates them, Ps. V, 4. Therefore, there is in God a certain vindictive justice, belonging to Him by essence; b) because without satisfaction never is absolved the guilty, Exodus XXXIV, 7, and He abominates men who justify the wicked, Proverbs XVII, 15. Therefore, He is moved by natural justice to punish sins. c) The judgment (judgment) of God, that those who do evil are worthy of death, is known by nature, Romans I, 32. Therefore, that right of God is not voluntary, but natural. For those things that are of God's free will are not known from nature. (*)

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who deny that vindictive justice is an essential attribute of God; (**) their stronger arguments are:

(*) Indeed, these words of Christ offer us a most powerful argument, Matthew XXVI, 39. That cup was not so much the suffering of evils as the sense of divine wrath. For as this is wont to be denoted elsewhere by that name, e.g., Isaiah LI, 17, Ezekiel XXIII, 31, Revelation XIV, 10, XVI, 19, so in this place it is understood to be signified from Romans V, 8, 9, 10. Wrath in God is nothing other than that act of will by which God wills to declare His vindicating justice. But He declares it either by affecting the sinner with a punishment that is fitting, or by demanding a sponsor who may make satisfaction for him. To punish is not to spare either the sinner or the sponsor, Romans VIII, 32. And not even to be able to spare is necessarily to punish. For that is necessary which cannot be done otherwise. But it could not be done that Christ should be freed from that cup. Therefore, it was in no way possible by any other means to avert the vengeance of the wrathful Deity from men and to render God propitious. Therefore, vindicating justice in God is natural and necessary. This is also effected by a necessary consequence from the love of the good, undoubtedly a natural and principal perfection of God, from which an equally natural hatred of the opposite evil cannot but arise.

(**) It will be helpful to note the open contradiction in the errors of the Socinians. They confess (in the Racovian Catechism, Sect. III, ch. 1, qu. 6): "That it pertains to the nature of God that He is perfectly just." Then they say, although falsely, that the nature of God is to be distinguished from His most free will (ibid. qu. 23). Therefore, I argue: Justice, and indeed perfect justice, pertains to the divine nature itself (this our adversaries grant us); Punishing justice is also a certain kind of justice: Therefore, it pertains to perfect justice. But the nature of God (as they indeed would have it) differs from His most free will. Therefore, if we conduct the dispute according to human standards (according to human standards), punishing justice in God is not arbitrary, but altogether natural and necessary.

1. Every essential attribute of God belongs to God from eternity. Vindictive justice does not belong to God from eternity. Therefore. The minor premise is proven, because from eternity there existed no creatures upon whom God could exercise justice. Resp. I distinguish between the justice of God considered radically and formally. The justice of God considered radically is the will to punish sins, belonging to God from eternity. Formally, it is something relative, and exercises its acts only in time, and only on the hypothesis of a rational creature.

2. No property of God has a contrary property in God. The justice of God has a contrary property in God. Therefore. The minor premise is clear because punishing justice is contrary to mercy, which pardons sins. Resp. 1) The justice and mercy of God are not contrary to each other, although the effects of these divine attributes differ. For opposite effects can proceed from one principle. Thus the same sun melts butter and hardens clay. 2) Opposites are understood concerning the same subject and object, insofar as it is the same. The mercy and justice of God are not concerned with the same object, insofar as it is the same. For justice is concerned with the sinner as such, who is regarded by reason of his sins by which God has been offended, without respect to satisfaction. But mercy is concerned with the sinner under the aspect of satisfaction, or insofar as for his sins he has the satisfaction of Christ, by which God is moved to mercy. Hence mercy pardons sins for the faithful; but justice condemns the unfaithful, because they have not averted the wrath deserved by their sins through the apprehension of the satisfaction of Christ.

3. Whatever is a natural attribute of God is not overcome by another divine attribute. The justice of God is overcome by the mercy of God. E. The major premise is established, because every divine attribute, in respect to reality, is the divine essence itself. Just as this is not overcome by itself, so one essential attribute is not overcome by another. The minor premise is proven, because God shows mercy more often and more swiftly than He punishes; for He is slow to anger, Exodus XXX, 6. To show mercy is His own work, to afflict is a foreign work. Isaiah XXVIII, 21. Resp. One attribute is not overcome by another, if it is viewed intrinsically, as it is in God; yet more external effects of one divine attribute than of another are seen. God shows mercy more often and more swiftly than He punishes, because the world has been reconciled to God through Christ, and by His antecedent will He wishes all to be saved, to have mercy on all; but He punishes those who reject this grace offered in Christ, at length, by His consequent will.

4. If vindictive justice were naturally in God, He would always punish sin. But He does not always punish sin. Therefore. Resp. God would always punish sin, if the most sufficient merit of Christ had not intervened, by which God is moved to pardon sins. For God punishes sin either in the sinner himself, or in the sinner's sponsor, Christ, whose satisfactory passion he who applies to himself by true faith removes the deserved penalties for sins.

5. God punishes when and where He wills. Therefore, His punitive justice is not natural, but free. Resp. God punishes when He wills; but it does not follow: Therefore, He does not punish according to natural justice. For from the freedom of the act, for here and now, the consequence to the freedom of the principle is not valid. The act and its exercise, for here and now, are of the free will of God; from which God can defer punishments as He pleases. But the principle, the natural justice of God, is necessary. Thus creation is free, but the power of creating is natural and necessary in God.

6. To punish sins, in the sacred letters, is attributed not to justice, but to wrath or severity. Romans 11, 5; chap. XI, 22. Indeed, it is attributed to justice when God pardons sins. 1 John I, 9; Romans III, 26. Resp. 1) The infliction of punishments is referred to the just judgment of God (just judgment of God), or the just judgment of God. Romans II, 5-9. But when severity, wrath, indignation, fury, vengeance are opposed to divine mercy, they are put by a metonymy of the sign for the vindictive justice of God, and presuppose it. 2) Righteous (Righteous), 1 John I, 9, is explained by faithful, and so denotes that God most faithfully fulfills His promises. But here the controversy is about the punitive justice of God. 3) Romans III, 25. Paul treats of the justice founded on blood, or that which demands a bloody death. Which indeed is vindictive justice, which a judge exercises by inflicting the punishment of a bloody death on the guilty. You need not object that Luther rendered these words: "That He might declare the righteousness that avails before God." Luther renders the consequent for the antecedent, because that imputed righteousness is none other than that which was exacted in Christ through vindictive justice.

7. If God is just, why do the evil fare well, and the good ill? Resp. Look to the end; for indeed the evil fare well, and the good ill for a time, but not finally. For in the end it will be well for the good, and ill for the evil, if not in this life, then in the other. Add, that it should never be ill for the perfectly good; but we are not perfectly good.

Question XLVII. What is the veracity of God?

The Veracity of God. Veracity is an operative (operative) divine attribute, by which God, in speaking the truth, is constant in keeping His promises and fulfilling His threats.

Obs. 1. The truth of God in being differs from His truth in speaking. The former is an absolute, or quiescent, attribute; the latter is a respective, or operating, attribute.

Obs. 2. By this attribute, both hypocrisy and all falsehood are removed from God.

Proof 1. Numbers XXIII, 19, Balaam says: "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent; hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?" God had put these words in Balaam's mouth, that by them he might express the veracity of God most lucidly. And the most truthful God is compared with deceitful men. Men are prone to lying, because not only are they often deceived on account of the infirmity of their intellect, but they also most frequently deceive on account of the inconstancy of their will. But God, because He possesses infinite knowledge, is never deceived; and because He is eminent in infinite constancy of will, He never deceives.

2. Hebrews VI, 18, the apostle says: "It is impossible for God to lie." God can do all things by effecting, but nothing by defecting. Since a lie is an enormous defect, it is inferior to the object of divine power.

Question XLVIII. What is the power of God?

The power, or omnipotence, of God is an operative (operative) divine attribute, by which God is able to effect everything that is possible to be done, and which implies no imperfection in God. (*)

(*) In the sacred letters this description exists: that God can effect whatever He wills, Psalm CXV, 3; Matthew VIII, 2; XXVI, 39, 42. Of course, everything possible is to be considered either in respect to the thing, or to the effector. Many things indeed can be done, which yet cannot proceed from this author, just as it does not befit a good man to lie and deceive. Thus, no nature of things can ever exist which God cannot, if only He wills, effect. But God can will nothing except all that which is altogether consonant with His wisdom, goodness, and all His perfections, nor can He not will anything which altogether agrees with all His perfections and is judged by His most wise counsel to be good, nay even the best. Otherwise, there would be a defect and a certain repugnance in God's power or will; But everything repugnant is plainly not of the genus of possibles. Let us assume these two principles: 1) God is a most perfect being: Therefore, God can effect all those things which are best suited to His perfections, with none taken away; but He can do none of those things which contain in themselves some imperfection contrary to God, 2 Timothy II, 13; Hebrews VI, 18. Therefore, the will of God is also most perfect, so that He can neither not will the best, nor will anything not altogether suitable to His wisdom. 2) God is an infinite being, nor is there any composition in God, nothing greater or lesser. Therefore, each one of the divine perfections is equally infinite as all the rest. Therefore, it is not to be thought that the divine power (I speak not of the physical, in respect to the thing, but of the moral, in respect to God) extends more widely than the divine will. For if it were so, it would follow either that the perfections in God are not all equally infinite (which is repugnant to the nature of God), or that one infinite is broader and greater than another (which is contrary to infinity). These sayings, Hosea XI, 9; Matthew III, 9, and others of this kind, must undoubtedly be understood with this condition: "If God should will it." The case of man is far different, because man is a finite being, and also depraved, laboring under many great defects. In him there is a huge defect, either of power, or of good will, if not of both at once. Men neither will all the good that they can and should, nor can they do all that they will. Therefore, in man, at one time power is broader than will, at another, will is to be praised, even if strength is lacking. In God, however, there is nothing, and can be

Obs. I. God is called omnipotent from His active power. For since God is a most pure and perfect act, He is devoid of passive omnipotence.

Obs. II. The attribute of omnipotence belongs to God not accidentally, but essentially; not dependently, but independently; not mutably, but immutably; not in a certain respect, but absolutely, so that His power is not finite or measured, but infinite and immense a) with respect to objects, because the things God can perform are infinite; b) with respect to the mode of acting, since God never acts so intensely and effectively that He could not operate more intensely and effectively.

Obs. III. A distinction must be made between the ordered and the absolute power of God. The ordered power is that by which God acts in accordance with His decree and the order established by Himself. That order is twofold, of nature and of grace. The former is that by which God operates according to the laws of nature established by Himself, e.g., God can preserve the natural life of man through bodily nourishment. The latter is that by which God, through supernatural means established by Himself, can illuminate, convert, regenerate, justify, renew, and save a sinful man. The ordered divine power can be resisted, since the influx of secondary causes with which God concurs, and of the means through which He operates, can be impeded. But the absolute divine power cannot be resisted; for otherwise the finite power of a creature would prevail over the infinite power of God. By His absolute power, God can cause a virgin to give birth, the sun to stand still, iron to float, etc.

Obs. IV. Things are called possible which, if they happen, involve no contradiction, neither on the part of the agent, God, nor on the part of the thing produced. For example, if it were possible for God to lie, or to sin in any way, He would not be the most holy God. For to be most holy and yet to sin implies a contradiction. But if God were to make yesterday into today, a contradiction would be involved on the part of the thing produced. For to be simultaneously yesterday and today implies a contradiction.

Obs. V. The norm for judging a contradiction is not the human intellect, but the divine. Things often seem contradictory to us which are not. Whence God can do exceedingly abundantly (exceedingly abundantly) above all that we understand, Ephesians III, 20. In general, most indeed assert that God cannot make contradictions (although THOMAS, P. I, Question 25, art. 3, thinks it is more theologically said that such things cannot be done, than that God cannot do them; since they do not argue a defect of power in God, but are not in the genus of possibles due to a defect of entity; for they can in no way exist); however, it is not for us to determine all those things that are truly contradictory in particular, because we do not perfectly know what is the essence of each thing. Just as a fool does not judge what all wise men are able to accomplish; nor does a brute grasp all that is within man's power; nor does man attain to the powers which angels possess; so much less does our intellect know what is impossible for God. This in the meantime is certain, that it does not infer a contradiction what (a) God has asserted in His word that He will do, (b) what does not subvert the essence of a thing clearly known to us.

Obs. VI. A distinction must be made between impossible by nature and impossible in nature. Impossible by nature are things that surpass the usual course of nature. Thus, nature cannot effect that a donkey should speak, that water should turn into wine. Impossible in nature are things that, if they happen, involve a manifest contradiction. These, because they are simply impossible, do not fall under any power, and thus not even under the power of God Himself; just as what is simply invisible does not fall under any visual power.

Proof of the Omnipotence of God; I. From the light of revelation. For in the sacred letters 1) God is expressly called omnipotent, Genesis XVII, אל שרי (El Shaddai), i.e., God the devastator, who can devastate all things and reduce them to nothing, just as He created all things from nothing. He is called κύριος παντοκράτωρ, Lord omnipotent, 2 Corinthians VI, 18. 2) The Holy Spirit affirms that with God all things are possible, Matthew XIX, 26. 3) The same divine spirit denies that any word (any thing) is impossible with God, Luke I, 37.

nothing, in any way deficient. God both wills whatever is best, and is able to effect all that He wills. Moreover, that to the most perfect power which is in God there also pertains authority and supreme right is placed beyond all controversy. The Legate of Christ predicates both, both power (power) and authority (authority), conjointly in Romans IX, 21, 22.

II. From the light of reason, and indeed 1) from the perfection of God. Every perfection belongs to God in the most excellent manner. But power in operating is a perfection. Therefore. 2) From the effects. Whoever created the world, and preserves and governs the created, He is omnipotent. But God, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis was I. that of the Gentiles, among whom are PLINY, book II of natural history, ch. VII, and GALEN, book II on the use of parts, ch. XIV, who denied that God could do all things. II. that of the Socinians (to whom Vorstius accedes), who deny the infinity of divine power. They attempt to deceive us with the following arguments.

1. God cannot sin, lie, be deceived, die, be conquered, condemn the innocent, or dismiss the sinner unpunished without satisfaction. Therefore, God is not omnipotent. Resp. These predicates infer a contradiction on the part of God the agent, since they are repugnant to His most eminent perfection. If God could do these things, He would not be God, not the most perfect being. God cannot sin, because He is most holy; not be deceived, because He is most wise; not lie, because He is most truthful; not die, because He is eternal; not be conquered, because He is infinitely powerful; not condemn the innocent or dismiss the guilty unpunished, because He is most just.

2. God cannot walk, eat, sleep, etc., which creatures can do. Therefore, God cannot do all things that are absolutely possible. Resp. (1) Indeed, by His immense power, God causes creatures to walk, eat, and sleep, and so the movement, eating, and sleep of creatures proceed from the power of God. (2) God does not exercise those acts immediately in Himself, because they are conjoined with manifold imperfection. Walking is done with the feet of a body, and implies passive power and a change of place. The eating of food requires bodily members, and argues the neediness of creatures and passive power. Sleep, however, arises from weariness and indicates a certain imbecility. Therefore, it is clear that these predicates are repugnant to the spirituality, immutability, beatitude, and omnipotence of God.

3. God cannot make contradictory things true, He cannot make what is done undone, yesterday's day today, or make a violated woman a pure and chaste virgin. E. God is not omnipotent. Resp. (1) It is simply not possible for both contradictory propositions to be true. But whatever is simply impossible falls under no power. ARMANDUS DE BELLO VISU says excellently: "What God cannot do is called impossible, not on account of a defect of divine power, but on account of a defect of the feasible thing, which is not capable of it. A doctor of theology can teach theology; but that he cannot teach a donkey is not a defect of power in the theologian, but it is a defect of the donkey, which is not capable of doctrine." (2) For what is done to be simultaneously undone, for today's day to be yesterday, for a violated woman to be a pure virgin, implies an evident contradiction, and is therefore the object of no power. God could, however, have caused what has passed not to have been, and thus never to have passed; He could have caused the virgin who was later violated never to have existed.

Instance: If God cannot do anything impossible, His power will be limited, not absolute. Resp. God can do things impossible by nature, but not impossible in nature. Since these are simply impossible, they are inferior to active omnipotence, and thus place no limits on the omnipotence of God.

4. God cannot make a creature infinitely more perfect or better than He made it. Therefore, He is not omnipotent. Resp. (1) I distinguish between a creature considered with respect to its essential, and its accidental, goodness or perfection. (2) I distinguish between a thing which remains the same in number, and one which is changed, so that it becomes another in numerical essence. God cannot make a thing infinitely better in essential goodness or perfection, if it must remain the same in number. For the essences of things are like numbers, to which, if they are to remain the same, nothing can be added or taken away. E.g., a tree, as long as it remains a tree, cannot become a man; although from a tree, if it no longer remained a tree, God could make a man. Accidentally, however, and indeed infinitely, God can make a thing better or more perfect; since to one He can add a degree of magnitude, and to another a degree of multitude, and to another a degree of accidental perfection infinitely.

5. God cannot make a God. Resp. It implies a contradiction to be God and yet to be made. For the true God is the first being, independent, existing from Himself, not made by another.

6. The effects of divine power (namely, creatures) are finite. Therefore, divine power is also finite; for as is the effect, so is the cause. Resp. I distinguish between a univocal and an equivocal effect. The divine effects are equivocal, because they are not of the same nature as God. But it is not permissible to argue from the quality of an equivocal effect to the quality of the cause. Divine power is infinite, (1) insofar as it is considered in itself; for thus it is the infinite essence of God itself; (2) insofar as it is viewed in relation to its objects and mode of acting. See above, obs. II.

7. Whoever cannot bring all possible things into act is not omnipotent. But God cannot, etc. Therefore. Minor premise proven: because thus no possible would remain. Resp. God brings all possible things into act dividedly, or one by one, not collectively at once, so that no possible remains. For the infinity of divine power does not consist in this, that it should at once and at the same time make every possible thing. It suffices that no possible can be named which God is not able to produce.

8. Whatever is exceeded by some divine attribute cannot be infinite. But divine power is exceeded by some divine attribute, namely, by divine knowledge. Therefore.

The major premise is established, because in infinity the notion of exceeding and being exceeded has no place, but mere parity dominates. The minor premise is clear, because God knows more things, namely sins, natural defects, and others, which He cannot do. Resp. The power of God is considered in a twofold manner: (a) inwardly (inwardly), or intrinsically, according to its entity, inasmuch as it is identified with the very essence of God; thus it is not exceeded by the knowledge of God, but just like it, is infinite. (b) outwardly (outwardly), extrinsically, with respect to its objects; thus power is exceeded by the knowledge of God, with respect to the number of objects, because more things fall under the knowledge than the power of God; but not with respect to the proportion of objects, because as the knowledge of God extends to all knowable things, so the divine power extends to all possible things.

9. Christ, true God, could not do miracles in His own country, Mark VI, 5. Therefore, divine power is not immense. Resp. Christ could do miracles in His own country by His absolute power, but not by His ordered power, His miraculous force being retarded, not by powerlessness, or a defect of power in Himself, but by unbelief, or a defect of faith in the people.

Question XLIX. What is the omnipresence of God?

The omnipresence of God is an operative (operative) divine attribute, by virtue of which God is present to all creatures not only by proximity of substance (a), but also by efficacious operation (b).

Obs. I. The presence of God is one, universal; another, special; another, singular. By His universal presence, which is also called the presence of power, God is present to all creatures. The special presence is twofold, the presence of grace and of glory. By the presence of grace, God is present to believers in this life. By the presence of glory, God is present to the angels and the blessed in heaven. The singular and hypostatic presence is that through which the whole fullness of the deity dwells bodily in Christ; Colossians II, 9.

Obs. II. The degrees of divine presence follow one another, so that the latter always presuppose and prerequire the prior degrees, but not vice versa. Thus the presence of grace presupposes the divine omnipresence; the presence of glory includes in a certain way, or prerequires, the presence of grace. And finally, the presence of the hypostatic union supports and prerequires in its own way the presence of glory, as well as the presence of grace, and indeed also the universal presence or that of power. Cf. D. CALOV. system. tom. II. p. 613.

Obs. III. The divine presence in biblical style, and in a complex sense, implies two things: (1) non-distancing (non-distancing) or the substantial presence of God to creatures; (2) energy (energy), or efficacious operation. Two things are therefore to be proven here: (a) That God is everywhere present by reason of His substance. (b) That for a full and accurate definition of the divine presence, the efficacious operation of God is also required as a definitive part, with Holy Scripture as our guide.

Proof a: (1) From Jeremiah XXIII, 23, 24. "Am I a God at hand," saith the Lord, "and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him?" saith the Lord. "Do not I fill heaven and earth?" saith the Lord. Concerning this prophetic oracle, you should observe: (a) the prefix מ in the nouns מרחק and מקרוב creates a construction of substantives to be expressed in Latin by the genitive, as BUXTORF observes in his thesaurus, book II, chap. III, p. 365, and SEB. SCHMID, in his prior biblical collection, p. 97. And since the expression is elliptical, Buxtorf supplies בעל ; Am I the God of a near place? And so also; Am I the God of a far place? Quite correctly. For thus God is also called the God of heaven and earth, Genesis XXIV, 3. Unless you prefer to understand אל ; i.e., Am I a God of that which is near, etc. (b) Near and remote places, or near and remote things, are called such with respect to a certain mode of divine presence, according to which God is said to be somewhere. Nor does there seem to be any doubt here that the Lord is referring to heaven, which elsewhere in scripture is called, and by all peoples has always been held to be, the habitation of God. By those false prophets, against whom the Lord here acts, it was also held to be the same. With respect to heaven, therefore, and with respect to the mode of presence by which God is in the heavens, places are called near and remote. But since God is in heaven by reason of substance, He is also substantially present to places near to and remote from heaven. (c) When the Lord says; "Do not I fill heaven and earth?" the proper meaning of the word "fill" is to be retained. Something is said to be filled by something when it so penetrates and possesses all of it that nothing remains empty, nothing in which the thing that fills is not. We argue; Whoever is the God not only of the nearest place, but also of the most remote, filling heaven and earth, He is omnipresent by reason of His substance. But God, etc. Therefore.

(2) From Psalm CXXXIX, 7-8. "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art here." Obs. By the spirit of God, the Holy Spirit is to be understood; by the face of God, the tremendous majesty of God, or as D. GEIERUS opines in his commentary on this passage, p. 1208, the Son of God, who is the image of the Father and the express image of His substance, Colossians I, 15, Hebrews I, 3, is understood. An argument is born for us; Whoever is so in the heavens and in hell that no one can escape his spirit and face, he is substantially omnipresent. But God, etc. Therefore.

Proof b: That the divine omnipresence should be defined complexly as an operative presence, we show by the following argument: In whatever way the sacred scripture defines the divine omnipresence, in the same way it must be defined by us. But the sacred scripture defines the divine omnipresence complexly by the substantial presence of God to creatures, and at the same time His most efficacious operation. Therefore. The minor premise is proven, because in sacred scripture no mode of divine presence is found defined without including operation. For (1) The universal presence, by which God fills heaven and earth, in scriptural phraseology denotes not the bare presence of God, but the most powerful conservation and governance of creatures; which St. Paul, about to delineate, says in Acts XVII, 27; "the Lord is not far from every one of us. For in him we live, and move, and have our being." We live in God, as an infant in its mother's womb, in which it is given life; we move in Him, as ships on the ocean, by which they are sustained; we are in Him, as light in the air, with which it is united. (2) By His gracious presence God inhabits the faithful, renewing, consoling, and protecting them. Leviticus XXVI, 12; 2 Corinthians VI, 16; Psalm XCI, 15. (3) By His glorious presence God is present to the angels and the blessed, glorifying and exhilarating them. Psalm XVI, 11; Revelation XXI, 3. For which reason, since every divine presence is connected with some operation, we define it complexly as an operative presence.

The antithesis is (1) that of the Socinians (with whom VORSTIUS agrees) who deny the substantial omnipresence of God. (2) That of certain theologians, among whom are also those of Tübingen, who deny that the efficacious operation of God enters into the definition of divine presence. The Socinians attack our assertion with the following arguments:

1. If God by reason of His substance were to fill heaven and earth, He would be in the filthiest places. But the latter seems to be absurd. Therefore, the former also. Resp. Filthy places do not stain God; because bodies indeed, but not spirits, are contaminated by filthy things. Created spirits, namely angels and souls, as well as the light of the sun, are present to things physically filthy, yet they are not defiled. God is offended by things morally foul (the wicked deeds of men), not by things physically filthy.

Instance: God commanded that everything filthy should be removed from the camp of the Israelites. Numbers V, 28; Deuteronomy XXII, 10. R. God did not command that because of a fear of the staining of the divine essence, but so that, through the way of symbolic observance, He might commend to the Israelites a most accurate pursuit of moral purity, and also to provide for the health of the Israelites.

2. If God were substantially omnipresent, He would be present to the devils. The latter is absurd. Therefore, the former also. Resp. God is present to the devils by His general presence, or the presence of power; otherwise He would not be at hand for the good angels wrestling with the devils, Jude v. 9. Indeed, God would not even have been present to Christ when He was tempted and carried by the devil. Matthew IV. By the confession of our adversaries, God is present to the devils by reason of His power, knowledge, and providence; why not therefore by reason of His substance, which does not really differ from the divine attributes.

3. Whoever is immense and excluded from no place is intermingled with created things. But God is not intermingled with created things. Resp. Presence formally does not speak of intermingling, but of non-distance. Angels are present to lions, yet they are not intermingled with them. God, a most pure act, excluding all passive potentiality, is not capable of being intermingled.

4. Whoever dwells in heaven does not dwell on earth. God, etc. Therefore. The minor premise is established from Psalm II, 4. Resp. God dwells in heaven not only, not exclusively, but He also fills the earth, Jeremiah XXIII, 24. He dwells in us. John XIV, 17. God is in heaven by the presence of glory, because to the angels and blessed men in heaven He manifests His glory most lucidly; Yet He is also on earth by the presence of grace, and of power; everywhere by His essence. (*)

5. Those who pray stretch their hands to heaven, and lift up their eyes and their hearts. 1 Kings VIII, 22. Which they do because God is substantially only in heaven. Resp. We stretch our hands to heaven in prayer (1) so that, venerating the majesty of God, we may think only sublime thoughts, and thus elevate our minds from earthly to heavenly things. (2) So that we may seek heavenly goods, testifying that our citizenship (citizenship), for which we are held by desire, is in heaven, Philippians III, 20.

6. Whoever changes place, by ascending and descending, is not immense or substantially omnipresent. But God, etc. Genesis XI, 7. Resp. God descends not by reason of His essence, but by reason of His manifestation (**).<sup>64</sup> But He does not change place, because He is not in a place locally or circumscriptively.

7. If God were wholly in the whole world, and wholly in every speck of dust, it would follow that He would be at the same time finite and infinite, equal and unequal to the same thing, greater and lesser than Himself. The latter is absurd. Therefore, the former also. Resp. I deny the consequence. Because (1) God is not some physical whole, either essential or integral, composed of parts, but He is a perfectional whole, which, having the highest perfection without parts, is said to be whole. Cf. CALOVIUS, divine metaphysics, general part, p. 520. God is everywhere wholly present, because being indivisible (indivisible), or a most simple spirit, devoid of all parts, He is everywhere present, not circumscriptively or occupatively, but repletively. He is therefore whole in a speck of dust, without inclusion from within, without exclusion from without. If the whole soul is in the whole body, and whole in every part of the body, why should not God, a spirit and a most simple act, be whole in the whole world, and whole in every part of the world? (2) God is infinite, not by reason of quantitative extension, but by reason of essence and perfection. While He is present to finite things, His essence is not rendered finite, just as His essence does not become temporary by coexisting with temporary things. (3) Equality is an affection of quantity, not befitting angels, much less God, a most pure spirit. (4) No one is said to be greater or lesser than himself, but is said to be greater than others, insofar as he is compared with them by reason of quantity.

(*) There are chiefly four arguments from which it is clear that it is not properly said when God is said to be, or even to dwell, in heaven. For 1) that no determination of place and habitation is to be attributed to God, is openly written in 1 Kings VIII, 27; 2) God is said to be above all the heavens, Job XI, 9; 3) to be in heaven and on earth at the same time, Isaiah LVII, 15; 4) to fill heaven and earth, that is, to be circumscribed by no boundaries of place, Jeremiah XXIII, 24. Not so much the presence as the majesty of God is designated by this manner of speaking: to be, to dwell, to sit in heaven. For heaven in the sacred letters, spoken of improperly, is a sign of height, as the earth is of humility. See the connected notions in Psalm CIII, 19; CXV, 3.

(**) That this expression, to descend and to ascend, is to be understood of a certain singular mode of revelation and its end, appears lucidly from Genesis XVII, 22, collated with v. 1; XXXV, 13, compared with vv. 7 & 9. But that this diction, to approach and to recede, or to be present and to be absent, denotes nothing other than this, to either enjoy or to lack the assisting and blessing grace and benevolence of God, we learn from Numbers XIV, 42, 43; Psalm XCI, 15; Hosea IX, 12.

8. If God were omnipresent in all parts of the world, outside and inside, above and below, before and after, to the right and to the left, it would follow that all the most separate parts of the world would also be most conjoined. The latter is absurd. Therefore, the former also. The consequence of the major is proven, because things which are joined to the same thing according to the same thing are also conjoined among themselves. Resp. Whatever things are joined to one third thing are also joined among themselves with respect to that third thing, or in order to that third thing, but not absolutely. India no less than Germany has God present; but for that reason, those most widely separated regions are not absolutely conjoined.

Question L. What practical uses can you derive from the description of God and His attributes?

From the description of God and the divine attributes, the most abundant uses may be derived, both paraenetic, by which we are stimulated to exercises of piety, and paracletic, which contribute no small amount to the tranquility of the soul.

1. God is Spirit. John IV, 24. Therefore, a) let us worship Him in spirit and in truth; let us walk according to the Spirit. Romans VIII, 7. b) Since our soul is a spirit, in adverse circumstances it is tranquilized only by spiritual solace. "Be silent only towards God, O my soul; for from him will be my salvation." Psalm LXII, 2.

2. God is the first and independent being, on whom all creatures depend. Let us therefore depend entirely a) on the divine will expressed in the sacred letters. "I have stuck unto thy testimonies," says the royal prophet in Psalm CXIX, 31. b) Those who depend on God are supported by Him, lest they perish. "My soul cleaveth unto thee; but thy right hand sustaineth me." Psalm LXIII, 9.

3. God is one. a) Therefore let us worship this one Lord our God, and serve Him alone. Matthew IV, 10. b) This one treasure of our heart is better than all the treasures of the world. Let us trample on the riches of this age; the one treasure of the heart is sufficient.

4. God is simple; therefore a) let us love simplicity, fleeing all deceit and hypocrisy worse than a dog or a snake. Let us pray with David: "Let simplicity and thy righteousness, O Christ, govern me." Psalm XXV, 21. b) The Lord preserves the simple; when they are afflicted, then He saves them. Psalm CXVI, 6.

5. God is true. Therefore, let us a) truly acknowledge and worship Him from the word of truth. b) Let us constantly consider with ourselves that eternal life is situated in that one true God. John XVII, 3.

6. God is good. Therefore, a) He is to be loved. For if we love a good that is derived, imperfect, and fragile, how much more the original, archetypal, and eternal good? "None is good, save one, that is, God." Matthew XIX, 17. b) "All things work together for good to them that love God." Romans VIII, 28. Hence we do not fear to die (I speak with St. AMBROSE), because we have a good Lord.

7. God is holy. Wherefore, a) let us imitate our most holy father. "Be ye holy; for I the Lord your God am holy." Leviticus XIX. b) To the holy sons of God, no good is lacking, provided they continue to strive to worship God holily. "O fear the Lord, ye his saints; for there is no want to them that fear him." Psalm XXXIV, 10.

8. God is infinite. Therefore, let us most humbly a) acknowledge our imperfection, we who, when compared with the infinitely perfect God, are nothing and have no power. "All nations before him are as nothing; and they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity." Isaiah XL, 17. b) As the essence of God is infinite, so His mercy is terminated by no end. "This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope. It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not." Lamentations III, 21, 22.

9. God is eternal. Therefore, having contemned fleeting and perishable goods, with ardent desire let us a) aspire to Him who alone inhabits eternity. Isaiah LVII, 15. Let us ascend from earth to heaven, from shadow to truth, from time to eternity, from creatures to God, the creator and king of the ages. 1 Timothy I, 17. b) With the devil raging, and the world pressing upon us, let us lift up our minds with the hope of eternal glory. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." 2 Corinthians IV, 17, 18.

10. God is immense, substantially present everywhere. Let us therefore carefully beware a) lest we commit works of darkness in hidden corners. "Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the Lord." Jeremiah XXIII, 24. AUGUSTINE says aptly in Psalm 1, 6; "God is all eye, because He sees all things; all ear, because He hears all things; all hand, because He does all things; all foot, because He is present everywhere." b) Walking through the dark valley of death, let us say with David: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou, O Lord, art with me." Psalm XXIII, 15.

11. God is immutable. a) Therefore let our mutable will adhere to the immutable goodness and will of God, that it may be solidified and confirmed in the good. b) Since the gifts and calling of God are without repentance (without repentance), Romans XI, 28, let us most firmly resolve that God will never change His favorable affection toward us, provided we do not suffer ourselves to be overcome by the desires of the flesh and to be torn away from God.

12. God is immortal. For which reason a) let us fix all our trust, all our hope, in the immortal God. He who loves transient things perishes with transient things. But hope, having trusted in the immortal God, rests on an immovable foundation. b) Our immortal soul is not made, it does not rest, except in the immortal God. Psalm XVIII, 15.

13. God is invisible and incomprehensible. Therefore, a) with grateful heart and mouth let us acknowledge and celebrate that He has come forth from the secret seat of His majesty, and has revealed Himself to us both through the creation of the world and through the preaching of the word. b) Let this be a most effective solace to us travelers, that although we now see God in an enigma according to the state of this life, in the heavenly fatherland we shall see Him face to face. 1 Corinthians XV, 28.

14. God is most glorious. Wherefore, a) let us refer all our undertakings, words, and deeds to the glory of God, as to the ultimate goal, 1 Corinthians X, 31. b) Let the afflicted sons of God glory in the Lord, Jeremiah IX, 23, expecting from Him the riches of heavenly glory, Ephesians I.

15. God is most blessed. Let us therefore seek a) perennial beatitude not in creatures, but in the creator, the fount and author of solid beatitude. AUGUSTINE says very elegantly in On the Spirit and the Soul, ch. LXIII: "God is the highest good, sufficient unto Himself for all things, in need of nothing, whom all things need that they may be and be well." Let afflicted Christians in this world soothe their minds with a foretaste of heavenly beatitude; for it is divinely given to them to taste the powers of the world to come, Hebrews VI, 5.

16. God lives an intellectual life by perceiving and directing all things with a most perspicacious intellect, and by commanding all things with a most free will. Let us therefore a) also live a divine life after the example of Enoch. Genesis V, 24. Let us live by the will of God, not by the lusts of men, 1 Peter IV, 2. b) Let it be a most present solace to us that God does not delight in the death of a sinner, but wills that, repenting, he may live eternally with Him. Ezekiel XXXIII, 11.

17. God is omniscient and all-wise. And therefore, a) let us flee all hypocrisy, since God beholds not only external deeds, but also searches the hearts and reins. Psalm VII, 10. b) Let us not despair, being destitute of human help. For our heavenly father knows all things of which we have need, Matthew VI, 32. He sees the affliction of His people. Exodus III, 7.

18. God is benign and merciful. Therefore, a) let the care of the miserable also touch us. "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful," says Christ in Luke VI, 36. b) Conscious of even the gravest sins, let us not despair with Cain and Judas, but with contrite hearts let us appeal to the throne of divine mercy, repeating that saying of David: "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy great mercy." Psalm LI, 1. Indeed, to all the afflicted, the mercy of God is a sweet harbor for the soul and an anchor of hope, Isaiah LIV, 7.

19. God is most just. Let us therefore a) also live justly, Titus II, 12, by observing the divine laws, harming no one, giving to each his own, and standing by our promises and pacts. b) When oppressed by the unjust censures or judgments of others, let us constantly reflect with ourselves that God will bring a just cause to light. Micah VII, 9.

20. God is most truthful. Accordingly, a) by the example of our heavenly father, let us follow the truth. "Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour," says the prophet Zechariah, chap. VIII, 16. b) Let the divine promises suffuse us with living solace. "Fear not; I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward," Genesis XV, 1. "I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee," Joshua I, 5; Hebrews XIII, 5. Indeed, let us have no doubt that the most truthful God will fulfill His promises in deed itself.

21. God is omnipotent. Far be it, therefore, that we should try to measure the infinite power of God with the ten-foot pole of our reason! For God is able to do more than abundantly above what we understand, Ephesians III, 20. Rather, let us acknowledge that the glory of most humble obedience has been left to us, 1 Peter V, 6. b) In every necessity, the omnipotent hand of God, which can change all things, Psalm LXXVII, 11, sustains and refreshes us. "Father, all things are possible unto thee." Mark XIV, 36.

22. God is omnipresent. Therefore, a) let us cleanse our souls from all filth, that God may dwell in us. "Let him who prepares a home for God in his mind wipe away the filth of evil works," says GREGORY THE GREAT in homily XXX on the Gospels. b) Surrounded by uncertain danger, let us console ourselves with the most present help of God. For God has promised us His helping presence. Isaiah XLIII, 23; Psalm XCI, 14, 15. (*)

(*) But before we depart from here, the reserved things of the divine must be considered with great attention of mind. For in those perfections of God which have been in some way communicated to finite, especially intelligent, beings, many things proper to the infinite nature of God are found, which God has reserved for Himself. To begin from the principle: In every thing, that which is highest, and which altogether pertains to infinity and independence, cannot but always be the property of the one God. Therefore, the Reserved things are:

I. Of Divine Knowledge, which are generally comprehended under the name of Omniscience, specifically: 1) the most perfect knowledge of God Himself and of all His secret counsels, Job XV, 8; Isaiah XL, 13; Matthew XI, 27; Romans XI, 34; 1 Corinthians II, 10, 11. 2) The knowledge of all of nature, for He Himself is the one effector and moderator of all things, Psalm CXXXIX, 1, 5; Hebrews IV, 13. 3) The knowledge of all things that are superior to all the powers of nature; for God alone is able to effect miracles. 4) The knowledge of souls, 1 Kings VIII, 39, and that indeed (a) immediate, as is usually said, with no intervening revelation or declaration through signs, Psalm CXXXIX, 1, 3, 4; John II, 25; (b) certain, not probable, which force the word יָדַע obtains; (c) universal and perpetual, without any exception either of men, 1 Kings VIII, 39; Acts I, 24, or of thoughts and movements of the soul, of the hidden places and recesses in souls, of counsels however clandestine and of which man himself is not conscious, Psalm CXXXIX, 2, 4, 23. Finally, 5) prescience, and that indeed of all things which are (a) most remote, whence so many predictions of future events, to be expected only after many ages, (b) most minute, not only of a period of time, but also of a point and moment, Acts I, 7. (c) Future contingencies, Isaiah XLI, 22, 23; XLIII, 8, 9; XLIV, 7; 1 Samuel XXIII, 11.

II. Of Divine Wisdom: 1) The never-failing election of the best from among many goods, Genesis I, 31, 2. (טוֹב מְאֹד) The infinite amplitude and variety of innumerable ends and means, Psalm XL, 6; LXXI, 15; CIV, 24, which is the "manifold wisdom" (manifold wisdom), Ephesians III, 10. 3) The supreme authority of all counsels, Isaiah XL, 13; Romans XI, 34. 4) The immense profundity, which no one will ever be able to investigate, "the depth of the riches of wisdom" (the depth of the riches of wisdom), Romans XI, 33, 34; of which there are three most illustrious documents: (a) the admirable coupling of things, and as it were, a consenting combination for our well-being, Romans VIII, 28; (b) salutary outcomes, surpassing all hope and opinion of men, Genesis L, 20; Isaiah XXVIII, 29; (c) the selection of means of such a kind that they seem indeed completely contrary to the end and plainly absurd, but in reality are most apt and most suitable, 1 Corinthians I, 25, 27, 28. For what revelation teaches us in the kingdom of grace, reason and experience now demonstrate in the kingdom of nature, namely this: In the smallest things, there is the greatest virtue.

III. Of Divine Goodness. For besides God, no one is good, Matthew XIX, 17, namely, to use received terms, 1) independently, 2) excellently, as being the highest good, and the one most excellent of all, 3) causally, since all goods proceed from the one God, James I, 17, 4) constantly, without any mutability, ibid.

IV. Of Divine Truth, and specifically that which is called veracity: 1) Universality, without any exception, Joshua XXIII, 14; 2 Kings X, 10; Luke XVIII, 31; Acts III, 21. 2) Necessity, so that God cannot even ever deceive, Numbers XXII, 19; 1 Samuel XV, 29; Hebrews VI, 18.

V. Of Divine Power, as well as authority, since God is all-powerful, παντοκράτωρ (all-ruler), 2 Corinthians VI, 18; Revelation IV, 8; ισχυρός, δυνατός, Psalm LXII, 12; 1 Timothy VI, 15. Of this, therefore, the proper and reserved things are to be considered (a) by reason of things, or Objects; In the power of God alone is 1) the soul of every man, Matthew X, 28, to which pertains the right

(κ) of obliging the conscience, Romans II, 15; XIII, 5; 1 Peter II, 19; (b) of remitting sins, and that by His own authority, Mark II, 7. 2) Both fortunes, as being the highest and extreme in any action, Genesis XXXIX, 3; Deuteronomy XXX, 9; Psalm CXXVII, 1, 2; Ecclesiastes IX, 11. 3) Heaven no less than the whole earth, Psalm CXV, 16; CXXXV, 6; Daniel IV, 32. 4) The church, Ephesians I, 22. 5) Every Magistrate, with no exception even of the highest Rulers, Daniel II, 21; Romans XIII, 1, 2; 1 Timothy VI, 15. 6) The life and death of mortals, to the last one of all, Psalm XC, 3; Isaiah XXXVIII, 1, 5. 7) Judgment, and that the supreme, and therefore common, judgment, Genesis XVIII, 25; Psalm LIX, 14. 8) The whole nature of things, Psalm LXXXIII, 19, so that God alone is also able to effect miracles, much greater than the powers of nature, Exodus XV, 11; Psalm LXXII, 18.

(α) By reason of mode: God, and He alone, is able to do all things 1) by His own will, or, as is commonly said, independently, in such a way, namely, (a) that He has all power and authority in Himself, not given to Him by another, (b) that no one can ever resist God, (c) that He Himself is never bound to render an account of His deeds to anyone (all these three notions are contained in one saying, Daniel IV, 32). 2) Immediately, when He only wills and commands, Psalm XXXIII, 9; Revelation IV, 11, so that He can effect all things where there was nothing before, Romans IV, 17. 3) Infinitely, so that there was no beginning of His power, nor will there be any end, Daniel IV, 31; VI, 26. 4) Perfectly, so that not the least thing is wanting, Genesis I, 31; Isaiah XL, 26.

I consider this doctrine concerning the divine reservations to be one of the chief ones. For this will hereafter be of very great use, nay, it will bring the greatest moment to proving both the supreme divinity of Christ and of the Holy Spirit. For if we can demonstrate that sacred scripture asserts that those things which are proper to God, all of them without any exception, belong to Christ and the Holy Spirit no less than to the Father, it will consequently follow that we should not doubt that both Christ and the Holy Spirit are altogether equal to the Father, and therefore the supreme God. This will be established from what will be said below.

SUSPIRIUM

We give immortal thanks to thee, O ATERNAL GOD, that coming forth from the secret seat of thy majesty, thou hast revealed thyself to us with thy stupendous works in the kingdom of nature, and especially by thy revealed word.

Therefore, being anticipated and illumined by the light of thy grace, we acknowledge thee to be the most HOLY SPIRIT, and we adore thee in SPIRIT and in truth. We acknowledge thee as ever-living, and we ardently desire to live now for thee. We fear thee as omniscient, and thy avenging eye that sees all things. To thee, all-wise, and to thy counsel and will we commit our whole selves. We acknowledge thee as most benign, and as we recall thy benefits with grateful memory, so we proclaim them with grateful mouth. We implore thee as most merciful, and troubled by the recollection of our sins, we flee as suppliants to the sacred altar of thy mercy. We acknowledge thee as most powerful, and to thy right hand, which dispenses all things, we most humbly subject ourselves. We revere thee as most present, and we dedicate the temples of our hearts to thee for a gracious indwelling. Remain in us, O LORD, that we may remain eternally in thee!

CHAPTER II.
ON THE SUPREME MYSTERY
THE HOLY TRINITY.

Question I. How should the mystery of the Trinity be proposed and inculcated to the unlearned people in the simplest and plainest way?

HE WHO IS about to deliver the most august mystery of the venerable Trinity to the simple in the simplest and plainest manner should show 1) that God is one. 2) That the one God is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. 3) That the Father is one, the Son is another, the Holy Spirit is another. 4) That the Father eternally begets the Son, the Son is eternally begotten of the Father, and the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son.

Question II. Why does the church, in explaining the mystery of the Trinity, use words that do not exist, in their letter, in sacred scripture?

The church, in delivering the sublime and arduous article of faith concerning the most holy Trinity, uses certain words which do not exist literally (literally), or according to the letter, in sacred scripture, but are deduced from the same by a good and ready consequence, and are employed both to confute false doctrine (false doctrine) (a), and to declare the heavenly truth (orthodoxy) (b).

Proof a: The enemies of heavenly truth spoke the same as the catholic church, but they did not think the same, as IRENAEUS testifies in the preface to book I. Wherefore the church was compelled, in order to uncover the deceit of its adversaries, to use terms that do not exist in their letter in sacred scripture, yet do not differ from it in their sense. For when the church taught that there are three in whose name we are baptized, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, Sabellius, about to corrupt the dogma of the church by a false interpretation (false interpretation), said that those three were not distinguished by a real distinction, but that one and the same person was now called Father, now Son, now Holy Spirit. Therefore, so that the orthodoxy of this article might remain unimpaired, the church began to call those three, three distinct persons. When the church taught that the Father and the Son are one, John X, 30, Arius said that the Father and the Son are one in consent and will, just as the believers are said to have one heart, Acts IV, 32. Wherefore, so that orthodoxy might stand unshaken, the church began to teach that the Son is of one substance with (of one substance with) the Father. Cf. D. GERHARD, exegesis, book III, fol. 334.

Proof b: The most sublime mystery of the Trinity is briefly proposed and nervously explained by words received by the church, which indeed cannot be twisted into a foreign sense by the enemies of heavenly truth.

Question III. What are those words by which the mystery of the Trinity is briefly proposed and nervously explained by the church?

The ecclesiastical words by which the mystery of the Trinity is briefly and nervously proposed are trinity, essence, person, hypostasis, hypostatic character, personal notion, personal act, ομοῦσις (of one substance), περιχώρησις (circumincession); the meaning of which must here be elucidated, and their foundations shown from the sacred letters, before we proceed to prove this sublime article of faith.

Question IV. What does the word, Trinity, denote?

Description of the Trinity. Trinity, by the custom of ecclesiastical speech, here denotes the ternary number of the divine persons.

Obs. I. There are some who would have Trinity so called, as if it were the unity of three; but wrongly. For rightly, with ATHANASIUS, we venerate unity in Trinity and Trinity in unity. But who ever said: We venerate the unity of three in unity?

Obs. II. There is a great difference between trine and triple. Trine is that which, being one in essence, has three modes of subsisting. Triple is that which is composed of three. We say that God is trine, but we are forbidden by the Christian religion to say He is triple. In German, it is more correctly called die Dreyeinigkeit (the three-oneness), than die Dreyfaltigkeit (the threefoldness).

Proof: The word, Trinity, is drawn from the fountains of Israel; for indeed its concrete form is read in 1 John V, 7. "These three are one." Since therefore Holy Scripture uses the concrete, why should it not be permitted to collect from it the abstract, just as from one we collect unity?

Question V. What do you understand by the essence of God?

Essence of God. The essence of God is the spiritual and independent nature of God, common to the three divine persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

Proof: 1) In general, they define essence as that which is first conceived in a thing, without which the thing cannot be, and which is the foundation and cause of the other things that are in the same thing, from THOMAS's On Being and Essence, ch. 1, and Metaphysics VII, text 5. Since therefore in God we first conceive spirituality and independence, which in our way of understanding is the principle and foundation from which the divine attributes flow, we deliberately describe the essence of God as the spiritual and independent nature of God. But the divine attributes are the same thing (the same thing), equally common to the three persons of the divinity. For, "the Father is almighty, the Son is almighty, and the Holy Spirit is almighty: And yet they are not three almighties, but one almighty," says ATHANASIUS in his creed. 2) The word οὐσία, essence, is indeed not found in express letters in sacred scripture; yet it is elicited from it by an easy consequence. For a) God in the Old Testament is called יהוה, the one who causes to be: therefore He has an essence, and that an independent, infinite, and immutable one. b) In the New Testament, God is named ὁ ὢν, the one who is, Revelation I, 8. From which is οὐσία or essence. c) A synonym for the divine essence is φύσις θεία, the divine nature, which St. Peter mentions in his 2nd epistle, ch. I, 4. Essence, nature, and form of God, according to the holy fathers, is the same thing, says DAMASCENE, Isagoge, chap. I.

Question VI. What is a person?

Person. Person, viewed materially and concretely, is an intelligent suppositum. But a suppositum is a singular, incommunicable subsisting thing (a subsisting thing), not sustained by another. But formally, or abstractly, a person is considered the independent and incommunicable subsistence of a singular, complete, and intelligent substance.

Obs. We define 1) person, viewed concretely, by suppositum, i.e., a singular subsisting thing. There are those who define it by singular substance; but less accurately. For a person, considered in a concrete sense, is not a substance, but a subsisting thing (a subsisting thing), a singular subsisting thing, which consists of a substance and an ultimate mode of subsisting. When CRELLIUS, the Socinian, defined person by substance, D. SCHERZERUS responded: "You define person falsely. 'Subsisting' must be substituted for the word 'substance'," in his Anti-Socinian collection, p. 264. And the Augustan confessors in article 1 say: "We use the name 'person' in that signification in which the ecclesiastical writers have used it in this cause, so that it signifies not a part or quality in another, but that which properly subsists." Since, however, to subsist belongs to substances, it follows that no accident is a person. 2) Every person is a singular subsisting thing. Therefore, universals are not persons, since when considered formally they do not exist outside the intellect. We call a person a singular subsisting thing (a subsisting thing), not an individual; because this implies a logical respect to the most special species, which is predicated of an individual. But God is not predicated in the manner of a species of the divine persons, nor do these differ by numerically diverse essences, just as individuals do. 3) Every person is an intelligent suppositum. This stone, this tree, this horse, are indeed called supposita, but not persons, because they are destitute of intellect. 4) Every person subsists incommunicably, i.e., the subsistence of one person cannot be communicated to another person, because each person obtains its own and ultimate act of subsisting, so that it cannot be further terminated by another person. 5) Every person subsists independently of another united to it as a sustainer. For which reason the human nature of Christ is not called a person, because it is united with the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), by which it is terminated in subsisting.

Question VII. What do you understand by hypostasis?

Hypostasis. ὑπόστασις (Hypostasis), not differently than person, abstractly denotes the incommunicable mode of subsisting of a singular and complete substance; concretely it is the same as a subsisting thing (a subsisting thing) or a suppositum.

Obs. I. The holy Fathers, as DAMASCENE testifies in his dialogue, chap. XXVI, called hypostasis and person the same thing. Yet person differs from hypostasis in this very thing, that hypostasis is common to an intellectual nature and to one devoid of reason; person is said only of an intellectual nature.

Obs. II. The formal and abstract signification of both person and hypostasis has its place when three persons, or hypostases, are asserted in one divine essence. For by that assertion of the catholic church, three relative and incommunicable modes of subsisting of the one divine essence are indicated, and are called by the Greeks τρόποι ὑπάρξεως, modes of subsistence; since to each person a proper mode of subsisting belongs; for the Father subsists unbegottenly (ἀγεννήτως), the Son begottenly (γεννητῶς), the Holy Spirit processingly (ἐκπορεύτως).

Proof. Although the word 'person' in the signification in which it is here used by the church is not read, yet since the Greek fathers called that 'hypostasis' which the Latins called 'person', it is incumbent on us to deduce the name ὑποστάσεως (of hypostasis) from the sacred letters. The word ὑπόστασις (hypostasis) is found in Hebrews I, 3, where the Son of God is called the express image of the Father's hypostasis (χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως τοῦ πατρὸς). There are those who deny that hypostasis is used by the apostle in the ecclesiastical sense, to denote the person of the Father. But our GERHARDUS rightly admonishes that the name of person is taken either materially and concretely, for a suppositum having an essence, or formally and precisely, so that it is distinguished from the essence, and is the same as personality. In the former sense, the Son of God is called the image of the Father's person, but not in the latter sense. The image immediately respects the person, because an image, as such, is a relative term; it mediately respects the essence, because the Son of God is not only an imperfect, but a most perfect substantial image of the Father. The correlate of the image is indeed the person, but the foundation, by reason of which the Son is called the image of the Father, is the essence of the Father communicated to the Son through eternal generation. To which LUTHER referred when he rendered it in German as das Ebenbild seines Wesens (the image of his being). For he indicated the essence marked by the hypostatic character of the Father. The divine essence, viewed absolutely, cannot be understood by ὑπόστασιν (hypostasis) in this apostolic passage, because the same essence is in the Father and the Son. But an image is not an image of itself, but of another. See AUGUSTINE, book VII, on the Trinity, ch. 1. Cf. GERHARD's exegesis, loc. III, fol. 342, and D. CALOVIUS's system, tom. III, p. 98.

Question VIII. What is noted by the name hypostatic character?

Hypostatic Character. The hypostatic character, or personal property, is a relation founded in a personal act, constituting a person in the being of a certain person, and inferring a real distinction from another person through relative opposition.

Question IX. How many hypostatic characters or personal properties are there?

The hypostatic characters of the divine persons are three: paternity, filiation, and passive spiration, or procession, strictly so called.

Proof. Paternity is a relation founded in active generation, constituting God the Father in the being of the Father, and, through the relative opposition which exists between paternity and filiation, inferring a real distinction between God the Father and the Son. The same judgment should be formed concerning filiation and passive spiration. The term, hypostatic character, undoubtedly derives its origin from Hebrews I, 3, where the Son of God is called, as we indicated above, the character, or image, of the Father's hypostasis, because He represents the person of the Father with respect to the essence. From this it came to be that indiscriminately every relation by which one divine person represents or respects another is called a hypostatic character or personal property.

Obs. The proximate foundation of the hypostatic relation is the personal act; which, since it founds the relation and does not really differ from it, is not rarely called by theologians a hypostatic character or personal property. Thus the active generation of God the Father, and the passive generation of the Son of God, is a hypostatic character. Certainly, by the consent of all, by the name of passive spiration, or procession, the personal property of the Holy Spirit is expressed. Cf. D. CALOV. in system. tom. III. p. 193, sqq.; D. SCHERZ. in system. p. 65.

Question X. What are personal notions?

Personal Notions. Personal notions are the reasons for knowing the divine persons and for distinguishing them ad intra; of which some are constitutive (συστητικαί), or constitutive of each person in the being of such a person; some are significative (σημαντικαί), or significative, which indeed notify the divine persons and indicate their distinction, but do not constitute any person in the being of such a person.

Obs. The constitutive personal notions coincide with the hypostatic characters, or personal properties; which, if they are counted among the personal notions, the personal notions are numbered as five: innascibility and paternity in the Father, spiration in the Father and the Son, filiation in the Son, procession in the Holy Spirit. But insofar as personal notions, taken more strictly, are only significative and notificative (σημαντικαί and θεωρητικαί), i.e., only significative and notificative, and distinct from personal properties, there are only two personal notions: innascibility and active spiration. For unbegottenness (ἀγεννησία) or innascibility indeed notifies God the Father and indicates that He derives His origin from no other person, but it does not constitute Him in the being of the Father, and is therefore not His hypostatic character, but a personal notion. Active spiration, since it is common to God the Father and the Son, is not a property, but a personal notion. On personal notions, D. IO. ADAM. OSIANDER in his systematic collection, part 1, p. 408, D. BAYER in his compendium of theology, p. 251, and D. BREITHAUPT in his theological institutions, p. 350, have treated accurately.

Question XI. Which are the personal acts?

Personal Acts. The personal acts are those which are terminated within the divine essence at a certain person, and whose principle of acting is not the divine essence common to the three persons, but one or two are the persons; and they are two, generation and spiration.

Obs. I. The personal acts are also called works ad intra, concerning which that well-worn theological axiom is true: the personal works ad intra are divided, i.e., they are not common to all the persons of the divinity; since a work proper to one person does not belong to another, relatively opposed to it.

Obs. II. Generation no less than spiration, viewed with respect to the principle from which it emanates, is called active, and with respect to the term which it produces, passive, speaking grammatically; although on the part of God the nativity of the Word (τοῦ λόγου) is eternal, most pure, and devoid of all passion, it is an emanation from the Father, while the procession of the Holy Spirit is His emanation from the Father and the Son; since passive potentiality does not fall upon God.

Question XII. What does the word ὁμούσιος signify?

ὁμούσιος The Greek word ὁμούσιος is rendered in Latin as coessential or consubstantial, and denotes that the three persons of the divinity are of one and the same essence.

Proof. The Greek word ὁμούσιος is derived from ὁμῶς, together, or at the same time, and οὐσία, essence, and indicates that the Son of God and the Holy Spirit are of the same essence with God the Father and co-eternal. It is deduced from those sayings of scripture which testify that two or three persons, expressly named, are one. Christ says in John X, 30, "I and the Father are one." St. John says: "These three are one," 1 ep. V, 7. AUGUSTINE says appositely in tractate 97 on John: "Against the impiety of the Arian heretics, the fathers coined a new name, ομοούσιον, but they did not signify a new thing by such a name; for that is called homousion which is: 'I and the Father are one,' namely, of one and the same substance." God the Father and the Son are one, not indeed by a unity of person, nor only of will and concord, but of essence, not specifically, but most singularly one. This is gathered 1) from the purpose. Christ proves that no one can snatch the sheep from His hand, because He and the Father are one; that whatever power the Father has, the Son has the same. Imagine that the discourse is only of a unity of concord; by the same consequence you could infer that no one can be snatched from the hand of John or Peter either. 2) From the manner of speaking befitting God (θεοπρεπῶς) concerning divine things. From which we conclude in this manner: The one will of the Father is the one essence of the Father (for the divine attributes are the same thing with the essence of God (ταυτό)). But the will of Christ is that one will of the Father. Therefore, the will of Christ is the very essence of the Father. These things being well considered, the council of Nicaea asserted and defended the ὁμοουσίαν, i.e., the most singular unity of essence, in the three divine persons against the Arians. The ὁμοουσία was so hateful to these that they preferred to thrust their own ὁμοιούσιον upon the church. From this it happened that the entire Christian world was distracted by only a single letter. Yet that one letter represented not a light, but a great difference between the catholic dogma and the Arian; since by ὁμοουσίαν the Son of God was designated by the catholics as independent, eternal, and the supreme God with the Father, while by ὁμοιούσιον He was designated by the Arians as a creature similar to the creator, but in respect of essence infinitely distant from the creator. For the rest, EPIPHANIUS in his Ancoratus admonishes that συνέσιον is one thing, ταυτούσιον another, and ὁμοούσιον another. Συνέσιον denotes a specific unity of essence, as the one common essence of all men; ταυτούσιον signifies in one essence one person, exerting itself with diverse properties and operations; but ὁμοούσιον denotes a numerical unity of essence, with a distinction of persons. AMBROSE says splendidly in Book III, on the faith, ch. VII: "Rightly do we call the Son of God homousion with the Father; because by that word both the distinction of persons and the unity of nature is signified." Cf. D.

CHEMNITZ, in theological loci, on the three divine persons, fol. m. 46.

Question XIII. What does the word περιχώρησις signify?

Περιχώρησις is rendered in Latin as immeation, circumincession, immanence, and denotes the eternal and intimate immanence of one divine person in another.

Obs. 1. The word περιχώρησις is not biblical, but ecclesiastical, used by DAMASCENE in book I of the orthodox faith, ch. 19. It is distinguished by theologians into essential and personal. The former is the most singular immanence of one divine person in another; the latter is the intimate and ineffable immeation, by which the divinity of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) intimately permeates, inhabits, and perfects the assumed humanity. We are presently concerned with the essential περιχώρησις of the divine persons, which is founded on the words of Christ in John XIV, 11: "Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me." Cf. John XVII, 21. Namely, the essential περιχώρησις of the divine persons causes the Father to be in the Son, the Son in the Father, and the Holy Spirit in both.

Obs. II. The ecclesiastical words having been elucidated, by which the most august mystery of the Holy Trinity is commonly proposed in the church, the truth of this mystery must now be demonstrated. Since, therefore, the most singular unity of the divine essence has been lucidly proven above, it will now be worthwhile to show clearly that both the indefinite plurality of the divine persons and, determinately, their trinity are most openly taught by the Holy Spirit in the divine letters.

Question XIV. In how many ways does the sacred scripture of the Old and New Testament propose the number of the divine persons?

Pragmatology. Sacred scripture proposes the number of the divine persons in two ways: (1) It teaches their plurality indefinitely or indeterminately. (2) It expresses the trinity of the divine persons definitely or determinately.

Proof of the Trinity. Obs. I. To the more unlearned, who are to be imbued with catechetical doctrine, the faithful catechist should propose and inculcate from the outset not the indefinite plurality of the divine persons, but their determinate trinity, according to the divine command in Matthew XXVIII, 19, where the ministers of the church are ordered to teach and baptize the nations in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. But in a disputation with adversaries, one playing the part of the respondent can, against the objected unity of one person in the divine essence, in the first conflict (whose end is to confound the adversary and to convict his antithesis of falsehood) defend the indefinite plurality of the divine persons. In the second action, or the progress of the disputation, he should confirm the catholic truth, namely, that there are no more and no fewer divine persons than three, and that they are that one true and supreme God. See in HULSEMANN, breviar. enucleat. p. 128.

Obs. II. The indefinite plurality of the divine persons is more frequently proposed in the Old Testament, although the determinate trinity is not merely tacitly or obscurely insinuated there either. In the New Testament, however, testimonies of the indefinite plurality of the divine persons are rarer, while testimonies of the Holy Trinity are more frequent and clearer than in the Old Testament.

Question XV. By what arguments will you demonstrate the indefinite plurality of the divine persons?

The arguments by which the indefinite plurality of the divine persons is proven are sought from the lucid testimonies of sacred scripture, of which some vindicate distinct divine actions for distinct persons (a), some attribute common colloquies and common works to several divine persons in the plural number (b), some make manifest mention of several divine persons (c), and some express the plurality of the divine persons with names of the plural number (d).

Proof a: The Son of God is begotten by God, Psalm II, 7. God is anointed by God, Psalm XLV, 8. Jehovah is sent by Jehovah, Isaiah XLVIII, 16. The Lord is exalted to the right hand by the Lord, Psalm CX, 1. We argue; Wherever God is introduced as begetting and begotten, anointing and anointed, sending and sent, exalting and exalted, there several divine persons are introduced. But in the sacred letters, God is introduced as begetting and God as begotten, etc. Therefore.

Proof b: (1) From Genesis I, 26. "And Elohim said (by distribution, each one of the Elohim, or the divine persons, said to one another, exciting and consulting themselves): Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." We argue; where there are several speaking and consulting, there are several persons. But in the divinity, there are several speaking and consulting. Therefore, in the divinity there are several persons.

You say: I. God speaks of Himself in the plural number out of honor, in the manner of princes. Resp. No king or prince speaks of himself alone in the sacred letters in the Hebrew language, which is most simple and devoid of all artifice, in the plural number. In other languages, indeed, princes speaking of themselves use the plural number, but they signify that they are deciding something with the assistance of counselors and nobles; which cannot be said of the all-wise God.

You say: II. God conferred or consulted with angels. Resp. Angels were never admitted into the counsel of God, Isaiah XL, 13; nor could they concur in the work of creation, which is of infinite power; nor were men created in the image of angels, but in the image of God.

Proof the same (2) From Genesis XI, 7. "Jehovah said: go to, let us go down, and there confound their language." The adversaries object that God joined the angels to Himself in the confusion of tongues; but in vain. For the confusion of tongues belongs to God alone, who possesses that incomparable power, that He can act immediately upon the minds of men, insert other concepts, other thoughts into them, and obliterate the memory of a language previously most known. (*)

Proof c: (1) From Genesis III, 22. "And Jehovah God said (to himself): Behold, the man is become as one of us (divine persons), to know good and evil (and yet he sinned)." Whoever compares one to several of his own order by reason of knowledge, designates several persons. But God, speaking of himself, compares one man to several of his own order by reason of knowledge.

(*) To this is added that in v. 8, the singular number is used. This, therefore, when compared with that plural number in v. 7, does not allow us to doubt that these many, who are one Jehovah, are signified.

Therefore, God designates several persons. (**)

(2) An illustrious passage is Isaiah VI, 8, where Adonai says: "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" He who says "for us" implies that he is not one (in person), but that there are others with him, and therefore several. That אלהים is a divine name that is plural not only in its termination but also in its signification, we have demonstrated above. This divine name is construed (1) with a plural verb, Genesis XX, 13, where Abraham says: "And it came to pass, when Elohim caused me to wander from my father's house." Since there is only one God, by Elohim construed with a plural verb we cannot but understand several divine persons. Cf. Genesis XXXV, 7; 2 Samuel VII, 23. (2) It is construed with a plural adjective. Thus by Joshua ch. XXIV, 19, they are called קדשים אלהים, holy divine persons.

You say: Elohim is also construed with a singular verb, Genesis I, 1, ברא אלהים. Resp. It is construed with a singular verb to indicate the mystery of several persons in the one essence of God.

Question XVI. How will you prove the determinate Trinity of the divine persons?

The determinate Trinity of the divine persons is proven by indubitable testimonies of sacred scripture, of which some exhibit all three persons of the divinity conjunctively, while some distinctly teach that not only the eternal Father, but also the Son of the eternal Father, as well as the Holy Spirit, is true and supreme God. Both classes of testimonies concerning the most holy Trinity are drawn both from the apostolic writings of the New Testament and from the prophetic monuments of the Old Testament.

Obs. A distinction must be made here between the order of divine revelation and the method of demonstration. The latter proceeds in such a way that we begin from the clearer and progress to the less clear; the former observes the series of times. Since we must here demonstrate the trinity of the divine persons against the enemies of heavenly truth, attending to the method of demonstration, we premise the testimonies of the New Testament, as clearer, to the testimonies of the Old Testament, in which a lesser degree of clarity is noticed.

Question XVII. What are the testimonies of the New Testament by which the trinity of the divine persons is exhibited conjunctively?

The testimonies of the New Testament by which the trinity of the divine persons is proposed conjunctively, our regeneration through baptism (a), the theophany (θεοφάνειαν) or appearance of the divine persons (b), the incarnation of the Son of God (c), the mission of the Holy Spirit (d), the gracious indwelling of God in us (e), the divine operation in the church and its ministry (f), the religious veneration of God (g), and the apostolic assertion concerning the ὁμοουσία (consubstantiality) of the divine persons (h), perspicuously expound, so that we may be imbued with the salutary knowledge of the most holy Trinity.

Proof a: Christ, just about to ascend into heaven, prescribed the solemn form of administering baptism to His disciples, Matthew XXVIII, 19: "Go ye therefore, and make disciples (μαθητεύσατε) (to me) of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." From this classic text we demonstrate (1) the Deity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, (2) their personal distinction, (3) the ὁμοουσίαν (consubstantiality), i.e., the one essence, of the divine persons. We argue: He in whose name we are baptized is the true and supreme God. We are baptized in the name of God the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is the true and supreme God. The major premise is established, because we are baptized in the name of Him who instituted baptism, the means of grace and salvation. But God alone, the fount of grace and author of salvation, instituted baptism. Add that we are baptized in the name of Him in whom we are bound to believe and whom we are bound to invoke; for by the sacrament of baptism we are bound to the profession of faith, worship, and obedience of Him who is the author of

(**) Besides the fact that man is said to have been created not in the image of angels, but in the image of God, it should also be noted that man in the state of integrity was not similar to, but equal to the angels, just as we will be "equal unto the angels" (ισάγγελοι), not "like the angels" (ὁμοιάγγελοι), when we have arrived at consummate blessedness. Luke XX, 36.

baptism. Therefore, baptism is called the answer of a good conscience toward God, 1 Peter III, 21. "We ought to believe as we have been baptized, to adore as we believe," says BASIL THE GREAT, epistle LXXVIII. Then, those who are baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit must believe that there are three divine persons. But all nations are baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Therefore. The major premise is clear, because without any doubt the Father and the Son differ as distinct persons. But in the same way that the Son is distinguished from the Father in the words of the institution of baptism, in the same way the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the Father and the Son, as the series of the text shows. But the Son is distinguished from the Father as a person. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is also distinguished from the Father and the Son as a person. Furthermore, the Holy Spirit is not only proposed in this place as other than the Father and the Son, but is also so conjoined with these divine persons in the administration of baptism that the same name, the same authority of instituting baptism, the same majesty of adoration, the same power of regenerating, which belongs to the Father and the Son, is attributed to Him. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is a divine person. It is certainly absurd and contrary to living speech to apply the same name to persons and to a non-person. Finally, we prove the ὁμοῦσιαν (consubstantiality) of the divine persons, because we are not baptized into the names, but into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, that we may be obliged to acknowledge and venerate the same name, the same authority, majesty, sanctity, grace, and power, and therefore the same essence of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

The Socinians object (1): To be baptized in someone's name is not an indication of deity, since one can also be baptized into a man; thus the Israelites were baptized into Moses, as Paul testifies in 1 Corinthians X, 1.

Resp. (a) It is one thing to be baptized into someone, another to be baptized in the name of someone. The former can be explained ministerially, the latter only authoritatively. (b) A distinction must be made between baptism properly so called, which is the laver of regeneration and a sacrament of the New Testament, and typical or metaphorical baptism. Baptism properly so called cannot be administered in the name of any man; but the baptism of the Israelites into Moses was typical, by which they were obliged to render obedience and service to Moses, the servant of God, so that under the cloud they might readily pass through the Red Sea, with Moses leading the way; just as we by the baptism of regeneration are obliged to place our trust in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

They object (2): It is not new, in matters of no less moment than baptism, for things and persons not pertaining to His essence to be joined to God. Thus, 1 Samuel XII, 18, the people are said to have feared the Lord and Samuel. Exodus XIV, 31, where the Israelites are said to have believed God and His servant Moses. Ephesians VI, 10, Paul says, "be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might," where Paul joins with the Lord, who is a person, the power of God, which is not a person, but a divine attribute. Resp. (1) The examples adduced are dissimilar and unsuitable. For God and Moses are joined as master and servant, as principal and instrumental cause, by reason of a concurrence to a certain third thing, which belongs to God and the creature (not equally, but in a different way). But to dispense baptism in someone's name belongs to no creature, 1 Corinthians I, 13. Let our adversaries produce an example from the sacred letters where God and a man by a single, simultaneous command, and with equal authority, instituted a new sacrament, and we will yield to them. (2) A non-person is never joined to persons in an authoritative communion (as happens in this place, where one name is attributed to three) of a divinely ordained means of salvation. Paul indeed says, "be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might," but he does not attribute one name to the Lord and His power. To be baptized in the name of a divine attribute, or even of a divine breath, is unheard of in the sacred writings and unsuitable.

Proof b: A most illustrious theophany (θεοφάνεια) or divine appearance occurred in the administration of baptism conferred on Christ, which is described in Matthew III, 16; Mark I, 10; Luke III, 22. Concerning this theophany (θεοφάνειαν), we observe (1) three names. For He whose voice is heard from heaven is called the Father, 2 Peter I, 17. He who stands on the bank of the Jordan is called the Son, Matthew III, 17. He who descends in the form of a dove is called the Holy Spirit, Luke III, 22. (2) Three distinct symbols of manifestation, as the Father appears by a voice, the Son by a body, the Spirit by a bird. (3) Three distinct acts; of the Father crying from heaven, of the Son standing in the Jordan, of the Holy Spirit descending in the form of a dove. (4) The common deity of the three persons. For the Father, crying from heaven, is undoubtedly true God; to whom the Son is coessential, since He is not an adopted, but the natural Son of God; for He is emphatically called with a doubled Greek article "the son, the beloved" (ὁ υἱὸς ὁ ἀγαπητός), in whom all the good pleasure (ἐνδοκία) of God resides and is at rest. But every natural son has the same essence with his father; the same, I say, in species in human affairs, the same in number in divine affairs. The Spirit, who descended in the form of a dove, cannot be a creature; for He came upon Christ for this reason, that He might fill and anoint Him, as He is man, with gifts, so that He might preach liberty to the captives and release to the prisoners, Isaiah LXI, 3, who also afterwards drove Christ into the desert, Matthew IV, 1. Therefore, that Spirit is true God. These things being premised, we argue; As many persons as there are in the divinity, by so many names, external symbols, and distinct acts did God manifest Himself in the baptism of Christ. But God manifested Himself in the baptism of Christ by three names, three external symbols, and three distinct acts. Therefore, there are three persons in the divinity.

The Socinians, seeking to cut the nerve of this argument, object (1) that no theophany (θεοφάνειαν) occurred at Christ's baptism, since besides Christ and the Holy Spirit nothing was seen, but only a divine voice was heard; (2) that the Holy Spirit did not appear in the form of a dove, but only descended from on high upon Christ with a rush and a sound like a dove; (3) that the form of a dove no more argues the Holy Spirit to be a person than the tongues of fire, which were many, were many persons; (4) that the external symbols, since they were separate, infer three persons distinct not only really, but also essentially; for what are distant in place have distinct essences.

Resp. to 1) That God the Father manifested Himself by an audible voice is clear (a) from the correlate, which is the Son; for He cried: "This is my beloved son." (b) From the assertion of Peter in his 2nd Epistle, ch. I, 17, where he says of Christ: "For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

Ad 2): The adverb ὡσεὶ does not denote a mode of descending similar to the flight of a dove, but the form of a dove; for the dove was seen and it remained upon him, John I, 32. "The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove," according to Luke III, 22.

Ad 3): We establish the personality of the Holy Spirit from this theophany (θεοφάνεια): Whoever assumed a bodily form, appeared in it, and visibly descended, he is a subsisting suppositum (ὁφιστάμενον), and, since he is of an intellectual nature, a person. But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore. That he is a person distinct from the Father and the Son is clear from the fact that not the Father, not the Son, but only the Holy Spirit assumed the form of a dove. The example sought from the multitude of fiery tongues, from Acts II, is disparate. For the Holy Spirit occupied those many tongues with the same form of fire. Wherefore, there was not a diverse, but one symbol of the same Spirit, dispersed through many tongues. But in Matthew III, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are distinctly named. The Father manifests Himself by one external symbol, the Son by another, the Holy Spirit by another, and according to the diversity of the symbol, diverse acts are produced by them.

Ad 4): From the separation of external signs to the separation of the thing signified, the consequence is not valid. Although the external symbols are separated and essentially distinguished, the divine persons are nevertheless neither separated nor essentially distinguished; for they are one, 1 John V, 7. The symbolic manifestation of the Trinity implies a personal, not an essential, distinction.

Proof c: We are led to the acknowledgment of the Holy Trinity by the incarnation of the Son of God, which the angel announces to St. Mary and declares in Luke I, 35: "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." The incarnation of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) flows from the common hand, as it were, of the Trinity, if you consider its principle; but it is terminated at the sole person of the Son of God (just as three virgins place a crown on one from their number). Cf. D. DANNH. in hodós. phan. II. p. 185. Wherefore the angel commemorates all three persons of the divinity: he calls God the Father the Highest, who sent the Son into the flesh, Galatians IV, 4. He calls the Son of God the power of the Highest, who overshadowed Mary in a secret and ineffable manner, by filling the temple of his body in Mary's womb with all the fullness of the divinity, just as God once filled the temple of Solomon, 1 Kings VIII, 11, by an overshadowing (ἐπισκιασμόν). But the Holy Spirit, as the angel foretold, will come upon Mary, by exciting the droplets of blood, sanctifying them, and from them forming the body of Christ. For this reason, pious antiquity derived a proof of the Trinity from the incarnation of the Word (τοῦ λόγου). RUFFINUS says beautifully in his exposition of the creed: "See the simple Trinity cooperating! The Holy Spirit is said to come, and the power of the Highest to overshadow. And who is the power of the Highest, but Christ Himself, who is the power and might of God? Whose power is this? Of the Highest. Therefore, the Highest is present, the power of the Highest is present, the Holy Spirit is present." We argue: Whoever, from the revealed word of God, acknowledges that the incarnation of the Son of God is the work of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, cannot but believe in the Trinity of the divine persons. But all Christians, etc. Therefore.

The Socinians object; (1) that only God the Father is called the Highest by the angel; (2) that Christ is called the Son of God on account of His singular conception from the Holy Spirit; (3) that the Holy Spirit is named the power of the Highest, and therefore is not Himself the highest God, nor even a person, since power is not a person.

Resp. ad 1): God the Father is indeed called the highest, but not exclusively, since Christ is also designated by the name of the highest, Luke I, 76. Ad 2): The angel does not say that Christ is called the Son of God on account of His singular conception by the Holy Spirit, but because of the overshadowing of the power of the Highest. For the conclusive conjunction διὸ, therefore, immediately refers to the words immediately preceding: "the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee," so that the sense is: because the Son of God, the consubstantial power of the Father, overshadowed Mary, by assuming flesh in her womb and uniting it to Himself, therefore that which will be born of Mary will be called the Son of God. Certainly, if Christ is called the Son of God because He was conceived by the Holy Spirit, it will follow that the Holy Spirit Himself is the father of Christ, which we are forbidden by the Christian religion to say. Ad 3): Not the Holy Spirit, but the Son of God is called the power of the Highest, since Paul also calls Christ the power of God, 1 Corinthians I, 24. There is no need to object that power is not a person; for Reuben was also called the strength of his father, Genesis XLIX, 3, who was a true person.

Proof d: We seek a not invalid proof of the Holy Trinity from the mission of the Holy Spirit, which is described in John XIV, 16: "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever." In the same chapter, v. 26: "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things." John XV, 26: "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth (ἐκπορεύεται) from the Father, he shall testify of me." Cf. Galatians IV, 6. Obs. We use these testimonies both to demonstrate the deity of the Son of God, and especially the personality of the Holy Spirit, since both are attacked with great effort by our adversaries. To this end, we argue: (1) He who is not true God with the Father, equal to Him in unity of essence, does not have the right to send the Holy Spirit. But the Son of God has the right to send the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the Son is true God with the Father, equal to Him in unity of essence. The major premise is established, because according to the mind of our adversaries, the Holy Spirit is the power and efficacy of God. But no one can send the power and efficacy of God unless he himself is God. (2) The Holy Spirit is described by Christ as a comforter, as another comforter, as the spirit of truth, teaching all things, who proceeds from the Father, is sent in the name of the Son, whom the Son also sends from the Father. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is a divine person distinct from the Father and the Son of God. The reason for the consequence is by no means obscure, since all those predicates befit only a true person, and likewise infer a personal distinction.

The Socinians object; (1) that Christ obtains from the Father by prayers that he may be able to send the Holy Spirit, and is not its fount or source, and therefore not equal to Him from whom he is derived. (2) Nor can the Holy Spirit be equal to Him from whom He proceeds and is given. Resp. ad 1): Intercession of a person does not in itself argue inequality, since an equal can intercede with an equal, indeed a greater with a lesser, a prince with a count, for some third party. But Christ, as man, asks the Father for the sending of the Holy Spirit, when indeed, as God, He obtains the right of sending by nature. Nor indeed is the Father alone the fount and source of the Holy Spirit, but also the Son of God, from whom, as He receives wisdom, so He receives the essence of the Holy Spirit, John XVI, 14, 15. Ad 2): It is not permissible to infer inequality from the fact that the Holy Spirit proceeds from and is given by the Father and the Son, but only the origin and order in the Holy Trinity is to be gathered from it.

Proof e: The mystery of the Trinity becomes known from the gracious indwelling of the triune God in the faithful, which the Savior promises in John XIV, 23: "If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." Paul teaches the same in 1 Corinthians III, 16: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" From these divine utterances we argue: Whoever dwells in the faithful, as in consecrated temples, is true God. But the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit dwell in the faithful, as in consecrated temples. Therefore. The major premise shines with its own light. "Ye are the temple of the living God," says Paul in 2 Corinthians VI, 16. Cf. Leviticus XXVI, 22. CYRIL says splendidly in Book XXXIV of his Thesaurus: "No creature, nor any made thing, is said to dwell as God in a temple."

The dissenters object: (1) that according to the opinion of the Lutherans, Christ also dwells in the pious according to His assumed human nature, which is not God; (2) that from the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the faithful it does not follow that the Holy Spirit is a divine person, since God dwells in the saints through His Spirit, as through His power. Resp. ad I: The human nature of Christ, viewed not in itself, but in the personal union, inasmuch as it has been assumed into the hypostasis of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), has been elevated into the fellowship of the Holy Trinity. Ad II: The deity of the Holy Spirit is invincibly asserted from His gracious indwelling in the pious. For He Himself, whose temple the Corinthians are said to be, is expressly called God; but He, according to Paul, is the Spirit of God. Nor do we read anywhere in the sacred letters that God dwells in us through the Holy Spirit as through His power, but just as God the Father and the Son, as divine persons, dwell in the pious, so also we rightly conclude that the Holy Spirit dwelling in them is a divine person.

Proof f: The Trinity of divine persons is known from the divine operation of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit in the church, which the apostle teaches in 1 Corinthians XII, 3, 4, 5, 6: "Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed; and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all." There are some who take vv. 4-6 to refer to the person of the Holy Spirit, and think that he comes under the name of one Spirit, one Lord, one God. But since the apostle wishes to recall the Corinthians to the adequate object of Christian worship and faith, which is the triune God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and by "one Lord" he understands the same one whom in v. 3 he had called "the Lord Jesus" (κύριον Ἰησοῦν), and by "one God" he designates the same one of whom in v. 3 he had spoken as the Spirit of God, we have no doubt that all three persons of the divinity are exhibited conjunctively by the apostle in this passage. Namely, to the Holy Spirit are assigned spiritual gifts (χαρίσματα), both ministering and sanctifying, according to the third article of the Apostles' Creed; administrations (διακονίαι) in the church are attributed to Christ, the Lord and archbishop of the church; operations (ἐνεργήματα) are vindicated for God the Father, from whom originally is all faculty of operating. Cf. D. CALOV. in bibl. illustrat. on this passage, fol. 378. We argue: He from whom all gifts, all ministries, all operations in the church depend, is true God. But from God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore.

The Socinians object: (1) that although divine gifts and operations are ascribed to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, it cannot be inferred that they are of the same essence; (2) that the Lord and the Spirit are here clearly distinguished from the one God, so that the name of Lord signifies something less than the name of God; and the Holy Spirit, since he is distinguished from God, denotes only the power of God. Resp. ad (1): All divine gifts and works proceed from God, whose essence is only one. Ad (2): The celestial Father is indeed called God, but not exclusively. For just as Christ the Lord and the Holy Spirit do not exclude God the Father from dominion and the communion of a spiritual nature, so neither does God the Father exclude Christ and the Holy Spirit from the unity of the divine essence. Nor is Christ a subordinate Lord, but the supreme Lord, the Lord of lords, Revelation XIX, 16. Nor is the Holy Spirit the power of God without a hypostasis (ἄνυπόστατος), destitute of its own personality, but self-subsisting (αὐθυπόστατος), an intelligent suppositum, or a true divine person; since the same Spirit works and distributes to each one as he wills, 1 Corinthians XII, 11. But operations belong to supposita. (*)

Proof g: The trinity of the divine persons becomes manifest from the apostolic wish in 2 Corinthians XIII, 13: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all! Amen!" Obs. The apostle in this final wish placed the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ in the first place, not to invert the order among the divine persons, but to set forth the substantial foundation of faith and salvation, which is Christ, 1 Corinthians III, 11, the author and finisher of our faith, Hebrews XII, 2, by whose merit both the love of the Father and the communion of the Holy Spirit were obtained for the fallen human race. Wherefore, the Apostle understands the special love of the Father and the active communion of the Holy Spirit, who indeed makes us partakers of the grace of Christ and the love of the Father. From this apostolic wish an argument arises: He whose love, grace, and communion we pray for for ourselves and others with pious wishes and sighs, is one and true God. But we pray for the love of the Father, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the communion of the Holy Spirit for ourselves and others. Therefore, the celestial Father, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit are one and true God. (**)

The adversaries object: 1) It is one thing to wish that the communion of the Holy Spirit be with all, another to invoke the Holy Spirit. 2) The name κοινωνίας, communion, is not taken actively, but passively, so that it is understood of the gifts of the Holy Spirit communicated to us, which do not sustain the name of a person. 3) Only the Father is designated by the name of God pre-eminently (κατ' ἐξοχήν).

Resp. ad I: The apostolic wish is a votive invocation of the Holy Trinity. The Father and the Son are joined to the Holy Spirit. Therefore, just as we invoke them, so also we invoke him. Ad II: In the same way that we pray for love from the Father and grace from Christ, we pray for communion (κοινωνίαν) from the Holy Spirit. But we pray for the active love and grace of Jesus Christ. Therefore, we also seek the active communion of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit communicates Himself to us with His gifts, which He distributes, as a divine

(*) The nerve of the proof is indeed this: He who is said to work all things (ἐνεργῶν τὰ πάντα) is one God (v. 6). But He who works all things (ἐνεργῶν τὰ πάντα), and indeed by His own will, "as he will" (καθὼς βούλεται), is also the Holy Spirit (v. 11), and also Christ (Romans XV, 18). Therefore, both Christ and the Holy Spirit, equally as the Father, is one God. But that the Father is singly called God (Θεός), this is the underlying reason: because the Son and the Holy Spirit have their eternal divinity from the nature of the Father, for which reason the former is called the Son of God (υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ), and the latter the Spirit of God (πνεῦμα Θεοῦ). Therefore, inasmuch as they are equal persons in one nature, all three are one God. But insofar as the Son of God is considered as the Son, begotten of the Father, and the Spirit of God as the Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, God (the Father) (Θεός (πατήρ)) is distinguished from the Son and the Holy Spirit.

(**) I collect the reasons thus: A wish is a certain kind of prayer. That which Paul has in his wishes is, without controversy, the salvation of the church, to which indeed the entire sense of this epistle and the others looks. Prayer, especially in causes of this kind which pertain to the salvation of souls, is a certain part of religious worship. All religion ought to be referred to the one God. Therefore, these three are one God. This demonstration, in itself sufficiently evident, is greatly illustrated by what the Apostle had said before in v. 11: "God shall be with you" (ὁ Θεὸς ἔσται μεθ' ὑμῶν), and indeed "the God of love and peace" (ὁ Θεὸς τῆς ἀγάπης καὶ εἰρήνης); but no one is unaware that both love (ἀγάπην) and peace (εἰρήνην) are numbered among the merits of Christ and the fruits of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, those three, whom he now names and prays to be "with you all" (μετὰ πάντων), are "God" (ὁ Θεός).

person, as He wills, 1 Corinthians XII, 11. Ad III: The celestial Father in the apostolic wish is designated by the name of God because He is the fount of divinity. By this is inferred the origin and order of the divine persons, not an eminence or prerogative of the Father, since the essence of the divine persons is one and the same, and their majesty and glory are one and the same.

Proof h: The apostolic assertion concerning the ὁμοουσία (consubstantiality) of the divine persons is read in 1 John V, 7: "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one." The scope of St. John in chapter V of his epistle was to teach that Jesus of Nazareth, born of the virgin Mary, is the Christ, or Messiah, promised in the Old Testament and exhibited in the New Testament (v. 1), the true Son of God (v. 5), and the savior of the world, who by His most perfect obedience and most full satisfaction acquired the victory over the world (v. 4) and eternal life (v. 11) for us sinners. The apostle, about to confirm this doctrine of greatest moment, adduces three heavenly witnesses, as well as three earthly witnesses. Concerning the heavenly witnesses, he says in v. 7: "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, and the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one." Concerning this classic text, let us observe: 1) The divine majesty of the heavenly witnesses. For those three witnesses are said to be in heavenly and divine glory, just as our Father, whom we daily adore, is in the heavens, Matthew VI, 9. Therefore, the three heavenly witnesses are divine witnesses. 2) The unity of the divine essence. For John says: "and these three are one." He does not say: They think one thing, but they are one. He therefore implies a unity of essence, or ὁμοουσίαν (consubstantiality), the consequent of which is a unity of consensus. 3) The trinity of the divine persons; for the apostle says: "These three are one." There is therefore here a trinity, not in the abstract, but in the concrete. For we easily gather: If three divine witnesses are one, a trinity of persons is given in one divinity. For the apostle understands witnesses properly so called, living, intelligent, subsisting by themselves, such as are the Father and the Son; to which personal witnesses, since the Holy Spirit is joined as a third witness, He cannot but be a true person. 4) The name and personal property of each person. St. John calls the first witness the Father, whose hypostatic character is paternity, founded in the eternal generation of the Son. He calls the second witness the λόγον (Word), or Word, because of His eternal generation from the Father. For just as an internal word is generated in the mind without a real change of the one conceiving, so also the Son of God was begotten of the Father immutably, within the divine essence. He names the third witness the Holy Spirit, whose personal property is passive spiration, from which the Spirit is denominated. 5) The order of the divine persons, founded in the origin of the mode of having the divine essence. For the first witness is the Father, because He is neither begotten by, nor proceeds from, anyone. The second witness is the λόγος (Word), or the Son of God, because He is begotten of the Father; the third witness is the Holy Spirit, because He proceeds from the Father and the Son. These things being premised, we conclude: Whoever asserts that three divine witnesses are one, teaches that in one divine essence there are three distinct persons. But St. John asserts, etc. Therefore.

The Socinians object: 1) that this text is spurious, since it is not read in the Syriac version, nor in the ancient Latin versions, nor in the first German version of Luther; 2) that it does not follow that as many as are the witnesses, so many are the persons, for in the following verse the spirit, the water, and the blood are called three witnesses, yet they are not three persons; 3) that the apostle is speaking of a unity not of essence, but of consensus, because otherwise it would follow that the spirit in the ministry, the water in baptism, and the blood in the supper agree in one essence, since unity is also attributed to them by the apostle.

Resp. ad 1): This text is not spurious. For although in certain codices of the Bible it was expunged or erased by the Arians, it is nevertheless read in the most approved Greek exemplars, in the most ancient British codex, in the Complutensian, Basel, and Antwerp editions, in the Vatican exemplar, in the Bibles of Robert Stephanus, and in many others, far more numerous. It was adduced by ATHANASIUS in his disputation against Arius, and was neither rejected nor called into doubt by him. It was alleged by the Ante-Nicene fathers. It was found in all the Greek codices in the time of Jerome, who accused the Latin translators of infidelity because they had omitted the testimony of the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, by which the catholic faith is especially strengthened, and the one divinity of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit is proven. Cf. D. GERHARD, in disp. acad. p. 1293 sqq.; D. CALOV. in bibl. illustrat. on this passage, fol. 1664; D. SCHERZ. in colleg. Anti-Socin. p. 162 sqq. Nor can it be omitted without a hiatus in this fifth chapter of John. For John, about to prove that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ, the Son of God, and the Savior of the world, adduces witnesses partly heavenly and partly earthly, and connects them by the copulative conjunction καὶ (and) in v. 8. But with the three heavenly witnesses omitted, the primary ones would be passed over, and the coherence of the text would be disturbed.

Ad 2): I distinguish between a witness properly and figuratively so called. When John asserts that there are three witnesses in heaven, he speaks of witnesses properly so called, which is clear from the fact that the Father is certainly a testifying person, the Son is a testifying person, as the Socinians themselves acknowledge. What, therefore, hinders the Holy Spirit from also being a testifying person? But if the Holy Spirit were only a power, not three, but only two witnesses would emerge in the heavens. But in the following verse 8, the discourse is of witnesses improperly and figuratively so called, because that whole verse speaks of things, not of persons.

Ad 3): The earthly witnesses "are into one" (εἰς τὸ ἓν εἶσι), i.e., they tend to one goal, to bear a concordant testimony to Christ the savior of the world, and likewise they are divinely ordained as means and seals of grace for offering, conferring, and sealing the salvation procured by the merit of Christ. But the heavenly witnesses "are one" (ἐν εἶσι), i.e., they are of one essence. This we prove a) because these witnesses are divine; for they are in heaven, i.e., in heavenly and divine glory; their testimony is called divine in v. 9. The (substantial) Word and the Holy Spirit are immediately conjoined with God the Father in testifying, and are said to be one with Him. Therefore, just as the Father is true God, so also the Word (ὁ λόγος) is true God, and the Holy Spirit is true God. But since there are not three gods, not three divine essences, it is necessarily inferred that the three divine witnesses agree in one essence, but are distinguished by a personal distinction. b) We appeal to the parallel passage, John X, 30. That unity is urged here by St. John which is intimated by Christ Himself in John X, 30, when He says: "I and the Father are one." But the Father and the Son in that passage are said to be one in such a way that not only a unity of consensus, but of essence is evidently concluded. For Christ posits that unity as the foundation of His insuperable power and the impossibility of snatching the sheep from His hand. But unless a unity of power, and consequently of essence, is granted, there will be no force of proof in the argument. For the apostles were also one thing, by a unity of consensus with the Father; but who would say that no one could snatch the sheep of Christ from their hands? c) Just as the Holy Spirit, whom most Socinians state to be the essential power of God, does not differ essentially from the Father, so neither does the Word (ὁ λόγος), or the Son of God, who is one with the Father and the Holy Spirit. d) If only a unity of consensus had been indicated by John, he could have adduced far more witnesses in heaven. For the angels, Moses, and Elijah bore testimonies in agreement with Christ, as is clear from the angelic apparitions and the transfiguration of Christ. e) If the Word and the Holy Spirit are one with the Father by reason of consensus and will, they are also one with Him in essence, because the will of God does not really differ from the divine essence. For which reason, just as in our manner of conceiving the will follows the essence of God, so the unity of consensus follows the unity of the divine essence.

Question XVIII. What are the testimonies of the Old Testament by which the Trinity of the divine persons is exhibited conjunctively?

The testimonies of the Old Testament by which the Trinity of the divine persons is taught conjunctively are drawn from the creation of the world (a), the leading of the Israelites out of Egypt (b), the foretold mission and anointing of the Messiah (c), the solemn blessing of the priests (d), and the angelic trisagion (e).

Proof a: From Genesis I, 1, 2, 3. "In the beginning Elohim created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. And God said, Let there be light; and there was light." That this passage is among the principal ones in the Old Testament which treat of the mystery of the Holy Trinity appears from this, that without a doubt the phrase of Psalm XXXIII, 6 is derived from it: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." And who would deny that John in ch. I, 1, 2, 3 referred to this with these words of his: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made."

Obs. 1) Moses, about to describe the first work of God, says, "Elohim (אלהים) created," which plural name, not only in its termination but also in its signification, construed with a singular verb, ברא, signifies the common work or action of several, as if to say, He who are God, created. See the annotations of D. SEB. SCHMID on Genesis, p. 2. 2) God, about to create light, said: "let there be light." The God who speaks is God the Father, by contradistinction to the Word, through whom He spoke, and the Holy Spirit, in whom He, with the Word through whom He was about to speak, moved upon the waters. 3) God the Father spoke by commanding, according to Psalm XXXIII, 9: "He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast." Therefore, the speaking of God denotes a word of command, yet so that 4) it connotes or prenotes the hypostatic (ὑποστατικόν), or substantial, word. This we prove a) from the infallible interpretation of John, ch. I, 1, 2, 3. From which passage we conclude thus: That Word was in the beginning of creation with God the Father, through whom all things were made. But the Word, subsisting by Himself, who is true God, was in the beginning of creation with God the Father. Therefore, the Word, subsisting by Himself, is that Word through whom all things were made. b) From the testimony of Solomon, who attributes the same things to the wisdom of God (the hypostatic wisdom, the eternal Son of God, the author and source of all wisdom) which Moses here attributes to the word of God, Proverbs VIII, 22, sqq. c) From the consideration of the thing itself. For just as in man the external word of the mouth presupposes the internal word of the mind and internal wisdom, so the word of divine command is not without the hypostatic word, not without substantial wisdom, the eternal Son of God, since the Father does not work without the Son, John V, 17. d) When Moses in verse 2 says: "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," by the Spirit of God is indicated the third person of the divinity, whom King David calls the Spirit of the divine mouth, Psalm XXXIII, 6. By the movement of the Spirit of God we understand His most eminent movement to create light, since in verse 2, the latter hemistich in the Hebrew codex coheres most closely with the following verse 3, so that this sense emerges: And in this His Spirit, moving upon the waters, God the Father said through His internal Word, the Son, this uttered (προφητικόν) saying: "Let there be light." Cf. the annotations of D. SCHMID on Genesis, p. 4. These things being premised, we argue: Whatever work is common to several divine persons, and is perfected by God speaking through His internal Word, in the Spirit of His mouth, from that work the trinity of the divine persons becomes known. But the work of creation is common to several divine persons, and is perfected, etc. Therefore.

The Socinians object: 1) That the Word of God in the work of creation denotes a divine command. 2) That the Spirit of God, who moved upon the face of the waters, designates the air, or wind. 3) That neither the Word nor the Spirit of God are persons. Resp. ad I: The word of divine command is not to be thought of here without the hypostatic word, without whom nothing was made, John I, 3. Ad II: Neither air nor wind existed on the first day of creation; nor did God employ wind, or any other creature, for the creation of light. And why is it called the wind of God, rather than the heaven of God, the earth of God, etc.? Ad III: Since creation, a most noble action, is ascribed to the Word and the Spirit of God, personality cannot be denied to them, for actions belong to supposita.

Proof b: The leading of the Israelites out of Egypt testifies to the trinity of the divine persons. God the Father led the Israelites out of Egypt by the angel who was their guide (ὁδηγόν), Exodus XIV, 19, whom the ancient Rabbis called מטטרון (Metatron), the measurer or leader of the way. He is not a created angel, but uncreated, namely the Son of God. For he is called (1) expressly יהוה, which is the proper name of God and incommunicable to creatures, Exodus XIV, 24. (2) He is called the angel of the face, who saves the people, Isaiah LXIII, 9. (3) Concerning this angel, God says: "my name is in him," by which the glory, majesty, essence or divine nature is denoted. (4) To this angel is attributed the judicial power of punishing the disobedient. "Beware of him, and obey his voice; provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions," Exodus XXIII, 21. (5) Divine works are assigned to him, which are the singular guardianship on the way, the preceding, and the introduction of the Israelites into the land of Canaan, Exodus XXIII, 20, 23. (6) To this angel is to be exhibited a religious veneration, due to God alone. "Obey his voice," says Jehovah, Exodus XXIII, 21, which honor is nowhere read to have been rendered to any created angel. For which reason, by the angel-leader of the people of Israel, we understand the Son of God, who led the Israelites, and was tempted by them, 1 Corinthians X, 9. To this is added that God the Father led His people out of Egypt by the Holy Spirit. For the Israelites are said to have rebelled in the desert and vexed the Holy Spirit of Jehovah, Isaiah LXIII, 10. From these things an argument arises; He who led the Israelites out of Egypt is true, eternal, and supreme God. But God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore.

Proof c: We gather the Trinity of divine persons from the mission and anointing of the Messiah, concerning which those words, worthy of perennial memory, in Isaiah XLVIII, 16, especially deserve to be noted: "and now the Lord GOD, and his Spirit, hath sent me." He who speaks here is not the prophet Isaiah, as the Jews and Photinians will have it, but the Messiah; since Christ Himself made the immediately preceding words, "I have not spoken in secret from the beginning," His own, John XVIII, 20. He who speaks here is called the first and the last, v. 12, the founder of the earth, v. 13, the redeemer, v. 17. There is therefore expressed in this prophetic oracle the Lord who is sent, Christ the redeemer; the Lord who sends, God the Father, to whom in the sacred letters the mission of the Son is attributed in countless places; and the Spirit of the Lord, who anointed and sent Christ according to the flesh, Isaiah LXI, 1: "The Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me." Cf. Luke IV, 18. Truly therefore we argue: Wherever God sent, God sending, and His Spirit are introduced, there three persons of the divinity are expressed. But in the prophetic oracle of Isaiah, etc. Therefore.

Proof d: The mystery of the Trinity shines forth from the priestly blessing, Numbers VI, 24: "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; The Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." From this solemn blessing, the Trinity of the divine persons is gathered: (1) Because the name of Jehovah was to be recited in this blessing not twice, not four or more times, but three times. Which threefold repetition of the name of Jehovah, since it is not without mystery, nor can a solid reason for it be adduced from scripture if you depart from the mystery of the Holy Trinity, there is no doubt that the Trinity of the divine persons was designated here, since no apex in such a succinct and nervous blessing is superfluous. (2) Because twice three benefits are wished for and vowed to the people of God. Invoked is (a) God the Father, as the fount of blessing and the author of the keeping of soul and body. That keeping denotes the divine conservation and protection, which benefits pertain to the first article of the apostolic faith. (b) Invoked is the Son of God, as the light of the Gentiles, Isaiah XLII, 6, and the throne of grace, Romans III, 25. (c) Invoked is the Holy Spirit, lifting up His face upon us, by the word and sacraments calling, illuminating, converting, regenerating, justifying, renewing, and bestowing upon us the internal peace of conscience. For the Holy Spirit is the comforter, John XIV, 16, who tranquilizes the conscience. To which priestly blessing we join the royal blessing of David, Psalm LXVII, 7: "God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him." The word "God" is repeated three times, not in vain, but to notify that God is one in essence, trine in persons. We gather: Whomever the ministers of the church invoke in the solemn blessing as the author of all corporal and spiritual benefits, which they pray for for the sacred assembly, that one is the Triune God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But the ministers of the church, etc. Therefore. He who is prayed to by the high priests of the church is the one and true God. But the high priests of the church invoke God as three in persons, etc. Therefore.

Proof from experience. The angelic trisagion, or the Seraphic doxology (δοξολογία), which is read in Isaiah VI, 3, teaches us the Trinity of divine persons: "Holy, holy, holy is Jehovah Zebaoth: the fulness of the whole earth is his glory."

The one whom the Seraphim celebrated is not one person, but several. For with the Seraphim singing in harmony, the prophet soon heard the voice of Adonai saying: "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" To whom the prophet said: "Here am I! send me." God speaks of himself in the plural, to teach the plurality of divine persons. That these several persons are determinately three, we gather from the fact that the Seraphic choir repeats the "Holy" three times; for which threefold repetition no other suitable reason can be given than the determinate trinity of the several divine persons. To this assertion of ours, no little strength is added from the infallible exposition of the New Testament, since this prophetic passage is expounded in the New Testament concerning the distinct persons of the Godhead. For Isaiah saw the glory of the Son of God, and spoke of him, as Saint John testifies, chapter XII, 41. The Holy Spirit spoke there through Isaiah the prophet to the fathers, as Paul testifies, Acts XXVIII, 25. With these presuppositions, we argue; In whatever place of scripture God himself has revealed a plurality of divine persons, in the same place, since God is called thrice holy by the angelic choir, the Trinity of divine persons is indicated; this is all the more certain, the more clearly that place is expounded elsewhere in the sacred writings concerning the distinct persons of the Godhead. But in the present passage or chapter of Isaiah, God himself has revealed a plurality of divine persons, and in the same place God is called thrice holy by the angelic choir. Therefore, in this place, or chapter of Isaiah, the Trinity of divine persons is indicated; this is all the more certain, the more clearly this place is expounded elsewhere in the sacred writings concerning the distinct persons of the Godhead.

The Jews and Socinians object; 1) That God deliberated with the angels about sending a messenger, when he said in v. 8. "Who will go for us?" 2) That a thing is often called three times, even if it is in reality only one, not threefold. Thus the hypocrites cry out; "This is the temple of the Lord, this is the temple of the Lord, this is the temple of the Lord." Jer. VII. 4. Compare Jer. XXII, 29. Ezech. XXI, 27. 3) That the threefold repetition of "holy" is made either to demonstrate the perfection of divine holiness, or for the sake of the constancy of the assertion.

Response. to I. The all-wise God never deliberates with angels. Who has been His counselor? Is. XL, 13. To II. We do not argue from the mere threefold repetition of "holy," but we observe that God Himself in chapter VI, 8 of Isaiah has revealed a plurality of divine persons, and so when the Seraphim, crying out, repeat three times; "holy, holy, holy Jehovah Zebaoth," we assert that the determinate Trinity of the several divine persons is indicated. We have cited as the preceding leaders of our assertion, or as irrefutable witnesses, John, chap. XII, 41, and Paul, Acts XXVIII, 25. To III. The threefold repetition is an index of perfection, because the most perfect being is threefold. For the first in every genus is the measure of the rest. Besides, there was no reason why the Seraphim should go on to confirm the holiness of God with a constant assertion, since there is no doubt about it. A constant assertion is accustomed to be opposed to doubts that have been raised.

Question XIX. By what arguments is the divinity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit distinctly proved?

The arguments by which the divinity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is distinctly and solidly confirmed are drawn from the divine names, attributes, actions, and religious worship owed to God alone.

Observation. The general and invincible argument is this: If the same truly divine names, attributes, works, and glory, which belong to God the Father, insofar as he is considered absolutely as the true God, are attributed in the sacred scriptures to the Son of God and the Holy Spirit, it is necessary that the Son of God and the Holy Spirit be one, true, and supreme God with God the Father, or as the church says, that in one essence there are three distinct persons.

That in the divine essence there are three distinct persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The antecedent is true. Therefore, so is the consequent. In order to validly fortify the truth of the antecedent, we must now treat distinctly of the three persons of the Godhead. (*)

(*) Since 1) all adversaries bring forth various exceptions against the major proposition, 2) some of them attribute to Christ a true divinity indeed, but deny it to be the highest (although this contradicts itself); therefore, in order to shut off all their paths, the truly greatest weight of our argumentation must be perfected in this way: He to whom belong 1) the divine Names, and indeed those proper to the supreme God, and the very indicators of

CONCERNING GOD THE FATHER.

Question XX. Who is God the Father?

Description of God the Father. God the Father is the first person of the Godhead, neither begotten, nor proceeding, but from eternity begetting the substantial Son, the image of Himself, and with the Son from eternity spirating the Holy Spirit.

He is more fully described: God the Father is the first person of the Godhead, neither begotten, nor proceeding, but from eternity begetting the substantial Son, the image of Himself, and with the Son from eternity spirating the Holy Spirit, creating, conserving, and governing all things, sending the Son as redeemer and the Holy Spirit as sanctifier of the human race.

Observation. In the first, succinct and vigorous description, God the Father is described 1) by order, that he is the first person of the Godhead; 2) by personal notion, that God the Father is unbegotten (ἀγέννητος), unoriginated, neither begotten, nor proceeding from another. 3) By personal acts, the eternal generation of the Son, and the eternal spiration of the Holy Spirit. On the active generation of the Son is founded paternity, the personal property of the Father. Through active spiration the Father and the Son, although not from each other, are nevertheless distinguished from the Holy Spirit. The latter, more ample definition, connects to the personal notion and property of God the Father his works ad extra, and his benefits in relation to the church. See D. CHEMNITZ. loc. theol. fol. m. 44.

Question XXI. How is the name of Father understood here?

The name of Father is not taken here essentially (ἐσιωδῶς), but personally (ὕποστατικῶς).

Proof. The name of Father, taken essentially, does not belong to the first person of the Godhead alone, but to all divine persons equally; since taken in this sense, it implies a relation to creatures, of whom God is called Father both because of creation, in which way the angels are called sons of God, Job. XXXVIII, 7.; and because of regeneration and adoption; in which way converted and reborn men, by the merit of Christ, apprehended by faith, have received this power (ἐξουσίαν), or dignity, that they should become sons of God, John I, 12. But the name of Father, taken personally, is proper to the first divine person, and implies a relation to the consubstantial Son, whom he begot from his own essence as the image of himself, of whom he is said to be the proper Father (ἰδιος πατήρ). John V, 18.

Question XXII. Why is God the Father called the first person of the Godhead?

God the Father is called the first person of the deity not by reason of the divine essence, nor with respect to time, nor on account of a prerogative of dignity; but by reason of origin and order.

Proof. God the Father is named the first person of the Godhead not by reason of the essence of nature; because the Son and the Holy Spirit have the same essence as the Father; nor by reason of time; because the three divine persons are co-eternal; nor by reason of dignity; because in the Trinity nothing is greater or less, as Athanasius teaches in his creed; but by reason of origin and order. By reason of origin God the Father is the first divine person; because he is unoriginated, neither begotten, nor proceeding from another. The Son and the Holy Spirit originate from God the Father, and the Son indeed as the second person from the Father alone, but the Holy Spirit as the third person from the Father and the Son together. From this, God the Father is called by Athanasius against Sabellius the root and fount of the Son and of the Spirit (ρίζα καὶ πηγή τοῦ υἱοῦ, καὶ τοῦ πνεύματος), as quoted by DANHAUER, in hodos. phæn. III. p. 230. God the Father is also the first person of the Godhead by reason of order, or natural enumeration, founded on the origin, or emanation of one person from another, and observed in the solemn formula of baptism, his divine nature, 2) all the Attributes to a one, both properties and perfections (p. 234. **), and, as far as these are concerned, even the reserved ones, with none omitted (p. 281.), 3) the Works of God, and in every way, namely those also which God himself, with no minister employed, and therefore He alone, can effect, and indeed even in that way which uniquely befits God, 4) the worship, fitting for God alone, that is, religious worship, and all its parts; he is certainly the true God, and the same supreme one. Thus determined, the major proposition holds without any exception, and the entire proof pertains to bringing the minor to light, about which we shall see hereafter.

Matthew XXVIII, 19. and repeated by John, 1 epist. c. V, 7.

Question XXIII. By what arguments is the divinity of God the Father proved?

The divinity of the eternal Father is demonstrated by (1) Divine names; (2) Attributes proper to the true God alone; (3) Works truly and purely divine, both ad intra and ad extra; (4) Religious worship competent to God alone.

Observation. The demonstration of the divinity of the heavenly Father can be deduced most sufficiently from innumerable sayings of Holy Scripture; But since no one who accepts the sacred writings as infallible doubts it, we will refrain from a more lengthy demonstration, and we will adduce only one apostolic saying, embracing the four classes of arguments already mentioned, from 1 Peter I, 3. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy has regenerated us to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." This apostolic oracle presents to us (1) a nominal (ὀνομαστικὸν) argument, drawn from the divine names. For God the Father is explicitly called God by the apostle Peter, he is called the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who can be none other than the highest God. (2) This apostolic utterance contains an attributive (ἰδιωματικὸν) argument, taken from a divine attribute. Abundant mercy is attributed to God the Father, which is a property of the true God. (3) It embraces an operative (ἐνεργητικὸν) argument, drawn from a divine action. For God the Father is said to regenerate us. Regeneration is a divine action. (4) This classic saying includes a worshipful (λατρευτικὸν) argument, taken from religious worship. For the apostle says: "Blessed be God the Father!" God the Father is worshipped and celebrated by the apostle, as the fount and source of all blessing, regeneration, and eternal inheritance. Therefore God the Father is the true and supreme God. But this scope of proof may perhaps seem superfluous. For if God the Father is not God, there will be no God in the world, since he is the fount of divinity.

Question XXIV. Whence is the distinct personality of God the Father known?

That God the Father is a distinct person from the Son of God and the Holy Spirit is established from his denomination and personal property (a); from his personal acts ad intra, and their manifestation (b); from the action ad extra, appropriated to God the Father (c).

Proof a. God the Father is named the proper Father of the Son in John V, 8, and therefore on account of a properly so-called paternity founded in a true and essential generation. But a Father, generating a Son from his own substance, is a distinct person from this Son.

Proof b. Just as God the Father is personally distinguished from the Son by active generation, so by active spiration He is distinguished from the Holy Spirit. This personal distinction is also made manifest by the mission of the Son for the work of redemption, and the mission of the Holy Spirit for the work of sanctification. For the one who sends and the one who is sent differ as distinct persons.

Proof c. Since God the Father created this universe through his Son, as substantial wisdom, Prov. VIII, 30. and hypostatic word, John I, 3. in the Spirit of his mouth, Ps. XXXIII, 6. it is gathered that he is a true person, and one distinct from the Son and the Holy Spirit.

Question XXV. What is the personal property of God the Father?

The hypostatic character, or personal property of God the Father is paternity, founded in the active generation of the only-begotten Son.

Proof. By paternity God the Father is not only distinguished from the other divine persons, but he is also constituted in the being of the Father. Therefore, paternity is the hypostatic character of the Father.

Observation. Since the proximate foundation of paternity is the active generation of the Son, on account of which God the Father is properly called Father, by some theologians the hypostatic character of the Father is held to be active generation, especially because this does not in reality differ from paternity. Cf. DANNHAV. hodos. phæn. III. p. 186.

Question XXVI. What are the personal notions of God the Father?

The personal notions of God the Father are unbegottenness (ἀγεννησία) (a), and the active spiration of the Holy Spirit (b).

Proof a. A personal notion, strictly speaking, insofar as it is contradistinguished from a hypostatic character, notifies a person, and distinguishes it from another person, but does not constitute it in the being of such a person. But unbegottenness (ἀγεννησία) does not formally constitute the Father in the being of the Father; for he is called Father on account of the eternal generation of the Son, whom he regards as his correlate. But unbegottenness (ἀγεννησία) in itself does not imply such a relation, and therefore it is not a constitutive (χαρακτηριστική) property, but only a merely notificative (γνωριστική) notion. For when unbegottenness (ἀγεννησία), as is usually done, is so explained that it denotes the negation of all origin, God the Father is called unbegotten (ἀγέννητος), i.e., unoriginated, because he has his origin from another neither through generation, nor through spiration. But the Holy Spirit is sometimes denominated unbegotten (ἀγέννητος), because he derives his origin from the Father and the Son not through generation, but through spiration. Rightly in the same sense God the Father is said to be of Himself (ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ), because He is from no other; likewise God of Himself (αὐτόθεος), not because the Father alone is God of Himself (ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ), or He alone possesses self-existence (αὐτουσίαν), i.e., an independent and uncreated essence; but because He alone is God from Himself, and does not have the independent essence of self-existence (αὐτουσίαν), by which He is Jehovah, from another, as do the Son and the Holy Spirit. Cf. D. CALOV. in system. theol. tom. III. p. 192.

Proof b. The active spiration of the Holy Spirit, according to the different way of considering it, is called a personal act and notion. It is called a personal act, because through it the Holy Spirit is produced. It is called a personal notion, because through the same, God the Father is known as a person distinct from the Holy Spirit. And yet it is not the personal property of God the Father; since it is common to the Father and the Son; nor is God the Father the Father because of the spiration of the Holy Spirit, but because of the generation of the Son.

Question XXVII. What are the personal acts of God the Father?

The personal acts of God the Father are the generation of the Son, and the active spiration of the Holy Spirit.

Question XXVIII. What is the active generation of God the Father?

The active generation of God the Father is a divine, personal act ad intra, by which God the Father, by the communication of one and the same essence in number, begets the Son, the image of Himself, from eternity, truly and properly, yet in a hyperphysical and inscrutable manner.

Observation. This hyperphysical generation will be proved below, where the passive generation of the Word (τῷ λόγῳ) will come to be considered.

Question XXIX. What is active spiration?

Active spiration is a divine, personal act ad intra, by which the eternal God the Father with the eternal Son, by the communication of one and the same essence in number, produces the Holy Spirit, the common breath of both, in one indivisible and eternal act, in a hyperphysical and ineffable manner.

Question XXX. What is the consequence of active generation and spiration, by which it is manifested?

Active generation and spiration is followed by active mission, by which God the Father sent the Son as redeemer (a), and together with the Son, sent the Holy Spirit as the sanctifier of the human race in time (b).

Proof a. John III, 17. "For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." In these words the purpose of the mission of the Son of God is designated (1) remotely; not to judge, i.e. condemn the world; (2) positively, that the world might be saved through him, that is, be advanced by divinely ordained means from darkness to light, from sin to righteousness, from death to life.

Proof b. John XV, 26. "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me." God the Father and the Son send the Holy Spirit. The Father, because he proceeds from him. The temporal mission is a sign and an argument a posteriori for the eternal procession. The Father sends the Holy Spirit in the name of Christ, i.e., on account of the merit and intercession of the savior, John XIV, 26. The Son of God sends the Holy Spirit from the Father; because as he has his essence, so he has the power from the Father to send the Holy Spirit.

Observation. This active mission is not local or separative, since local separation is repugnant to the intimate identity of the divine persons and to their infinite presence; but it is non-local and manifestative; nor is it indicative of inequality, because it happens by voluntary consent, not by command.

Question XXXI. What divine action ad extra is peculiarly claimed for God the Father?

In the sacred scriptures, and in the Apostles' Creed, to God the Father, as the first person of the Godhead, creation, which is the first divine operation ad extra, is ascribed by a certain singular appropriation.

Proof. This universe God the Father created by speaking through the substantial Word in the Spirit of his mouth, Gen. 1, 1. 2. Ps. XXXIII, 6. John I, 3. The work of creation is therefore claimed for God the Father not exclusively, as if the Son of God and the Holy Spirit were entirely excluded from that first action; nor by way of excellence (ἐξοχικῶς), in a more excellent manner, as if God the Father were the principal cause, and the Son the instrument of creation; because the unity of essence, which is the principle of operations ad extra, is repugnant to this; but appropriatively and relatively, God the Father is said to have created through the Son in the Holy Spirit, to designate the order of the divine persons, while preserving the unity of action and of the power to act. The same judgment should be formed concerning conservation, which is a continuous creation, and the governance of this universe.

CONCERNING GOD THE SON.

Description of the Son of God. The Son of God is the second person of the Godhead, begotten from the essence of the Father from eternity, who with God the Father from eternity spirates the Holy Spirit.

He is more fully described: The Son of God is the second person of the Godhead, begotten from the Father from eternity, of the same essence and majesty with the Father; who with the Father from eternity spirates the Holy Spirit, and in the fullness of time assumed a human nature into his own hypostasis, in order to redeem and save the human race.

Observation. In the first description, brief yet vigorous, the Son of God is described (1) by order, that he is the second person of the Godhead; because he is not from himself, but from the Father. (2) By origin, which he derives from the Father through eternal generation, in which, viewed passively or terminatively, is founded filiation, the hypostatic character of the Son of God. (3) By a personal notion, namely the active spiration of the Holy Spirit, so that the Son of God may be distinguished not only from the Father, but also from the Holy Spirit; for He Himself spirates Him with the Father. The latter description, somewhat more lengthy, adds to the former (a) the incarnation of the Son of God, by which He manifested Himself externally. "God was manifest in the flesh," says Paul in 1 Tim. III, 16. Mention of this is made here, because the human nature now pertains to the integrity of the person of the Son of God, after He assumed it into the unity of His person. (b) The external operation, which is appropriated to the Son of God, is the redemption of the human race, the end of which is the eternal salvation of men.

Question XXXIII. How is the name of the Son of God understood here?

The name of the Son of God is here taken not improperly, but properly, to designate a son begotten from the substance of the father.

Proof. Improperly, the sons of God are said to be (1) angels, on account of a certain likeness of divine wisdom and holiness, which shines in them, Job. XXXVIII, 7. From which God embraces them with a singular love, as sons. (2) Magistrates, on account of an analogy or certain correspondence with God, by reason of their office, Ps. LXXXII, 6. (3) The faithful, on account of spiritual regeneration, John I, 12. and adoption to the inheritance of eternal life, Rom. VIII, 16. Gal. IV, 5. (4) The blessed, on account of the glorious fruition of adoption, Luke XX, 36. But the second person of the Holy Trinity is called the Son of God on account of a true, proper, and essential generation, by which the very essence, which is of the begetting Father, is perfectly communicated to the begotten Son, so that he is the Son consubstantial with God the Father. Thence the Son of God is called the proper Son, Rom. VIII, 32. and only-begotten, John I, 14. existing in the bosom of the Father, John I, 18. the image of the invisible God and the firstborn of all creation, Col. I, 15. The brightness of his glory and the express image of the Father's person, Hebr. I, 3.

Question XXXIV. By what arguments is the true and eternal divinity of the Son of God proved?

The true and eternal divinity of the Son of God is confirmed by nominal (ὀνομαστικοῖς) arguments, drawn from divine names (a); by attributive (ιδιωματικοῖς) arguments, drawn from attributes proper to the true God alone (b); by operative (ἐνεργητικοῖς) arguments, taken from the personal and essential acts of God (c); by worshipful (λατρευτικοῖς) arguments, drawn from the religious worship owed to God alone (d). To which add a careful comparison of the Old and New Testaments (e).

Proof a. There are very many places in Holy Scripture in which the Son of God is distinguished by divine names, both essential and personal, from which we shall select a few, and those the clearer ones.

The divinity of the Son of God is therefore shown:

I. From the essential divine names. In the Old Testament, Christ, the branch of David, is called Jehovah, our righteousness, Jerem. XXIII, 6. He is called Jehovah, whom Jehovah has anointed, upon whom is the Spirit of the Lord, Is. LXI, 1. 8. He is called Adonai, sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, religiously honored by the Seraphim, Is. VI, 1. 2. 3. compared with John XII, 41. No creature is called Jehovah and Adonai. In the New Testament, the Son of God (1) is absolutely, without any limiting or alienating condition, called God. "The Word was God," says John in chapter I, 1. Whom Thomas, about to make a sincere confession, addresses with great confidence: "My Lord, and my God," John XX, 28. These words were not directed to God the Father, but to the Lord Jesus. For Thomas answered and said to him (Jesus, who, having shown the scars of his hands and side, had said: "be not faithless, but believing"): "My Lord, and my God." Nor are these words merely of one exclaiming, or admiring, but of Thomas confessing; for Christ immediately adds: "Because you have seen me, you have believed." (2) To the divine names are added words by which the incarnate Son of God is designated. Thus Paul in Acts XX, 28 says: "God has purchased the church with his own blood." Where by God, who purchased the church with his own blood, none other than the Son of God is understood. The same apostle says in 1 Tim. III, 16. "God was manifest in the flesh." The Son of God, inasmuch as he was made flesh, John 1, 14, was made partaker of flesh and blood. Hebr. II, 14. and came in the flesh. 1 John IV, 2. 3. (3) To the divine names are annexed epithets by which the supreme God is indicated. For (a) Christ is named by St. John "the true God and eternal life." 1 John V, 20-22. "And we know that the Son of God is come, and has given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life." Where (α) the position of the words (because the demonstrative pronoun this [ὁτός], ordinarily refers to and demonstrates the immediately preceding noun), (β) the purpose of the apostle, to treat of Christ as the principal theme of this epistle. Vid. 1 John I, 2. (γ) the absurdity of tautology (if it is referred to the Father), (δ) the epithet of eternal life, so proper to Christ that you may read it attributed to no other person with such ease, and so all things cry out that the truth of deity is asserted of Christ. Cf. DANNH, hodos. phæn. III. p. 233. (b) By St. Paul the Son of God is called "the great God." Titus II, 13. "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God." Concerning this apostolic utterance we observe: (α) The name of the great God is claimed for the one and only supreme God. This the prophet Daniel teaches in chapter II, 45. "The great God has made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter." (β) By the words, "of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ" (τῷ μεγάλῳ θεοῦ καὶ σωτῆρι ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), one and the same subject, namely Jesus Christ, is designated; since only one Greek article is used, which denotes only one subject, according to the property of the Greek language; just as the apostle is treating of that God, whose appearance (ἐπιφάνεια) at the judgment is expected; which appearance at the judgment is attributed to the Son of God alone. 2 Thess. II, 8. 1 Tim. VI, 14. 2 Tim. IV, 1. Nor does the interposed conjunction, "and," stand in the way; for it often joins two nouns to one subject. Cf. 1 Peter 1, 3. (c) By the same apostle Christ is named "God over all, blessed forever." Rom. IX, 5. "Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen!" From these things it is clear that Christ is the supreme God; since those words of the apostle express a periphrasis of the supreme God. Cf. Rom. 1, 25. The Socinians, seeking to evade this illustrious saying, object (1); that those words "who is over all,

God" (ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων θεός) are not to be referred to Christ, but are a doxological (δοξολογικὴν) exclamation, by which God the Father is celebrated: And therefore after the words, "according to the flesh" (κατὰ σάρκα), a period should be written, which many scribes are accustomed to omit. (2) "Over all" (Ἐπὶ πάντων), signifies, over all men, not over all things. Response. To 1): The Socinian punctuation is opposed by (a) all Greek exemplars; (b) The purpose of the apostle, which is to extol the dignity of the Jewish nation; which, in order to do so successfully, he teaches that Christ, sprung from the fathers of the Jews, is not only man, but also God, blessed over all; (c) The added limitation, "according to the flesh"; which would not be necessary if Christ were only a man; (d) The context; The doxological (δοξολογικὴ) exclamation, which is imagined by the adversaries, coheres neither with the preceding nor with the following words. Not with the preceding; because the apostle had testified his sympathy (συμπάθειαν) for the Jews, v. 2. and had wished to be accursed for his brethren, v. 3. describing whose glory, v. 4. he commemorates among other things, that from their fathers is Christ according to the flesh. How then would the apostle abruptly transition to a doxology (δοξολογίαν)? He grieves, he wishes, he does not give thanks. He extols the dignity of the Jews, not to celebrate God, but to exaggerate the causes of his grief. Nor with the following; for how do these cohere? "I could wish that I myself were accursed for my brethren, etc. Of whom is Christ according to the flesh Who is over all, God, be blessed forever, Amen! Not as though the word of God had taken none effect?" Certainly no connection (συνάφεια), or cohesion of the text appears. To 2): Even if the words, "over all" (ἐπὶ πάντων), were rendered, over all men, the divinity of Christ would not be diminished; for he is not only over all men, but also over all creatures. He is Jehovah, high above all the earth, greatly exalted above all gods, whom all the angels of God worship. Psalm XCVII, 9. Cf. Hebr. 1, 6. With these premises, we argue: Whoever in the O.T. is called Jehovah and Adonai, and in the N.T. not only absolutely God, but also true, great, God blessed over all, he is the supreme God and God by nature. But the Son, etc. Therefore.

Nor does the name Lord (Κύριος), often corresponding in the N.T. to the O.T. name יהוה (Jehovah), which is claimed for the true God alone, supply an invalid argument for the divinity of Christ. For he is called (1) the Lord from heaven (Κύριος ἐξ οὐρανοῦ). 1 Cor. XV, 47. Since this cannot be said of him by reason of his human nature; there must be in him a higher, and divine nature, according to which he is the Lord from heaven. (2) He is called Lord of all, Acts X, 36. and therefore Lord of heaven and earth, which is a description of the true God. Matth. XI, 15. (3) Lord of lords and King of kings, Rev. XVII, 14. chap. XIX, 16. which denomination is proper to the true God alone, as is clear from 1 Tim. VI, 15. We may therefore gather: The Lord from heaven, the Lord of lords, and King of kings is the supreme God. But Christ, etc. Therefore (*).

II. From the personal divine names. Christ is called in the sacred writings (1) the proper Son of God, Rom. VIII, 32. having God as his proper Father. John V, 18. But he would not be the proper Son of God if he were of a different nature from the father. For it is of the formal reason of being properly called a son, that he be of the same essence with the Father. (2) The only-begotten Son from the Father, John 1, 14. The name of only-begotten son in the entire sacred code never denotes anyone other than he who alone is born from the substance of the Father (**). (3) The Son (*) Indeed, the name Jehovah is attributed to Christ no less than to the Father, Exod. III, 7. Ps. CII, 13. as interpreted by Paul, Hebr. I, 10. 11. 12. Is. XLV, 24. 25. add: Rom. XIV, 10. 11. Rev. I, 8. Not only that one, but also these five names, undoubtedly proper to the supreme God: 1) Jehovah Zebaoth, Is. VI, 3. ff. add. John. XII, 41; 2) Jehovah Elohim, Exod. III, 2-6; 3) Jehovah our righteousness, Jer. XXIII, 6; 4) God of Israel, Ex III, 2. 6. & Luke 1, 16. 17; 5) Lord God of the Holy Prophets, Rev. XXII, 6. cf. with v.16.

(**) That this argument has the greatest force is apparent 1) from the signification of the word, only-begotten (μονογενής). To be sure, there are two ways in which someone can be said to be begotten of God, either properly, from nature, or improperly, from grace. A third way can never be conceived. But men are generated from God by grace, James I, 18. where there are two distinguishing words (α) having willed (βυληθεύς), (β) by the word (λόγῳ), by which indeed our divine generation is discerned from a certain other, which is (α) necessary existing in the bosom of the Father, John 1, 18. which is said of him metaphorically and anthropopathically (ἀνθρωποπαθῶς); yet it insinuates the intimate secret of paternal love and nature, in which the Son always is, as AMBROSE has it lib. de bened Patriarch. serm. 17. The kinship of substance, closeness, equal knowledge and power with the Father, as CHRYSOSTOM has it on this place. that he is consubstantial with the Father, intimately beloved, conscious of the paternal heart and of all secrets, inseparable (ἀχώριστος) from the Father, as Augustine and others explain; whom see cited by D. CALOVIUS in system. theol. tom. III. P. 554. (4) The firstborn Son, Hebr. 1, 6. The firstborn of all creation; because in him all things were created, Coloss. I, 15. 16. He is not called first-created (πρωτόκτιστος); as if he himself were also of the number of creatures, but firstborn (πρωτότοκος) of all creatures, and their creator; because in him all things were created, visible and invisible, which are in the heavens, which are on the earth; The apostle therefore implies that the Son of God was begotten from eternity, before anything was created. v. 16. (5) The Son superior to the angels, Hebr. 1, 5. "For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee." The apostle, having adduced the testimony of Psalm II, 7, teaches that Christ is the Son of God not by creation, nor on account of a concession of power, as the angels are called sons of God in Job XXXVIII, 7. but in a far more eminent manner, which far exceeds the condition and source of all the angels. Since, however, there is nothing more eminent than the angels, except God, as to nature, or essence, it is necessary that the Son of God be of a divine nature, and therefore, since there is but one God by nature, of the same nature and essence with God the Father. (6) The Son equal to God the Father. John V, 17. 18. "Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God." The Jews concluded from those words of Christ: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," that Christ was making himself equal with God. So far was Christ from disapproving of that manner of concluding, that he rather confirmed it, saying: "what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise (ὁμοίως)," to indicate that he accomplishes the same works with the Father by one and the same power, as he has one and the same essence. With these things established, we conclude: The proper Son of God, only-begotten from the Father, existing in his bosom, the firstborn of all creation, superior to the angels and equal to God, is by nature the true and supreme God, consubstantial (ὁμοούσιος) with God the Father. But Christ is the proper Son of God, etc. Therefore.

Proof b. The divinity of the Son of God is validly established from the divine attributes, which are assigned to him in the sacred scriptures no less than to God the Father. For the Son of God is I. ETERNAL; whose eternity Paul indicated, saying, Col. 1, 17. "The Son of God is before all things (πρὸ πάντων), and by him all things consist." He who is prior to all creatures visible and invisible, which are conserved by his providence, is the eternal and independent God. According to the same apostle, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and for ever," Hebr. XIII, 8. By which words, embracing all differences of time, not a finite, but an infinite duration, not time, but eternity, which eminently embraces all durations, is described. St. John supports this, who gravely says in chap. 1, 1. "In the beginning was the word," understanding the hypostatic word, namely the only-begotten son from the Father, v. 14. He was already then in the beginning, when the universe of things began to be created. John does not say:

and (β) from the very nature of God. And Christ is called the only-begotten (μονογενής) Son of God, because he alone by necessity of nature is begotten from the Father. It is also apparent 2) from the coherence of the words. He is namely called only-begotten (μονογενής), (α) who is the Word (λόγος), V. 1. (β) who already was in the beginning of all things, ibid. (γ) and was with God from the beginning, v. 1. 2, (δ) who is God himself, v. 1. (ε) through whom all things were created, so that without him nothing ever came into existence, v. 3. (ζ) who has life in himself, and always has had, v. 4. add. V, 26. where there is the opposite, Acts XVII, 25. & 28. (η) who has made it possible for us to enter into the fellowship of the sons of God, v. 12. (θ) who already was before he was made man, 1. a. cf. with v. 14. 15. Therefore, this name, the only-begotten son (ὁ υἱὸς μονογενής), clearly ought to be referred not to the human nature of Christ, but entirely to the divine.

"In the beginning the word was made," or "began to be," but "was," as if to say, he was prior to every beginning. For the beginning of creation, or of the restoration of men, is not precisely determined here, but the beginning is spoken of absolutely and simply. For whatever beginning you may posit, the Word (ὁ λόγος) did not then first begin to be, but was already then; he anticipated every beginning of times that can be conceived in the mind, every beginning of divine works. Therefore, although these words are rightly compared with the words of Moses: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth"; yet here "in the beginning" (τὸ ἐν ἀρχῇ) is taken more absolutely, and has the same value as "before all things." Which the apostle, intending to indicate, says: "The Word was with God," when there was nothing, but God, nothing, but mere eternity. Nor was he with God as a creature, created before all other creatures, but as God. That Word (λόγος), God, was in the beginning with God (the Father), so that the latter did not exist before the Word (λόγον), but the Word (λόγος) coexisted with him from eternity. All things were made by the Word (τὸν λόγον) v. 3. Therefore he was before all things that were made; for the maker, by whom things are made, is prior to the things made. The world was made by him v. 10. Therefore he was before the creation of the world. Through this Word (λόγον) God created the ages, Heb. 1, 2. Therefore he was before the ages, and thus from eternity. Nor does St. John delineate the eternity of the Son of God less graphically in Rev. I, 8. where he introduces him speaking: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come." Just as the first letter of the Greek alphabet is Alpha, the last Omega; so Christ is the beginning, without beginning of time, and the end, without end; he is the first, because before him there is nothing; the last, because after him there is nothing: on the part from before, and on the part from after he is interminable. Cf. Is. XLI, 4. chap. XLIV, 6. chap. XLVIII, 12. This Lord is, was, and is to come, because his eternity coexists with all the differences of time, itself remaining indivisible in itself (*).

II. IMMENSE & OMNIPRESENT. He is immense; because he is in the immense bosom of the Father, John I, 18. (**). He is omnipresent; because, where two or three

(*) Also very clear are these testimonies, John I, 27. 30. VIII, 58. XVII, 5.

(**) But the principal argument is drawn from Eph IV, 10. Although that ascension is properly to be attributed to the human nature in Christ, yet the reason for it is placed in this; that the human nature of Christ is joined with his supreme divinity by the tightest bond. And indeed 1) this expression, to be higher than all the heavens, denotes an immense magnitude, to be asserted of God alone, 1 Kings VIII, 27. and the difference of the words is to be well observed; to ascend into heaven; and above the heavens, and indeed all of them. This certainly cannot but be the highest, and therefore immense. 2) This way of speaking, to fill all things, is used in no other way than of the immensity of God, Jerem. XXIII, 24. 3) Christ openly and plainly asserted that he would return to where he had descended from, John VI, 62. Therefore Christ, before he descended and finally ascended above all the heavens, was superior to all the heavens, and filled all things; Therefore according to his divine nature, since the human had not yet existed. To this point several such sayings look, which testify that, (a) Christ came from above, and for that reason is far superior to all, John III, 31. (b) Christ was with God, before the foundations of the world were laid, John I, 2. (c) Christ descended from heaven, yet in such a way that he himself is still always in heaven, John III, 13. (d) he came forth from the Father, John XVI, 28; but yet is nevertheless perpetually in the Father, John XIV, 10. 11. For in the way that God, who fills heaven and earth, is sometimes said to have descended, namely when he manifested himself in some singular manner; in the same way Christ, the eternal and immense God himself, descending from the heavens exhibited himself to us, manifested in the flesh. I will perfect the argumentation 4) by a comparison of these sayings, Eph. IV, 10. John III, 13. with that one, Job XI, 8. where the divine man assigns the heights of the heavens to God alone, and thence draws an argument for the immense knowledge of all things which is in God, v. 7. So likewise Christ, to make Nicodemus certain that he knows the heavenly things (τὰ ἐπουράνια), adduces this reason; that he himself has always been in heaven, and indeed even higher than all the heavens, Eph. IV, 10. Hebr. VII. 26. These reasons having been collected, that rapture of Christ into heaven, which the Socinians so barbarously speak of, and which they are gathered together in his name, there he is in the midst of them. Matthew. XVIII, 20. He is with us always, even unto the end of the world. Matthew. XXVIII, 20.

III. IMMUTABLE. "You are the same, and your years shall have no end." Ps. CII, 28. That these words are to be understood of the Son of God, Paul teaches in Hebr. I, 12.

IV. MOST HOLY; for the prophet Daniel calls him the most holy, chap. IX, 24.

V. OMNIPOTENT. The Son of God Himself says: "I am the almighty (παντοκράτωρ)." Rev. I, 8. "No man is able to pluck my sheep out of my hand," John X, 28. Therefore, the power of Christ surpasses all finite power.

VI. OMNISCIENT. "Lord, you know all things," says Peter in John XXI, 17. Christ knows what is in man. John II, 25.

VII. MOST BLESSED & MOST SELF-SUFFICIENT; for he has all that the father has, John XVI, 15.

VIII. MOST GLORIOUS; for he is the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. VIII, 8. He had glory with the Father, before the world was, John XVII, 5.

From these we gather: Whoever is eternal, immense, omnipresent, immutable, most holy, omnipotent, omniscient, most blessed, and most glorious, he is the supreme and true God by nature. But Christ, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because to whom the divine attributes belong, to him belongs the divine essence itself; since the former do not in reality differ from the latter. (***) were indeed forced to invent, serving their own preconceived opinion, is naked of all support.

(***) Now I must declare, in what the strength of this proof chiefly consists, that the reserved properties themselves, proper to the individual divine perfections, and all of them, with not one exception, are predicated of Christ equally as of the Father (page 281. * & page 301.). The reserved properties are attributed to him:

I. Of divine knowledge, specifically 1) the most perfect knowledge of God himself, for in the same way that the Father knows the Son, the Son in turn knows the Father, Matthew XI, 27. John I, 18. & VI, 46. in which place indeed there is a threefold strength of proof, if indeed this knowledge of God the Father, which Christ claims for himself, (a) is denied to all others, add. 1 Tim. VI, 16.; (b) is opposed to that knowledge which is acquired by divine doctrine and institution, v. 45.; (c) is derived from the intimate conjunction of the Son with the Father, "as being from the Father" (ὡς παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ). 2) Knowledge of all nature, John XXI, 17. Hebr. IV, 13. the word, "his" (αὐτοῦ), pertains to what follows, "with whom we have to do" (πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος), but indeed it is not the Father, but the Son, concerning whom it was Paul's established plan to expound in this letter, v. 14. 3) Knowledge of supernatural things, as they are called, John XVI, 30. and this is to be compared with those things which we will discuss hereafter concerning the supreme power which Christ possesses to perform any miracles whatsoever. 4) Knowledge of minds, and that indeed (a) immediate, without any testimony or sign, John II, 24. & 26. (b) certain, not probable, which is the power of the word, "he saw" (εἶδεν), John I, 47. 48. (c) universal and perpetual, John XXI, 17. Peter concludes from the universal to the particular, and especially Rev. II, 23. where the number of the multitude, "all the churches" (πάσαις ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις), is coupled with the number of unity, "every one of you" (ἐκάστῳ ὑμῶν), that is, to know exploratively the thoughts of all and of each. That Christ speaks thus of himself is abundantly clear from v. 18. as well as from the continuation of the discourse up to v. 28. The expression itself is entirely that which befits the one God, 1 Kings VIII, 39. add. Jer. XI, 20. where likewise the power of judging is skillfully joined with the searching of the reins and hearts. Finally 5) Prescience, and indeed (a) of the most remote events, Luke XXI, 25. ff. and frequently in the revelation of John, (b) of the most minute, of which number is also the point of time, and even the opportunity (which indeed pertains more to wisdom than to knowledge) John XIII, 1. XVII, 1. (c) of future contingents, John XVIII, 4. even of those things which would have happened, a certain condition being posited (that which they have called mediate knowledge in God) John VI, 15.

II. Of divine wisdom: 1) The choice of always the best, wherefore Christ, no less than the Father, is named both par excellence (κατ' ἐξοχήν), and in the abstract, the very wisdom of God, Luke VII, 34. 35. XI, 29. cf. with Matthew XXIII, 34. 2) infinite breadth, without any exception "the treasures of wisdom" (οἱ θησαυροὶ τῆς σοφίας), Col. II, 3. 3) supreme authority, or, as is commonly said, independence, for Christ possesses such wisdom that (a) no one taught him, 1 Cor. II, 16. add. Rom. XI, 34. (b) he himself confers it on others, and (c) no one is able to resist it, Luke XXI, 15. 4) immense depth, 1 Cor. II, 16. cf. with Rom. XI, 34. Eph. III, 8. add. Rom. XI, 33.

III. Of divine goodness; 1) independently, John III, 31. XVI, 15.; 2) excellently, for which reason Christ is called good par excellence (κατ' ἐξοχήν), John X, 11.; 3) causally, John X, 10. add. Pr. XXIII, L. 6. and especially notable is that which is said of Christ, 2 Cor. XII, 9. 4) constantly, so that neither change nor mutability can fall upon him, Hebr. I, 11. 12. thus indeed Paul interprets the words of David concerning the Son of God. In that passage, however, Matthew XIX, 16. 17. Christ institutes a discussion according to man (κατ' ἄνθρωπον), against him who was denying to him the glory of divinity. By what right, he says, or with what mind, do you call me good, when you are unwilling to confess that I am God? An example, very similar to this, we see in Matthew XXII, 43. 45. Who would think that Christ denied he was the Lord of David? But this he meant, that his adversaries should explain how they could reconcile this with their false opinion.

IV. Of divine truth, which is wont to be called veracity: 1) Universality, without any exception, John III, 31. 32. 33. 2) Necessity, so that Christ is unable to deceive. For so he attributes immutability to his own words, Luke XXI, 33. add. Ps. CXIX, 96. For which reason he himself is named par excellence (κατ' ἐξοχήν), "the Amen, and the true one" (ὁ Ἀμήν, καὶ ὁ ἀληθινός), Rev. III, 7. 14. and the truth itself, John XIV, 6. Therefore Christ also swears by himself, and Paul confirms his own utterances with an oath by Christ; about which argument we will have to dissert below.

V. Of divine power, and therefore of authority. General sayings exist in John XVI, 15. Phil. III, 21. Ps. VIII, 7. so that nothing is excepted, except God, 1 Cor. XV, 27. Specifically (κ) by reason of things, or objects; In the power of Christ, equally as of the Father, are: 1) the mind of each and every man, and of his dominion there are two parts, (a) the right to bind the conscience, Rom. XIV, 1. & 10. (b) the right to remit sins, and indeed in his own name, Matthew IX, 6. in which way also the Legates of Christ, in his name as well as the Father's, have performed the duty entrusted to them, both in remitting sins, 2 Cor. II, 10. and in retaining them, 1 Cor. 5:4-5. 2) the directing of fortune, Mark. XVI, 20. Rom. XV, 18.; 3) heaven and earth, and all created things, Rev. V, 13.; 4) the Church, Col. I, 18. the foundation of which supreme power is not only liberation, v. 14. but also creation and conservation, v. 16. 17. Hebr. III, 3. 4. and to that pertains the right of instituting sacraments; 5) Magistrates, and therefore supreme Rulers, Ps. II, 9. CX, 1. and therefore this name, King of kings, Lord of lords, which is certainly proper to the supreme Deity (1 Tim. VI, 15. 16.) is attributed to Christ no less than to the Father, Rev. XVII, 14. XIX, 16. compare with the preceding v. 11-15, and the following v. 17. 6) the right of life and death, constrained by no limits, Rom. 14:7-9. in which place four things are worthy of note: (a) the name, "the Lord" (Κύριος), by which Christ is signified, is perspicuous, v. 9.; (b) the sign of universality, "none of us" (οὐδείς ἡμῶν); (c) the expression is exactly the same as is used of God the Father, Luke XX, 38. "for all live unto him" (πάντες γὰρ αὐτῷ ζῶσιν); (d) the conjunction of this predicate with others, indices of supreme divinity, v. 10;11. add. Is XLV, 21-24. to which prophecy the Apostle manifestly had respect. But it is also pertinent to say what Christ pronounces about his own life, John II, 19. X, 18. 7) The right to judge the entire world, Rom. XIV, 10. 11. 8) The right over the entire nature of things, so that he himself can perform miracles, superior to all the forces of nature, whatsoever and in whatsoever manner he wishes; about which I will explain shortly after. (κ) By reason of mode, namely 1) independently; for Christ, (α) as he has life in himself, John V, 26. (see page 234.) so he also has all power of acting, if he wishes, and whatever he wishes, John V, 21. Matthew VIII, 2. 3. (but it befits all those who are inferior to God to speak much differently, James IV, 15.); (β) no one is able to resist him, 1 Cor. XV, 25.; (γ) he ought to render an account to no one, he the supreme judge of all; 2) immediately, with one word, and by his own sufficient will, Matthew VIII, 8. 3) infinitely, Rev. V, 12. 13. in which place there is a threefold strength of proof, (α) "power and strength" (ἰσχύς καὶ κράτος), without any determination, (β) eternal power, and that (γ) attributed to the Son equally as to the Father, v. 13. Add. Dan VII, 13. 14. Luke 1, 33. cf. with Dan. IV, 31. where the same thing, in the same words, is predicated of the most high God; 4) perfectly, Matthew XXVIII, 18. Phil. III, 21. IV, 13.

Proof c. The true divinity of Christ is demonstrated by the divine acts, both personal and essential, which are attributed to him in the divine writings. The personal acts of the Son of God are the eternal spiration and the temporal mission of the Holy Spirit.

From which it is argued: He who together with God the Father from eternity spirates, and in time sends the Holy Spirit, is true God, consubstantial (ὁμοούσιος) or co-essential with God the Father. But the Son of God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the Holy Spirit, who is eternal God, can be spirated and sent only by the true and eternal God. We will establish faith in the minor below.

The essential divine acts, which are claimed for the Son of God in the sacred writings, generally considered, are the same as those of God the Father; specifically considered they are the acts of divine power, omniscience, mercy, and justice (****). The identity of the essential operations of God the Father and the Son is evident from John V, 19. "For what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise." By which words Christ both teaches that absolutely all things which the Father does are his works, and claims for himself both the identity of the works and the same manner of working. To these add John X, 37. 38. "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know, and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him." The Savior shows not obscurely that from the communion of works, the communion of essence is to be gathered. Wherefore we conclude: He who does the same divine works as the eternal Father, and operates in the same manner of acting with him, is of one essence with the heavenly Father. But Christ, etc. Therefore.

The acts of divine power are 1) The creation of this universe, the making of all things (ποίησις τῶν πάντων), John 1, 3. Col. I, 16. so that not only are all things said to be produced through him (just as Paul says he was called through the Father, not certainly as a less principal cause, but as a principal one, Gal. I, 1), but he himself is also said in the nominative case to have created all things, Hebr. 1, 10. from Psalm CII, 26. "You, Lord, in the beginning have laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of your hands." 2) The conservation and governance of this universe. For the Son of God upholds all things by the word of his power. Hebr. I, 3. he upholds all things by conserving and governing: he upholds all things by the word of his power, i.e. by his most powerful command and dominion. From which Paul asserts that in him all things consist, Col. I, 17. namely lest they dissolve or fall apart. 3) (****) Entirely divine works, namely both all those which God himself performs, not through some minister, and in every way that is fitting for God alone (page 301. *) Behold! a general saying, John V, 19. Specifically (x) actions, and indeed all those which God himself alone, with no one ministering, performs, are 1) The creation of the entire world, as well as its conservation, both of which are asserted of Christ, Col. I, 16. & 17. John 1, 3. (the particle, "through" (διὰ), in this place, as sometimes elsewhere, denotes the efficient cause, as we learn from Hebr. I, 10. III, 3. 4.); 2) The new creation, Hebr. III, 1-4. 3) The mission of the ministers of the church, John XX, 21. and plainly in such a way as it is attributed to the Father, Gal. I, 1.; 4) The efficacy of the means of grace, Rom. XV, 18. Hebr IV, 12. (for who is he, from whose mouth the word proceeds like a two-edged sword? Indeed Christ, Rev. 1, 16. II, 12. 16.); 5) The recalling of all the dead to life, John V, 21. (□) entirely in a manner that uniquely befits God, 1) To act by his own will, in his own name, and by his own authority, in the same way as the Father, John V, 21. Luke IV, 36. VII, 14. Matthew VIII, 3. 4. No one sent from God, not even an angel, ever dared this. All, if they undertook anything, did it under divine auspices, always appealing to the will and authority of God. The one greatest of all prophets, Moses, always calls God the effector of such great things, he says that God did this, but that he lent his hands to God, Ex. IV, 22. 23. VII, 16. XIV. 21. 24. He never dared to say: I will do this, so I will, so I command, in the way that Christ, and he alone indeed, did not hesitate to speak. 2) To confer on others the power of performing divine things, and the greatest of all, Matthew XVI, 19. Luke IX, 1. John XX, 21. Eph IV, 10. 11. so that his Legates might conduct his business in his name, relying on his will and authority, Luke IX, 54. Mark XVI, 17. Acts III, 6. cf. with v. 12. 3) To perform miracles with the intention of making his own glory manifest, John II, 11. V, 23. But all things are to be referred and directed only to the glory of the supreme Deity.

The effecting of miracles. True miracles with His own authority (αυτοκρατορικῶς), by his own power, only God performs. Ps. LXXII, 18. Ps. CXXXVI, 4. For true miracles are rare and unusual effects, produced by God, beyond the order of the whole of created nature. Christ performed a) true miracles, to which he appealed as witnesses of his divine mission, greater than any exception. Matthew XI, 5.; b) singular and inimitable (ἀμίμητα) ones, of which AUGUSTINE commemorates three in tom. II. epist. III. "To be born of a virgin, to rise from the dead, to ascend into heaven; he who thinks this too little for God, I know not what more he would expect." c) with His own authority (αυτοκρατορικῶς) by a power not adventitious or precarious, but primitive and independently flowing, from which as from a fount the grace of miracles flowed down into other thaumaturges. Matthew X, 1. Acts III, 6.; d) for his own glory, John II, 1.

The acts of divine grace are, 1) Redemption, which is certainly a truly divine action. For "God purchased the church with his own blood." Acts XX, 28. 2) The collection, conservation, governance, and defense of the Church; which indeed as king of Zion, Ps. II, 6. he gathered through the word and sacraments. Mark XVI, 15. Matthew XXVIII, 19. chap. XXVI, 26. which also he protects against the gates of hell. Matthew XVI, 18. The gates of hell are the vices, heresies, and persecutions stirred up by the devil against the church. 3) Salvation, which is certainly a divine work. "I, even I, am Jehovah; and beside me there is no savior." Is. XLIII, 11. But Jesus is the Savior, who saves his people from their sins. Matthew I, 21.

The acts of omniscience are 1) the prediction of future things. Future contingents, which depend on the will of God or of men, God alone has foreknown and predicts with certainty and infallibility, Is. XLIII, 9. Christ predicted future things. Matthew XXIV, 15. John II, 18. Indeed, the prophets also predicted future things, but being illuminated by the Spirit of Christ, 1 Peter II, 11. 2) Knowledge of hearts (Καρδιогνωσία), the scrutiny of human hearts, which belongs to God alone, 1 Kings VIII, 29. Jer. XVII, 10, belongs to Christ, who says of himself in Rev. II, 23. "I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts." The acts of divine justice are 1) the resurrection of the dead, which is a truly divine action, Rom. IV, 17. 2 Cor. 1, 9. and is attributed to Christ, Job. XIX, 26. John VI, 39. 2) The universal judgment, John V, 22. for which infinite knowledge, power, and majesty are required, and therefore it is claimed for God alone, Gen. XVIII, 25. From the divine actions taken together, an argument is born: Whoever created this universe, conserves and governs the created; performs true miracles by his own power for his own glory; redeemed the entire fallen human race; gathered, protects, and saves the church through the word and sacraments; infallibly foreknew and predicts future contingents, and scrutinizes the hearts of men; raises the dead, and exercises a universal judgment on all men, he is the supreme and true God by nature. But Christ, etc. Therefore.

Proof d. The divinity of Christ is also solidly established from divine worship. God denies that he will give his glory to another, Is. XLII, 8. But to Christ is claimed 1) in general, divine worship. For all are commanded to honor the Son, just as (καθὼς) they honor the father, John V, 22. 2) In particular, all men are commanded a) to be baptized in the name of the Son of God, equally as in the name of God the Father and the Holy Spirit, Matthew XXVIII, 19. b) to believe in Christ just as in God the Father. "Believe in God, and believe also in me," John XIV, 1.; c) to worship Christ religiously, Ps. XLV, 12. Is. XLV, 24. Rom. XIV, 11. Phil. II, 10.; d) to celebrate God the Father and the Son with equal honor. "To him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb (be) blessing, and honour, and glory, and power for ever and ever," Rev. V, 13. This will be the argument; Whomever men are commanded to honor, just as they honor the Father, to be baptized into him and to believe, to worship him religiously, and to celebrate equally as the Father, he is the supreme God, of the same essence and majesty with the heavenly Father. But the Son of God, etc. Therefore (*****).

of which let us consider (a) the object, which are the merits of Christ (what and how great? So great certainly, that they are able to reconcile the whole world to God, and the world in turn to God, 2 Cor. V, 19. 20. which declares the infinite force of Christ's merits; the liberation of one soul, not to mention all, costs a price which is to be valued more than the universe of things, Matthew XVI, 26.); (b) the mode, and true reason, by which it ought to be done, that we prefer Christ, the supremely good, to all things, Phil. III, 8. 9.; (c) the effect, namely righteousness valid before God, and the forgiveness of all sins, Acts X, 43. 1 Tim. I, 15. 16. indeed eternal salvation, John. III, 16; (d) the foundation, on which it rests, which is the word of Christ, as one who can neither deceive nor be deceived, John. VIII, 51.; (e) the adjunct, namely this, that the trust to be placed in Christ is closely joined with that which we ought to place in the Father, John. XIV, 1.

2) Hope, the most certain expectation of all future goods, John. X, 11. XIV, 13. 14. Finally of sempiternal blessedness, John. X, 28. and so indeed, that the foundation of this hope is the immense power of Christ, Phil. III, 20, 21. so that also the effect is self-sufficiency (αὐτάρκεια), 2 Cor. XII, 9. 10. Phil. IV, 11. 12. 13.

3) Love conquering all things, both good things to be sought, Luke XIV, 26. cf. with Matthew X, 37. 39. XIX, 29. and evil things to be feared, 2 Corinthians XII, 10. Both kinds are treated in Rom. VIII, 37. 38. 39. in which place heights (ὕψωμα) are honors and pleasures, depth (βάθος) are dangers and calamities.

4) Obedience, and that indeed entirely most perfect, without any exception either of duties, John XV, 10. or of men, Prov. II, 8. 10. We are admonished to avoid repugnance against Christ and temptation, entirely the same by which God was once violated, 1 Cor. X, 9. add. Exod. XVII, 2. 7. Num. XXI, 5. 6. Deut. VI, 16.

5) Covenant, and that indeed, by which we profess our conscience to be bound and devoted to God, 1 Pet III, 21. Math. XXVIII, 19.

6) The greatest religion indeed of an oath, by which we profess the supreme knowledge which God possesses, especially knowledge of the heart (καρδιογνωσίαν), and justice, and power, Deut. VI, 13. X, 20. Hebr. VI, 13. 16. Therefore these three documents are to be noted: (α) Paul swears by Christ no less than by the Father, Rom. IX, 1. 2 Cor. XI, 10. 2 Tim. IV, 1. (β) Paul adjures Timothy by Christ equally as by the Father, 1 Tim. VI, 13. (γ) Christ swears by himself, which is an indication that there is no one superior to him, Hebr VI, 16. He swears, however, in that manner, Is. XLV, 23. That these are the words of Christ is apparent both from the whole series of the oration, and from the interpretation of Rom. XIV, 10. 11. Phil. II, 10. Nor should that be passed over, Is LXV, "the God of truth" (אלהי אמת) - Christ, Rev. III, 14. The reason is at hand, 2 Cor. I, 20. & John. I, 17. From which it is understood, (a) why Christ, and he alone, and frequently, has used this form of speech, "amen, I say to you" (ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν), thus indeed swearing by himself, (β) for what reason he generally used that double assertion, "amen, amen" (ἀμὴν, ἀμὴν), for in that prophecy, as it is in Isaiah, both the repetition of "amen" (אמן) exists, and the signification of two things, of which one indeed is an oath, and the other, a blessing. Therefore Christ saying, "amen I say" (ἀμὴν λέγω), and again "amen I say" (ἀμὴν λέγω), first swears by himself, then also speaks good to us, by himself likewise.

7) Prayer, and indeed both kinds of it: a) Adoration, by which we venerate the infinite majesty and excellence of God. Cf. Rom. XIV, 11. with that of Is. XLV, 23. 24. where Christ is considered as יהוה (Jehovah). A great deal of weight is certainly in this saying, Rev. V, 13. 14. in which the strength of the proof is fourfold: (a) the eternal continuation of praise, which is a certain part of supreme religion, "for ever and ever" (εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων), (b) the common office of all created things, "every creature" (πᾶν κτίσμα), "which is in heaven etc." (ὃ ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ κ.τ.λ.) so that not even the angels are excepted, Hebr. I, 6, none of whom, however, venerates Christ as their liberator, Hebr. II, 16. Therefore as their Creator, and Conservator, Hebr. I, 10.; (c) a most significant combination of words, "the blessing, and the honor, and the glory, and the power" (ἡ εὐλογία, καὶ ἡ τιμὴ, καὶ ἡ δόξα, καὶ τὸ κράτος), so that nothing is left that pertains to supreme veneration, (d) the conjunction of the Son with the Father, as worthy of equal honor, "to him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the lamb" (τῷ καθημένῳ ἐπὶ τῷ θρόνῳ, καὶ τῷ ἀρνίῳ). What remains, reserved for the Father alone? Absolutely nothing. b) Supplication, or, as it is commonly called, Invocation, Proof e. A careful comparison of the sayings of the O. and N.T. supplies us with most certain arguments for confirming the divinity of Christ. For example, let the argument be: The one whom the Israelites tempted in the desert besides Moses, is the true and eternal God, Num. XXI, 5. 6. But Christ is he, whom the Israelites etc. 1 Cor. X, 9. Therefore, Christ is the true God. Similarly: He who ascended on high, led captivity captive, received gifts for man, is God, Ps. LXVIII, 19. But Christ etc. Eph. IV, 8. Therefore. By a like reason compare Ps. CX, 1. and Hebr. I, 10. Mal. III, 1. with Matthew XI, 10. Is. XL, 3 with Matthew III, 3.

The antithesis is of all the Antitrinitarians, among whom today the most hostile enemies of the divinity of Christ are the Socinians; but the Arminians deny that Christ is truly called God of Himself (αὐτόθεον). Their arguments are of a twofold order. 1) They proceed to prove that only the heavenly Father is the supreme God. Whence they gather that Christ is not the supreme, but a subordinate God. 2) They directly attack the supreme divinity of Christ. The arguments of the former class are.

I. Whomever Christ calls the only true God, besides him there is no supreme God. But God the Father etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because an exclusive particle of the subject excludes all other subjects from the participation of the same predicate. The minor is evident from John XVII, 2. where the Savior says: "This is eternal life, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Where only the Father is called the true God. Response. The particle, "only," is not added to the subject, which (as to the sense) is the Father, but to the predicate, which is that true God; and so the words of Christ do not mean that the Father alone is that true God, but that the Father is that only true God, or he, who alone is the true God. Notwithstanding this, the Son of God is also the true God, as is expressly stated in 1 John V, 20. "This (the Son) is that true God." For the word, "to be" (εἶναι), seems to be omitted by ellipsis, or insinuated by the article, "the" (τὸν), so that the complete sense is this: This is eternal life, that they might know, thee, Father, to be that true God, and with the addition; and, whom you sent, Jesus Christ, the predicate from the preceding must be repeated in this way: And, whom you sent, Jesus Christ, to be that only, true God; so that thus the Father and the Son are said to be that only true God.

II. In 1 Cor. VIII, 6. Paul says: "But to us there is but one (only true) God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one (true) Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him." Where Paul calls only the Father God. Response. 1) The apostle does not say: "The Father alone is God"; but thus: "to us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things." One God is opposed not to the divine persons, but to the so-called gods (θεοῖς λεγομένοις), v. 5. who are so called either metaphorically and by analogy (κατ' ἀναλογίαν), as angels and magistrates, or catachrestically, and by opinion (κατὰ δόξαν), as the idols of the gentiles. 2) If from the fact that the Father is called one God, it were permissible to gather that Christ is not one God; by a like reason from the fact that Christ is called one Lord, it would have to be inferred that God the Father is not one Lord.

by which we implore the kindness of God, and ask for benefits to be divinely conferred upon us. That supplication, however, which is to be decreed for the supreme God alone, ought to be common and perpetual, Rom. X, 13. 14. It is called common, and what is wont to be said, universal, for a fourfold reason, by which it always has respect to the divine properties and perfections, and therefore is religious worship (by definition). There is namely a universality of (a) places, the reason for which is the immense presence and knowledge of God, (b) times, to this pertains the eternity and immutability of God, (c) supplicants, the foundation of this is the knowledge of the supreme dominion of God, that all depend on the will of the one God, (d) things to be sought, this rests on the consideration of the infinite power, authority, and goodness in God, Eph. III, 20. But this universality of supplication is attributed to Christ no less than to the Father, by reason of (a) all places, Matthew XVIII, 20. 1 Cor. 1, 2. (b) all times, 2 Thess. 1, 11. & 12. (c) all supplicants, Rom. X, 13. 14. cf. with v. 9. 10. 11. 12. (d) things and benefits, partly the bestowal of all good, John XIV, 13. add. Ps. XXXVII, 5. where this is said to be proper to God, "Jehovah, he will do it" (יהוה יעשה), partly liberation and freedom from all evil, 2 Tim. IV, 18. That the Lord (Κύριον) is Christ, both the context declares, v. 1. 8. 22. and the perpetual custom of Paul's speech, see 1 Cor. VIII, 6.

The Father would therefore be God, who was not the Lord of all, and Christ would be Lord, who was only a so-called god (θεὸς λεγόμενος), by name, not by nature. Which things are most alien to the Christian religion. For the Father is the Lord of heaven and earth, Matthew XI, 25. and Christ is the true God, 1 John V, 20.

Objection: Christ is subordinated to God by the apostle; because all things are said to be from God, and through Christ. "From" designates the principal cause, "through" the less principal cause. Response. The particles, "from," and "through," do not designate an inequality, but the order of the divine persons. Nor does the particle, "through," always denote a less principal cause. For from God, and through God are all things, Rom. XI, 36. Through the Father are all things. Hebr. II, 10. (*)

III. In Eph. IV, 6. Paul says: "One God and Father of all." Where "one God," and "Father," signify the same subject. Therefore the one does not extend more widely than the other, nor is anyone else that one God, than the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Response. 1) If Father, and God, are as broad here; the name of father is not taken personally here, but essentially. Which signification is established from the fact that he is called the Father of all. When it is taken personally, it precisely implies a relation to the only-begotten Son Christ. But the one God, as he is the father of all, is the whole Holy Trinity. Whence it can be conceded that the one God, and the Father of all, extend equally broadly here. 2) Even if it is posited that the name of Father is taken personally here, still the one God is not opposed to the Son of God, who indeed is the true God, 1 John V, 20. but is opposed to creatures, and false gods.

Objection: But the one God is openly distinguished from the one Lord, and the one Spirit, v. 4. 5. Therefore the Father is God, Christ is Lord, and the Spirit is our Sanctifier. Response. The adversaries wrongly oppose the one God, the one Lord, the one Spirit by reason of essence; and this against the mind of Paul, who distinguishes them by reason of person, and of the actions which are appropriated to them; Otherwise it would follow that the Father is not Spirit, because there is one Spirit v. 4. nor is he himself Lord, because there is one Lord v. 5. But that is false, see John IV, 24. And this is false, see Matthew XI, 25.

IV. The Father alone knows the last day and hour. Therefore, the Father alone is the true God. The reason for the consequence is evident: Because omniscience, to which belongs the knowledge of the last day, is an attribute of the true God. The antecedent is made clear from Mark XIII, 32. "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." Response. The particle "only" here excludes from the participation of the prescience of the last day the creatures, and the Son himself, as man in the state of humiliation, in which he voluntarily abdicated the universal and incessant exercise of divine omniscience; but it does not exclude the Holy Spirit and the Son, as God; who indeed knows all things, John XXI, 17.

V. Whoever is distinguished by the name of God from the Son and the Holy Spirit, he alone is the supreme God. But God the Father etc. Therefore. The minor is clear from 1 Cor. XII, 6. "There is one God, who worketh all in all." The Son is called lord v. 5. The Holy Spirit is absolutely called spirit v. 4. But only the Father is called God. Response. In the cited passage the name of God is taken personally (ὕποστατικῶς), and distinctively (διακριτικῶς), because he is distinguished from the Son and the Holy Spirit as the first person of the Godhead, so that nevertheless, essentially (ἔσσιον), the Son, as well as the Holy Spirit, are also that same God, working all in all.

(*) I consider a certain distinction necessary. Christ must be considered either as God, or as the Mediator, intervening between God and men, in which respect he is himself discerned from God. When we look at the former, then that "through" (διὰ) has the same value as "from" (ἐξ), or "he who," and therefore denotes an efficient cause, is clear from a threefold argument: 1) that the word, "through" (διὰ), is used of the Father equally as of Christ, and indeed in the conjunction of both, Gal 1, 1. 2) that the particle, "from" (ἐξ), is applied in the same way to both, Rom I, 7. 3) that the Son of God is not only said to be the one through whom all things were created, but also himself the Creator and Maker of this universe, John I, 3. cf. with Hebr II, 10. if we contemplate both the context and the scope of this chapter. But where this latter is the case, there "through" (διὰ) does not indeed designate an efficient cause, nor yet a ministerial one, as is said, but a meritorious one, for example 1 Cor. VIII, 6. But satisfaction is contained in this: that our Sponsor is the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), and his human nature is joined with the divine person by the tightest bond.

VI. Whoever is that God, between whom and men Christ is the mediator; he alone is the supreme God. But between God the Father and men Christ is the mediator. Therefore. The minor is established from 1 Tim. II, 5. Response. By God in that place is understood the triune God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Objection: If in that place by God is understood the triune God, Christ will be the mediator of himself, when yet the mediator is manifestly distinguished from God. Response. 1) Christ is not the whole Holy Trinity, although he is one of the Holy Trinity. 2) Christ is not the mediator of himself, inasmuch as he is one God with the Father and the Holy Spirit, the offended party, but inasmuch as he is the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) satisfying for the offense, according to that: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," 2 Cor. V, 19. 3) The mediator is distinguished from God by reason of person and office, not by reason of the divine essence.

VII. If only the Father sits on the throne of divine majesty, he himself alone is the supreme God. The antecedent is true. Therefore, so is the consequent. The reason for the consequence is; because the supreme God occupies the most lofty throne of divine majesty. The antecedent is proved from Dan. VII, 9. Rev. IV, 5. Response. a) In general: Parabolic theology is not argumentative. b) In particular: From the vision of the Father alone on the throne to the negation of the divinity of the Son is not a valid consequence. For an apparition is of free determination, and therefore can be of one or of several persons. Although God is three in persons, he can nevertheless in some vision be represented not as three, but as one, on account of the unity of essence, power, glory, and majesty. Christ says of himself: "I have sat down with my Father in his throne," Rev. III, 21. (*)

VIII. Whoever alone is God of Himself (αὐτόθεος), he alone is the supreme God. But

God the Father etc. Therefore. The major is established; because God of Himself (αὐτόθεος) is he who is God from himself. To be from oneself is proper to the supreme God. The minor is clear, because God the Father has not received his essence from anyone, he is truly called God of Himself (αὐτόθεος), i.e., God existing from himself. Response. The Greek word God of Himself (αὐτόθεος) is not biblical, but ecclesiastical, used first by ORIGEN tom. II. in Ioan. fol. 272. as cited by HÜLSEMANN in brev. enucl. p. 137. We could safely abstain from this word. But since the dissenters attack the deity of Christ from this ecclesiastical word, its force of signification must be accurately weighed. Since "himself" (αὐτός) signifies self, and "God" (θεός) signifies God, the ecclesiastical term God of Himself (αὐτόθεος) can be explained in two ways, so as to note a) him, who is God by himself, or in himself. Thus the Son of God (as also the Holy Spirit) is God of Himself (αὐτόθεος) by himself, or in himself. For as the Father has life in himself; so has he given to the Son to have life in himself, John V, 26. b) So as to designate him, who is God from himself. But just as to be from oneself either says the negation of dependence on another, as an efficient cause, or the negation of all origin and personal procession; so God of Himself (αὐτόθεος), God from himself, is said 1) The independent God. In which sense the Son of God is rightly called God of Himself (αὐτόθεος); because he is a being, equally as the Father, independent. For to depend signifies to be from another, as an efficient cause, in a diversity of nature. But in the divine, the Father is not the cause of the Son, but only the non-causal principle through eternal generation; nor between the Father and the Son is there a diversity of nature, but a most singular unity. 2) God of Himself (αὐτόθεος) is called the unoriginated God. Thus only the Father is God of Himself (αὐτόθεος), God from himself (ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ), i.e., having his origin from no one. The Son has the communicated divine essence through generation, from the Father, the Holy Spirit through procession, from the Father and the Son. And yet from this the supreme divinity of the Son or the Holy Spirit is not rightly attacked. For to be from oneself is proper to the supreme God, insofar as it

(*) But also those words, whose meaning is the same, Is. VI, 1. are to be understood not of the Father alone, but also of the Son of God, and of the Holy Spirit, as will be abundantly clear, if the continuation of the words v. 3. 8. 9. is compared with John. XII, 40. 41. & Acts XXVIII, 25. 26.

denies causal dependence on another; but insofar as it denies all origin or personal procession, it is a notificative (γνωριστική) notion of the first person of the Godhead. It remains therefore fixed and settled, that the Son of God is God of Himself (αὐτόθεον), who is God from himself and in himself, because he is the independent and eternal Jehovah. Nor was EPIPHANIUS wrong, when he called the Son of God self-perfect and God of Himself (αὐτοτέλειον καὶ αὐτόθεον). Hæres. LXIX.

Objection I: The fathers of the council of Nicaea called the Son God from God, and therefore denied that he was God of Himself (αὐτόθεον), God from himself. Response. By the very fact that the fathers of the council of Nicaea called the Son God from God, they indicated that he is from the Father not by way of dependence, as creatures are, but by way of origin, and consubstantiality (ὁμοουσίας), otherwise they would not have called him God from God. They took the word, God, not essentially, but personally. Cf. 2 Cor. XIII, 13. 1 Tim. III, 16.

Objection II: God the Father seems to be God par excellence (κατ' ἐξοχήν), because he is a) the fount of deity; b) because the reason of the giver is weightier than that of the receiver; as, if a king should give to his son equal power with himself in the kingdom. Response. A fount and principle has an excellence (ἐξοχήν) or prerogative over the principled, if it is essentially distinguished from it. But the three divine persons are of one singular essence, and therefore of one excellence and majesty.

Objection III: A distinction could not incongruously be made between a personal (ὑποστατικόν) or personal axiom, and a natural (Φυσικόν) one. Although the Son of God possesses the same majesty with the heavenly Father, if you look at the same divine nature; yet by reason of person God the Father seems to be prior, more worthy, and more eminent. Which personal eminence of the Father some doctors of the primitive church asserted, according to DIONYS. PETAV. L. II. de trinitat. cap. II. §. XI. Response. Excellence (Ἐξοχή) and majesty of God is a divine essential attribute, not a personal one. Hence where a diversity of excellence (ἐξοχής), worth (ἀξιόματος), and dignity is asserted; there a diversity of essence is believed. And where there is a prerogative, there is inequality. But the Son (the same is to be felt of the Holy Spirit) is consubstantial (ὁμοούσιος) with the Father, John X, 30. equal, John V, 18. having all things that the Father has, John XVI, 15. We do not imitate the imprecise language (Ἀκυρολογίαν) of the Fathers.

The arguments of the latter class, by which they directly attack the supreme divinity of the Son of God, are the following:

1. Whoever is distinguished from the supreme God, is not the supreme God. But Christ, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from John I, 2. Where the hypostatic Word, which is Christ, is said to have been with God. Response. Christ is distinguished from God the Father by reason of person, and office, not by reason of the divine essence.

Objection I: It is necessary that the substance of the Father be one, and that of the Son another. Response. It is sufficient that there are two persons.

Objection II: The Son is later in time than the Father, and therefore of a different essence from him. Response. The Son in human things, not in divine, is later than the Father in time. For in human things the Son was born in time, and has a different nature in number than the Father. But the Son of God was begotten from eternity, and has the same essence in number with the Father.

II. The supreme God can do all things from himself. The Son of God cannot, etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because the supreme God as he is from himself; so from himself he has the freest power and ability to act. The minor is proved from John V, 19. "The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do." Response. 1) That phrase; "to do from himself," can be taken in a twofold sense, one, that it simply imports a negation, of all origin whatsoever, so that the sense is: That supreme God can do all things from himself, so that he acknowledges no origin at all, whence he has the power and knowledge of working. In the other, that to do from himself imports a negation of dependence in working on another higher cause, and the sense is: That supreme God can do all things from himself, that is, independently of another higher cause. In the former sense the major proposition is not universally true, but proceeds only of the Father. In the latter sense the minor is denied. When therefore Christ says: "The Son can do nothing from himself, but what he seeth the Father do?" then his words are to be taken in the former sense, not in the latter, and their meaning is: The Son, as he is from the Father by eternal generation, and has received from the Father the same power and knowledge of working which the Father has; so he can do nothing from himself, and separately, from the Father, but whatever he does, he does simultaneously with the Father. 2) Nor from the words of Christ: "but what he seeth the Father do," is his supreme divinity rightly attacked. For the Son cannot do anything, unless he sees the Father doing, as a disciple, but as the Son. If however as the Son, he certainly has that concurrence of operation not by information, but by eternal generation. Since therefore the divine essence and knowledge are identified; it follows, that he who receives the essence from the Father by generation, also receives knowledge from the same. Therefore the Son can do nothing from himself on account of the unity of both power and knowledge with the Father; which unity is an argument for divine consubstantiality (ὁμοουσίας).

III. Whoever is sent by God, is not the supreme God. But the Son of God, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the superior sends the inferior. The minor is proved from John III, 17. Response. The Son of God was sent by the Father not by command, but with consent. But a mission which is made with consent does not infer the right of a superior. For a friend can send a friend of the same dignity.

IV. Whoever has not come of himself, is not the supreme God. Christ has not come of himself. Therefore. The major is evident; because the advent of him who has not come of himself, depends on another. The minor is proved from John VII, 28. c. VIII, 42. Response. In the cited places Christ the God-man (θεάνθρωπος) speaks of his advent to the prophetic office, to which he came not of himself, arrogating the office of a prophet to himself against the will of the Father, or thrusting himself into the office, but was sent by the Father with that mission which is made with consent.

Objection I: The supreme God does nothing by another's will. Response. Nor does the Son of God do anything by another's will; for the will of the Father is the will of the Son.

Objection II: Christ denies that he came to do his own will, John V, 30. Response. The words of Christ are to be understood not in an opposite sense, but in a composite sense, the exclusive particle, "only," being understood. Christ came, not to do only his own, but to do his own and the Father's will, since the will of both is the same.

Objection III: Christ subjected his will to the Father. Matthew XXVI, 39. Response. Christ subjected to the Father his human will, which indeed is not contrary to the divine will, but is yet distinct from it.

V. If Christ were the supreme God, he could seek his own glory. But he did not seek his own glory. Therefore. The consequence of the major is clear; because the highest honor, the highest glory, belongs to God. The minor is proved from John VIII, 50. Response. 1) Christ in that place speaks not from his own, but from his adversaries' sense. For the Jews were calumniating that he sought glory out of a certain arrogance. But Christ denies that, stimulated by vain ambition, he seeks glory. 2) The words of Christ can also be taken in a composite sense, or a conjunctive one, with the exclusive particle, "alone," being understood, as if to say: I do not seek my glory alone, but my Father also seeks it, since the glory of both is one and common.

VI. The supreme God is good par excellence (κατ' ἐξοχήν). Christ is not, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from the words of Christ, Matthew XIX, 17. "Why do you call me good? there is none good but one, that is, God." Response. The words of Christ contain a response according to the man (κατ' ἄνθρωπον), by which Christ responds according to the mind of the questioning young man, who had called Christ good in no other sense than he would have called any other teacher. Christ, intending to correct this, responds: "Why do you call me good, whom you believe to be neither God, nor sent from God? No one is good by essence, except the one God; nor does he deserve to be called a teacher, who is not sent from God. Wherefore either cease to call me good, or believe that I am the God-man (θεάνθρωπον), the true God, and the true teacher sent from God."

VII. Christ is not the first author of his doctrine. Therefore he is not the supreme God. The antecedent is established from John VII, 16. "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me." Response. The sense of Christ's words is: My doctrine is not only mine, but also the Father's; whom the Jews were separating from the Son, and were considering Christ to be a mere man, who ought to have learned letters like others. In response to these, he shows that his doctrine is plainly divine, not drawn from the information of teachers.

VIII. The supreme God is the ultimate scope of faith, and its principal object. But Christ is not, etc. Therefore. The minor is proved from the words of Christ, John XII, 44. "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me." Response. The sense is: He that believeth on me, believeth not only on me, but also on him that sent me.

IX. The Father is greater than Christ, John XIV, 28. Therefore Christ is not the greatest God. Response. The Father is greater than Christ the man in his humiliation, or considered in the state of humiliation. But Christ, as God, is equal to the Father, John V, 18. and consubstantial (ὁμοούσιος), John X, 30.

X. God the Father is called the God and head of Christ, John XX, 17. 1 Cor. XI, 3. Therefore Christ is not the supreme God. Response. In the cited places, it is speaking of Christ, as man.

XI. Christ is of God, 1 Cor. III, 23. Therefore he is less than God. Response. Christ is said to be of God, either as man; or if he is said to be of God absolutely and simply, it will have to be accepted by reason of generation, mission, and destination to the office; which also agree with Christ, as the second person, on account of his origin from the Father. In whichever way he is said to be of God, nothing will thereby be detracted from his eternal deity.

XII. He in whose power and will all things are not, is not the supreme God. In the power of Christ all things are not. Therefore. The minor is proved from Matthew XX, 23. "To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father." Response. In the cited words Christ does not deny to himself the power of giving a prerogative in the kingdom of grace, or of glory, but only limits the object. For the genuine sense is: To sit on the right and on the left is not mine to give (to others), except to those for whom it has been prepared. But thus neither does the Father grant any prerogative in his kingdom to others than those to whom he has decreed to give it from eternity.

Objection: But Christ says that he will give according to his Father's will. Response. The will of the Father and of Christ is one. For as the Father raises up the dead, and gives them life; so also the Son gives life to whom he will. John V, 21.

XIII. All things were given to Christ by the Father. Therefore he is not the supreme God, to whom nothing can be given. The antecedent is proved from John III, 35. c. V, 22. Response. By a giving inwardly (κατ' ἔσω), or by eternal generation, the divinity of Christ is not diminished; But a giving outwardly (κατ' ἔξω), or temporal, belongs to Christ according to his humanity.

XIV. Christ received commandments from the Father, John X, 18. c. XII, 49. and obeyed God, Rom. V, 19. Phil. II, 8. Therefore he is not the supreme God. Response. Christ not as God, but as man, having assumed the form of a servant, received commandments from the Father, and obeyed him.

XV. If Christ were the supreme God, he would surely have glorified himself to become a high priest. But he did not glorify himself, Hebr. V, 5. Therefore. Response. This is not a valid consequence from a qualified statement to an absolute statement. In the cited place it is not simply denied that Christ glorified himself, but it is only denied that Christ glorified himself in that way that self-appointed priests (αὐτόκλητοι) glorify themselves, who, not being sent by God, thrust themselves into offices, and take the honor of the office to themselves by their own audacity: whereas Christ was certainly called and glorified by the Father to become a high priest, although the glorification of himself, which was from his Father, was also from himself, as God.

XVI. The supreme God does not hand over the kingdom to another, by laying it down and abdicating his right to rule. Christ will hand over the kingdom to the Father, by laying it down and abdicating his right. Therefore Christ is not the supreme God. The minor is clear from 1 Cor. XV, 24. Response. That the supreme God, as such, hands over his kingdom to no one, is true. But the God-man (θεάνθρωπος), or the supreme God, manifested in the flesh, will hand over the kingdom to the Father, by ceasing from a certain form of government administered by the Word and sacraments, not by laying down his royal power; since it is established from the scriptures that the kingdom of Christ is eternal, Dan. VII, 14. Luke 1, 33.

Question XXXV. From whence is the true and distinct personality of the Son of God known?

That the Son of God is a true person, and one distinct from God the Father and the Holy Spirit, is established from his denomination and personal property (a), from his personal act ad intra, and its manifestative sign (b), and from the action ad extra, appropriated to the Son of God (c).

Proof a. Christ is called the proper Son of God, Rom. VIII, 32. and therefore on account of a properly so-called filiation, founded in passive generation, which is manifested by the passive mission for the work of redemption. Now it is evident that a Son begotten from the substance of the Father, and sent by him for a certain office, is a true and distinct person from the Father.

Proof b. Just as the Son of God is personally distinguished from the Father by passive generation, so by active spiration he is distinguished from the Holy Spirit; which personal distinction becomes clearer from the mission of the Holy Spirit. Surely the spirator and the spirated, the sender and the sent, differ as distinct persons.

Proof c. The redemption of the human race is appropriated to the Son of God; which although it is common to the whole Holy Trinity by reason of its principle, ordination, and application; yet terminatively, by reason of merit and acquisition, it is proper to the Son of God; where something singular occurs. For the Son of God not only appropriated this work ad extra externally to himself, but also internally, assumed human nature into the unity of his person, and communicated his own subsistence to it, so that in and with human nature he might accomplish the work of redemption; which cannot be said of the other persons of the Godhead. For neither the Father, nor the Holy Spirit communicated their subsistence to the human nature of Christ; nor do they have their own flesh and blood in such a way, that through it they could have perfected the redemption of the human race.

Question XXXVI. What is the hypostatic character of the Son of God?

The hypostatic character, or personal property of the Son of God, is filiation, founded in eternal generation, viewed passively, or terminatively, which is also called eternal nativity.

Proof. Divine, and that proper, filiation belongs to the eternal Son of God, by which he is not only distinguished from God the Father and the Holy Spirit, but is also constituted in the being of the Son.

Observation. Since the proximate foundation of divine filiation is eternal nativity, this is called by some theologians the hypostatic character of the Son of God, especially because filiation, and the eternal nativity of God, do not differ in point of fact.

Question XXXVII. What is the passive generation of the Son of God?

Passive generation, or eternal nativity is that by which the Son of God is produced by the eternal Father, as his substantial image, by the communication of one and the same essence, truly and properly, yet in a hyperphysical and inscrutable manner.

Observation. The active generation of the Father, and the passive of the Son of God, are not two generations, but one generation, which by reason of its principle is called active; by reason of its term, passive grammatically, because the Son of God is said not to generate, but to be generated; but it is not passive really and physically, as if a real passion should fall upon the Son of God; his supreme perfection, simplicity, and immutability do not admit this.

Question XXXVIII. What is the nature of the generation of the Son of God?

The generation of the Son of God is not improper, metaphorical or accidental, but proper, true, and substantial (a); it is not physical, but hyperphysical (b); not temporal, but eternal (c); not external, but intimate (d); not voluntary, but natural and necessary (e).

Proof a. That the generation of the Son of God is not metaphorical, or accidental (such as the regeneration of sinful men), but proper and substantial, we learn from Ps. II, 7. where God the Father addresses his Son with the sweetest words: "You are my Son; this day I have begotten you." From which words we form an argument. To whomever Jehovah said: "You are my Son, this day I have begotten you," he was produced by a true, proper, and substantial generation from the Father Jehovah. But to the second person of the Godhead Jehovah said, etc. Therefore. The major is proved (1) from the true reason of a Son. A Son, properly so called, is he who is brought forth from the substance of the Father, and has either the same essence in species (as in humans), or the same in number (as in the divine) with the Father. But Christ is the proper Son of God, Rom. VIII, 32. But he would not be the proper Son of God, if his generation were improper, or metaphorical; He is the only-begotten Son from the Father, John I, 14. The name of only-begotten Son in the entire canonical scripture never denotes anyone other than him who alone is born from the substance of the Father. The Socinians object that "only-begotten" is said of a most beloved son, just as Solomon is called "the only one" (יחיד), Prov. IV, 3. and as Isaac is not only called "your only son" (יחידך) Gen. XXII, 22. but also "only-begotten" (μονογενής), Hebr. XI, 17. yet he had a brother Ishmael. Response. Solomon is indeed called the only one, but not only-begotten; Isaac, however, was properly only-begotten. For although he had a brother Ishmael, he was nevertheless only-begotten with respect to that marriage which was between Abraham and Sarah. (2) From the true reason of generation. Generation formally is an action by which the generator, by producing the generated, communicates to this one his own essence, so that he becomes his image. But God the Father, by producing his Son, communicated to him his own essence, so that he might be his image. The word "I have begotten" (ילדתי), which is in Ps. II, 7. whenever in the sacred scriptures it is used of a person, producing a person, absolutely and without a diminishing addition, designates a substantial production. (b) Christ himself says: "As the Father has life in himself; so has he given to the Son to have life in himself." God the Father through eternal generation gave the Son his life; Therefore also his essence; since the latter does not really differ from the former. (c) The Son of God is the image of the invisible God, Col. I, 15. Every image implies both an origin and expression from the exemplar, and a correspondence with the same, so that it represents it. The Son of God is therefore the substantial image of the Father; because he has his origin from God the Father through eternal generation, and corresponds with the same by reason of a most singular essence, being personally distinct from him. The apostle teaches the same more fully, when the Son of God in Hebr. 1, 3. is called by him "the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person" (ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ), (of God the Father). "Brightness" (Ἀπαύγασμα) properly signifies an effulgence, a radiance, or a resplendence issued from a light, and in the N.T. it is used only in this place. The author of the book of Wisdom, c. VII, 26. calls wisdom "the brightness of the everlasting light" (ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς αἰδίου). The glory of the Father, however, is the most glorious and adorable essence of God the Father. The apostle therefore implies by this phrase that the Son of God is begotten by the most glorious Father not freely, or by will and counsel, but naturally, necessarily, continuously, from eternity, without any change of the begetter or the begotten, and that he coexists inseparably with the Father; just as the light of the sun naturally, necessarily, continuously, and coeval with the sun, and inseparable from it, emanates from the sun without any change; and yet that the Son is distinct from the Father, as a ray is distinct from the sun. To which the Fathers of the council of Nicaea had respect, when they called the Son of God "light from light." Besides, as every Son is the image of his Father; So the Son of God is the express image of the hypostasis, taken concretely, namely of the person of the Father, or of the divine essence, determined by the subsistence of the Father. Now "express image" (χαρακτὴρ) denotes an image not shadowy, fleeting or evanescent, but express, constant and perfect. Wherefore by this word the apostle asserts that the Son of God is the express, most perfect and eternal image of God, by which the Father is represented to the life, so that he who has seen the Son has seen the Father, John XIV, 9. The minor of this argument is clear; because the whole of Ps. II contains a most manifest prophecy concerning the kingdom of Christ, expounded and applied by the apostles, Peter, Acts. IV, 25. Paul, Acts. XIII, 33. Hebr. 1, 5. c. V, 5. John, Rev. II, 27. c. XIX, 15.

Proof b. That the generation of the Son of God is not physical, or common, but hyperphysical and most eminent, is established from the fact that this generation confers on the Son of God a majesty, far superior to angelic eminence, as the apostle teaches, Hebr. I, 5: "For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee?" A majesty, superior to angelic eminence, is truly divine. The generation of the Son of God is therefore truly divine, to be cut off from all the imperfections adhering to physical generation, such as are: the dependence of the generated on the generator, the priority and posteriority of duration, change and transition from not being to being, the multiplication of numerical essence, propagation by traducianism, etc.

Proof c. The eternity of the generation of the Son of God is proved (1) from Ps. II. 6. 7. in which the generative act, according to our way of conceiving, is described as prior to the divine decree concerning the inauguration of this king Messiah. But the divine decree is certainly eternal. Therefore the act of generation, conceptually prior to that decree, is eternal. Then that act of generation produces an infinite, omnipotent, omnipresent and adorable person, v. 9. seqq. But such an act is not temporal, but eternal. Finally, that act of generation is described by the "today," which, used of an internal divine act, such as generation, can only be a divine "today," and therefore excludes the flux of time, is separated from the past and the future, and denotes a perpetual now, or the day of immutable eternity. For a day that neither begins with yesterday's end, nor is terminated by the beginning of tomorrow, is always today, i.e., it is eternity itself, in the judgment of AUGUSTINE tom. III. in enchirid. ad Laurent. cap. 49.

The adversaries object: (1) that the "today" intimates a certain day, which is plainly contrary to eternity; (2) that God the Father addresses the Son in the past: "I have begotten you," to indicate that that generation has already passed. Response. To I. the "today" does not always in the sacred scriptures designate a determinate day, but a continuous time, as Psalm XCV, 7, "Today if you will hear the Lord's voice" i.e. always, as long as it is called today, Hebr. III, 13.; or a long course of time, as Gen. XXII, 14. "Whence it is said today, in the mount of Jehovah it shall be seen." Nay, and the day itself denotes eternity, Is. XLIII, 13. "Yea, before the day was I am he," i.e., from eternity; because one day is with the Lord as a thousand years. 2. Peter. III, 8. & 18. To II. The generation of the Son of God is expressed in the past, not as if it had passed, or ceased, but because the Son of God was most certainly no less than most perfectly begotten before the ages. GREGORY NAZIANZEN says excellently in orat. III. de theol. "Neither does God the Father so generate, that he has not yet perfectly generated; nor did he so generate the Son, that he has ceased to generate. For those things have place only in those things which are subject to the changes of times; in God there is a true nativity, but a perfect one; for the Son is always born, but perfect." (II) From Prov. VIII, 22-24. "Jehovah possessed me, the beginning of his way; before his works, from that which is from eternity I was anointed (poured out) from the beginning, from the ancient times of the earth. When there were no depths, I was brought forth." This passage is to be expounded not of the essential wisdom of God, or a divine attribute, but of the hypostatic or personal wisdom of God, namely the Son of God, as D. CALOV proluxly shows in bibl. illustrat. in h. l. fol. 1147. seqq.

We, studying brevity, observe (1) that the Son of God is also called the wisdom of God in the N. T. "We preach Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God," 1 Cor. 1, 24, Cf. Matthew. XI, 19. Luke. VII, 35. (2) That wisdom in Solomon testifies of itself: "I was brought forth" (הוּלַלְתִּי), a word for conception and generation (הוּרַר), is clear from Ps. LI, 7. Job. XV, 7. Is. LI, 2.) by which word the hypostatic character of the Son of God is expressed: "I was brought forth," it says, "from the beginning, from the ancient times of the earth, when there were not yet depths"; by which words his pre-existence before the ages and eternal is insinuated; which is more clearly indicated, when the hypostatic wisdom says of itself: "Jehovah possessed me (by generation, cf. Gen. IV, 1) the beginning of his way; before his works from that which is"; where we understand the beginning not as material, but as effective and architectonic. With these things established we argue: The wisdom which was begotten and possessed by God before all his works, from that which he is, its generation is eternal. But the Son of God is that wisdom, etc. Therefore. (III.) From Micah V, 2. "Whose goings forth have been from of old, from the days of eternity." The prophet speaks of the ruler of Israel, or of Christ, cf. Matthew III, 7. John VII, 42. The goings forth, however, are designated not merely manifestatively, inasmuch as the Son of God went forth to the holy Fathers Adam, Noah etc., and revealed himself to them in familiar speech; but generatively; in which way that word is sometimes taken, Gen. XVII, 6. c. XXV, 26. Jud. VIII, 30. The goings forth are said in the plural, not because a twofold nativity, eternal and temporal, is insinuated; for both the determination of eternity, and the absurdness of idle repetition stand in the way; since the temporal going forth was treated in the former member; but to note the eminence of the eternal nativity; for it is solemn for the Hebrews to enunciate sublime things in the plural, and a constant emanation; just as we call the emanation of a fount springs, because water continually springs forth. From these we gather: He whose generative goings forth are from of old, from the days of eternity, was begotten from eternity. But the ruler of Israel, etc. Therefore.

Proof d. That the generation of the Son of God is not external, or transient, but intimate and immanent, is clear; because God the Father did not produce his Son externally, but begot him within his own essence; nor is the Son separated from the Father, as happens elsewhere, but remains in the bosom of the Father, John 1, 18.; nor is the Son only in the Father, but the Father is also in the Son, through an intimate communion, and mutual interpenetration (περιχώρησιν). "Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" John XIV, 10. This immanent generation is illustrated from the fact that the Son of God is called wisdom, Prov. IIX, 24. and the Word (ὁ λόγος), which was in the beginning with God, John I, 2. For as the internal word and wisdom flow from the mind as from a principle, and remain in the mind, as a certain offspring and daughter of the mind; so the Son of God is begotten by the Father, and remains in the Father.

Proof e. For if the generation of the Son of God were elicited by an act of will and free, but not necessary or natural, the Son would not be equal to the Father and consubstantial (ὁμοούσιος); for the latter exists necessarily, and cannot not be. DAMASC. L. I. O. F. c. 8 concisely says: "generation is a work of nature, creation a work of will" (γέννησις ἐστὶν ἔργον φύσεως, κτίσις ἔργον θελήσεως). It is to be well observed here that God the Father, not coerced, yet not by the counsel of a free will preceding the generation, but by the necessity of nature, utterly removed from all coercion, begot the Son by a most perfect generation.

The antithesis is of the Socinians (1) denying the eternal generation of the Son of God; (2) seeking other foundations of divine filiation. The arguments by which they attack the eternal and substantial generation of the Son of God are the following:

I. God the Father begot the Son either as existing, or as not existing. If the Son always existed, he could not be begotten; because generation proceeds from not being, to being. If, however, he did not exist, the Son of God is not eternal. Response. God the Father begets the Son as always existing, always emanating from the Father, just as a ray always flows from the sun. Physical and temporal generation proceeds from not being to being, since it belongs to natural bodies subject to change, but not hyperphysical and eternal generation, for it is of a necessary being, superior to all change. (*).

Objection: To be from eternity, and to be begotten from eternity, are contradictory, which cannot stand together. Response. They are not contradictory. For a contradiction revolves between the same terms. But here a notable distinction of terms appears. For to be from eternity notes the essence itself; to be begotten from eternity, notes the mode of having the essence from eternity. Hence the contradiction expires. (**).

II. Whatever is eternal, in it prior and posterior have no place. In all generation prior and posterior have place. Therefore no generation is eternal. The major is established, because eternity is a perpetual now, excluding all succession of prior and posterior. The minor is proved; because every generated is posterior to the generator. Response. Every physically generated is posterior to the generator; I concede. But the Son of God was supernaturally begotten.

Objection: A supernatural generation seems to be improper, because it destroys the formal reason of a true generation. Response. The formal reason of generation consists in the communication of the same essence; which a supernatural generation does not destroy. It is called hyperphysical, because it is most eminent, far transcending all the imperfections of physical generation.

III. The Son of God is either always being begotten, or at some point ceases to be begotten. If he is always being begotten, he never attains perfection; because what is still being generated, has not yet reached the term of generation. If, however, he ceases to be begotten, there will be some change in God from being, to not being. Response. He is always being begotten, but without time. From which no imperfection arises. Those things which are still being begotten in time, have not yet obtained the term of perfection. But eternal generation is not to be estimated from temporal generation. God the Father always generates perfectly, the Son of God is always generated perfect.

(*) The principle of the error is this; that the adversaries place the temporal origin of a thing, which then at last exists when it is generated, in the nature of generation, when however it is placed in the nature of a finite thing, both of the begetter and of the begotten, insofar as each is finite; for in that which is finite, and therefore in each of its actions and effects, there cannot but be a beginning at some time. Therefore, from the generation of finite things to the generation of an infinite being is not a valid consequence.

(**) Indeed, this would be an open repugnance, if something infinite were to generate something finite. For since all generation, properly so called, is a communication of the same nature; it is necessary that the nature of him who is begotten from the infinite and eternal, be equally infinite and eternal.

IV. Whoever is by nature and necessarily most simple, cannot generate another like himself. But God, etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because God is most perfect; but the most perfect can be but one. Response. A distinction is made between immanent generation, or inwardly (κατ' ἑσώ), and transient, or outwardly (κατ' ἑξώ). In transient generation indeed the essence of the begetter is always one, and that of the begotten another. But it is far otherwise with immanent generation, in which multiplication of essence has no place; because divine immanent generation is the communication of the same singular essence.

Objection 1. That immanent generation is either made without essence, or with essence. If without essence; it will not be a communication of essence. If with essence; the essence of the begetter will be one, and that of the begotten another. Response. It is not made without essence, nor yet with multiplication of essence; because it is the communication of the same essence in number.

Objection II. If it is a communication of the same singular essence, the same will generate itself. Response. I deny the consequence. Because the essence is indeed one, but the persons of the generator and the generated are distinct.

Objection III. God the Father generates either the essence of the Son, or his person. If he generates the essence of the Son, the essence of the Father will be one, and that of the Son another. If he generates only the person, the person will be able to be without essence, which is absurd. Response. Generation is of the person, as to its term, because actions are of supposits. Meanwhile, since generation formally is nothing other than the communication of the same essence; God the Father is rightly said to generate from his own essence; nor yet is a different essence of the begetter and the begotten necessarily inferred.

V. If Christ was begotten from the essence of the Father, he was begotten either from a part of it, or from the whole essence. Not from a part of it; because it is indivisible. Nor from the whole essence; because otherwise the Father would cease to be the Father. Response. This argument is so invalid, that it is not always valid even in natural things. For the whole soul of the son is propagated from the whole soul of the father, and the latter remains whole. A lamp is lit from a lamp, without the diminution of the latter.

VI. God the Father generates either necessarily, or freely. Not necessarily; because God can be compelled by no one. Nor freely; because thus the Son of God could not be. Therefore God the Father does not generate the Son at all. Response. A fallacy of equivocation is committed. For the necessity of coercion is one thing, the necessity of immutability and of nature is another. God the Father freely begot the Son, if you respect freedom from coercion; yet he begot necessarily, if you look at the necessity of immutability and of nature.

VII. If Christ was begotten from the essence of the Father, he will be begotten from his own essence and consequently from himself, because he is of the same essence in number with the Father. But no one can be begotten from himself. Therefore the Son of God was not begotten from the essence of the Father. Response. The Son of God is said to be begotten from the essence of the Father, because God the Father communicated his essence to the Son. But from this it is wrongly inferred; Therefore the Son of God was begotten from himself. For although the divine essence is one and common to the whole Trinity, if it is considered absolutely; yet the foundation of generation is not the divine essence absolutely, but considered relatively, insofar as it is marked by the hypostatic character of the Father.

VIII. If God the Father by generating the Son communicated to him the same essence in number, the latter cannot be called the image of God the Father. But the Son is called the image of God the Father. Therefore God the Father, by generating the Son, did not communicate to him the same essence in number. The consequence of the major is manifest; because no image is of the same essence in number with him of whom it is the image. Response. In the order of creatures no image is of the same essence in number with him of whom it is the image. But on account of the infinity of the divine essence it happens that one divine person is the image of another; and yet of the same essence with it.

Objection: Thus the same will be the image of itself. Response. I deny the consequence. Because the Son of God is personally distinguished from the Father.

The arguments by which the adversaries strive to establish other foundations of divine filiation are the following.

I. They state that Christ is called the Son of God on account of his miraculous conception by the Holy Spirit, about which the angel says in Luke I, 35. "The Holy Spirit shall come upon you, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow you; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of you shall be called the Son of God." Response. The angel does not assert that Christ is called the Son of God on account of his singular conception from the Holy Spirit, but on account of the overshadowing of the power of the highest, which is Christ, 1 Cor. I, 24. Therefore the sense is; because the Son of God will fill the womb of Mary with a singular presence and in an inscrutable manner, and will unite to himself in it the flesh formed by the Holy Spirit, therefore also that which will be born of Mary, will be called the Son of God.

Objection: Thus there will be two Sons of God, one on account of eternal generation from the Father, the other on account of the incarnation of the Word (τοῦ λόγου). Response. Because the hypostasis of the Son of God is one in number, therefore also the Son of God is one, and although the reasons for the filiation are distinct, yet they do not constitute two Sons of God; because they do not make two persons.

II. They opine that Christ is the Son of God on account of his sanctification and mission into the world; because the Savior himself gives this reason for his filiation in John X, 34-36. "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? (Ps. LXXXII, 6.) If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken; Say ye of him, whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God!" Response. By sanctification in that place is understood the essential communication of divine sanctity through eternal generation. For just as they, to whom the word of God came, are gods and sons of God not by the communication of the divine nature, but by the conferral of a dignity outside of God, and of the essence of God, and therefore adopted sons of God and nominal gods; so he, whom the Father sanctified, is God and the Son of God by the communication of the divine essence, so that he was sufficient through the communicated divine sanctity, who was to be sent into the world to redeem and sanctify men. Christ makes mention of this sanctification, or of the sanctity communicated through eternal generation, because he wished to indicate the principle of our sanctity. Cf. D. SCHMID. in coll. bibl. post. p. 55.

III. They hold that Christ is the Son of God on account of his resuscitation to immortal life. For Paul says in Rom. I, 2-4. "Which gospel he had promised afore... concerning his Son, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; And declared to be the Son of God with power (omnipotent), according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." Response. Christ is said by the apostle to be "demonstrated" (ὁρισθεὶς), demonstrated or declared the omnipotent Son of God, because he resuscitated himself from the dead by the Spirit of sanctification, that is, by his divine nature; which resuscitation is an argument a posteriori effectively demonstrating the divine filiation of Jesus Christ. They add the saying of Paul in Acts XIII, 32. 33. "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." R. The apostle here is not speaking of the resuscitation of Christ from the dead, but of the raising up of the Messiah from the seed of David, whose most eminent person he is about to describe, adducing the words of Ps. II. to show that the Messiah is not a mere man, but the only-begotten and eternal Son of God. The apostle deals with the resuscitation from the dead in v. 35.

Objection: But why is Christ called the firstborn from the dead, Col. I, 18. Rev. I, 5. unless because he is the Son of God on account of the resurrection? Response. Christ is called the firstborn from the dead, because his resurrection was the cause and consecrator of our resurrection, (which is a certain kind of regeneration (παλιγγενεσία)).

IV. They maintain that Christ is the Son of God on account of his exaltation to dominion and the supreme priesthood. They rely on the apostolic saying in Hebr. V, 5. "So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee." R. In the words of the apostle, not the cause of divine filiation, but the legitimate and divine calling of Christ to the priesthood is expressed. Christ was not of the family of Aaron, nor even of the tribe of Levi, which alone was sacerdotal, but of the royal family of Judah. A scruple could therefore be injected into the minds of the Hebrews about the authority of Christ's priesthood. Lest a place be left for this, the apostle says: "Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest, but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee." as if to say, No one is more worthy of the sacerdotal office than Christ; because he is the only-begotten Son from the Father; from whom as he received his essence by eternal generation, so he received the priesthood by a calling. Certainly the firstborn Son by right of nativity is the priest in the house of his Father. Wherefore the authority of Christ's priesthood is the greatest, inasmuch as its author is the eternal Father of Jesus Christ. (*).

Question XXXIX. What is the consequence of eternal nativity?

The passive mission of the Son of God in the flesh.

Observation. We will give the proof and explanation of this passive mission of the Son of God below p. 656.

Question XL. What is the personal act of the Son of God?

The personal act of the Son of God is the spiration of the Holy Spirit, by which the Son of God together with the Father produces the third person of the Godhead, the common breath of both, by the communication of the same essence in number, in an ineffable manner.

Observation. This act of the Word (τοῦ λόγου) is at the same time his personal notion; for it notifies the second person of the divinity, distinguishes the same from the third person, and implies a relation to this one; but it is not the personal property of the Son of God, because it is common to the Father and the Son, nor does it constitute him in the being of the Son.

Question XLI. What is the consequence of active spiration?

The active mission of the Holy Spirit, by which the Son of God together with God the Father sends the Holy Spirit for the work of sanctification.

Proof from John XV, 26. "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father." Christians must contend with no small, but great misery, to which Christ opposes the greater solace of the Holy Spirit, whom he calls the comforter (paracletum). Christ will send him by a mission not by command, but by most free consent. He will send the same from the Father, not only with the Father consenting and sending simultaneously, but also communicating the faculty of sending the Holy Spirit to the Son through eternal generation.

Question XLII. What external action is appropriated to the Son of God?

The redemption of the human race. Proof from Gal. IV, 4. "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Where observe: a) Our Redeemer is the Son of God and the Son of man, and therefore the God-man (θεάνθρωπον). b) sent by the Father, which mission is a certain consequence of substantial generation, not implying inequality, not local, not separative, but manifestative and most free. c) The redeemed are men, who were under the law; by whom are understood not only the Jews, who lived under the ceremonial law, but all men, who have been, are, or will be, all debtors of the law. d) The redemption of Christ is called a buying out (ἐξαγορισμός); by which word is noted a redemption not metaphorical, but true, satisfactory, and meritorious, which is made by a price paid. e) The final cause of redemption is twofold, namely 1) liberation from the law, insofar as it curses, compels, and presses with the burden of ceremonies. The redeemer liberated us from the law, while submitting himself to the law, of which he was the Lord. 2) Adoption as sons of God, with all the right and privilege that accompanies adoption.

(*) Nor with less confidence do they appeal to this saying, Hebr. I, 3. & 5. But the response is easy. In v. 3. various propositions are contained, of which the first is this: "who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person" (ὃς ὢν ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ); the second, "upholding all things etc." (φέρων τὰ πάντα κ.τ.λ.); the third, "when he had by himself purged etc." (δι' ἑαυτοῦ καθαρισμὸν κ.τ.λ.); the fourth finally, "sat down on the right hand etc." (ἐκάθισεν ἐν δεξιᾷ κ.τ.λ.). Each one of these is confirmed by the sayings of the divine Prophets. To the first pertains v. 5 & 6. To the second, v. 10. 11. 12. To the third, v. 8. & 9. To the fourth, v. 13. Therefore this saying, "thou art my son", ought to be referred not to the last assertion, but to the first.

CONCERNING THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Question XLIII. Who is the Holy Spirit?

Description of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is the third person of the Godhead, not begotten, but from eternity proceeding from the Father and the Son.

He is more fully defined: The Holy Spirit is the third person of the Godhead, of the same essence with the Father and the Son, who from eternity proceeds from the Father and the Son, and is sent by both in time to sanctify the hearts of men to be saved.

Question XLIV. Why is He called Spirit?

He is called Spirit not so much from spirituality, as from spirating.

Proof. The spiritual essence is common to all three persons of the Godhead; but passive spiration is proper to the Holy Spirit. He is therefore called Spirit, because he is spirated by the Father and the Son in an ineffable manner from eternity, as an omnipotent breath. Job. XXXIII, 4.

Question XLV. Why is He denominated Holy?

The third person of the Godhead is called Holy not only on account of the holiness of his essence, but also on account of the work of sanctification, which is appropriated to him.

Proof. The Holy Spirit has the most holy divine essence in common with God the Father and the Son; but the sacred scripture and the apostles' creed appropriate the work of sanctification to the Holy Spirit. "I am the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit," says Paul in Rom. XV, 16.

Question XLVI. How do you prove the Holy Spirit to be a true, and distinct person from the Father and the Son?

The true personality of the Holy Spirit is proved from the definition of a person (a) and from the acts proper to a true person (b). That the Holy Spirit, however, is a distinct person from the Father and the Son, is known from the order of the divine persons (c), from the hypostatic character, and its manifestative sign (d), from the action ad extra appropriated to the Holy Spirit (e), and from the Jordanian theophany (θεοφανεία) (f).

Proof a. A person is defined as an intelligent suppositum, or substance, endowed with free will. The Holy Spirit subsists by Himself, because He is the Paraclete, John 14:16, who cannot even be conceived of by the mind without ultimate subsistence. He is intelligent; indeed, He is called the spirit of understanding, Isaiah 11:2, who searches the deep things of God, 1 Corinthians 2:10. He is endowed with free will, since He distributes gifts to each one as He wills, 1 Corinthians 12:11. Therefore, He is a true person.

Proof b. Actions proper to persons are predicated of the Holy Spirit. For the Holy Spirit speaks through the mouth of holy men, 2 Peter 1:21; Matthew 10:20. He convicts, teaches, announces, John 16:8-13. He consoles and testifies, John 14:26. He appoints bishops over the church, Acts 20:28. He commands that ministers be set apart for Him, Acts 13:2. These actions can only befit a true person.

Proof c. The Holy Spirit is joined with God the Father in the business of salvation and is enumerated as the third person. For we are baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, Matthew 28:19. Cf. 1 John 5:7, where He is called the third heavenly witness. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is both a true person and distinct from the Father and the Son.

Proof d. The Holy Spirit is breathed, or proceeds, from the Father and the Son, John 15:26, and is sent, John 14:26. But the one who breathes and the one who is breathed, the one who sends and the one who is sent, are distinct persons.

Proof e. The work of sanctification is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, to which also belongs the consolation of the afflicted. But the Holy Spirit is the Paraclete, or comforter, distinct from Christ. "I will ask the Father, that He may give you another Paraclete," John 14:16.

Proof f. When Christ was baptized in the Jordan, the Father appeared by a voice, the Son in the body, the Spirit in a dove, Matthew 3:16. To assume a visible and bodily form for a time, to descend in it from heaven, to appear in the form of a dove, to come upon Christ and remain, as they argue for a person, so they can in no way be applied to an accident, quality, or state. Moreover, since the Holy Spirit, having assumed a distinct symbol of manifestation, performed distinct acts, we rightly conclude that He is a distinct person from the Father and the Son.

The antithesis is that of the Socinians, who maintain that the Holy Spirit is not a person, but a power of God sanctifying us, and that it is ἀνυπόστατον (without its own subsistence), i.e., that it lacks its own subsistence, but exists in God in the same way that mercy, justice, and other attributes are in God. Their more significant arguments are:

I. The power of God is not a person, because it is an essential attribute of God. The Holy Spirit is the power of God, Luke 24:49. Therefore. Resp. 1) The Holy Spirit is nowhere in the sacred writings called power. In the cited passage, the efficacy, or effective operation of the Holy Spirit, is understood. 2) Distinguish between a power that is ἀνυπόστατον (without its own subsistence), lacking subsistence, and one that is αὐτοῦπόστατον (with its own subsistence), possessing its own subsistence, by which an active and living person is understood. Christ is the power of God, and yet a true person, 1 Corinthians 1:24. Reuben was Jacob's first strength, Genesis 49:3. (*)

II. The Holy Spirit is a gift, Luke 11:13. Therefore, He is not a person. Resp. Children are gifts, Psalm 127:3, and yet they are persons.

III. The Holy Spirit is a pledge and a seal, 2 Corinthians 1:22; Ephesians 1:13. Therefore, He is not a person. Resp. The Holy Spirit is metaphorically called a pledge and a seal, just as children are commonly called pledges.

Zerubbabel is called a signet ring, Haggai 2:23, and yet he was a person.

IV. A person is incommunicable. The Holy Spirit is not incommunicable. 2 Corinthians 12:13. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is not a person. Resp. The Holy Spirit is incommunicable with respect to His ultimate subsistence; however, He is communicable with respect to His gracious presence and saving efficacy.

V. No person is in another. The Holy Spirit is in God the Father. Therefore, He is not a person. Resp. An infant is in a pregnant mother, yet is nevertheless a true person. God the Father is in the Son, and the Son is in the Father, without prejudice to the personality of either, John 14:10.

VI. If the Holy Spirit were a person, Christ would more correctly be called the Son of the Holy Spirit than the Son of God the Father. The latter is absurd. Therefore, so is the former. The consequence of the major premise is proven because Christ is said to have been conceived not by the Father, but by the Holy Spirit. Resp. The consequence is denied. Christ was conceived by the Holy Spirit, not as a generating principle, but as an exciting and sanctifying one, whence no filiation arises.

VII. No person is extinguished. But the Holy Spirit is extinguished, 1 Thessalonians 5:19. Resp. In the cited passage, the name of the Holy Spirit is not taken ὑποστατικῶς (personally), for the person of the Holy Spirit, but ἐνεργητικῶς (effectively), metonymically and effectively for the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

Question XLVII. By what arguments is the divinity of the Holy Spirit demonstrated?

The divinity of the Holy Spirit is demonstrated by arguments that are ὀνομαστικοῖς (nominal), derived from the divine names (a), ἰδιωματικοῖς (idiomatic), (*) Indeed, there are three kinds of statements by which we fight and conquer, that the Holy Spirit is not the power of God. 1) There are utterances of this kind, in which the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the power of God, 2 Corinthians 6:6-7, and also from the internal efficacy of God in the soul of man, Ephesians 3:16, 20. 2) There are others, in which He is distinguished from His own power and efficacy, Acts 1:8; 1 Corinthians 12:11; πάντα (all) (χαρίσματα (gifts), v. 4.) are effects, the πνεῦμα (Spirit), producing these effects, is power and efficacy. What then will the πνεῦμα (Spirit) be? What is the meaning? Does divine power exercise its power, or efficacy in these effects? See also Romans 15:13 and 19. 3) There are statements in which such excellent powers are attributed to the Holy Spirit that they cannot flow into men or ever be communicated with any created thing, namely, the most profound understanding, 1 Corinthians 2:10-11, and the secret mind, which no one can perceive, except God alone, Romans 8:26-27.

drawn from the divine attributes (b), ἐνεργητικοῖς (energetic), taken from operations suitable only to God (c), λατρευτικοῖς (worshipful), taken from the worship due to the supreme God (d). To which should be added a careful comparison of the sayings of the Old and New Testaments (e).

Proof a. 1) Peter in Acts 5:3 says that the one to whom Ananias, besides the apostles, and in the first place, lied, or dared to pass off his lie as truth, was the Holy Spirit; but soon after, in v. 4, he calls him God Himself. From this we argue: He to whom Ananias, besides the apostles and in the first place, lied, is the true God. But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore. 2) Paul in 1 Corinthians 3:16 says that the faithful are the temple of God because the Spirit of God dwells in them as in temples. He therefore indicates that the Holy Spirit is God. 3) King David in 2 Samuel 23:2-3 says: "The Spirit of Jehovah has spoken in me, and His word was on my tongue." The God of Israel said, the rock of Israel spoke to me. What King David had previously called the spirit of Jehovah, he later calls the God of Israel (*).

Proof b. Divine idioms are predicated of the Holy Spirit. For He is said to be 1) eternal. Concerning whom Isaiah c. 40:13 says: "Who has directed the spirit of the Lord, when he weighed the mass of the earth?" Therefore, the Holy Spirit, when the earth was first created, already was; which Moses also confirms with his testimony, Genesis 1:2. But everything before the world is, in the style of Scripture, eternal. Psalm 90:2; Proverbs 8:24. 2) Omnipresent. "Where shall I go from your spirit?" the psalmist asks in Psalm 139:7, as if to say: Wherever I go, your immense spirit will meet me. 3) Omniscient. For "the spirit of God searches even the deep things of God," 1 Corinthians 2:10, i.e., it penetrates the secrets of God, which no creature can investigate. 4) Omnipotent. For He is called the spirit of power, Isaiah 11:2, of whom is said "power from on high," if not synonymously, yet paronymously, Luke 24:49. "You will be clothed with power from on high." Which words Christ Himself explains in Acts 1:8: "you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes upon you." 5) Ἐξοχικῶς (Preeminently) or excellently good. "Your good spirit leads me in the land of uprightness," Psalm 143:10. 6) Most true. For He is the spirit of truth, leading us into all truth, John 16:13. 7) Most glorious; because He is the spirit of glory, resting upon us. 1 Peter 4:14. 8) With the Father and the Son, ὁμοούσιος (homoousios), or coessential. "Three are the heavenly witnesses, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one," 1 John 5:7. Having premised these things, we argue: Whoever is eternal, omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, best, most true, most glorious, consubstantial with God the Father and the Son, He is the true and supreme God. But the Holy Spirit is... Therefore (**).

(*) The divine names, even those which are proper to the supreme God (p. 301) are attributed to the Holy Spirit: יהוה (Yahweh) as also עליון (Elyon). See Psalm 78:17, add Isaiah 63:10; Hebrews 3:7-10. יהוה צבאות (Yahweh Sabaoth), Isaiah 6:3 ff. coll. with Acts 28:25. אלהי ישראל (Elohei Israel), 2 Samuel 23:3. On the name, Θεός (Theos), see also Luke 2:28-29, coll. with v. 26. And when scripture is said to be θεόπνευστος (theopneustos), 2 Timothy 3:16, the Holy Spirit is signified, 2 Peter 1:21.

(**) Since immutability is undoubtedly to be numbered among the natural properties of God (p. 234), this also is in the Holy Spirit, 1 Corinthians 12:11. The word, αὐτὸ (the same), can here designate nothing other than perpetuity, devoid of all mutability; for 1) it is distinguished from that voice, ἕτερος (another), 2) it is opposed to variety, just as ἓν (one) is to multitude, v. 8 & 4. Therefore, it denotes that which is contrary to variation and change; 3) it is attributed to the Holy Spirit equally as to the Father, v. 6; 4) it is explained in Hebrews 1:12, that it signifies the opposite of mutability, and corresponds to the Hebrew הוּא (He), always the same, Psalm 102:28. But as for the divine perfections, from their own reserved properties, and indeed from all of them, with none omitted, the supreme divinity of the Holy Spirit shines forth more clearly than light (p. 301.*). For His, no less than God the Father's, are the reserved properties. I. Of divine knowledge: 1) the most perfect knowledge of God Himself, and of all the secret counsels of God, 1 Corinthians 2:10-11. 2) The nature of the universe, and also 3) of those things which far surpass all the powers of nature, the knowledge, 1 Corinthians 2:10, and therefore miracles are assigned to Him; 4) The knowledge of souls, Acts 5:3-4, and indeed also that, Acts 1:24, especially pertains to Proof c. The divinity of the Holy Spirit is confirmed by the divine works, which in the sacred writings are attributed to the Holy Spirit. Namely 1) works of power, such as creation, Genesis 1:2; Psalm 33:6; Preservation, Job 33:4; Psalm 104:30. The working of miracles, Luke 1:35; Matthew 12:28; Acts 10:38. 2) Works of grace, which pertain either to the redemption or to the sanctification of the human race. To redemption belong the mission of the redeemer as to His humanity. Isaiah 48:16. Anointing, Psalm 45:8; Isaiah 61:1; 1 John 3:34; Acts 10:38. Instruction, Isaiah 11:2. Direction, Matthew 4:1. To sanctification (taken broadly) belong the calling and preaching of the word, which is called the ministry of the Spirit, 2 Corinthians 3:6. (The Holy Spirit calls and ordains bishops to preach the divine word, Acts 20:28. He speaks through them, Matthew 10:20.) Illumination, 2 Corinthians 3:18. Regeneration, John 3:5. Justification, 1 Corinthians 6:11. Gracious indwelling, 1 Corinthians 3:16. Renewal, Titus 3:5; Galatians 5:22. Glorification, Ephesians 1:14. 3) Works of justice, namely, the conviction of the world, John 16:8. The withdrawal of the word by a just judgment, Acts 16:6. The resurrection of the dead, Romans 8:11. From these arises the argument: He who performs truly divine works is true God. But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore.

Proof d. The divinity of the Holy Spirit is established by the religious worship which is due to Him. For 1) we are baptized into the name of the Holy Spirit just as into the name of the Father and the Son. Matthew 28:19. But baptism implies the worship of faith and invocation. Which Basil teaches excellently in epistle 78: "We ought to be baptized as we have received; but believe as we are baptized; but glorify as we believe, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." 2) Our hearts are temples of the Holy Spirit. 1 Corinthians 6:19. Whoever dwells in pious hearts as in his temples, he is God to be glorified by us (1 Corinthians 6:19-20). But the Holy Spirit dwells, etc. Therefore. 3) The angels adore the Holy Spirit, Isaiah 6:3, compared with Acts 28:25-26. King David invoked Him, Psalm 143:10. Paul, 2 Corinthians 13:13. John, Revelation 1:4. (*) the Holy Spirit, as is apparent from the fact that the power of appointing ministers of the church is attributed to Him, Acts 20:28. 5) The foreknowledge of future and contingent events, both the most remote and the smallest, for His are the predictions and prophecies of things long to come, and also of definite times, 1 Peter 1:11.

II. Of divine wisdom: 1) The choice of what is always best; for which reason He is called κατ' ἐξοχήν (pre-eminently) the Spirit of wisdom and understanding; 2) Its breadth, without any exception, John 16:13; 3) Its independence; for He possesses that wisdom (a) which no one taught Him, Isaiah 40:13-14, (b) which He Himself teaches us, and (c) which no one can resist, Acts 6:10; 4) Its immense depth, 1 Corinthians 2:14, where ἡ μωρία τῶν τοῦ πνεύματος (the foolishness of the Spirit) is said just as ἡ μωρία τοῦ Θεοῦ (the foolishness of God), c. 1:21, 25. This saying is also very notable, Romans 8:26-27. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is more powerful than renewed men can both ask of God and understand, which is proper to God, Ephesians 3:20.

III. Of divine truth: 1) Its universality, John 14:26; 16:13; for which reason He is called κατ' ἐξοχήν (pre-eminently) the Spirit of truth; 2) Its necessity, so that His testimony is most certain, on which our whole faith rests, in divine matters, and those pertaining to our eternal salvation, Romans 8:16; 1 John 5:6-7.

IV. Of divine power and authority; for the Holy Spirit 1) alone can effect a) all things, and indeed b) independently, as He pleases, c) immediately, namely miracles, d) perfectly, so that nothing is lacking that pertains to the common salvation of men, especially of souls. All these things are contained in this one saying, 1 Corinthians 12:11, compared with v. 7.

(*) All parts of religious worship (p. 314.), just as they are fitting for God the Father, are also attributed to the Holy Spirit: 1) Saving trust, and that the greatest, 1 Peter 1:2; Romans 8:15-16; 1 Corinthians 6:11, and the Holy Spirit is our παράκλητος (paraclete), from whom all consolation proceeds, the foundation of all trust; which is utterly divine, 2 Corinthians 1:3; 2) The firmest hope, John 16:13; Romans 8:11, 13; Ephesians 4:30; 3) Love that conquers all allurements of evil, and excites the pursuit of all virtue, Ephesians 4:30-32; 4) Obedience, without any exception, either of men or of duties, Romans 8:14; Acts 7:51, so that the sin against the Holy Spirit cannot be forgiven; 5) A covenant, and that indeed by which our Proof e. A careful comparison of the sayings of the Old and New Testament scripture furnishes us with the firmest arguments for the deity of the Holy Spirit in the following manner: He who spoke to Isaiah, and ordered him to go to the people, etc. Isaiah 6:9, is the true and supreme God. But the Holy Spirit is He who spoke to Isaiah according to Acts 28:25. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is true God. He who spoke through the prophets is Jehovah, Isaiah 1:2; Ezekiel 1:3. But the Holy Spirit spoke through the prophets, 1 Peter 1:11; 2 Peter 1:21. So cf. 2 Samuel 23:2 with Acts 1:16.

The antithesis was formerly of the Macedonians, but today is of the Socinians, who deny that the Holy Spirit is the supreme God, whose more significant arguments are the following:

I. The Holy Spirit is nowhere in the sacred writings called God. Therefore, He is not true God. Resp. The Holy Spirit is indeed called God. Acts 5:3-4; 1 Corinthians 3:16-17; 2 Samuel 23:2-3.

Instance 1. But this proposition: "The Holy Spirit is God," which the Evangelicals assert, does not expressly exist in the sacred writings. Resp. 1) Neither does that proposition: "The Holy Spirit is the power of God," which Socinus strives to defend; nor that thesis: "The Holy Spirit is a quality intermediate between the power of God and the effects produced in man," which Crellius endeavors to maintain, is expressly read in Holy Scripture. 2) We show by an easy and manifest consequence that the Holy Spirit is expressly called God in the sacred writings. When in 1 Corinthians 3:16-17 believers are called the temple of God, because the Spirit of God dwells in them, it necessarily follows that the Holy Spirit is God himself, from whom believers have this, that they are called the temple of God. This will be the argument: He by whom, as an indweller, believers are called temples of God, is expressly called God (compare with this saying 2 Corinthians 6:16): But by the indwelling Holy Spirit believers are called temples of God (cf. 1 Corinthians 6:19-20). Therefore, the Holy Spirit is expressly called God. Pious antiquity urged this argument most strongly against the Pneumatomachi. Hence Theophylact on 1 Corinthians 3:16: "If we are the temple of God, because the Holy Spirit dwells in us, therefore the Holy Spirit is God." And Athanasius in Dialogue III on the Trinity, vol. II of his works: "Every temple of God is the temple of the Holy Spirit."

Instance 2. But the Holy Spirit, in that passage, as well as elsewhere in Holy Scripture, Isaiah 63:10; Joel 2:28; Matthew 3:16, is distinguished from God (for He is called the spirit of God): Therefore, He is not God Himself. For what are distinguished are not the same. Resp. The Spirit is distinguished from God not essentially, but personally. For when He is called the spirit of God, then the word God is not taken οὐσιωδῶς (essentially), or essentially, but ὑποστατικῶς (personally), or personally; and from the distinction of the Holy Spirit from God, so understood, it is less correctly inferred that He is not God, but this at least follows, that He is another person from that divine person from whom He is distinguished.

II. The supreme God is eternal. The Holy Spirit is not eternal. Therefore. The minor is proven; 1) John 7:39. "For the Holy Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified." 2) From Acts 19:2. Those baptized by John did not know that there was a Holy Spirit. Resp. to I. The words of the text are to be understood of the wonderful mission and visible outpouring of the Holy Spirit, by which the apostles on the day of Pentecost were furnished with extraordinary gifts, so that the meaning is: the Holy Spirit was not yet visibly poured out upon the apostles, because Christ had not yet been taken up into heaven. To II, in the cited place, the discourse is not about the essence of the Holy Spirit itself, but about the miraculous conscience is bound to God, 1 Peter 3:21, coll. with Matthew 28:19; 6) An oath, Romans 9:1, with which words Paul signifies that his conscience is a lower witness, whose entire faith rests on the authority of the witness whom he calls upon, the higher one, governing and confirming the conscience, and indeed what pertains to the secret thoughts of the mind, v. 2; 7) Prayer, of both kinds: (a) Adoration and praise, Isaiah 6:3, coll. with Acts 28:25; 1 Peter 4:14. (b) Supplication, 2 Corinthians 13:13; Luke 2:29, coll. with v. 26. For him, on whose promise he relied, Simeon, now dying, supplicates in prayer, and to him he commends his soul, departing from the body, by which he professes him to be Lord both of life and of the soul.

gifts of the Holy Spirit, which flourished at the beginning of the nascent church; for about these Paul had asked in v. 2, and these he had conferred by the laying on of hands in v. 6. How else could the Holy Spirit have been unknown to the Jews or proselytes, who is so often mentioned in the scriptures of the Old Testament, Genesis 1:2; Psalm 33:6, etc.? Indeed, even the Baptist himself publicly professes the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, Matthew 3:11; John 1:32.

III. Whoever has received his essence from God is not the supreme God. But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established; because the supreme God is Jehovah, or the one who gives essence. But he who receives his essence from another is one who has been given essence, and therefore not Jehovah. The minor premise is clear from John 15:26. Resp. Whoever receives his essence from God a) dependently, as from an efficient cause, b) numerically different, is not the supreme God. The Holy Spirit indeed proceeds from the Father and the Son as from a principle of origin, not as from an efficient cause, nor does He receive a numerically different essence, but the same essence.

IV. He who is sent by the Father and the Son of God is not the supreme God. But the Holy Spirit is. John 15:26, c. 14:26, c. 16:7. Therefore. Resp. Whoever is sent by the Father and the Son by an imperious mission is not the supreme God, I grant. But the Holy Spirit is sent with the most free consent, and His mission is nothing other than the temporal manifestation of His origin, or eternal procession from the Father and the Son.

V. The supreme God, whatever He speaks, speaks from Himself. The Holy Spirit does not, etc. John 16:13. Therefore. Resp. The phrase; "to speak from oneself," can be taken in a twofold sense. One; to simply import the negation of all origin, so that the sense is: The supreme God speaks all things from Himself, so that He acknowledges absolutely no origin from which He has the power and knowledge of speaking. The other; that to speak from oneself imports the negation of dependence in speaking on another and superior cause, so that the sense is: The supreme God, whatever He speaks, speaks from Himself, i.e., He speaks independently of another superior cause. In the former sense, the major proposition is not universal, but is true only of God the Father; for only the Father, as He is not from another, so He does not hear or receive from another what He should speak, but speaks from Himself. But if the major premise is taken in the latter sense, it will indeed be universally true, but the minor will be denied by us. For when Christ says: "The spirit of truth will not speak from himself, but whatever he will have heard, he will speak," then those words are to be taken in the former, not in the latter sense, so that their meaning is: The Holy Spirit, as He has received His essence by procession from the Father and the Son, so He has received the power and knowledge of speaking, so that He speaks nothing from Himself; but whatever He speaks, He speaks together with God the Father and the Son. The venerable Bede agrees with us, who, as quoted by D. Calovius in his illustrated bible on this passage, fol. 801, explains the words of Christ thus: "The spirit does not speak from himself, that is, without the communion of the Father and the Son; for the spirit is not different, nor divided from himself; but whatever he will hear, he will speak; he will hear, that is, through the unity of substance and the property of knowledge; from whom he has his essence, from him he surely also has his knowledge, from him therefore his hearing, which is nothing other than knowledge." For which reason the words of Christ denote not ignorance or dependence, but the identity of doctrine and essence, and the order of eternal procession.

VI. The supreme God is omniscient. The Holy Spirit is not, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from 1 Corinthians 2:10. The Holy Spirit searches τὰ βάθη (ta bathē), the deep things of God. To search signifies to inquire into those things which are unknown. Resp. The consequence from divine searching, or omniscience, to human searching, or ignorance, is not valid. For the Holy Spirit searches, not as men do, by successively gathering the unknown from the known through discourse, but by penetrating and inspecting the inmost and most secret counsels and decrees of God with a simple intuition. He so searches that He knows the things that are of God, 1 Corinthians 2:11. Thus God is said to search the reins and hearts, Psalm 7:9; Jeremiah 11:20, by knowing them most intimately.

VII. The supreme God is given to no one, is obtained by no one's prayers, is possessed by no one. But the Holy Spirit is given to men, is obtained by their prayers, is possessed by them. Therefore, the Holy Spirit is not the supreme God. The major is clear;

because whatever is given and obtained by prayers is in the power of the giver; whatever, however, is possessed, is in the power of the possessor. Both are most alien to the majesty of the supreme God. The minor is proven from Luke 11:13; John 7:39, c. 14:16-17; Acts 5:32, c. 15:8, etc. Resp. (1) By an instance: The Son of God is true God, and yet is given to us. Isaiah 9:6; John 3:16. We have God the Father, as dwelling in us (John 14:23), and we obtain Him by prayers. (2) For a gift it is not required that it be in the power of the superiority of the one who gives; for the power of origin is sufficient. And one can give himself to another. For the Son of God gave Himself, Galatians 2:20; Ephesians 5:25, not having become superior to Himself. (3) God is possessed by us not indeed by an authoritative possession, which implies the right and power of the possessor; but yet by a communicative possession, by which we have God Himself graciously present and indwelling. Whence He is called our reward, Genesis 15:1, our portion, Psalm 73:26. (4) Concerning the alleged passages, it should be observed that the primary signification, in which the name of the Holy Spirit is taken ὑποστατικῶς (hypostatically), or for the person, must be distinguished from the secondary signification, in which it is taken ἐνεργητικῶς (energetically), or for the gifts. For in Luke 11:13, the gifts, as is clear from Matthew 7:11, in John 7:39, the visible outpouring, in Acts 15:8, the visible gift are understood. In John 14:16; Acts 5:32, the person of the Holy Spirit is indeed treated, but nothing is detracted from the deity of the Holy Spirit, neither by the intercession of Christ, nor by the giving of the Father. For He is given by the Father and the Son, because He proceeds from both from eternity, and is sent in time.

VIII. Whoever is not commanded in Holy Scripture to be adored is not true God. But the Holy Spirit is not commanded in Holy Scripture to be adored. Therefore. Resp. (1) There is no strength in the major proposition. For since we have proven that the Holy Spirit is the supreme God, it is self-evident and clear that the Holy Spirit is to be adored, even if no express command or example of His religious veneration were in the sacred writings. For he who is commanded to adore God is commanded to adore the Holy Spirit. (2) That the minor is false is clear from proof d.

IX. If the Holy Spirit were God, ὁμοούσιος (of the same substance) with the Father and the Son, He would know both the Father and the Son. But He knows neither the Father nor the Son. Therefore. The antecedent is proven from Matthew 11:27. "No one knows the Son except the Father; nor does anyone know the Father except the Son, and to whom the Son wills to reveal Him." Where the Holy Spirit is excluded from the knowledge of the Father and the Son. Resp. The exclusive and exceptive particle, added to one divine person, does not exclude the other divine persons, but creatures. But that the Holy Spirit knows the Father and the Son without the revelation of another is clear from 1 Corinthians 2:11; John 14:26.

X. The supreme God is not divisible. The Holy Spirit is divisible (cf. 1 John 4:13; Acts 2:18; Hebrews 2:4; Numbers 11:17, etc.). Therefore. Resp. In the cited places, the name of the Holy Spirit is taken metonymically and effectively, for the gifts of the Holy Spirit. But the consequence from the division of the gifts to the division of the essence of the Holy Spirit is not valid. There is one Holy Spirit, and indivisible, but there are divisions and partitions of charisms. 1 Corinthians 12:4, 7.

XI. The Holy Spirit is the power of God, namely that which proceeds from God, and flowing into men sanctifies them, consecrates them, and produces various and admirable effects in them, which is usually called the divine afflatus. Luke 24:49; 1 Corinthians 2:4-5. But the power of God can be neither the supreme God nor a divine person. Resp. (1) We have shown the weakness of this argument above. (2) No power of God that is ἀνυπόστατος (without subsistence), which behaves as a divine attribute, is the Paraclete, another from Christ, the third heavenly witness, distinct from the Father and the Son; no power of God is said to proceed from the Father and the Son, and to be sent by both. These predicates are fitting for the Holy Spirit, John 14:16; c. 16:7; 1 John 5:7. Therefore, He is a divine person, ὁμοούσιος (consubstantial) with God the Father and the Son.

XII. The supreme God is not poured out. The Holy Spirit is poured out. Therefore. The major is clear. For who would say that any person, let alone the supreme God, is poured out into men? The minor is proven from Isaiah 44:3; Ezekiel 39:29; Joel 2:28-29. Resp. The intimate communication of the Holy Spirit to produce gracious effects is metaphorically signified by the name of outpouring. What in this signification is there that cannot be attributed to the supreme God? Is not the supreme good communicative of itself and, as it were, diffusive? Cannot God the Father, since He is a living fountain, pour Himself out, that we may be irrigated by His grace? Jeremiah 2:13; Romans 5:5. You say: The Holy Spirit does not pour Himself out, but is passively poured out, which is beneath the majesty of the supreme God. Resp. The active communication of the Holy Spirit is desired by Paul, 2 Corinthians 13:13. And by the same apostle, 1 Corinthians 12:4, 11, the Holy Spirit is proposed not only as poured out, but also as pouring out both Himself and the divisions of gifts. But He is said to be poured out by the Father and the Son, because He proceeds from both from eternity, and is sent in time.

XIII. Whoever is omitted in many places of scripture where the Father and the Son are mentioned, when the sanctification and salvation of man are treated, is not the supreme God. But the Holy Spirit is, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from the epistle of Jude v. 2; 1 Corinthians 8:6-7. R. Neg. maj., which, if it were solid, should be formed thus: Whoever is nowhere in sacred scripture called God, nor is ever mentioned with the divine persons, or joined in the business of salvation, is not the supreme God. But the Holy Spirit is often called God in the sacred writings, and is often mentioned with the mentioned divine persons, Luke 3:22; Matthew 28:19; 1 John 5:7; 1 Peter 1:2, and other places.

Question XLVIII. What is the hypostatic character of the Holy Spirit?

The hypostatic character, or personal property of the Holy Spirit, is passive spiration, or the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. Proof. Passive spiration belongs solely to the Holy Spirit, distinguishes Him from the Father and the Son, and constitutes Him in the being of the Spirit. Therefore, it is the personal property of the Holy Spirit.

Question XLIX. What is the passive spiration, or procession of the Holy Spirit?

Procession, or passive spiration, is the eternal origin of the Holy Spirit, by which He, within the bosom of the deity, is produced from the Father and the Son, by the communication of one and the same essence in number, as the common spiracle of both.

Obs. 1. It is called passive spiration, not physically, as if it implies passive power, or imperfection; but grammatically, because the Holy Spirit is said not to spirate, but to be spirated. Nor are active and passive spiration two spirations, but it is one and the same spiration, which, with respect to the spirating and producing principle, is called active spiration, and with respect to the produced term, passive. For the rest, the emanation of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son is most pure. Obs. 2. Spiration is here understood not as external, such as was the breathing of Christ upon the disciples in John 20:22, but internal and immanent, since it occurs within the very bosom of the deity; not transitory and vanishing, such as is the breathing of men, but eternal and permanent; because the Holy Spirit proceeds from eternity, as the breath of the Almighty, Job 33:4, and the Spirit of the mouth of the Lord, Psalm 33:6; not an accidental spiration, but a substantial one; for accident does not fall upon God, nor can the Holy Spirit, as a divine person and substance, be produced by an accidental act.

Question L. How will you prove that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and from the Son?

That the Holy Spirit proceeds from God the Father, the sacred scripture teaches αὐτολεξεῖ (in the very words) and in express terms (a). That the same proceeds from the Son of God is validly collected from the denomination of the Spirit of the Son (b), the ὁμοουσία (consubstantiality) of the Father and the Son (c), the reception of omniscience from the Son (d), the apocalyptic vision of the river proceeding from the throne of the Lamb (e), the mission of the Holy Spirit from the Son (f), the breathing of Christ upon the disciples (g), the order and distinction of the divine persons (h).

Proof a. The words of Christ are clear, John 15:26. "When the Paraclete comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the spirit of truth, who from the Father ἐκπορεύεται (proceeds), He will testify of me." The Savior speaks of the eternal and internal procession of the Holy Spirit, by which He receives His essence from the Father, not of the temporal and external mission for the work of sanctification, which the Socinians want this classic passage to mean, but wrongly. For (1) the mission is openly distinguished from the procession. "Whom I will send to you from the Father, who proceeds from the Father." (2) The mission is said to occur in the future tense, the procession in the present tense, so that we may understand the discourse to be not about a temporal mission, but about the eternal emanation of the Holy Spirit. For eternity is a most present and immovable now. (3) Christ's purpose was to assert the authority of the heavenly witness, namely that the testimony of the Holy Spirit is irrefutable and greater than any exception, since He proceeds from the Father Himself, and searches and looks into His τὰ βάθη (deep things), or depths. (4) The origin of the Holy Spirit is designated in parallel places by the verb ἐκπορεύεσθαι (to proceed), Daniel 7:10; Revelation 22:1.

Obs. To this express assertion of Holy Scripture concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father, other arguments can be added, namely (1) that the Holy Spirit is from God, 1 Corinthians 2:12. (2) That He is the Spirit of the Father, Matthew 10:20. The Spirit of the mouth of the Lord. Psalm 33:6. The breath of the Almighty, Job 33:4. Therefore, because He is spirated by the Father, and proceeds from His mouth as His breath, yet in a divine and ineffable manner. (3) Because He is sent by the Father, John 14:26. The temporal mission is a sign of the eternal procession. Only the Father is not read to have been sent, because He has His origin from no one.

Proof b. In the same way that the Holy Spirit is called the spirit of the Father, Matthew 10:20, in the same way He is called the spirit of the Son, Galatians 4:6, the spirit of Christ, Romans 8:9, the spirit of the lips of Christ, Isaiah 11:4, the spirit of the mouth of Christ, 2 Thessalonians 2:8, because just as He is spirated from the Father, so He is spirated in an ineffable manner from the Son of God, and proceeds from His mouth like a divine breath.

Proof c. "All things, whatever the Father has, are mine; For this reason I said that He will receive from mine, and will announce it to you," John 16:15. From which words of Christ not only the ὁμοουσία (consubstantiality) of the Father and the Son, but also the origination of the Holy Spirit from the Son is gathered. "For whatever is said of the Father, this must be said of the Son in every way, except for this very thing, that He is the Father," says Cyril in his thesaurus. We argue; Whoever has all things that God the Father has, except for paternity alone, He has the power of spirating the Holy Spirit. But the Son of God, etc. Therefore.

Proof d. John 16:13-14. "When that spirit of truth comes, he will lead you into all truth. For he will not speak from himself, but whatever he will have heard, he will speak, and he will also announce future things to you. He will glorify me; because he will receive from mine, and will announce it to you." He from whom the spirit of truth receives the knowledge of speaking and announcing future things, from the same he receives his essence. But from the Son of God, etc. Therefore. The major premise is established, because in the Holy Spirit, essence and knowledge are the same. The knowledge of future things is divine and eternal, which on the part of the thing is the divine essence itself. You say; If the discourse had been about the reception of knowledge through eternal procession, Christ would not have used a verb in the future tense, but in the present or past. I respond with the words of Augustine in tractate XCIX on John. "Nor should it move you that a verb of the future tense is used; for it is not said, whatever he has heard, or whatever he hears, but whatever he shall hear, he will speak; for that hearing is sempiternal, because the knowledge is sempiternal. But in that which is sempiternal, without beginning and without end, a verb of any tense may be used, whether past, present, or future, it is not used falsely." But Christ used a verb of the future tense because he was speaking of the reception in relation to the annunciation, which at that time was still future, as is clear from verse 14.

Proof e. Revelation 22:1. "Moreover, he showed me a pure river of the water of life, splendid as crystal, ἐκπορευόμενον ἐκ τοῦ θρόνου Θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἀρνίου (proceeding from the throne of God and of the Lamb)." Where observe (1) that by the throne of God and of the Lamb is understood the essence of God the Father and the Son, marked with a hypostatic character, insofar as it is most glorious and majestic. (2) That by the river is understood the Holy Spirit, the phrase of scripture teaches, which is accustomed to describe the Holy Spirit thus by water, by which we are refreshed, Isaiah 44:3; John 4:10; c. 7:38-39. (3) The verb ἐκπορεύεσθαι (to proceed or to go out) is appropriated by John to the Holy Spirit, John 15:26. (4) Since this river is said to go out from the throne of God and of the Lamb, the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son is indicated. Having premised these things, we argue; Whoever proceeds like a river from the throne not only of the Father, but also of the Lamb, that is, of the Son of God, He proceeds from both. But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore.

Proof f. The Holy Spirit is sent equally by the Son as by the Father, John 15:26 and c. 16:7. But the temporal mission, since it is of a divine person, presupposes an eternal origin and procession from that person by whom He is sent. A divine person is not sent in time, except by Him from whom He eternally proceeds. Whence the argument: The principle of the mission of a divine person in time is the principle of the origin of the same in eternity. But the Son of God is, together with God the Father, the principle of the mission of the Holy Spirit in time. Therefore, the Son of God is, together with God the Father, the principle of the origin of the Holy Spirit in eternity. You say: The Holy Spirit, with respect to the Son of God, is the principle of the mission in time, Isaiah 61:1, and yet not the principle of the origin of the same in eternity. Resp. Christ was sent by the Holy Spirit as man, not as God. We are speaking of the mission of divine persons, insofar as they are divine.

Proof g. John 20:22. "Saying this, he breathed on them, and said to them; receive the Holy Spirit." From which words Augustine, book IV of his doctrine, c. 19, collects the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son of God: "We cannot say that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son, nor is the same Spirit in vain called the Spirit of both the Father and the Son. Nor do I see what else he meant to signify, when, breathing on the face of the disciples, he said: Receive the Holy Spirit. For that bodily state, proceeding from the body with the sense of being bodily touched, was not the substance of the Holy Spirit, but a demonstration by a suitable signification that the Holy Spirit proceeds not only from the Father, but also from the Son."

Proof h. If the Holy Spirit did not also proceed from the Son, then He would not be really distinguished from Him. For every distinction in God arises from relations founded in origin. Indeed, the reason for the order of the persons in the Holy Trinity would also expire. For no reason could be given why the Son is the second, and the Holy Spirit the third person of the Trinity, if there is no order of origin. Finally, this absurdity would follow, that the Son of God does not have His own spirit.

The antithesis is of (1) the Nestorians, (2) the modern Greeks, who deny that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son of God, (3) the Socinians, who maintain that the procession of the Holy Spirit is His temporal mission, (4) the Weigelians, who assert that the Holy Spirit, before the birth of Christ, proceeded from the Father alone, but after the ascension of Christ, also proceeds from the Son; who attack the orthodox opinion with the following arguments.

I. Sacred scripture testifies that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, John 15:26. It does not assert the same of the Son of God. Resp. The words of Christ in the cited passage are not to be understood exclusively. For He does not say that the spirit of truth proceeds from the Father alone; but when the Savior says: "Whom I will send to you from the Father," He also implies that the Holy Spirit proceeds from Himself. For a divine person is not sent in time, except from Him from whom He eternally proceeds. Add this argument: The Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, either as such, or inasmuch as He has the Son as coessential. If the former, the Holy Spirit will be the Son; because He who proceeds from the Father, as such, proceeds in the image of Him from whom He proceeds. If the latter, then He proceeds from both.

II. Whoever communicates essence to another, generates the same. The Son of God does not generate the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the Son of God does not communicate essence to the Holy Spirit. The major premise is established because generation is formally the communication of essence. Resp. I deny the major. For the formal reason of generation is not completed by the mere communication of essence, but by the communication of essence in the image of the producer. The procession of the Holy Spirit indeed denotes the communication of essence, but not in the image of the producer, but so that it may be the common spiracle of the Father and the Son.

III. God the Father is either a sufficient principle of spiration, or not. If the former, He will not need the help of the Son; if the latter, imperfection will fall upon God the Father. Resp. 1) By way of example: God the Father is either a sufficient principle of creation, or not. If the former, He does not need the help of the Son of God and the Holy Spirit; if the latter, imperfection will fall upon God the Father, the creator. (2) There is one power of spiration in the Father and the Son. Therefore, God the Father, in the spiration of the Holy Spirit, does not need the help of the Son of God because of imperfection, but the Son of God concurs in the spiration of the Holy Spirit because of the identity of the spirative power.

IV. Whoever is not the fount and root of the deity, the Holy Spirit does not emanate from him. (For a river emanates from its fount.) But the Son of God is not, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven because only God the Father is the fount and root of the deity, as Athanasius says according to Dannhauer in his Hedosophia, p. 230. Resp. The Father is called the fount of the deity because He is unoriginated, and because both the Son and the Holy Spirit derive their origin from Him. In this strictest sense, that the Son of God is not the fount of the deity is evident. But if by fount is understood the principle of origin, nothing prevents the Son of God from being called the fount of the procession of the Holy Spirit.

V. If the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son, it would follow that the Son is more similar to the Father than the Holy Spirit is. The latter is absurd. Therefore, so is the former. The consequence of the major premise is proven; because, if the Son spirated the Holy Spirit with the Father, He would be similar to the Father not only by reason of essence, but also by reason of the spirative power; of which power the Holy Spirit is destitute. The absurdity of the latter is clear; because the divine persons are of the same majesty, as they are of the same essence. Resp. Similarity in divine matters is considered not according to relations, but according to essence, and therefore the consequence of the major premise is null.

VI. If the Holy Spirit proceeds from both, namely the Father and the Son, He either proceeds by one and simple procession, or by a double procession. If by one, a contraction of persons follows; for the Father and the Son will be contracted into one spirating person, and the Holy Spirit will be the other person, namely the spirated one, and thus the Holy Trinity will be overturned. If by a double one, the Holy Spirit will be duplicated or composed; for a double action implies a double term. Resp. (a) The Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son by one procession; yet it does not follow that there is a contraction of both into one person; because the Father and the Son agree in the same essence, but are distinguished by a distinct hypostatic character; But spiration is not the constitutive character of a person, but a personal notion that is γνωστική (gnostic), or merely notificative, common to God the Father and the Son because of their common power of spirating. (b) The three persons of the divinity created the world without any contraction of persons. Instance: From two persons one spirit cannot proceed, since individual persons have their own spirit. Resp. From two persons, essentially different, one spirit does not proceed. But God the Father and the Son have the same essence, and the same power of spirating, and stand for one principle.

VII. The ancient doctors asserted that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son. See Chemnitz, Loci Theologici, p. 102. Resp. The preposition, "per" (through), is used by the ancient fathers only for the sake of order, not for inequality or diversity of principle. Namely, they taught that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son, so that the property of each person might be preserved, because the Son, by being born of the Father, has this, that the Spirit proceeds from Him; but the Father has it from no one, but from Himself. But the ancients did not deny that the Son of God is the principle of the procession of the Holy Spirit. Instance: If the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son, so that the latter is as much a principle of origin as the former, the Holy Spirit will proceed from God the Father mediately, from the Son of God immediately, and thus the Holy Spirit will be more closely and familiarly joined to the Son than to the Father. Resp. The Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Father ἐμμέσως (mediately), or mediately, that is, through the intervention of the Son; in this way He would indeed be closer to one person than to the other; but He proceeds ἀμέσως (immediately), immediately, from both as from one essential fount. For as the Father and the Son are one in essence; so in producing one and the same consubstantial spirit they are one essential principle; yet in such a way that the Father has that spirative faculty from Himself, while the Son receives it from the Father through an ineffable generation.

Question LI. Is the generation of the Son of God through the divine intellect, and the procession of the Holy Spirit through the divine will?

Neither is the generation of the Son of God through the divine intellect, nor the procession of the Holy Spirit through the divine will, but through the most eminent fecundity of the divine nature, marked by a certain hypostatic character.

Proof I. Because the divine intellect and will are common to the three persons of the divinity. Therefore, if the generation of the Son of God were through the intellect, and the spiration through the will, this absurdity would follow, that the Son by understanding, or thinking, would generate another son, and the Holy Spirit by willing would produce another holy spirit. You say: The discourse is not about the absolute divine intellection, but about the relative intellection of the Father, and the volition of the Father and the Son. Resp. By this distinction new labyrinths are opened. For whence is it that the Father's intellection is fecund, but not the intellection of the Son of God? Whence is it that the volition of the Father in the production of the Holy Spirit is common to the Son of God, but not the intellection?

II. True and proper filiation acknowledges as its principle not the diffusion of the intellect, but fecundity, or the communicability of nature. Since therefore ὁ λόγος (the Word) is the proper Son of God, Romans 8:32, His origin must be attributed not to the intellect, but to the fecundity of the divine essence, which is in the Father and the Son.

III. If God the Father and the Son spirate the Holy Spirit by willing, they surely spirate freely, and can not spirate, and thus the spiration of the Holy Spirit will be a free action, and not necessary or natural. But if the Holy Spirit is not spirated necessarily from the divine nature itself, He is not God, ὁμοούσιος (of the same substance) with the Father and the Son. For the true God exists necessarily and cannot not be.

IV. If the Holy Spirit proceeds through volition, but the Son of God is generated through intellection, the Holy Spirit will not be equal to the Son of God. The latter is absurd. Therefore, so is the former. The consequence of the major premise is proven; because volition is always less noble than intellection.

The antithesis is of the Scholastics and Jesuits, according to whose opinion the Son of God is generated by the intellect of God the Father, and the Holy Spirit is spirated by the will of the Father and the Son. Their more significant arguments are:

I. Whoever is the son is the word of the father, he is begotten by the intellect of the father. But the son of God is ὁ λόγος (logos), or the word of the father, John 1:1. Therefore. The major is proven; because the internal word corresponds to the intellect, by which it is begotten. Resp. (1) I deny the major. For the son can be called the word, because he explains the will of the father. (2) Distinguish between the created λόγος (logos) and the uncreated. The created λόγος (logos) indeed corresponds to the intellect, as the proximate and formal principle; because man cannot produce a word, unless the intellect intervenes, as an intermediate faculty; which is a matter of human imperfection. But the uncreated λόγος (logos) is immediately produced from the divine nature of the father. (3) The Son of God is called the word of the father to indicate the spirituality of the divine generation, not to express the formality of the principle. As a concept from the mind, so the Son of God is produced by the father immaterially and ἀπαθῶς (impassively) (as Basil says, Homily XVI) without passion and corruption. A concept of the mind is so from the mind that it remains in the mind; so the son is from the father, and never ceases to remain in the father. From which it does not follow that God the father begot the son, inasmuch as, beholding and considering himself, he conceived and begot an image of himself. Surely filiation is founded on the communication of the same nature, not on the thought of the intellect.

II. Whoever in sacred scripture is called the love of the Father and the Son, he proceeds from the divine will; But the Holy Spirit, etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the principle of love is the will. The minor is clear from Romans 5:5, 1 John 4:16. Resp. In the cited places the Holy Spirit is not called the love of the Father; but in Romans 5:5, the love of God (by which God loves us) is said to be poured out, i.e., most abundantly declared through the Holy Spirit. The triune God is named charity, 1 John 4:16. But who from that would conclude that the Holy Spirit is the love of the Father and the Son?

III. The productive action of the Son and the Holy Spirit is either transient or immanent. Not transient; otherwise its term would be outside of God, and it would be either creation, or conservation, or cooperation. But if it is immanent, it will be through the intellect and will. For no immanent action in a spiritual nature exists besides intellection and volition, as is clear from the soul and the angelic nature. Resp.

The productive action of the Son of God and the Holy Spirit is indeed immanent, but personal, which is immediately founded in the divine essence, marked by a certain hypostatic character.

IV. If the Son of God is not generated by the intellect of the Father, nor is the Holy Spirit spirated by the will of the Father and the Son, there will be no difference between the generation of the Son and the procession of the Holy Spirit. But there is a difference between generation and procession. Therefore, the former occurs through the intellect, the latter through the will. Resp. We candidly confess that the difference between the eternal generation of the Word and the procession of the Holy Spirit cannot be exactly known by us in the infirmity of this life, nor fully explained. But generation differs from procession, not because the former occurs through the intellect and the latter through the divine will; But (a) the Son of God is generated from the Father alone; the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. (b) The Son is generated by the Father as His image; the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as the common spiracle of both. (c) The production of the Son of God is the first divine production, diffusing itself into another person with further fecundity; the production of the Holy Spirit is the final divine production (immanent), in which the communicability of the divine nature comes to rest within the bosom of the deity. Cf. D. Osiander in his systematic theological collection, part 1, p. 430.

Question LII. What is the consequence of the procession of the Holy Spirit, by which it is manifested a posteriori?

The eternal procession of the Holy Spirit is manifested by the temporal mission of the Holy Spirit, which is from the Father and the Son. Proof. God the Father sends the Holy Spirit in the name of the Son, John 14:26. But the Son sends the Holy Spirit from the Father, John 15:26. Therefore, the power of sending the Holy Spirit is common to God the Father and the Son; which God the Father has from Himself, the Son has received from the Father through eternal generation. Moreover, the mission of the Holy Spirit is either visible or invisible. It is visible when the Holy Spirit is so given and communicated that He manifests His presence through some symbol, obvious to human senses. In this visible manner the mission of the Holy Spirit was made in the baptism of Christ, when He descended in the form of a dove upon Christ, Matthew 3:16, and also on the feast of Pentecost, when He came upon the apostles in the form of fiery tongues, Acts 2:3. Furthermore, it is sometimes called the visible effusion of the Holy Spirit, by which He suddenly reveals His presence through rare and unusual effects; such as happened to the converted Gentiles in the house of Cornelius the centurion, Acts 10:45. For they immediately began to speak in various tongues and to celebrate God. But the visible mission of the Holy Spirit is extraordinary, and occurs through a certain singular οἰκονομίαν (economy), or divine dispensation. The invisible mission of the Holy Spirit is that by which He is ordinarily sent through the word and sacraments into the hearts of penitent sinners, and His gifts are communicated to them. Galatians 4:6; 1 Corinthians 12:13. Moreover, there are gifts of the Holy Spirit, some sanctifying, others ministering. Sanctifying gifts are those which are conferred on a sinner, that he may become and remain just and holy; such are: illumination, Ephesians 1:18. Conversion, Ezekiel 36:27. Regeneration, John 3:5. Justification, 1 Corinthians 6:11. Adoption, Romans 8:15. Mystical union, 1 Corinthians 3:16. Renewal, Titus 3:5. Virtues worthy of a Christian, which are the fruit of the Holy Spirit, Galatians 5:22. The certification of eternal salvation, Ephesians 1:14. Ministering gifts are those which are distributed for the administration of public office in the church according to the measure of divine grace, 1 Corinthians 12:8-10.

Question LIII. Is the Holy Spirit sent only with respect to gifts and gracious operation, or indeed also as a hypostasis?

Not only are the gifts of the Holy Spirit communicated to the faithful, but the very person of the Holy Spirit is sent into their hearts by God the Father and the Son, so that He may be closer to the pious than to the impious, both with respect to substance and with respect to ἐνεργείας (energy) or gracious operation.

Proof I. from Galatians 4:6. "God has sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying: Abba, Father!" Here the apostle distinguishes the operation of the Holy Spirit, by which He excites in us prayers proceeding from filial trust, from the person of the Holy Spirit Himself, but he does not separate them. For he teaches that God the Father has sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, who produces pious prayers in us.

II. From Christ's proagonistic sermon in John 14:16. "I will ask the Father, that he may give you another paraclete, that he may remain with you forever; the Spirit of truth." And v. 26. "But the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, (ἐκεῖνος) He will teach you all things and will remind you of all that I have said to you." These words of Christ cannot be explained of the gifts of the Holy Spirit alone. For the Holy Spirit has distinct personal names. For he is called the paraclete, which is a personal name. 1 John 2:1. He is called ἄλλος παράκλητος (another paraclete). Gifts are not distinguished from the Father and the Son by ἄλλος (another). He is described as the catholic doctor of truth; for He is called the Spirit of truth, who will teach all things. This cannot be asserted of the gifts of the Holy Spirit alone.

III. From 1 Corinthians 6:19. "Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you?" And 1 Corinthians 3:16. "The Spirit of God dwells in you." A temple is said to be of God, and indwelling is of a person, not of gifts, which are not said to indwell, but to be in.

You say I. The Holy Spirit is omnipresent; how then does He become present by mission? Resp. The Holy Spirit is omnipresent by universal presence. Psalm 139:7. But He deigns the faithful with a special presence. Which special presence is a more intimate and secret conjunction of the Holy Spirit with the faithful for singular gracious effects.

You say II. The infinity and immensity of the Holy Spirit seem to obstruct this more intimate conjunction of the Holy Spirit with the faithful. For he who is infinite and immense is absent from no place, from no creature, but is most present to it. Resp. The infinity and immensity of the Holy Spirit did not prevent Him from being more closely joined to that dove in which He descended visibly upon Christ in His baptism, than to other creatures. Indeed, ὁ λόγος (the Word), though also infinite and immense, dwells more closely in the assumed flesh of His own and indeed σωματικῶς (somatically), Colossians 2:9, than in other pious men. Therefore, that more intimate conjunction is not impeded by the immensity of the Holy Spirit.

Question LIV. What divine action ad extra is proper to the Holy Spirit?

Proof. Sanctification is indeed a divine action ad extra, and therefore undivided or common to all three persons of the divinity, from which it is also attributed to God the Father, John 17:17, and to the Son of God, Hebrews 9:14; but it is appropriated to the Holy Spirit in the sacred writings and the apostolic symbol, as an external mark of discretion, so that He Himself is said to sanctify us terminally. Namely, God the Father sanctifies us, through the Son, in the Holy Spirit. This Paul teaches in Romans 15:16. "I am a minister of Jesus Christ among the gentiles, sacrificing the gospel of God, that the offering of the gentiles may be acceptable, sanctified in the Holy Spirit." Paul, by preaching the gospel, showed to all that one ἱλαστικόν (propitiatory), or propitiatory sacrifice of the Lamb of God, which most fully expiated the sins of the whole world, in which Lamb of God the believing gentiles, previously unclean, being cleansed by faith through the operation of the Holy Spirit, were sanctified, and offered as a most acceptable host to God. Therefore, the Holy Spirit sanctifies not instrumentally or ministerially, but principally; since He is openly distinguished from the minister Paul. He sanctifies through the ministry of the word, which is called διακονία (diakonia), or the ministry of the Spirit, 2 Corinthians 3:8, by calling, illuminating, converting, regenerating, justifying, indwelling, renewing, establishing, and saving fallen men.

Question LV. Can the mystery of the Trinity be demonstrated or refuted from the principles of reason?

The truth of the supreme mystery of the Trinity can neither be constructed nor destroyed from the principles of reason.

Proof. The mystery of the Trinity is known solidly from the divinely revealed word, as from its οἰκείῳ (proper) or proper principle, and is therefore entirely more sublime than any natural grasp of reason, light, or sphere, as the Savior Himself teaches, Matthew 11:27. "No one knows the Son except the Father, nor does anyone know the Father except the Son, and to whom the Son wills to reveal Him." But if we know neither the Son of God without the kindness of the revealing Father, nor God the Father without the revelation of the Son; it follows that the knowledge of the Holy Trinity, as Justin Martyr says, is ὑπὲρ νοῦν, ὑπὲρ λόγον, καὶ ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν κατάληψιν (beyond mind, beyond reason, and beyond all comprehension), i.e., it far transcends the principles of reason, and depends solely on supernatural revelation. Therefore, it cannot and should not be demonstrated or impugned from reason. You say: The mystery of the Holy Trinity cannot be known without reason. Therefore, the dictate of reason must be attended to here. Resp. We do not apprehend the mystery of the Trinity without reason, as a receiving subject and a knowing organ; We know it without reason, considered as a norm and judge; Just as we do not speak without the tongue, yet we do not use it as the judge of speech.

The antithesis is 1) of the Scholastics, and of Keckermann, according to whose opinion the mystery of the Trinity can be demonstrated from the principles of reason. 2) of the Socinians, who try to impugn the truth of the supreme article of faith concerning the unity of the divine essence and the Trinity of divine persons with arguments derived from the light of reason. The sophisms of the Scholastics are the following:

I. Whoever is good from eternity has communicated his goodness from eternity. (For every good is communicative of itself.) But God, etc. Therefore. Furthermore; If God communicated His goodness from eternity, He either communicated it to creatures or to divine persons. Not to creatures, because they did not exist from eternity. Therefore, to divine persons. Resp. If this argument were presented to a gentile philosopher, he would resolve it with no trouble. Namely: Good is communicative of itself, not as a mother, fertile with offspring, communicates her nature to it through generation, but as the sun communicates itself to the world, not by begetting a new sun, but by imparting its rays to the world.

II. Supreme beatitude seems to require society and friendship. But God has this without need of creatures, which indeed are not co-eternal with God. But friendship cannot exist without distinction of persons. Resp. A gentile philosopher will reply that God, being αὐταρκέστατον (most self-sufficient), most content with Himself, does not need a friend.

III. In which essence there is a perfect intellect, reflected upon itself, and a perfect will, inclined towards itself, in that essence there is a begotten image, and a spirit proceeding by the impulse of the will. But in the divine essence, etc. Therefore. Resp. Neither intellection nor volition is productive of a person. Angels possess an intellect reflected upon itself, and a will inclined towards itself, and yet they do not produce persons. Add that God knows all things through His essence, not, however, through species or images. See above p. 258.

IV. The mystery of the Trinity is either conformed to reason, or disformed from it. If it is disformed from reason, it is false; For whatever is against reason cannot be true for this reason, that reason has God as its author, from whom nothing but truth can proceed. Therefore, it is conformed to reason, and thus demonstrable from its principles. Resp. The mystery of the Trinity is disformed from reason, left to itself, not that it is against reason, but above reason.

V. Theologians show the truth of the mystery of the Trinity through similarities taken from nature, see Dannhauer, Hodosophia, p. 276. Resp. Those similarities are not adequate, but inadequate, by which that most sublime mystery is in some way adumbrated, but not proven.

VI. Certain philosophers, especially the Platonists, acknowledged a Trinity of divine persons. Resp. Those philosophers transferred some things into their writings from the monuments of the Israelite church, but interpolated and corrupted with the vainest commentaries.

The arguments of the Socinians, drawn from the principles of reason, with which they attack the mystery of the Trinity, are the following: I. As many persons as there are, so many essences there are. But there are three divine persons. Therefore, there are also three divine essences. The conclusion is absurd, the absurdity of which arises not from the major proposition, which is known from the light of nature; Therefore, from the minor. Resp. 1) The absurdity of the conclusion arises from the major proposition, which is not universally true. For by multiplying the persons, it is not necessary to multiply the essences. The reason is ready; because a person, considered abstractly and formally, is a mode of the essence; but that there can be several modes of one essence is no doubt. For example, we note in Peter the mode of subsistence, of presence, of duration, of position, of habit, while the unity of Peter's essence remains safe. 2) As many finite and separate persons as there are, so many essences there are; I grant. But the divine persons are both infinite and one, 1 John 5:7, so that one person is in another, John 14:10. Therefore, it must be attributed to the infinite perfection of God that in one divine essence there are three distinct persons, enjoying mutual περιχώρησις (perichoresis); which infinite divine perfection it is wrong to measure by rules derived from creatures.

II. Whatever dogma implies a manifest contradiction, that is not consistent with truth. But the dogma of the Trinity of persons in the unity of the divine essence implies a manifest contradiction. Therefore. The major is established; because two contradictories cannot be true at the same time. The minor is proven; because the dogma of the Trinity implies that God is one, and not one, trine, and not trine; by which a manifest contradiction is involved. Resp. A contradiction is the affirmation and negation of the same thing about the same thing, insofar as it is the same. But when we say that God is one and not one, trine and not trine, then the same thing is not affirmed and negated about the same thing according to the same respect; but unity is affirmed of God according to essence, it is negated of the same according to the modes of subsisting, or personalities; trinity is affirmed of God according to personalities, it is negated of the same according to essence. You say: A divine person is the divine essence itself. Resp. A divine person is ambiguously said to be the divine essence. For 1) the sense can be that a divine person in the nominative case is the divine essence, 2) that a divine person in an oblique case connotes the divine essence. In the former sense, the assertion is false. For a person taken concretely and materially is an intelligent ὑποστάμενον (substance) or suppositum, which consists of essence and subsistence; the same, taken abstractly and formally, is a mode of the essence, which in Greek is called ἀνθυπαρξία (anhypostasia), in Latin, incommunicable subsistence. In the latter sense, the assertion is indeed true; But just as we do not call the person of John his humanity, so neither is a divine person in the nominative case accurately called the divine essence itself.

III. If a person is formally a mode of subsisting, God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit will be three modes. The consequent is absurd. Therefore, so is the antecedent. The absurdity of the consequent is clear; because a mode is a non-being. But who would call God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit non-beings? Resp. I deny the consequence of the major; because God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are concrete things, which besides their personality connote the divine essence itself; but a person formally considered is a mode of subsisting, or ultimate subsistence. Nor is a mode of subsisting a non-being; for since it modifies and determines being, it is necessary that it be something of being, materially implying the essence itself.

IV. No singular is communicable to many. The divine essence is singular. Therefore, it is not communicable to several persons. Resp. No singular is communicable to several inferiors differing in number; I grant. For thus universals, namely genera and species, are communicated to inferiors, so that they are essentially multiplied in them. But a singular can be communicable to several in another way. Thus one and the same prince in number is divinely communicated to several citizens, one pastor to several listeners. Instance: But one singular essence cannot be common to several persons. Resp. One singular essence cannot be common to several finite and separately existing persons. But it is far otherwise with infinite persons, one of which is in another; these, as Holy Scripture teaches, are one, 1 John 5:7.

V. Whatever things are the same as a third, are the same among themselves. But the three divine persons are the same as a third, namely, the divine essence. Therefore, the three divine persons are the same among themselves, and differ in no way. Resp. Whatever things are the same as an incommunicable third, they are simply and adequately the same among themselves, e.g., the promised Messiah, and Jesus of Nazareth; the apostle of the gentiles, and Paul. But whatever things are the same as a communicable third, there is no identity between them, except by reason of that common third. e.g., a horse and a man agree in the common generic concept, which is animal, while the specific difference remains, John and James agree in the common specific concept, which is man, while the numerical difference remains. Since, therefore, the divine essence is communicable to three persons, those persons indeed agree in one common essence, but the personal distinction remains intact.

VI. The Father is God, the Son is God, the Holy Spirit is God. Therefore, there are three Gods. Resp. There is no strength in the consequence; because it is not licit to say: The Father is God, as to the essence, distinct from another, who is the supreme God. Therefore, it is wrongly concluded from an indeterminate and common middle term, in which the three divine persons agree. In a similar way, someone might perhaps collect: Solomon the king is a man, Solomon the husband is a man, Solomon the father is a man; Therefore, Solomon the king, the husband, and the father, are three men. Instance: Why then do the defenders of the Trinity conclude thus: The Father is a person, the Son is a person, the Holy Spirit is a person. Therefore, there are three persons? They rightly collect thus; because they conclude from a determinate and distinctive middle term. For by personality, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are distinguished.

VII. There are three infinite persons; Therefore there are three infinite beings, which is absurd. Resp. I deny the consequence. For a person, formally and in the nominative case, does not denote being itself, but something of a being, namely a certain mode of its existing, which is called ultimate subsistence.

VIII. The one God is trine in persons; Each divine person is God; Therefore, each divine person is trine in persons. Resp. 1) The major premise is not distributively universal, because it is not permissible to say: All that which is one God is trine in persons. 2) There are four terms in this sophism because of the varied supposition, which in the major is simple, in the minor is personal. A similar sophism is: An animal is both rational and irrational; Every Socinian is an animal; Therefore, every Socinian is both rational and irrational.

IX. Three divine persons really distinct are three Gods. But God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are three divine persons really distinct. Therefore, God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are three Gods. Resp. Three divine persons, really and essentially distinct, are three Gods, I grant. But God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are indeed three persons, really distinct on account of their relative oppositions, but they are not distinguished by reason of essence; which they have in common.

X. In whatever is the whole essence of God, in it is the whole Trinity. But in each divine person, etc. Therefore. Resp. In which is the whole essence of God under all three modes of subsisting, in it is the whole Trinity, I grant. But one divine person has the essence of God not under three, but under one mode of subsisting. For God the Father subsists ἀγεννήτως (unbegottenly), the Son of God γεννήτως (begottenly), the Holy Spirit ἐκπορεύτως (processively).

XI. The true God is to be invoked through a mediator. The one God in essence, and trine in persons, is not to be invoked through a mediator. Therefore. Resp. The major is particular in the second figure. For not whoever is true God is to be invoked through a mediator; since the mediator himself is also true God, who is not invoked through a mediator, as different from himself (as the adversaries understand). Although the minor should not be conceded either; because to invoke through a mediator is to ask for a hearing on account of the merit of the mediator; which can certainly be alleged in the invocation of the Holy Trinity, is certain. See D. Calov. System. vol. III. qu. III. p. 114.

XII. The divine essence is the Father; The divine essence is the Son; Therefore the Son is the Father. Resp. 1) Neither the major nor the minor is universal; because I cannot say: Everything that is the divine essence is the Father. 2) The conclusion should be inferred thus: Therefore a certain one who is the Son is the Father (namely, in a different respect).

XIII. If the divine essence is distinguished from the divine persons, there will be a quaternity in God (namely 1. Essence 2. Father 3. Son 4. Holy Spirit). The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. If the divine essence is distinguished from the persons really, there will be a quaternity in God, I grant. But the divine essence is not distinguished from the divine persons really, but only by an eminent or reasoned distinction.

XIV. Whatever consists of three persons is composite. God is not composite. Therefore. Resp. We have satisfied this argument above. pp. 241.

Question LVI. Is the mystery of the Trinity necessary to be believed by all who are to be saved?

The mystery of the Holy Trinity is necessary to be believed by all men to be saved in the Old (a) and New Testament (b), both by the necessity of divine precept, and by the necessity of the means, divinely ordained for obtaining salvation (c).

Proof a. When God promulgated the decalogue, He inculcated this precept on the Israelites. Exodus 20:2. "I am Jehovah your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage; you shall have no other God before my face." But that the triune God brought the Israelites out of Egypt, we have clearly shown above. Furthermore, God said in the same place, v. 10-11: "The seventh day is the sabbath of Jehovah, your God --- For in six days Jehovah made the heaven and the earth." The creator of heaven and earth is God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Genesis 1:1-2; Psalm 33:6.

Proof b. In the New Testament, all who are to be saved are commanded to be baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, Matthew 28:19. Therefore, all who are to be saved are obliged by divine precept to acknowledge and worship God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

Proof c. 1) "This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent," John 17:3. As eternal life consists in the sempiternal vision and fruition of the Holy Trinity; so the means and way of obtaining eternal life is the saving knowledge of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. 2) No atheist is saved; one who does not honor the triune God is an atheist; Therefore. The minor is proven both from John 5:23, "He who does not honor the Son, does not honor the Father," and from 1 John 2:23. "Everyone who denies the Son, does not have the Father either." But he who acknowledges neither God the Father nor the Son of God is an atheist. From which Athanasius in his creed gravely says: "Whoever wishes to be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the catholic faith; which faith unless every one does keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly. And the catholic faith is this, that we worship one God in trinity, and trinity in unity."

The antithesis is of the Socinians, Arminians, and certain Papists, who deny that the mystery of the Trinity is necessary to be believed by all who are to be saved, whose arguments are:

I. The Holy Trinity does not exist in the sacred scripture. Therefore, it is not necessary for all to believe it. Resp. We have in the sacred writings three witnesses, who are one, 1 John 5:7. Although the abstract word, Trinity, does not exist in sacred scripture  $\rho\eta\tau\omega\varsigma$  (expressly), it is sufficient that  $\tau\omicron$   $\pi\rho\acute{\alpha}\gamma\mu\alpha$  (the thing itself), or the thing itself, is clearly known from the heavenly oracles.

II. To whomever the mystery of the Trinity is necessary to know, to them it is necessary to know the difference between essence and person. But not all men know that difference. Therefore. Resp. The supreme dogma of the Christian faith concerning the three persons in one divine essence is necessary for all to know, not insofar as it is proposed in ecclesiastical terms, but in the simple phrases of scripture. For the rest, we teach the difference between essence and person most plainly to the unlearned; that essence is common to all three persons of the divinity; but a person is incommunicable to another person.

III. Infants do not believe in the Holy Trinity, because they are utterly ignorant of the difference between the essence and the divine persons, and yet they are saved. Therefore, the mystery of the Trinity is not necessary for all to believe. Resp. Infants are baptized into God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and therefore, with the illumination of the Holy Spirit, they believe in the triune God, with a faith not indeed discursive or reflective, but yet simple and direct, in a way inexplicable to us.

IV. If the mystery of the Trinity was known in the Old Testament, it was known either implicitly or explicitly. If the former, the Jews did not have a distinct knowledge of the divine persons, and therefore this mystery cannot be proven from the places of the Old Testament. If the latter, the difference between the Old and New Testament will be removed, although it is established that the mystery of the Trinity is more clearly proposed in the New than in the Old Testament. Resp. The Jews of the Old Testament explicitly knew the triune God, but explicit knowledge has its degrees; for it is clearer under the new covenant, less clear it was under the old.

V. Whoever were kept under the law for the faith to come, they did not have explicit faith in the Holy Trinity. But the Israelites in the Old Testament, etc. Galatians 3:23. Resp. 1) By faith in that passage, some understand the doctrine of Christ exhibited, which was to be revealed in the New Testament. Meanwhile, the Fathers under the Old Testament had faith in the Messiah to come. 2) Blessed Luther understands saving faith, and distinguishes not between the times of the Old and New Testament, but between the different states of man, who lives either in a state of anxiety under the law, or in a state of grace, or of faith. We are all kept and constrained under the law for the acknowledgment of sins, until we are raised up and refreshed by faith in Christ.

VI. The Israelites in the Old Testament did not worship the Father in the name of Christ. Therefore, they did not explicitly know the mystery of the Trinity. Resp. I deny the antecedent. Daniel asked to be heard by the Lord for the Lord's sake, c. 9:17, i.e., for Christ's sake. Instance. But Christ says: "Hitherto you have not asked in my name," John 16:24. Resp. By the name of Christ in that passage, as Luther explains, is understood all that which Christ performed for us in His mediatorial office, to which belongs His passion, death, burial, resurrection, etc., which at the time Christ used the cited words, had not yet been accomplished, but were to be accomplished in the near future.

VII. The Jews of today do not acknowledge the mystery of the Holy Trinity. Resp. The Jews of today are blinded and hardened; the Jews of the Old Testament were teachable. It is wrong to argue from the latter to the former.

Question LVII. Does the human nature of Christ also pertain to the Holy Trinity?

The human nature of Christ, by means of the personal union with the Word, pertains to the Holy Trinity.

Proof. For the same reason that the human nature of Christ pertains to the Word, for the same reason it pertains to the Holy Trinity. But by means of the personal union it pertains to the Word. Therefore, by means of the personal union it pertains to the Holy Trinity. The minor is established from John 1:14; 1 Timothy 3:16.

The antithesis is of the Papists, who deny that the human nature of Christ has been elevated into the fellowship of the Holy Trinity. They rely on the following arguments; I. In the Holy Trinity is the Father, the Son of God, and the Holy Spirit. But the human nature of Christ is not the Father, the Son of God, and the Holy Spirit. Therefore. Resp. The Son of God manifested in the flesh consists of a divine and a human nature.

II. If human nature pertains to the Trinity, there will be an equalization of the divine and human nature. The consequent is absurd, therefore so is the antecedent. Resp. There is no equalization of natures. For the human nature of Christ pertains to the Trinity not essentially, immediately, and per se, but only mediately and by the grace of the personal union.

Question LVIII. How are those to be instructed who cannot grasp the doctrine of the Holy Trinity?

The mystery of the Trinity is to be explained to them most simply in the phrases of scripture.

Proof. The sacred scripture most plainly teaches that God is one, Deuteronomy 6:4. That that one God, in whose name we are baptized, is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, Matthew 28:19. That the Father is one, the Son of God another, the Holy Spirit another, John 14:16. That the Son of God was begotten by the Father. Psalm 2:7. That the Holy Spirit proceeds from God the Father and the Son from eternity, John 15:26. For the rest, the apostle admonishes that reason is to be taken captive in obedience to Christ, 2 Corinthians 10:5.

Question LIX. Does one who adores one person of the divinity adore the Holy Trinity itself?

When one person of the divinity is adored, the whole Holy Trinity is adored.

Proof. The three persons of the divinity are ὁμοούσιοι (homoousioi) or consubstantial, John 14:10; 1 John 5:7. Therefore, by prayers directed to one person, we do not exclude the others, but we abstract our mind from creatures and from everything that is not God, and for the sake of a more distinct concept, we direct our prayers to the divine persons.

Question LX. What practical uses will you extract from the doctrine of the Holy Trinity?

The practical uses to be derived from the mystery of the Trinity concern partly the trust of our heart (a), and partly the declaration of our charity towards God and neighbor (b).

Proof a. Nothing equally erects and supports the trust of our heart as the love of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. For God the Father loved us sinners, guilty of eternal death, by sending the Son as mediator into the flesh, and by benevolently accepting His satisfaction rendered for our sins. The Son of God loved us by assuming our flesh, by suffering in it the penalties of our sins, and by preparing eternal salvation for us. The Holy Spirit loved us by offering and conferring on us, through the word and sacraments, the salvation prepared by the Son of God. O charity without example! O grace without measure! Supported by this, we pour out prayers full of trust to the triune God, and promise ourselves all things most salutary from Him.

Proof b. Augustine says excellently in his manual, c. XIX. "God the Father is charity; God the Son is love; the Holy Spirit is the love of the Father and the Son; this charity and this love require something similar in us, namely, charity, by which, as by a certain affinity of kinship, we may be associated and joined to Him."

CHAPTER III.
ON THE
DIVINE ACTIONS IN GENERAL, AND IN PARTICULAR ON CREATION.

Question I. What are the divine actions?

HEY ARE THE second acts of the infinite power of God.

Question II. How are the divine actions distinguished?

Distinction of divine actions. The divine actions are distinguished into those which are within God, and those which are outside of God. The divine actions "ad intra" are those which tend toward an object which is God Himself. The actions "ad extra" are those whose object are created things.

Proof. Every action involves a transcendental relation to a certain object. Therefore, the object of divine actions is either God Himself, or creatures.

Question III. How are the divine actions "ad intra" distinguished?

Divine actions "ad intra". The divine actions "ad intra" are either essential or personal. The former are those which respect God as their object, and whose acting principle is the divine essence considered indeterminately, as it is common to all three persons of the divinity (a); The latter is that which terminates in a divine person, and whose acting principle is the divine essence considered determinately, as it is marked with a certain hypostatic character (b).

Proof a. Certain divine actions flow from the essence of God considered indeterminately, e.g., the acts of the divine intellect and will. For God knows Himself, loves Himself, rests in His own goodness; these are essential actions ad intra.

Proof b. The generation of the Son of God and the spiration of the Holy Spirit are personal divine actions ad intra; for they terminate in producing a divine person, and their acting principle is the divine essence, marked by a certain hypostatic character. Of these, that trite saying is valid; The divine works ad intra, being personal, are divided, i.e., not common to all three persons of the divinity.

Question IV. How are the divine actions ad extra distinguished?

Divine actions ad extra. Divine actions ad extra are distinguished into immanent and transient. The former are those which indeed terminate in creatures, but are perfected within the essence of God (a). The latter are said to be those which are both perfected outside the divine essence and respect an object distinct from God (b).

Proof a. God knows creatures, loves them, destines them for certain ends; which actions are indeed perfected within God, but terminate in creatures. To this pertain the divine decrees of creation, conservation, predestination, reprobation.

Proof b. Transient actions are distinguished into personal and essential. The former are those which are perfected outside the bosom of the deity, and belong to one certain person by economic appropriation. The latter are those which are perfected outside the divine essence, and are common to all three persons of the divinity, their order, however, being preserved. Concerning this distinction, it should be well observed; (1) That personal actions ad extra are considered in two ways; (a) inchoatively, or with respect to the principle; for thus they are common to all three persons of the divinity: (b) terminatively, or with respect to the term; thus they belong to one divine person, and terminate in the same. e.g., The incarnation is a personal divine work ad extra, which inchoatively is common to all three persons of the divinity, namely, with respect to the production of the flesh of Christ, and also with respect to the coupling or union of the two natures in Christ; but if it is viewed terminatively, it belongs only to the λόγος (Logos), or the Son of God, in whose hypostasis the flesh of Christ was assumed. Similarly, the appearance of the Holy Spirit in the visible form of a dove, Matthew 3:16, is common to all three divine persons inchoatively, namely, as to the production of the form of a dove, and the exhibition of the produced form; but terminatively, with respect to the assumption, external appearance, and descent, it belongs only to the Holy Spirit. (2) Essential actions ad extra are undivided, i.e., common to all three persons of the divinity, their order, however, being preserved, e.g., The creation of the world is an external essential work, common to God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the order of the divine persons, however, being preserved. For just as the Father is from Himself, but the Son of God is from the Father, and the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son; so God the Father is said to have created the world through the Son in the Holy Spirit.

Question V. What is creation?

Definition of creation. Creation is a divine action ad extra, by which God the Father, through His Son in the Holy Spirit, both created immaterial substances and simple bodies out of nothing, and mixed bodies out of unsuitable and unformed matter within six days, solely by the command of His will, omnipotently, for the glory of His wisdom, power, and goodness, and for the utility of men.

Obs. Creation is taken either properly or improperly. Properly, it signifies, both in a stricter sense, the production of a subsistent thing either from nothing or from unsuitable matter; and in a broader sense, the production of a dependent being from a creator in the process of becoming: in which broader sense, by metaphysicians, being is distinguished into created and uncreated, and God is said to create, when parents generate. Improperly, it signifies (a) renewal, Psalm 51:12, (b) the sending of the most just judgments of God, Isaiah 45:7, (c) the effecting of wonderful things, Numbers 16:30.

Question VI. Who created the world?

The efficient cause of creation. Only God (a) the Father (b), the Son (c), and the Holy Spirit (d).

Proof a. (1) Because Moses, in the historical description of creation, clearly testifies that Jehovah created the heaven and the earth, Genesis 2:4. (2) By the exclusive particle, everyone who is not God is removed from the work of creation. For only God is said to have stretched out the heavens, Job 9:8; Isaiah 44:24. (3) Creation is a γνώρισμα (distinguishing mark) of the true God, by which He is distinguished from false gods. Psalm 96:5; Isaiah 45:5-7.

Proof b. 1 Corinthians 8:6. "To us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things." The work of creation is peculiarly attributed to God the Father in the sacred writings and the apostolic symbol (a) because of the order of operation; because the Father has it from Himself that He acts and creates, the Son of God and the Holy Spirit from the Father. (b) Because God the Father manifested His omnipotence by the most efficacious word of command in the work of creation, Genesis 1:3. (c) Creation is the first divine work ad extra, and therefore it is said of the first person of the divinity by a certain appropriation.

Proof c. John 1:3. "All things were made through him" (the λόγος (Logos), or Son of God). Obs. that by "all things" are understood not only those which pertain to the business of salvation and religion under the New Testament, as the Socinians will; but all things which are contained within the compass of heaven and earth. For thus St. Paul explains τὰ πάντα (all things), made through the Son of God, Colossians 1:16: "By the Son of God were all things created, which are in heaven, and which are on earth, visible and invisible."

Proof d. Psalm 33:6. "By the word of Jehovah the heavens were made, and by the spirit of his mouth all their host." By the spirit of the divine mouth is implied the Holy Spirit, of whom Moses speaks in Genesis 1:2-3. "And the Spirit of God was moving over the face of the waters; and God said: Let there be light! and there was light." Which words D. Seb. Schmid concisely explains in his annotations on Genesis, p. 4. "Then in this his spirit, moving over the waters, God the Father said through his internal word, the Son, this spoken word: Let there be light."

The antithesis is of the Socinians, who maintain that only God the Father is the first cause of creation; whose arguments are: I. God the Father is called creator in the apostolic symbol. Therefore, creation is not a work common to all three persons of the divinity. Resp. God the Father is indeed called creator in the apostolic symbol appropriately, but not exclusively, since the Son of God and the Holy Spirit are also the same creator.

II. Whoever can do nothing of himself is not the creator of the world. But the Son of God, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because the creator is independent, both in being and in operating. The minor is clear from John 5:19. "The Son can do nothing of himself." Resp. The Son can do nothing of himself not due to a defect of power, but due to the identity of nature, which He has from the Father, not by dependence, but by eternal nativity, and therefore the sense of the cited words is: The Son, as He is from the Father by eternal generation, and has received from the Father the same power of operating that the Father has; so He can do nothing of Himself, and apart from the Father, but whatever He does, He does together with the Father.

III. He through whom all things were made is not the principal cause, but the instrumental cause of creation. But through the Son of God, etc. John 1:2. Therefore. The major is established; because the particle, διὰ (through), per, denotes an instrument. Resp. (1) The particle, "per," is not always an index of an instrumental cause; for it is used of God the Father in 1 Corinthians 1:9; Ephesians 1:1; Romans 6:4; Hebrews 2:10. (2) God the Father created all things through the Son, not as through an instrument, but as through His wisdom and ὑποστατικὴν (hypostatic) power, Proverbs 8:30; 1 Corinthians 1:24.

IV. Whatever spirit, the first matter having been produced, began to operate, is not the creator of the world. But the Spirit of God, etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because Elohim in the beginning created the heaven and the earth. The minor is clear from Genesis 1:2, where Moses testifies of the Spirit of God that, when the heaven and the earth were created, the Spirit of God moved over the waters. Resp. The motion of the Holy Spirit over the face of the waters is not to be understood with the exclusion of a prior operation, but with the inclusion of and relation to subsequent works; otherwise, for the same reason, someone might perhaps argue; God the Father on the sixth day formed man from the dust of the earth. Therefore, He is not the creator of heaven and earth.

Question VII. Are the three persons of the divinity three associate causes of creation?

The three persons of the divinity are not three associate causes, not three authors of creation, but one cause, one author of creation, one creator.

Proof. For associate causes, there is required (1) a diversity of essence, (2) a diversity of power, (3) a partial influx. But the three persons of the divinity have the same essence, and the same power of creating, and it is alien to the divine majesty to state that the persons of the Holy Trinity influence partially. For the Father created all things, the Son all things, the Holy Spirit all things. Just as the divine essence is one and indivisible, so the act of creating is one and indivisible (*).

You say: If God the Father, as such, the Son of God, as such, the Holy Spirit, as such, created the world, it follows that there are three associate causes of creation. The antecedent is true. Therefore, so is the consequent. The consequence of the major premise is proven; because, if the Father in contradistinction to the Son is the creator, He will certainly be the principle and formal cause of creation, and so also must be judged concerning the Son of God and the Holy Spirit. But the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, as they are formally taken, are not one thing, but are three, namely three causes of (*) Associate causes are said to be cooperating, each of which contributes something to completing the work, none completes it entirely. And insofar as one of them supplements the defect of powers in another, it is called an auxiliary cause. But the three most holy persons are entirely equal among themselves: Therefore, all three demonstrated their equal and completely infinite power in making the world. Therefore, they are not to be thought of as associate causes. The clearest statement exists in Isaiah 44:24, where that אני לבדי (I alone) confirms this sufficiently.

creation not subordinate; because thus God the Son and the Holy Spirit would be instrumental causes; Therefore, they are coordinate, or associate. Resp. I deny the consequence of the major premise. For although there are three distinct persons, they nevertheless influence the work of creation by one power. If they influenced by different powers of operating, they would be associate causes.

Question VIII. Can the power of creating also be communicated to a creature?

The power of creating is incommunicable to a creature, subsisting per se and ultimately.

Proof. For creation, infinite power is required, proper to God alone. Therefore, Jehovah your redeemer and your former from the womb said: "I am Jehovah, who makes all things, who stretches out the heavens alone, who spreads out the earth by myself." Cf. Job 9:8.

The antithesis is of the old and recent Scholastics, who maintain that the power of creating could have been communicated to a creature, if not as a principal cause, then as an instrumental cause; whose arguments are:

I. Whatever can regenerate, the same can create. But a certain creature can regenerate. Therefore. The major is proven; because it is of as great power to regenerate as it is to create. Indeed, scripture itself has designated regeneration and renewal by the name of creation, Psalm 51:12; 2 Corinthians 5:17. The minor is proven; because water in baptism, and the minister of the church baptizing, concur instrumentally in regeneration. Resp. Creation is of substances; regeneration and renewal are of accidents. Therefore, although an intermediate cause may be used by the first cause to produce an accident; since the effect is not absolutely nobler than the intermediate cause; yet in creation an instrument cannot be used by virtue of that proportion; because that effect far exceeds the power of the intermediate cause.

II. Whatever can be an instrument of a miraculous operation, that also can be an instrument of creation. But a creature, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because an equally infinite power is required to produce a miraculous effect as to perform creation. Resp. The reason for creation and for miraculous production is different. The former presupposes either no subject, or certainly an unsuitable one. The latter does not occur, except in an order already established, and consequently presupposes a subject, around which the miraculous operation happens. Therefore, creation exceeds miraculous operation, so that from the latter it cannot be concluded that a creature can be so elevated as to be an instrument of creation.

III. He who can annihilate can also create. Nature can annihilate. Therefore. The major is established; because creation proceeds from non-being to being, annihilation from being to non-being. On both sides, the distance is infinite. The minor is proven; because through nature not only the bodies of animals and plants, but also their forms or souls, are finally annihilated. Resp. 1) To the major: It is easier to destroy what is perfect than to construct what is not yet perfect. 2) To the minor: Through nature, the bodies of animals are not annihilated, but are resolved into atoms, or particles, of which they consist; But how their forms perish, or are annihilated, is scarcely demonstrable or explicable.

IV. The creative power was communicated to the human nature of Christ, Matthew 28:18. Therefore, the creative power is communicable to a creature. Resp. Distinguish between a mere creature, ultimately subsisting by itself, and a creature that is indeed real, but assumed into the hypostasis of the Word. To this, all power, and therefore also the power of creating, κατὰ συνδύασιν (kata syndyasin), on account of the grace of the personal union, has been communicated; but to a mere creature, κατὰ μετέκβασιν (kata metekbasin), according to an external egress, it is incommunicable.

Question IX. Was the world, and all that is in it, created from nothing, or from pre-existing matter?

The matter of creation. The world, and all that is in it, were created partly from nothing, partly from unsuitable matter. Angels, the soul of Adam, the heaven, and the elements were created from nothing (a). The remaining bodies were produced from unsuitable and unformed matter, from which the work to be produced would not have emerged, without the action of omnipotent power (b).

Obs. Distinguish between the first creation, or immediate, which is from absolute nothing, and this has no pre-existing matter; and the second creation, or mediate, which is from pre-existing matter indeed, but unfit and unsuitable, in which only an obediential potency is given in order to the first cause, acting with infinite power. The works of the first day were created from purely negative nothing; the works of the remaining days (except the human soul) were produced from the works of the first day, but unformed and undigested. These too can, in a certain respect, be said to have been created from nothing, partly mediately, because they owe their origin to matter produced from nothing; partly because unformed matter, with respect to the works which emerged from it, is considered as nothing.

Proof a. 1) Because Moses in the historical description of creation makes no mention of matter, but simply says: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Genesis 1:1. 2) God, about to create, called (or commanded to be present) all τὰ μὴ ὄντα (the things that are not), which in no way were, ὡς ὄντα (as being), as if they really existed, (so that, that is, through creation they would really exist). Romans 4:17. 3) "By faith we understand that the ages were framed by the word of God, so that from things not appearing those which are seen were made," Hebrews 11:3. Where by τὰ μὴ φαινόμενα (the things not appearing), the apostle indicates τὰ μὴ ὄντα (the things that are not), just as in 2 Maccabees 7:28, God is said to have made heaven and earth ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων (ex ouk onton), from non-existent things. 4) In the interval of six days God created the heaven and the earth, the sea and all that is in them, Exodus 20:11. From which we conclude: Whatever matter truly exists, it was created within the first six days. What matter is said to pre-exist creation was not created within the first six days. Therefore, the matter pre-existing creation does not truly exist.

Proof b. The rough and undigested mass created on the first day is called תהו ובהו (tohu va'vohu), void and empty, and so unformed that by the power of no secondary causes could plants and animals have come forth from it. Therefore, with respect to these, it is considered as nothing.

The antithesis is of the Materialists (who are also called Hermogenians), who posited a matter co-eternal with God, to whom some of the Socinians accede, whose arguments are:

I. From nothing, nothing is made. Therefore, from nothing, nothing is created.

Resp. From nothing, nothing is generated by the powers of nature; But by the infinite power of God, the world, and all that is in it, were created from nothing, either immediately or mediately.

II. Whichever action is the noblest, that is not the production of a thing from nothing. Creation is the noblest action. Therefore. The major is proven; because that action which tends from good to good, from being to being, is far nobler than that which tends from non-being to being, from non-good to good. Resp. I deny the consequence of the major. To the proof, we say that the nobility of an action is to be estimated not from the term from which, but from the term to which. Therefore, creation is far nobler than the other species of production, precisely because it is a production from non-being to that infinitely distant term of being.

III. If creation is production from nothing, then either there will be something intermediate between the creator and the creature, or it will be either the creator himself or the creature. If it is something intermediate, there will be an intermediate between immediately opposite terms. If it is the creator, it will be eternal. If it is the creature, it has been produced by another creation; because every creature is such by creation. About that creation I ask again: Whether it is a created or an uncreated being: And so the process goes on to infinity. Resp. This argument presupposes that creation is a being properly so called; whereas it is only a mode of an infinite being, or of the creator. Being, strictly speaking, is divided into creator and creature; but the modes of beings are not divided in the same way.

IV. The production of a thing, which is from nothing, is creation. The production of intelligible species is from nothing. Therefore, the production of intelligible species is creation. The minor is clear; because intelligible species are immaterial, and therefore their production is not from matter, but from nothing. Resp. Creation is from nothing, i.e., without matter, both entering and pre-existing. Intelligible species are produced indeed without entering matter, but they have a natural dependence on pre-existing matter.

V. Every creature is made from nothing. Man is not, etc. Therefore. Resp. Every creature is made from nothing either mediately or immediately. Man is mediately created from nothing; because he derives his origin from matter created from nothing.

Question X. Is creation from nothing knowable from the light of nature?

Creation from nothing, taken generally and abstractly, is known not only from the light of revelation, but also from the light of nature (a). But specifically, considered according to order and mode, it can only be known from the light of revelation (b).

Proof a. 1) Reason collects: The world was created either from nothing, or from pre-existing matter. If from nothing, I have my point. If from pre-existing matter, that pre-existing matter is either created or uncreated. If it is created, the same question returns: if uncreated, it will be eternal, and therefore either God Himself, or co-eternal with God. But two eternal, infinite, and independent principles cannot exist at the same time. 2) The clear sayings of scripture testify that the creation of the world is knowable by nature. Romans 1:20; Acts 14:17; Job 12:7; Isaiah 40:26.

Proof b. From Hebrews 11:3. Πίστει νοοῦμεν κατηρτίσθαι τοὺς αἰῶνας ῥήματι Θεοῦ. "By faith we understand that the ages were framed by the word of God." Two things you should observe here: 1) that the word κατηρτίσθαι (katērtisthai) signifies to fit, to frame, to arrange, so that the same harmonious order of creation is indicated. 2) That ῥῆμα Θεοῦ (rhēma Theou) denotes the word of command; by which the ὑποστατικός (hypostatic) λόγος (logos) is not excluded, because God said: "Let there be light." He said it by commanding not without the word, but through the hypostatic word, through which all things were made. John 1:3. We argue: Whoever knows the order of creation, made by the word of divine command, only by faith, he does not know the same by natural knowledge. But the illuminated man, etc. Therefore.

The antithesis is of certain Scholastics, who maintain that creation is a pure article of faith; whose arguments are:

1. The doctrine of creation is included in the Apostles' Creed. Therefore, it is a pure article of faith. Resp. The doctrine of creation is a mixed article of faith, which, insofar as it is known from the light of revelation, is believed; insofar as it is known from the light of reason, it is known evidently.

II. Paul testifies, Hebrews 11:3, that by faith we understand that the ages were framed. Resp. The apostle speaks of creation considered not generally, but specifically according to its mode and order. That, not how, the world was created from nothing, reason knows.

III. Reason dictates that from nothing, nothing is made. Therefore, it is ignorant of creation. Resp. Reason dictates that by the powers of nature, from nothing, nothing is made; yet it acknowledges the omnipotence of God, with whom is the power of creating this universe from nothing.

Question XI. Did God create this visible world from His own essence?

God did not create this visible world from His own essence, nor did He, as it were, diffuse it into parts, so that each creature could be called a particle of the deity.

Proof I. Because creation formally denotes not production from the substance of God, but from nothing, Genesis 1:1; Romans 4:17.

II. God is a spirit, John 4:24. Therefore, the essence of God cannot be diffused into parts.

III. Creatures are changed and perish daily; but God is immutable, Malachi 3:6. IV. It is blasphemous to say that the devil and sinful men are parts of the divine essence.

Question XII. What is the form of creation?

The form of creation The form of creation, generally considered, consists in this, that creation is an action not ad intra, but ad extra; not necessary, but free; not successive, but, with respect to the individual created beings, instantaneous (a). Specifically considered, it is completed in three stages. I. The production of an unformed mass from purely negative nothing. II. The distinction and arrangement of those things which were created from no pre-existing matter. III. The adornment and consummation of this universe (b).

Proof a. Creation is a divine action ad extra, because it terminates not in God, but in creatures, which did not emanate from the very essence of God, but were made by speaking, or by commanding, when God, by the command of His will, directed by the practical knowledge of His intellect, applied His effective power to creating. Then, creation is a free divine action, because God created this universe, not led by necessity, as if He needed the service of creatures, since He is αὐταρκέστατος (most self-sufficient); but freely, so that He could create and not create, sooner or later, in this or another way, create. Finally, creation, with respect to the individual created beings, is an instantaneous divine action; for God did not create individual things by motion or laborious effort, but when He said: "let there be light," it was suddenly made. The same judgment should be formed about the effecting of the other works. Although, if the created beings are considered collectively, creation was completed in six νυχθήμερα (night-days); not because God spent those entire six days in creation, but because at moments of individual days He created something.

Proof b. On the first day of creation, God Almighty created a rough and indistinct mass of heaven, earth, and water, and on that same first day He divided the light from the darkness, on the second the lower waters from the upper, by interposing the firmament; on the third day, He prepared the earth, separated from the waters, with grass, herbs, and trees; on the fourth day, He furnished the heaven with luminaries, on the fifth the water with fish, the air with birds, on the sixth the earth with animals, and finally with man, the prince of all living things, He adorned and filled it. The order observed by the most wise creator was most accurate. For He first created inanimate and simple bodies, then mixed, living, then sensitive, and finally the intelligent animal, man.

The antithesis is of Philo, Procopius, Cajetan, and others, who think that God created all things simultaneously and in one moment, and not in the interval of six days; who rely on the following arguments:

I. Moses writes in Genesis 2:4. "These are the generations of the heavens and the earth, when they were created in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens, and every plant of the field." If the heaven, and the earth, and the plant of the field were created on the same day, they were certainly not made within a six-day period. Resp. "Day" in a general sense not rarely signifies "time"; but that "time" comprises several days.

II. Sirach chapter 18:1 says: "He who lives forever, created all things together." Resp. 1) God created all things together at the same common time, in an uninterrupted series of creation, although not at the same singular moment of time; just as a whole fleet is said to have set sail from the port together, although one ship set sail before and another after, provided that no long interval intervened. 2) In the Greek text is the adverb, κοινῇ (koinē), which signifies "commonly," and therefore does not precisely denote συγχρονίαν (synchronian), a community of time, but συλλογὴν (syllogēn), or a community of origin and dependence; because this is common to all creatures, that they depend on God for their being and existence, and nothing exists outside of God that was not created by God.

III. God is omnipotent, not effecting anything with slow effort. Therefore, no cause can be imagined why He progressed at such a slow pace in creating. Resp. Because God is omnipotent, He could have produced this universe in an instant, and He could also have produced it in the interval of six days. That He did not produce it in one instant is to be attributed to His free will. However, the reasons for the creation being protracted over six days are given by authors as follows.

1) It so pleased divine wisdom, both that it might be more evident that the world is not from eternity, and that we might meditate more distinctly and attentively on the individual works of God; and indeed that we might from time to time consider with ourselves the triple state of the created world, namely the state of creation from nothing, of distinction, and of adornment. 2) The creator wished by this example to admonish us of what the beginnings of divine works are generally like, that He first lays some small rudiment, then gradually bestows increments, until He brings the thing to perfection. 3) In the opinion of Ambrose, God wished us to be imitators of Himself, that we should first make some things, then beautify them, lest, while we attempt both at once, we should be able to accomplish neither. 4) God wished to teach that six days are assigned to labors, but the seventh is to be spent in divine praises, and in memory of divine benefits, especially of creation. 5) Finally, there are some who think that the world was created by God in the space of six days because it was to last for six thousand years; which matter, however, is uncertain (*).

(*) Although to this question; why was the entire universe's creation completed in the interval of six days? it might be enough to have answered: Who has known the mind of the Lord? Who has been his counselor? Nevertheless, the inquiry and investigation of the true

Question XIII. Could the world have been created from eternity?

The world could not have been created from eternity.

Proof I. Whatever cannot be made without a beginning of being, that cannot be created from eternity. But the world, etc. Therefore. The major is established; because whatever has a beginning of being is not eternal. The minor is proven; because, when a creature is made, it begins to be; for it has being after non-being, and therefore a beginning of being.

II. Eternity is an attribute of God alone; from which He is called the God of eternity, Genesis 21:33. The eternal God, Romans 16:26. The incorruptible King of ages, 1 Timothy 1:17.

III. Everything eternal is infinite and without end. But the world is not infinite or without end. Therefore, the world is not eternal. The major is clear; because eternity is an infinite and endless duration. The minor is clear; because the world is a composite of many bodies. But no body, since it has a determinate quantity, can be infinite.

IV. Just as something cannot be reduced to nothing and remain eternal; so something cannot be created from nothing and be from eternity. For the reason is parallel on both sides.

The antithesis is of certain Scholastics and Papists, who maintain that the world could have been created from eternity; whose arguments are:

I. Whatever does not involve a contradiction, that can be done by God. But the eternal creation of the world, etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because creation from eternity, neither on the part of the creator, nor on the part of the creature, involves a contradiction. Not on the part of the creator; because He is omnipotent and eternal, and therefore could have created from eternity. Not on the part of the creature; because just as we rightly conclude; God could have made the world from eternity; so also we rightly conclude; God could have willed the world to be made from eternity, and consequently the world could have been made from eternity. Resp. 1) A manifest contradiction is involved on the part of the creature; which, as it is in no way capable of infinity, so it is not capable of eternity; since eternity is infinite duration. Athanasius says wisely in his second oration against the Arians: "Although it was possible for God to make works from eternity, yet those things which were made could not have been from eternity; since they emerged from non-beings, and were not before they were made. But those which were not before they were made, how could they coexist with God who always exists?"

Instance 1: Neither on the part of the creating God, nor on the part of the thing which is produced, does a contradiction seem to be involved, if the eternal creation of the world is posited. Not on the part of the creating God; because the power of God to create is no less than the power of the sun to illuminate; but this, if it were eternal, could illuminate from eternity. Therefore, God, who is truly eternal, can create the world from eternity. Nor on the part of the reason is praiseworthy, and indeed of that which God himself has revealed. Namely, the Creator of this universe, in constituting the whole nature of things, acted in a twofold manner, first by effecting its powers, then by completely perfecting them. God instilled in the first matter, as soon as it existed, certain powers, suitable to it, through the first motion, impressed by the divine Spirit, Genesis 1:2. These powers, therefore, were continuously effective, as is clearly signified by these words: תוצא הארץ ... ישרצו המים ... תדשא הארץ (Let the earth bring forth... Let the waters teem... Let the earth bring forth...). But they were not sufficient for the complete constitution of all things, especially of living things. Therefore it is added: ויברא אלהים (And God created) and ויאמר אלהים (And God said...). For this reason also God is said, after the lucid particles had begun to be separated from others, and to be joined among themselves, by the power of motion excited in nature, to have himself distinguished the light from the darkness, giving a name to each. For as a name is a sign by which we distinguish a certain thing from others; so the perfect constitution of a thing, which entirely pertains to its distinction, is signified by that improper expression; God named. Therefore, that which the powers of nature were already capable of, for separating and gathering the different parts of various bodies by a most vehement motion from others, was accomplished in a certain space of days and hours. But as for the perfect nature and constitution of distinct things, which they have called form, God himself perfected this on individual days in one moment.

thing which is produced; for the Son is generated from the Father from eternity, and exists co-eternal with Him. Resp. The examples adduced are irrelevant. For 1) the creation of the world was made from nothing: the Son of God emanates from the essence of the Father, rays from the essence of the sun. 2) Creation is a free and voluntary action: The generation of the Son of God, and the illumination of the sun, are necessary acts. For ὁ λόγος (the Logos), or the hypostatic word of God, is the Son of God τῇ φύσει (by nature), not τῇ θελήσει (by will), as Basil the Great says in Book IV against Eunomius, cited by D. Calov. vol. III, p. 595. And the sun, by the necessity of nature, pours forth rays from itself.

II. If the world is not eternal, God, by creating the world, became mutable. But God, by creating the world, did not become mutable. Therefore, the world is eternal. The consequence of the major is clear; for God became a creator from being a non-creator. R. Distinguish between divine actions ad intra and ad extra. Creation is a divine action ad extra. But divine actions ad extra terminate in creatures, not in the creator. Hence it is that creation denominates God not intrinsically, but extrinsically; which extrinsic denomination does not effect a change.

III. If the motion of the sun is eternal, the sun itself, together with the heaven in which it moves, is eternal. But the antecedent is true. Therefore, so is the consequent. The consequence of the major is clear; because the motion of the sun is its affection; but such as are the affections of any being, such is the being itself. The antecedent is clear; because the motion of the sun is in a perpetual flux, nor can there be a first motion; for even that would be from a prior motion, and therefore not the first. Resp. The first motion can be from an action which occurs without motion. God created the world, yet He Himself was not moved.

IV. Every being, good from eternity, is from eternity communicative of itself. But God, etc. Therefore. Resp. Distinguish between necessary and free communication. God communicates His goodness to creatures freely, when and where He wills.

V. God could have created the world a hundred thousand years ago, and again a hundred times a hundred thousand. Therefore, from eternity. Resp. The question is not whether God could have created the world earlier, but whether He could have created it infinitely earlier. The latter we deny.

VI. Whatever was not created in time, that was created from eternity. But the world, etc. Therefore. The minor is clear; because there was no time when the world was being created. Resp. The world was created in time not pre-existing, but co-existing. (*)

Question XIV. What is the purpose of creation?

The purpose of creation. The ultimate purpose of creation is the glory of the divine goodness, power, and wisdom, to be acknowledged and proclaimed by creatures a). The intermediate purpose is the utility of men b).

Proof a. From Psalm XIX, 2, The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament proclaims the work of his hands. Obs. 1. That the royal psalmist is chiefly dealing with the heaven of grace and the preaching of the gospel, as Paul testifies in Romans X, 18; yet he has taken the entire mode of speaking from the book of nature, by a tropical change, so that the preaching of the gospel and the preaching of nature may be compared with each other, and one may illustrate the other. Therefore, King David lays down and supposes in this psalm the truth of natural knowledge, just as every trope supposes a proper meaning and the truth of the thing from which the transfer is made. Therefore, the heavens declare the glory of God, not effectively, or by the proclamation of an articulate voice, but objectively, or by presenting the material and argument for acknowledging and proclaiming the majesty of God; for this reason, that they so present and offer themselves to human minds that they perpetually impress upon them that they are the theater of divine glory, or a most lucid mirror, from which the glory of divine goodness, which He communicated to creatures, of power, which He exercised in producing all things from nothing, of wisdom, by which He most artfully disposed all things in this universe, shines forth most clearly. Furthermore, the heavens declare the glory of God not exclusively, as if the other creatures were excluded; but the sacred psalmist implies that all creatures praise their creator. For whatever is the reason why the heavens should praise God, that is also the reason why the other creatures should celebrate the divine praises.

(*) Not in time, but with time the world came into existence, or rather, if we wish to speak accurately, time came into existence with the world. For what is time? Surely nothing else than the true determination of finite things, with respect to duration, through the continual succession of moments. Therefore, time is properly an adjunct, or accident, and indeed inseparable, of finite things, and therefore of the universe itself, since a determinate succession cannot by the very nature of finite things, insofar as they are finite, be separated from them. But every accident, or adjunct, cannot exist without a subject, nor can it exist prior to it. Hence it is manifestly contradictory if anyone should say that time existed before the world existed. For it would be equally absurd as if someone were to say that an adjunct or accident existed without a subject, or existed before that subject.

Proof b. Since God granted man dominion over sublunary creatures in Genesis I, 26, He indicated that they were created for man's utility. For dominion, granted to man by the creator over creatures, cannot be conceived as a simple power, but under the aspect of use, for which the creature is bound to serve man, by virtue of its subjection.

You say: I. Man does not have dominion over the heaven and the stars. Therefore, not all things were created for man. Resp. Man does not have direct dominion over the heaven and the stars; yet he obtains an indirect dominion over them; insofar as he converts their influence to his own utility.

You say: II. But dominion over creatures was lost through the fall. Resp. Full, pleasant, and easy dominion was lost through the fall; yet after the fall, remnants and vestiges of that dominion remained, to be exercised not without trouble and difficulty.

Question XV. What is the effect of creation?

The effect of creation is substance, both visible and invisible.

Proof I. Because accidents, which are the beings of a being, are said not so much to be created as to be co-created.

II. Just as generation is terminated at the production of a substance, so also creation, as the noblest action, ought to have the noblest term. That substance is nobler than accident, no one is unaware; but accident was co-created with substance. A certain succession of finite things, and therefore of the entire universe, as something adjoined, or an accident, and indeed an inseparable one, since a determined succession cannot be separated from the very nature of finite things, insofar as they are finite. But every accident, or adjunct, cannot exist without a subject, nor be prior to it. Therefore, it is a manifest contradiction if anyone should say that time existed before the world came into being. That would be as absurd as if someone dared to say that an adjunct existed either without a subject, or before it.

ON THE WORKS OF THE SIX DAYS

Question XVI. What are the works of the first day?

The works of the first day of creation are: (a) the undigested and unformed substance of heaven, earth, and water; (b) the πρωτόκτιστος (protoktistos), or primeval, light. (c) The angels are probably to be numbered among the works of the first day. Works of the first day.

Proof a. Moses writes distinctly in Genesis I, 1, In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. Obs. There are those who persuade themselves that the first verse επιτομικῶς (epitomically) comprehends the sum of the whole history of creation. On the contrary, there are those who maintain that Moses, by the name of heaven and earth, indicates the raw material of the future work. The latter opinion is approved by us. 1) Because when the heaven and earth were being founded, there was no distinction of day and night, no distinction of darkness and light, which was only added later, v. 3. 2) Because when the first light was created, there was not yet a distinction of the expanse and the waters, which indeed happened on the second day of creation, v. 6. 3) Nor was there a distinction of the earth and the waters, which only followed on the third day, v. 9. 4) Because before the incubation of the Holy Spirit upon the face of the waters, the earth was waste and empty; by which words a horrible vastness and confusion is signified. Therefore, by the LXX interpreters, the Hebrew words: תהו ובהו (tohu va'vohu) are rendered in Greek: Ἡ δὲ γῆ ἦν ἀόρατος καὶ ἀκατασκεύαστος (But the earth was invisible and unformed), that is, the earth was invisible (because covered by waters) and indisposed. Cf. Deut. XXXII, 10. Job. XII, 24. Is. XXXIV, 11. Jer. IV, 23. 5) The author of the book of Wisdom addresses God in the following words, ch. XI, 17. Your hand created the world from unformed matter. Although this book is not in the canon, it nevertheless testifies that the Israelites of old believed that God first created a certain undigested mass lacking complete form, from which the other infinite bodies were created by the power of God.

Proof b. Gen. I, 3. And God said: Let there be light! and there was light. By light we understand a most brilliant, and that a fiery substance, mobile around the undigested mass, which by its approach brought day, and by its withdrawal, night, within the space of 24 hours. That the primeval light was a substance is gathered 1) from the fact that it was created by a special action; but the term of creation is a substance. 2) Because mobility, which belonged to it, is an affection of corporeal substances. But that that πρωτόκτιστος (protoktistos) light was a fiery substance is clear from this, that all the properties of fire were suited to it; for it performed the functions of the sun, and by the will of God it migrated into its substance. But that the sun is fiery, and formally hot, we shall prove below.

Proof c. From a comparison of Gen. I, 1, where it is said that God in the beginning created the heaven and the earth, with Job. XXXVIII, 4, 7. Where were you, when I laid the foundations of the earth? When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy? The speech in Job is about the stars, which are the sons of God. Therefore, he does not mean the stars of the sky; since these are never called sons of God in scripture, nor does any excellent inanimate creature bear this name. Rather, Job indicates the angels, whom he distinguished by the same name in ch. 1, 6. We observe here 1) that the angels were created before men. For Jehovah says: Where were you, when the morning stars sang together etc. Job could have excepted: "Although I was not yet then, my first father, Adam, was." God anticipates this objection: Where were you, when I laid the foundations of the earth? when the morning stars sang together? But when the earth was founded, Adam was not yet created. We note 2) that the angels were created on the first day of creation; because they are not only called morning stars, but are also said to have sung the praises of God, when the earth was founded by Him. But the earth was founded on the first day of creation. The words of D. CALOVIUS in vol. III of his system, p. 905, are most worthy of note. The angels are stated to have been created not before the beginning of creation, but in the beginning itself, yet ὥς ἐν πλάτει (as in breadth) with some latitude, so that although in that first beginning invisible and immaterial creatures were first created, yet in that beginning heaven and earth are rightly said to have been created; because in that very beginning God also created heaven and earth. For if these are said to have been created even in the second moment of that beginning, the creation of the angels will still be prior.

The Antithesis is 1) of the Pontificians, denying that God first created an undigested mass of heaven, earth, and water. 2) of the Socinians and Arminians, asserting that the angels existed for many ages before the origin of corporeal things.

Against the undigested mass of heaven and earth, they argue: I. Whoever historically commemorates that in the beginning heaven and earth were created, does not mean a raw and undigested mass, but heaven and earth properly so called. But Moses historically commemorates etc. Therefore. The major is established; because in history one must not depart from the clear letter. The minor is evident from Gen. I, 1. Resp. I deny the major. For the undigested mass of heaven and earth is true heaven and earth, with respect to substance, although a certain accidental difference obtains with respect to a distinct state and completion. Nor do we understand a metaphorical heaven or earth.

Instance I. The emphatic Hebrew he indicates this heaven, this earth, such as it is now, is to be understood as distinct or adorned. Resp. 1) The demonstrative he is sometimes taken indefinitely, Deut. VIII, 3. Levit. XVIII, 5. 2) That earth, which is called תוהו ובהו (tohu va'vohu), has he prefixed, and yet the earth is not understood to be fully trodden by feet.

Instance II. An unformed heaven and earth is not a true heaven or a true earth, because it lacks the form through which heaven and earth is what it is. Resp. I distinguish between substantial form and accidental form. Heaven and earth, as originally created, did not lack a substantial and internal form; but they did lack an accidental and external form; since the distinction and adornment of heaven, earth, and water was added on the following days.

II. Whoever created all things in a most orderly way did not create a confused chaos. But God etc. Therefore. The minor is proven; because God is the author not of confusion, but of order, and the first and noblest action of God Almighty ad extra is undoubtedly most orderly. From which the author of Wisdom says in chapter XI, 22: God created all things in number, weight, and measure. Resp. 1) Whatever the poets have dreamed about a confused chaos, we do not make our own, but with the Blessed LUTHER we assert that God in the beginning of his works created a raw and undigested mass of heaven, earth, and water, in which we acknowledge the true substance of heaven, earth, and water, but unadorned and unpolished. 2) I deny the major. Because this order is most fitting, when progress is made from non-being to being, from imperfect to perfect, from unpolished to polished and adorned. Therefore, creation is not to be called confused, although some work at the beginning of creation was undigested, to be more and more digested and distinguished on the following days. 3) All things are said to be created in number, weight, and measure, insofar as they are in a complete state of being, not insofar as they were created indistinctly on the first day without adornment.

III. If chaos was created on the first day, nowhere in the history of creation is there mention of the creation of heaven and earth. The consequent is absurd. Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. I deny the consequent of the major. For there is mention of the creation of heaven and earth, insofar as heaven and earth are commemorated as created indistinctly on the first day, but heaven was made distinctly on the second, and the earth on the third day and adorned.

Against the fiery substance of the primeval light they argue:

I. Whatever penetrates a body is not a corporeal substance. But the primeval light etc. Therefore. The minor is proven because all light, and therefore also primeval light, has the power of penetrating glass, crystal, etc. Resp. I distinguish between true and apparent penetration. A luminous substance insinuates itself into the pores of glass as the air yields, and so, strictly speaking, it does not penetrate the glass. Nor is that apparent penetration to be denied to fire, although it is a corporeal substance.

II. No substance is immediately sensible. The primeval light was immediately sensible. Therefore, the primeval light was not a substance. The major is evident; because the immediate object of the senses are sensible species, which are qualities. Resp. In the major, light is taken abstractly, in the minor, concretely. For by primeval light in philosophical precision is not to be understood an intentional species, or an accident, which cannot be the term of creation, but a luminous substance, which is sensed by means of light.

III. That light in Gen. I, 2 is understood, which coincides with day. But fire does not coincide with day. Therefore, that light was not fire. The major is established; because God called that light day, and the darkness night, Gen. I, 5. The minor is proven because no one ever said that day is fire or a substance, since it is a mere quantity. Resp. 1) The primeval light is called day causally, because by its motion it distinguished day and night, not formally. 2) Day, since it is a quantity, cannot formally be light.

IV. If the primeval light was fire, it was either elemental or culinary fire. But it was not elemental fire, because that does not shine; nor culinary, because that is not sufficient to illuminate the whole world. Therefore, it was not fire at all. Resp. The primeval light was a fiery substance collected like a flame, and thus luminous. But whether it was similar to elemental or culinary fire is not worth anxious investigation. For there is a fire that is neither culinary nor merely elemental, namely celestial fire, such as is in the sun.

Instance: Not all light is fiery. Resp. All light partakes of fire to some extent, although, the rarer and more dispersed it is, the less it heats. Just as vapor is rarefied water, which moistens little or nothing, on account of its rarity; so light is sometimes like a rarefied flame, which heats little on account of its rarity; but it heats the more, the more it has been collected. Cf. D. IO. ADAMI OSIANDRI in colleg. system. part. II. p. 88.

Question XVII. Was the empyrean heaven created by God on the first day?

It cannot be clearly demonstrated from the scriptures that, at the beginning of the world's creation, any heaven was divinely established above the firmament for the purpose of being the palace of God, the dwelling of angels, and of blessed souls, which should be called empyrean or empyræan.

Proof I. Because Moses's purpose was to set forth the origin and seat of visible creatures. If he had intended to describe the dwelling of invisible creatures, or angels, he would certainly have made mention of angels in the history of creation. But he did not expressly commemorate them; therefore, neither did he express their dwelling (*).<sup>90</sup>

II. The heaven of God cannot be created, because it is eternal. Rather, by the majestic heaven of God is to be understood the eternal and infinite majesty or glory, which God had in Himself from eternity, and will have for eternity, and the divine, celestial, omnipresent and omnipotent dominion over all things, Ps. II, 4. CII, 20. Appositely says TERTULLIAN against Praxeas: Before all things God was alone, to Himself both world and place.

III. The heaven of God and of the angels cannot be one ubi (where). For the ubi of angels is definitive, the ubi of God is replitive. That prodigal son in Luke XV, 18, says: Father, I have sinned against heaven, i.e., against the divine majesty; no one sins against the heaven of the angels.

IV. The heaven of the angels cannot be a determined place, established above the starry heaven; because otherwise the angels on earth, guarding the little ones, could not be in the heavens and see the face of God the Father διὰ παντός (dia pantos), or continuously, Matthew XVIII, 10.

V. The heaven described by Moses will be consumed by fire and will perish on the last day. 2 Peter III, 7. Luke XXI, 33. But the angelic heaven will not perish. Therefore, that one was not commemorated by Moses in Gen. I, 1.

VI. The heaven is barbarously called empyreum, or empyræum; because that which is fiery is not called in Greek ἐμπύρεον (empyreon) or ἐμπυραῖον (empyraion), but ἐμπυρον (empyron).

The Antithesis is of most of the Scholastics and Pontificians, who maintain that at the beginning of the world's creation an empyrean heaven was created by God, most ample, most luminous, established above this visible world. Their arguments are:

I. The aerial and starry heaven, created on the second day, is in the midst of the sub- and supracoelestial waters. The heaven created on the first day is not in the midst of the sub- and supracoelestial waters. Therefore, the heaven created on the first day is neither aerial nor starry, but far more sublime. Resp. The heaven of the first day differs from the heaven of the second day, not in substance, but in a more distinct state, and a more complete and polished external form.

II. Angels are either everywhere, or nowhere, or somewhere. They are not everywhere, because ubiquity belongs to God alone. Nor are they nowhere; because they truly exist. Therefore, they are somewhere. If angels are somewhere, their ubi is either created or uncreated. Not uncreated; which belongs to God alone. Therefore created, namely on the first day of creation, on which the angels themselves were created. But the angelic ubi, created on the first day, is the empyrean heaven. Resp. Real being, properly speaking, is divided into created and uncreated. The ubi is not so much a being as a mode of being. But if a definitive ubi is said to be co-created for the angels, it cannot yet be clearly demonstrated that it was expressed by Moses in Gen. I, 1. For just as Moses does not expressly mention the angels, so neither does he mention the angelic heaven.

(*) Moses wished to commemorate the origin and creation of all things, and not only of those which fall under our sight, just as John interprets τὰ πάντα (all things) in the beginning, John I, 1 & 3, Apocalypse IV, 11; indeed, Paul also expressly divides τὰ πάντα (all things) into τὰ ὄρατα, καὶ τὰ ἀόρατα (the visible and the invisible), and by the name τῶν πάντων (of all things) he himself embraces the universe, which is contained in the heavens and the earth, Col. I, 16, manifestly referring to the words of Moses, Genesis II, 1. Nor is there any doubt that the angels, as elsewhere in the sacred writings, so also in that place, are referred to the hosts of the heavens. But in the history of creation itself, Moses seems to have passed over the angels in silence with a most wise counsel, lest he should give anyone the slightest occasion for this suspicion, however false and absurd, that God in chapter I, 26 took counsel with the angels, and that those spirits are signified by the plural number, since in the preceding parts absolutely no mention had been made of any intelligent subject besides God. For the rest, that argument is certainly valid: If Moses did not even commemorate the angels themselves, much less is it to be thought that the dwelling prepared for them was indicated by the sacred writer. And this sacred expression, to be in the heavens, denotes not so much a place as a state, namely the highest dignity and perfect blessedness.

III. There is a third heaven in 2 Cor. XII, 2. Therefore, there is an empyrean heaven. The reason for the consequence is; because just as the aerial heaven is the lowest, the ethereal the middle, so the empyrean heaven is the third and most sublime. Resp. Following the lead of scripture, heaven is divided into the heaven of nature, of grace, and of glory, not by reason of site or place, but by reason of state. Hence it is that angels on earth are in heaven, because they carry their heaven, or their blessedness, with them everywhere; but a local heaven does not belong to them, because they are not in a place, but in a definitive ubi. We add no more; because it is not for our frailty to discuss the secrets of the heavens, as AUGUSTINE judges in de fid. & symbol. chap. 17.

Question XVIII. What are the works of the second day?

The works of the second day of creation are both the firmament and the distinction of the upper and lower waters. The Hebrew רקיע (raqia) is more correctly rendered in Latin by expansum (expanse) than by firmamentum (firmament) (b), and in the historical description of creation it denotes that continuous tract which consists of air and ether, and extends from the terrestrial globe up to the supracoelestial waters (c). Works of the second day.

Proof a. Gen. I, 6, 7, 8. Afterward God said: Let there be an expanse in the midst of the waters; and let it be dividing between waters and waters. And God made the expanse, and distinguished between the waters that were above the expanse; and it was so. And God called the expanse heaven.

Proof b. From the root רקע (raqa) which means, he expanded, or he stretched out, and in the scriptures it is used for the firmly expanded earth, Is. XLII, 5, for a plate of gold, silver, bronze, stretched out with a hammer. We expand something (1) by dilation; just as a mass of gold is expanded when stretched into the thinnest plates; (2) by rarefaction; just as water, boiling with fire applied, is extended into a larger mass; (3) by unfolding, when what was rolled up and folded is unrolled and unfolded, as is customary with curtains and draperies. Which things can be accommodated ἀναλογικῶς (analogically) to the creation of heaven; since God stretches out the heaven like a curtain, Ps. CIV, 2. He stretches out the heavens like something thin, and spreads them out like a tent to dwelt in, Is. XL, 22. For which reason the heaven created on the first day in a confused state was like a folded curtain, which on the second day was unfolded and expanded; whence it is called the expanse. See D. GERHARD. in disput. isagog. pag. 451. Although the name expanse prevails over firmament; yet heaven can also be distinguished by this name, both on account of its incorruptibility, by which, as a most simple body, it is subject to no corruption; and on account of its immobility, by which the whole never moves in an orbit (for the circular motion of heaven does not follow from the motion of the stars); and on account of its very great capacity, and in that fluidity its stable and firm roundness; and on account of the stupendous quantity of the stars, as if they were solid bodies, which move in the heavens. Cf. D. VAREN. in Gen. p. 48.

Proof c. (1) The word רקיע (raqia) is either used simply for the aerial heaven, or for the ethereal alone, or for both. Not for the aerial alone; because thus (a) that to which the meaning of רקיע (raqia) eminently belongs, namely the ethereal expanse, would be excluded; (b) that to which the denomination Schamaim excellently belongs would be excluded; (c) there would be no relation of this second day and v. 6, 7, 8 to the work of the fourth day and v. 15, 16, 17, since that starry firmament is altogether to be included, and indeed principally in that which was created on the second day. (2) Not for the ethereal alone; because thus the creation of the air, which is also a created expanse and is often expressed in the scriptures by the name Schamaim, would have been omitted, and only the ethereal heaven would distinguish between the waters and the waters, and it would begin below from the element of water, which is absurd. Therefore, it is used for both, and so whatever in the scriptures comes under the name of Rakia and created Schamaim, here it comes under that name, namely that whole expanse of air and ether, from the element of water and earth, up to the very last surface of heaven, reaching the supracoelestial waters. Compare D. VAREN. in Gen. p. 45. (3) Ether and air are of the same substance, and differ only in qualities, since both ether and air are a body not solid or thick, but thin, pervious, and fluid, to which the motion of the stars testifies. For the planets at one time ascend, at another descend. Which could hardly happen if the heaven were of a thick and hard substance. Therefore, both can be conveniently comprehended by the word רַקִּיעַ (raqia). See SPERLINGII instit. phys. p. 424.

The Antithesis is of the Scholastics and Pontificians, who maintain that ether is not homogeneous with air in matter, but solid and hard like crystal, and therefore does not constitute the same Rakia with ether. Their arguments are;

I. The creation of heaven is described on the first day of creation. Therefore, the expanse created on the second day is not ether, but air. Resp. Heaven, like a folded and indistinct curtain, was created on the first day; But unfolded and distinct, it was created on the second day, whence it is called the expanse. But just as the heaven of the first day denotes the raw substance of ether and air; so the expanse of the second day is both ethereal and aerial.

II. Air is nowhere in Holy Scripture called רַקִּיעַ (raqia). Therefore, the expanse of the second day is not ethereo-aerial. Resp. (1) Grant that by expanse in other places of scripture air is not denoted, yet it does not follow from this that in this place air cannot be understood by expanse; since the circumstances of the text openly prove this meaning by the very fact that what it denotes as heaven, it connotes as air, because ether and air do not differ, except by certain qualities, and that expanse is designated which distinguishes the upper waters from the lower. But not only ether, but also air, distinguishes the same waters. For just as ether on the side of the upper waters, so air on the side of the lower waters makes the same distinction. (2) In Gen. I, 20 it is expressly said that the birds fly upon the face of the expanse of the heavens. But birds do not fly above the aerial heaven. Therefore, in the cited place the aerial heaven is understood. You say: the particle עַל-פָּנָי (al-pene) signifies against, opposite, so that the sense is: The birds fly towards the firmament of heaven. Resp. That exposition is not solid. For the complete text is; and let birds fly above the earth, and upon the face of the expanse of the heavens. But just as a bird truly flies above the earth, not necessarily towards the earth; so it truly flies upon certain parts of the air. Add that in v. 2 the same phrase is used concerning the Spirit of God, when it is said that he moved upon the face of the abyss, where עַל-פָּנָי (al-pene) implies superiority, or presence upon the face of the abyss; so also the presence, or flight of birds, upon the face, not of the ethereal expanse (which is impossible), but of the aerial.

III. Air did not yet exist on the second day, but emerged only when the waters were separated from the dry land on the third day. Resp. On the day the expanse was produced, on the same day air was made, which already existed in its rudiments on the first day, signified by the name of heaven, and located between the upper and lower waters, together with the ether, in one indivisible action.

IV. That in which the host of the stars is placed, that is ether. In the expanse of the second day etc. Therefore. The major is clear; because the stars are not in the air, but in the ether. The minor is evident from Gen. I, 14, 15. Resp. I limit the major. That in which the host of the stars is placed, that is the ethereal heaven, to wit, with respect to that part in which the host of stars is, but there remains another part, namely the aerial, not occupied by the host of stars. Otherwise, one could argue by the same reasoning: That is true Germany, in which the Gauls have placed their army. But in lower Germany, the Gauls have not placed their army. Therefore, lower Germany is not true Germany.

Question XIX. What do you understand by the superior waters?

By the superior waters are understood not clouds (a), but supracoelestial waters, homogeneous with the inferior waters (b).

Proof a. (1) Clouds and rainwater did not yet exist on the second day: which is evident from Gen. II, 5, 6, where it is said that it had not yet rained when the grass germinated on the third day, and that only then did a vapor ascend from the earth. But when vapor does not ascend into the middle region of the air, there is not yet a cloud. (2) Clouds or rainwater are not above the Rakia, neither the ethereal, which is granted, nor the aerial, because they are in the aerial expanse, and therefore not above it; just as a man immersed in the sea is not said to be above it; nor can clouds be called superior waters, because they are not in the supreme region of the air. (3) The expanse interposed between the waters ought to set a boundary for both, and therefore be a certain mediator, or division, lest they should be confounded again, v. 6. But the air alone does not constantly mediate between the inferior waters and the rainwater or clouds; since not only is the air very often full of clouds and rainwater, but also the ascending vapors, resolved into droplets by the force of the sun, very frequently descend and are mixed with them. (4) The supracoelestial waters are fixed and perpetual, homogeneous with the subcelestial waters; But clouds are not fixed, nor perpetual in place. Hence it is that clouds in the nominative case are never called waters in the sacred code, as HOTTINGER observes, in his history of creation, p. 85.

Proof b. From Gen. I, 7. God made the expanse, and distinguished between the waters that were under the expanse, and between the waters that were above the expanse. From which we argue; Whatever in the first creation was located higher, with respect to the interposed Rakia, that was placed above the starry heaven. Water properly so called etc. Therefore. The major is evident; because Rakia denotes the whole tract consisting of air and ether. You say I. In the text it is not supra (above), but מֵעַל (me'al), from above, to indicate that in the upper part of the expanse there are waters from above, "es seyn Wasser von oben her" (it is water from above), which can be conveniently explained concerning clouds resolving themselves into rain, and dripping from above. Resp. The word מֵעַל (me'al) is translated supra (above) by PAGNINO, ARIAS MONTANO, and SEBASTIAN SCHMID, and ἐπάνω (epano) by the LXX. If therefore it meant from above, why was the error not caught by Arias Montano in Pagnino's version? Or why did Schmid not correct the error of Arias Montano? But that the prefix מ (me) before עַל (al) does not change the meaning of the word is indicated by the fact that it also occurs in the other word מִתַּחַת (mitachat) without changing the meaning. Therefore, as truly as those waters are under the expanse, notwithstanding the prefix מ (me); so truly, notwithstanding it, the superiority of the waters is noted by the Mosaic phrase. Even if מֵעַל (me'al) were to signify clouds from above; yet with respect to the whole expanse they cannot be said to be from above, since they are not elevated beyond three Batavian miles.

You say; II. Just as birds are said to fly upon the face of the expanse of the heavens, i.e., upon the air; so the waters are above the expanse, i.e., the air. Resp. Birds are said to fly upon the face, i.e., parts of the air; but the waters are said to be above the expanse, with respect to the waters below the expanse; whence those are above the whole expanse, because these are under the ethereo-aerial expanse. Indeed, if by Rakia, above which the superior waters are, the air were understood, the Rakia would be in the midst of the waters by its smallest part, and not in the midst of the waters by its largest part; namely the whole ethereal expanse, and the supreme region of the air; and thus it would not be dividing between the waters and the waters. (2) From the parallel place Ps. CXLVIII, 4 Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that are above the heavens. Where by the heavens of heavens is understood the highest heaven, above which the waters are said to be, which are indeed supracoelestial. Vain are those who wish these waters to be understood as clouds; since meteors, of which number clouds are, are listed by the royal psalmist in v. 8.

III. From the testimony of the ancient Jewish church, which is evident from the song of the youths, Dan. III, 60. Bless the Lord, all ye waters that are above the heaven. Although that song is ἀπόκρυφον (apocryphal), it testifies concerning the faith of the Jews, that the ancient Jews believed with us in supracoelestial waters.

The Antithesis is of certain Theologians and Philosophers, who deny the supracoelestial waters, and maintain that by the waters placed above the expanse, Moses understood clouds; whose arguments are:

I. Moses did not describe to a rude people invisible things, such as the supracoelestial waters are. Therefore, by the waters located above the expanse he understands clouds. Resp. 1) The ether itself is invisible, and yet it is described by Moses. 2) The supracoelestial waters, by reason of their native property, are visible, although due to distance they are not actually seen.

II. There cannot be a natural place for waters above the heaven; Therefore, there are no supracoelestial waters. The antecedent is evident; because water is a heavy element, naturally tending to the center of the world; it must therefore be established, if those waters are admitted, either that they are there violently, or supernaturally and miraculously; both of which are absurd. For God assigned to each creature a place in which it is naturally. Resp. BONAVENTURE aptly says; That space is natural which God assigned to each in the first creation. Therefore, the gravity of the waters is not to be regarded, but the will and dominion of the creator. In their natural place, elements are neither heavy nor light.

III. If supracoelestial waters had been created, they would be corruptible; since they would be diminished and corrupted by the solar rays. Resp. The solar rays are not projected above the firmament. Even if they were to reach there, they would not corrupt the supracoelestial waters, just as they do not exhaust the subcelestial waters. The most wise creator preserves them from corruption.

IV. If supracoelestial waters were established, there would be not two, but three types of water: 1. supracoelestial waters; 2. rainwater in clouds; 3. subcelestial waters flowing through the channels of the earth. Resp. 1) Rainwater in clouds is to be counted among the inferior, or subcelestial, waters; because they are not elevated beyond the highest mountains, and in comparison to the whole expanse they are like vapor, ascending from a boiling pot, which is rightly counted as subsisting water. 2) If clouds were the superior waters, there would certainly be three types of water; because often a thicker cloud in the lowest region of the air is below a more subtle one in the middle region of the air.

V. There is no use for the supracoelestial waters. Therefore, they do not exist. Resp. They contribute to the glory of God, and to the completion and ornament of this universe.

Question XX. What are the works of the third day?

The works of the third day are a) the gathering of the waters into a certain place. b) The segregation and drying of the earth. c) The procreation of plants. Works of the third day.

Proof a. Gen. I, 9. Afterward God said: Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place. Obs. (1) The gathering of the waters was made by the omnipotent word of God, by which the waters are still held, lest they overwhelm the earth. Job XXVIII, 8. 2) The waters were gathered into their own place, so that, although there are several collections, yet all water remains in a certain and predefined place.

Proof b. Gen. I, 9. God said: Let the dry land appear. The Earth was indeed created on the first day of creation, but was covered by waters. But when at the thunder of the divine voice: Let the waters be gathered, they fled with a precipitous fall to their predefined place, the dried earth appeared, to provide an origin for vegetables and a dwelling for living creatures.

Proof c. Gen. I, 11. Then God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed after its kind; and the tree yielding fruit after its kind, whose seed is in itself upon the earth; and it was so. The earth produced plants, not as an active or effective principle, but as a passive material principle, inasmuch as it supplied the material from which, at God's command, the herbs sprang forth. For the rest, it is not rashly believed that stones and metals, and the garden of Eden itself, were produced on this third day of creation. The same seems to be said of minerals.

Question XXI. Was the earth created mobile, so that it moves in a circle, and by its motion defines the times?

The most wise creator fashioned the earth so that ordinarily and universally it does not move, but rests. a) But to the celestial luminaries He gave this function, that by their motion they should define the times b).

Proof a. 1) Because Holy Scripture denies motion to the earth. Ps. CIV, 5. He founded the earth upon its bases, it shall not be moved for ever and ever. Just as an architect builds a building upon a solid base, so that it may persist unmoved against storms; so the heavenly craftsman most solidly founded this machine of the earth, so that at no time ever until the last day can the whole be moved from its place. 2) Because a state of rest is attributed to the earth. Eccl. I, 4. The earth stands for ever. Ps. CXIX, 90. You have established the earth, and it stands.

Proof b. 1) Because motion is attributed to the celestial luminaries. Eccl. I, 5, 6. The sun rises and the sun sets; and to its place, while it is panting; again rising it is there. It goes toward the south, it circles to the north. 2) Christ is compared with the running sun. Ps. XIX, 6. The sun is like a bridegroom coming out of his chamber; he rejoices, like a hero, to run his course. From the end of the heavens is its going out, and its circuit to their ends. The words of Ps. XIX are indeed to be understood of the mystical sun, Christ, which is clear from Paul's citation in Rom. X, 18. But they are taken from the kingdom of nature, and Christ is compared with the physical sun; That is, that Christ presents Himself no less eagerly to complete His course than the natural sun; Which comparison would certainly be null if the sun stood motionless, and the earth, like a planet, moved around the sun. 3) The standing still of the sun, which occurred while Joshua was warring, is considered a stupendous miracle, Josh. X, 12, 13, 14. If the sun does not move, but ordinarily stands immobile; what did Joshua command? Sun, move not beyond Gibeon, and moon, against the valley of Aijalon.

The Antithesis is of some Astronomers, among whom NICOLAUS COPERNICUS stands out, who maintain that the sun rests, and the earth moves, and who rely on the following arguments:

I. Every natural body moves. Therefore, also the earth. Resp. I deny the antecedent, because motion and rest are a disjunctive affection of natural bodies, of which some move, some rest. See SPERLINGII instit. physic. p. 370.

II. The earth is most apt for motion. Therefore, it is probable that it moves. The antecedent is proven because 1) it is round, 2) it has air surrounding it, 3) it is in a place. Therefore, it has local motion. Resp. 1) If something moves because it is round, then certainly the sun moves. 2) The motion of any body is to be judged not from the surrounding air, but from the divine ordinance. Because God commanded the earth to stand in the air, it remains immobile. 3) A stone is in a place, and yet it does not move. The motion of the earth is impeded both by its inherent gravity and by its state as the center.

III. The earth abounds in magnetic fibers. Therefore, it moves around the poles, to which the magnet turns itself. Resp. 1) We are doubtful about the abundance of magnetic fibers. 2) We doubt whether the force of magnetic fibers is so great that they can turn the heavy and dense body of the earth to the poles. Whatever is asserted about magnetic fibers is uncertain.

IV. Whatever moves from place to place with trembling columns, that truly and really moves. But the earth etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from Job IX, 6. Resp. I distinguish between natural, ordinary, and universal motion; and between violent, extraordinary, and particular motion. Job speaks of a violent and extraordinary motion, which is stirred up by the fury of God.

V. If only the heaven with the stars moves, it follows that the stars around the equator, in every second of an hour, or in a single pulse of an artery, according to TYCHO's distances of the world, run 876 German miles; which is improbable. But if the earth rotates from west to east, and partly meets the motion of the heaven, in the space of an hour it will proceed only 225 German miles, and in the pulse of an artery 250 paces; which is far more probable. Resp. Since scripture clearly testifies that the sun moves, the argument for divine power and wisdom is to be sought from the most rapid motion of the sun. How suddenly the solar light diffuses its rays! How suddenly lightning and wind move! Who can measure such a sudden motion? (*)

Question XXII. What are the works of the fourth day?

The works of the fourth day are the sun, the moon, and the other stars. Works of the fourth day.

Proof. Gen. I, 14, 15. Afterward God said: Let there be luminaries in the expanse of the heaven to distinguish between the day and between the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and for years. And let them be luminaries in the expanse of the heaven to give light upon the earth. In which words Moses teaches that God on the fourth day of creation made the sun, the moon, and the other stars, for a threefold purpose; (1) for an illuminative purpose; that they may shine upon the earth; (2) a distinctive purpose, that they may be for seasons, days, and years, i.e., that they may measure the years and their parts; (3) a significative purpose, that they may be signs of natural events, of rain, drought, winds, sowing, harvest.

Question XXIII. What is the matter from which the sun, moon, and stars were made?

(*) But suppose that the Copernican system is most consonant with the truth; it would by no means follow that men writing by divine instinct and inspiration should be thought to have erred, or to have wished to confirm the error of the common people. We have never heard a single philosopher say: the earth rises, the earth sets. All use the common custom of speech, on everyone's lips is the rising and setting of the sun. Nor are they to be accused of error, nor do we think they accommodated themselves to the false opinion of the common people, when they speak as it is the custom to speak. It will also be of great help to have read what our S. V. DEYLINGIUS has excellently commented on the difference between physical and optical truth, in his Obs. S. T. I. pag. 398.

That the matter of the sun, moon, and stars is the primeval light is gathered not from vanity.

Proof. (1) From the identity of function. For just as the πρωτόκτιστος (protoktistos) light distinguished the day and the night, Gen. I, 5: so, thereafter, did the sun and moon. Gen. I, 14. (2) From the evident absurdity of the contrary opinion. If the primeval light was not made the matter of the stars, it would follow that it was destroyed or annihilated. But that anything which God saw to be good was destroyed or annihilated at the beginning of the world is utterly absurd.

Question XXIV. Is the sun formally hot?

The sun is entirely igneous, and therefore formally hot.

Proof. (1) The sun appears as a most luminous flame, it shines, illuminates, and heats. Therefore, the sun, like a burning torch, is formally hot. The antecedent is evident; because the sun appears to our sight no differently than a burning flame, and the learned eye, through telescopes, has observed that the sun is a globe of fire. But that the sun heats is established both from sense and from burning-glasses, in which the collected solar rays exert a combustible force. (2) Sirach describes the sun as a globe of fire, endowed with the power of burning, ch. XLIII, 3, 4. The sun in its noontide dries up the country, and who can stand against its heat? A man blowing a furnace is in works of heat; the sun burns the mountains three times as much, breathing out fiery vapors; and shining with its rays it dazzles the eyes.

The Antithesis is of certain Philosophers, who assert that the sun is not formally hot, whose arguments are:

I. A burning torch is extinguished. The sun is not extinguished. Therefore, the sun is not a burning torch. Resp. I limit the major. A burning torch is extinguished when its fuel fails. But the fuel of the sun is perennial, and never failing.

II. If the sun is igneous; the sublunary world will be burned by its heat, and the middle region of the air will be hotter than the lowest region of the air: The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The proof of the major's consequence is that the sun is larger than the earth. If, therefore, the sun were igneous, it would burn the whole earth, and the middle region of the air would be filled with a more intense heat than the lowest region. Resp. I deny the consequence. To the proof, we say that a huge part of the ethereal and aerial expanse separates the sun from the sublunary world; since this is rare, it cannot be burned. But the lowest region of the air is hotter than the middle, both because of the reflection of the solar rays, and because of the congregation of igneous atoms, erupting from the pores of the earth, which, uniting with the heat of the solar rays, produce a greater effect.

III. A burning flame can be looked at with a direct gaze; But the sun cannot be looked at with a direct gaze; Therefore. Resp. A small flame, and not intensively bright, can be looked at with a direct gaze, I grant. But the sun is a very large igneous globe, and most intensively bright, injuring the sight, as an excellent sensible object is accustomed to inflict a certain force upon the sense.

Question XXV. What kind of signifying use do the stars have?

The stars have a natural and civil signifying use a); but they do not pre-signify the voluntary actions of men b).

Proof a. The Savior himself confirms with his calculation the natural signifying use which the stars have, Matthew XVI, 3. For they signify storms, rains, droughts, fertilities of the fields. They also have a civil signifying use, insofar as they signify the times which are more suitable than others for conducting business, namely, when to sail, to fish, to sow, to cut wood.

Proof b. 1) The voluntary actions of men proceed from the will, which is a distinguished faculty of the rational soul; But this is far superior and nobler than the stars. 2) Voluntary actions are free, which are not determined by the stars.

The Antithesis is of the Astrologers, who, from the position of the stars, or the genethliac theme, strive to foreknow and predict the nature, will, affection, condition, fortune, and finally the very manner of death of each person. Their arguments are:

I. The stars are for signs, with respect to all sublunary things, Gen. I, 14. Therefore, also with respect to man, who is sublunary. Resp. SENECA says excellently: The mind of a wise man is above the moon, there it is always serene. For although the mind of man is under the moon, if you consider its local condition; yet it is not under the moon, with respect to governance.

II. Victory and defeat depend on the stars, Judg. V, 20. Therefore, voluntary actions are directed by the stars to a happy or unhappy outcome. Resp. The stars fought against Sisera and his allies, not ordinarily and naturally, but extraordinarily and by a miraculous divine direction; nor immediately, by an influx into their wills, but mediately, by an influx into the air, stirring up meteors, lightning, thunder, hail, and a great storm, as JOSEPHUS testifies in book V of Jewish Antiquities, ch. IV.

Question XXVI. What are the works of the fifth day?

The works of the fifth day are the aquatic animals, which were produced from the water a), and the flying creatures, which were produced from the earth b). Works of the fifth day.

Proof a. Gen. I, 20. Furthermore, God said: Let the waters bring forth the creeping thing, the living soul. Obs. 1) By the creeping thing, the fish is indicated here, according to the following verse 21. 2) The water was the material and passive principle from which, at God's command, the fish emerged: It is, moreover, the place of habitation suited for fish.

Proof b. Gen. II, 19. When Jehovah God had formed from the earth every beast of the field and every bird of the heaven. Here it is said clearly enough that the birds were created from the earth. Whence it is not to be thought with others that they were formed from the water along with the fish.

The Antithesis is of certain Fathers and interpreters, asserting that both birds and fish came forth from the waters. Whose arguments are:

I. The production of fish and birds is joined, since it was done on the fifth day. Gen. I, 20. But just as the former emerged from the water, so also the latter emerged from the water. Resp. The production of fish and birds is joined, not because of the identity of the material principle, but because of the common day of production. For when Moses had said: Let the waters bring forth the creeping thing, the living soul; he makes a great sensual division by Atnach, and adds: And let the bird fly above the earth; Where the style is changed, so that עוף (of - bird) is not the object of the preceding verb ישרצו (yishretzu - let them teem), but the subject of the following predicate יעופף (ye'ofef - let it fly), and therefore is to be explained in the nominative, not in the accusative, so that you rightly translate: "Das Wasser rege sich mit webenden und lebendigen Thieren; und das Gevogel fliege auf der Erden" (Let the water teem with living, moving creatures, and let birds fly above the earth). From which it is clear that birds and fish in that passage did not come forth from the same matter.

Instance. But if these words are so explained: And let the flying thing fly above the earth, it will not be taught by them that birds were created, but only that they were commanded to fly above the earth. Resp. The creation of birds is certainly indicated. For a bird cannot fly unless it is created. But the matter of creation is implicitly suggested, when the bird is commanded to fly above the earth, which designates not only its natural place of dwelling, but also the matter of its production.

II. There is a great analogy between fish and birds; for there are flying fish and aquatic birds. Therefore, they came forth from one matter. Resp. From that analogy the matter of production is not validly proven. There is a greater analogy between birds and terrestrial animals. For they live in the same element, they agree in gradation, in dry flesh, in the structure of their body parts, and when they putrefy, they resolve into earth. Therefore, birds were produced from the earth.

III. Fish and birds are mixed bodies; Therefore, they have their material origin from all 4 elements. Resp. The production of mixed bodies is to be estimated according to the predominant element. Thus, in the substance of fish the element of water predominates; but birds were created principally from earth, less principally from the other elements.

Question XXVII. What are the works of the sixth day?

The works of the sixth day are the living creatures, the terrestrial brutes a), and man, the principal inhabitant of this visible world b). Works of the sixth day.

Proof a. Gen. I, 24. Afterward God said: Let the earth bring forth the living soul according to its kind, and the beast according to its kind, and every creeping thing of the earth according to its kind. Obs. 1. The production of living creatures is attributed to the earth, as the matter from which, and the patient subject, from which God by creating made the brutes come forth. 2) The living soul denotes an animal, and indeed here a terrestrial one, of which the species are enumerated; 1) בהמה (behemah), a tame and domestic beast; 2) רמש (remes), a reptile, embracing the various kinds of serpents and worms; 3) חיתו ארץ (chayyat ha'aretz), a wild beast, which either never, or with difficulty, is tamed.

Proof b. The last place among the works of the six days is held by man; Concerning whom AMBROSE in epistle XXXII excellently discusses; Rightly was man created last, as the sum of the whole work, as the cause of the world, for which all things were made, as the inhabitant of all the elements; he lives among the wild beasts, swims with the fish, flies above the birds, converses with the angels, inhabits the earth and serves in heaven, plows the sea, is nourished by the air, a cultivator of the soil, a traveler of the deep, a fisherman in the waves, a fowler in the air, an heir in heaven; a co-heir of Christ. But we shall consider the origin and production of man more deeply below.

Question XXVIII. What practical uses will you extract from the doctrine of the creation of the universe?

Practical Uses. An accurate and serious meditation on the creation of this universe excites in us a) confidence to be placed in the most powerful, best, and wisest God b), a sincere love for God c), a filial fear of God d), prompt obedience to be rendered to God e), invocation f) and celebration of the divine name.

Proof a. We fix all our confidence not in creatures, but in the creator. For the omnipotent creator can deliver us from a thousand dangers; And the same best father will deny us no help, solace, or comfort; since He deigned to create all things from nothing for our sake. And He who abundantly testified to His wisdom in the first creation, will most wisely direct the course of our life to the glory of His name and our own benefit.

Proof b. We love creatures because they are good; how much more is the creator to be loved, from whom, as from a fount, streams of goodness have flowed into creatures.

Proof c. God himself drew an argument from creation when he exhorts us to reverence and fear of Him, Jer. V, 22. Will you not fear me, says Jehovah, will you not tremble before me, who have placed the sand as a boundary for the sea?

Proof d. Creation is the first foundation and bond obliging the creature, partaker of reason, to worship the creator. Rom. I, 18 sqq.

Proof e. Come, let us bow down, and humble ourselves, and bend the knee before Jehovah, our maker; for he is our God, and we are the people of his pasture, and the flock of his hand, says the prophet king, Ps. XCV, 6, 7.

Proof f. If the article of creation is exercised daily, impressed on the mind, and properly recalled to memory, the heart will surely grow warm, and will be wonderfully inflamed to give thanks promptly, so that we use all things for the glory and praise of God, says the blessed LUTHER in his larger catechism, p. 492.

SUSPIRIUM

I cannot but silently admire and gratefully venerate Your power and wisdom, O nurturing parent and craftsman of this universe. What kings or princes are to be compared with You! For You, having preceded by innumerable ages, at the point in time that pleased You, designed this world and all that is contained within its compass, without any tools, without any iron implements, without any matter, from nothing. You created me also, O best, greatest creator, the least of Your servants. There is no good in me that was not bestowed by You. You gave me both this fragile little body and the spirit that governs these limbs. Do not desert me, the work of Your hands. For I depend entirely on You, as a branch on the vine, a ray on the sun. You, the author of my life, are always in my heart, always on my lips: to be esteemed with a pious heart, to be praised with a full mouth.

CHAPTER IV. ON ANGELS.

Question I. What are angels?

ANGELS ARE FINITE, complete spirits, created by God, intelligent, with free will, and ordained to perform ministries pleasing to God.

Obs. I. The name, angel, if you consider the force of the word, denotes a messenger; for it descends from ἀγγέλλειν (to announce). The Hebrews have מַלְאָךְ (mal'akh), a significant word, legate, messenger. Although the root מֵלֵךְ (l'k) has become obsolete among the Hebrews, it is still found today in the related Ethiopian language, and has the meaning of sending. Both by use and by the style of scripture, it is often used as a name of nature, and occurs only concerning persons.

Obs. II. The word, angel, is used 1) of the uncreated angel, the Son of God, the creator and lord of all finite angels. The Son of God is called an angel, both before the incarnation indeed, but with respect to it, and after the incarnation. Before the incarnation, he is called the Angel of the face of God, Is. LXIII, 7. The Angel of the covenant, Mal. III, 2. The redeeming Angel, Gen. XLVIII, 16. etc. After the incarnation, Apoc. VII, 30, 35. Ch. VIII, 2. Ch. X, 1. ch. XIX, 1. 2) The word, angel, is used for visible creatures, and indeed both for teachers of the church in general, Mal. II, 7. Apoc. I, 20, and for John the Baptist in particular, Mal. III, 1. Mark I, 2. Matt. XI, 10. Luke VII, 27. 3) For invisible and incorporeal creatures, that is, for finite and complete spirits, Hebr. I, 14. Psal. CIV, 4. etc.

Question II. Whence is the existence of angels known?

The existence of angels. The existence of angels is known for certain from holy scripture, and is believed by divine faith a); from the principles of reason it is gathered topically and probably b), not apodictically and irrefutably c).

Proof a. The existence of angels is taught both by the assertions of Holy Scripture, about which more below, and by the many and various apparitions of angels, among which that which was made to Abraham stands out, Gen. XVIII, 2, where the Son of God, and with him two angels in the form of three men, appeared to the father of believers; as well as the angelic apparition which happened to Lot, Gen. XIX, 1, whom two angels went to save from the burning of Sodom.

Proof b. Reason gathers; 1) Where one of two opposites is given, it is necessary that the other also be given, so that one may be most clearly discerned from the other; for opposites, placed next to each other, become more apparent; But there are corporeal substances; Therefore, also spiritual ones. 2) If it is necessary to know that this universe is in some way assimilated to its creator; this also must be known, that there are creatures similar to the creator by reason of spirituality, intellect, and will; The antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent (*). 3) Energumens and possessed men have often performed

(*) This argument brings us no small probability, especially when we assume three principles of reason: I. There are different grades of perfection in created things, and in their distinct kinds. We are always led in our thought from the lesser to the greater. Thus, for example, the perfection of a shrub is greater than that of grass; greater that of a flower than of a shrub; greater that of a tree than of a flower; greater that of metals than of stones, wonderful things, far superior to the powers and knowledge of men. For they have spoken in foreign tongues which they never learned, they have spoken blasphemous words which could have come neither from a separated soul nor from God, they have displayed a strength greater than the strength of many men, they have carried immense burdens, they have broken through bars and chains; which must necessarily arise from some extrinsic principle, more powerful than man (*). 4) Gentile philosophers acknowledged and even among metals themselves one excels another. The construction of the body is more perfect in a certain kind of living things than in others. Also the powers naturally inherent in different things differ much among themselves in various perfections. In some there is the power of growing, namely in plants, in grass, in herbs; in others, besides that, also the power of bearing fruit, namely in crops and trees; again in others, together with that twofold power, also the power of sensing, as in brute animals, and even tiny beasts; Finally, in one kind of thing there is not only that threefold power, but also the most excellent power of thinking and enjoying the use of reason; namely in man; who however needs external senses, which minister many objects to the mind. But since from these many perceptions and thoughts are exercised imperfectly; it follows that the most perfect of all created things is that intelligent one, which needs no ministry of corporeal senses. II. In the whole nature of things there is no leap, but the grades are distinct gradually and little by little. We do not observe even two genera separated by so great an interval, nor even two species of one and the same genus, but that some third middle genus, or some middle species intercedes, consisting of both genera, or of both species, and participating in some way at least in the nature of both. For example, between an animate body and an inanimate one, there is something in between, a zoophyte (ζωόφυτον), a sea-nettle, see PLINY in his history of animals, ch. 9, and DAMASCENUS in his dialogue, ch. 47. Another certain middle genus is constituted by testaceous animals, shells, mussels, oysters, snails, tortoises. Between terrestrial and aquatic animals, there is something in between, namely the amphibious (ἀμφίβιον), and of this there is not just one species. Between terrestrial, aquatic, and flying animals, there are middle animals, like the goose and the duck. Between a spirit endowed with reason and a body, there would be nothing in between, unless there were man, who has a nature composed of both. But he could not be in the middle, unless there were certain spirits, endowed with reason indeed, but utterly devoid of body. III. Among all created things, there is none that approaches so closely to the supreme perfections of the best Creator as that whose nature is spiritual, endowed with intellect and free will. Such indeed is man; but not the whole nature of man, only the other part of him. Nor indeed is there any doubt that the perfections of spirits, more excellent than man, can be much greater. But from the various grades of perfections in created things, it becomes quite probable; that God not only could, but also wished to create spirits of such a kind, to whom He Himself would grant such great perfection, as a certain thing, the most excellent of all created things, would be capable of. Therefore, it is most like the truth, that between the creator and man, there are certain substances, whose perfections are superior to human ones, and closer to divine ones, whose nature therefore agrees most closely with human nature indeed, insofar as in it there is a spirit endowed with reason; but also with the divine, insofar as God is a complete and most simple spirit, in which nothing is mixed and concrete, nothing coupled with it that is corporeal and born of the earth. This is indeed most true: Since God is an immense, infinite, necessary, independent spirit, the distance between God and created spirits, without exception, is and cannot but be always infinite. But since God is a complete and infinite spirit; while man is a spirit not only finite, but also incomplete, as he is joined with the body by a very tight bond, as it were; hence the created things, intermediate between the Creator and man, are spirits complete indeed and devoid of all body, insofar as they are the most perfect of all created things; but finite and circumscribed by their own limits, insofar as they are created things, in no way to be compared with the infinite and immense Creator.

(*) But if we turn our attention to the moral actions of wicked men, about which the divine scripture in Eph. II, 2 makes us more certain, that those men are in the power of the spirit that is at work (πνεύματος τῷ ἐργῶντος) in them, whence it is called spiritual possession, if we listen to nature and experience as a witness, two arguments of probability angels, or δαιμόνια (daimonia / spirits/demons), namely Socrates, Plato, Aristotle and others. See D. HILDEBRAND'S Institutes of Theology, p. 262.

Proof c. The reasons adduced certainly flatter us with some probability, but they are not beyond exception. For it can be answered to I. It was within the most free will of God to join spirits to bodies. For it is not necessary that one species should always be joined to an opposite species. To II. This universe is assimilated to God generally, as an effect testifies to the power, wisdom, and goodness of the architect, not specially, so that the creatures themselves are partakers of spirituality, intellect, and will. To III. The effects of the possessed are indeed wonderful; But indeed some separated soul, or some superior power, whatever it may be, of a subtle body, or a spirit, can produce those effects. This argument, therefore, remains within the sphere of probability, but does not convince the mind. To IV. If the gentiles had any knowledge of genii or demons, they drew it from Jewish tradition, and indeed with at least a confused knowledge. Add that they wrote of genii not as spirits, but as more subtle and more robust bodies. For they even numbered the strongest heroes among the genii.

offer themselves to us. One is provided to us by completely unexpected thoughts, which enter the mind, and of which not the slightest coherence with the preceding ones is perceived. Let us assume these two axioms, certainly most sure: 1) There is a certain natural connection of ideas and thoughts, by which it happens that preceding thoughts contain in themselves the reason for the subsequent ones, unless something intervenes from elsewhere, by which the mind is suddenly called away to think of other things. 2) There is a certain property of the human mind, insofar as it enjoys the use of reason, to be conscious of itself. Therefore, every man, conscious of his own thoughts, will easily be able, by investigating, to know how the later thoughts cohere with the earlier ones, and how one operation of the mind followed from another. But indeed, a man living with himself sometimes observes in his mind something completely unexpected and by no means coherent, so that he is utterly ignorant of the reason why it came into his mind. What? that those unexpected and most swift thoughts are sometimes completely contrary to the preceding ones. It sometimes happens that a good man, always an enemy to sins, now also so totally occupied and involved in some most holy business, that all his thoughts are fixed on this one thing, against all expectation is carried away to the worst thoughts, most unwillingly and not without horror. Whence, I ask, are those thoughts? Is it not more probable that they have arisen from the instinct of some other spirit, laying snares for him, than from his own motion and the agitation of his own mind? Another argument is supplied to us by completely inhuman thoughts, and utterly repugnant to nature; nature, I say, 1) proper to this man, since it is wont to happen that a most gentle man, and by nature and discipline most mild, most meek, which is the disposition of a sanguine temperament, is disturbed by the most truculent and most ferocious and most vehement motions of the mind, so that he rages against his own flesh; 2) common to all men. There are certain sins, so monstrous, so detestable, not even to be thought of without trembling, and so utterly contrary to the whole of human nature, that whoever has applied his mind to such crimes seems to have cast off all humanity, and to have extinguished and rooted out all affection, such as killing one's own offspring, to take one's own life voluntarily. Is that not proof of a malice by which man is impelled, far greater than human? An example is Judas the traitor, whose most wicked treachery if anyone accurately contemplates, and weighs all the surrounding circumstances, he will find nothing in it that was consonant with human nature, however depraved. This crime, therefore, was more than human; hence diabolical, John XIII, 2. Therefore, experience and reason persuade us that it is very probable, what holy scripture teaches us to be most true. Those who go to the contrary side have nothing with which to defend themselves, except this one thing: that it cannot be conceived in the mind how a spirit can exercise any action in another spirit. But let them first define the nature of a spirit, intimately known and perceived! Let them explain further, by what bond the spirit of man is so closely coupled with his body, which certainly can and is accustomed to communicate its thoughts daily with another spirit, likewise dwelling in a body! Let them finally rashly arrogate to themselves an infinite knowledge of all things, and reveal to us whatever secrets there are! or let them confess ingenuously that this consequence is most false: that cannot happen, which they themselves do not understand how it happens.

Question III. Are angels spirits, devoid of all corporeal mass?

Angels are spirits, devoid of all matter, both grosser and more subtle.

Proof. 1) Paul describes angels as πνεύματα λειτουργικά (ministering spirits), Hebrews I, 7. 2) The sacred psalmist supports this, singing in Psalm CIV, 4. Who makes his angels spirits. You say: By רוחות (ruhot) winds are understood. For Luther thus translates it into German: "Du machest deine Engel zu Winden" (You make your angels winds). Resp. 1) There is no note of comparison present. For it is not said: Who makes his angels כרוחות (keruhot), like winds. 2) In its stronger meaning, רוח (ruach) denotes spirit, which meaning ought to take precedence wherever it can. Instance. But it is added: His ministers a flaming fire. No one would assert that angels are of a fiery nature. Therefore, just as angels are metaphorically called flames, so also are they called winds. Resp. The name fire is not only found for corporeal fire; but we also have incorporeal fire in the scriptures, so that God is called a burning fire, not indeed only because of the attribute of justice, by which He punishes most severely, but also because of His most subtle, most pure, incorporeal substance; because otherwise it would not be necessary to add the epithet, burning. 2) Granted that in the latter member of the cited verse the angels are metaphorically called burning flames; in the former member, however, they are properly called spirits. For the apostle had this passage in view when he called the angels πνεύματα λειτουργικά (ministering spirits), Hebrews I, v. 7. Cf. D. SEB. SCHMIDI colleg. bibl. poster. p. 195. 3) Evil angels are called spirits, Matthew VIII, 16. Eph. II, 2. ch. VI, 12. 4) Angels can penetrate stones, doors, and other solid bodies, Acts XII, 7. entire legions can inhabit one man, Mark V, 9, Luke VIII, 30. 5) Angels are by nature invisible. Col. I, 16. who appeared by assuming bodies, and again disappeared at will.

The Antithesis is of certain Fathers, Scholastics, Socinians, and Arminians, to whom add HUGO GROTIUS and ERNESTUS SOHNERUS, formerly a Professor at Altdorf, who attribute most subtle bodies to angels, and rely on the following arguments:

I. Angels can be seen, Gen. XVIII, 2: Therefore, they are not spirits. Resp. Angels were seen, not in themselves, but in assumed bodies, not in their essence, but in the economy and office of their appearance, which they undertook.

II. Angels ate, Gen. XVIII, 8: Therefore, they are not spirits. Resp. The angels ate, by taking food into their mouths, not by digesting it through a vital operation of the body, but by consuming it with a superior power. Just as dry earth consumes water in one way, and the sun absorbs it in another. The former through need, the latter through virtue and power.

III. Angels moved from place to place, Is. VI, 2: Therefore, they have bodies. For local motion is an affection of a natural body. Resp. Angels moved from place to place, not in themselves, but in assumed bodies, which they did not assume περιχορητικῶς (perichoretically), or by an essential union, but παρατατικῶς (paratactically), or by an accidental union. For the angel is not the informing form of the assumed body, but an assisting form: Just as a charioteer assists and presides over a chariot, a pilot over a ship, a general over an army.

IV. Whatever is mutable has matter: But angels are mutable: Therefore. The major is proven because the root of mutability is matter. By reason of matter something is generated and corrupted, is altered, is changed from place to place. The minor is established: because angels not only change their ubi, but also certain angels were corrupted by the fall. R. 1) I distinguish between substantial and accidental mutation. The root of substantial mutation is matter; but accidental mutation also befalls spirits devoid of matter (*). 2) Angels indeed vary their ubi, but properly speaking they do not change their place; since they are in a definitive ubi, not a circumscriptive or occupative one. The fallen angels were corrupted accidentally, not substantially.

V. Those of which there is a certain number, they have matter. There is a certain number of angels. Therefore. The major is established; because number is a discrete quantity. But if quantity is posited, matter is posited. Resp. If quantity of mass is posited, matter is posited, I grant. But discrete (*) Allow me to add this: The reason for mutability is contained in the nature of a finite, determinate, and contingent thing, insofar as it is such, and depends entirely on the will of its Creator. For nothing is entirely immutable in itself, except the infinite, immense, and necessary, which cannot be otherwise.

quantity also belongs to immaterial things, when it is improperly called quantity.

VI. Whoever sings and praises God, they are not pure spirits, devoid of all matter. But the angels etc. Therefore: The major is evident; because without a mouth, tongue, and lungs, no one can form a voice, sing, and praise. The minor is proven from Is. VI, 3. Resp. Whoever sings and praises God with corporeal organs, they are not pure spirits, I grant. But angels praise God in a spiritual manner, to us in this life unsearchable and inexplicable.

VII. ORIGEN, in περὶ ἀρχῶν (On First Principles) chapter II, TERTULLIAN, in his book on the flesh of Christ, and other fathers of the primitive church, attributed subtle bodies to angels. Resp. 1) The writings of the fathers are not the norm of theology. 2) Some, but not all, fathers thought that angels were corporeal. 3) The fathers either understood by σώματα (somata - bodies) persons, or they opposed body to a phantasm and to nothing, or they took matter for the subject of accidents, and indeed in comparison with God, who is so pure a spirit and act that not even an accident can befall Him.

Instance: The fathers of the primitive church did not attribute bodies to angels without reason; But 1) because the Sons of God, by whom they understood angels, took the daughters of men as their wives, Gen. VI, 2. 2) Because fire is said to be prepared for the devil and his angels, Matthew XXV, 41. Resp. to I. By the Sons of God in that passage are understood the sons born from pious patriarchs and educated in the church; these saw the daughters of men with an inordinate gaze, that they were beautiful, and they took wives from all whom they chose at their pleasure, against the will and word of God. But it is inept to think here of angelic spirits, for whom marriage was not instituted; and they neither generate nor are generated. To II. The fire of hell is not elemental, which only burns bodies, but singular, prepared singularly by God together with hell, Matthew XXV, 41, to burn the spirits and damned men for eternity. For who would doubt that God can create such a fire that also torments the evil angels with burning?

Question IV. How do angels differ from God, the human soul, and other creatures?

Difference of angels. Angels differ from God in that their spiritual essence is dependent and finite a), from the separated soul in that their substance is complete b), from other creatures in that they enjoy intellect and free will c).

Proof a. God is an independent and infinite spirit; angels, since they have their being not from themselves but from God, are dependent and finite spirits.

Proof b. The human soul is an incomplete spirit, by itself and by its nature ordered to the composition of the whole man. Hence even the separated soul has a natural propensity and inclination towards the body, with which, as a component part, it constitutes a complete man; but angels are not naturally ordered to constitute one thing in itself with some component part, but have an essence terminated in itself. Therefore, the soul is an incomplete spirit, angels are complete spirits.

Proof c. Visible creatures, if you depart from man, lack intellect and will. But angels are endowed with intellect and free will. For the angels of God are wise, 2 Sam. XIV, 20. The evil angels know Jesus the Son of God, Mark V, 7. Therefore, angels, both good and evil, are partakers of intellect. The will of angels is proven by a) The obedience of the good angels, which they render to God, Psalm CIII, 20, and the apostasy of the evil ones, 2 Peter II, 4. b) The pious desire of the good angels to look into the mystery of Christ, 1 Peter I, 12. The impious desire of the evil angels to devour men, 1 Peter V, 8. c) The rewards conferred on the good angels, and the punishments inflicted on the wicked. For the rest, the intellect and will of angels are indeed conceived by us as faculties distinct from the soul and from each other; but in reality, they differ neither from the angelic essence nor from each other. This is proven: 1) because angels live a spiritual life, which formally consists in intellect and will. But just as life is of the essence of an angel, so also are intellect and will. 2) Intellect is of the essence of man. Therefore, much more so of the essence of an angel. The antecedent is evident; because intellect, or reason, is the constitutive difference of man. The consequence is proven; because angels understand more readily and perfectly than men; since they are not so diverted from understanding by sensitive appetite as men are. From which they are called intelligences and demons, because their being consists in the faculty of understanding. 3) If intellect and will do not enter into the essential constitution of angels, they can be separated from them by the absolute power of God. But the latter is absurd. Therefore, so is the former. The consequence is proven; because proper accidents are separable from their subjects by divine power. The latter is a manifest absurdity; for if intellect and will were separated from angels, there could be an angel devoid of intellect, or irrational, and destitute of all freedom of action, and therefore plainly idle. 4) The angel of all creatures approaches most closely to God. Therefore, it pertains to its perfection to know immediately, without a really distinct power (although sometimes with an impressed species). And indeed, it cannot be denied that moral actions proceed immediately from the angel; otherwise they could not be imputed to them. But since the principle of moral actions must be formally free, and only the will is free; it follows that the angelic will is the angelic essence itself.

The Antithesis is of certain Scholastics, who deny that intellect and will are of the essence of angels. Whose arguments are:

I. No creature can operate immediately without superadded accidents. Therefore, neither can an angel. The antecedent is proven; because to operate immediately belongs to God alone. Resp. I deny the antecedent; because created substances immediately produce their natural properties by an emanative action, e.g., fire heat, water humidity, etc.

Instance: God alone acts by His essence. Therefore, God alone acts without superadded qualities. Resp. To act by essence either signifies to act independently, or to act according to one's own nature, that is, without the intervention of a superadded quality. God understands independently; The intellect of angels depends on God. Yet an angel is said to understand by its essence, inasmuch as the intellect is not a quality superadded to the angelic essence, but enters into the essential constitution of the angel.

II. If an angel understood by its essence, it would not need intelligible species for knowing; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. Resp. 1) An angel knows itself by its essence because its understanding is sufficiently proportioned to itself, and it is not distant from itself. Therefore, for the knowledge of itself, it does not need an intelligible species. 2) Angels indeed know external objects through intelligible species, because of the distance; but it does not follow from this that the intellect is really distinct from the angelic essence, since either the intelligible species were co-created with the angelic essence itself, as some wish, or they are formed by it and derived from objects.

III. An angel does not perpetually understand and will; Therefore, it does not understand and will immediately. The antecedent is evident, because the angelic intellect and will can be impeded. The consequence is clear; because that which operates immediately (e.g., God) operates perpetually. Resp. 1) I distinguish between an immediate uncreated efficient cause, which is a most pure act; and a created one, which is a pure act in a certain respect. The former is God alone, who acts by His essence far differently than an angel, who is created, and is only a pure act in a certain respect. God knows all things by one simple and eternal act of understanding. But angels know neither all things nor at once, but distinctly and through different concepts, not however by simply apprehending, but also by composing and discoursing. 2) It is not absurd that an angel always knows itself, since intellection is the most vital action of angels, from which they never seem to cease.

IV. If intellect and will do not really differ from the angelic essence, the angelic intellect will be the angelic will; The consequent is absurd; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is clear from the most trite axiom; Things which do not agree in a third, agree among themselves. Resp. I distinguish between the identical sense and the formal sense. If the intellect and will of angels are considered in the identical sense, as they are one and the same in the angelic nature; that proposition is true; the intellect of an angel is the will of an angel. But if they are viewed in the formal sense, as they are in our concepts; that proposition; the angelic intellect is the angelic will, is false; for the intellect and will of angels, because of the distinct acts they exercise, are represented by distinct inadequate concepts, and are said to differ virtually. Cf. D. BECHMANNI institut. theolog. p. 248. & D. BAYERI comp. theol. p. 285.

Question V. Who created the angels?

The efficient cause of angels. God the Father a), the Son of God b), and the Holy Spirit c) created the angels.

Proof a. God the Father made his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. Hebr. I, 7. Cf. Ps. CIV, 4.

Proof b. By the Son of God were all things created that are in heaven, and that are on earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, Col. I, 16. The invisible thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers are the angels, so denominated on account of the distinguished excellence and power conferred on them by the creator.

Proof c. By the Spirit of the mouth of God the heavens were made, and all the host of them. Ps. XXXIII, 6. But that angels are also comprehended under all the host of the heavens, we learn from 1 Kings XXII, 19. I saw Jehovah sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left. Cf. Nehemiah IX, 6.

Question VI. Were angels created before the fabrication of the world?

At what time were they created? Angels were created not long before the fabrication of the world, but within the six-day period of creation described by Moses.

Proof I. Because Moses presents the beginning of all created things. Gen. I, 1.

II. The same openly testifies that God completed all creation in the space of six days; and on the seventh day He rested, Gen. II, 1, 2.

III. Before the six-day period of creation, there was nothing but God the creator, as John testifies: In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. John I, 1, 2.

IV. In the style of scripture, everything before the world is eternal. Ps. XC, 2. Is. XLVIII, 13. Prov. VIII, 22.

V. Angels are numbered among the works of the six days, Ps. CIV, 3 sqq.

The Antithesis is of certain Fathers, Socinians, Arminians, Conrad Vorstius, Genebrardus, and others, who opine that the angels existed for many ages before this world was created. Who support their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Moses, when he describes the creation of this universe, does not mention angels. Therefore, angels were not created with this universe. Resp. 1) It is not permissible to argue negatively from the sacred scripture in historical relations. Moses was silent in the history of creation about the production of metals and minerals, which, however, by the confession of all, were produced within the six days of creation. 2) Moses indeed lucidly described the origin of things that fall under the senses, but he insinuated the origin of angels in Gen. II, 1, when he says: Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. That angels pertain to the host of the heavens, we have shown above from 1 Kings XXII, 19. Nehemiah IX, 6.

II. Whoever praised God when the earth was founded, they existed before the foundation of the earth; But the angels etc. Job XXXVIII, 8. Therefore. Resp. I deny the major. For those who praised God at the foundation of the earth could have existed at the same time as the earth, although they did not exist before it. Therefore, there is a distinction between antecedent and simultaneous existence.

III. Those who always see the face of God, they are from eternity; But the angels etc. Matthew XVIII, 10. Therefore. Resp. The angels always see the face of God, after they were created and translated into a glorious state. That διὰ παντός (dia pantos) in Matthew XVIII, 10 notes a duration, perennial without end, but not devoid of a beginning.

IV. To whom the blessed hope was promised before secular times, they existed from eternity; But to the angels etc. Therefore. The minor is evident from Titus I, 2, where the apostle says: which blessed hope God promised before secular times. But God did not promise the blessed hope from eternity to men, because it is plain that they were created on the sixth day of creation; Therefore, to the angels. Resp. In the cited place, the apostle's speech is not about angels, but about elect men, v. 1, to whom the blessedness to be hoped for was promised before secular times, by reason of the divine decree, and revealed through the gospel at the divinely appointed time. But the divine promise, conceived in an eternal decree, does not require creatures existing from eternity. Men were elected before the foundations of the world were laid, Eph. I, 4, and yet they did not exist from eternity.

V. The opinion from which a sudden fall of the angels from the beginning of creation is inferred is not probable; From that opinion, which states that the angels were created within the six-day period, it is inferred etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because it is improbable that creatures divinely endowed with exceptional holiness should immediately have fallen away from their concreated holiness. The minor is evident; because it is gathered that the angels who seduced the first human parents had fallen within the six days in which they are thought to have been created. Resp. I deny the minor. For we do not assert that the angels fell within the six-day period of creation; since God, having looked upon the works of the six days, estimated them to be very good, from truth. Gen. I, 31. Nor can the dissenters show by a valid argument that the devil stood in the truth for a long time.

Question VII. What are the attributes common to all angels?

Attributes of angels. The attributes common to good and evil angels are some affirmative, some negative. The negative are indivisibility a), invisibility b), immutability c), immortality d), illocality e).

Proof a. Angels are indivisible into quantitative parts; because they are devoid of matter; for the root of quantity and divisibility is matter.

Proof b. Angels are invisible, because they are spirits. They are invisible by nature, they were seen by economy, or by a peculiar divine dispensation. They are invisible in themselves and by their nature, they were seen in assumed bodies; which they took on, and united to themselves, not by an essential or personal union, but merely an accidental one.

Proof c. Angels are immutable not absolutely and simply, but comparatively and respectively. God alone is simply immutable, angels are immutable in a certain respect; because they are not subject to physical mutations, which are proper to natural bodies. For angels neither generate, nor are generated; nor do they grow, nor diminish; nor do they grow old, nor corrupt; nor do they proceed on feet (which indeed they do not have) from place to place. Yet they are not superior to all mutation; for they vary their ubi, they rejoice, they are sad, they love, they are averse; which are moral mutations.

Proof d. Angels are immortal and incorruptible not independently, originally, and by an eternal essence; for thus God alone is immortal, 1 Tim. VI, 6. but they are immortal dependently, participatively, and by the grace of the creating and conserving God. For a like reason, they are said to be incorruptible physically from within and from without. From within they are incorruptible; because they do not have an internal principle of mutation or corruption in themselves, which is matter. Nor is any physical body of such virtue that it can corrupt a spirit, or an angel, from without.

But if it is said metaphysically to be corruptible which can be reduced to nothing by the absolute divine power, angels are not incorruptible; because at God's command they can return to that nothing from which they emerged. In which sense D. SCHERZER. system. theol. p. 102 prefers to call angels annihilable, rather than corruptible.

Proof e. Angels are illocal; because they are not material, nor do they have parts outside of parts. For locality is an affection of a natural body, which occupies a certain space commensurate with itself.

Question VIII. What are the affirmative attributes common to all angels?

The affirmative attributes common to good and evil angels are a) knowledge, b) freedom of will, c) power, d) ævternal duration, e) definitive ubity, f) agility.

Proof a. Since not only good, but also evil angels possess intellect, knowledge of many things is not to be denied to them. But what and of what kind the cognition of good and evil angels is, becomes known more certainly and clearly from the original state of both, and the state of either glory or misery that followed this.

Proof b. The will accompanies the intellect, and freedom the will. The angelic will is free, both with respect to immanent acts, of willing or nilling this or that object, and with respect to different external effects, when it freely does now this, now that.

Proof c. The power of angels is great, but finite. It is great; for they are called mighty in strength, Ps. CIII, 20, strong armed men, Luke XI, 21. For they can a) move bodies by transferring them from place to place, Matthew IV, 5, 8. Acts VIII, 39. b) Prostrate bodies, 2 Kings XIX, 35. c) Assume bodies, and unite them to themselves not indeed essentially or personally, but accidentally, and assist them, as a pilot assists a ship. d) Speak with God, angels, and men. They speak with God by directing their thoughts to God, while they adore and praise Him; they speak with angels when they freely impress intelligible species on each other; they speak with men with a sensible and distinct voice, formed in the air in imitation of the human voice. The angelic power is finite, not infinite; for infinite power, since it is proper to the creator, is incommunicable to a mere creature. Hence it is that angels cannot, (a) create; since creation is a work of infinite virtue, which angels lack: (b) generate. For if an angel generates, it generates either as a spirit, or as clothed in a body. Not as a spirit; because generation is a vegetative act, i.e., it presupposes a vegetative principle, which an angel is not; Not as clothed in a body; for the assumed body is either living or dead. If it is living, the generation does not come from the angel, but from the body, endowed with a living soul; If it is devoid of life, it is not a principle of vital action. Therefore, angels cannot generate. You say: There are changelings ("Wechselbälge") who are so monstrous that they have no other father than the devil. Resp. Monstrous births are from nature erring or failing in generation. Some changelings are not true men, but diabolical specters. Some changelings were born from possessed or seized men, whose fantasy the devil disturbed, so that they failed in generating, whose fetuses the devil can substitute in place of legitimate children. Nor can angels (c) change substances. For no one can change the course of nature, except the author of nature, God. Therefore, the changing of creatures is held to be a κριτήριον (kriterion), or a most certain sign, of the most glorious divine power, John II, 9. Vainly do some object: 1) that the Egyptian magicians by the work of the devil changed their staffs into serpents; 2) that experience testifies that there are λυκανθρώποι (lycanthropes), i.e., men who have been changed into wolves by the devil. Resp. to 1. The staffs of the Egyptian magicians were changed into serpents not truly or really, but apparently, through the prestiges of the cacodemon, who cast a glaucoma over the eyes of the onlookers, and most swiftly threw serpents from the nearby marshes into their midst. To 2. Those who seem to be λυκανθρώποι (lycanthropes) are in reality men. (d) To perform true miracles. For miracles are rare and unusual effects, produced by God beyond the order of the whole created nature. Hence Jehovah alone is said to perform miracles. Ps. LXXII, 18. Yet angels can perform certain wonderful things, by dazzling the eyes, and by disturbing the medium, or by most swiftly applying active things to passive ones; which swiftness snatches the minds of the onlookers into admiration. (e) To drive away all diseases. For there are diseases divinely sent either as τιμωρίαι (timoriai), punishments for sins, or as παιδείας (paideias), paternal chastisements, Amos III, 6, which no creature, no angel can avert. But what diseases the devil inflicts, these he is able to remove; although no help should be sought from him. For the cacodemon heals the body, to destroy the soul. (f) To resuscitate the dead; for no one can restore life to them, except the arbiter of life. Abraham acknowledged this, who believed in God, who gives life to the dead, Rom. IV, 17. You say: The devil raised the prophet Samuel from the dead, 1 Sam. XXVIII, 7. Resp. I distinguish between the true Samuel, and a counterfeit or masked one. He who was represented to Saul through the prestiges of the devil under the habit of Samuel was not the true Samuel, but had only put on the external appearance of Samuel, but in reality was a diabolical specter.

Proof d. The duration of angels has indeed a beginning, but lacks an end, and therefore is commonly called ævum (æon); for this acknowledges a beginning, but knows no end. But that ævum is rightly ascribed to angels is clear from the fact that angels have no internal principle of corruption, and therefore cannot be naturally destroyed, but always continue their duration of living without danger of corruption.

Proof e. Angels are in a definitive ubi (where); since they define for themselves at will a certain space, in which they are whole in the whole, and whole in any part of the space; because their essence is indivisible. Obs. God is said to be in a replitive ubi; since He fills all things in all things. Physical bodies are in a circumscriptive, or occupative ubi; for this reason, that they occupy a space commensurate with themselves and are circumscribed by the ambient air. But angels are not in a replitive ubi; because they are not everywhere, like God; nor in an occupative ubi; since according to the disposition of their spiritual nature they do not occupy a commensurate space. For measure follows quantity, of which an angel is devoid.

Proof f. The agility and velocity of angels is wondrous, so that without local motion, such as that of bodies, and therefore without succession of parts, which they do not have, they can vary their ubi most swiftly. Yet not all motion seems to be denied to angels, since at one moment they are here, at another elsewhere. And although the motion of angels is most rapid, it is not, however, instantaneous, because the space in which they move is extended and continuous, which no creature can traverse in an instant.

Question IX. What is the number of angels?

The number of angels. The number of angels is indeed very great, but to us men it is innumerable.

Proof. The sacred writings teach that the number of both good and evil angels is immense. For it is said that a thousand thousands minister to God, and a myriad of myriads stand before him, Dan. VII, 10. Indeed, Christ himself asserts that if he asked, more than twelve legions of angels would easily be sent to him by the father. But a whole legion of impure spirits is said to have inhabited one man, Mark V, 8. A legion among the Romans was commonly a multitude of six thousand soldiers.

Question X. How many states of angels are there?

The twofold state of angels. The state of angels is either original, or that which followed the original. The original state is a state of grace, which in the first creation all angels obtained through the grace of the Almighty creator, and in the same were created equally wise and holy, and were placed on the way to eternal blessedness a). The state which followed the original is either of glory or of misery. The state of glory is that in which the angels, who persisted in their concreated wisdom and holiness, admitted to the clear intuition of God, perpetually enjoy His most exuberant goodness b). The state of misery is the most sad condition of those angels who of their own accord defected from God c).

Obs. In the state of grace, the angels were wayfarers. See GERHARDI disput. isagog. p. 557. In the state of glory they are good, in the state of misery they are evil.

Proof a. 1) All things that God made were in the beginning very good, Gen. I, 31. Therefore, also the angels. You say: In the cited place, natural goodness is understood, such as that of simple and mixed bodies. Resp. Goodness is understood that is tempered to the nature of each created thing; but for free agents, of whose number angels are, tempered and suitable goodness is moral; for lacking this they are evil. 2) The devil did not stand in the truth, John VIII, 44. Therefore, before the fall, he was instructed with true wisdom and justice. The reason for the consequence is; because privation presupposes a habit; nor can anyone rightly be said not to persist in a thing, unless the granting of the thing in which he ought to have persevered is presupposed.

Proof b. The good angels διὰ παντός (dia pantos), always see the face of God, Matthew XVIII, 10. Those who have been admitted to the everlasting intuition of God cannot but perpetually enjoy the goodness of God and be most fully satisfied; since before the face of God there is fullness of joys, and pleasures at His right hand. Ps. XVI, 11.

Proof c. That the condition of the fallen angels is most sad, St. Peter teaches in his 2nd Epistle, ch. II, 4. God did not spare the angels who sinned, but, casting them down into chains of darkness, delivered them to be reserved for judgment.

The Antithesis was formerly (1) of the Manichaeans, who stated that not all angels were created good in the first creation, but some were created evil; (2) of certain Pontificians, who deny that the angels were created in justice and holiness, but in a state of pure naturals, i.e., neither just nor unjust. Whose arguments are:

I. Whoever was a murderer from the beginning was not created good. But the devil etc. Therefore. The minor is proven from John VIII, 44. Resp. In the cited place, the beginning of creation is not understood, but of defection, so that the sense is: As soon as the devil departed from the rule of right, he intended the death of men. He enticed the first human parents with a great opening of promises into sin, which death followed. For which reason the author of Wisdom says in ch. II, 24. By the envy of the devil, death entered into the world.

Instance. The devil is said to have sinned from the beginning, 1 John III, 8. Therefore, from the beginning of creation. Resp. (1) John teaches that the devil is the author of sin. (2) John does not say: The devil sinned from the beginning, but sins from the beginning, that is to say: From when the devil first sinned, he did not cease to sin; It is proper and perpetual to him to do evil.

II. If all things were created good by God, God will not be the creator of the devil; for he is the enemy of all goodness; But God is the creator of the devil; Therefore. Resp. The devil is considered either as a creature, or as the devil, a slanderer of the highest good. He was created by God as a creature, not as a slanderer.

Question XI. With what gifts and powers did God instruct the angels in the state of grace?

Angels in the state of grace were adorned by God with exceptional wisdom and perfect holiness.

Proof. (1) Because all angels were created for eternal blessedness; for they were created equal in condition and of the same nature. That some, without consideration of a fall, were created for eternal damnation, is repugnant to divine justice. Therefore, all must have been created for eternal blessedness. Wherefore they were also instructed with sufficient powers and necessary grace, by which they could attain the end for which they were created. That grace imported (1) on the part of the intellect a certain habitual light of the intellect, or concreated knowledge, for knowing God and His will, (2) a habitual holiness of the will, by which the angels in the state of the way could institute and perfect all their actions conformably to the eternal law of God. (2) The devil did not stand in the truth, John VIII, 44, that is, he did not retain the concreated wisdom of the intellect and the true holiness of the will, with which, as with a divine image, the angels were adorned in the first creation. Cf. D. DANNHAV. hodos. phanom. III. p. 284.

You say: If the angels were originally created in exceptional wisdom and perfect justice, they could not have fallen away from God. Resp. Perfect justice was concreated for the angels, but it was not immutable or inamissible. For the will of the angels in the state of grace was not determined to perpetually loving and choosing the good, but God had granted the angels freedom of will with a concreated propensity for the good, so that in them there was not a proximate, but a most remote potential for sinning, consisting in the negation of the impossibility of sinning, and of the inamissibility of the concreated gifts. But the angels, having abused their freedom of will, of their own accord fell away from God, the highest good.

ON THE GOOD ANGELS.

Question XII. Who are the good angels?

Definition of the good angels. The good angels are those who persisted in their concreated true wisdom and holiness, and were illuminated by God with the light of glory, and thus were confirmed in good, so that, immune from the danger of sinning, they might clearly behold God and perpetually enjoy His goodness.

Obs. I. The good angels were confirmed in good when the light of glory was infused into them by God, so that their confirmation in good, as to the matter itself, is nothing other than the infusion of the light of glory, by which they know God intuitively.

Obs. II. In the state of the way, the angels were able not to sin, i.e., there was not in them a proximate power or propensity for sinning, yet there was in them a remote power for sinning; in the state of glory, the angels cannot sin, i.e., in them there is neither a proximate nor a remote power for sinning, but their ἀναμαρτησία (anamartesia), or impeccability, is immutable, and their holiness inamissible.

Proof. 1) From the election of the angels. The good angels are called elect, 1 Tim. V, 21, because by the eternal decree of God they were destined for blessedness without end. For God foresaw the persevering obedience of certain angels, not indeed as a meritorious cause; since the obedience of angels, being due and temporary, does not have the force of merit before God, or the force of impelling His will to decree or give the good of eternal blessedness; but as a certain condition annexed to His decree, which He benevolently regarded, and granted the reward of confirmation to the angels, moved by His most liberal goodness. They were not indeed elected by God as sinful men are said to be elected on account of the merit of Christ apprehended by persevering faith; Yet they were segregated from the fallen angels, and translated to eternal glory.

2) From the beatific vision of God, to which the good angels have been admitted; because διὰ παντός (dia pantos) they always see the face of God, Matthew XVIII, 10. But he who clearly beholds God, the highest good, cannot but perpetually burn with love for Him, since nothing but good and lovable is seen in Him; but he who perpetually loves God cannot sin.

3) From the exemplary holiness of the angels. That angelic holiness is the norm and example of our holiness, Christ teaches in Matthew VI, 10. Therefore, what will of God we ought constantly to do in imitation of the angels, that the angels unceasingly execute. For which reason they are said to celebrate God without end, Is. VI, 3, to minister to Him perpetually, Dan. VII, 10, and to be occupied with no other than holy actions, Ps. CIII, 20.

4) From the eternal blessedness of men, who in eternal life are said to be about to be ισάγγελοι (isangeloi), Luke XX, 36. But the holiness of blessed men will be inamissible; Therefore, also that of the angels.

The Antithesis is 1) of the Arminians, who deny that the confirmation of the good angels can be proven by a solid argument; 2) of the Jews, who maintain that it has often happened that good angels become evil. Whose arguments are:

I. Job says; Behold, he puts no trust in his servants, and his angels he charges with folly. Job. IV, 19. & XV, 15. Behold, he puts no trust in his saints, and the heavens are not pure in his eyes. Resp. The words of Job are to be understood comparatively, that the holiness of the angels, when compared with the divine, is imperfect by many degrees. The former is independent and original, which indeed God has from Himself from eternity; the latter is dependent and participated, as the angels have it from grace, provoked by no merits; which comparative imperfection of the angels is a certain impurity before the most pure eyes of God.

II. Every reward is rejectable; the gift of confirmation is a reward; Therefore. Resp. Every reward in the state of the way is rejectable; but the rewards conferred in the state of glory are eternal and irrejectable.

III. If the elect angels are so confirmed in good that they cannot sin, they will not have perfect freedom of will; The latter is absurd; Therefore, also the former. Resp. Freedom of will towards good and evil does not imply perfection simply as such. For the most perfect liberty is not to be able to sin, by which perfection God, most free in acting, eminently stands out in the highest degree.

Question XIII. Is the glory of the angels confirmed in good to be attributed to an absolute divine decree, or to the angels' own merit?

The glory of the angels, confirmed in good, is to be attributed neither to an absolute divine decree a), nor to the merit of Christ b), nor to angelic merit c), but to the most liberal goodness of God, rewarding the persevering obedience of the angels beyond what is deserved.

Proof a. The absolute decree of God excludes every foreseen condition to be fulfilled in the subject being elected; But the decree of God electing the angels does not exclude every condition to be fulfilled in them; Therefore. The minor is proven 1) From the harmony of the decree and its execution. For just as God in time conferred blessedness only on those angels who persevered in good; so the eternal decree concerning the angels to be saved at some time rested on the prevision of that condition to be fulfilled in time. 2) From the opposite. Just as the devils were not reprobated by an absolute decree of God, but because they did not stand in the truth, John VIII, 44; So the good angels were elected and raised to glory because they stood in the truth and did not desert their own principality, Jude v. 6, 2 Peter II, 4.

Proof b. 1) Christ is called the mediator of God and men, 1 Tim. II, 5, not of angels; whose nature He never assumed into His hypostasis, Hebr. II, 16. But for a mediator, a union of the nature of both parties for whom he ought to intercede as mediator is required. Wherefore, since Christ consists not of an angelic, but of a human and divine nature, He is the mediator only of men and God, not of angels. 2) The Son of man came to save that which was lost, Matthew XVIII, 11. But the angels were never lost, i.e., they were never in a state of corruption. Therefore, Christ did not come to save the angels.

Proof c. Because merit is the performance of an undue work, directed to the benefit of another, to obtain a reward proportionate to the work. But indeed, whatever good work the wayfaring angels performed, it was entirely due; because they were obligated to perform it by the law of creation, conservation, and governance; nor did it result in a benefit to the creator; since He, being most blessed, cannot be increased by any benefit; nor is there any proportion between the temporary angelic obedience and the eternal glory with which the angels have been crowned.

The Antithesis is of the Pontificians, some of whom attribute the crown of angelic confirmation to the merit of Christ, others to angelic merit. Who support their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Whoever are called elect, they have been raised to their glory on account of the merit of Christ; Certain angels are called elect, 1 Tim. V, 21; Therefore. The major is clear from the parallel example of men, who are said to be elected in Christ, Eph. I, 4. Resp. I deny the major. To the proof, we say that the example of men and angels is completely different. For men were elected from perdition, Matthew XVIII, 11. They were sick, miserable, in need of medicine, namely the blood of Christ; and therefore for their cause the savior came into the world. Matthew IX, 12. But the good angels were never in a state of perdition, misery, or sickness; but they are called elect, because by the grace of the creator, rewarding their laudable constancy in the truth beyond what is deserved, they were segregated from the fallen angels, especially beloved by God, confirmed in good, and translated to celestial glory.

II. Christ is called the head of the angels, Eph. I, 22. Therefore, the angels were redeemed by Christ as mediator, and were elected in him. R. Christ is called the head of the angels, not because of an internal influx of mediatorial grace into the angels as members, but because of the excellence, power, direction, and external dominion which belongs to Christ over the angels.

III. God proposed to restore (to reduce to one head, as CHRYSOSTOM interprets), all things in Christ, which are in heaven and on earth, Eph. I, 10, Col. I, 20. Resp. Through that ἀνακεφαλαιώσιν (recapitulation), the angels were not reconciled to God, whom they had never offended; but the concord between angels and men was restored; for the angels had deserted men as enemies, being exacerbated by their disobedience towards the creator; but when men were reconciled to God through Christ, the angels associated themselves with them as friends.

Instance: Therefore, some fruit redounded to the angels from the merit of Christ. Resp. From the restoration of angelic and human concord, no benefit, no perfection returns to the angels, otherwise they would profit for the better as often as a sinner returns to the path.

IV. The angels were elected either by an absolute decree of God, or on account of the foreseen merits of their works; But they were not elected by an absolute decree of God. Therefore. Resp. There is a third option: The angels were elected neither by an absolute decree of God, nor on account of the merits of their works, but with a view to their persevering obedience; which indeed does not rise to the dignity or value of merit; yet it was a condition to be fulfilled in the angels being elected. That constancy in the truth was the way of the kingdom, not the cause of reigning. Therefore, the angels were elected by a respective decree.

Question XIV. Were the attributes of the angels made more eminent by the benefit of confirmation?

The angels, by the benefit of confirmation, obtained more excellent knowledge a), more perfect holiness b), more distinguished liberty c), greater power d), and stricter concord e).

Proof a. The good angels are eminent for most excellent knowledge, and that indeed 1) natural, which by creation is inherent in the angelic intellect. This they did not lose, because they persisted in the truth. John VIII, 44. 2) Experimental, drawn from the observation of many years. The manifold wisdom of God is made known to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places through the church, Ephesians III, 10. 3) Revealed, which they obtain both from the ordinary revelation of the divine word, and from peculiar and extraordinary revelation, 1 Peter 1, 12. 4) Intuitive, since they always see the face of God, Matthew XVIII, 10. To see the face of God does not precisely note the expectation of a divine command, as Arminius wrongly explains (although it connotes the same), but the beatific vision of God. For which reason the good angels know a) God intuitively and immediately. For the light of glory, with which they are divinely suffused, exhibits the divine essence intimately present to the angels, illuminates their intellect most splendidly, and elevates it to see God clearly. From which the good angels are called angels of light, 2 Cor. XI, 14. b) The angels know themselves also intuitively, without an intelligible species. For an angel is not distant from its own intellect, so as to need an intelligible species, but rather the angelic intellect enters into the essential constitution of the angels. c) The angels know other angels and material things abstractively, or through intelligible species, as images. For although the knowing angel has a proportion with another angel, by reason of its spiritual nature; yet the angel which is known is not sufficiently present to the intellect of the knowing angel for it to be able to behold its essence immediately. Therefore, the angels have need of intelligible species, representing others. Concerning material things, this is more easily proven, since they neither have a proportion with the angelic intellect, nor are they sufficiently present or intimately joined to it; which they certainly know through intelligible species, which, in the opinion of many authors, were concreated for them, or impressed upon them by God in their first production. For which reason, since the angels know created things not immediately and intuitively, but abstractively through intelligible species; we gather that angelic cognition is not made only by simple apprehension, but also by composition, as well as by demonstrative or probable discourse, both a priori and a posteriori. For the rest, although the angels are possessed of much knowledge, they are not, however, omniscient, because their knowledge is not infinite. For they do not know 1) without divine revelation, future contingents, with certain and infallible knowledge. The reason is at hand; because no created or finite intellect can know any future thing, except from its causes. But indeed, from freely acting causes, it cannot be inferred that the effect will necessarily be in the future, since such causes, by the very fact that they act freely, can produce the effect, and not produce it. Hence it is that God alone designates Himself by the character of the knowledge of future contingents, Is. XLI, 12. Yet a conjectural knowledge of future contingents, arising from certain external signs, is not to be denied to the angels. For if a prudent man predicts future events; why not the angels, whose whole life is intellectual? 2) The angels do not know certainly and infallibly the secret thoughts of human hearts. For καρδιγνωσία (kardiognosia), or the scrutiny of hearts, is an axiom of the omniscient God alone. You, Jehovah, alone know the heart of the sons of men, says King Solomon, 1 Kings VIII, 39. We readily grant, however, that from external signs the angels can acquire for themselves a probable knowledge of human thoughts.

You say: I. The angels always see the face of God; Matthew XVIII, 10. Therefore, they see all things that are in God, consequently also all the objects of the divine intellect and will; and therefore they see all things that God knows and wills. Resp. The angels see all things that are formally in God; but they do not know all things that are from God virtually, or that can be freely effected by God; otherwise they would know God not intuitively, but comprehensively.

You say: II. Whatever intelligent spirits can make themselves proximately present to the human soul, they can perceive human thoughts; But the angels etc. Therefore. The major is proven; because, where there is an intelligent spirit, a proportioned object, and a close presence, there is intellection. The minor is evident; because angels can enter the human body; for the crassness of the body does not obstruct a spirit; and thus they can make themselves present to the human soul, and perceive its thoughts. Resp. That approximation to the soul does not infer a knowledge of human thoughts, because these are free, not necessary. The blessed in heaven stand most near to God, and yet they do not know His free decrees; so although the angels are most near to the soul, they do not penetrate its free concepts.

Proof b. In the state of grace, the angels were placed outside the potential, at least remote, for sinning; But in the state of glory, the holiness of the angels is so stable and rooted that it excludes even the most remote potential for sinning. For the beatific vision introduces impeccability, Matthew XVIII, 10.

Proof c. To the blessed angels belongs 1) freedom from coercion. For they worship God not coercively, but freely. 2) Freedom from internal necessity; because their will is free and indifferent in order to created goods, so that whatever of them He wills, He can also not will (which is called the liberty of contradiction, or of exercise), or for one to will another (which is the liberty of contrariety, or of specification), unless that one thing, on account of a command from God, must necessarily be sought.

Good angels are perpetually intent on the command and nod of God.

(3) Liberty from misery and the root of misery, sin, and even from the remotest potential for sinning. Which liberty is surely most excellent; For by this the good angels approach in a certain way to the likeness of God, who, being most free in acting, cannot deflect from the rule of righteousness.

Proof d. The good angels obtained great power through creation, and greater through glorification. That good angel, who in the Assyrian army struck down 185,000 soldiers, displayed a specimen of his stupendous power, 2 Kings XIX, 25. Nor is there any doubt that the good angels surpass the evil ones in strength; since they are present for faithful men against the cacodemons, Ps. XXXIV, 8. Apoc. XII, 7. The power of the angels is, however, finite, not infinite; inasmuch as it is not in their power to convert a sinful man, to regenerate, justify, recall him from the dead to life, and make him eternally blessed.

Proof e. In the state of trial, at the point of time in which the fall of the angels occurred, the entire chorus of angels was split into different pursuits; some retained their origin, others deserted their own dwelling. But indeed, angels in the state of blessedness cannot be opposed to each other. For there, full blessedness does not thrive where discord and adversity grow.

Question XV. What works and duties do the good angels perform?

The blessed angels carry out their works and duties by standing before God a), assisting pious men b), and resisting the devils and evil men c). Duties of the Good Angels.

Proof a. The blessed angels stand before God, so that 1) with most joyful psalmody (psalmody) they may sing the praises of Jehovah, Ps. CXLVIII, 2. Is. VI, 2. 2) with most humble worship (worship) they may venerate and adore God, Ps. XCVII, 7. Hebr. 1, 7. 3) with most ready service (service) they may execute the will of God. Ps. CIII, 20. Dan. VII, 10.

Proof b. The good angels assist pious men, partly as individuals, partly as constituted in a society, or a certain hierarchy. They are present with individual men at the entrance, progress, and exit of life. At the entrance of life, they look after the affairs of infants, Matth. XVIII, 10. In the progress of life, they guard the more mature, Ps. XXXIV, 8. XCI, 11. 12. At the exit of life, they accompany the souls of the dying, Luc. XVI, 22.

Proof c. They assist the ecclesiastical state, by promoting the ministry of the divine word. For they were present, as ministers, at the promulgation of the Mosaic law, Deut. XXXIII, 2. Gal. III, 19. They announced the advent of Christ in the flesh, Luc. I, 26. c. II, 9. They cast out idolatry when it creeps into the church, Jude ep. v. 9. They are present in the sacred assemblies to this day, 1 Cor. XI, 10. 1 Tim. V, 21. They bring aid to the political state, by watching over religion and justice, Dan. X, 13. and by defending the magistrate, Dan. VI, 22. They are present for the economic state, by promoting the marriages of the pious, Gen. XXIV, 7, by guarding the family property, Job. I, 10. by protecting children from dangers, Matth. XVIII, 10.

Question XVI. Is a particular guardian angel assigned to each person?

It is not permissible to affirm for certain that a particular guardian angel is assigned by God to each individual person, to accompany him ordinarily in every place and at every time.

Proof. 1) Because, according to the testimony of Holy Scripture, the custody of one faithful person is entrusted to several angels. He has commanded his angels concerning you, Ps. XCI, 11. 2) The examples of Jacob, Gen. XXXII, 2, Elisha, 2 Kings VI, 10, Joshua, Zech. III, 7, Lazarus, Luc. XVI, 22, teach that several angels have attended one man in their company. 3) Several angels rejoice over the repentance of one sinner, Luc. XV, 20.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificiorum (Roman Catholics), asserting that to each person a particular guardian angel has been divinely deputed (*), who strive to support their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Jacob makes mention of one angel, by whose help he was redeemed from all evil, Gen. XLVIII, 16. Resp. The redeeming angel is not a created angel, but uncreated, namely the Son of God, whose role it is to redeem from all evil.

II. One angel, who is called Raphael, led Tobias, Tob. II, 27. Resp. One angel in visible form led Tobias; however, several could have been present with an invisible presence. Nor can it be proven from this example that in every case only one angel accompanies us. Two angels lead Lot out of Sodom, Gen. XIX, 12. Two hosts of Seraphim surrounded Jacob with their protection, Gen. XXXII, 2.

III. The assembled Christians said: It is his angel, Acts XII, 15. Resp. These words were not of the Holy Spirit, but of certain Christians speaking from a common opinion, or a Jewish persuasion. For the Jews believed that a man's angel appears in visible form shortly before, or a little after the man's decease (**).

(*) That opinion of tutelary and domestic genii, which the superstition of profane nations venerated, is very ancient. The JEWS adopted it, like many other products of the human intellect born outside the church, from the time they departed from the ancient faith, and then also the ROMAN-CATHOLICS, although it must not be concealed that certain FATHERS, though not those from the earliest antiquity, were not averse to the same opinion.

(**) Three more things are to be considered. 1) It is asked: whether the word, ἄγγελος (angelos/messenger), in this place denotes a spirit, or a messenger? as elsewhere, e.g., Luc. VII, 24. Jac II, 25. 2) Even assuming this: that a familiar, or guardian, spirit should be

Question XVII. Is there a particular ruling angel as a guardian for each region?

We cannot define for certain that a particular ruling angel is a guardian for each province.

Proof. 1) Entire armies of angels surrounded the city of Dothan, 2 Kings VI, 17. Why then would there not be many angels for entire kingdoms? 2) Entire camps attend and surround one man, Gen. XXXII, 2. Why not an entire province?

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificiorum, according to whose mind a particular ruling angel is the guardian for each region; whose principal argument is that in Dan. X, 12. mention is made of the prince of the kingdom of Persia, who resisted Gabriel. R. By the prince of the kingdom of Persia in the cited passage, one does not understand a good angel set over the kingdom of Persia, but rather a certain courtly cacodemon, who strove to incite the king of Persia and his counselors against the people of the Lord, so that they might not be released from captivity. See D. CALOV, bibl. illustr. in h. l. fol. 674.

Question XVIII. Is there a certain order among the angels?

Order of the good angels. There is no doubt that there is a certain order among the good angels a), but who and what that angelic order is, we think no one in this life knows b).

Proof a. From the general rule, by which God in the church militant wills all things to be done decently and in order, 1 Cor. XIV, 40. There is therefore no doubt that a certain order exists in the church triumphant among the blessed angels, and that it is so much the more perfect, the more splendid the church triumphant is than the militant. 2) From the different denominations of the celestial spirits. St. Paul in Eph. I, 21. says: He (God the Father) has placed (Christ) above all principality, and power, and virtue, and dominion. Likewise Col. 1, 16. In him were created the visible and the invisible, whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, 1 Thess. IV, 16. & Jude Ep. v. 9. mention is made of archangels (*). Different names imply a distinction of angels. 3) From a parallel. There is an order among the evil angels. E. & among the good. The antecedent is clear from Luc. XI, 25. where Beelzebul is called the prince of demons; & Matth. XXV, 41. mention is made of the devil, and his angels.

Proof b. From the different denominations of the angels, it can neither be validly concluded, nor certainly defined, in what the distinction of the angels consists, and how far it extends.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificiorum from PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS lib. I. de cælest. hierarch. cap. 6. distinguishing the angels into nine orders, and these again into three hierarchies, so that in the highest are Seraphim, Cherubim & thrones; in the middle dominions, virtues & powers; in the lowest principalities, archangels. He attempts to support his opinion I. from Dan. VII, 10. A thousand thousands ministered to him, & ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; where the angels are distinguished into ministering and attending. R. It cannot be solidly proven that ministering angels differ from attending ones. For all angels are ministering spirits, Hebr. I, 14. Angels minister by attending, and attend by ministering: just as a minister stands before a prince, to execute his commands. II. The different names of angels indicate different orders. Resp. From the mere diversity of names, without other distinctive marks, to enumerate the determinate orders of angels, is rash.

Question XIX. Are angels to be pursued with the religious cult of adoration?

Angels are not to be religiously adored, nor invoked.

Proof. 1) God alone is to be religiously adored, Deut. VI, 13. Matth. IV, 10. Therefore not angels. Except. God alone is to be adored, understood; what follows from that? The affirmation of one is not the negation of many. 3) The constitution of the case, which is commonly called the state of the controversy, must be strictly held. Those who invent a guardian angel, they imagine him not only to be one, but also a certain one, and always the same one, who, from the tenderest age, is a protection for a man throughout the entire course of his life. Which, indeed, can by no means be effected or deduced from these words.

(*) The divine writers preach not many Archangels, but one, and by the name Michael they designate not a created angel. see Apoc. XII, 7. & 10.

as the first being, and the principal bestower of all good. Angels are to be adored, as friends of God. Resp. Religious adoration flows from true faith, and pertains to the first table of the decalogue, into which it is not permissible to insert the friends of God. Therefore Paul counts θρησκείαν τῶν ἀγγέλων (the worship of angels), the cult of angels, Col. II, 18. 23. among ταῖς ἐθελοθρησκείαις (the voluntary and superstitious worships).

2. Whoever is not omnipotent, omniscient, all-merciful, omnipresent, is not to be invoked. But angels are not omnipotent, omniscient, all-merciful & omnipresent. Therefore. The major is established, because with undoubted confidence of heart we implore the help of him who is omnipotent, that he may be able to help us; omniscient, that he may have our inmost desires perceived; all-merciful, that he may be benevolently inclined to all men; omnipresent, that he may be present everywhere for us who labor.

3. Whoever are ministers of God, they are not to be religiously venerated. But angels &c. Hebr. 1, 14. Therefore.

4. Whatever is refused by angels, that is not to be offered to them. But religious adoration &c. Therefore. The minor is established from Apoc. XIX, 10, c. XXII, 8.

You say: 1. John thought that he whom he was about to adore was not a created angel, but Christ. Resp. Suppose John did not know whether the angel was created or uncreated; yet he heard that a created angel repudiates religious worship.

You say: II. The angel repudiated τὴν λατρείαν (the highest religious worship), due to God alone; he did not refuse τὴν δελείαν (the lower worship), religious worship inferior to the highest, or subordinate. Resp. The distinction between λατρείαν (highest worship) and δελείαν (lower worship) is fabricated; since Holy Scripture uses these words promiscuously. We are certainly bound δελεῦν (to serve) even the eternal God. Matth. VI, 24. 1 Thess. I, 9. Rom. XVI, 18.

You say: III. The angel refused religious worship out of modesty; although he knew that it was due to him by the most just right. Resp. He refused not out of modesty, but with serious feeling, having adduced the most grave reasons for the offered worship not being accepted, a) because he is a fellow servant, b) a brother, c) not God, who alone is to be adored (*).

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificiorum, who persuade themselves that angels can be religiously worshiped, not indeed with the cult of λατρείας (highest worship), which they attribute to God alone, but of δελείας (lower worship), which holds a middle place between the worship of God and of men. They adduce

I. The examples of Abraham, Gen. XVIII. Lot, Gen. XIX. Jacob, Gen. XLVIII. Joshua, c.V. who adored angels. Resp. Dist. between a created angel and an uncreated one; They adored the latter; they pursued the attending angels with civil worship.

II. Angels, on account of their excellence, are to be worshiped either with civil or religious worship. Not with civil worship; because they are not citizens or men, but greater and more eminent than men placed in civil dignity; Therefore with religious worship. Resp. By civil worship is understood either strictly the worship appropriate to men, or broadly all non-religious worship, or moral reverence. There are, however, degrees of non-religious worship according to the greater or lesser excellence of creatures. But degree does not vary the species; nor is religious worship founded on the finite excellence of God.

III. Angelic worship is commanded to us, Job. V, 1. Call now, is there any that will answer thee? and to which of the saints wilt thou turn? Resp. By saints in this passage,

(*) It is especially worthy of contemplation that in those places of scripture where the protection of angels is either promised to be provided, or is preached as already provided, there is a deep silence about each and every part of religious worship that would pertain to them. Indeed, so far is it from anything being written about religiously worshiping them, that in those very places all religion is referred to the one God, specifically trust, Ps. XXXIV, 8. add. v. 9. XCI. 1. 9. 10. 11. Dan. VI, 22. add. V, 23. both prayer, then adoration and praise, Dan. VI, 22. 26. 27. Act. XII. 11. then supplication, or what is commonly called invocation, Pl XCI, 11. coll. with. v. 14. 15. But surely in these very places, in which the benefit of angels divinely given to us is discussed by design, as in its proper place, something should have been commanded, or commemorated, about some religious worship to be offered to angels, if any such thing were fitting for them? But we see neither a command nor an example anywhere.

angels are not understood, but holy men. Eliphaz indicates that no one among the saints is found whom God has overwhelmed with such great miseries as Job. Therefore he says: Call, or name, I ask, does anyone attest that he is like you. To which of the saints wilt thou turn? Whose example of a pious man will you be able to produce? (**)

IV. Angels carry our prayers to God, Apoc. VIII, 3. Tob. XII, 12. E. our prayers can be commended to the angels, so that they may be carried by them to God. R. The angel whom John mentions, Apoc. VIII, 3. is uncreated, or the Son of God; inasmuch as a priestly act, which created angels do not perform, is attributed to him. But the angel of Tobias in the apocryphal book does not deserve faith, for he committed a lie, Tob. V, 12. & suggested to Tobias superstitious and profane counsel. c. VI, 4. Christ alone is our advocate carrying our prayers to God, 1 Jo. II, 2. & the only priest, obtaining a hearing for us by his intercession, Heb. VII, 25. Moreover, assuming, but not conceding, that angels offer our prayers to God, they are not for that reason to be religiously venerated.

V. Angels are our intercessors. Therefore they can be invoked. The antecedent is proven from Job. XXXIII, 23. If there be an angel with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to shew unto man his uprightness. Resp. (1) Not all intercessors are to be religiously invoked. (2) There is nothing in the text about the intercession of an angel; but the office of an angel is described, that he should announce to man righteousness, or justice, through which he ought to be delivered, or saved. That angel is Christ. Vid. D. SEB. SCHMID. in commentar. in Job. ad h. l. p. 161. sequ.

VI. The Apostle John prays for grace and peace from the seven Spirits, who are before the throne of God. Apocal. I, 4. Those seven Spirits are seven angels according to the mind of the Pontificiorum, who argue with the following reason: It is licit and proper to invoke those from whom the apostle John prays for grace and peace. But from the angels &c. Therefore. Resp. By the seven apocalyptic Spirits, angels are not understood. For it is repugnant (1) to the Analogy of faith, to seek from created angels grace and spiritual peace, of which the source and bestower is God alone, Rom. XI, 36. Jacob. I, 17. (2) The seven apocalyptic spirits are placed between two divine and uncreated persons. Therefore, created spirits are not designated by them. For in the order of the holy benediction no creature is to be placed between two divine persons. (3) The seven spirits are honored with the same worship with which God the Father and the Son are honored; which worship is λατρεία (highest worship) due to the eternal God alone. For which reason, by 'the seven spirits' we understand the Holy Spirit, who in respect to essence and person is indeed one, but is described metonymically by John through the number seven, on account of the multitude and perfection of the charisms, which the Holy Spirit poured out largely and abundantly on those seven Asiatic churches, of which mention is made in the apocalypse, just as if there were as many Spirits, each working perfectly in his own church. All the pious, who pray for grace and peace from the triune God, invoke this Holy Spirit, one in nature, and sevenfold in office, with God the Father and the Son. Conf. 2 Cor. XIII, 13.

VI. It is permissible to address men, that they may intercede for us with God: Therefore also angels. Resp. The sacred letters do not teach us to ask for the intercession of deceased men. We do indeed seek the prayers of the living for us, but from this it is wrong to conclude: Therefore angels can be invoked, that they may intercede for us. For (1) we have a divine command for seeking the mutual suffrages of the living, Jacob. V, 14. There is no command for (**) Four points are to be weighed: 1) These are the words of Eliphaz, disputing against Job, not of God commanding, 2) The discourse is instituted concerning the dead. Therefore of the holy angels? or of the blessed men? which? what kind? how great? the saints are called men, who, still mortal, are among the living: 3) As to what pertains to the predicate: look, or turn to! is it thus for adoring them, or for supplicating them? by no means; but for investigating and knowing, whether any of the saints is so conspicuous for perfect sanctity, that he has something of which he himself might boast before God? see the entire context, but especially the preceding chap. IV, 18. 4) The error of the common interpreter is to be noted. In the sources, the sense of the words is completely contrary: מְקַרְשִׁים תַּפְנֶה (to which of the holy ones will you turn?) This is, to absolutely none. For it is a most well-known hermeneutical rule: An affirming question denies most strongly. The Rev. DEYLINGIVS has explained more fully on this argument, obs. S. T. I. 28.

imploping the patronage of angels. (2) The imploring of the suffrages of the faithful in the church is a dutiful invitation and a work of charity; but the invocation of angels according to the mind of the dissenters is a religious δέλεια (lower worship). (3) The mutual intercession of the faithful is not ἱλαστική (satisfactory or expiatory); but συναγωνιστική (a striving together) of the members of the church militant, praying for each other as if in concert. Paul teaches this quasi-comilitant intercession in Rom. XV, 30. I beseech you, brethren, by our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love of the Spirit, συναγωνισαθαί μοι (that you strive together with me) in prayers for me to God. But angels do not strive together with us in prayers, since they are not members of the church militant; nor do they conflict with the same enemies and miseries by which Christians are assailed.

Question XX. Was the angel seen by the eyes of the fathers in the O.T., and described in various places as God, created or uncreated?

The angel seen by the fathers in the O.T. in visible form, called Jehovah, described by attributes and works proper to God alone, and honored with divine worship, was an uncreated angel, namely the Son of God, preluding His future incarnation.

This is proven by a general syllogism: That angel to whom are attributed names proper to God, the essential attributes of God, truly divine works, and the religious worship of adoration and invocation, was not a created angel, but uncreated, namely the Son of God. But to the angel seen by the fathers in the O.T. are attributed names &c. E. Min. is clear, because the Angel who was the monitor to the fugitive Hagar, Gen. XVI, 7; the principal guest of Abraham, attended by two ministering angels, Gen. XVIII, 1; the rescuer of Lot, Gen. XIX, 18; the consoler of Hagar, Gen. XXI, 7; the wrestler with Jacob, Gen. XXXII, 24; the redeemer of Jacob, Gen. XLVIII, 16; the dweller in the bush, Exod. III, 2; the leader of Israel from Egypt through the desert into the land of Canaan, Exod. XIII, 21. c. XV, 19, C. XXIII, 20; the restrainer of Balaam, Num. XXII, 28; the Prince of the army of the Lord and commander of Joshua, Jos. V, 11; the instructor of Manoah, Jud. XIII, 18; is distinguished by divine names, is described by the essential attributes of God, is said to have performed truly divine works, and is honored with religious worship.

Inspect the biblical context in all these places, and cf. D. CALOV. Syst. t. IV. from p. 211. up to p. 283. and with him D. QUENSTED. p. 1. theol. did. pol. from f. 494. up to f. 509.

The Antithesis is that of the Pontificiorum & Socinians, denying that the Son of God appeared in a visible form, such as angels were accustomed to be seen in, in the O.T. Their arguments are:

I. Whoever in the last times has spoken with men, he did not speak to the fathers in the O.T. But Christ &c. Hebr. I, 2. E. Resp. Dist. between an ordinary visible prophet, and an extraordinary one. Christ in the N.T., as an ordinary prophet, in the flesh hypostatically (ὑποστατικῶς) assumed, was seen and spoke. In the O.T. the Son of God by an economy for a certain time spoke to the fathers extraordinarily, and offered himself to be seen by a few.

II. If the Son of God appeared according to His own person, as an angel in the O.T., He appeared either in an angelic or a human form. Not in an angelic form; since that cannot be seen; nor in a human form; for from this He cannot be called an angel. Therefore He did not appear at all according to His own person, as an angel, in the O.T. R. The Son of God in the O.T. appeared in the visible form of a certain man, such as angels were otherwise accustomed to be seen in; He is called an angel, on account of His mission from the father to a high, extraordinary prophetic office.

III. Whoever is therefore called an angel, because he was sent by God, is not the supreme God; But by the evangelical doctors the λόγος (logos/word) is therefore called an angel, because he was sent by God; Therefore the λόγος (logos/word) is not the supreme God. R. Dist. between a mission made by command; & made by voluntary consent. Whoever is called an angel on account of a mission from God made by command, is not the supreme God, I concede. But the Son of God was sent by the Father with the freest consent. It is, however, agreed among all, that an equal can send an equal who consents.

IV. If the Son of God appeared in an angelic form, God the Father also appeared in the same; The consequent is absurd; E. & the antecedent. The consequence of the major is proven; because an appearance in a visible form is a work of God ad extra. But the divine works ad extra are undivided, i.e. common to all three persons of the divinity.

Resp. That appearance was indeed a divine work ad extra, but not essential, but personal. But personal works ad extra, in respect to their principle, are common, but in respect to their term they are appropriated to one person of the divinity. A parallel example is the Holy Spirit, who appeared in the visible form of a dove.

V. Jehovah in the O.T., according to our opinion, appeared as an angel; God the Father is Jehovah; E. God the Father, in our opinion, appeared as an angel. Resp. Jehovah in the major is taken relatively, and denotes the Son of God. Therefore in the minor it is wrongly subsumed of God the Father.

VI. The Son of God appeared in the O.T. either in His own hypostasis, or through a legate, that is, an angel; Not in His own hypostasis, because that is invisible; E. Through an angel. Resp. Christ appeared in His own hypostasis, but clothed in a visible form, which we call angelic; because in such a visible symbol angels were accustomed to appear.

VII. Whoever teaches that the Son of God, by assuming an angelic form, appeared in His own person, must teach that the angelic form was the proper hypostasis of the Son of God. But orthodox doctors ought not to teach this; because the Son of God did not assume angels into His hypostasis, but the seed of Abraham, Hebr. II, 16. The major is proven, because the Son of God terminates that angelic form as personally united to Himself. Resp. The major is denied. To the proof we say, that the λόγος (logos/word) terminates the angelic form, not as personally united, but as accidentally and extrinsically attached, inasmuch as He clothed Himself with it, and economically (οικονομικῶς) offered Himself to be seen by it; just as the Holy Spirit joined the form of a dove to Himself not hypostatically (ὕποστατικῶς), but paratactically (παράτακτικῶς).

VIII. An angel is a messenger and a legate, and is subject to him by whom he is sent; Therefore Christ ὁσαρκος (unincarnate), and outside the business of incarnation and redemption, is not to be called an angel, unless we wish to concede to the Arians that Christ is inferior to God the Father. Resp. (1) The word angel designates a mission, but does not necessarily include ministry and inferiority. (2) The name angel is attributed to the Son of God indeed outside the business of incarnation and redemption; but not outside of respect to the same.

IX. A created angel, sustaining the person of God, can assume His name, be adorned with the same attributes, and be honored with the same worship as God; E. From the proper name of God, divine attributes, and the most humble worship in the apparitions, it cannot be validly concluded that the angel seen by the fathers in the O.T. was the Son of God. Resp. Angels do not assume the proper name of God, nor do they suffer divine worship to be attributed to them. That arrogance is far from the modesty of angels, far from the λειτουργία (service); by which they minister to God. Conf. Apoc. XIX. 10.

ON THE EVIL ANGELS

Question XXI. Who are the evil angels?

Definition of evil angels. The evil angels are those who did not persevere in the concreated wisdom and justice, but having turned away of their own will from God and the rule of right, they became perpetual enemies of God and men, to be tormented with eternal sufferings.

Question XXII. Why are certain angels called evil?

Certain angels are called evil not on account of the essence which they have from God, but on account of their spontaneous apostasy, that is, the free aversion of their will from God the highest good, and from the rule of right, which however they were able to keep by the grace of creation.

Proof. (1) The devil did not stand in the truth, says the Savior in John VIII, 44. By the truth here is understood the concreated perfection of wisdom and justice, with which, as with a divine image, the angels were adorned in their first creation; He did not stand, i.e., he did not persevere. Therefore, before he fell, he had the truth actually impressed and concreated, the strength, arms, and aids to render faith to God and to obtain (not indeed meritoriously) the crown of confirmation, and to avoid the fall. Conf. DANNHAV. in hodofoh. phen. 111. p. 284.

(2) The apostle Jude describes the apostasy of certain angels with most memorable words in his epistle v. 6. And the angels who did not keep their own origin, but left their proper dwelling, he has reserved in everlasting chains under darkness for the judgment of the great day. Obs. (a) By ἀρχὴν (origin/principality) we understand the original state of the angels, which embraces both the internal perfection of the intellect and will of the angels, and the external dignity of the angels. From which some interpreters have rendered ἀρχὴν in Latin as principatum, D. LVTHERVS, ihr Fürstenthum (their principality). (b) Οἰκητήριον (dwelling) designates the happy and in its own way blessed mansion of the angels, yet not perfectly glorious, which the beatific vision and the gift of confirmation makes serene. Conf. DANNHAV. l.c. p. 285. The angels could have retained their principality and their dwelling; But they of their own accord deprived themselves of both.

(3) The apostle Peter makes mention of the angelic fall, 2 Ep. II, 4. saying: God did not spare the angels who sinned. Ἀμαρτάνειν (to sin) properly signifies to deviate from a rule. Thence ἀμαρτία (sin) is called ἀνομία (lawlessness), 1 Jo. III, 4. St. Peter therefore implies that certain angels transgressed against the divine will, the rule of all justice.

Question XXIII. How could the angels, created wise and holy, have fallen?

The fall of the angels, adorned with the concreated perfection of intellect and will, was not impossible; because the sanctity inherent in them in the state of grace was not immutable.

Proof. Although God created all angels good and holy; He had not, however, determined the will of the angels in the first creation to always and everywhere choose the good; but He had granted them free will for good and evil, so that there was in them by the force of the concreated divine image a propensity for good, and a most remote potentiality for evil. Hence it happened that not a few of the angels, having turned away from the good by a voluntary abuse of free will, converted themselves to evil.

Question XXIV. What was the first sin of the fallen angels?

The sacred letters teach in general that the angels sinned; but they do not explicitly express what the special first sin of the angels was, from which, as from a fountain, the other sins of the angels flowed a). First sin of the fallen. We gather with probability that pride was the first sin of the angels b).

Proof a. The apostle Peter in 2 ep. II, 4. describes the fallen angels in general as sinners unworthy of pardon; but he does not determine the species of the first sin into which they fell.

Proof b. It is probably gathered that a certain angel of a supreme order, more excellent, affected a deformity or a perfection and dignity more eminent than the concreated one, and seduced other angels either by example or by some persuasion. 1) From the temptation with which Satan attacked and conquered our first parents, Gen. III, 5. For he instilled in them the desire for a perfection more eminent than the concreated divine image. The devil seems to have committed the same sin to which he instigated the first humans. 2) From the usual machinations of Satan, by which he goes about arrogating the glory of God to himself, Matth IV, 9. 3) Because the beginning of sin is said to be pride.

You say: Envy seems to have been the first sin of the devil. For he is called the father of lies and a murderer from the beginning, Jo. VIII, 44. But he who from the beginning was a liar and a murderer, was from the beginning envious. From which it may be gathered that envy towards the human race to be blessed with celestial glory was the first sin of the devil. Resp. The devil was not a liar or a murderer simply and absolutely from the beginning, but relatively, from the time the correlative, or the object of envy, namely man, existed: But envy is the offspring of pride. Therefore, it is consistent with the truth that the first sin of the angels was pride (*); which was accompanied by many sins, contempt of the eternal Deity,

(*) So that it may be quite apparent, not only that this opinion is very probable, but also that it can be easily reconciled with that by which some have reasoned that envy was the very first sin, let us first define what pride is, or rather arrogance. It is indeed a vice of the mind, by which someone not content with his own lot insolently exalts himself, and attributes more to himself than is proper and consistent with the divine will. We consider each one's lot in a threefold way, 1) of his duty towards a superior and one who commands, 2) of his own condition, dignity, and felicity, 3) of his conjunction with others, whose condition is either equal or inferior. E. the sin of arrogance is committed in three ways: 1) by deserting the duty owed to a superior, and indeed to one who commands, 2) by aspiring to a greater dignity and felicity than is fitting, 3) by despising others and envying them. For refusal of obedience, lying, envy, and others of that kind.

Question XXV. Was the sin of the angels very grave?

The sin of the angels was by far the most grave and most atrocious.

Proof. The atrocity of the angelic sin is estimated 1) from the object injured, which is God, the best and greatest creator of the angels; 2) From the safeguards with which they could have avoided evil. For the intellect of the angels shone with the light of exceptional wisdom. The will was eminent with perfect sanctity; 3) From the manner of sinning. For the angels sinned not from infirmity, or inadvertence, but from full understanding, deliberate counsel, and a voluntary abuse of free will, with no one instigating them.

Question XXVI. Are the fallen angels under a certain standard-bearer?

It is probable that the evil angels fell under a certain leader or prince, whom the sacred scripture calls Satan and the devil a). Who either by persuasion, or by example, enticed many angels to the fellowship of the same sin b).

Proof a. 1) Because in the singular the devil is said not to have stood in the truth, Jo. VIII, 44. 2) Because the same is called ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων (prince of the demons), Luc. XI, 15.

Proof b. In Apoc. XII, 4. mention is made of the angels of Satan; Where Satan denotes him who is most opposed to God, the rest are only called angels of Satan; because they followed the persuasion and example of this adversary of God in sinning. Conf. Matth XXV, 41.

Question XXVII. At what time did the angels fall?

The angels fell not within the six days of creation, but after that was completed a). Before the fall of the first humans, in the second week of the created world, on an uncertain day b). The time of their fall.

an elated and arrogant mind will not bear or admit anyone superior to itself, nor an equal and a participant in its dignity and felicity. E. envy is a certain species of arrogance. Thus defined, let us apply it to this case with a twofold argumentation. I. Sin is ἀνομία (lawlessness), a defection from the law; The sum of the entire law is love, from which one virtue all good actions arise; E' all vices and sins draw their origin from the defect of love and from hatred. Love is threefold; Love towards God, to which rebellion and denial of duty is opposed; Love in oneself, to which is opposed the neglect of the felicity and dignity suitable for oneself, and the unjust pursuit either of a false and specious felicity, or of the greatest dignity, which by rashly affecting it, one harms oneself more than benefits; Love towards others who are companions in dignity and felicity, if not of the same, certainly of some similar kind, to which contempt and envy are contrary. But the whole of arrogance consists of those three parts (by definition); E. this sin was the beginning of all. II. It is most likely that the malignant spirit with his company did not defect from God before that very time when he himself instigated and enticed the first humans to sin. I conjecture this from the words of Christ, John VIII, 44. τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐχ ἔστηκεν (he did not stand in the truth). E. the devil then fell into sin, when he deviated from the truth. But our Liberator speaks of truth specially regarded not only in acting (in the words previously spoken; θέλετε ποιεῖν [you wish to do]); but also especially in speaking (as is apparent from the subsequent words; οὐκ ἔστιν ἀλήθεια ἐν αὐτῷ. ὅταν λαλῇ τὸ ψεῦδος, ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων λαλεῖ, ὅτι ψεῦστος ἐστὶ, καὶ ὁ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ [there is no truth in him. When he speaks a lie, he speaks from his own resources, for he is a liar and the father of it]), and indeed, from the beginning of his defection, as soon as he began to be διάβολος (devil), who had been ἄγγελος (angel). E. the devil began to sin then at last, when he himself, having become a liar, deceived men. But in that false and fallacious persuasion, with which he indeed imposed on them, all three parts of arrogance were associated; 1) Neglect and denial of duty; since indeed he resisted God, whom he ought to have obeyed in every way, by being an author and persuader to men not to do what was commanded; 2) Affectation of the highest dignity and felicity; for he both demanded that greater faith be given to his words than to the divine ones, and willed that the blessedness, suitable for created things capable of a blessed life, be entirely equal to the divine, and in the most perfect comparison with the blessedness of God Himself; 3) Envy; for which reason he is named ἀνθρωποκτόνος (murderer), John VIII, 44. by which that saying is confirmed, Wisdom II, 24.

Proof a. Having completed the works within six days, the most wise creator added the praise of goodness: For God saw everything that he had made, and it was very good, Gen. 1, 31. But if all the creatures made within the six days were, in God's judgment, good, how are the angels to be considered to have left their original goodness within that six-day period?

Proof b. The fall of the angel undoubtedly preceded the fall of man; otherwise, if he had persisted in the truth, he would not have solicited man to sin. And yet the time of the angelic fall does not extend beyond the second week of the created world. For the devil is a murderer from the beginning, Jo. VIII, 44. and so he did not retain his origin for long.

Question XXVIII. Do the evil angels in their state of misery have some knowledge, freedom of action, and power?

The fallen angels have a) a certain knowledge, but it is surrounded by the darkness of doubts and errors. b) Their will, cast down to evil, does not enjoy that freedom which implies indifference to good and evil, or to several goods; but their freedom is engaged with particular evils. c) Their power is indeed superior to human power, yet it is bound by divine virtue, so that they can effect nothing without the permission of God.

Proof a. The evil angels know God, themselves, the state of this universe, and certain future things. They know God indeed, but so as to shudder completely at this θεογνωσίαν (knowledge of God). You believe that there is one God; you do well. But even the demons believe, and (yet) they tremble, Jac. II, 19. The evil angels know themselves. For if the spirit of man, which is in man, knows the things that are in man, 1 Cor. II, 11. Why should not the same be held for the evil angels? The evil angels know the state of this universe. This we learn from Job. 1, 6. where Satan says that he has roamed the earth. Conf. 1 Petr. V, 8. The evil angels know certain future things. Namely, they know certainly and evidently future things which proceed from determined causes and, according to the order of nature, always behave in the same way, e.g., they know for certain the eclipses of the sun and moon from their causes. But contingent future things, which depend on free will, the demons either know for certain from divine revelation, Job. 1, 12, 1 Kings XXII, 22. or they foreknow with natural sagacity probably from the dispositions of men, their temperaments, customs, and present affairs, diligently observed, but in such a way that this foreknowledge is uncertain and fallacious. Hence it happens that the event does not always correspond to diabolical predictions.

Proof b. Concerning particular evils, the demons have a certain freedom of will, insofar as from several evils they can choose this and not choose it (which is the liberty of exercise or contradiction); also to choose one over another (which is the liberty of contrariety, or of specification).

Proof c. That the power of the evil angels is great is clear from the fact that the devil is called by Christ ισχυρὸς (a strong armed man), Luc. XI, 22. and by Paul the malignant spirits are called ἐξουσίαι καὶ κοσμοκράτορες (powers and world rulers), Eph. VI, 12. But that the power of the demons is circumscribed by certain limits by God is clear from the fact that they can do only as much as is permitted to them by the secret command of the Almighty, as AUGUSTINE says in lib. II. de C. D. c. 23. Conf. Exod. VIII, 18. Job. I, 12. Matth. VIII, 13.

Question XXIX. What are the operations of the evil angels?

Operations of the evil angels. The operations of the evil angels are indeed various; but all are directed to the undermining of the divine glory a), and to the temporal no less than the eternal perdition both of individual men and of the hierarchical states b).

Proof a. The great dragon instructs and arms his angels against Michael, i.e., Christ, to destroy his kingdom, Apoc. XII, 7.

Proof b. The evil angels burn with the desire to harm both individual men and the three hierarchies. For they often inflict diseases on the bodies of men, Luc. XIII, 11. They lay snares for and do violence to the wealth of men, Job. 1, 12, they possess souls as well as bodies, and they delude the senses of men with specters, and cast fear upon them.

Question XXX. How many kinds of diabolical obsession are there?

Diabolical obsession is twofold, spiritual and corporal. The former is that by which the devil blinds the minds of impious men, instructs them with the worst counsels, instigates them to nefarious sins, and leads them, as if captured in snares, according to his will a). The latter is that by which an impure spirit, with God permitting and vindicating past sins, enters the bodies of men, dwells within them according to his substance, and operates in them b).

Proof a. (1) The god of this age has blinded the senses of the unbelievers, lest the light of the gospel should shine on them, Eph. II, 2. (2) He put this counsel into the heart of Judas, that he should betray Jesus. Jo. XIII, 2. (3) He investigated David, to number the people, 1 Chron. XXI, 1. (4) Many he ζωγρεῖ (captures alive), i.e., he snares them like beasts, and leads them according to his will 2 Tim. II, 16.

Proof b. The sacred letters teach that possessed men, who are also called demoniacs, energumens, and the seized, are occupied by substantially present demons and are vexed in a horrible manner, Matth. VI, 24. c. VIII, 28. c. IX, 32. c. XII, 22. Luc, IV, 33. Acts. VIII, 7. c. XIX, 12. and experience testifies to it (*).

Question XXXI. What are the causes of corporal obsession?

The efficient cause of obsession is the devil a); the meritorious cause is sin b); the cause vindicating or punishing sin with corporal obsession by the devil is God c); the intermediate end is punishment or chastisement d); the ultimate is the manifestation of divine justice, wisdom, and power e).

Proof a. The devil is in the possessed κατ' οὐσίαν καὶ ἐνέργειαν (according to substance and operation), by a substantial and operative presence. For he dwells in them according to his substance, see Luc. IV, 33. and he takes to himself many more unclean spirits as companions, Luc. XI, 26. Marc. IV, 6. and he performs stupendous and most foul operations in them, Matth. VIII, 28. c. XV, 22. on account of which horrible ἐνεργείας (operations), or workings, they are called ἐνεργούμενοι (the possessed/energumen).

Proof b. Sin is either original, or actual, and this is either involuntary, or voluntary or proaeretic. Mostly the causes of corporal obsession are proaeretic sins, perseveringly continued; such as contempt of the divine word, carnal security, curses and blasphemies, debauchery and adultery, drunkenness, avarice, pride, a desired pact with evil spirits. St. Paul delivered the incestuous man to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, 1 Cor. V. 5. However, God sometimes permits the devil to corporally possess a man, polluted indeed by original and involuntary sin, but not by proaeretic sin. An example for us is that lunatic, Marc. IX, 21. whom a mute and deaf devil had occupied from boyhood.

(*) That obsession of the body, truly and properly so called, existed especially in that age when Christ went to destroy the works of the devil, in the land of Judea, and that the δαίμονες (demons), of which mention is made in the sacred letters, cannot but be malignant spirits, we prove with these arguments against TH. HOBBS, BALTH. BECKER, and his likes, BERNARD LAMY and others: 1) Those demons are called διάβολος (devil), Acts X, 38. and also ὁ σατανᾶς (satan), Matth. XII, 26. Luc. X, 18. 19. inasmuch as both names were never used in all of Greece, neither for the diseases with which bodies are afflicted, nor for the vices with which minds are thoroughly depraved, was it ever customary to impose. 2) They are distinguished from the sick, and indeed from all of them, Matth. IV, 24. X, 8. Luc. VIII, 2. Marc. XVI, 17.18. As for vices, these are named ἔργα τοῦ διαβόλου (the works of the devil), 1 Jo. III, 8. E. they differ from the evil demon himself, as an effect from its cause. 3) A certain prince and prefect is assigned to them, Matth. XII, 24. 26. Luc. XI, 18. 4) Their multitude in one man is said to be so great that it cannot be understood of diseases, Luc. VIII, 27.30. 5) Effects are attributed to them, which we can by no means interpret of any disease, whether of the mind or of the body; especially two: (a) the incredible strength of the possessed, Marc. V, 3. Matth. VIII, 28. (b) the migration of those expelled from a man into the bodies of brute animals, as in Matth. VIII, 31. 32. Lo! what a clever interpretation is to be expected, assuming the ὑποθέσει (hypothesis) either of BECKER, who wants diseases of the body, and especially that which is called melancholy, to be understood, or of LAMY, in whose opinion the δαίμονες (demons) were vices of the mind. For if δαίμονες (demons) are to be thought of as nothing but diseases, either natural, or moral, namely vices; what will happen in this way? Certainly it is effected that the swine at one moment in time were all afflicted with the very same diseases from which the men were now liberated, and so perhaps they were seized with melancholy, or contaminated with enormous depravity!

Proof c. God, by the corporal obsession of a cacodemon, either as a most just judge, vindicates the grave sins of the impious; or as the best father, he afflicts the pious with that plague, so that they may be chastised and tested: Just as with God's permission Satan struck Job with a sore boil, and his angel buffeted Paul, Job. II, 7. 2 Cor. XII, 7. (*) Although it should be well observed that Job and Paul were afflicted not by an internal inhabitation of Satan, but by an external assistance. For corporal diabolical obsession, it is required that the demon αὐτοπροσώπως (in person) occupy the body of a man, and torment it.

Proof d. & e. From what has already been said, it is clear that the intermediate end of diabolical obsession, on the part of God, is partly τιμωρίαν (punishment), a penalty inflicted by an angry God; partly παιδείαν (chastisement), a discipline originating from a propitiated God. The ultimate end, on the part of God, is the manifestation of divine justice, by which sins are vindicated; of wisdom, by which a certain limit is set to diabolical fury; of power, by which Satan is expelled. On the part of the devil indeed, the end of corporal obsession is the perdition of man; which, however, God, for His immense goodness, often turns into the salvation of the possessed, so that they may repent and be saved. Conf. Matth. XV, 28. 1 Cor. V, 5.

Question XXXII. What are the signs of corporal obsession?

Various signs of corporal obsession are recounted, of which some are proper to the possessed; some are common to melancholics, ecstasies, and the frenzied, and therefore they are to be taken and considered not disjointly, but conjointly, lest we take those afflicted with grave diseases for the possessed.

Proof. The signs of corporal obsession are: 1) Knowledge of foreign languages and disciplines, acquired with no study; 2) Knowledge and manifestation of hidden and future things; 3) Speech, made with an open mouth, without the proper disposition of the organs; 4) Representation of small birds, sheep, oxen, pigs, bears &c.; 5) More than human strength in carrying immense burdens; 6) Horrendous blasphemies spewed against the most holy deity; 7) Most agile contortions of the bodies without dissolution of the body's frame, Luc. IV, 35. 8) Impure, savage, terrible gestures and acts, e.g., they sometimes foam at the mouth, gnash their teeth, throw themselves into water, into fire, and strive to commit suicide; 9) Grave vexation inside in the viscera and parts of the body, and swelling of the belly; 10) Cessation of the senses, both internal and external, and of the faculty of locomotion, Matth. XV, 22. c. XVII, 16. Luc. VIII, 25-35. Marc. I, 24.

Question XXXIII. What are the antidotes against corporal obsession?

The most present antidotes against corporal obsession are prayers and fasting.

Proof. from Matth. XVII, 21. But this kind (of demons) does not go out, except by prayers and fasting. From which it was the solemn custom of the primitive church to proclaim days of fasting, to institute public gatherings, to bring the demoniac into the church, and to send up pious prayers to heaven over him. AUGUSTIN. lib. XXII, de C. D. c. 8.

Question XXXIV. Do demons also delude men with specters?

The sacred letters teach that cacodemons delude men with specters.

Proof: 1) The שַׁעִירִים (satyrs), commonly so called, appearing in the form of goats, Is. XIII, 21. &c. XXXIV, 14. were specters. 2) The author of Wisdom says of specters; c. XVII, 3.4. They were troubled with apparitions --- and phantoms with weeping faces appeared. 3) In the N.T. mention is made of specters, Matth. XIV, 26. Luc. XXIV, 37.

Question XXXV. Are specters the souls of the dead?

Specters are not the souls of the dead

Proof. The souls of the impious dead do not return to this life, Luc. XVI, 26. But the souls of the pious rest in the hand of God, Sap. III, 1.

(*) That the ἄγγελον τοῦ Σατανᾶ (angel of Satan), by which the divine man complains he was vexed, were ψευδοαποστόλους (false apostles), and that the word, κολαφίζειν (to strike with the fist/buffet), designates any calamities whatsoever, joined with the greatest ignominy, and stirred up against him, an innocent man, by their frauds, I gather from a comparison of this saying with the preceding c. XI, 13. 14. 15. as well as the following c. XII, 10.

Question XXXVI. By what means are specters driven away?

Specters are driven away by a) unconquered faith, b) ardent prayers, c) serious amendment of life, d) constant patience.

Proof a. We resist the devil, steadfast in the faith, 1 Petr. V, 9. This is the shield, with which we receive the fiery darts of the devil. Eph. VI, 16.

Proof b. Demons are put to flight by prayer and fasting. Matth. XVII, 21.

Proof c. Let those infested by specters amend their vices with virtues. For Christ teaches in Luc. XI, 24. 25. 26. that the devil for the most part delights in those dwellings which are contaminated with various filth.

Proof d. Behold! we call them blessed who have suffered. You have heard of the patience of Job, and you have seen the end of the Lord; for the Lord is very merciful, and a comforter. Jac. V, 11. He who sustains the incursions of demons with a placid mind, reflects from time to time that all things work together for good for those who love God, Rom. VIII, 28.

Question XXXVII. With what operations are demons occupied concerning the hierarchical states?

The cacodemons constantly meditate to disturb, shake, and utterly overthrow the ecclesiastical a), political b), and economic c) states.

Proof a. The devil and his angels vehemently oppose the ecclesiastical state, 1) by spreading heresies; for the devil, a most cunning enemy, sows tares in the field of the church, while men are buried in the sleep of security. Matth. XIII, 27. 2) By impeding the efforts of the pious ministers of the church. Satan hindered Paul when he was about to go to the Thessalonians. 1 Thess. II, 18. 3) By calling away the minds of the hearers from the meditation and practice of the divine word; for the devil takes away the seed of the word from the heart of the hearers, Luc. VIII, 12. 4) By exciting persecutions against the kingdom of Christ; for the infernal dragon fights against Michael. Apoc. XII, 7.

Proof b. The devil disturbs the political state, 1) by shaking the harmony of the republic either with internal dissensions, or with external wars. Thus a malignant spirit incited Ahab to undertake war against the Syrians. 1 Kings XXII, 21. 2) By suggesting unjust and destructive counsels to rulers; such as the counsel to number the people, which he supplied to David. 1 Chron. XXII, 1.

Proof c. The devil afflicts the economic state, 1) by distracting the minds of spouses; for he is a murderer from the beginning, who delights in sowing discord, Jo. VIII, 44. 2) By laying snares for the children and goods of spouses. The devil deprived the most pious Job of both his wealth and his children. Job. 1, 13.

Question XXXVIII. How many kinds of punishment are there for the evil angels?

The punishment of the fallen angels is twofold, the pain of loss, and of sense. The pain of loss, which they also call privative, is the most sad loss of grace and glory a). The pain of sense, or positive, are the torments which the demons feel from their fall, very great b), and they will undergo greater on the day of the last judgment c). Punishment of the evil angels.

Proof a. The fallen angels by their most grave sin deprived themselves of the state of grace and glory, and thus they both lost their concreated wisdom and justice, and fell from the hope of the beatific vision of God, Conf. Jo. VIII, 44. ep. Jud. v. 6.

Proof b. We are taught that fire is prepared for the devil and his angels, Matth. XXV, 41. where the Savior undoubtedly understands a singular fire acting on spirits and inflicting most exquisite pains.

Proof c. St. Peter in 2 ep. c. II, 4. asserts that God did not spare the angels who sinned, but cast them down to hell in chains of darkness, and delivered them to be reserved for judgment, conf. ep. Jud. v. 6. By chains of darkness is noted the obligation of the angels to punishment and a state horrid and sad with the squalor of misery. With these chains God has so bound the fallen angels that they can never and nowhere shake them off, or escape them. For although God permits them to roam in this air and to tempt men until the day of the last judgment; they carry their own punishment and misery everywhere, like captive slaves their chain. Moreover, the apostle says that the fallen angels are reserved for judgment, so that on the day of the universal judgment they may be openly declared by Christ the judge as violators of the most holy divine will, and that they may receive an increase, or complement of their punishments.

Question XXXIX. Will the punishments of the angels be eternal?

The punishments of the evil angels will be eternal and without end, everlasting.

Proof. 1) Matth. XXV, 41. It is said that eternal fire is prepared for the devil and his angels; into which also the reprobate men will be sent, of whom Christ says in v. 46: The unjust will go into eternal punishment; but the pious into eternal life. From which opposition it becomes clear that an eternity without end is designated. For as the life which the elect are to enter is eternal; so is the punishment which the demons and reprobate men will suffer eternal.

2. The apostle Judas in his ep. v.6. asserts that the angels who did not keep their origin, but deserted their own dwelling, are reserved in eternal chains under darkness. But those who are detained in eternal chains, i.e., never to be loosened, under darkness, h. e. in hell, conf. 2 Petr. II, 4. from which there is no redemption, for them no hope of pardon remains.

3. St. John in Apoc. XX, 10. says: The devil, who deceived them, was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and they will be tormented day and night for ever and ever.

4. The evil angels have nothing of their own from which they might satisfy an angry God; nor is a mediator, reconciler, intercessor destined for them; nor are any aids of conversion, justification, renewal granted to them. Therefore they cannot return into grace with God.

The Antithesis is commonly attributed to Origen, the doctor Adamantius; whom, however, some go about excusing, that he did not seriously assert the complete restoration of the angels, but only disputed about it problematically, for the sake of more accurately investigating the truth. Vid. D. CALOV. in syst.th. tom. IV.P.374. The Anabaptists of the 16th century, however, boldly affirmed that the demons would finally be saved, after an end was put to their torments. But the Socinians dream that the demons are not to be tormented forever in infernal fire, but are to be completely abolished, who support their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Whatever sin was finite, that cannot, with equity preserved, be afflicted with eternal punishments. But the sin of the angels &c. Therefore. The major is established; because between crimes, and their punishments, a certain proportion ought to exist, otherwise justice would be violated. Now, there is no proportion of a finite sin to an infinite punishment. Resp. Angelic sin, not indeed in respect to its transitory act, but in respect to its guilt, is considered infinite on account of the infinite majesty of God, which was injured by the angelic sin. Finitude and infinity in faults are to be estimated not from duration, but from moral obligation. A moral proportion of the finite to the infinite is given, though not indeed a physical or mathematical one. Thus a king can, with justice intact, relegate for ever a citizen by whom his majesty has been injured in a single act, committed in a single hour, and can delete his memory.

II. The mercy of God endures forever, Thren, III, 22. 31. E. He does not cast off the fallen angels forever. Resp. The justice of God also endures forever. As God is merciful, so also is He just. God justly vindicates sinners who are turned away, He clemently receives the converted. Instance; But if men can be converted; why not also the devils? Resp. To fallen men a restorer of the lost integrity, Jesus Christ, was divinely ordained and sent; but not to the angels, who were turned away from God. For Christ did not assume them. Hebr. II, 16. Therefore also God did not spare the angels who sinned, 2 Petr. II, 4. We cannot, with scripture being silent, give with certain infallibility the reason for the perpetually denied grace to the demons: The following reasons, however, the holy fathers, cited by D. CALOV. tom. IV. Syst. p. 319. have adduced, IRENAEVS L. IV. 28; The devil sinned from full malice, man from negligence. GREGORY M. 1. IX. moral. c.36; Man was seduced by the devil, the devil deserted of his own accord. CHRYSOST, homil. I. de Adam & Eva; In the fall of the angels not the whole angelic nature perished, as in the first man sinning the whole human nature would have perished. Moreover, we venerate the most just judgment of God, in whose power is the choice of receiving a sinner into grace, and of perpetually deserting him.

III. Christ on the day of the last judgment will destroy all principality and all power and virtue, 1 Cor. XV, 24; E. He will reduce to nothing the principalities, powers, and world rulers of the darkness of this age, Eph. VI, 11. i.e. the malignant spirits. Resp. The word καταργῶν (destroying/rendering ineffective), which is in the source, does not simply signify to annihilate, but to subtract, or take away the force, efficacy, and operation from something. Conf. Luc. XIII, 7. Rom. III, 3.31. 1 Cor. XIII, 8. 10. Gal, III, 17. cap. V, 4. 11. Eph. II, 14. Therefore Christ will destroy the force, power, and empire of the demons, He will not reduce them to nothing.

Question XL. What practical uses will you excerpt from the doctrine of angels?

Practical uses. The doctrine of angels confers on us a) a notable parenetic use, for avoiding sins, doing penance, and cultivating virtue b); a paracletic use, so that, certain of the custody of angels in all dangers and adverse cases, we may lift up our spirit.

Proof a. We should be solicitous 1) to take care that we do nothing improper in the sight of the angels. To which that admonition of St. Paul in 1 Cor. XI, 10 pertains. A woman ought to have power (a veil, a sign of subjection to her husband) on her head, because of the angels. The same is inculcated by BERNHARDVS serm. XII. in Ps. XCI. In every corner have reverence for your angel; nor do in his presence what you would blush to do in my presence. 2) Let us do penance in a timely manner, both so that we may further enjoy the custody of the angels, and so that we may excite a certain joy in them. There will be joy before the angels of God, over one sinner who does penance. Luc. XV, 10. 3) Let us imitate the virtues of the angels. The angels revere God, they sing His praises, and they do what is commanded not unwillingly. Wherefore let us fear God. The angel of Jehovah encamps around those who fear him, Ps. XXXIV, 8. Let us give thanks to God, both for all benefits, and especially for the angelic protection. Finally, let us obey the divine precepts most promptly; since obedience is a sacrifice most pleasing to God.

Proof b. For if we walk in the ways of our vocation, the angels will accompany us, protect us, and keep us safe from dangers. For God has given his angels charge over you, to keep you in all your ways; who will bear you up in their hands, lest perhaps you dash your foot against a stone, says the hieropsaltist, Ps XCI, 11, 12.

SUSPIRIUM.

With what words, O most merciful GOD, shall I proclaim your ready benevolence towards me? You created me, and having created me, you protected me. Both life, and the security of life, I attribute to You. For those most pure spirits who stand before Your majesty, as most ready ministers, at Your command, are present with me, as most faithful guardians. Let the devil rage: I do not succumb, attended by celestial athletes. Let the world insult: I am not destroyed, supported by angelic protection. I acknowledge with a grateful heart, O most benign DEITY, your most inclined grace towards me, and I most ardently pray, that you may perpetually guide me, coming and going, with your spirit, so that I may strenuously run the way of my vocation, the way of piety, with an unoffending foot. For thus I believe it will be, that the holy angels will encamp around me, will keep me safe from the assaults of enemies, and finally will transfer my soul, weary of human affairs, into the bosom of CHRIST, where there is a secure and most joyful dwelling.

CHAPTER V. ON M A N .

Question I. What is man?

MAN IS AN animal, consisting of a rational soul and an organic body, created by God, and adorned with his image in the first creation, to sincerely worship the creator, to lead a pious life, and to attain eternal blessedness. The first man.

Observ. I. We are dealing here with man, not as he is a sinner; for thus he is the subject of theological operation, the consideration of which pertains to the second part of theology; But as man is the other of the noblest creatures, the center of creation, the principal inhabitant of the visible world, into whom the most abundant streams of divine goodness have overflowed.

Obs. II. Philosophers succinctly define man as a rational animal; but it is for the theologian to describe man through the four causes.

Question II. Who was the first man?

The first of all men was Adam, the parent of the entire human race.

Proof. 1) Because Adam is called in express words the first man. 1 Cor. XV, 45.47. There is no reason for you to object that Adam is called the first man relatively, with respect to the last Adam, who is Christ. For he is called the first man absolutely; since Adam would have been the first man, even if Christ had never come. Adam is compared with Christ not by reason of priority; but inasmuch as he is the author of sin and death, and the latter of justice and life.

2. Gen. II, 5. Moses openly writes that there was no man (before Adam) to till the ground. If there was no man before Adam who tilled the ground; with what appearance of truth can it be asserted that gentiles were produced before Adam?

3. Because, when Adam was created, no helpmate, or female helper, was found, Gen. I, 19. But indeed, if gentiles had been created long before Adam, a helpmate would certainly have been found for Adam.

4. Because Eve is called the mother of all living, Gen, III, 20. If women had lived before Eve, she would not have been adorned with that title.

5. The Apostle testifies, Act. XVII, 26. that God has made of one blood all mankind. But indeed if gentiles were created before Adam, it could not be said that God made all mankind of one blood.

The Antithesis is that of Isaac Peyrerius, who in the year 1655 spread the monstrous opinion about the Preadamites, whose main arguments are:

I. A twofold creation of men is described in the sacred letters. The first in Gen. I. where male and female are said to have been created in one act, not in a broken series. The later in Gen. II. where the series of creation is broken, and the creation of Adam and Eve is delineated according to distinct acts. In Gen. I. the origin of the Gentiles, in Gen. II. the creation of the Jews in Adam seems to be described. Resp. 1) The creation of man described in chap. 1. & II. of Genesis is one, the circumstances of which are more lucidly recounted in chap. II. and although in Gen. I. the creation of Adam & Eve is joined, yet that conjunction does not indicate one act, but it is only proposed there in general, and in c. II. it is explained specifically through distinct acts. 2) If the creation of man described in chap. II. Gen. is different from that which is contained in Gen. I. it will have to be said that when in Gen. II, 4. it is said: These are the generations of the heavens and the earth, also another heaven and another earth is to be understood than in Gen. I, 1.; likewise when in Gen. II, 5. it is said that plants and herbs were produced, other herbs and plants are to be understood than those which in Gen. I. are said to be produced, which is absurd. Indeed, from the text itself it is clear that what works are commemorated as created in Gen. I. are repeated in Gen. II. with certain circumstances added. (*)

II. Whoever, being a murderer about to go into foreign lands, fears the punishments of men, presupposes that many men live there. But Cain &c. E. The major is established: If a murderer were to go into a foreign land, empty of men, he would fear no man there. The minor is clear from Gen. IV. where Cain addresses God thus: Behold, you have driven me out from (the place) upon the face of this earth, so that I am forced to hide from your face; Whence I shall be a fugitive and a wanderer in the (remaining) earth, so that whoever finds me will kill me. But if besides Adam and Eve no men had lived, no fear would have been cast upon Cain as he was about to go to foreign lands. R. 1) A murderer fears even the safest places, with his conscience tormenting him within. 2) Cain feared his father Adam as an avenger, he feared the future descendants of Abel as avengers, he feared that one of his own children would be an Absalom.

III. There are men who did not sin in the likeness of the transgression of Adam. Rom. V, 14. E. not all men were created from the blood of Adam. R. The transgression of Adam was an equal proaeretic sin (ἐκ τῆς προαιρέσεως - from choice/deliberate purpose), the consequence of which was death, reigning not only over those who sinned in the likeness of Adam by choice, but also over embryos who are extinguished, and over newly born infants, not contaminated by proaeretic sins, but infected with original sin, which flowed from Adam into his posterity.

IV. That not all men descend from Adam is taught by the example of Melchizedek, who if he had been born of Adam, would not be called ἀπάτωρ (without father) Hebr. VII, 3. Resp. Melchizedek is called ἀπάτωρ (without father), with respect to our knowledge; since it has not been divinely revealed to us who his parent was (**).

V. If no men had been created before Adam, for the course of many centuries no one would have enjoyed the fruits of the trees born in Germany, Poland, France &c. which fruits would have hung in vain on the trees a thousandfold, in vain would tame and wild animals have run in the fields, mountains, forests &c. But God and nature do nothing in vain. Resp. Dist. between the act and the potentiality of enjoying. By God's command and operation, trees bring forth fruit, so that man may be able to enjoy them; although man does not always actually enjoy them. Many herbs perish, and many fruits, which no one turns to his use, which yet were born for the use of men.

Question III. Who created man?

The efficient cause of man. The triune God created man.

Proof from Gen. I, 26, אֱלֹהִים (Elohim/God) said נַעֲשֶׂה (na'aseh/let us make) man in our image, after our likeness. Obs. 1) By this celestial oracle the plurality of divine persons is implied. For a) the name Elohim is used, which we have proven above to be plural not only in termination but also in meaning. b) a plural verb, let us make, c) plural suffixes are attached; In our image, after our likeness.

2. According to the mind of most theologians, God is introduced by Moses as consulting about creating man in His own image. But D. VAREN. decad. I. Mof. p. 115. thinks that not so much a consultation as an intention and decree of God is designated, and he renders the Hebrew word in Latin: faciemus (we will make); because a) the most proper meaning of the simple future is expressed; b) the harmony of the decree, and (*) How openly false that opinion of PEYRERIUS is, is clear 3) even from this, that there was no difference between the Jews and the profane nations before Abraham, whose descendants God willed to be a holy and separate nation from other peoples.

(**) As Melchizedek is distinguished from the Aaronitic priests, descended from the tribe of Levi; so he himself is called ἀπάτωρ (without father), so that by that name also he may be distinguished from the genealogies of Levi, and of all the tribes, which were preserved with the greatest diligence in the nation consecrated to God, just as Paul himself interpreted it, v. 6; ὁ μὴ γενεαλογούμενος ἐξ αὐτῶν (he whose descent is not traced from them). If ἀπάτωρ (without father) had been said so simply that he had absolutely no father; by what right then should he be referred to the offspring of the Preadamites, as is indeed the opinion of PEYRERIUS?

of its execution, which is immediately added in v. 27., is more lucidly shown; c) with this exposition standing, there is no need to imagine ἀνθρωποπάθειαν (human-like emotion) in consulting, nor is it permissible for the Jews and Photinians to invent a consultation with angels. I add the annotation of SEB. SCHMIDT: And God said to himself (Father, Son, & Holy Spirit in highest consent). The reason is? Because the words; Let us make man &c. are not the words of one inviting to consultation, but of one decreeing; the execution of which decree immediately follows in v. 27; So God created man &c. But the decrees of God concerning things ad extra, just as the execution of the decrees, are common to all three persons of the deity.

You say: God speaks of Himself in the plural number in the manner of magnates, and so the plurality of divine persons is not indicated in this passage. Resp. We have satisfied this objection above on p.209.1.

Question IV. From what matter was man formed?

The matter of man. The body of Adam was formed from the earth a), the body of Eve from a rib of Adam b).

Proof a. Gen. II, 7. And God formed man, dust from the earth.

Obs. 1) The material principle of man is called אֲדָמָה (adamah/earth/soil), properly red earth, since in the land of Babylon the earth is commonly red; although the same word taken generally signifies any earth, and from the same matter the beasts were formed, Gen. II, 19. so that the earth is a common principle of origin for man and for the beasts, and the common dwelling of both.

2. Moses indicates that the predominant element from which the body of Adam was produced is earth; however, he does not simply exclude the other elements, water, air, and fire. For from whatever matter the human body consists, from the same it was originally produced; But it consists of the four elements.

3. Man is said to be formed as dust from the earth, to signify that he is not only from the dust of the earth, but also nothing but the dust of the earth, if he is estimated from the principles of his origin without a soul and the concreated image of God. Whence, this having been lost, he heard this voice; you are dust, and to dust you shall return! Gen. III, 12.

Proof b. Gen. II, 21. 22. Then at last the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man, so that he slept, and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh in its place, and the Lord God built the rib, which he had taken from the man, into a woman.

Obs. 1) Since the body of Eve was to be constructed from Adam, he was immersed in this deep sleep, so that he would not be a spectator of the divine architecture, but an admirer of the woman who was built.

2. For as physicians use narcotics in more serious treatments, so that the patient does not feel what is being done; so God sent Adam into a very deep sleep, so that the fabrication of Eve from Adam's rib would create no pain for him.

3. That sleep was not without illustrious divine revelations, but the mind of the sleeping Adam was so elevated and divinely illuminated, that he understood the rib being taken from his body. From which תַּרְדֵּמָה (tardemah/deep sleep) is rendered by the LXX Interpreters as ἔκστασις (ecstasy): although it was not a perfect ecstasy, but a prophetic sleep analogous to ecstasy. Conf. D. VAREN. dec. VII. Mof. p. 183. 3) The rib, from which the body of Eve was constructed, was not superfluous, but natural, and due to the integrity of Adam's body. For what rib God had taken away, He compensated with flesh, Gen. II, 22. But restitution cannot happen, unless the removal of a due part is presupposed. Nor does it stand in the way that it is not explicitly said that the rib was restored, but only the flesh. For as God, by extracting a rib from Adam's body, also extracted flesh; which if it had not happened, Adam could not have said of Eve, that she was bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh, so by restoring the flesh, it is implied that the rib was also restored; even if Moses does not explicitly say so. (4) The rib of Adam, from which Eve was made, was not inanimate, but animated. For (a) it is not said that a soul was breathed into Eve, as into Adam. (b) It was part of a living and animated body. (c) 1 Cor. XI, 8. the woman is said to have been taken from the man. But woman is the name of a suppositum, which consists not only of a body, but also of a soul. Indeed, in that way the woman is said to be from the man, in which the man is not from the woman. But the man is not from the woman both in respect to the body and in respect to the soul, because God breathed the latter into him immediately. Therefore, according to soul and body, the woman is from the man.

Question V. How did God form the first humans?

The manner of man's creation. The manner which God employed in forming the first humans consists a) in the artful fashioning of Adam's body; b) in the inspiration of the soul; c) in the singular building of Eve's body.

Proof a. The manner of production is expressed by the Hebrew words יצר (yatsar/to form/fashion) & בנה (banah/to build). יצר (yatsar) properly notes to form, and is used of potters, who induce an elegant figure on the clay which they work. Thus God formed man ornately and decently, and induced a fitting harmony in the body of man, and due to all the members.

Proof b. Gen. II, 7. God breathed into the man's nostrils the soul of lives, and man became a living soul. Obs. 1) To the body, fashioned indeed, but lying like a trunk, devoid of motion, sense, reason, the soul was inspired and united, as an entelechy, or form, by which it was to be vivified, moved, and perfected.

2. As πλάσις (formation), or forming, is attributed to the body; so ἐμπνευσις (breathing/inspiration), or inspiration, is to the soul. But God is said to have inspired ἀνθρωποπαθῶς (in a human manner), in a human way, which is to be understood θεοπρεπῶς (in a manner befitting God), in a way suitable for God. For it does not note the emission of a corporeal breath; since God is incorporeal; but (a) the manner of action, by which the soul was communicated to Adam's body; that this communication was made in an easy and spiritual manner, since by the same inspiration the soul is said to be produced, at the same time as it is inspired; (b) the effect of the action, that the effect produced is a spirit distinct from all body and matter.

3. The soul is said to be inspired by God, but not from God. For God did not inspire the soul into man from His own substance, as the Stoics, Epictetus, Seneca, Cicero called the soul a particle of the divine breath, and the Manicheans and Priscillianists asserted that human souls came forth from the substance of God, and were therefore condemned in the council of Braga can. V. because the substance of God is both indivisible and purely incommunicable to a creature.

4. God inspired the soul into man's nostrils; because the most wise creator willed the soul to reveal itself especially in these through respiration and vital actions.

5. Moses calls the soul the breath of lives, h. e., not only living immortally in itself, but also vivifying the body, and breathing through the nostrils.

6. Through this breath of lives man was made into a living soul, h. e., into a perfect living animal.

You say: From our clearly explained opinion it follows that first the body, then the soul was created; which could not have happened, because 1) creation is an instantaneous action, and therefore man was created in an instant without succession, or delay of time. 2) Adam's body, as soon as it was created, was a living body, endowed with a soul, otherwise it would have been a corpse. 3) It was organic, and therefore animated.

Resp to 1) Creation, as such, is instantaneous; but as it is plastic, formative, and as it were, potter-like, it admits delay, so that one part is created after another. However, the creation of man can be called instantaneous in respect to the suppositum, because in a moment the soul was inspired into the body, so that it might be a living animal.

Ad 2) For the truth of a body, of which man is to be composed, a soul is not required; for the body of Christ was a true body in the three days of death, although it was not physically alive.

Ad 3) I distinguish between the order of nature being constituted, and constituted. In the latter way, no body is called organic, unless it is animated; But in the former way, a body is organic which has been fashioned by the hands, as it were, of its creator, and made suitable for receiving a soul.

Proof c. The body of Eve, with an architectural word, is said to be built, i.e., decently put together, to indicate that the woman would not only be a seat of virtues, but also her womb would be a house, in which the human race was to be built and propagated through generation.

Question VI. Of how many parts does man consist?

The parts of man. Man consists of two parts, a rational soul, and an organic body.

Proof. 1. From the creation of man. For, according to the testimony of Moses, Gen. II, 7. The body was formed from the earth, into which the breath of life, the soul, was inspired. The sacred historiographer does not add a third part.

You say: Three parts are expressly posited by Moses, the earthly body, the breath of life, the living soul. Resp. Mention is indeed made of three by Moses, but of two as essential parts, and of the third as a composite resulting from the union of those parts; which composite is called a living soul, the denomination being made from the prior part.

2. From the assertion of Christ; Matth. X, 28. Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul. Where the savior himself recounts two parts of man, namely the soul and the body.

3. From the death of man. When he dies, he is resolved into only two parts, Eccles. XII, 7. E. He is composed of only two parts.

4. From the state after death. For there are no essential parts constituting man other than those which will either triumph in heaven, or be tormented in hell. But those are only the soul and the body, Matth. XX, 28. Luc. XVI, 22. 1 Cor. V, 5. 2 Cor. V, 8. 10.

The Antithesis is that of Paracelsus, Comenius, Weigelius and others, according to whose mind there are three parts of man, spirit, soul and body, whose principal argument is sought from 1 Thess. V, 23. And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit, and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. St. Paul by this his wish seems to assign three parts to man, to be preserved whole and blameless. Resp. What is understood by spirit in this passage is not explained in one way. There are some who, with CHRYSOSTOM, understand by spirit the gifts and effects of the Holy Spirit in a reborn man, so that spirit is opposed to flesh, Rom. VI. Gal. V. In which sense spirit is not a peculiar part of man, but a spiritual gift, by which primarily the soul, secondarily the body is instructed for the exercises of piety. There are others who, with AUGUSTINE & our LUTHER, want the superior faculty of the soul, by which we understand and reason, to be designated by spirit, by soul the inferior faculty of the soul, by which we sense and desire, by body they understand the dwelling of the soul, whose members as organs serve the soul for the practice of piety. But here spirit, soul, and body are considered not physically, but theologically, according to the state of regeneration and renewal. This latter opinion seems more agreeable to Paul's wish. I therefore give this paraphrase of Paul's wish: This I sincerely wish and pray, that the God of peace may illuminate your spirit (intellect), and keep it immune from errors, the senses and affections pure from inordinate acts, the body untouched by filth, so that you may think what is true and salutary; desire what is holy; devote all the limbs of the body to the living practice of those things which are pure and chaste, lest you incur a tremendous reprehension before God and men on the day of the universal judgment. In the same way the words of St. Mary, Luc. 1, 46. 47. My soul doth magnify the Lord; And my spirit hath rejoiced, seem to be explained, q.d. The joy which I have conceived concerning the savior of the human race has inundated all my affections, all my senses, like a torrent, so that my mind, suffused with celestial light, may piously esteem the highest glory of God, and be wholly fixed in celebrating it. Conf. D. CALOV, in bibl illustr. ad 1 Theff. V. fol. 884.

II. 1 Cor. XIV, 14. Paul says; For if I pray in a tongue, my spirit prays, but my understanding is unfruitful. In this place Paul distinguishes the spirit from the mind. Resp. In this place by spirit is understood that afflatus of God, by which the apostle was adorned with the gift of tongues; or also the motion of the spirit, excited by that afflatus, which expresses itself through foreign tongues. By mind is denoted the sense or meaning of the prayer, which is called ἄκαρπος (unfruitful), unfruitful, not with respect to the speaker, but to the hearer, so that the sense of Paul's words is: If I, led by the Holy Spirit, pour out prayers from my soul in a sacred assembly in a foreign tongue, the sense of those prayers will escape the hearers who are ignorant of the foreign tongue, so that they receive no utility from my prayer.

Question VII. Is the body a true part of man, or only his instrument?

The body is a true part of man, without which he is not a true and whole man.

Proof. 1) Because the essence of man is completed by two parts, the soul and the organic body; as we have demonstrated in the preceding question.

2. If the soul alone completed the essence of man; man would never die, but when the soul was separated from the body, man would only lay down his instrument.

3. If the whole essential perfection of man consists in the soul, there is no need for resurrection; because with the flesh removed the whole human being would persist.

The Antithesis is that of the Platonists, Socinians, and Arminians; some of whom openly deny that the body is a part of man; some doubt whether it is a part or an instrument of man. Their arguments are the following:

I. The body is compared to a garment and to a tent, 2 Cor. V, 3. 4. 5. Resp. That similitude is not to be extended beyond the third term. For the soul is said to be clothed with the body, on account of the natural union. It is therefore wrongly inferred from this metaphorical way of speaking that the body is not a part of man. Certainly the flesh of Christ is also compared to a garment and a tabernacle for the Word (τῷ λόγῳ), yet it is nonetheless a part of Christ the God-man (θεανθρώπου).

II, The part of a living man remains perpetually the same in number; The body does not perpetually remain the same in number; E. The body is not a part of a living man. The major is established; because with a true part removed the whole does not remain. The minor is clear; since from infancy each of us has worn out many bodies. Resp. Neg. min. For although the ὄγκος (mass/bulk), or external mass of the body grows, and decreases, is increased and diminished; the body remains the same in number, as its own and radical matter (οὐκείαν ὕλην).

III. Paul says in 2 Cor. XII, 2. I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth;), such a one caught up to the third heaven. The apostle indicates that although in his rapture he was out of the body, he yet remained a true man. Therefore he says; I knew a man. Whence an argument is born; Whoever, being constituted outside the body, remains a true and whole man, the body does not pertain to his essential integrity; But a certain man (Paul) caught up to the third heaven, constituted outside the body, remained a true and whole man &c. Therefore. Resp. The apostle does not doubt whether in his ecstasy the soul informed the body, or was separated from it; for if the soul had been separated, the apostle would have been dead. But he doubts whether the soul united to the body, without the cooperating body, or with the co-admitted and concurring body, was elevated to hear the unspeakable words of God (τὰ ῥήματα ἄρρητα τοῦ θεοῦ), or, to speak more clearly: The apostle doubts whether he perceived the ineffable words of God only with his internal mind, or also heard them with his bodily ears. Therefore, in his rapture the apostle was not constituted outside the body.

IV. A true part gives being to man; But the body does not &c. E. The minor is clear from the philosophical axiom; The form gives being to the thing. The body is not the form; Therefore it does not give being to the thing. Resp. The form gives being to the thing not adequately and completely, but inadequately and incompletely. The form gives the ultimate, determinate, and specific being; The matter gives the inchoate, indeterminate, and generic being; Both united give the total being.

V. The human body is called organic by the philosophers, because it is an instrument, not a part of man. Resp. The body is called organic not with respect to man, but with respect to the soul; of which it is indeed a co-part, by reason of the natural union, by which man becomes one per se; But it is the instrument of the same soul, by reason of the operation, which is done through the corporeal members, as organs. But you should observe well that the corporeal members are called organs of the soul in an excellent way; since they are not separate, but conjoined, not inefficacious, but efficacious instruments.

Question VIII. Was the human soul cast by God into the body as into an impure prison?

The human soul was not cast by God into the body, as into a squalid prison, by which it is impeded, so that it cannot properly elevate itself, and fly up to know, love, and venerate God.

The Antithesis is 1) that of Pythagoras, Plato, and their disciples, who taught the προὔπαρξιν (pre-existence), or preexistence of souls, which, when with a loathing for celestial goods they began to love earthly things, were cast down into the body as into a muddy prison. From which Plato explicitly calls the body the prison of the soul, in Cratylus pag. 264. Sap. Aeg. L. II. c.s. For which reason these philosophers taught καθαρισμὸν (purification), or purgation from the foul dregs of the body, about which see SCHEFFER. in philosoph. Ital. cap. VIII. p. 73. who adduces Porphyry writing thus;

Purgation is a divorce from the body, and from the irrational motion of the passions. For which reason 10. SCHEFFERVS, about to explain the mind of the Pythagoreans, says: It is clear enough from these definitions what Pythagoras and his followers understood by purgation. They said that the body is something material, coarse, foul, by which the soul is pressed down, and drawn to these lower, mortal things, full of vices and evils; and for that reason it is defiled and polluted, not otherwise than in a squalid and muddy prison. Therefore before it can arrive at true wisdom, it has need of καθαροει (purification), that is, a certain purgation by which its filth may be washed away.

2. That of Hermes Trismegistus, who, about to teach his son the manner of regeneration, says: Abrogate the senses of the body, then will be the begetting of divinity: purge yourself from the bonds of matter, destitute of reason.

3. That of the Mystical authors, who think more abjectly than is just about the human body. ORIGEN went before them, who, according to the testimony of PRATEOLUS, in elencho heref. 1. 13. num. s. asserted that this punishment was divinely inflicted on human souls, because they had sinned, that they should be detained in bodies as in prisons. Abraham von Franckenberg calls the body the external man, but the soul the internal man, and philosophizes in the following manner in the book which is entitled: Know Thyself; part. II. p. 89. "The inner man arises from the one Center of the Light of Life, from the holy Power-Essence of the Trinity of GOD: whereas the outer man, or the perishable fleeting body is the earthly dark sack of mourning, the outer earthly shell, and base worthless shelter, the assumed coat of Adam, the house of perishability."

Exposition

Obs. I. Both the soul and the human body can be viewed in two ways: 1) κατ' οὐσίαν (according to essence), according to themselves, or their essence; 2) καθ' ἁμαρτίαν (according to sin), according to the state of corruption, or according to sin, adhering by accident. If they are considered according to themselves, they are good creatures, created for the glory of God. Glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's, says Paul in 1 Cor. VI, 20.

Obs. II. The primary seat of sin is the human soul with its faculties. For the intellect deflects from the divine law through ignorance, opinion, error; the will through the choice of a good not true, but apparent; the sensitive appetite through a blind impulse towards a good pleasing to the senses, but forbidden by divine law. The secondary seat of sin is the organic body of man, insofar as it served the sinning soul in its delinquency.

Confirmation

Proof. 1) Whatever body was created by God, and skillfully fashioned, to be a pleasing dwelling for the soul, and with it, as a natural part, to constitute the whole man, that is wrongly considered a troublesome prison for the soul: But the human body &c. E. The minor is proven from Gen. 1, 27. II, 7. Job inculcates the most beautiful fashioning of the body, c. X, 10. and king David, Ps. CXXXIX, 15.

2. The physical, proximate, and special cause of the formed body is the soul communicated, or transmitted, in and with the seed from the begetter. E. The body cannot be its prison. The reason for the consequence is; because no architect fabricates a prison for himself, which he inhabits. The antecedent is clear to any sensible person. For a) the work of the formation of the body is wonderfully various, and restricted according to the reason of each species. For example, the body of a lion is formed differently from that of a bear, differently from that of a man, according to size, figure, color, position of parts. Therefore, a specific cause, determined by its nature to this particular work, must be present everywhere, which indeed is none other than the soul of each body itself? y) The formation of the body is a natural work of the seed; indeed, most natural. Therefore, by the force of the definition which all assign to nature, from an intrinsic cause and principle; which indeed is none other than the soul? y) It is a vital work, therefore from the soul. Conf. D. SENNERTI hypomnema physicum IV. c. IX. p. 251.

3. No squalid prison is the temple of the Holy Spirit. For who would dare to affirm that a temple is a prison, and that the Holy Spirit is detained in bonds? But the body of a reborn man is the temple of the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. VI, 15. Therefore.

4. The body in the resurrection of the just will be reunited with the soul. E. it is not the prison of the soul. The reason for the consequence is because the resurrection of the just is a huge benefit, procured by the merit of Christ. But it would be a huge punishment, if the soul, which was separated from the body, were through the resurrection to be cast down again into the body, as into a perpetual prison. Indeed, the sisters of Lazarus would have given no thanks to Christ, if he had recalled the soul of their deceased brother into a prison.

5. Two absurdities follow the adverse opinion: a) God did not act justly, when in the flood he preserved Noah, in the conflagration of Sodom he preserved Lot, and destroyed innumerable wicked men. What else would this have been, than to release wicked men from prisons, but to confine upright men longer? b) That blessing: increase and multiply, would have been a curse; for it would pertain to the long detention of the soul in the prison of the body.

6. The opinion of the dissenters was condemned in the council of Braga, canon VI. If anyone says that human souls first sinned in a heavenly dwelling, and for this were cast down into human bodies on earth, as Priscillian said, let him be anathema.

Refutation

The opponents object I. from Ps. CXLII. 8. Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name. Where by prison they understand the mortal body. R. By prison the psalmist understands the cave of Adullam, of which mention is made in 1 Sam. XXIV, 3. in which David felt such anguish as a malefactor experiences when detained in prison.

II. From Ps. CXVI, 7. Return unto thy rest, O my soul! The human soul is said to return to its rests, i.e., to the most tranquil celestial mansions, in which it enjoyed the sweetest quiet before it was cast down into the body, subject to many dangers and afflictions, as into a squalid prison. R. With the cited words the prophet king excited himself, when he was in troubles, (according to Rabbi Kimchi) so that the soul, variously vexed by anguish, might betake itself to God, as the author of all tranquility, and expect solace from him. Furthermore, it is to be noted that the soul is said to return to rest, not because it at some time before the body was formed existed in rest, but because it fell by sin from that rest which it could have had in Adam.

III. Whatever body the rational soul is pressed down and weighed down by, that is fittingly called its prison; But by a corruptible body &c. E. The major is established; because every prison is a troublesome place, where the soul is oppressed with grief. The minor is proven from Sap. c. IX, 15. The corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthy tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things. Resp. 1) The book of wisdom is not canonical, but, in the judgment of LUDOVICUS VIVES, is believed to be of Philo Judaeus of Alexandria, who lived in the times of the apostles, to whom he was also a friend. Such is the eloquence in the Greek language, that the Greeks said of him: Either Philo platonizes, or Plato philonizes. 2) Whatever body, considered in itself, the soul is weighed down by, that can be called its prison. But, if the soul and body were whole, the body would not weigh down the soul. But since each part of man has been vitiated by the fall, it happens by accident that the soul is distracted by an excessive and inordinate care of the body, so that it does not have leisure for contemplating divine things.

IV. The body from which a reborn man desires to be liberated is his squalid prison. But from a mortal body &c. E. The minor is proven from Rom. VII, 24. where the apostle groans: O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death. Resp. By the body of death is not understood the physically mortal body, but the evil and corrupt concupiscence of the flesh, which like some body embraces the entire frame of vices as if of members, and thus brings forth death, Col III, 5. The apostle desires to be liberated from this corruption of the flesh. Suppose the mortal body is denoted by the apostle, yet it is not understood κατ' ἐστίαν (according to essence), according to itself, but καθ' ἁμαρτίαν (according to sin), according to the inherent sin, from which Paul desires to be liberated.

V. It cannot be denied that there is much filth in the human body. Resp. The soul is not polluted by the physical filth of the body, because it is a spirit; But the primary seat of moral filth is the sinful soul, which the body served in its delinquency.

Question IX. Is the human soul today created, or is it propagated by traducianism?

Origin of the soul. The human soul today is not immediately created, but by means of fertile seed it is generated from the parents, and is transmitted into the children.

Obs. I. A distinction must be made between the word creation taken in a general, special, and most special sense. In a general sense, creation notes the act by which God produces something in whatever way, whether immediately from nothing, or from some pre-existing matter, whether with the intervention of a secondary cause, or in its absence. In a special sense, creation signifies the act by which God, with no secondary cause intervening, produces something, whether it be from pure nothing, or from unsuitable matter. In a most special sense, creation designates the act by which God immediately, without the concurrence of secondary causes from nothing, with no pre-existing matter, produces something.

Obs. II. A distinction must be made between tradux (transmission) said concretely, and abstractly. Concretely it is taken either in a general or a special sense. Specifically it notes a suitable cutting of some tree, vine or plant (in Greek ἀπόσπασμα [a piece torn off]) or a torn-off particle of a plant suitable for propagation. In German, "ein abgeschnittener Zweig, ein Sprößling, ein Pfropfreislein, dadurch der Baum, oder die Pflanze, kan fortgezielet werden" (a cut-off branch, a sprout, a grafting-scion, by which the tree, or the plant, can be propagated). Generally it designates any fertile seed of plants and animals, and is commonly called prolific sperm. Abstractly, tradux notes the transmission itself.

Obs. IV. The soul is not generated from the tradux, or fertile seed, as from a material principle, but through the tradux, or by means of the prolific seed, as a vehicle, it is propagated.

The assertion is proven 1) from the divine blessing, Gen. I, 18. c. IX, 1. Every soul by the force of the divine blessing is multiplicative of itself; Therefore also the human soul.

2. From the definition of generation. Generation is the communication of essence through fertile seed in the image of the begetter. From which definition we conclude: Whoever communicates essence to a begotten man, communicates to him a soul. But a begetting father &c. Therefore.

3. From the effect. Whoever generates a man, he generates not only the body, but the soul. But a parent &c. Therefore. The major is established; because the begetter is a univocal cause, and according to the well-known physical axiom: Every begetter begets its like.

4. From the nature or property of the soul, which is the power of vivifying. From whom we have life, from them we have a soul. But from parents &c. E. The major is clear; because life, taken in the first act, is the soul itself; or, if it is taken for the second act, it is something emanating from the soul.

5. From the term of generation, which is the image of the parent. Whoever begets a son in his own image, he begets the soul of the son. The parent begets &c. Gen. V, 3. Certainly the image of the father cannot exist without his propagated soul, since this is the πρῶτον δεκτικόν (the first receptive thing), the primary subject of the image.

6. From the divine rest. From whatever work of making God rested, that, with the nature of things constituted, God does not create. But God rested from making all the works of nature, Gen. II, 2. E. You say: God rested from making new species, but not from creating individuals. Resp. 1) God indeed concurs with secondary causes for the production of individuals, but He does not create them immediately and by Himself alone. 2) Extraordinarily and miraculously God sometimes immediately creates new individuals (e.g., new stars); But generation is an ordinary and most natural work.

7. From the nature of fertile seed. Whoever emits living seed, they propagate the soul. But parents &c. Therefore. The major is proven; because without a soul no corporeal thing lives. The minor is clear; because from non-living seed a living man cannot come forth.

8. From the propagation of original sin. From whom original sin is propagated into children, from them the soul is propagated. But from parents &c. Therefore. The major is established; because the πρῶτον δεκτικόν (the first receptive thing) of original sin is the human soul. With that which is in the soul being propagated, it is necessary that the soul itself be propagated.

9. From various absurdities which press the opinion of the adversaries. For a) those who hold that souls are immediately created by God, must either deny original sin, or accuse God of injustice. For God created the soul either impure, or pure. If impure; he will be the cause of sin; If pure; he is not just, because he inserted a pure soul into impure matter. b) It will follow that parents no longer generate men; because a man cannot be said to be generated by parents, whose soul is not generated by them. c) The father will not be the physical cause of his son, but only a moral cause; because he only applied the passive subject, namely the matter, to the active principle, namely the soul created by God. d) It will follow that the soul of Christ was not generated and consequently our soul was not redeemed. For τὸ ἀπρόσληπτον ἀθεράπευτον (that which is not assumed is not healed).

The Antithesis is that of most of the Scholastics and Pontificiorum, defending the creation, or infusion of souls, which happens immediately from God, with whom some philosophers concur. They wish to fortify their opinion with the following arguments:

I. Everything generable is corruptible: According to the evangelical doctors the human soul is generable: Therefore. The major is clear from induction: Sheep, oxen, donkeys &c. are generated and die. E. everything generable is corruptible. Resp. 1) The major is not universal; because if man had remained in the state of integrity, he would indeed have been generable, but not corruptible. 2) Every induction must be made from equals. But the adversaries form an induction from unequals, namely from bodies, and they wrongly apply it to the human soul, which is a spirit.

II. Whatever soul is not divisible, from that the soul of children cannot come forth: But the soul of parents &c. Therefore. The major is proven; because whatever is essential to the parents, and yet comes forth from them, is as it were cut off from them. Resp. Dist. between cutting off, and deduction. The soul of children is indeed deduced from the soul of the parents, but it is not cut off.

III. If the soul of children is from the soul of the parents, it is from the same either by cutting off; or subjectively, or constitutively. But it is not by cutting off; because it is indivisible: Not subjectively; for thus the soul of the son would exist subjectively in the father: Not constitutively; for thus the soul of the parent would be an essential and constituent part of the son. Resp. One member of the division is omitted, namely multiplicatively and propagatively. For every soul, by the force of the divine blessing, is multiplicative of itself.

IV. The soul of the son is either generated solely from the soul of the father, or solely from the soul of the mother, or from both. Not solely from the soul of the father; because thus the mother would not generate a man; nor solely from the soul of the mother; because thus the father would not generate a son; nor from both; because thus a composition or confusion of souls would occur: Therefore the soul of the son does not come from the soul of the parents at all. Resp. In generation the father and mother stand for one cause. For they are social causes, from which one effect flows. Therefore the soul of the son comes from both. And yet a composition or confusion of souls is not to be feared; because the soul is a simple act, not composing, or confusing.

V. If the soul of the son is drawn from the soul of the parent; either the whole soul passes into the son, or a part of it. But not the whole soul, because thus the parent would not retain a soul: Not a part, because the soul is indivisible. Resp. 1) This argument rests on a false hypothesis; as if the soul were some whole divisible into parts. The soul is neither a whole, nor does it have parts. By the Scholastics indeed a spirit is said to be a whole potestatively; because it contains many potencies, united in a certain way. But the potencies, or faculties of a thing, properly speaking are not its parts. 2) When a flame lights a flame, neither does the whole lighting flame pass into the lit one, nor does a part of it descend into it. Thus the soul of the parents generates the soul of the son, so that nothing is lost from it.

VI. The human soul is made either from nothing, or from matter. But it is not made from matter. E. from nothing, and consequently it is created. The consequence of the major is proven; because nothing was ever made, which was not made either from matter, or from nothing. Resp. a) The disjunctive syllogism is not made from immediate members. For a third is given; from a preexisting form. You except in vain that the particle 'from' notes matter; for taken more broadly it also designates form; for the physicists teach with great consensus that a natural body consists of matter and form. b) We respond to the proof: Whatever is material, or corporeal, is made either from matter, or from nothing: But the soul is not material, or corporeal.

VII. Whoever is called the father of spirits, from him the soul has its origin. But God &c. Hebr. XII, 9, Therefore. Resp. 1) Limit. the major. Whoever is called the father of spirits, from him the soul has its origin either immediately, or mediately. The soul of Adam has an immediate origin from God, our soul has a mediate origin. 2) God in that passage is called the Father of Spirits, not on account of the creation of souls, but spiritual regeneration.

VIII. God gives the human soul, Eccles. XII, 7, and forms the human spirit, Zach. XII, 1, Therefore he creates the human soul. The reason for the consequence is; because whatever God gives, or forms, he gives and forms by creation. Resp. Eccles. XII, 7 looks back to the first origin of the soul. For just as when it is said that the dust returns to the earth, whence it was, it looks back to the first creation; So when it is said that the spirit returns to God, who gave it, it looks back to the same, in which the spirit was immediately created by God. Today God gives the spirit mediately, with secondary causes intervening; just as he also gives the body, 1 Cor. XV, 38. Zechariah likewise considers the first origin of the soul; just as also the creation of heaven and earth made in the beginning is indicated.

Question X. Did the human soul emanate from the divine essence, and does it return and, as it were, flow back into the same through regeneration and mystical union?

The human soul neither flowed out from the divine essence, nor does it return, or flow back, into the divine essence through spiritual regeneration and mystical union with the triune God.

The Antithesis is 1) that of Plato, who held that God is the center of all things, from which human souls came forth, or emanated, and into which they return. Libr. 12. Myst. Aeg. c. 9.1.13.c.8.1.14. 6.1.2. The opinion of Plato is more clearly explained by his follower, MARSILIUS FICINVS, in Timaeus c. 6. All things are from God in such a way that not even the smallest things are ever deserted by God. For indeed the divine unity thrives, through which each thing consists; and in a perpetual and intimate circle they are wonderfully revolved back to God himself, from whom and in whom they are, otherwise they would suddenly rush into nothingness. From the divine unity all things proceed, and proceeding they retain a certain unity impressed upon them, the image of the divine unity, by which they are recalled into it, and being recalled they are perfected. This itself snatches souls to vows, by which a union with God may be fully accomplished in us. For if nature, emanating from God, has inserted into certain things properties suitable for them with the superiors, by which in a certain way they turn themselves to the superiors, as heliotropes to the sun, and lunaries to the moon; much more has the father of souls impressed upon them forces that snatch them to himself; which indeed seem to be situated primarily in a certain divine unity, in a superior intellect, and also in the actual reflection itself. And our very restitution into God is absolutely consummated by the suppliant adoration that arises from this.

2. That of Hermes Trismegistus, addressing his son Tatius thus, in the Pyramider, chap. XII. The mind, O Tatius, is from the proper essence of God. For there is some essence of God, of whatever kind it may be; this he knows absolutely by itself. The mind indeed is not cut off from the essence of God; because it is even like the splendor of the diffused sun. But this mind in men is indeed God; for that reason some men are gods, and their humanity is contiguous to divinity.

3. That of the Mystics. For thus writes 10. TAVLERVS in tr. von der Nachfolgung der Armuth Christi S. 3.: "Some said that this is the highest poverty, and the closest detachment, that man be as he was when he was not yet. Then he understood nothing, then he willed nothing, then he was God with God." Let us also hear H. HARPHIVM in theol. myst. 1.5.collat. 2. p. 683. saying: Thus our spirit, turning itself to its origin, i.e., the apex of the mind, and further, reclining on the uncreated spirit, happily deserves to be renewed. Because while it immerses itself wholly in the uncreated spirit, so that it may be liquefied; it flows back again into that infinite abyss, its image is always renewed, so that it may happily deserve to hear: You are my son, today I have begotten you. p. 684. O my soul, whence did your flowing forth take its beginning? Was it not from that abyss of divinity, as essence from essence, life from life, intelligence from intelligence, light from light? but creaturely, not essentially; not Goddess from God, but deified by God. So also GOTTFR. ARNOLD. in theol. myst.c. 6, p.149. "I say that a Christian man becomes a God." He adds the reason for the assertion on p. 152. "Because this doctrine has for the final purpose of all its secret knowledge and working GOD himself; so it expresses his beauty according to its ability, in that it beholds it, and whoever becomes a partaker of it, it makes him as it were into a holy and bright mirror, that he may catch the ray of the highest Godhead, and of the primordial light, and shoot it back into GOD himself, from whence he flowed." On this hypothesis is based that Weigelian formula of speaking in the dialogue on Christianity p. 13: "We must be in him, with him, and through him new creatures, born from God himself, essential children of God, and not imputatively."

Exposition

Obs. I. That God gave the soul, and inspired it into man, the Holy Scripture testifies, Eccles. XII, 7. Gen. II, 7. But it nowhere says that the soul of man emanated from the divine essence itself. It is therefore from God ἐνεργητικῶς (effectively/as an efficient cause), as from an efficient cause, but not ἐσιωδῶς (substantially/as a constituting principle), as from a constituting principle.

Obs. II. By the benefit of regeneration a new and spiritual life of faith is conferred, through which we are rendered, with our sins remitted, adoptive sons of God, Jo. 1, 12. not natural or essential sons of God.

Confirmation

Our assertion is proven; 1) Whoever has emanated from the divine essence, is essentially God. But the human mind is not essentially God; E. The major is clear; because no one can emanate from the essence of God, without being God. Ο λόγος (The Word), or the son of God is therefore essentially God; because he emanates from the essence of God the father by eternal generation. The minor is clear; because if the human mind were essentially God, it would be omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, and to be adored; which is impious to think, and blasphemous to say.

2. The divine essence is one, indivisible, and most simple; E. it cannot be dispersed, or diffused into almost innumerable souls; otherwise there would be as many gods as there are human souls. M. T. CICERO felt the force of this argument, not vainly writing, in book I. on the nature of the gods: Pythagoras, who held that God is a mind intent and pervading through the nature of all things, from which our minds were taken, did not see that by the distraction of human minds God is torn apart and lacerated; and when human minds were miserable, which would happen to most, then a part of God would be miserable, which cannot happen.

3. Whatever has emanated from the divine essence, is immutable; for the divine essence is invariable, Ps. CII, 28. Mal. 111,6.

But the human soul is not immutable; for it becomes evil, through sin, and again from evil becomes good, through grace. Therefore.

4. The mystical doctors, by their nefarious dogma about the origin of the human soul from the divine essence, greatly derogate from the divine majesty, by making a) the human soul equal to the Son of God, and the Holy Spirit. For the former emanated from the essence of God the Father by eternal generation, the latter by eternal spiration; to which the soul, by the dogma of the flowing forth from the abyss of divinity, is equated. b) By constituting the essence of God the subject of sin and misery. For after the fall the soul is corrupt, and subject to divine punishments and afflictions. But if therefore the soul were a particle of the divine essence, sin would no less inhere in it, than affliction would befall it; which is absurd.

5. The opinion of the adversaries was long ago condemned by the ancient church in the council of Braga, canon V. If anyone believes that human souls have existed from the substance of God, as Manicheus and Priscillian said, let him be anathema. The same opinion was rejected, as impious, heretical, and blasphemous by LEO I. epist. 93. to Turbius, JEROME epist. to Marcellinus, AUGUSTINE epist. 28 to Jerome.

6. Through regeneration the human mind does not become a natural Son of God; otherwise Christ would not be the only-begotten Son of God, Jo. 1, 14. E. through the same it does not return into the divine nature, as its constitutive principle.

7. Through mystical union God dwells in the reborn soul, as in his temple 1 Cor. II, 16. E. the reborn soul is not transformed, or liquefied into the essence of God. Who ever heard it said that a dwelling was changed into an inhabitant, or an inhabitant into its dwelling?

Refutation

The dissenters object; I. Whatever soul was inspired into the first man by God, that emanated from the substance of God. But the intelligent soul &c. Therefore. The major is proven; because God produced the other creatures by saying, or by the word of his command, but he inspired the soul, a clear indication that it proceeded from the divine essence in the same way as breath proceeds from the mouth. Resp. To inspire, signifies to produce and communicate a spirit; which God produces either from his own essence, or from nothing. From the substance of God is spirated and proceeds the Holy Spirit, the third person of the divinity; from nothing were produced the finite spirits, namely the angels, and the human soul. For this was inspired by God indeed ενεργητικῶς (effectively/as an efficient cause), as from an external efficient cause, but not οὐσιωδῶς (substantially), as from an internal constituting cause. God created the soul, as a finite spirit, and this he infused into the formed body, but he did not infuse the soul, as a particle of his own essence, into the body.

You object; But no reason can be given why the human soul was not created by the omnipotent word, like the other creatures, but was communicated to man through inspiration, unless this one, that it was derived, or taken from the substance of God. Resp. Ἐμπνευσις (inspiration/breathing in), or inspiration notes 1) the origin of the soul, that it, created from without by God, was infused into the body; 2) the manner of inspiration, that this divine action was done in a singular and excellent manner, yet as easily as it is for a man to emit the breath of his mouth; 3) the effect of the inspiration, that it is not a body, but a spirit not only distinct from all body and matter, but also capable of spiritual motions. But just as the breath of the mouth is not a particle of the soul, so neither is the soul a particle of the divine essence.

II. We are called the offspring of God, Acts. XVII, 28. But the foundation of offspring consists in the communication of essence. Whence the argument arises; Whoever are the offspring of God, to them God has communicated his very essence; But men &c. Therefore. Resp. We are called the offspring of God, not because of the participation of the divine essence, but because of a similar production to it, as to an exemplary cause. Thus Adam is called the Son of God, Luc. III, 38. because he was created in the image of God.

III. Which soul is a partaker of the divine nature, that emanated from the essence of God. But the faithful soul is a partaker of the divine nature, according to the testimony of Peter 2. ep. c. 1, 4. E. Resp. Neg. major. Because not every human soul, but only the reborn and justified is said to be a partaker of the divine nature, not on account of an emanation from the essence of God, but on account of the gracious indwelling of God in the faithful soul, which implies a participation of the divine nature not essential, but accidental. If the human soul had flowed from the substance of God, not only the reborn, but also the unregenerate soul would be from God, which is unwritten and contrary to scripture; for he who sins is of the devil. 1 Jo. III, 8.

Question XI. For what purpose did God create man?

God created man a) for the glory of his name; b) for the eternal salvation of man.

Proof a) Rom. XI, 36. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things; to whom be glory for ever! Amen!

Proof b) That man was created for eternal life is taught by the law prescribed in paradise, Gen. II, 19. Just as the penalty of eternal death was proposed to the one who transgressed it, so, on the contrary, it is gathered that for the man who sanctly observed that law, the reward of eternal life was established.

Question XII. How manyfold is the state of man?

State of man. The state of man is fivefold: The first is the state of innocence, which was created together with the first humans. The second is the state of misery, into which the human race has fallen through the fault of the first-formed. The third is the state of grace, which the faithful obtain through Christ. The fourth is the state of glory, into which the elect will be transferred on the day of universal judgment. The fifth is the state of ignominy, with which the reprobate will be afflicted by the just judgment of God.

Observation. The states are accidental conditions of men, according to which they can and should be considered in different ways. These different states of all men will be examined more accurately below.

Question XIII. What practical uses does anthropology supply?

Practical uses. Anthropology (Ἀνθρωπολογία), or the doctrine of man, when more deeply impressed upon the soul, should rightly and deservedly produce in us a) a decent submission of the soul; b) love of God and neighbor; c) a desire for eternal life.

Proof a) God created man from the dust of the earth, Gen. II, 7, so that man, remembering his primal origin, might bear himself submissively before God. What is viler or more abject than the dust which we trample with our feet? Abraham ingeniously acknowledged this, who, beginning to pray, said: "Behold, I pray, I have dared to speak to the Lord, though I am but dust and ashes!" Gen. XVIII, 27.

Proof b) God breathed into man the breath of life, Gen. II, 7, so that the soul might live perpetually for the author of life, might adhere to him indivisibly, and might rest in him, as in a harbor. "Lord, you have made us for yourself, and our heart is restless until it rests in you." AUGUSTINE, lib. I. conf. c. 1. God formed Eve from the rib of Adam, "that he might make of one blood every nation of men to dwell on all the face of the earth,"

Acts XVII, 26. Since, therefore, all men who live under heaven were created from the one blood of Adam, they are obligated to mutual love by the law of blood.

Proof c) Since man was created for eternal life, let him be held by the love of eternal goods, burn with desire for them, and be delighted by their memory. "The spirit must be directed there" (I speak with BERNARD) "where it is to go. We must hasten there, where we may live forever, and where we may no longer fear to die."

SUSPIRIUM

For if I did not chiefly honor you, O most benign CREATOR of the human race, and constantly venerate You, I would be ungratefully impious, and impiously ungrateful. For when I was nothing, You made me to be not a beast devoid of mind, not a venomous worm, but a man illuminated by the light of reason and speech. You made me from dust, so that I should not be ashamed to cast myself into the dust before your face. You gave me a soul, the breath of life, that I might acknowledge all reasons for breathing and hoping to be dependent on you. I depend on You, O best CREATOR, as a bee on a flower, a shadow on a body. You I love above all, You I esteem the most. Be to me a most indulgent FATHER, I am and remain the humblest of your sons.

CHAPTER VI. ON DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

Question I. What is divine providence?

DIVINE PROVIDENCE IS the external action of the Triune God by which, according to the infallible foreknowledge of His intellect and the benign decree of His will, He most powerfully conserves all creatures, most effectively cooperates with those that operate, and most wisely governs all things for the glory of His name and the benefit of men, especially the pious.

Question II. From where is the word providence derived?

Providence is derived from providendo (providing); pro, in composition, has the same value as præ, or ante (before).

Proof. The author of Book II to Herennius says: "Providence is that by which something future is seen before it happens." Yet, from usage, providere (to provide) implies more than prævidere (to foresee). An astrologer foresees an adverse storm, having no care for those whom it will strike; but to provide, along with foresight of the mind, denotes a solicitous care of the will. So too the Greek word πρόνοια (providence) is from προνοέω (pronoëō), which means, I grasp with the mind, I foresee, I procure.

Question III. Is the word πρόνοια (providence) read in the canonical books?

The word πρόνοια (providence) is indeed read in the apocryphal book of Wisdom a), but not in the canonical books, in which divine providence is called the vision of God b).

Proof a) The author of Wisdom, chapter XIV, 3, says: "Your providence, O Father, governs all things." The word, διακυβερνᾶν (to steer through), is a nautical term. For just as a pilot governs a ship, lest it be carried headlong onto the rocks, so God rules men with his provident care, lest they be broken by adverse things, or be utterly overthrown.

Proof b) Abraham, committing the whole matter to divine providence, says: "יהוה יראה" (Yahweh yir'eh - The Lord will see), Gen. XXII, 8. The providence of God is called vision, not without emphasis, because God sees all things in one glance. Foresight and foreknowledge are attributed to God only anthropopathically (ἀνθρωποπαθῶς).

Properly speaking, God foresees nothing, foreknows nothing, since to Him nothing is future, but all things are most present, and so from eternity He sees and beholds all things as most present. He is said to foresee only with respect to us, who exist in time and measure things that happen in time according to before and after.

Question IV. In how many ways is the word providence taken?

The word providence is taken in two ways: a) broadly, b) strictly.

Proof a. Broadly taken, providence comprises 1) πρόγνωσιν (prognosis), or foreknowledge, which is an act of the intellect by which God foreknows what is conducive to creatures. 2) πρόθεσιν (prothesis), purpose, or decree, which is an act of the will by which God wills to order and dispose those things which He foresaw to be conducive to creatures. 3) διοίκησιν (dioikesis), the very conservation and governance of God. The providence of God, as πρόγνωσιν καὶ πρόθεσιν (foreknowledge and purpose), is an internal act of the divine intellect and will; as διοίκησιν (administration), it is an external action.

Proof b. Strictly speaking, the providence of God is a divine action directed outward (ad extra): for it is concerned with creatures, and is terminated outside the bosom of the deity. In this stricter sense, the actual providence of God is the very conservation, cooperation, and governance of creatures; while foreknowledge and the decree concerning the things to be conserved and governed are presupposed, as acts of the divine intellect directing and of the will commanding.

Question V. From what principle does the providence of God become known?

The providence of God is known partly from the light of nature a), and partly from the light of scripture b).

Proof a. 1) From the creation of things, because creation being posited, divine providence must necessarily be posited; without which created things cannot subsist. "Why would God create all things, if He did not want to take care of them?" says

THEODORET, lib. II. de provid. "Who would not perceive that this world, so perfected with wonderful reason, is governed by some providence? Since there is nothing that can subsist without any moderator. If a house deserted by its inhabitant falls into ruin, a ship without a pilot goes to the bottom, and a body abandoned by the soul decays; should we not much less think that so great a structure could either have been built without a craftsman, or have stood for so long without a ruler?" as LACTANTIUS aptly says, lib. III. instit. cap. 19.

2. From the constant order of created things, which is seen in the fixed and perennial motion of the celestial spheres, in the certain vicissitude of times and seasons, in the fecundity of the earth, the perpetuity of rivers, the generation of different species; which order is conserved not by chance and fortune, but by God Himself. (*)<sup>105</sup>

(*) This illustrious evidence of divine providence is most worthy of accurate contemplation. All the properties of the world, which both reason and experience teach us, must be considered.

I. The contingency of this universe. That is called contingent which can be and not be, or be otherwise than it is. Therefore, it is not through itself, but through the will of its author and maker. Therefore, its continuation also depends entirely on the will of the maker. As is its existence, as the Philosophers say, so also is the whole nature of the thing, or its essence. The continuation of existence is named duration, the continuation of essence we call conservation. Therefore, by whose will a thing exists, by the same will it both endures and is conserved. Therefore, also those things, whatever they may be, that pertain both to the existence of the thing and to its essence, so that they cannot be separated from it, depend entirely on the will of that author, by whose most free will that thing both endures and is conserved. To the essence of an animate body, at the same time endowed with reason, insofar as it is animate, pertains the power of moving itself; but insofar as it is a participant of reason, the power of acting toward a certain end proposed to itself. The power of moving itself, insofar as it depends on the will of another, is said to be sustained, and not without the wisest determination. The power of acting, insofar as it depends on the will of another, is said to be governed. Therefore, the whole world, and whatever in it is animate, whatever also possesses the use of reason, each one of these is always conserved in its essence by that author, by whose most free will it first came into being, is always sustained and determined in its motion, and is also always governed in its action, to be directed to a certain end. These three things, however, conservation, sustentation with arbitrary and wise determination, and governance, are what we comprehend under the one name of providence.

II. The harmony and agreement of all parts of the world, always the same and perpetual amidst so many and so great vicissitudes, and at the same time the continuous coupling and succession of the most apt ends and means in each and even the smallest things. Which indeed clearly indicates the most profound wisdom of one common author and moderator of all.

III. The multitude and variety of things, especially human affairs, which universally and individually wonderfully agree to one general end, namely, to the utility and society of the entire human race. Specifically, there are six signs of divine providence to be weighed with the greatest attention of the mind; 1) The diverse propensities of souls to various kinds of life and duties, partly the most humble, which most men, though unjustly, hold in contempt; partly the most sordid, which all others disdain; partly the most dangerous, which all the

3. From the omniscience, omnipotence, goodness, and omnipresence of the creator. If God, the creator of the world, did not provide for the needs of created things, He would not provide either because He did not know them; or because He could not provide for them; or because He would not want to; or because He was very far away from them. The first detracts from divine omniscience, the second from omnipotence, the third from goodness, the fourth from omnipresence. Wherefore it is most validly concluded that the omniscient, omnipotent, most good, and omnipresent creator of this universe provides for the welfare of the things created by Him in the best and wisest manner.

4. From the dictate of conscience, which presents God as a severe judge, and thus rest dread, yet all necessary for social life and the good of the state. To choose these, certain men are carried by a certain natural instinct, and even impulse, and with such a difference that in no state or kind of life is there a lack of necessary men or an abundance of superfluous ones. That this propensity, and this most powerful inclination of the will, naturally implanted and innate in man, is not to be attributed to parents alone as the cause, is apparent from this: that (a) it often happens that the offspring is both most ready and most apt for that duty and kind of life from which its parents were very far removed, and which they even most abhorred; that (b) the admirable proportion of so many and so varied propensities, and the order and conjunction of them all with the common welfare of the entire human race, demonstrates one common cause. Nor indeed should this be passed over in silence, that as men multiplied, so also were the arts multiplied, and increased by new inventions. 2) The distinction of forms and faces. How great a benefit this is, and with what wise counsel it is bestowed upon us, Nemesius among the ancients excellently taught, whose excerpted words Buddeus has given in his Instit. theol. dogm. L. II. c. 2. §. 43. not. a. 3) The entirely unexpected disclosure of clandestine deeds, hidden with the greatest study of cunning and craftiness, not without a wonderful conjunction of surrounding circumstances. Which argument the same lauded Nemesius has pursued. And a most grave weight and strength is added to this argumentation by the fact that from that disclosure of crimes the punishment of retaliation shines forth. Which thing is a manifest proof that a most just as well as most wise Deity presides over human affairs. Men are to be rebuked whose levity of mind is so foul and mad that they themselves will not turn their mind to know the divine judgments, Ps. XXVIII, 5. 4) The very close coherence of those things which happen to a man favorably and fortunately, since indeed all things are connected and apt among themselves, so that experience may perpetually illustrate this most true saying: "All things work together for good." (πάντα συνεργεῖ εἰς ἀγαθόν) Rom. VIII, 28. 5) The direction of the most bitter calamities, and even of the worst actions, to a salutary event, Genesis L, 20. 6) New cases, not only very rare, like plague and famine, but even plainly singular, which, if they proceeded only from natural causes without a provident ruler and moderator, could not but happen more often and recur in a cycle. A clear example is provided to us by the conversions and overthrows of states, which grew from a small beginning in a wonderful way, but the greater the increments they received, the more they were inclined to fall, and the closer they were to destruction. But entirely singular is the destruction of the land and nation of the Jews. A fate truly unheard of, to which there has never been any like it, nor will there be in the future, that can be conferred and compared with it, Matth. XXIV, 21. From which it is also known how closely things done in the kingdom of nature are connected with those things which pertain to the kingdom of grace; for since the promises and benefits, entirely singular and excellent, by which the Jewish nation was distinguished from all others, pertained to the Christ who was to come, and was repudiated by that nation, and since the Jews were contaminated by a singular sin; therefore they also suffered a singular calamity. These are truly the most evident proofs, from which it follows that the providence of God not only exists, but is also never absent from all created things, nor was it occupied only in their first constitution. God "works until now" (ἕως ἄρτι), John V, 17. Christ pronounced this with the intention of teaching his hearers that the Sabbath, the rest of God, pertains not to all external works, but only to the works of the first creation. God indeed ceased to create, that is, to make new kinds of things and new species; but he never ceases to conserve, sustain, and govern the things created and propagated, still giving to all "life, and breath, and all things." (πάντα ζωὴν, καὶ πνοὴν, καὶ τὰ πάντα), Acts XVII, 25.

exhibits the providence of God with respect to those things which are done by men. Whence is it that even those who have no man conscious of their crimes, or do not acknowledge a superior on earth whom they should fear, feel terrors in their conscience after committing wicked deeds? Therefore, those who are struck by the scourges of conscience testify that there is a superior God in the heavens, who takes care of those things which are done by them.

Proof b. The entire sacred scripture is nothing other than a pellucid mirror, from which, wherever you turn, that ever-watchful eye of provident direction shines forth; since the keeper of Israel never sleeps, Ps. CXXI, 4. (1) The psalmist testifies concerning the conserving providence of God, Ps. XXXVI, 7. "You preserve man and beast, O Jehovah!" By which words he teaches that divine providence is occupied not only with creatures endowed with intellect, angels and men, but also with those devoid of reason, namely beasts, which God preserves, averting harmful things from them, and conferring the most useful things. (2) St. Paul asserts the cooperating providence of God, Acts XVII, 27, 28. "God is not far from each one of us; For in him we live, and move, and have our being." God, filling all in all, is present to all creatures by the presence of power, to faithful men by the presence of grace, to angels and blessed men by the presence of glory; but no presence of God is not efficacious or operative. Therefore, the apostle says: in him we live, as an embryo in the mother's womb, in him we move, as ships in the sea, in him we are, as birds in the air, fish in the river. But in whom we live, move, and are, he cooperates with us as we operate. (3) Jeremiah teaches the governing providence of God, ch. X. 23. "I know, O Jehovah, that the way of man is not in himself; it is not in man who walks to direct his steps." The prophet implies that the counsels and actions of men proceed indeed from the liberty of the human will, but are subject to divine providence, by reason of governance and direction to a certain end.

The antithesis is of the Atheists, who deny the providence of God, whose arguments are:

I. "God does not care for oxen," 1 Cor. IX, 9. Therefore, divine providence does not provide for the welfare of all.

Response: Paul's words are not to be taken absolutely, as if he completely removes oxen from the care of divine governance. Scripture asserts the contrary, Ps. XXXVI, 7; CXLVII, 9. But comparatively, that the primary care of God is not for oxen, but for men. The apostle adduces the divine precept about not muzzling oxen, for the general reason of the law, which is: The means of life are not to be denied to the laborer. From which, he teaches us to conclude: If the mouth of the ox treading out the grain is not to be shut, much less are the means of life to be withdrawn from the ministers of the divine word doing their duty. For God does not care for oxen only, or chiefly, but takes the most special account of faithful men, among whom the prelates of the church are not the least.

II. If the providence of God were occupied with all created things, there would be no defect in natural things: The consequent is false: Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is clear; because the most perfect God acts in the most perfect way. Therefore, if God cooperates with operating creatures, nothing imperfect can be produced. The falsity of the consequent is manifest: For daily monstrous, blind, deaf, lame men, etc., are generated.

Response: The defects of created things are not to be ascribed to God, but to particular causes; which, indeed, either destitute of sufficient strength, or impeded by an object as if by an obstacle, have not produced a perfect work. Nor, however, are such effects, produced with a defect, completely withdrawn from divine providence, since they do not happen without the general concurrence of God.

III. "God rested from his works," Gen. II, 2. Therefore, there is no watchful care of God for them.

Response: Rest is said of God not simply, but in a certain respect and with a certain regard. God rested from making the world, from creating new species, he did not rest from the conservation and governance of things. Nor did He cease from propagating the individuals of species. Indeed, rest is said of God in one way, and of man in another. Man rests either tired from laboring, or falling asleep in idleness. God rests in acting, and acts in resting.

IV. If God cared for all men, he would surely bestow more prosperous successes on the pious than on the impious; But experience speaks the contrary.

Response: (1) Judgement concerning prosperous successes is not to be made from the dictate of blind reason, but from the word of God. What seems to many to be the principal part of happiness, is not rarely for them a ready path to the underworld. On the contrary, the calamity of this age is for many the mother of prayers, a training ground for patience, fortitude, constancy, an expeller of vices. "He who suffers in the flesh ceases from sin." I Petr. IV, 1. 2) Distinguish between the beginning, middle, and end of successes. Let us not estimate the beginnings, nor the course of successes, but let us look to their end and outcome. "The evil man is reserved for the day of destruction; he is led forth to the day of wrath," Job. XXI, 30.

V. If the providence of God were to rule all things, no place would be left for chance or fortune. But that much place is left for chance and fortune, Solomon frankly confesses, Eccles. IX, 11. "Time and chance happen to them all."

Response: (1) Providence excludes chance in the order of the universal cause; for all things are subject to its directing foreknowledge and commanding will; But not in the order of the particular cause; since something can disturb or deflect it in acting, so that the desired event does not correspond to the undertakings, e.g. a killing is called accidental with respect to the woodcutter from whom the axe head flew off, Deut. XIX, 5, but not with respect to God, who caused the man to be killed to come into the hand of the killer, Exod. XXI, 13. 2) In Hebrew, the word is פגע (pega), which properly denotes an occasion, or an occurrence, and so the sense is: The occasion for doing something as one wishes does not always present itself to us, but it is offered to us by God, in whose hand is both the occasion and the event of the occasion.

VI. "It is absurd to reduce the majesty of God to this, that He should know at every single moment how many gnats are born, or how many die, what the multitude of fleas and flies is, or how many fish swim in the waters," says JEROME, on Habakkuk chapter I.

Response: (1) Let Jerome, a most learned father, be excused, for he speaks of a successive and discursive knowledge, by which at single successive moments that which was previously unknown is known, whereas God by one act knows and penetrates all things infallibly. (2) But if Jerome absolutely denied that the providence of God extends to the vilest things, we do not stand on his side. For not only the hairs of our head are subject to divine care, Matth. X, 30, but also the lice, Ex. VIII, 17, 18.

Question VI. Who is the lord providing for all created things?

The Lord, conserving and governing all created things with His provident care, is God a), the Father b), the Son c), and the Holy Spirit d).

Proof a. The creator of the world is its inspector, conservator, and governor. For as creation is a work of infinite power, so to conserve and govern the created world is a work of infinite virtue, goodness, and wisdom. ANSELM aptly says, in his monologion: "Just as nothing was made except through the creative essence of God, so nothing flourishes except through his preserving power," as cited by D. GERHARD, in disput. isagog. p. 647.

Proof b. John V, 17. "My Father is working until now, and I am working." The Savior implies that God the Father from the first creation to this very day works effectively and continuously, sustaining creatures, supplying them with congruent powers, and influencing their actions. Therefore, since the divine essence is the same, the power of the Father and the Son is the same, the Son of God is also constantly occupied with promoting the benefits of creatures, especially of men.

Proof c. The Son of God "upholds all things by the word of his power," Hebr. I, 3. The divine person upholding is the Son of God, as he was previously called the splendor of glory and the character of the Father's person; to whom in the words immediately following is attributed the cleansing of sins. The context therefore teaches that the Son of God upholds all things. Φέρειν (pherein) among the Greeks signifies both to carry and to do, or to move. Wherefore by this emphatic word both the sustentation and the governance of all created things are indicated. The apostle adds that the Son of God carries, acts upon, and moves all things by the word of his power, i.e., by his nod, command, and authority, by which all things are nourished and live, Matth. IV, 4.

Proof d. Concerning the Holy Spirit, it is said in 1 Cor. XII, 11, that he distributes spiritual gifts for the conservation and governance of the church; which is a special providence. That saying of David should be understood of general providence; Ps. CIV, 30. "You send forth your spirit, they are created." The creator Spirit, who at the beginning of creation moved over the face of the waters, Gen. I, 2, continuously creates, i.e., conserves creatures; since conservation is a certain continuous creation.

Question VII. For which things does God provide?

The object of providence. God provides for all creatures a), the greatest b), and the smallest c).

Observation 1. God Himself does not pertain to the object of divine providence. For the providence of God is an action ad extra, which is performed outside the bosom of the deity and is terminated at creatures. Add to this, that the object of divine providence is everything conservable and governable. But God is not conservable; because He can neither perish nor depend on a superior conserving cause; nor is He governable; because a governing cause is superior and wiser, which God does not acknowledge.

Observation 2. The object of divine providence can be distinguished into general and special. The general object of divine providence is the entire system of the world, and all the creatures contained in it, which are heaped with the temporal benefits of God. The special object is the church of God, both militant, that is, the assembly of faithful men, and triumphant, that is, the assembly of angels and blessed men, enjoying the spiritual and eternal benefits of God. Cf. D. GERHARD'S disput. isagog. p. 653.

Proof a. From Gen. I, 31. "Then God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good." As far as the divine eye extends, seeing the goodness of creatures, so far does divine providence extend. But that eye extends to all and singular creatures; Therefore, so does this. The reason for the consequence is that to see the goodness of creatures is a work of divine providence.

Proof b. The noblest and greatest of creatures are angels and men, originally created according to the model of divine wisdom and sanctity. God commands the good angels, Ps. XCI, 11, and sends them forth for His ministries, Hebr. I, 14, who will also minister to Him in the resurrection of the dead and the citation to judgment, I Thess. IV, 16. Therefore, God governs them by His providence. God places restraints on the evil angels, Job. I, 12, and loosens them, Matth. VIII, 31. Therefore, evil angels also are subject to divine rule. The most benign God has regard for men, both good and bad. For

He makes His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust, Matth. V, 45. However, He provides in the first place for the salvation of faithful men. For He is the savior of all, especially of the faithful, I Tim. IV, 10. The church, therefore, or the assembly of the faithful, is governed, conserved, and adorned with spiritual gifts by God in a special manner.

Proof c. The most wise care of the thrice-best God does not neglect even the smallest creatures. For He provides for the ravens, Ps. CXLVII, 9, for the sparrows, Matth. X, 29, for the lice, Exod. VIII, 17, for the lilies and the grass, Matth. VI, 28, 30. He moderates the waters, rains, winds, and lightnings, Job, XXVIII, 25. He produces from the earth grain, new wine, and oil, Hos. II, 22. He has in number the stars, Ps. CXLVII, 4, the hairs, Matth. X, 30, and our tears, Ps. LVI, 8.

Question VIII. How does the providence of God moderate the life of men?

The providence of God moderates the entrance into human life a), its progress b), and its exit c).

Proof a. The entrance into human life comprises both formation and conservation in the mother's womb, and extraction from the womb. The most pious Job vindicates the formation of the embryo and its conservation in the womb to God, ch. X, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. "Your hands have made me and fashioned me, an intricate unity; yet you would destroy me. Remember, I pray, that you have made me like clay; and will you turn me to dust again? Did you not pour me out like milk, and curdle me like cheese? You clothed me with skin and flesh, and knit me together with bones and sinews. You have granted me life and steadfast love, and your care has preserved my spirit."

Observation (1). God is said to form man in the mother's womb not exclusively, as if the womb itself, or the plastic power of the soul, or the menstrual blood, or other causes were excluded; but since all natural causes are subject to God, and He acts through them, He is rightly said to form and conserve us in the womb.

Observation (2). Job skillfully delineates the entrance into his life. He attributes this, indeed, to the hands of God, by which he understands the creative power of God; for as parents generate, God creates. He compares his formation in the womb now with the shaping of clay, now with the curdling of milk, now with the putting on of a garment, expressing indeed his humble origin, but the sublime action of God. That he lives and breathes, he holds all this to be dependent on the assiduous vision of God, and His paternal care and protection. Cf. Ps. CXXXIX, 14, 15, 16. Concerning the extraction from the mother's womb, the king prophet testifies, Ps. XXII, 9: "From my mother's womb you are my extractor," as if to say, "You acted as a midwife, and freed me from my maternal bonds." Or: "You yourself so governed the hands of the midwife that no harm was done to me as a tender infant, but I came forth into this air unharmed."

Proof b. God moderates the progress of life by bestowing the sustenance of life, Ps. CXLV, 16, by directing our steps, i.e., by advancing our counsels, undertakings, and deeds to desired outcomes, Ps. XXXVII, 23, by repelling the snares of enemies or their open force from us, Ps. III, 7, 8, by fitting and calling us to a certain kind of life, Jerem. I, 5, 6, 7.

Proof c. God (1) infallibly foreknows the end, or exit, of life. This the Psalmist indicates, Ps. CXXXIX, 16, "Your eyes saw my unformed substance; in your book were written, every one of them, the days that were formed for me, when as yet there was none of them." God infallibly knows our unformed substance (glomus), i.e., the formless mass from which we were formed in our mother's womb. He also foreknew all the future days of our life, divinely destined for us for the enjoyment of this light. But he whom all the days of our life do not escape, is not deceived by the last hour of living.

(2) God has preordained and established the term of life. This Job teaches, ch. XIV, 5. "Since his days are determined, the number of his months is with you; you have appointed his bounds that he cannot pass." By which words it is signified that definite days of living are appointed for man by God, and the number of months is established by reason of divine prescience and decree, which man cannot transgress. However, the term of life is fixed by a decree not absolute, preceding or excluding all secondary causes, but by a hypothetical and ordained decree, founded in secondary causes, and formed according to their condition. Namely, by a common and ordinary law, God establishes for man a physical, or natural, term of life, according to the nature and temperament of each person. We prove our assertion (a) because, as God from eternity foreknows what nature each one will receive from his parents by the force of natural generation, and how far he will protract his life according to the order of nature with His general concurrence; so also from eternity He established to provide to secondary causes only as much influence as is due to them by the law of nature, until they reach the term determined by nature. For this is the way of divine providence, that it does not subvert the common course of nature and the order and powers of acting of secondary causes, but conserves them, and provides its own influx to them, congruent and proportionate to the powers and nature of each. (b) Whenever Holy Scripture promises a prolongation of life to the followers of piety, but threatens its abbreviation to the impious, it indicates that God has appointed a term of life for man according to his nature and temperament. For to prolong life is to extend it beyond the appointed term, and to abbreviate it is to anticipate the appointed term. Where, by the appointed term, no other can be understood than that which nature itself, with the general concurrence of God, appoints by common law. (c) The same is proved by the example of King Hezekiah, whose term of life, when he was sick, the prophet Isaiah announced by God's command to be at hand, saying: "Set your house in order, for you shall die, and not live," Is. XXXVIII, 1.

Where, without doubt, it was foretold that death was imminent for him in view of the term which the secondary causes, with the general concurrence of the first cause, had fixed by common law; which term God later, at the prayers of Hezekiah, beyond the accustomed course of nature, prolonged by adding fifteen years. (d) If the term of life were absolutely fated, the divine promises of prolonging life for the pious would be in vain, Exod. XXIII, 25, 26; Prov. III, 2; the threats of cutting off and abbreviating the life of the impious would be in vain, Ps. LV, 23; prayers for a longer life or a peaceful kind of death would be in vain, Is. XXXVIII; Phil. II, 27; the use of medicines ordained by God would be in vain, Sir. XXXVIII, 1; the avoidance of dangers would be in vain.

Furthermore, divine providence is not absolutely and simply bound to secondary causes; but as it sometimes operates beyond the order of nature and the course of secondary causes according to the reason of divine wisdom, so it sometimes appoints another term for human life than that which secondary causes with its natural concurrence fix, and that either longer or shorter, for certain causes; which term is commonly called hyperphysical, supernatural, or preternatural. Cf. D. FEVERBORN. fascic. V. disp. VI. p. 844. God appoints this preternatural term of life either positively, by decreeing it and ordaining the means by which it may be reached; or permissively, by not impeding, by withdrawing His grace, and thus by just judgment permitting that a man be carried off by a premature death sooner than should happen through the course of nature. Positively, God appoints a hyperphysical term, by virtue of His promises, adduced above, in gratuitous remuneration of piety, by prolonging life beyond and contrary to the course of nature, as happened to King Hezekiah, Is. XXXVIII. or also to avert evils and imminent dangers, He calls someone from this mortality sooner than should have happened through nature, as it is said in Wisdom IV, 14: "His soul was pleasing to the Lord; therefore he hastened him from the midst of wickedness." This hyperphysical term of life, shorter and longer, since it depends peculiarly on the benign decree of the divine will and the means ordained by it, is specifically called the term of grace. Permissively, God establishes a preternatural term of life, whenever a man either by his own intemperance, drunkenness, lust, and other sins brings diseases upon himself and accelerates death, or through imprudence or rashness exposes his head to dangers and perishes by shipwreck, or war, or the hand of robbers, or for crimes falls into the power of a judge and is executed, or in despair lays violent hands on himself and cuts short the life which he could otherwise have prolonged for many years. For just as God by His providence does not impose necessity on man's will, so by just judgment He at length abandons to themselves the contemners of His grace, who sin by free will or expose themselves to dangers, and permits them to perish by premature death in the aforesaid and other ways. This hyperphysical term, permissively established, is singularly named the term of wrath. Cf. D. GERHARDI disp. isag. p. 667.

If it is now asked whether the term of life, fixed by the eternal decree of God in such diverse ways, is necessary and unmovable, or contingent and movable, we answer that it is necessary, not with the necessity of the consequent, or absolute necessity, but with the necessity of the consequence, or hypothetical necessity; for the same reason, the term of life is unmovable hypothetically, in a composite and complex sense; but it is movable in a divided sense, by the removal of the presupposed condition. For the physical term can be anticipated by diseases accelerated through a disordered life, or by other means; therefore it is not absolutely necessary that anyone should reach that term of life to which he could have reached through the forces of nature and the course of secondary causes, with the general concurrence of God. However, it being posited that God foresaw from eternity that man would arrive at that term through secondary causes and his general concurrence, and established from eternity that he should then depart from this life when his natural forces fail according to the accustomed course of nature, it is necessary that he die when that term arrives. For the same reason, the natural term is unmovable hypothetically, in a composite sense, e.g. let us suppose that God formed the following decree: King David, if he takes solicitous care of his temperament, which he received well-disposed through the natural generation of his parents, by abstaining from gluttony, lust, anger, and enormous sins, shall live to complete 70 years. This term of life, in a composite sense, is unmovable, but it is movable in a divided sense, by the removal of the annexed condition. For if David does otherwise, he will not reach that longer term, but another shorter one. As for the hyperphysical term, it is always hypothetical, including the condition of piety, or impiety, or contempt of the means.

The antithesis is (1) of Gisbertus Voetius, and others who follow him, asserting that for each man the term of life is fated, that is, certain and unmovable, fixed by the secret and absolute decree of God, so that it is absolutely and simply impossible for anyone to die at another time, in another way, or by another kind of death than that which has been decreed by God. (2) Of Simon Episcopius, and others who adhere to him, according to whose mind every term of life is unmovable. Who rely on the following arguments:

I. Whatever term of life is established by divine decree, so that it cannot be passed, that term is absolutely fated. But the natural term of life, etc. Job XIV, 5. Therefore.

Response: Whatever term of life is established by an absolute divine decree, that term is simply fated; I grant it. But the divine decree by which the physical term of life is established is ordained and respective, since it respects the order of secondary causes, the natural temperament, the use of medicines, the cautious avoidance of impediments, in view of which God can recede from the course of nature and positively or permissively establish another term than nature itself determines.

II. God is not bound to physical causes; Therefore, He does not respect their powers in establishing the term of life.

Response: God, acting by absolute power, is not bound to secondary causes; But acting by ordained power, He attempts Himself to the order established by Him in the very kingdom of nature, and according to the temperament of each, He establishes the natural term of life.

III. "All our times are in the hand of God," Ps. XXXI, 15. Therefore, also the day of life and of death.

Response: We grant that all our times, and the very day of death, depend on the divine hand; but we deny that this day of death is so simply fated that it cannot be anticipated by intemperance, rashness, and suicide (αὐτοχειρία).

IV. God absolutely fixed the term of life for the entire first world at the time of the flood, and for all living in it. If for these, why not also for others?

Response: The term of life was not fixed for them absolutely, without regard to any impelling cause; but God had respect to the incorrigible malice of the most savage men.

V. If the term of life is fixed by an ordained divine decree, then obedient sons will live longer than disobedient ones; But experience teaches that the consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent.

Response: The term of grace is twofold, longer and shorter. The common rule indeed is that longevity is to be expected for obedient sons, Exod. XX, 12. But this rule admits of an exception, namely if God foresees that in the course of time their malice will pervert their intellect, and the harshest calamities will overwhelm them, Wisdom IV, 11. Hence they are sometimes divinely snatched away by a premature death from the theater of malice.

VI. Some of the evangelical doctors themselves, among whom is DANNHAVER, grant that the term of life is fated.

Response: Dannhauer teaches that the term of life is fated (i.e., defined by a certain decree of God): (1) with a physical fatality, which is universally defined by 70 years, Ps. XC, 10, and is wont to be estimated individually from the nature of the temperament. This fatality, however, taken separately, is movable, and is either dilatable by a temperate diet, medical care, piety towards parents, the extraordinary grace of God, such as happened to Hezekiah; or it can be abbreviated by intemperance, neglect of medicine, the impiety of Absalom, suicide (αὐτοχειρία), the just wrath of God the judge, etc. (2) With a complex fatality, if you consider the whole chorus of natural, voluntary, fortuitous causes, extended from heaven outside the ordinary course. But not (3) with an absolute fatality, preceding all respects, conditions, and causes, but a conditioned one, respecting the course of natural, supernatural, and voluntary causes, see Hodos. S. C. p. 865. (*)

Question IX. What acts does divine providence comprise?

The acts of divine providence broadly taken. Divine providence, taken broadly, comprehends in its general scope a) πρόγνωσιν (prognosis), prevision or prescience, b) πρόθεσιν (prothesis), purpose or decree of God, c) διοίκησιν (dioikesis), the actual conservation and governance of created things.

Proof a. (1) The word providentia, derived from providendo (providing), by its native force denotes the knowledge, or vision, of future things before they happen. Therefore, prescience cannot be excluded from the acts of divine providence.

(*) Nor are these two things to be confused with each other; the change of the term of human life, and the change of the divine decree determining it. We affirm the former, we deny the latter. The term of life is mutable, according to the freedom of will which man possesses, either to spare or to harm his own life, which is the sense of the words, Exod. XX, 12; Deut. XXX, 20; 1 Kings III, 14; Ps. LV, 23; Is. XXXVIII, 1, 5. But the divine decree is immutable, on account of the eternal and most certain knowledge of future contingents which is in God, and its necessary connection with God's wisdom, goodness, and justice. Thus these sayings should be understood, Job XIV, 5; Ps. XXXIX, 4.

(2) The Hebrews designate the whole complex of providence by the name of vision, Gen. XXII, 8.

(3) If prescience is denied, exact providence of God is removed. For how can one wisely rule and care for unknown things? How can one avoid unforeseen things?

(4) HUGO DE S. VICTORE warns that in divine providence three things are to be considered: directing knowledge, commanding will, and executing power. Paul seems to complete these three, Eph. I, 11: "God works all things according to the counsel of his will." Where counsel elegantly denotes the directing knowledge, will the commanding will, and the word works the executing power. Βουλή (boulē), or the divine counsel, cannot be without prescience.

The antithesis is of Socinus, who excludes prescience from the acts of providence, whose argument is: The prescience of contingents undermines providence and renders God idle. For what does it matter for God to perpetually contemplate what is done by men, if He already knew it from eternity?

Response: Prescience does not undermine providence, but establishes it. For nothing happens in the present time without God's knowledge, because God is prescient of future things. Hence, the same necessity of divine knowledge that applies to present and past things, also applies to future things.

Observation. The word πρόγνωσις (prognosis), taken in a special sense, denotes the prevision of the persevering faith of the elect, according to which the election was made, Rom. VIII, 29. Here, however, it is taken in a general sense, for the universal knowledge of all things that are, were, and will be; by which the omniscient God exactly knows not only good things, but also evil things which depend on the human will; since He has known all things from eternity, Acts XV, 18.

Proof b. 1) "Our God is in the heavens; he does all that he pleases." Ps. CXV, 3. The psalmist teaches that all divine works depend on the will of God, as the proximate moving principle. This principle expresses itself in a twofold manner: by willing something, either absolutely, without respect to any condition to be fulfilled by creatures, or in an ordained manner, presupposing some condition, which being fulfilled or not fulfilled, God wills to do or not to do something.

2) God "works all things according to the counsel of his will," Eph. I, 11.

Observation. Βουλή (boulē), or counsel, strictly taken, is the eternal act of the divine intellect concerning those things which God wills to be done for the glory of His name; sometimes, however, in the scriptures, it is used for the most wise decree of God. Cf. Acts II, 23; ch. IV, 28. In which sense ESTIUS, in his notes on this passage, thinks counsel should be taken here, on account of the certainty of divine knowledge, which the decree presupposes.

3) "There is no other besides you who has care for all things," says the author of Wisdom, ch. XII, 13. While God in time takes care of all things created by Him, we gather that from eternity He decreed that He would provide for them; because He does nothing in time that He did not from eternity decree He would do, on account of the immutability of the divine will. AUGUSTINE aptly says, and from him PROSPER, sentent. LVIII: "The will of God is the highest and first cause of all corporeal and spiritual movements. For nothing happens visibly and sensibly that is not either ordered or permitted from the invisible and intelligible court of the supreme emperor, according to the ineffable justice of rewards and punishments, of graces and retributions in this most ample and immense republic of the whole creation."

Observation. The divine decree is an act of the divine will by which God wills to effect whatever is good for creatures, and sometimes to permit evil, with most wise counsel and free authority; and thus it is distinguished 1) into effective and permissive. By an effective decree God resolves to effect good things, by a permissive decree to permit evil things. 2) Into absolute and non-absolute. Absolute is that which God conceived without regard to any condition, of means ordained to produce the effect, or of external impelling causes. The non-absolute, for different reasons of consideration, is called conditional, ordained, or respective. A non-absolute decree is called conditional on account of the condition in view of which it was made. e.g., "If that nation, concerning which I have spoken, turns from its evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do to it," Jer. XVIII, 7, 8. The most just God had decreed to destroy the evil people, if they should pertinaciously indulge in nefarious sins; this condition being removed, He had resolved to spare them. The same non-absolute decree is called ordained on account of the τάξιν (taxin), or order of means divinely established, in view of which it was sanctioned by God, e.g. "Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved," Mark XVI, 16. God decreed to save men through the ordinary means of grace and salvation, namely baptism and faith. Finally, a non-absolute decree is called respective, on account of the respect to external impelling causes, in view of which it was formed by God, e.g. "God chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world," Eph. I, 4. The decree of election was made with respect to the merit of Christ, as an external impelling cause. There are some theologians who do not admit a conditional decree (since to decree is properly said of one who, having considered all circumstances, wills something simply and without condition); they insist, however, on a decree respective of external impelling causes, among whom is D. MUSAEUS in his dissertation de æterno electionis decreto p. 273, arguing thus: "The decree of election, although we say it was made in view of foreseen faith, we by no means call it conditional, or made under the condition of faith, but if the term absolute is used in opposition to conditional, we intrepidly state that the decree of election is absolute, or unconditional, nor do we deny it is absolute in any other sense than that in which absolute is used to exclude respect to an impulsive cause external to God. A decree is not, however, immediately conditional because it is made in view of some impulsive cause, but if it is made in view of an impulsive cause already constituted in act, or distinctly foreknown as future, then it is absolute, or unconditional." Cf. D. BREITHAUP. Instit. theol. p. 356.

Proof c. Διοίκησις (dioikesis) denotes administration, dispensation, governance. Concerning this, the author of Wisdom says, ch. XII, 18, "you administer us with great forbearance" (μετὰ πολλῆς φειδοῦς διοικεῖς ἡμᾶς - with much sparingness you administer us). Which words B. LUTHER rendered in German; Du regierest uns mit viel Verschonen (You rule us with much forbearance). Διοίκησις (dioikesis) originates from οἶκος (oikos), from a house. For just as a householder provides for the needs of his household, so God administers the huge house of the world and takes account of all creatures. This διοίκησις (dioikesis) properly constitutes and completes the actual providence of God; for it is an action of God ad extra, an execution of the divine will, and therefore presupposes an internal act of the divine mind and will, and by the customary usage of speech, approved by the church, it comprises conservation, cooperation or concurrence, and governance; although we would not deny that διοίκησις (dioikesis) in a stricter sense designates only direction, or governance.

Question X. Does divine prescience rest on a prior decree?

The prescience and the decree of God conceived concerning future things are eternal and simultaneous on God's part; but in our way of conceiving, the prescience of God precedes the divine decree.

Proof. 1) Although in God it is really the same thing to be, to understand, and to will, yet the divine will is distinguished in its effect from the intellect. For what the intellect has known as good, concerning that the will decrees. No wise person forms a decree about unknown things; for this would be blind, vain, and void. Nothing is in the will that was not first in the intellect, and there is no desire for the unknown.

2) Such is the perfection of the divine intellect that by itself and immediately, without any prior decree of the will, it perceives and infallibly knows the present, past, and future. For all things are naked and laid bare to the divine eyes, Hebr. IV, 13, all things are present to it, by reason of its infallible intuition.

3) The Apostle Paul places πρόγνωσιν (prognosis), or prescience, before the eternal decree of election, Rom. VIII, 29. "For those whom he foreknew, he also predestined." And St. Peter in his 1st Epistle, I, 2, writes to the elect "according to the foreknowledge of God."

4) God knows all possible things, through His infinite knowledge, even those which will never exist, about which He makes no decree. Therefore also by His essential omniscience He foresees future contingents without a prior decree. For there is no reason why God should know possible things differently from future contingent things: for He sees all things in the light of His infinite intellect. You say: Merely possible things, which will never exist, God indeed knows without a prior decree; but there are no future things, nor can there be, which God has not decreed to effect or to permit, and which He will eventually effect or permit. For things are not foreseen as future otherwise than they are future; otherwise they would be falsely foreseen. Response: Although there is no future thing which God has not decreed to effect or to permit, yet God does not for that reason foreknow a future thing because He has decreed it, but because He is omniscient. For before God decrees a future thing, He foresees its possibility, and its transition from possibility into existence, while He freely foreknows the inclination of the human will, that it will produce an effect, if He should impart His necessary concurrence. Thereafter, He decrees to impart His concurrence, and knows how the human will will use His concurrence to produce the effect.

5) God knows future sins, which He has not decreed to effect. Therefore, His prescience does not rest on a prior determining decree. You say: God has decreed not indeed to effect future sins, but to permit them. Response: The divine decree concerning the permission of evils presupposes the prescience of evils, that, unless divinely impeded, they will certainly be future. Therefore, the permissive decree, according to our way of conceiving, does not precede divine prescience, but follows it.

6) God conditionally foreknew future things about which He made no decree, e.g., Christ foreknew the repentance of the Tyrians and Sidonians, if the miracles that happened in the towns of Chorazin and Bethsaida had been performed among them, Matth. XI, 21.

The antithesis is of certain Scholastics, Scotists and Dominicans, whom others follow, according to whose opinion the infallible reason of divine prescience is founded in the predefinition of God, or the decree of making and permitting future things. They try to confirm their opinion with the following arguments:

1. If possible things cannot pass into the condition of future things unless they are determined by a decree of the divine will, then future things cannot be known by God without a prior decree: The antecedent is true; Therefore, so is the consequent. The consequence of the major is clear; because what is in no way future, God does not know as future, since true knowledge conforms to its object. The antecedent is proved; because possible things by their nature are indifferent to future existence and non-future existence; and so some cause is required which determines that indifference, and makes them pass from purely possible things into the condition of future things. A cause of this kind is not to be sought outside of God, because that transition from the condition of possible things into the condition of future things was made from eternity; for from eternity future things are whatever things are future, otherwise they could not have been known as future even by God, and that from eternity. For which reason, because from eternity there was nothing that could be the cause of that transition outside of God, it is validly concluded that the decree of the divine will determines the condition of possible things, so that they migrate into the condition of future things. Response: 1) God knows conditionally future things, which will never be absolutely future (e.g., the repentance of the Tyrians and Sidonians, conditionally future), and yet His prescience is not false. For this proposition is true in a composite sense: The Tyrians and Sidonians would have performed true repentance, if the same miracles that were done among the Chorazins had been performed among them.

2. The transition of not all possible things into the state of future existence is from the predetermining will of God, but from the free cause itself, determining itself to act; whose inclination and powers God foresaw and foreknew, that it would produce an effect, if His concurrence were imparted: Afterwards, He decreed to provide sufficient concurrence. Therefore, prescience precedes the decree.

3. Nor was the transition from the condition of possible things into the condition of future things made from eternity, although it was foreseen from eternity. For such is the power and perfection of the divine intellect, that it presents to itself from eternity as present those things which are future in time.

Instance: I. Future things cannot be present from eternity. Response: Future things cannot be present from eternity with respect to their real and actual being, although, with respect to their ideal objective being, they are presented to the divine intellect for knowing.

II. If a thing is future, and not decreed by God, it will be independent: The consequent is absurd: Therefore, so is the antecedent. Response: We concede that future beings are decreed by God and depend on Him; but we urge this, that a certain divine prescience, at least a conditional one with respect to its object, precedes the divine decree, as we have clearly shown.

III. Whoever knows an object without a prior decree, his knowledge depends on the object: But divine knowledge depends on no object; because it is independent; Therefore, God does not know an object without a prior decree. The major is clear; because according to the common axiom: Knowledge depends on things, not things on knowledge. Response: Divine knowledge indeed respects the object, but properly does not depend on it. Objective dependence is not so called ἀκριβῶς (akribos) and accurately, but ἀκῦρως (akyros) and improperly.

IV. Whoever knows something that he did not previously decree, his intellect is changed; But the divine intellect is not changed. Therefore, God knows nothing that He did not previously decree. The major is established; because in this way the intellect is brought from potency into act. For He could know free acts before they happened; after they happened, He began to know them in act. But this is a change from potency to act. Response: Distinguish between a finite and an infinite intellect. The former is brought from potency to act; the latter in eternity and infinite clarity knows all things most perfectly.

Question XI. Does divine providence impose necessity upon created things, especially upon the human will?

Although all things which God has foreseen happen necessarily, with a hypothetical necessity, yet divine providence does not impose upon all created things, especially the human will, an absolute necessity.

Observation I. The proposed question can be understood of the providence of God, as it is both an immanent and a transient act of God. When the providence of God is considered as an immanent act of God, it comprises, with the prescience of the intellect, the decree of the divine will; regarded as a transient act, it is the conservation and governance of creatures. In this question, we are primarily considering whether the prescience of God, joined with the divine decree, imposes necessity on all created things.

Observation II. Necessity is either absolute, or of the consequent, which some authors also call antecedent and causal; or it is hypothetical, and of the consequence, which is also called subsequent and non-causal. The former arises from the indissoluble cohesion of a cause with its effect, e.g., by absolute necessity, according to the ordinary course of nature, the sun illuminates, water moistens, rhubarb purges, every light thing is borne upwards, every heavy thing downwards. The latter is when something belongs to a thing contingently, if its nature is considered in itself, yet, some hypothesis having been made, it cannot not belong to it, e.g., for a man to walk is contingent; yet, it being posited that he is running, it is necessary for him to be moving forward.

Proof 1) If all things happen necessarily, with the necessity of an antecedent cause, that is, of providence, which necessitates secondary causes to their operations, contingency in human affairs is removed. For that is properly contingent which can be and not be. But things that happen necessarily from an antecedent necessary and immutable cause, namely from the immutable decree of God and the divine influx proceeding from it, which immutably determines secondary causes to an effect, those things cannot not be. Therefore, they are not contingent. But to remove contingency from human affairs is absurd.

2. If divine providence imposes necessity on all created things, so that they cannot act otherwise than God has decreed, the liberty of the human will in all things, even external and civil, is removed. For liberty implies indifference to either alternative, and the will is and is called free because, all things required for acting being posited, it can act and not act, do this and do that. But if it is established that through divine providence the will of man is determined to do this which it does, so that it can neither not do it, nor do its opposite, it will not be indifferent to either alternative, and therefore not free. But to remove the liberty of the human will is absurd.

You say: It is not of the nature of free will to be indifferent to both opposites; because even those act freely who do not act under coercion, although they cannot act otherwise. Thus, the holy angels most freely praise and worship God, whom however they cannot not praise and worship. But the evil freely hate God, even though they cannot not hate Him. Response: Indeed, indifference to both opposites is of the nature of free will. If it were sufficient for the liberty of the will to act not under coercion, even brutes would be freely acting agents, which in many things do not act under coercion. Nor do the examples alleged to the contrary obstruct us. For the holy angels, insofar as they freely praise and worship God, are indifferent to either of the opposites. They praise and worship God freely, not with the liberty of contrariety, or of specification; for they are determined to praise and worship God by their intrinsic sanctity; but with the liberty of contradiction, or of exercise, so that the act of praise or worship which they now exercise, they can for this instant not exercise. The same is to be thought of the evil angels, who are determined to evil, and thereby lack the liberty of contrariety to good and evil; yet they exercise those evil acts freely, they exercise them so that they can not exercise them, and thus they still possess the liberty of contradiction, or of exercise (*).

The antithesis is of Scotus, and those who follow him. Whose arguments are: I. Whatever God has foreseen, that happens necessarily: God has foreseen every created thing: Therefore, every created thing happens necessarily. The major is proved; because, if the things which God has foreseen as future were not to happen necessarily, God would be deceived in His prescience. Response: Whatever God has foreseen, that happens necessarily either with absolute necessity, or hypothetical. Absolute necessity arises from the indissoluble cohesion of a cause with its effect. But divine prescience is not the cause of things. Therefore, not everything that God foresees happens necessarily with absolute and causal necessity. Cf. the deductions above, p. 273.

II. God is not an idle spectator of future things, but a powerful and wise director, who has all secondary causes in His hand, and directs them no less wisely than powerfully, where, when, and how He wills. Thus, future things do not depend on simple prescience, but on will and power, and therefore are not foreknown unless the will, from which they are to have their existence through effect or permission, precedes in order. Response: 1) God remains not an idle spectator, but a wise and powerful director, although by an absolute decree He does not so predetermine things that they cannot happen otherwise. For, as AUGUSTINE testifies, lib. VII, de civit. Dei, c. 30, "God so administers all things which He has created, that He allows them to exercise their own proper movements." 2) We have proved in the preceding question that prescience does not follow, but precedes, the decree of the divine will.

Instance: If the decree of the divine will does not predetermine future things, the divine intellect does not know them determinately; for they can be and not be, happen and not happen, if they are considered outside the decree of God. Response: Future contingents are not predetermined by a divine decree; for thus they would not even be contingent; because they would not proceed contingently from secondary causes, but necessarily. For which reason it should be well noted that future contingents can be viewed in two ways: (1) insofar as they can be produced by a (*) Liberty, properly so called, is the faculty of acting or not acting, of doing this or that, of acting in this way or another, in a manner convenient and congruent with rightly known reasons, without any prevailing impediment. It is therefore a property of the will, the reason for which the intellect, rightly knowing and judging, contains in itself. Therefore, the more perfect the use of reason is, the greater and more certain the knowledge of things and wisdom in the intellect, the more perfect also is the liberty in the will. There is, however, a necessary connection of the consequent will with the antecedent intelligence: Therefore, there is also a necessary consequence, that the will decrees as the intellect judges. Therefore, by a certain moral necessity, the will cannot but decree to act rightly, if the intellect has known and judged all surrounding things in no other way than rightly; yet the will is free, since there is nothing that can prohibit and impede it from this decree. God certainly, knowing all things and infinitely wise, necessarily wills to act well, indeed, in the best way; but He acts most freely, since nothing can resist His will, decreeing without any condition, or be an impediment to it. The damned angels, by their own vice and their own fault, have an intellect utterly corrupted, so that they can know and judge nothing rightly and wisely. They are always engaged in ignorance and error, as in a dense fog. Therefore, they also have no liberty of will, but are eternal slaves of sin, just as impious men, insofar as they are such, enjoy no liberty, John VIII, 34, 36; 2 Peter II, 19. The blessed angels, on the contrary, have perfect intelligence and wisdom, so that they cannot even ever sin, and deflect from the truth. Therefore, they necessarily will to act well, and to prefer the greater good to the lesser; but they nevertheless enjoy perfect liberty, since nothing is, nor can ever be, an impediment to them.

particular cause, and not be produced, be, and not be; in which respect they are called contingent; (2) Insofar as they are produced by their cause freely determining itself to production; In which sense they are called future. Future contingents are presented from eternity to be known by the infinite knowledge of God, just as they are determinately to exist, or not to exist, through their free causes; for nothing that is certainly future escapes the infinite knowledge of God.

III. Whatever cannot be impeded, that happens necessarily with absolute necessity; Whatever God has foreseen and decreed, cannot be impeded; Therefore. The minor is proved from Ps. CXV, 3, "Our God is in the heavens; he does whatever he pleases," and Is. XLVI, 10, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Response; Whatever God wills with an absolute will, and decrees to do with irresistible power (which seems to be understood in the cited passage), that cannot be impeded. But besides the absolute will of God, there is also a conditional will, by which God wills something under a condition, which is not fulfilled by all, e.g., John XIV, 14, "If you ask anything in my name, I will do it," Rom. VIII, 13, "If by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live." Besides the irresistible power of God, there is also a resistible power, e.g., God can through the word and sacraments convert and save all men. But many resist this power of God. Cf. Luke VII, 30; Matth. XXIII, 37.

You say; There is no conditional will of God and resistible power; For if there were a conditional will of God, it would depend on the condition; But the will of God is independent; And if a creature could resist divine power, it would be more perfect and powerful than the creator Himself, which is absurd. Response; The conditional will of God does not depend on the condition, but respects it in distributing benefits and punishments. And a creature by resisting the ordained power of God is not more perfect or powerful than the creator; because it resists not through any perfection and power, but through a certain foul imperfection, e.g., through the blindness of the intellect, the perversity of the will, and the disorder (ἀταξίαν) of desires; which are imperfections. Indeed, even when God is impeded in the acts which He wills to effect by ordained power, He could so act that He would not be impeded, if, that is, He willed to act with irresistible power.

IV. Every wise and powerful master necessarily achieves the desired end through his provident care; God is a most wise and most powerful master; Therefore, through His provident care He necessarily achieves the end. Response; The end of divine providence is twofold; One is common, namely the manifestation of the glory of God; The other is particular, which is the good of creatures. God always and everywhere achieves the common end by His provident care; He does not always obtain the particular end, because He decreed to achieve it under a certain condition, with resistible power. Nor does this conflict with the wisdom and power of God. For a wise and powerful prince, by prescribed laws, intends the welfare of all citizens, although he foresees that very many will not obey the laws, but will bring ruin upon themselves by their own fault.

V. This consequence is firm; God according to His eternal decree wills this to be done; Therefore, it will immutably be done in the way that He wills it to be done. The reason for the consequence is that the will of God is immutable. "I am Jehovah, I do not change," Mal. III, 6. Response; Distinguishing the consequent; Therefore, it will immutably be done in the way that God wills it to be done, with an immutability either causal or hypothetical, according as God willed it to be done either absolutely, or under a certain condition.

VI. If necessity is not imposed on creatures by the providence of God, especially on the human will, the latter will be the queen and absolute mistress of divine concurrences, and of all free acts; The omnipotent dominion of God over the free acts of angels and men will be evacuated, and all things will be subjected to the dominion of fortune; But all these things are absurd; Therefore, necessity is imposed by the providence of God on created things, especially on the human will, so that they act in this and no other way. Response; The human will is not the queen of divine concurrences, nor the absolute mistress of free acts, but is subordinated to divine providence, by which it is ruled, with a governance not captivating the liberty of the will, but gently disposing and ordinarily attuned to created things. The omnipotent dominion of God is not evacuated, or diminished, although God does not always exercise it with absolute and irresistible power, but sometimes with ordained and resistible power. Nothing is committed to the dominion of fortune, because divine providence holds a middle course between the chance and fortune of the Epicureans, and the fate of the Stoics, indeed most wisely directing all things, but not completely removing all liberty and all contingency.

Question XII. Should fate be admitted in the governance of created things?

Fate. We should not assert the Stoic fate, by which all things happen with absolute and inevitable necessity; nor the more rigid astrological fate, by which even the free acts of the human will depend on and are determined by the influx of the stars; but we should acknowledge the Christian fate, which is the connection of causes and effects, necessary with an extrinsic necessity, insofar as it is infallibly foreknown by God, established by an absolute or conditional decree, and governed by a divine rule gently disposing.

Observation 1. The name fate comes from fando (speaking), just as scitum (a decree) from sciendo (knowing). Fate, therefore, is that which someone has spoken (fatus est): (i.e., destined, decreed) just as a pact (pactum) is that which someone has agreed to (pactus est).

Observation 2. Fate is either mental, or active, or real, or subjective. The former is the command and decree of God, which He himself has spoken from eternity, i.e., decreed that it should happen. The latter is the order of secondary causes executing divine providence; It is called fate by an extrinsic denomination; Just as an apple is said to be loved by me; because my love is terminated at the apple. See DANNHAV. hodos. phan. III. p. 321.

Observation 3. Fate is divided into physical, astrological or mathematical, Stoic, and Christian. Physical fate is the order of natural causes, inferring necessary and infallible effects, subject to God, the author of nature; e.g., if rain falls from the clouds, it waters the earth, the sun absorbs the rain. Astrological fate is the influx of the stars into lower bodies, variously disposing and directing them, and it is either more rigid or more lenient, with respect to astrologers who explain it in different ways. The more rigid is that by which all human acts, even voluntary ones, are said to depend on and be determined by the influx of the stars. The more lenient is that which proceeds with the liberty of man unharmed. Stoic fate is defined by Gellius L. VI. N. A. c. 2. as "a certain eternal and indeclinable series of things, and a chain revolving and implicating itself through eternal orders of consequence, from which it is aptly and connectedly formed." The property of this Stoic fate is absolute and inevitable necessity. SENECA teaches this, lib. II. Qu. natural. Q. 36. "What do you understand by fate? I think it is the necessity of all things and actions, which no force can break."

Observation 4. Christian fate is defined (a) by the connection of causes and effects, which the memorable saying of God teaches us in Hosea II, 21. "I will answer the heavens, and they shall answer the earth, and the earth shall answer the grain, the new wine, and the oil, and they shall answer Israel." Contained in these divine words is a concatenated series of creatures dependent on the governance of the first cause. (b) Christian fate is called a necessary connection of causes and effects; because the necessity of fate, if not its form, is certainly its inseparable property. For something is therefore called fated because it is necessary, immutable, and certain. LIPSIUS, lib. I. physiol. Stoic. cap. 12, calls the necessity of fate its twin sister, as it were. But a careful distinction must be made between intrinsic, absolute necessity of the consequent, or causal necessity, and extrinsic, hypothetical necessity of the consequence, or non-causal necessity. Fate is said to be a connection of causes and effects, necessary not with an intrinsic, absolute, and causal necessity, whether you consider prescience or the divine decree. For prescience is extrinsically concerned with its knowable object, and is not its cause. The bishops of the primitive church taught this excellently. ORIGEN, on Romans IX, says: "Something will not be for the reason that God knows it will be; but because it will be, therefore it is known by God before it happens." CHRYSOSTOM, homil. LX on Matthew: "Not because the savior foretold that scandals would come, therefore they happen; but because they were altogether to come, therefore he foretold them." AUGUSTINE agrees with these, lib. III. de lib. arbitr. c. IV. "Just as your memory does not compel things that have passed to have happened, so God by His prescience does not compel things that are future to be done. And just as you remember some things that you have done, but have not done all the things you remember; so God foreknows all things of which He is the author; yet He is not the author of all things which He foreknows." See D. CALOV. in system. tom. II. p. 546. Nor by reason of the divine decree, to which the order and connection of causes and effects is subject, is divine fate necessary with absolute and causal necessity; because the divine decree does not predetermine future things, but gently and easily disposes them according to the nature and capacity of creatures, so that the contingency of things and the liberty of human will may not be removed. (c) The divine decree, directing the connection of causes and effects, is either absolute or conditional, or hypothetical. The former was made by God without regard to a condition to be fulfilled by creatures, the latter includes a condition to be fulfilled by creatures.

Observation 5. For the same reason, Christian fate is divided (1) into absolute and conditional. The former is when the order of causes and effects is governed by the absolute decree of the divine will, and is simply unmovable and invincible; The latter is when the connection of causes and effects flows under a hypothetical divine decree, and therefore is immutable only when taken with the supplement of the hypothesis. (2) Into ordinary and extraordinary. The former is attempted to the nature and ordinary course of creatures; The latter transcends the order of nature.

Proof 1) Absolute Christian fate is proved (a) from those sayings of scripture in which the will of God and His irresistible power are discussed. The royal psalmist says gravely, Ps. CXV, 3, "Our God is in the heavens; he does all that he pleases." The same the prophet Isaiah asserts, c. XIV, 27. "Jehovah of hosts has decreed, and who will annul it? His hand is stretched out, and who will turn it back?" And c. XLVI, 10. "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." (b) By the clearest examples. Absolutely fated is the creation and conservation of the world, Ps. CIV, 5; the duration of the catholic church (not a particular one, of Jerusalem or Rome) to the end of the world, Matth. XVI, 18; the necessity of dying incumbent on all men, and the last judgment, Hebr. IX, 27. Absolutely fated was the hour of Christ's passion, John VII, 30; absolutely fated was the hour when Christ turned water into wine, John II, 4; it is absolutely fated that I was born in this province, on this hour and day. D. DANNHAVER calls every divine hour absolutely fated, in hodos. phæn. III. p. 325. Absolutely fated are those things which happen against the effort, motion, and counsels of creatures, e.g., Esau, meeting Jacob, had formed a plan to crush him; but God moderating all things differently, he did otherwise; for he addressed Jacob as a friend, embraced him tenderly, and kissed him sweetly, Gen. 33.

Proof 2) Hypothetical, or conditional, Christian fate. Conditionally fated is the temporal prosperity and dignity of men. This we learn from Deut. XXVIII, 1 ff. "If you will indeed obey the voice of Jehovah your God, being careful to do all his commandments that I command you today, Jehovah your God will set you high above all the nations of the earth. And all these blessings shall come upon you and overtake you, if you obey the voice of Jehovah your God. Blessed shall you be in the city, and blessed shall you be in the field." This is illustrated by an example. According to the decree of God, Joseph will be a great light in the kingdom of Egypt, and a sun among his brothers; if he shows obedience to his father Jacob, walks piously, prudently, and chastely in the house of Potiphar, interprets the dreams both for his fellow prisoners in jail and for King Pharaoh, and suggests useful counsel to him. But if he does otherwise, either by resisting his father, or by pursuing lust, or by despising his fellow prisoners, he will perish ingloriously. Conditionally fated are marriages. For "house and wealth are inherited from fathers, but a prudent wife is from Jehovah." Prov. XIX, 14. Marriages are fated, I say, not by reason of an inflexible decree, as if it were simply impossible for a man to marry another wife than the one he marries, or for a woman to be married to another man than the one to whom she is married; but by reason of a hypothetical decree, which respects the piety of the man or woman, Ps. CXXVIII, ff.; Sir. XXVI, 3. Hypothetically fated is the term of life. See above, question VIII. Conditionally fated are the opportunities for accomplishing things opportunely, pointed out by the divine finger; he who seizes them is a master of fated felicity. The spoil left by the fugitive Syrian army was offered to the Samaritans by a divine hand; when they embraced it, they held it by fate. 2 Kings VII, 16.

You say: I. The doctrine of fate has long since been eliminated from the church. For AUGUSTINE says wittily, tr. 37. in Jo. "Oh, if your heart were not foolish (fatuum), you would not believe in fate (fatum).” Therefore, the doctrine of fate should not be reintroduced into the church. Response: Stoic and the more rigid astrological fate have long since been eliminated from the church. For thus AUGUSTINE says, L. V. de C. D. c. I. “If for this reason anyone attributes human affairs to fate, because he calls the very will or power of God by the name of fate, let him hold the opinion, but correct the language. For why does he not first say that which he will say later, when someone asks him what he meant by fate? For when men hear this, they understand nothing but the influence of the position of the stars.” But concerning Christian fate, the bishop of Hippo judges far differently, L. V. de C. D. c. 9. “But those who call the connection and series of all causes, by which everything that happens happens, by the name of fate, we need not contend and labor much with them about a controversy of a word; since they attribute the very order of causes and a certain connection to the will of the supreme God.” Nor is the doctrine of fate useless; since through it, rightly handed down, the glory of divine providence remains—not indeed of one wandering and idly spectating—of prescience and decree, and to man remains liberty, whether native in the lower sphere, or given in the higher, in the judgment of DANNHAV. in hodos. phæn. III. p. 328.

You say: II. Whatever removes the contingency of things and the liberty of human will should not be asserted; But fate removes them, etc.; Therefore. Response: If we were to teach that fate is a chain of causes and effects in human life, necessary with an intrinsic necessity, celestially determined and absolutely decreed, we could rightly and deservedly be accused of removing the contingency of things and the liberty of human will by the doctrine of fate; but we teach and confess that fate is a connection of causes and effects in human life necessary with an extrinsic necessity, insofar as it is infallibly foreknown by God, and established by an absolute or conditional decree, and governed by a divine rule gently disposing. From which we distinguish between absolute and conditional fate.

You say: III. All fate, properly speaking, is unmovable, or immutable. Hypothetical fate is not immutable. Therefore, hypothetical fate is not properly speaking fate. The major is established; because we commonly call that fated which is immutable. Response:

Absolute fate is simply immutable and unmovable; but hypothetical fate is immutable in a composite and complete sense, if it is taken together with the supplement of the hypothesis, e.g., If Noah constantly worships God, and builds the ark at his command, and enters it when built, he will not perish in the flood, but will be saved, this is an immutable fate; It can be changed, however, by the removal of the hypothesis, or the non-fulfillment of the annexed condition.

Question XIII. Is there such a thing as fortune?

Fortune, which is an event by accident, accompanying an effect intended per se by a freely acting cause, does not exist with respect to the omniscient and most wise God a); but it does with respect to ignorant man b).

Proof a. With respect to God, nothing is fortuitous or unforeseen; because the providence (πρόνοια) of God governs all things, Wisdom XIV, 3. Therefore, there is no place for fortune in the kingdom of divine providence, but what we call a fortuitous good is offered by the hand of the most wise God. Gen. XXII, 8.

Proof b. A farmer, plowing his field with a plowshare, unexpectedly finds a treasure. He calls the finding of the treasure fortune, or a fortuitous effect. He did not intend to find the treasure; for he was ignorant that it lay hidden in the field. For which reason, folly, and error, and ignorance of things and causes, introduced the name of fortune, in the opinion of LACTANTIUS, book III. instit. c. 29.

Question XIV. By which acts is διοίκησις (administration), or the providence of God strictly speaking, accomplished?

The acts of divine providence strictly spoken. Διοίκησις (administration), or the actual providence of God, is accomplished by three acts: conservation, cooperation, and governance.

Observation I. These are the general, or common, acts of divine providence, concerning all creatures; But there are also more special acts; which, since they are diffused throughout the whole of theology, cannot be considered here, but are to be explained in their peculiar places or seats.

Observation II. In the mind of some theologians, the acts to which divine providence is terminated, to be exercised upon creatures, are two; conservation and governance, which is said to import both a universal concurrence with secondary causes and a special direction of created agents. Cf. D. BAIER's compend. theol. p. 356.

Question XV. What is conservation?

Conservation. Conservation is an act of divine providence by which God sustains all things created by Him, so that they can persist in their nature, their inherent properties, and the powers they received in creation.

Observation I. Creation and conservation are distinct divine acts not in themselves, from the side of the thing, but through our intellect, from a different connotation; for conservation is a continued creation. For God is not said to conserve a creature for any other reason than that He positively continues the action by which He had produced the creature. This is most evident from the fact that just as duration, from the side of the thing, is nothing other than continued existence; so conservation is nothing other than continued creation. It is illustrated by a simile: By the same emanative action with which the sun first shed its rays from itself, it continues the perennial efflux of rays; So God, by the same action with which He first conferred being on creatures, He continues to confer being. But they are distinguished by different connotations. For creation connotes that the thing did not exist before; conservation presupposes that the thing existed before; creation gives the beginning of being; conservation, the continuation of being.

Observation II. Divine conservation is not a merely negative or indirect act; for it does not consist in God not willing to destroy or annihilate the things He has made, but leaving them to their own vigor, as long as they can be vigorous and endure, by the force imparted to them through creation; but it is a positive and direct act, by which God in general flows with a true and real influx into the efficient causes of things to be conserved, so that they may persist and remain in their nature, properties, and powers.

Observation III. God conserves species and individuals. He conserves species by vindicating the essences of things from destruction and imparting perseverance to them. He conserves individuals by substituting new ones in the place of those that perish, so that the essence of the species may persevere.

Observation IV. Annihilation is opposed to conservation, which is the destruction of creatures through the subtraction of the divine influx. But God can, if He wishes, annihilate all creatures, both spiritual and corporeal. For as all creatures depend on God in their being and operation, so they can be annihilated by Him through the subtraction of His conserving hand.

Observation V. God conserves some creatures by Himself alone, such as angels, the heavens, and simple bodies; others He conserves with the concurrence of creatures, such as men, plants, etc.

The divine conservation of creatures is proved both from the light of scripture and from the light of nature. The entire sacred scripture testifies abundantly concerning the conservation of created things through the divine influx. It is sufficient for us to have adduced the following. In the Old Testament, the psalmist proclaims the providence of God, the conserver of this universe, Ps. CXIX, 89, 90, 91. "Forever, O Jehovah, your word is firmly fixed in the heavens. Your faithfulness endures to all generations; you have established the earth, and it stands. By your judgments they stand this day, for all things are your servants." The sense is: Heaven, earth, and whatever is in them, by the word of your command and the truth of your governance, O Lord, persist and remain, both in respect of substance and in respect of the powers of acting; for all creatures are truly your servants, so that whatever they are, they are yours, and whatever they do, they do under your command and governance; since like servants they obey all your commands most promptly. In the New Testament, Hebr. I, 3, the conservation and sustentation of all things is ascribed to the Son of God (not, however, excluding God the Father and the Holy Spirit). For he is said to be "upholding all things by the word of his power" (φέρων τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ). Observation. Some translate τὸ φέρειν (to pherein) as to carry, to bear, to sustain. Others render it as to act, to move, to moderate. In the judgment of SEB. SCHMIDIO in his commentary on the passage, p. 45, the verb φέρειν (pherein) can be taken so broadly here as to comprise both. For God not only carries things at rest, but also moves movable things. By ῥῆμα (rhema - word), we understand the most free and most easy act of God, by power, the omnipotence of God itself. Πάντα (panta) comprises all things, except the one carrying. But God alone, the Father and the Holy Spirit with the Son of God, carry all things; and so τὰ πάντα (ta panta) are all created things, whether they be things, or persons, or actions. Wherefore this is the sense of the apostle's words: The Son of God, together with God the Father and the Holy Spirit, sustains, cherishes, and moderates all created things by the most free and easy act of His infinite power.

From the light of nature we learn (1) That conservation is a continued creation. Therefore, He who created the world and whatever is in it, the same conserves it. For just as the light of the sun is not, does not shine, does not constantly remain, unless it emanates from the sun; So no creature is, endures, or acts, unless it is conserved by God. (2) That God is most present to creatures. Wherefore the supreme inspector and ruler of the world, to whichever creatures He is most present, He can by His omnipotence, knows by His infinite wisdom, and wills to conserve by His most exuberant goodness, the same. (3) That if created things were to subsist without the influx of God, something could remain contrary to God's will, or with Him withdrawing His influx. But with God withdrawing His influx, all things collapse and fall back into nothing.

Question XVI. What is cooperation, or the concurrence of God?

Cooperation or concurrence. Concurrence, or the cooperation of God, is an act of divine providence by which God, with a general and immediate influx, according to the requirement and nature of each creature, gently flows together with secondary causes into their very actions and effects.

Observation. God not only gives creatures the powers of acting, and commands them to be perpetuated, but also immediately flows into the action and effect of creatures, so that that effect is produced neither by God alone, nor by the creature alone, but by one and the same total efficiency simultaneously by God and the creature; by God, that is, as the first and universal cause, by the creature, as a secondary and particular cause.

The divine concurrence is proved both from the light of revelation and from the light of reason. The light of revelation testifies (1) that not only our powers of moving and acting, but the motion itself, or the action, depends on God. The words of Paul are most well-known, Acts XVII, 27, 28. "God is not far from each one of us; for in him we live, and move, and have our being." (2) All our works are attributed to God, as the first and universal cause, 1 Cor. XII, 6. "And there are varieties of activities, but it is the same God who works all things in all." Whoever effects all things in all, He cooperates with operating creatures; But God does, etc.; Therefore. (3) The sacred letters teach that God, as parents generate, creates man, Job X, 8. "Your hands fashioned me and made me, and indeed together all around." Whoever, as parents generate, with his hands makes and forms an infant in the mother's womb, he immediately concurs in the work of generation; But God does, etc.; Therefore. (4) The cooperation of God is gathered from the divine presence, which in biblical style and complex sense implies both substantial presence and efficacious operation. See above, chap. I, Question 49, p. 275 ff.

The light of reason shows us 1) that all creatures are essentially subordinated to God, so that in their becoming, being, and operating they depend on Him. 2) Whatever is and happens positively outside of God, is an entity dependent on the creator. The actions of secondary causes, and their effects, are and happen positively outside of God. Therefore. 3) If the essence of any creature were from God, but not its act and effect; it would follow that the action of the creature is nobler than its essence, and its effect nobler than its cause, indeed that the action is an independent being, and thus God Himself, which is most absurd. 4) From conservation itself shines forth divine cooperation. For the first cause conserves and sustains the second in its being and vigor, in which it was first created. The being and vigor of creatures is not something idle, but is operative everywhere. Therefore, both the powers of creatures and their exercises are from God. For if God sustains every being, He certainly also conserves the action through efficacious production, since conservation is nothing other than the continuous production of a thing. 5) With God suspending His cooperation, the creature does not act according to its inherent powers as it was accustomed to act, e.g., the sun does not move, Josh. X; fire in the Babylonian furnace does not burn, Dan. III. From which reason gathers that secondary causes cannot operate according to their ordinary course unless the first cause cooperates.

Question XVII. What kind of concurrence of God is understood here?

Since in the present we are dealing with the general providence of God, we understand here a concurrence of God that is general and indeterminate a), immediate b), and adapted to the requirement and nature of each cause c).

Proof a. Here is considered the influx of divine cooperation into the actions of all creatures; which is undoubtedly general and indeterminate. If, however, we look at human actions, they are of two different kinds. Some can be elicited by man with natural powers, some transcend the natural powers of man. Those which can be elicited by man with natural powers are either indifferent, or morally good, or morally evil. If the actions are indifferent, such as the act of eating, drinking, God concurs in them with a general and indeterminate concurrence, with the human will freely determining itself to act according to the nature of the object and circumstances. If the actions are morally good, God concurs in them by His providence (1) physically, (2) morally. Physically, He provides a general concurrence to moral actions, by sustaining the powers of mind and body suitable for acting. Morally, He concurs by commanding and promising. To the formal aspect of morally evil actions, namely lawlessness (ἀνομίαν) and disorder (ἀταξίαν), God does not concur with a positive influx; because malice is a defect and a privation, not proceeding from the most perfect God, in whom no defect can fall, but from the human will failing in its acting. God does, however, concur in the remote material of morally evil actions, not the proximate. The former is an indeterminate act; the latter is an act determined and applied to a prohibited thing. E.g., when Eve extended her hand to the forbidden fruit, two acts were present; (1) the extension of the hand, (2) the extension applied to the forbidden fruit. The first act is called the remote material, the second the proximate material. God does not concur in the latter; because His concurrence is general and indeterminate, and so the determination to this or that object is not from God, as from the first and universal cause, but from the secondary and particular cause. Supernatural actions, however, are considered either as to their generic being or as to their specific being. As to their generic being, they are movements of the intellect and will, to which God concurs with a general concurrence; as to their specific being, those movements are excited by the Holy Spirit with a special concurrence. But supernatural acts are not yet dealt with here. To natural acts God concurs indeed with a general concurrence, but not exclusively; for extraordinarily, under that general influx is also contained a peculiar influx, conferring more intense powers of acting and a stronger motion on one creature than on another.

Proof b. God concurs in the actions of creatures with an immediacy of power and of person (suppositum). He concurs with an immediacy of person because God is proximately present with His substance to operating creatures; since He fills all things in all, Jer. XXIII, 24. He also concurs with an immediacy of power, by an efficacious influx immediately and proximately touching the action of the creature and its effect; because He "works all in all," 1 Cor. XII, 6. You say: God operates through creatures; Therefore not immediately. Response: Someone is said to act immediately either exclusively or inclusively. Exclusively, when someone acts alone; Inclusively, when someone, together with other cooperators, proximately touches the action and effect. God flows immediately into the actions of creatures, not exclusively, as if creatures were excluded from the action or were idle; but each creature does what is its own; but God, together with the operating creatures, immediately and proximately touches the action and effect with His influx. Which the author of Wisdom seems to insinuate, c. VIII, 1. "She reaches mightily from one end of the earth to the other, and she orders all things well."

Proof c. God concurs in the actions of secondary causes with a gentle, easy, and accommodated concurrence to the requirement and nature of the creatures. For with necessarily acting agents God concurs uniformly, e.g., with fire, that it may burn, with the sun, that it may shine; With freely acting agents He concurs multiformly, leaving to them free will and the free power of choosing this or that; for what order God has once established, He does not easily change, Ps. CXIX, 91. AUGUSTINE says aptly, book VII. de C. D. c. 30. "God administers all the things which He created, so as to allow them also to exercise and perform their own proper movements."

The antithesis is of Pelagius, Durandus, and the Arminians, who either deny divine cooperation entirely, or at least call it into doubt. They rely on the following arguments:

I. If God, by cooperating, were to produce the same action as the creature, God, when a man eats, would have to be said to eat; The consequent is false; Therefore, so is the antecedent. The consequence of the major is clear; because those who do the same thing receive the same denomination from the same action. Response: We deny the consequence of the major. To the proof, we say that the denomination from an action is acquired by that acting cause in which the effect is terminated, or by which it is received. When God concurs in the natural eating of a man, the food is received by the man, and so not God, but the man, is said to eat.

II. Whoever concur in the same action are associate causes. But God and nature are not associate causes. Therefore. The major is clear by itself. The minor is proved; because associate causes flow into an action with a partial influx, which implies imperfection. Response: Whatever coordinate causes, or causes of the same order, concur in the same action, they are associate causes. But God and nature are not of the same order. For God is the first cause, independent and universal; the creature is a subordinated, secondary, dependent, and particular cause.

III. One action cannot proceed from very different agents. God and a creature are very different agents. Therefore. The major is clear; because there is a certain harmony among cooperating causes. Response: One action cannot proceed from very different agents, unless the inferior agent is subordinated to the superior. But the creature is essentially subordinated to God and is subject to His governance.

IV. Whoever concurs in all the actions of men also concurs in sins; But God concurs, etc. Therefore. Response: Distinguish between human actions and their disorder (ἀταξίαν), and also between effects and defects. Because the divine concurrence is general, indifferent, and indeterminate, God indeed concurs in the remote material of an evil action, which is a certain physical mode of the will, intellect, eyes, hand, etc. Not in their proximate material, which is the motion or action applied and determined to a prohibited object; which determination is from the particular cause, not the universal one. To the disorder (ἀταξίαν) and defect,

God does not concur; because the defect is to be imputed to the erring secondary cause, just as, e.g., the soul flows into the progressive motion of a limping man; but the limp is not to be imputed to the soul, but to the broken tibia.

V. A creature either has sufficient powers to perform its work, or it does not; If the former, it does not need the concurrence of God; If the latter, the creature will be nothing other than an instrument of God. Response: A creature has sufficient powers for acting in its own kind (in the kind of dependent beings), and so nothing prevents it from acting as a principal cause, or being able to act, since the effect does not exceed its powers; yet those powers are not absolutely sufficient, but the divine concurrence and dependence on the first cause is always included.

VI. The action of divine concurrence is either mediate or immediate; If it is mediate, God acts through secondary causes, not with them; If it is immediate, the action is miraculous; But miracles do not happen daily, nor should they be imagined without cause. Response: The divine concurrence is called an immediate action not in an exclusive sense, as if it excludes all means; but in an inclusive sense, since it so concurs with secondary causes that, together with them, it immediately touches the action and its effect.

VII. Whatever concurrence is laborious, troublesome, and unworthy of the divine majesty, should not be attributed to God; But a daily and continuous concurrence in all the actions of all and singular creatures is laborious, etc. Therefore. The major is clear, 1) because God, having completed creation, rested from His works, Gen. II, 2. 2) He is a most perfect deity, about whom nothing unseemly should be asserted. The minor is obvious; because in one day many myriads of actions are dispatched, among which many are very sordid. Response: The concurrence of God is not troublesome or laborious; because God moderates all things by the word of his power (verbo potentie sue), i.e., by the most free and easy act of His omnipotence, Hebr. I, 3. God also knows how to act while resting, and to rest while acting, as AUGUSTINE says in De C. D. L. XII, c. 17. God, the purest Spirit, is not contaminated by physical filth, and God does not concur in moral filth, i.e., sins.

VIII. If the divine concurrence is general and indifferent, these absurdities will follow:

1) That in one year there is not a greater abundance of grain than in another; 2) That God contributes no more to the formation of a man than to the formation of a beast; 3) That the creature determines the indeterminate concurrence of God; 4) That the concurrence in natural and supernatural acts is the same. Response: a) generally: The general concurrence of God does not entirely exclude peculiar and extraordinary modes or degrees of concurring; For God is not bound to the common law or order of creatures. The heavenly Father, bestowing food upon His sons in a general distribution, can impart a more copious meal to one son than to another. Indeed, God granted greater fecundity to the sheep of Jacob than to the sheep of Laban.

b) Specifically, to 1) Although God concurs with creatures every year, He has not so tied His hands that they do not have the faculty of bestowing more gifts in one year than in another. For God acts ordinarily with nature, and extraordinarily beyond the accustomed course of nature.

To 2) God concurs with an influx accommodated to the requirement, nature, and capacity of creatures. Hence it is that the formation of man is nobler than that of a beast.

3) Accurately speaking, the creature does not determine the general concurrence of God, but God, prospecting with the light of omniscience into which part freely acting agents will determine themselves, attempts His concurrence to them.

To 4) Supernatural acts, considered as to their generic being, as they are acts of the mind and will, are accompanied by the general concurrence of God; but considered as to their specific being, as they are spiritual, they are directed by the special concurrence of God.

Question XVIII. Should a prior or predetermined concurrence of God be established?

God concurs in the actions and effects of creatures not with a prior concurrence, but a simultaneous one; not predetermining, but gently disposing.

Proof. 1) Those who teach a prior concurrence commit a contradiction in the adjunct. For if God concurs, he does not pre-run; if he co-operates, he does not pre-operate. Premotion is an antecedent act; but concurrence does not precede, but happens when the action itself is produced.

2) Premotion, or predetermination, is terminated only at the cause, not at the action or effect of that cause. Therefore, the action itself and its effect do not depend on God after that premotion, but only the cause, which is impelled and moved; whereas divine cooperation is required for the very reason that the action and effect of the secondary cause depend on God.

3) Natural agents are already predetermined in creation to act ordinarily in a uniform manner, e.g., for water to moisten, fire to heat, the sun to shine; and so they do not need a predetermining divine concurrence.

4) If the divine concurrence were to predetermine free agents to an action, they would act necessarily, not freely. But divine concurrence does not remove the liberty of the will. For God concurs with secondary causes according to their nature, with free ones freely, with necessary ones necessarily, with weak ones weakly, with strong ones strongly, operating according to His most gentle universal disposition, says TOLETUS, l. 11. phys. c. 3. q. 8.

5) A predetermining concurrence has no place in the good or evil actions of men. If God were to predetermine by His concurrence to good actions, they could not resist the divine predetermination. But men often resist God, Acts VII, 51. God indeed permits the evil actions of men, not placing an inescapable impediment; but He determines no one to commit this or that sin; otherwise God would be the cause of sin.

The antithesis is of the Scotists and Dominicans, who assert that secondary causes, especially the will of man, are predetermined to act by a prior divine motion. Their arguments are:

I. Whoever has the heart of man in his hand, so as to bend it according to his will, he predetermines man to act; But God, etc. Therefore. The major is proved; because to bend the heart of man to act is the same as to predetermine. The minor is clear from Prov. XVI, 9; c. XXI, 1; Jer. X, 23. Response: Distinguish between a predetermination that necessitates action and a flexion that gently disposes and usefully directs to an end. God does not predetermine by imposing necessity on secondary causes or by captivating the liberty of human will, but He disposes gently in an ordinary manner, accommodating Himself to the inherent properties of created things. Hence, when God is said to incline the wills of men, this happens by a moral flexion through arguments, promises, threats: Just as a farmer directs streams, but does not necessitate their motion, by which they flow spontaneously. Thus, Samson's heart was inclined to love the Timnathite by the suasion of arguments by which his intellect was persuaded; to which Samson easily consented, already burning with a desire for revenge on the Philistines; otherwise he would have loved as necessarily as one who, having drunk a love potion, cannot not love; in which case Samson, while he was dying for the Philistine woman, would have been miserable. Thus God slips into the minds of men, and softens, bends, turns, moves them, whatever pleases Him; He does this not with certainty and force, but gently and easily, leaving to their minds free will and free choice, in the opinion of D. DANNHAY. in hodos. p. 317. Add that civil actions are ordinarily from free will, whose success is entirely from God; for man proposes, God disposes.

II. God concurs in the crucifixion of Christ with a predetermining concurrence: Therefore, it should not be denied here. The antecedent is proved: 1) because the crucifixion of Christ was a physical action, and therefore dependent on divine influx; 2) the Jews, by the definite counsel and foreknowledge of God, took him who was delivered up, and by lawless hands crucified and killed him, Acts II, 23, and so they did whatever the hand of God and his counsel had foreordained to be done, Acts IV, 28. Response: The crucifixion of Christ was a heinous sin, concerning which three things are to be observed: 1) The remote material, which was the physical action, considered indeterminately, to which God concurs with an active and direct influx, on account of the dependence of the secondary cause on the first; 2) The proximate material, which is the action determined and applied to the most innocent Jesus; which is not to be attributed to the divine concurrence, which is general and indeterminate, but to lawless hands, Acts II, 23; 3) The lawlessness (ἀνομία) and disorder (ἀταξία), which is not to be imputed to the most holy and perfect God, but to the erring Jews, who deflected from the rule of right. Meanwhile, the most wise counsel of God permitted this atrocious sin, set limits to it, and directed it to a good end, which is the redemption of the human race. Whence Peter says that the hand and counsel of God had foreordained, not that they should do, but that things should be done; Which word refers to the end for which God permitted the crucifixion of Christ.

III. A secondary cause does not act unless it is moved by the first; Therefore, it cannot act unless it is predetermined by God to act. The consequence is proved; because predetermination is nothing other than a prior, or antecedent, motion. Response: 1) Between a principal and an instrumental cause, there is indeed this order, that one moves the other; But between a first and a secondary cause, this order does not intervene, that one moves the other; since a secondary cause is not properly an instrument; but one is prior to the other in perfection, illimitation, and necessity. Thus the human will, because it is free, has a virtue in itself by which, an object being shown, it can move itself. 2) Although we do not deny that God sometimes specially moves agents, both natural and free, both efficiently, by impressing a quality or inserting a good thought; and objectively, by presenting an object convenient to the agent's nature, or congruent with the present disposition of the divine will; yet that prior motion is not predetermining or imposing necessity, but gently disposing and easily bending, by which the liberty of acting is not removed.

IV. The evangelical doctors themselves teach that God determines the actions of creatures. See KOENIG's th. posit. p. 59. Response: The evangelical doctors understand a determination not necessitating, but limiting. The former imposes necessity, so that the agent cannot not act; The latter places limits with respect to time and degree, within which the agent contains itself.

Question XIX. What is the governance of God?

Governance. The governance of God is an act of divine providence by which God, according to the counsel of His will, most freely orders, moderates, and directs all created things, and their powers, actions, and passions, to their proposed ends; the glory of the creator, the good of this universe, and the salvation of men, especially the pious.

Proof. God governs us with the greatest indulgence, Wisdom XII, 18. For He is the king of the whole world, because He is its creator, whose providence (πρόνοια) governs all things, Wisdom XIV, 3. He is king of kings, Dan. II, 47; 1 Tim. VI, 15, Lord of all, Deut. X, 17; 1 Chron. XXIX, 11, 12.

Question XX. What is the end of divine providence?

The end of providence. The ultimate end of divine providence is the glory of God a); The general intermediate end is the good of this universe b), the special end is the temporal and eternal salvation of pious men c).

Proof a. God "works all things according to the counsel of his will, that we should be to the praise of his glory." Eph. I, 11, 12. From the conserving, cooperating, and governing providence of God, the glory of divine power, goodness, and wisdom flourishes. For God most powerfully conserves the macrocosm and the microcosm (man), cooperates with acting creatures in the best and most gentle manner, and governs all actions and passions most wisely.

Proof b. Just as God originally created all things good, Gen. I, 31, so He procures the good of all. For "he loves all things that exist, and abhors none of the things that he has made," Wisdom XI, 24. Because God loves all things that He has made, He desires the good of all to be promoted and established.

Proof c. The ever-watchful care of the eternal deity directs all things for the benefit of pious men; about which the most pious king sang excellently, Ps. XXXIII, 18. "Behold, the eye of Jehovah is on those who fear him, on those who hope in his steadfast love, that he may deliver their soul from death and keep them alive in famine." Hence it is that for those who love God, all things work together for good, Rom. VIII, 28.

Question XXI. How is the providence of God distinguished?

Distinction of providence. The providence of God is distinguished a) into general and special. The former is that by which God conserves and governs the whole globe of the earth, and whatever is contained in its compass; The latter is that by which God most benignly regards, most clemently cherishes, and most gently rules the church, both militant, that is, the assembly of faithful men, and triumphant, that is, the choir of angels and elect men. b) Into ordinary and extraordinary. The former is that by which God acts according to the predefined law of nature; The latter is that by which God operates above the established order of nature. c) Into that which is occupied with good, and that which is occupied with moral evil. The former is that which protects the good of creatures by conserving it, promotes it by cooperating, and directs it to the praise of divine glory by governing; The latter is that by which God is concerned with moral evil not as an idle spectator, but as a most just judge, and so exerts justice, tempered by His grace, in the acts antecedent to, concomitant with, and consequent upon sin.

Proof a) The difference between the general and special providence of God is taught by Christ Himself, Matth. VI, 26. "Look at the birds of the air; they neither sow nor reap nor gather into barns, and yet your heavenly Father feeds them. Are you not of more value than they?" As if to say, God exercises a general care for the birds, but a special and excellent care for pious men, as His sons.

b) Although God for the most part accommodates the acts of His providence to the nature and properties of creatures, yet He has not so bound Himself to the powers of creatures that He cannot act above them. Thus, at the nod of God, the sun stands still, a donkey speaks, water turns into wine. All miracles are effects of the extraordinary providence of God.

c) That God is not an idle spectator of sins, just as men on holiday come to watch stage plays, but is indeed their most just, yet placable judge, is clearly evident from the acts of divine providence which either precede, or accompany, or follow the consummation of sin.

Question XXII. Which acts of divine providence precede sin?

Antecedent to the consummation of sin are a) prevision, or divine prescience, b) aversion to the foreseen sin, c) prevention.

Proof a) That God foresaw the perfidy and inobedience of the people of Israel, we perceive from Is. XLVIII, 8. "I knew that you would surely deal treacherously, and that from birth you were called a transgressor." This divine prevision of sins, though infallible, is not, however, absolutely necessitating. Hence the following sophism is fallacious: Whatever God foresees, that happens necessarily; But sin, etc. Therefore. Response: Distinguish between the necessity of the consequent and of the consequence. Although sins happen necessarily, as they are foreseen by God, that necessity is nevertheless of the consequence, not of the consequent; it is hypothetical, not absolute. For sins will not happen because they are foreseen; but they are foreseen because they will certainly happen.

b) "You are not a God who delights in wickedness; evil shall not dwell with you." Ps. V, 4. God not only does not delight in impiety, but He detests it exceedingly, and does not deign to give His special grace to the architects of crimes.

You say: I. Without God simply not willing, or in no way willing, nothing happens; for "who can resist God's will?" Rom. IX, 19. Response: Sins happen not with God simply being unwilling, or against His will; for no one can oppose the absolute will and power of God; nor with Him simply willing; because God neither approves of sins nor delights in them; but with Him not willing, that is, permitting. Between nolle (to be unwilling) and non velle (to not will) there is this difference, that the former denotes a privation of will with repugnance and contrary action; but the latter denotes a privation of will, without violent reluctance. God does not will evil, but only the permission of evil.

You say: II. God does not indeed will sin formally and per se, as it is lawlessness (ἀνομία); but He wills it as a means of exercising vindictive justice. Response: God does not will sin as a means of exercising vindictive justice, but the act of sin being foreseen and supposed, God cannot but exercise His vindictive justice.

Proof c. God impedes both the will and the faculty of the sinner. He impedes the will 1) by prohibiting it by the word of the law, Exod. XX. 2) by distracting it through men, Gen. XXXVII, 22. 3) internally through the Holy Spirit, struggling against the flesh, which is inclined to illicit pleasures, Gal. V, 17. 4) extraordinarily by terrifying through dreams, Gen. XX, 3. He impedes the faculty 1) by the removal of life, e.g., the suffocation of Pharaoh, 2) by the removal of the object, e.g., of Ahithophel, through Hushai, 3) by the opposition of a greater power, thus angelic powers oppose human forces, 2 Kings VI, 16. 4) by perturbation of the mind, 2 Kings VII, 6. 5) by the diminution of powers, 1 Kings XIII, 4.

Question XXIII. Which acts of divine providence accompany sin?

The acts of divine providence accompanying sin are: the sustentation of the evil-doing nature a), concurrence in the remote material of the vicious action b), the permission of the disorder (ἀταξία) adhering to the sinful action c), the limiting determination of the sin d), and the direction to a good end e).

Proof a. God declares His long-suffering (μακροθυμίαν), or longanimity, in that He sustains the members of the sinner, which are weapons of injustice, and does not always destroy the malefactor in the flagrant act of sin; Which goodness of God leads the sinner to repentance. Rom. II, 4.

Proof b. The remote material of sin is the physical action, in which God co-flows; But He does not concur in the action applied or determined to a prohibited object (which is the proximate material of sin), because the determination is from secondary causes acting freely, not from the general, indifferent, and indeterminate concurrence of God.

Proof c. Divine permission is not 1) a bland indulgence, as if God did not care at all when men commit crimes; Nor is it 2) a relaxation of the law, as if He permits a license for sinning to men; Nor 3) is it an impotence in God, or a defect of knowledge, as if He wills or approves evil; or a defect of power, as if He cannot restrain sin; Nor 4) does it make God an idle spectator of sins, who neither forbids sins, nor sets a limit to malice, nor coerces crimes with punishments; But it is 5) a negative act, consisting in the negation or suspension of an inescapable impediment. God could indeed, by placing a violent or insuperable impediment, restrain or coerce a sinner; but the most holy deity has most just causes for permitting sin. Meanwhile, He restrains the will of the sinning man with a legal impediment and from time to time invites the sinner to repentance with proposed punishments and rewards.

You say: Sins follow divine permission; Therefore, God, by permitting sins, is their indirect and accidental cause. I respond. An indirect cause of sin is that which can and ought to prevent it. God, however, is bound by no law to restrain sin with violent impediment. Sins indeed follow divine permission eventually, but not causally.

Proof d. God determines sin, setting limits both to the duration and to the atrocity of the crime. The Israelite church venerates this determining providence of God in Psalm CXXIV, 2: "If the LORD had not been on our side, when man rose up against us, then they would have swallowed us up alive, when their wrath was kindled against us." God permits the enemies of celestial truth to rage against the church, but He predefines the limits of their savagery, lest they vomit forth all the poison of their bitterness. The tyrant Pharaoh had in his hope devoured the Israelites; but the supreme arbiter of things halted his monstrous attack.

Proof e. Joseph praises the direction of divine providence toward its proposed end, in Genesis L, 20: "You indeed thought evil against me; but God thought it for good, that he might do according to this day to save a great people." Joseph's brothers had sold him, thinking he would be a most miserable slave. But God turned misery into glory, the burden of servitude into an honor next to the royal summit, the adverse fortune of the son into the second fortune of the father and brothers.

Question XXIV. Which acts of divine providence follow sin?

The acts that follow sin are the imposition of divine punishments a), and the remission of sins b).

Proof a. The most just God vindicates crimes with spiritual and corporal punishment. Spiritual punishments are desertion, or the subtraction of grace, consternation, being handed over to the power of Satan, blinding, and hardening. Corporal punishment is either temporal or eternal. The temporal is either singular, hereditary, or epidemic. For God does not absolve the guilty, but visits "the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation," Exodus XXXIV, 7.

Proof b. To repentant sinners, God remits the guilt and the punishment. "Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." Acts III, 19.

Question XXV. How do you transfer the doctrine of the providence of God to practice?

A deeper consideration of divine providence should excite in our souls an indubitable trust a), an ardent love b), a filial fear c), and a submissive veneration of God, the best and greatest d).

Proof a. Let us adhere with firm trust to God who dispenses all things, and let us cast the whole weight of our cares upon Him. The most pious king teaches us this, in Psalm LV, 22: "Cast your burden upon the LORD, and he shall sustain you." To which St. Peter gives his suffrage, in his Epistle, c. V, 7: "Cast all your care upon him; for he cares for you." AUGUSTINE says aptly in his commentary on Psalm XXXIX: "How will He who had care of you before you were, not have care of you, when you are now what He willed you to be?"

Proof b. God, the inspector and rector of our life, is most worthy of ardent and constant love. For just as no moment passes in which we do not enjoy the goodness of God, so let no moment flow by in which our heart does not grow warm with the love of God, and consecrate itself entirely to Him.

Proof c. Wherever we stand, let us fear the eyes of God, lest we offend this omnipotent governor and all-seeing judge with sins, and cut short the thread of our life; "for bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days," Psalm LV, 23.

Proof d. God is to be venerated with pious prayers and acts of thanksgiving at every hour, without omission. Through prayers, we become partakers of the benefits which the providence of God dispenses. For "the LORD is nigh unto all them that call upon him; to all that call upon him in truth. He will fulfil the desire of them that fear him; he also will hear their cry, and will save them," Psalm CXLV, 18-19. Prayers are like channels, through which the streams of divine charisms descend into us: Through the act of thanksgiving, those streams are led back to their source, which is the most exuberant goodness of God. Wherefore, "bless ye the God of all, which only doeth wondrous things everywhere, which exalteth our days from the womb, and dealeth with us according to his mercy." Sirach 50:22.

SUSPIRIUM

Dour provident care, SUPREME ARBITER of things, embraces, sustains, fosters, and governs all created things, and especially faithful men; I silently admire it, gratefully acknowledge it, and joyfully proclaim it. All the hope of the pious is placed in your providence: all prosperity is suspended from your most wise governance. You, LORD, will provide, and indeed You have provided from eternity. You have gifted me with light and life: at the first threshold of life, by Your most high counsel, You led me in a wonderful way: You have brought the harsh labors of youth to their desired outcomes. In my manhood, You assigned me a sacred station, and then You inspired me with the strength to maintain it. Without a murmur, I have followed your nod, and I will follow it hereafter, tireless, in the whole course of my life. This one thing I most humbly pray from You, that You would fill my heart with Your most HOLY SPIRIT, show me the ways and reasons for walking rightly, turn my mind away from the crooked paths of errors and sins, and finally, after I have been exercised by various labors, command me to enter the tranquil port of eternal beatitude.

CHAPTER VII.
ON THE FORMAL END OF THEOLOGY, THE BEATIFIC VISION AND FRUITION OF GOD

Question I. What do you call the formal end of theology?

THE FORMAL END of theology is the attainment of the highest good a), and it is a certain perfect operation of the rational soul concerning God, by which it is made a participant in His goodness in such a way that it is most fully satisfied by the same b). It is otherwise called blessedness c), and eternal life d). The formal end of theology.

Proof a. In practical disciplines, the formal end is the acquisition and possession of that good for the sake of which the science exists. From which THOMAS in I-II, q. 1, a. 8, says: "Blessedness denotes the attainment of the ultimate end" (*).

Proof b. The concept of blessedness itself indicates that the attainment of the ultimate end and the highest good consists in a certain operation of the rational soul. For the common person and the wise alike use "blessedness," "a blessed life," "to be blessed," and "to live blessedly" interchangeably. Since, however, the vital operations in man are threefold—vegetative, sensitive, and rational—the attainment of the ultimate end and the highest good can be established in none other than the rational soul. For the highest good is man's proper good, which befits him insofar as he is man. Therefore, it is obtained only through man's proper operation, and that which befits him as man. But the operations of the sensitive soul are common to man with brute animals, and the (*) "Beatitudo" (blessedness) and "beatitas" (state of being blessed), are not, indeed, sufficiently Latin nouns. CICERO in De Natura Deorum, Book I, ch. 34, says: "Both are altogether harsh, but by use the words must be softened for us." As to the meaning of the noun, the ancient writers subjected such power to it that they designated not just any happiness, not an inchoate and imperfect one, but one altogether complete, fulfilled in all its numbers and parts. Thus CICERO, Tusculan Disputations, Book V, ch. 8: "He who is blessed, I do not understand what he requires to be more blessed." And ch. 10: "They are called blessed who are in possession of goods, with no evil joined." In the sacred letters, this word sometimes has a broader scope, and generally denotes a good condition, by which one excels another, Acts XX, 35. And even he who is indeed unhappy, but yet more fortunate than others whom graver misfortunes press, is named blessed, Luke XXIII, 29. But for the most part, it is used in a stricter sense 1) of the highest and infinite perfection, when God, and He alone, is called blessed, 1 Timothy I, 11; VI, 15. 2) Of the perfect fruit of the highest good, insofar as it can fall to a finite nature, and the attainment, possession, and enjoyment of the highest end, so perfect that nothing more can be desired, and indeed so certain that no evil need ever be feared; which is the blessedness of men, and indeed, consummate blessedness. Matthew V, 8.

vegetative even with plants. It remains, therefore, that the blessedness of man formally consists in the operation of the rational soul alone.

Proof c. Blessedness is attributed to the one who sees God, Matthew V, 8. Therefore, the operation of the intelligent soul, knowing God intuitively, is rightly called Blessedness.

Proof d. Blessedness is called eternal life, John III, 15. By this word it is implied that the operation of the intellect and will, by which man possesses and enjoys God as his ultimate end and highest good, is vital, and that it is most happy and most constant. For life here is not regarded merely in itself, as the bare existence of living beings—which indeed also belongs to the damned in hell, whose state, however, is called eternal death in the sacred writings, never eternal life—but is considered in the present according to the most happy condition and operation of the living.

Observation. Eternal life is here pre-cognized as the formal end of theology, to which the means of grace and salvation are to be directed. In the third part of theology, where the acts of applying divine grace are examined, it is considered as the effect of glorifying grace. For this reason, although eternal blessedness, taken in its full latitude, embraces all the internal and external goods with which the elect are perfected and adorned in heaven, yet in the present, considered according to its intrinsic and formal reason, it denotes the vital operation of the intellectual soul, by which an elect man, having departed from this life, possesses and fully enjoys God, his highest good, in the celestial fatherland.

Question II. From what principle is the eternal blessedness of man known?

The existence of eternal blessedness. A solid and clear knowledge of eternal blessedness is drawn from the scripture of the Old a), and New Testaments b). From the principles of reason, however, we know to some extent that God is the highest good of man c), that the human soul is immortal d), and that after this life there is another life, in which it will be well for the good, and ill for the wicked e). But reason, left to itself, is ignorant of the formal reason of eternal blessedness f).

Proof a. We know clearly from the prophetic writings of the Old Testament that there is an eternal blessedness. For 1) God threatens: "In whatever day you eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, you shall die the death." Genesis II, 17. Therefore, He signifies that one would live eternally if he did not eat. For the most just God, to those men who were to transgress His law, threatened death; to those who were to observe the law (because the principle of contraries is contrary), He promised life. But to the first parents and in them to all, He threatened death. Therefore. 2) After the fall, God promised the seed of the woman, the meritorious cause of eternal salvation. "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," Genesis III, 15, i.e., it will destroy the kingdom of Satan, take away death, and bring back perfect righteousness and eternal life. 3) To those who keep the prescribed law, God promised eternal life; "Keep my statutes... for the man who does them shall live by them," Leviticus XVIII, 5, i.e., he will obtain eternal life, for Christ, to the question: "How shall I obtain eternal life?" replied only this: "Keep the commandments," Luke XVIII, 20, alluding to the passage in Leviticus XIX, 5, which the apostle also in Romans X, 5, and Galatians III, 12, expounds concerning eternal life. 4) The prophets teach that men who finally believe will, by the grace of God, obtain eternal life, Habakkuk II, 4. "The just shall live by his faith." That eternal life is noted here, the apostle teaches in Romans I, 17, Galatians III, 11, Hebrews X, 38, and Daniel XII, 2. "Many... shall awake... to everlasting life." 5) Reborn men of the Old Testament raised and refreshed their souls with the hope of eternal life. Jacob, near death, says in Genesis XLIX, 18: "I have waited for your salvation, O LORD." The patriarch was looking not for a temporary and transient salvation; for he said in Genesis XLVIII, 21: "Behold, I die," but for an eternal one, which he most firmly believed and expected for himself on account of the Messiah to be given. 6) God translated Enoch and Elijah, candidates for eternity, alive into heaven, so that we might rest on the most certain hope of future blessedness. On this Job relied, ch. XIX, 26-27: "in my flesh I shall see God."

Proof b. The scripture of the New Testament most lucidly and indeed in passage after passage inculcates that men who perseveringly believe in Jesus will obtain eternal life, John III, 16, an incorruptible inheritance, 1 Peter I, 4, eternal salvation, Hebrews V, 9.

Proof c. Human reason conceives God as the first being, who is from Himself and the cause of other things; and who conserves and governs all things. This being, surely, as it is the first, so it is also the last, and is a good to be sought for its own sake. Wherefore, true blessedness can neither be sought nor found, except in the attainment and possession of this highest good.

Proof d. The light of nature teaches that everything tends toward an end proportionate to itself, and having obtained it, is blessed. It further teaches that the soul is not perishable, but immortal. Therefore, it tends toward an eternal end, which is its blessedness. The human soul is immortal because it is a spirit. Its spiritual nature is testified by its invisibility, its power to penetrate bodies, and its perichoretic information of them, as well as its operations independent of matter, which demonstrate that the form itself is independent of matter, i.e., immaterial, and therefore immortal; since a cause is not inferior to, or less noble than, its effect. Surely the acts of the rational soul, e.g., to contemplate God, eternal things, intelligible species, to abstract universals from singulars, to reflect upon itself, to infer the future from the past, to deliberate prudently about the future, and to freely choose what is good, are independent of matter and can be produced without any cooperation of the body, and are therefore spiritual. Therefore, the soul itself must be a spirit.

Proof e. Led by the light of nature, we know that divine providence governs all things and directs them to ends suitable for each thing. Since, therefore, we experience in reality that in this life all joyful things often accompany the wicked, and all sad things the good, we not groundlessly conclude that for divine providence and justice another life remains, where, conversely, it will be well for the good and ill for the wicked, about which the domestic tribunal of conscience passes sentence on each one (*).

(*) Allow me to adduce some things to declare these arguments a little more fully.
